NORTHERN IRELAND ASSEMBLY

Monday 14 September 2009

The Assembly met at 12.00 noon (Mr Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

SPEAKER'S BUSINESS

Mr Speaker: Order. Before we proceed, I wish to refer to points of order that were raised during sittings that were held immediately before the summer recess. Those points of order related to a range of issues, and, in response to those that concerned the chairing of debates, I remind the House once again of the authority of the Chair: decisions that I or that the Deputy Speakers acting on my behalf make are not open to challenge. For some bedtime reading I refer Members to Standing Order 17, which concerns speeches in the Assembly, so that they might better understand exactly what I am saying about the authority of the Speaker.

In response to points of order relating to remarks made by Members about other Members, I consider several Members' remarks to have fallen short of the standard of good temper and moderation in the Chamber. Where appropriate, I have dealt with those issues by either meeting with or writing to the Members concerned. I will not, therefore, take any further points of order on those issues. However, I hope that, as we commence a new session, Members will share my determination and that of the House that we should conduct ourselves with good temper and moderation and in ways that justify the support of those whom the Assembly was elected to serve. I hope that the whole House supports my comments on the matter.

PERSONAL STATEMENT

Mr Speaker: I advise the House that Mr Declan O'Loan has sought leave to make a personal statement to the Assembly.

Mr O'Loan: I note what you have said and hope to continue in the spirit and manner that you have indicated. On 29 June, I commented in the Chamber on remarks that had been made by another Member in a previous debate. During my contribution I used the word "misleading". I am given to understand that the term "misleading" is technically regarded as unparliamentary language and, for that reason, I am prepared to withdraw my use of the word "misleading".

Mr Speaker: I thank the Member for conducting himself in such an appropriate manner. As with all personal statements, I will not allow any further comment or debate on that matter.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE BUSINESS

Budget (No.2) Bill

Royal Assent

Mr Speaker: I inform Members that the Budget (No.2) Bill has received Royal Assent. The Budget (No.2) Act (Northern Ireland) 2009 became law on 8 July 2009.

ASSEMBLY BUSINESS

Committee Chairperson and Deputy Chairperson Changes: Sinn Féin

Mr Speaker: I advise Members that I received notification of the resignation of Mitchel McLaughlin as Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel with effect from 8 September. Furthermore, I received notification of the resignation of Jennifer McCann as Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment with effect from 8 September.

The nominating officer for Sinn Féin, Pat Doherty, has nominated Jennifer McCann as Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel and Paul Butler as Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment with effect from 8 September. Ms McCann and Mr Butler have accepted the appointments.

I am satisfied that the correspondence meets the requirements of Standing Orders and, therefore, confirm Jennifer McCann as Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel and Paul Butler as Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment with effect from 8 September.

Committee of the Regions

Resolved:

That this Assembly nominates Mr Francie Molloy as a full member, and Mr John Dallat as an alternate member on the UK delegation to the Committee of the Regions; and notes that the Northern Ireland Local Government Association has nominated Councillor Jonathan Bell as a full member, and Councillor Arnold Hatch as an alternate member. — [Lord Morrow.]

Assembly Commission

Mr Speaker: I have been notified that Paul Butler has resigned as a member of the Assembly Commission with effect from 9 September. In accordance with Standing Order 79(4), the vacancy must be filled within 28 days. As with other similar motions, the motion to appoint a Member to fill that vacancy will be treated as a business motion and, therefore, there will be no debate. Before I proceed to the Question, I advise Members that the motion requires cross-community support.

Resolved (with cross-community support):

That, in accordance with Standing Order 79(4), Mr Pat Doherty be appointed to fill a vacancy on the Assembly Commission. — [Ms Ní Chuilín.]

MINISTERIAL STATEMENTS

North/South Ministerial Council Plenary Meeting

Mr Speaker: I have received notice from the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister that the deputy First Minister wishes to make a statement on the North/South Ministerial Council (NSMC) plenary meeting.

The deputy First Minister (Mr M McGuinness): Fáilte ar ais go léir. In compliance with section 52C(2) of the Northern Ireland Act 1998, we wish to make the following statement on the eighth meeting of the North/South Ministerial Council in plenary format, which was held in Farmleigh House, Dublin, on Monday 6 July 2009. Our Ministers who attended the meeting have approved this report, and we make it on their behalf.

The Executive delegation was led by the First Minister, Peter Robinson MP MLA, and me. In addition, the following Executive Ministers were in attendance: Michelle Gildernew, Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development; Caitriona Ruane, Minister of Education; Conor Murphy, Minister for Regional Development; Margaret Ritchie, Minister for Social Development; junior Minister Kelly; and junior Minister Newton.

The Irish Government delegation was led by the Taoiseach, Brian Cowen TD, who chaired the meeting. The Irish Government delegation comprised Mary Coughlan TD, Tánaiste and Minister for Enterprise, Trade and Employment; Brian Lenihan TD, Minister for Finance; Noel Dempsey TD, Minister for Transport; Dermot Ahern TD, Minister for Justice, Equality and Law Reform; Micheál Martin TD, Minister for Foreign Affairs; Éamon Ó Cuív TD, Minister for Community, Rural and Gaeltacht Affairs; Mary Hanafin TD, Minister for Social and Family Affairs; John Gormley TD, Minister for the Environment, Heritage and Local Government; Eamon Ryan TD, Minister for Communications, Energy and Natural Resources; Brendan Smith TD, Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food; and Batt O’Keeffe TD, Minister for Education and Science.

During the meeting we had a broad discussion with the Taoiseach and Irish Government Ministers about the common economic challenges facing us and our respective responses to dealing with the downturn and its impact, particularly on the banking sector in both jurisdictions. The Taoiseach outlined the Irish Government’s intention to establish a national asset management agency (NAMA). Ministers agreed that an early meeting of the two Finance Ministers will take place to discuss those issues.

We noted the contribution of continuing practical and mutually beneficial North/South co-operation to assisting both Administrations in our efforts to promote growth and employment. The Council received a progress report that the NSMC joint secretaries had prepared on the nine NSMC ministerial meetings that have been held since the most recent plenary meeting in January 2009, and we welcomed the progress made.

We noted the close co-operation on the recent influenza A(H1N1) outbreak. We welcomed the agreement on a framework for the removal of waste that is illegally dumped here. The Council also noted progress on introducing the mutual recognition of driving licence disqualifications later this year and on developing a co-ordinated approach to the introduction of lower blood:alcohol limits. We welcomed the intensified co-operation on child protection, including Internet safety, the development of a protocol for the movement of vulnerable children and families across borders and advice and guidance on safeguarding arrangements for parents, carers and employers. Ministers noted progress on suicide prevention, including proposals for revised media guidelines to incorporate advice on new technologies, including Internet-related suicides.

We welcomed the development of a draft all-island animal health and welfare strategy to facilitate free movement of animals, including plans for a cross-border event in autumn 2009 to bring together key stakeholders to discuss delivery of the strategy. Ministers noted a joint programme of research that was commissioned by the Loughs Agency, which has played a leading role in the development of a Europe-wide research project on use of genetic techniques to identify origins of salmon caught at sea (SALSEA).

The Council welcomed the continued co-operation in education on the approaches to the integration of newcomer children in schools. We noted the further development of the border people website — www.borderpeople.info — the publication by the main banks of information on the cost of cross-border transactions and progress on the transfer of pension rights on a cross-border basis.

The Council also discussed progress on the achievement of efficiency savings and the business plans of the North/South bodies and Tourism Ireland and noted the need for early decisions on those matters.

The Council considered a paper on the progress of the A5 and A8 roads projects. It welcomed good progress on the A5 Aughnacloy to north-west and A8 Belfast to Larne road projects and noted that an important milestone, the confirmation of the preferred routes, is to be announced shortly. The Council therefore agreed that payment of €9 million will be made by the Irish Government’s Minister for Transport to the NI Consolidated Fund before the end of 2009, in accordance with an agreed payments procedure. The Council agreed to consider a further progress report at the next NSMC plenary sitting.

The Council considered a paper on the St Andrews Agreement review. It noted that the review group is continuing its consideration of the experts' and advisers' report on the efficiency and value for money of the existing implementation bodies and Tourism Ireland Limited. The Council also confirmed its intention to conclude the St Andrews review process before the end of 2009. It instructed the review group to accelerate its work on all elements of the review and to provide a final report to the next NSMC plenary sitting.

The Council also confirmed its intention, on the conclusion of the review, to refer the recommendations emerging from the review process to the relevant Departments, North and South, for consideration and appropriate action, mindful that any changes to the existing arrangements will require the specific endorsement of the Assembly and Oireachtas.

The Council considered a paper on a North/South consultative forum. It noted the Executive's ongoing review of the Civic Forum, and agreed to bring discussions on the North/South consultative forum to an early conclusion. It recalled that the Irish Government made a proposal to the Executive on a North/South consultative forum following the conclusion of their consultations with social partners and other groups from civic society in 2008.

Ministers considered a paper on a North/South parliamentary forum. We welcomed the establishment of two working groups by the Oireachtas and the Northern Assembly respectively to progress discussions on the establishment of a North/South parliamentary forum. We noted that the agreement to establish a forum is a matter for the Assembly and Oireachtas respectively and agreed to review progress at the next North/South Ministerial Council plenary sitting.

The Council considered a paper on future North/South Ministerial Council meetings and approved a schedule of NSMC meetings to take place over the coming months. It was agreed that the next meeting in plenary format will be hosted by the Executive in November or December 2009.

The Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister (Mr Kennedy): I am grateful for the opportunity to ask the deputy First Minister a couple of questions: one as Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister and the second as a political representative.

Does the Minister accept that the impact of assets potentially being sold off in Northern Ireland by the Republic's national asset management agency (NAMA) could have a serious impact on the Northern Ireland economy during what is a very difficult time? What assurances, if any, has the Minister received?

Will the Minister outline what effect the speech made by his colleague the First Minister on Tuesday 8 September at the Ulster Hall regarding Assembly reform will have on the Council's St Andrews Agreement review?

The deputy First Minister: The size of the portfolio of loans residing here would have a critical impact on the local economy. Minister Lenihan indicated to Minister Wilson that the level of Northern loans likely to be transferred to NAMA could total around £4.8 billion. However, even if £4.8 billion of local assets were to be exposed, it would have considerable implications for our economy, as that is equivalent to around one quarter of its output.

The cross-jurisdictional implications are significant and include the absence of statements on the discount to be applied to Irish bank loans and the precise length of time for which NAMA will operate. A longer lifespan and larger discount would allow NAMA to pursue loans less aggressively, and it is our view that a short life and small discount would be disadvantageous. The big concern in the North — it is most relevant to land banks — is the possibility of a fire sale, which could have a very damaging and distorting effect on our economy. The Irish Government, through Minister Lenihan, have stated that they are conscious of our concerns. The recent meeting between our Finance Minister, Sammy Wilson, and Minister Lenihan was very useful, and we will continue to observe closely what happens in that regard.

The St Andrews Agreement review was discussed at the plenary meeting, and we welcomed the progress that has been made by the review group. The review group is continuing its consideration of the expert advisers' report on the efficiency and value for money of the existing implementation bodies. The Council wants the St Andrews Agreement review process to be concluded before the end of this year. It has instructed the review group to accelerate its work on all remaining elements of the review so that a final report can be brought to the next NSMC plenary meeting. On conclusion of the review process, it is intended that the recommendations that emerge will be referred to the relevant Departments, North and South, for their consideration and appropriate action.

Any attempt to draw me into a political discussion about recent speeches, comments or interviews given by the First Minister or me is doomed to failure.

Mr Speaker: Order. I remind Members that, as far as possible, questions should relate to the statement that we are discussing on the Floor.

Mr Moutray: Can the deputy First Minister confirm that the yet-to-be-agreed proposal for an all-island animal health and welfare strategy is not a crude attempt to remove the UK stamp from Northern Ireland produce?

The deputy First Minister: The NSMC welcomes the progress that has been made on the development of a draft all-island animal health and welfare strategy. The draft strategy sets out the high degree of co-operation that there has been on a range of animal health and welfare issues. It seeks to provide a strategic framework for co-operating on policies through a number of North/South working groups. The ultimate aim is to secure the free movement of animals on the island of Ireland. Full co-operation on animal health issues has the potential to help to reduce or prevent the spread of animal disease, facilitate trade and improve the sustainability of farming on the island.

When it is agreed, the strategy will facilitate trade by optimising the animal health status of the island through the alignment of policies to control animal disease. It will ultimately provide both jurisdictions with the basis to seek international recognition and develop and enhance the island's animal health and welfare status. It will also provide a foundation on which we can build our trading position and animal health status. The key stakeholders will be brought together at an event that is scheduled for later this year. That event will help to build genuine partnership on the development of policy and enable stakeholders to discuss the strategic approach and forward work programme. As in all of our efforts, we need to aim for as much agreement as possible.

Mr Brady: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Will the Minister update the Assembly on the development of the Narrow Water bridge project?

The deputy First Minister: The NSMC noted that Louth County Council has completed significant work on the Narrow Water bridge and is to undertake a further appraisal of the proposed project prior to progression through the statutory processes. Members may be aware that Roads Service employed consultants to undertake a feasibility study of a Newry southern relief road, which would link the A2 Warrenpoint road to the A1 just south of Newry. The council welcomed the continuing co-operation between officials of Roads Service and Louth County Council in that regard.

I understand that Minister Murphy intends to share the executive summary of the consultants' feasibility report on the Newry southern relief road with local representatives and the community later this month.

Mr Attwood: I welcome the report and the deputy First Minister's reply to Mr Kennedy's comment on NAMA. At least the deputy First Minister, in contrast to his party leader, has demonstrated that he has an interest in the economy. Last week, Gerry Adams said that he had no interest in such matters.

I suggest two ways in which the deputy First Minister could inject momentum into the political process. First, the report confirms that phase one of the North/South review is being considered by the review group. Is it not time for that document to be published for all to consider? If the First Minister is so interested in accountability on North/South matters, why has it not been agreed to publish the report? That would enable the political parties and the public on this island to draw their own conclusions on how well North/South co-operation is working.

Secondly, will the deputy First Minister say categorically to the Assembly that the business of the North/South parliamentary forum is to be progressed exclusively by the two working groups in the Assembly and the Oireachtas and that he and the First Minister are placing no impediment to their work proceeding and recommendations being published as soon as possible? Some people consider that the work of those two groups is being —

A Member: Held back?

Mr Attwood: Thank you.

[Laughter.]

The deputy First Minister: The Member knows as well as anyone in the Assembly that the work on the review is being undertaken under the auspices of the North/South Ministerial Council. Quite a number of Ministers from North and South attends Council meetings. Any report or other outcome of the Council's deliberations must first be presented to that body and no one else.

It has been agreed that the joint parliamentary forum is a matter for the Assembly and the Oireachtas. We look forward to reviewing progress at the next NSMC meeting. The fact that the process has been agreed and that people are meeting indicates that, at least on our part, a genuine attempt is being made. The Speaker is also involved in some of the discussions. It is important to leave the groups to complete their work and report to a plenary meeting of the NSMC. As far as the review and the parliamentary forum are concerned, it would be wrong of the First Minister and me to take away the rights of a body that was established under the tutelage of the Governments, North and South.

Dr Farry: I also welcome the deputy First Minister to the Chamber. I stress that my party's hope is that today marks the start of a productive session of the Assembly, in contrast to those in the past.

Will the deputy First Minister assure the House that the scope of the review of the North/South bodies will be sufficient to take efficiencies into account? Will it also ensure that as many economies of scale as possible are achieved in services by both Governments? Will he assure the House that a proper audit is being carried out to ensure that no opportunities for North/South co-operation, particularly in modernising the economy, are missed? Mutual challenges face the two Governments in growing the green economy through a process of rebalancing and modernisation.

The deputy First Minister: The efficiency programme was proposed at the NSMC meeting to reflect the wider efficiency programme arising from the revised Budget Estimates in the South. North/South bodies, in common with all public bodies, should deliver their objectives and programmes efficiently. A 3% per annum cumulative cash-releasing efficiency savings programme for 2009 and 2010 has been agreed by the two Finance Ministers. The next step is for sponsoring Departments to work with their North/South bodies to identify the efficiency savings required in 2009 and 2010 and to add that detail to their draft business plans.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr McClarty] in the Chair)

The revised 2009-2010 business plans should be submitted for the approval of the two Finance Ministers, followed by the NSMC.

12.30 pm

I am sure that we are all very conscious, particularly against the backdrop of the worldwide economic downturn, of the consistent need for all of us to challenge ourselves as to how we can best use resources in the interests of citizens, whether they be in Limerick, Kerry, Dublin, Dundalk, Belfast or Derry. There can be no doubt whatever that that will be a feature of the discussions on the review that is taking place.

Mr Shannon: The Minister mentioned swine flu in his statement. Will he outline the close co-operation between Northern Ireland and the Republic that he referred to? Will he confirm whether swine flu was discussed at the Council? Will he also describe the input of the local Health Minister in that process?

The deputy First Minister also mentioned suicide prevention, and he referred generally to the proposals to deal with it. Will he describe those suicide-prevention proposals in more detail? Many of us represent areas in which the suicide level is alarming, so I would like to know what the process for dealing with it is.

The deputy First Minister: At the plenary, Ministers welcomed the close co-operation on swine flu. We know that Minister McGimpsey has met Minister Harney, and there is departmental contact almost daily. The outbreak has affected both our jurisdictions, but, fortunately, the number of cases has been small so far. I am conscious of the fact that we are at the end of the summer and that we are moving into the autumn and winter when things could change.

As I said, Minister McGimpsey has spoken several times to Mary Harney since the outbreak began. I know that officials are also in regular contact to ensure that information and response plans are shared at an early stage. It is vital that we maintain that close co-operation. We must recognise that measures to contain the spread of the virus in one part of the island will be less effective if equally effective measures are not in place in the other part. As of last Friday, there have been 179 confirmed cases of swine flu here. In order to help to reduce the risk of transmission, the Public Health Agency has worked with family members and others who have been in close contact with the individuals concerned. GP consultation rates for flu and flu-like illnesses have decreased, but they remain significantly higher than the rates that were recorded in the same weeks of previous years. Obviously, this is an issue that we are dealing with very seriously. We all know that people's health does not recognise borders of any description, so it is critical that we work in very close co-operation.

At the plenary, we reviewed and welcomed progress on suicide prevention, including proposals for revised media guidelines to incorporate advice on new technologies, which include Internet-related suicides. Many of the issues that we face here are also challenges for the South. It is, therefore, important that we share learning and best practice from both jurisdictions.

The piloting of the national self-harm registry in the Western Health and Social Care Trust area is an example of such co-operation. It is pleasing to note that discussions are ongoing to extend that pilot into the Belfast area. It is most important that there is sensitive media reporting on suicide generally, and that is vital for specific cases. The development of updated all-island guidelines on media reporting is timely, as they will incorporate advice on new media technologies, including the Internet.

I share the Member's concern about the alarming figures that have been reported over recent days. All of us have to be very concerned about those, and there is probably not a person in this Assembly who has not had contact with some family that has been through that very traumatic experience. We have to do all in our power to ensure that we do what we can to help to deal with an obviously very difficult and complex subject. The work that is ongoing in the North and the South is valuable, but, like everything else, we are continuing to learn. At the end of that process, we want to be in a position to assure ourselves and our citizens that everything possible is being done to help in a really difficult situation for many families and, I contend, for society as a whole.

Mr McElduff: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Tá ceist agam don Aire.

Will the deputy First Minister update the Assembly on all-island child protection measures, particularly the management of sex offenders?

The deputy First Minister: Intensified North/South co-operation on child protection was welcomed at the plenary meeting, including on Internet safety, the development of a protocol for the movement of vulnerable children and families across borders, and advice and guidance on safeguarding arrangements for parents, carers and employers.

The five subgroups established under the auspices of the North/South Ministerial Council continue to meet regularly and to keep one another apprised of developments in their respective jurisdictions. Officials are considering how best to raise awareness of issues concerning Internet safety and social networking, and work is under way to jointly develop advice and guidance leaflets aimed at parents, carers, employers, and anyone concerned with children.

Officials in the North and South are also examining ways to develop and to strengthen current procedures for moving a child who is looked after or who is on the child protection register between jurisdictions. Cross-border discussions are continuing on the management of sex offenders. Both jurisdictions now use common assessment standards when dealing with sex offenders, and work is ongoing to bring legislation in both jurisdictions into line as much as possible.

Co-operation on child protection among agencies and jurisdictions is vital. OFMDFM recently published a major policy statement on safeguarding children, which brings together developments that are under way across Departments in the North, the NIO and the Courts Service. That has helped to identify gaps where further initiatives are required. OFMDFM welcomes any proposals that improve information sharing and that assist in the protection of the public in respect of offenders moving between the two jurisdictions.

Mr I McCrea: The deputy First Minister referred to efficiency savings. Mind you, when he read out the attendance list for the NSMC plenary meeting, I thought that every member of the Dáil was there. I believe that I counted 11 if not 12 Members who attended. Reducing that number would certainly be a good start on efficiency savings.

However, the deputy First Minister referred in his statement to progress on the A5 and A8 road projects. Will he inform the House what discussions took place? What assurances can he give that people who live along those routes will be properly compensated?

The deputy First Minister: It is not sensible to make comments about attendance at the North/South Ministerial Council plenary meeting, or to stress the fact that many Ministers turned up. The meeting was held at Farmleigh House, it probably cost no more than £1,000, and the fact that people are prepared to attend such meetings shows how important they consider the work. I welcome the large attendance of Ministers from the South; our attendance was also large. The more that Ministers engage with their counterparts, the more benefit there is for citizens in the North and the South.

The roads projects are important. The A5 and the A8 are critical to infrastructure along the road from Aghnacloy to the north-west and to ensure connections to the eastern seaboard, which, for our part, are the routes to Belfast and Larne.

As with all projects of this nature, there will always be controversies and disputes, particularly in situations in which people's livelihoods are affected. Nevertheless, the process is up and running, so we need to see people working closely together, taking account of objections. Opportunities for people to lodge such objections will be there in the time ahead.

There are concerns, and the Member articulated a view that some farming interests have expressed about the matter. That is perfectly right and understandable, and it is important that those roads are built in a fashion that takes account of the objections and concerns of local people. Hopefully, not many local people will be affected by the projects, but, in some circumstances, there will be an effect, and it is a matter of the relevant authorities working with those people, in conjunction with elected representatives, to ensure that any concerns that are expressed are addressed.

Mr Elliott: I note from the deputy First Minister's statement that the Minister of Education attended the meeting. In the Republic of Ireland, the Irish Government's proposal to cut funding for Protestant schools is a serious issue. I was wondering whether the management of Protestant secondary schools was mentioned, because it is a serious issue for the Committee.

The deputy First Minister: The issue was not mentioned.

Mrs D Kelly: Unlike others, I welcome the high level of attendance by Ministers from the Irish Republic, because it gives us some certainty as to the interest that the Republic's Government have in the North. I do not hear any sneering about the €9 million that the Irish Government have committed themselves to spending on transport in the North. I welcome that investment.

With respect to child protection, when will the protocol for childcare arrangements be published? In addition, given that it has been agreed in principle that there will be an all-Ireland animal health and welfare strategy, when will that strategy be available for consultation? Furthermore, the Civic Forum was reviewed almost two years ago. When might we see the results of that consultation, and how does the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister plan to make progress on the North/South consultative forum? Also, in future, when statements are being made to the House, perhaps there could be a specific section to highlight new work streams. For example, given the comments about the agreement on a framework for the removal of waste that is illegally dumped in Northern Ireland, might an all-Ireland approach to climate change be considered?

Mr Deputy Speaker: The deputy First Minister may choose to answer one or all of those questions.

The deputy First Minister: I will try to answer as many as I possibly can. I think that there were about four.

The animal health strategy is obviously being worked on at the moment, and it will be delivered as soon as possible.

Child protection is vital. At the plenary meeting, we welcomed intensified North/South co-operation on child protection and Internet safety; the development of a protocol for the movement of vulnerable children and families across borders; and advice and guidance on safeguarding arrangements for parents, carers and employers. Officials are always examining ways to develop and strengthen current procedures; that vital work is ongoing, and I believe that there is an absolute commitment from both Administrations to ensure that it continues.

At the plenary meeting, the Council noted the Executive's ongoing review of the Civic Forum. It agreed to bring to an early conclusion discussions on the North/South consultative forum. It also recalled that the Irish Government made a proposal on a North/South consultative forum to our Executive following the conclusion of its consultations with social partners and other groups from civic society in 2008. The Member will know that a review of the Civic Forum is under way to examine fundamentally its structure, membership and role, and to consider the most appropriate arrangements for engaging with civic society. That review of the Civic Forum has not yet been completed.

In relation to the other matter, a suggestion has been made. Without giving any commitment on that, officials can look at that to see whether it has merit.

Mr Molloy: Go raibh míle maith agat. I thank the Minister for his statement. Can he tell us whether an update was provided at the meeting on the role of Peace III and on how the INTERREG programme is playing out, particularly given the present importance of European funding to SMEs and the farming community?

The deputy First Minister: Under Peace III, the north-west cluster will deliver nearly £5 million through a peace and reconciliation action plan. Ilex has been awarded £13 million to develop the pedestrian bridge over the Foyle, which has been discussed recently. Under INTERREG, approximately £8 million in regeneration assistance will be delivered through a multi-annual plan developed by the North West Region Cross Border Group. INTERREG has also awarded £30 million to the Kelvin project to develop a broadband connection in the north-west.

A total of 104 Peace III projects, with a combined value of €155.8 million, which is roughly £141 million, have been approved to date. Peace III builds on the peace-building work of its predecessors, with a greater focus on activities that directly promote reconciliation and an emphasis on larger, more strategic projects with clear legacy potential.

The INTERREG cross-border programme, which is worth €256 million or £233 million, is the only EU programme in the North to have increased its budget in the new programming period; the previous INTERREG was worth something in the order of €183 million. Therefore, it builds on the work of previous programmes and supports strategic cross-border co-operation for a more prosperous and sustainable cross-border region. So far, 73 applications have been received under the cross-border programme, of which 34 have been approved and are worth a total of €156 million, or £142 million. For the first time, areas in western Scotland are eligible to participate, which adds a welcome new dimension. To date, Scottish partners are involved in INTERREG projects worth some £30 million.

The INTERREG programme will build on the successes and competencies of the five local authority-based partnership groups: East Border Region Committee, Irish Central Border Area Network (ICBAN), North West Region Cross Border Group, Councils of the Metropolitan Area (COMET) and North East Partnership. Funding in the order of €55 million has been made available to all five groups in respect of enterprise, tourism and collaboration. Therefore, quite an amount of investment is continuing.

Mr Weir: I will try to restrain myself to one question. Page 2 of the deputy First Minister's statement refers to the fact that, between the latest plenary meeting of the North/South Ministerial Council and the previous one in January 2009, there were nine North/South ministerial meetings. Can he tell me what the corresponding figure is for ministerial meetings of the British-Irish Council during that same period?

The deputy First Minister: I cannot tell the Member that off the top of my head, but we will undertake to provide the answer.

Ms Anderson: I thank the joint First Minister for that statement.

Reference has been made to the national asset management agency, and, in his statement, the deputy First Minister mentioned the common economic challenges faced by the North and South. Given the interconnected nature of those two economies, have any work or steps been outlined and undertaken by InterTradeIreland, one of the implementation bodies, to develop an all-Ireland economic policy?

The deputy First Minister: I congratulate InterTradeIreland on its initiative to hold the economic forum in Dublin on 18 June. That forum was designed to assist businesses in the current global economic downturn and in the challenges that it presents. Some 120 leading economists, economic commentators and senior policymakers took part in the first high-level North/South economic forum, which addressed a select group of policymakers from both jurisdictions who combined their expertise and knowledge on the extent of the downturn and search for innovative strategic responses.

Mr Ross: In his statement, the deputy First Minister made reference to progress in developing a co-ordinated approach to the introduction of lower drink-drive limits. Will he assure the House that, even if the Irish Republic does not go ahead with that, it will not be a barrier to the Executive introducing lower drink-drive limits for drivers in Northern Ireland? Furthermore, can he tell us what conversations there have been with other UK regions, perhaps through the British-Irish Council, on lowering the drink-drive limits throughout the United Kingdom?

The deputy First Minister: Officials are working to complete the arrangements needed to introduce mutual recognition of driving disqualifications. It is hoped that the process will be completed shortly. It is an important issue. We all understand fully the need to ensure an all-island approach, given that, in the past, people who have been involved in road accidents or who have flouted driving laws have been disqualified in the North but permitted to drive in the South, and vice versa. This is vital work. It is critical that we consider the possibility of introducing lower drink-drive limits, as is being done, and explore the potential for co-ordinating approaches to the implementation of any new limits agreed. The issue is being discussed at the British-Irish Council, so we will await developments from those discussions.

Mr P Ramsey: I welcome the deputy First Minister's reference to progress that has been made on the A5 from Aughnacloy to the north-west. In light of the haemorrhaging of so many jobs in the north-west — 3,000 jobs in recent months — and in view of the great hope, aspirations and opportunities in health, education and access to employment opportunities for the region with the north-west gateway initiative, will the deputy First Minister assure the House that the North/South Ministerial Council will sponsor and adopt the key areas that come out of the north-west gateway initiative as a way forward for that region?

The deputy First Minister: The north-west gateway initiative provides a strategic context for the north-west in facilitating a more co-ordinated approach by the Executive and the Irish Government to the area's development by helping to channel funding into it. The north-west gateway initiative, as Members know, has no dedicated funding, but it aims to derive synergy in the north-west through the effective co-ordination of existing public expenditure. The activities are taken forward by individual Departments in each jurisdiction. The gateway initiative is inherently linked to the work that Sir Roy McNulty, chairman of Ilex, is undertaking on a new regeneration plan for the city of Derry. The strategic plan for the city and its proposed delivery structures will impact on the wider region and will have a cross-border dimension, linking it to the work of Donegal County Council.

We are all conscious of the unacceptable number of job losses that have taken place in the north-west, whether in Coleraine, Limavady or Derry city. During the Minister for Employment and Learning's visit to the north-west, he made what, I think, we all considered to be an important point: more jobs have been lost in the north-west than in the whole of the Belfast area, which, given the relative sizes of both areas, is dramatic news. Therefore, we are concerned and exercised about that.

However, several things are happening in the north-west, including work on a number of infrastructural projects. For example, Project Kelvin will provide a direct international telecoms link to North America and improved telecom links to Europe, and there is also a major project to upgrade the road between Derry and Aughnacloy, of which the Broadbridge dualling phase is under way. Other infrastructural projects include the A2 Ballykelly bypass, the A6 Derry to Dungiven project, the City of Derry Airport runway safety-improvement programme, and improvements to the railway track between Derry and Coleraine.

Other projects are under way in further and higher education. For example, the strategic innovation fund is supplying in the region of €893,000 to provide a complete specification for the delivery of higher education through a strategic alliance between Letterkenny Institute of Technology and the University of Ulster, and a capital programme is under way for the renewal and refurbishment of the North West Regional College site. Employment and skills development projects include an all-island skills conference and the All-Island Skills Study 2008, which identified several potential areas of future joint work to help to realise future skills ambitions. Such projects include the NorthwestNow promotional programme, which is aimed at enhancing the promotion of the north-west business technology zone and the wider region. I could go on, but it is sufficient to say that quite a lot of things are happening in the north-west.

However, the bad news stories about job losses in the area overshadow all those projects. I have spoken already to the First Minister about the very serious situation that I think exists not just in Derry city but in places such as Coleraine and Limavady, as well as about the need for our Executive to address those difficulties as quickly as possible.

Lord Morrow: My question relates to the A5 project, or the north-west corridor. I note from the Minister's statement that the Irish Government are contributing some €9 million up front into that scheme. That represents approximately 2% of the South's contribution, or 1% of the overall scheme, and seems a very small amount. Will the Irish Government indeed be paying their contribution up front?

More importantly, the A5 scheme is turning out to be very controversial, not least because of the route that has been selected. For example, a section of the route runs from Aughnacloy to Ballygawley and has a curve of some two miles from the existing road. Part of the A5 has been realigned, and that section is known as the Tullyvar section and connects with the Ballygawley roundabout. However, when the new A5 is built, it will sit parallel to the new A4, which is being constructed. Does that not sound like bad management and bad value for money? Will the deputy First Minister assure the House that those and other issues that concern the planned route of the new A5 through to New Buildings will be reviewed? It is a very important issue.

The deputy First Minister: In fairness to the Irish Government, from the very beginning of the process, they declared that they will be paying up front for the A5 and A8 road projects. The €9 million is an initial contribution, and there will be further contributions.

I think that all Members will be very pleased that the Taoiseach and other Ministers at the North/South Ministerial Council dismissed out of hand the speculation in the South about the prospect of those road projects not proceeding. They have given us an absolute guarantee and commitment that those road projects will not be subject to whatever other cuts are made in Dublin. Therefore, we can say with 100% confidence that those projects will continue and that when they are completed, they will make a massive contribution to our infrastructure in the North.

1.00 pm

With regard to the detail of what is happening along the route of the A5, the Minister for Regional Development will be answering questions this afternoon, and he will be able to address that.

Mr Neeson: I welcome the deputy First Minister's statement on the upgrading of the A8 Larne to Belfast road. What is the Executive's position on a commitment to the formation of the North/South parliamentary forum?

The deputy First Minister: The Executive do not have a position on that matter. However, under the auspices of the North/South Ministerial Council, the Oireachtas and the Assembly have been charged with the responsibility for taking that matter forward, and Mr Speaker is the Assembly's lead person on that.

As we move forward, we all recognise that, in such a small island, there are two jurisdictions and there is a compelling argument for working together where there is mutual benefit for our citizens. A strong view is being put forward, to which I subscribe, that increased contact and co-operation among elected representatives on the island is in the economic interests of the people whom we represent.

North/South Ministerial Council: Aquaculture and Marine Sectoral Format

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Speaker has received notice from the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development that she wishes to make a statement regarding the North/South Ministerial Council meeting in aquaculture and marine sectoral format.

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development (Ms Gildernew): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. With your permission, I wish to make a statement in compliance with section 52 of the NI Act 1988 on the recent meeting of the North/South Ministerial Council in the aquaculture and marine sectoral format. The meeting was held in Greenmount on Monday 20 July 2009. Robin Newton and I represented the Executive, and Eamon Ryan TD, Minister for Communications, Energy and Natural Resources, and Conor Lenihan TD, Minister of State for Natural Resources, represented the Irish Government. This statement has been agreed with Robin Newton.

The Council welcomed a progress report on the work of the Loughs Agency presented by the chairperson, Mr Tarlach O'Crosain, and the chief executive, Mr Derick Anderson.

Ministers noted the impact of fishing conditions for the 2009 angling season and commercial salmon season; the success of the guides for angling in both the Foyle and Carlingford catchment areas, with the Carlingford guide so popular that it has had to be reprinted; and the agency's work with the regional fisheries boards and central fisheries boards to develop the angling brand for coarse, game, sea and pike, including a website in a number of European languages that will be announced shortly. Ministers also noted that, in September 2009, the Loughs Agency will consult stakeholders and the public on the options that are being considered for the agency's strategic implementation plan to license shellfisheries and aquaculture. A strategic environmental assessment is being conducted on the proposed implementation plan.

The Council welcomed a presentation by Dr Declan Lawlor, environment officer at the Loughs Agency, on the proactive water-quality assessment programme being undertaken by the agency in the Foyle and Carlingford catchment areas, and noted that that science-led approach has proved very beneficial to the agency in conserving and protecting the inland fisheries of Foyle and Carlingford.

The Council approved the recruitment of three staff on a fixed-term contract basis to assist the Loughs Agency in the administration and implementation of a programme in support of its marine tourism strategy, which is to be funded exclusively through the EU INTERREG IV programme.

The Council discussed and noted the operation and funding arrangements for the Loughs Agency's sustainable development fund, and approved the use of the fund in the implementation of the agency's marine tourism development strategy.

The Council approved two sets of regulations. The first will regulate the minimum size of oyster that may be retained on board a vessel within the wild oyster fishery in Lough Foyle, and the second will prohibit the catching of eels in the Foyle and Carlingford areas by any method except rod and line.

The Council also approved a framework designed to support the Loughs Agency in dealing with emergencies such as serious pollution incidents.

The Council agreed that its next meeting in the aquaculture and marine sectoral format will take place in October 2009. Go raibh mile maith agat.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development (Mr Paisley Jnr): I thank the Minister for her statement. The Minister will be aware that the Committee received a presentation on 23 June 2009 from her officials on the Foyle area and Carlingford area (control of oyster fishing) (amendment) regulations 2009, and that they deferred the progress on those regulations because of the numerous concerns expressed by fishermen. Those concerns have been repeated to the Committee during its consultation on the matter. It is, therefore, somewhat disappointing to note that the Council is approving, and, indeed, supporting, legislation that has not been endorsed by a Statutory Committee in this place, or by Members of this House.

That said, can the Minister advise the House of the evidence that her Department is using to suggest that grading an oyster by size rather than by weight is the best method available and whether that evidence has been sourced from samples taken from Lough Foyle as opposed to other oyster fisheries outside Northern Ireland? Can she tell the House why she is pursuing a policy that is contrary to the demands of the oyster fishery in Lough Foyle, and, very importantly, the market to which those fishermen seek to sell their hard-gained produce?

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: I do not have the detail of the evidence with me today, but the regulations must be approved by the NSMC. That approval was granted in July. We always aim to have the Committee on board with regulations before they are submitted to the NSMC for approval, but, occasionally, given the timetable of meetings and critical time factors in the making of regulations, submission may be necessary before the Committee has concluded its deliberations. In this case, the agency was very keen to have the conservation measure in place for the opening of the oyster season. The agency has explained its rationale, both to the Committee and to stakeholders, and I understand that the Committee is engaged in further discussion with the stakeholders on the issue.

Mr Doherty: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I welcome the Minister's statement. Can she provide an update on the Loughs Agency's strategic implementation plan?

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: This month, the Loughs Agency will consult with stakeholders and the public on the options being considered for the agency's strategic implementation plan for aquaculture. That will include public exhibitions in both the Foyle and Carlingford areas, and the NSMC will be informed of the exhibition details at the next meeting. A strategic environmental assessment (SEA) is being conducted on the proposed implementation plan, and a scoping report for the SEA has been issued. The public and stakeholders are being invited to comment on that document.

The SEA scoping report contains details of the proposed environmental assessment only and does not state what will be included in the draft plan as that has yet to be determined. Following the consultation on options, the draft plan and the environmental report arising from the SEA will be published. There will then be a public consultation period for the draft plan, and after that the plan will be finalised.

Mr Savage: I thank the Minister for her statement. Will she outline what discussions took place with her Irish counterparts on the approaches of both jurisdictions to the annual meeting of the fishery Ministers, which will take place in December in Brussels, and what she hopes to achieve at that meeting?

Development: The Member will be aware that the meeting under discussion today was held in the aquaculture and marine sectoral format and, therefore, dealt solely with the issues for which the Foyle, Carlingford and Irish Lights Commission has responsibility. The Member's question clearly falls outside that. The meeting did not deal with the issue that he raises. The work for December is ongoing, but I do not have any information on that today.

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle, Gabhaim buíochas don Aire as a ráiteas.

I thank the Minister for her statement. My question relates to paragraph 8 of the statement, which mentions recruitment of three staff on a fixed-term contract basis to assist the Loughs Agency in the implementation of a programme in support of its marine tourism strategy.

Although I realise that it is external to the Department, it would be helpful if the Minister could inform us of the total amount of investment that that involves, the duration of the contract plan and whether the Department sees itself as being in any position to extend the duration of that programme for marine tourism, which is an important issue, particularly in an island economy.

Development: The overall package that the Loughs Agency applied for was €4 million to the Special EU Programmes Body under INTERREG IVa, and I understand that it was successful in getting all that. I will have to come back to the Member with details of the duration of the contract plan, and I am happy to do so. However, I understand that there was quite a number of applications and I expect the money to be spent before the end of the programme, as that is what normally happens; the duration tends to be longer than money is available for.

Mr McCarthy: I thank the Minister for her statement, in which she noted the success of the guides for the Foyle and Carlingford, with the guide for Carlingford being reprinted because of its popularity. Will the Minister tell us what Carlingford has got to offer that the Foyle has not?

The statement also mentioned the approved framework for dealing with such matters as serious pollution incidents. Does that framework include measures or advice for avoiding pollution incidents happening in the first place?

Development: The avoidance of pollution is the responsibility of other agencies, as opposed to necessarily being the work of the agency responsible for Foyle and Carlingford. A serious pollution incident can impact on the work of the Loughs Agency, as the Foyle and Carlingford could be severely affected by such an incident. A pollution incident can have a hugely detrimental impact on a river system, especially when water levels are low, and we have seen the outcome of such incidents in the not-too-distant past. The framework is intended more as an early warning system to help the agency to take measures to mitigate the impacts of pollution incidents, as opposed to trying to avoid them. We all need to work together to avoid pollution, but the framework is more to do with mitigating the impact of pollution in those rivers.

Dr W McCrea: Further to the question from my colleague, the Chairperson of the Committee for Agriculture, Mr Ian Paisley Jnr, will the Minister tell the House why there is undue haste on the issue of oyster fishing, bearing in mind that, as I understand it, the Committee will meet representatives of stakeholder groups as part of its consultation exercise. Will the Minister not wisely accept the advice of the Committee to defer the decision until the Committee has properly concluded its consultation and come to a conclusion, or will the Committee have to pray upon it in the House to ensure that the will of the House is sought?

Development: The Loughs Agency is bringing forward the regulations, not the Department, so there is a distinct difference. The agency believes that an increase in size will promote the conservation benefits, and my understanding is that its evidence is based on surveys of oysters in the Foyle. The agency has undertaken work that it believes will bring about the best conservation measures, and I have to respect its work.

Mr Brolly: Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim mo bhuíochas leis an Aire as a ráiteas. Tá ceist amháin agam air.

Will the Minister explain what the marine tourism strategy is hoping to achieve?

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: There is so much potential in the Foyle and Carlingford area that can be achieved through the proper outworking of the strategy, and the agency is working with bodies such as Tourism Ireland, Bord Fáilte and the local councils to deliver that. The project objectives promote a number of key themes. Those are to develop boating access and infrastructure; to develop visitor facilities at beaches; to deliver environmental education and interpretation; to raise visitor awareness by providing tourist information; to enhance habitat and develop angling infrastructure for coarse and game fisheries; to design and deliver tourism marine safety and boating training; and to effectively market the Foyle and Carlingford areas.

So, if it is successful in all of those areas, I imagine that the marine tourism strategy will be a great feather in the agency's cap.

1.15 pm

Mr Irwin: I thank the Minister for her statement. I welcome the recent visit by Arlene Foster to Glenarm fishery. Is DARD doing anything to help that sector in Northern Ireland?

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: Again, that is clearly outside the Foyle and Carlingford area and the agency's remit, so I do not have any information on that.

Mr Elliott: The Minister indicated that there were discussions around the catching of eels in the Foyle and Carlingford areas. Did she or her Department have any impact on the Lough Erne eel management plan that was recently submitted to the European Union through the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (DEFRA)?

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: Again, that is outside the scope of the North/South Ministerial Council meeting in aquaculture and marine sectoral format. However, the eel management plan has been delivered. The Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure is primarily working with that, but it works very closely with DARD officials on that matter for the benefit of eel fisheries on Lough Erne and Lough Neagh.

Lord Morrow: The Minister said:

"Ministers noted the impact of fishing conditions for the 2009 angling season".

Will she elaborate on that? Furthermore, will she tell us, or find out for us, whether the Loughs Agency has received representation from any source about the future of fishing on the River Mourne?

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: I have not had an update from the Loughs Agency on that. We are talking about a meeting that happened on 20 July, so the timing needs to be taken into consideration. At that meeting, the Loughs Agency reported that the 2009 angling season had been affected adversely by the prevalent low-water conditions. The date is important because there were not many low-water conditions during the rest of the summer. However, we were talking about issues up to 20 July. The agency has also recently reported that flood-water conditions in the latter part of the season further contributed to poor conditions for anglers.

The total catch by game anglers cannot be determined until the season is closed and log books are returned. However, the agency estimates, at this time, that it is likely that game anglers will have caught and retained more salmon than the commercial fishery by the end of the season. The lowest commercial catch in the Foyle area in Loughs Agency records took place in the 2009 commercial season. The season was impacted by drought conditions in June and by flood-water conditions in the latter part of the season, but the agency has issued licences for 18 drift-net operators in Lough Foyle and 10 draft-net operators on the River Foyle.

Mrs D Kelly: I thank the Minister for her statement. What progress has been made by both jurisdictions on a common approach to a marine Bill? Also, were there discussions about fishing with regard to the state and condition of our rivers, and are any investments planned under INTERREG IV for our rivers?

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: No; the application is for the Foyle and Carlingford areas, and that is where the money is going. Again, the marine strategy is not part of the remit of the North/South Ministerial Council in aquaculture and marine sectoral format. The Department of the Environment is the lead Department on that.

Regional Transportation Strategy Review

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Speaker has received notice from the Minister for Regional Development that he wishes to make a statement on the regional transportation strategy review.

The Minister for Regional Development (Mr Murphy): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Today, I announce a major review of the regional transportation strategy (RTS). Transport impacts upon us all: the parent on the school run; the farmer bringing goods to the markets; the commuter on the bus, train or bike; the lorry driver delivering goods around the region; the businessperson catching a flight to London or Paris; and young people heading out to the cinema. We all use transport in day-to-day life. Due to advances in technology and wealth, we are travelling more often and further. Our parents and grandparents did not have access to the opportunities that we now have; for them, homes and work were much closer, and a trip to the seaside was a once-a-year privilege. For us, it is not uncommon to commute for 40 or 50 miles a day. Many Assembly Members make such journeys, and some travel even further than that.

Although this new twenty-first century world offers many new opportunities, it also brings concerns. There are concerns about how we cope with the increasing demands on our transport infrastructure, about the impact of transport on the environment and about the impact of ever-rising fuel prices. Between 1992 and 2006, the number of cars increased by 80%. There are now 800,000 cars on the roads, and more journeys are made in the region and beyond. People commute further to jobs and schools, more routes are available to new destinations from airports, and the ports deal with more freight transport.

However, many people do not benefit from the car-dominated society: 26% of households here do not own a car, and that figure rises to more than 50% in some urban areas. We must think about the needs of all citizens, not just those who have access to a car.

We encourage investment and business development, and we are helping people to overcome such barriers to work as poor transport. We support training and transport schemes that can help people to access the jobs that are available elsewhere. Good, affordable public transport is vital for helping such people feel included and valued in society. Without access to an affordable and appropriate form of transport, people in many areas are unable to access education, employment, health and other services.

Public transport and roads are interdependent. Most people who use public transport travel by bus on the roads. Improvements to roads, including quality bus corridors and park-and-ride sites, therefore, benefit bus users as well as car drivers. A well-maintained road network, particularly in rural areas, is an important aspect of a good bus network.

The economy must also remain competitive to achieve the lifestyles that we want. We must be able to move goods around the region and have good connections beyond it. At the same time, the environmental impact of freight must be minimised as much as possible.

Perhaps the greatest challenge that we face involves the environment and climate change. The burning of fossil fuels increases the amount of greenhouse gases in the atmosphere. Transport accounts for around a quarter of man-made greenhouse gas emissions in the North, and it is the only area in which emissions are rising rather than falling.

Since its publication in 2002, the speed and direction of change in society has overtaken the current regional transportation strategy, so a review is timely. The population, economy and the number of vehicles on the roads have grown much more quickly than had been originally forecast, while the issue of the environment and the challenge of addressing climate change have moved up everyone's agenda.

Through the investment strategy, the Executive have secured levels of investment for infrastructure that exceed those predicted in the RTS, but it is now difficult to predict how much investment will be available in the longer term. As the economy develops, North/South and east-west relationships are also developing and changing.

The review of the regional transportation strategy is not, however, being undertaken in isolation. Review and reform is happening across government, and transportation must align itself with planned initiatives and reviews that collectively influence the way that we live and work and the services and facilities that we enjoy. For example, the RTS is a vital component of the regional development strategy, which sets out a framework to influence growth for greater sustainability and better balanced development across the region. The regional development strategy is itself under review. The review of public administration and the public transport reform initiative will shift responsibilities in the planning and delivery of transport in the future.

It is vital that we develop the ability to manage the transport strategy with others across these islands. We must work together with other Administrations on a North/South and east-west basis to improve connections between our networks to enhance the free movement of goods and people. All of that must be completed in a sustainable fashion and against a backdrop of an increasing local, national and European direction that is designed to address the environmental impacts.

Sustainable development is generally defined as:

“development which meets the needs of the present without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs”.

The Executive’s sustainable development strategy aims to move our region towards a sustainable economy that strikes a better balance between the three different aspects of sustainable development: social, environmental and economic considerations. It seems sensible to me that the transportation strategy review reflects and complements all those elements.

Of course, we are not starting with a blank sheet. The current strategy has a set of expected outcomes that cover aspects such as transport emissions, road safety, transport speeds, and coverage and patronage of public transport. Since taking up office, I have been committed to tackling years of underinvestment in transportation and to delivering balanced improvement of the infrastructure.

I have agreed to a rapid-transit system for Belfast, which will provide people in the city with a new, dynamic means of getting around. It will play a significant part in improving access to new employment and education opportunities, as well as leisure and health facilities. It will help to regenerate neighbourhoods and to provide Belfast with a twenty-first century public transport solution that will complement existing services.

We have completed work on the Westlink, which has improved linkages across the city and has helped to ease journey times for all road users, particularly the haulage industry. We have widened the Belfast-bound carriageway between the Sandyknowes and Greencastle junctions and the country-bound carriageway over the Greencastle junction. We have replaced a number of bridges.

I am addressing the peripherality of counties Fermanagh, Tyrone and Derry with a comprehensive package of road improvements. A dual carriageway will be built on the A4 between Dungannon and Ballygawley. We will undertake the biggest road project on the island when we build a dual carriageway on the A5. We will also build a dual carriageway on the A6 between Derry and Dungiven and between Randalstown and Castledawson.

Those road projects are vital to connect rural communities and to open up new business opportunities. Access to ports is also crucial to our economic well-being. Dualling proposals for the A8 between Ballyclare and Larne will contribute positively to improving journey times, which will benefit the travelling public and the business community.

I am not just in the business of building roads. When I took office, the railway line to Derry was under threat. Now, my Department is buying more new trains and improving the track. Links between the two major population centres in the North are important. The new trains will improve the frequency of services. The track improvements, when completed, will mean that journey times between the two cities will be reduced by 30 minutes. It is now planned that, for the first time, commuter trains will arrive in Derry before 9.00 am.

Good progress has been made on increasing rail and Metro passenger numbers and the number of cycling journeys, as well as on reducing accidents. Initiatives such as Travelwise, which encourages the use of sustainable transport options such as walking, cycling, car sharing and public transport, have played a part. Capital investment in infrastructure has also certainly provided benefits. It is worth emphasising that new road schemes throughout the North and new trains and buses on the rail and bus networks have made a positive improvement.

Conversely, although vehicle speeds in Belfast and on the strategic roads network have decreased, road-safety figures are still comparatively high. There is still an over-dependence on the private car. Against the background of more cars on the roads, transport emissions continue to increase. The availability of public transport, particularly in rural areas, is always contentious. Accessibility for people who have mobility difficulties still presents barriers that need to be overcome.

Of course, I am conscious that those are snapshots and that not all the planned schemes to implement the strategy will be delivered until later in the plan period due to the longer lead-in times that are associated with statutory processes. There are challenges ahead. The Department will seek to build on what has been achieved and to provide strategic direction for transportation here.

Since 2002, the transportation scene has changed significantly and continues to evolve. Although investment so far has undoubtedly made a difference, trends suggest that there is still more work to be done to persuade people out of their cars and towards public transport and to avoid the increasing problem of congestion and environmental pollution. Independent research indicates that only three out of ten people use bus services regularly, and one person in ten uses rail services.

With the rise in car ownership, there is greater congestion on the roads. That adversely affects the movement of goods, which relies on the road network. That, in turn, affects the economy. Access to airports, seaports and key tourism sites that play such a vital part in expanding the economy also needs to be reassessed.

Transport emissions continue to rise. They must be tackled through changing driver behaviour, modal shift and better journey planning. We need to offer better facilities for active travel, such as cycling and walking, which present health benefits for everyone.

Transportation is a crucial component to society's well-being. It provides access to employment, leisure, education, health and social activities. It can assist the regeneration of neighbourhoods and economic activity and can help to include people who feel isolated and ignored.

Although the current strategy has been successful in attracting funding for transport, I believe that a higher-level strategy is now needed that is based on public consultation and gives all people who live here an opportunity to set the key outcomes and priorities that they want for the transportation network.

A revised strategy could include aims to reduce the impact of transport on greenhouse gas emissions; to improve the efficient, reliable and sustainable movement of freight; to improve access to education, training and lifelong learning; to improve travel safety; and to improve access to key visitor attractions. While recognising that not everything can be achieved at once, the strategy will identify the key priorities for transport here and include indicators for key outcomes in order to allow their achievement to be measured.

1.30 pm

The current strategy is being implemented through three transport plans, and any review will of course have a bearing on those plans. It does not strike me as sensible to suspend the implementation of those plans while the review is ongoing, particularly where the funding has been allocated to specific schemes and commitments have been given.

The review is likely to be completed in 2010 and will prompt us to review the transport plans and the accessible transport strategy which expire in 2015. I am equally conscious that the investment strategy has provision for transportation well beyond that time, and that in turn will have further implications.

The implications of the review go beyond my Department, and Executive colleagues will have a keen interest in influencing the review. Engagement with other key interested parties has already commenced. I know of and welcome the Regional Development Committee's inquiry into sustainable transport. As it features the social, economic and environmental aspects of sustainable transport, I fully expect its findings and outcomes to inform and influence the review.

Members of the integrated transport stakeholder group, which acts as a consultative body to me on the implementation of the regional transportation strategy, have also already added to the discussion and debate. I am grateful to both for their contribution, which I am sure will continue and will allow us to mould a revised strategy that will be relevant and appropriate to our circumstances.

I am keen to engage with Members and others on the key outcomes and priorities to help generate discussion and debate on the issues. To help in this task, my Department has prepared a discussion document that outlines some of our thinking. I am conscious that we do not have a monopoly or a complete prescription on what needs to be done, and I am keen to hear views and ideas that will inform the review and start to build consensus on the way forward. I encourage Members and others to consider and respond to the questions posed.

The discussion document is part of a comprehensive engagement process that will result in a draft revised regional transportation strategy that will be subject to a full public consultation process. Members and others will consequently have a further opportunity to share their views and help influence the final outcomes. The ultimate aim is to have a revised strategy available to help inform the 2010 comprehensive spending review. Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Regional Development (Miss McIlveen): I thank the Minister for his statement. If the revised strategy will not propose individual schemes or funding levels, how will the Department ensure that the key priorities of funding and prioritisation for transport will be delivered? Further to that, how does the Minister plan to manage the transition from the current RTS to the proposed revised RTS, which will be at a much higher level?

The Minister for Regional Development: I welcome Miss McIlveen to the Regional Development Committee and look forward to working with her and the other new members who recently joined the Committee.

The Member is aware that there is an investment strategy, a road-building programme and an infrastructure development strategy. Commitments have been given, and work has begun. It is sensible to continue with that as far as budgets will allow.

The regional transportation strategy tackles the issues from the broader perspective of how we go forward as a region. The end period for that is anticipated to be 2035. The strategy will look at key questions that perhaps were not so high up the agenda such as the environmental impact of transport and the increasing number of cars, which I referred to in my statement. It will look at the broader perspective of the Department and at where the emphasis of the Department lies.

A major road-building programme is going on now. Once the key transport corridors are complete — many of them are either in design stage or construction stage or well on their way to that outcome — questions will arise for us as a region and an Assembly about which direction we want transportation to go in with the funding that we have and the considerations that influence that. Rather than getting into the detail of specific projects and what will happen where, we want to try to set a key standard for that.

Obviously there is a management issue with the current strategy. As I said, I am keen for that strategy to continue being implemented until such time as we have a new direction. That will involve consultation with groups such as the Committee, the integrated transport stakeholder group, which we meet regularly, and my officials. By talking to other people and through the public consultation, we want to ensure that we manage that transition from what currently exists to a consensus on what is needed for the future.

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a ráiteas inniu. I preface my remarks by thanking the Minister for his statement and by welcoming his intervention last Friday on the rescheduling of the timetable in Derry to ensure that trains will now come into the city at 9.00 am.

Will the Minister outline how the review will fit in with the regional development strategy?

The Minister for Regional Development: As I said in my statement, a number of reviews are ongoing, and the regional development strategy is one of the key reviews. To reflect that, it is natural that the regional transportation strategy is also reviewed. Those reviews are fairly substantial documents. Ultimately, they are Executive documents, but they will be taken forward by the Department. We have Executive buy-in to the process that we launched, to my statement today and to the discussion document that was launched.

It is important that all the strategies that the Executive develop, including the reform of local government and many of the other important issues that are being looked at, complement one other. It is also important that we do not have a position, either in a Department or between Departments, in which there are competing strategies or strategies that do not dovetail. Making sure that that does not happen is one of the benefits of having all Executive Ministers discuss those and other matters on a regular basis.

The review is closely aligned with the regional development strategy. That strategy will also align closely with the planning reform process, the changes to local government and a range of other strategies that the Executive are considering for implementation. It is key that all of those strategies complement one other.

Mr Kinahan: I congratulate the Minister's Department on much of the great work that it does. Does he accept that our transport infrastructure is not keeping pace with the demands being placed on it and that his Department's statistic-driven decision-making may be limiting some of its decisions?

Does the Minister also accept that, for commuters in south Antrim and many other parts of Northern Ireland, the public transport network does not provide an option that is cheap enough or has enough capacity for growth to compete with road travel and that the resultant increase in private traffic creates a vicious circle of unreliability for all methods of transport during peak times? As fuel costs continue to rise, does he accept that the review must provide radical and innovative solutions to this growing problem?

The Minister for Regional Development: I want to see the review providing radical and innovative solutions to all our transportation problems. I do not necessarily concur with all that the Member said.

Passenger numbers on public transport are increasing, as is the number of people using cars. Therefore, the issue is getting a balance. We live in a largely rural area, and the road infrastructure is important. All our freight travels by road. The ability of regions to compete and participate in economic growth and development depends on them being connected by roads and the ease with which freight can get to and from them.

There are always competing demands, and the strategy will allow us, in consultation with the Assembly and all the other interested parties, to get that balance right. People will argue that a substantial amount of money is being invested in the roads, but we are emerging from a period of substantial catch-up. The Member talked about demands on the transportation system, but there are competing demands. There are demands for a better road network to get goods about and move people to and from opportunities for work and education. There are also demands relating to the impact that the amount of traffic on our roads has on increasing carbon emissions.

There are always competing demands; the issue is about striking the right balance, trying to get a proper level of investment in public transport and trying to get a public transport system that encourages usage, operates efficiently and effectively and provides a comfortable and reliable service and all the other things that are required of public transport. The review will allow the Department to further develop that sort of thinking. That is the type of balance that we have been trying to strike since I came into office. With the investment that is available to us, which is limited because we compete for it with all other Departments, we will try to continue to strike that balance.

Mr Gallagher: The Minister's statement on the review and the key issues associated with CO2 emissions and the contribution of transport to congestion and connectivity is important.

Further to the points that other Members made about the importance of better public transport, can the Minister outline any steps that his Department can take to introduce healthy competition to the public transport sector? The Committee for Regional Development heard that his Department, although talking about possible competition, intends to continue to regulate the market for all operators. His Department also needs to look in more depth at transport in peripheral areas. The paper today gives us the line that extending the dual carriageway to Ballygawley and improving the road from Dublin to Derry is addressing peripherality in Fermanagh. That is no substitute for addressing peripherality, and it needs to be looked at in greater detail.

The Minister for Regional Development: I am surprised by the Member's approach to competition in public transport; I thought that he perhaps would not support an increasingly privatised public transport system. The lesson from England is that deregulation — of bus services in particular — was a disaster.

There is an attempt in the reform of public transport to make sure that we get the right service appropriate to here. That is why Translink will continue to be the largest public transport provider. There are other operators in the field, and there is a degree of competition as is, but there is no suggestion that the only way of improving the service is to deregulate it and open it up to more private companies and more competition. Nonetheless, I have no doubt that we will continue to develop those discussions in our engagement with the Committee.

There is, particularly in the west, Fermanagh and Tyrone and in Donegal and Sligo, a sense of peripherality. The dual carriageway and the improvements to the Dublin-Derry road are major schemes in their own right, but they are not the only ones. We are looking at improvements in and around Enniskillen and at the further development of the proposed southern bypass for Enniskillen; all those are coming on board.

Recently, I visited Fermanagh and, with my colleague Michelle Gildernew, had the opportunity to look at the roads network. I am conscious of the sense of peripherality there and of the limitations on our structural maintenance budget for the improvement that is needed on some of the non-major routes at county council level. However, I am not suggesting for one minute that the road improvement schemes outlined in my statement are the be-all and end-all for Fermanagh or the rest of the west, although they will make a significant contribution to reducing the sense of peripherality. I have no doubt that we will continue to be reminded of what else is required there.

Mr B Wilson: I thank the Minister for his statement, and I welcome the review. The Minister said that there has been a significant increase in car usage and in carbon emissions since 2002. It is important that the Department move away from being the Department of road building and concreting over the countryside. The original strategy suggested a spending ratio of roads to public transport of 65:35. That has failed —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr B Wilson: That has failed —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order, order. Sit. This is a time for questions to the Minister; it is not a time for making a speech. Ask a question, Mr Wilson.

Mr B Wilson: I am sorry. The suggested ratio of roads to public transport was 65:35. Is the Minister still committed to that ratio and, if so, how does he propose to achieve it?

The Minister for Regional Development: I have accepted publicly that that is not the current ratio, even though it was the intended one. It comes down to the sometimes simplistic argument of roads versus public transport, an argument that I do not accept, as the vast majority of public transport goes on the roads. Therefore investment in roads infrastructure and improvement to roads is not necessarily a downside to public transport; it is, in fact, an improvement. We want to continue that through the building of quality bus corridors, park-and-ride facilities and other investment in the rural roads networks. The rural roads network assists public transport in places where the railway system, even if we had the investment to put into it, would never reach.

It is important that, in the type of region that we live in, investment in roads continues. Of course, we want to move towards the 65:35 ratio, and I am committed to trying to achieve the ratio of spend that the Member outlined. As I said in response to a previous question, the transport corridors that people envisage as the key linkages between the centres of population are either under way or at design stage. Although there will always be arguments for road improvement schemes, that will allow us to start to shift the focus of the public transport debate, not into the distant future, but a substantial number of years into the future. It will allow us to shift to the type of debate that the Member outlined.

Mr Bresland: I welcome the Minister's statement. In the light of the current economic downturn, will he confirm that additional funding is in place to complete the planned schemes in the existing regional transportation strategy?

The Minister for Regional Development: The Budget has been agreed up to 2011. I think that it was brought to the House in January 2008, voted on by the Assembly and adopted and agreed on unanimously by the Executive. A range of further schemes is identified in the investment strategy, and they will come online if the finances are available for them. That is why I always include that caveat when answering questions or making statements on matters that are subject to budgetary processes. However, I anticipate that we will continue to invest as outlined in the investment strategy.

The planned improvements to the key transport corridors, the additional investment in the railway system, the new trains, the investment in the track and the purchase of buses are key elements of the current transportation strategy and will continue to be key elements of a new transportation strategy. I certainly hope and intend to be able to invest as we have outlined. We will, obviously, return to a budgetary process after 2011, which will provide the Member with final answers to his question.

Lord Morrow: I want to ask the Minister about two issues. His statement mentions the fact that the A4 is being dualled from Dungannon to Ballygawley. Is that scheme on schedule, and will it be completed within the timescale that has been outlined?

I asked the deputy First Minister about this matter, but he seems to think that I should talk to the Minister for Regional Development about it. As I said earlier, the A5 is quite a controversial route, particularly the section from Aughnacloy to Ballygawley, where two new roads will run parallel to each other. It strikes me and many others, particularly farmers who will lose big tracts of land, that the new part of the A5 that is under construction from Tullyvar to Ballygawley will not be able to connect with another road that will be built in a couple of years. The two new roads will end up running parallel to each other, and one may make the other redundant. I want the Minister to comment on that matter, particularly on the fact that a section of that road has a two-and-a-half-mile curve on it. Why has that happened? It is beyond belief. The Minister has selected the preferred route, but is he prepared to reconsider?

Furthermore, his statement says that independent research indicates that only three in 10 people use bus services regularly and one in 10 people uses rail services. I wonder how those data were collected. For instance, does it take into account that one in 10 —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that you have asked a question, Lord Morrow.

Lord Morrow: I notice that another Member got to ask four questions on one occasion, but I suppose that I am different.

The Minister for Regional Development: I will try to deal with all those questions.

I have heard nothing to suggest that there are any delays to the A4 scheme. Although there was adverse weather during the summer, the report that I read suggested that it would not impact on delivery or on the achievement of the target date for completion. I can check that matter again and let the Member know whether any other information is available.

The Member mentioned the A5 scheme, particularly the stretch between Aughnacloy and Ballygawley. He will know that the original improvements that are under way in that area were planned and envisaged before the funding was committed, particularly from the Southern side, for the type of road that we are now able to build from Aughnacloy to Derry.

The route was selected in accordance with those planned improvements, and a wide consultation process brought us to the stage at which the route corridor was selected. In the overall scheme of things, we are now looking at minor adjustments to the project. Therefore, I cannot agree to revisit the scheme, given that there was substantial consultation on it, including public consultation and an examination of all the available route options against a range of measures by which such things are judged. That was the preferred route, it was launched, and there will be further discussions with the people who have been affected on issues such as land acquisition, access to land, or the division of farmland. I do not doubt that that process is under way.

The same process took place with the Dungannon to Ballygawley project, in which a large number of landowners was affected. Substantial negotiations took place on the issues that that scheme raised. I cannot give a definitive answer as to where those two schemes can knit together properly, but I will ask Roads Service to provide a briefing for the Member.

Mr Elliott: I am somewhat concerned about the Minister's answer to Lord Morrow's question about the A5. Will he confirm that an equality impact assessment will be carried out on the proposed route to determine who it will affect under section 75? Will he listen to the concerns of groups and individuals and give a reasonable assessment of their proposals and suggestions?

The Minister for Regional Development: The examination of route options does not take account of the Protestant route or the Catholic route. Options are examined against a range of criteria, such as environmental or economic impact, and I do not think that religion is one of those. I am sure that the Member is aware that a similar approach was taken for the Dungannon to Ballygawley route, which is in his constituency. The same criteria were analysed so that the preferred route could be selected.

I am not sure that section 75 applies when making decisions about roads; the choice between a Catholic route or a Protestant route does not come into it. The consultations with people who are affected by the proposed route will continue, as they did in a range of other schemes.

There have been similar schemes in my constituency in the past few years, one of which is under way at the moment. The people who are affected will be consulted to ensure that they are compensated properly for loss of land and that access and other issues are worked on. There has been a number of major road-building schemes not just in the North but right across the island in recent years, and every one of those projects encountered the types of issues that the Member raised. On every occasion, many such issues were sorted out with affected landowners. I have no doubt that the landowners affected in this instance will get an opportunity to make their voices heard. They should be listened to properly and compensated adequately for any impact that the scheme may have on them.

Mr P J Bradley: I thank the Minister for his statement. Earlier today, the deputy First Minister was asked about the Narrow Water bridge project. In reply, he talked more about the southern relief road around Newry. Where will the Narrow Water bridge project fit into the review of the regional transportation strategy? Will the Minister for Regional Development confirm that he is 100% committed to the Narrow Water bridge project on a stand-alone basis?

The Minister for Regional Development: I have answered that question so many times that the Member should be aware of the answer, but I will go through it again for him. The Narrow Water bridge project is being carried forward by the Southern authorities. They have granted money to Louth County Council to appoint consultants to assess the viability of options for the bridge project. Roads Service has been asked only to provide technical information on what the arrangements might be on the Warrenpoint side if such a project were to go ahead. I have expressed my support for that, and that remains unchanged: I would be happy to see the bridge developed. However, I repeat: the question of whether the scheme goes ahead is one for the authorities in Dublin. Neither Roads Service nor I have been asked to make any financial contribution to the project other than to assist with the provision of information and technical advice on the Northern side. That position remains unchanged. It is the same one that I articulated to the Member two years ago, and several times since.

Mrs Long: I thank the Minister for his statement and am glad to see that he is committed to making public transport a priority. I hope that it will also be a priority for those who have cars and choose to use public transport, not only those who do not have cars, although that is very important.

The Minister mentioned rapid transit for Belfast and is aware of public concerns about that scheme in east Belfast. Will the Minister provide an update on the time frame for consultation on that proposal? Will other options for using what is currently a dedicated walking and cycling route be included in any consultation that will go to the public?

The Minister for Regional Development: We have been around the houses a few times on that issue as well. The Member is aware that the Comber Greenway was identified very early on for rapid transit, even before it was developed as a walkway. It is a fine amenity. I have walked it myself and understand the attachment that the people of east Belfast have to it.

I will bring the Member up to date. Conclusions on the rapid transit system have not yet been reached. An examination is ongoing, and an examination is also ongoing of other routes in east Belfast. I am not in a position to give the Member a definitive answer. The Member and other interested parties will be informed of when and how a conclusion is reached, what options were considered and how the final decision was made. No decision has yet been reached.

Mr Ross: The Minister's statement focused on public transport and on how to get people out of cars and onto public transport. We could all subscribe to that, but does the Minister agree that the approach taken should be to make public transport more attractive to people, rather than going down the route of congestion charging or increasing town-centre car parking, which would have a negative effect on town centres?

The Minister for Regional Development: There is a balance between the carrot and the stick. The Member is right: public transport must be accessible and attractive. We have to move away from the notion that buses are only used by students and pensioners and that, once one can afford a car, one is no longer seen on a bus. Part of that is to do with improving public transport and its image, as well as the reality of using it. Trains will play a big part in that, and the rapid transit proposition for Belfast will also help.

Questions remain over how to deal with congestion and the number of cars coming into the city. Preventative measures may include the availability of car parking as well as the cost of it. The Member will see, through consultation, that there is an attempt to strike a balance. Reducing congestion is not just about trying to punish car users. If we improve the quality bus corridors and the rapid transit route, so that people in cars can see public transport getting to its destination much quicker than they can, perhaps that will convince car users to opt for the public transport option instead.

There will be a range of measures. The purpose of the review and the new transportation strategy is to try to ensure that there are complementary measures, so that it is not all carrot and no stick or vice versa.

Mr McLaughlin: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

I welcome the Minister's statement, particularly the emphasis on his personal commitment to sustainable development. Will the Minister consider, in the context of the discussion and the consultation process, publishing commissioned research on the developing technology of battery-powered transportation? An experiment is currently being carried out in Paris with compressed-air hybrid engines. That type of innovative approach would make a significant impact on the environmental issue of emissions and would attract public and tourism interests.

The Minister for Regional Development: I agree with the Member. We have to keep abreast of current and developing technology around more efficient and environmentally sustainable means of transport and ways of providing energy for that transport.

Currently, Translink's fleet uses a blend of 5% biofuel and 95% ultra-low-sulphur diesel. Translink is committed to continue to monitor the future availability and sustainability of alternative fuel blends. European directives may push us further and faster down that road anyway.

2.00 pm

There is a commitment to use the most advanced technology possible, and we are looking at the rapid-transit proposals to see what types of vehicles might be used. Whether we commission research or take advantage of the substantial body of work that has been done, I am happy to examine all the options. I will try to ensure that we have the most cutting-edge technology available in order to provide the most environmentally friendly solution.

Mr G Robinson: I welcome the capital investment in public transport in recent years and agree that public transport can provide many benefits for the population. Does the Minister agree that it is essential to have public transport that suits the user, or passenger, rather than the company? We saw a situation on the Londonderry line recently in which the Minister had to intervene to ensure that passengers had a more accessible timetable.

The Minister for Regional Development: I do not intend to be involved in working out timetables for Translink. However, the Member is right that there are occasions when a broader look must be taken at decisions that the Transport Holding Company makes, and how those decisions impact on passengers.

Translink has a passenger charter, to which it has adhered fairly well. Everyone who provides a public service, not just in public transport, should be focused on the customer's needs. All services, and the decisions that determine the provision of those services, should be for the good of the customer. After all, the whole purpose is to try to encourage more people to use the rail network and to avail themselves of public transport provision. That will be achieved only by focusing on what people want, what they need to get from A to B and at what time they need it. I concur with the Member's view that we can always improve on putting the customer first.

Reform of the Planning System in Northern Ireland

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Speaker has received notice from the Minister of the Environment that he wishes to make a statement on the reform of the planning system in Northern Ireland.

The Minister of the Environment (Mr Poots): With your permission, Mr Deputy Speaker, I will make a statement to advise formally that I have issued my planning reform proposals for public consultation. Members will be aware that the consultation paper 'Reform of the Planning System in Northern Ireland: Your chance to influence change' was issued for public consultation on 6 July 2009. On 3 July, I indicated that protocol did not permit me to make a written or oral statement owing to the paper's launch falling during the summer recess. I also indicated that I would make a statement to the Assembly as soon as was practical after recess, and that is the purpose of my statement today.

The reforms that are proposed in the consultation paper represent the most far-reaching changes to our planning system in more than 30 years. The proposals will help to transform our mainly regulatory planning system into a more responsive one that helps to enable appropriate development and to manage it in the public interest in order to achieve sustainable economic growth. Members will know that there has been widespread pressure for reform of the planning system from many quarters over the past few years.

We all recognise that the planning system needs to be able to adapt much more flexibly and quickly to the many challenges that face our society. The Executive's key aim is to grow the economy, and we need a planning system that will help us to do that. The recent global economic difficulties and the very challenging outlook for Northern Ireland reinforce the need to reform the planning system to make it more effective and responsive to the needs of all users.

Economic growth, including major infrastructure provision, requires development, but that development must be sustainable and take account of all relevant considerations in the wider public interest. The competing interests that often emerge in the assessment of development proposals require our planning system to balance important social, economic and environmental considerations.

However, I must stress the importance that should be attached to the economic benefits of a development proposal as a material consideration when a decision is being made on a planning application. My predecessor, Minister Wilson, made a statement on that matter shortly before leaving office.

I realise that the planning system cannot be expected to satisfy all interests all of the time. A reformed planning system should, however, enable timelier decision-making in a way that is transparent, demonstrably fair and delivers better development decisions. No one should underestimate the scale of the reform programme, particularly when combined with the transfer of responsibility for the majority of the planning functions to the 11 new district councils. The reforms that I propose are fundamental and wide-ranging, and, over time, almost every aspect of the system will change.

I will take a few minutes to draw out some of the key elements of my proposal. I propose a new streamlined, fit-for-purpose and responsive local development planning system that will enable the 11 new district councils, communities and developers to work together on the preparation of plans setting out a clear and realistic vision of how places should change and what they will look like in the future. The proposals are intended to produce more flexible local development plans in a shorter timescale, which will reduce from the current six and a half years to approximately three and a half years.

I propose a new two-stage process comprising a planned strategy document and a site-specific policies and proposals document. The introduction of a structured programme management approach will help to ensure speedier delivery. The replacement of the issues stage with a preferred options document will help to increase the participation of the public and other stakeholders early in the process. Plans will be more strategic and responsive, and they will provide greater clarity.

As far as the more effective processing of applications is concerned, we must move away from the current system of development control to a new regime of development management. The proposals are intended to change the culture of the planning application process to ensure that it is responsive to different types of proposals and that it will help to deliver development, rather than mainly control it. It is a question of improving efficiency in determining applications while preserving the safeguards in the system and enhancing public and community involvement at appropriate points in the process.

The creation of a hierarchy of development is a fundamental element of managing development. The intention is to encourage a more proportionate approach to processing applications by focusing resources on proposals that involve a greater economic, social or environmental impact. The hierarchy determines whether a development is classified as regionally significant, major or local, and that, in turn, affects the way in which an application is processed. By introducing new processes, such as performance agreements, pre-application community consultation and predetermination council hearings, we hope to achieve efficiency, greater certainty about timescales and enhanced transparency and openness.

The introduction of arrangements for the delegation of decision-making to officers, thereby building on the successful streamlining project, will also speed up decision-making and enable work on the ground to start more quickly.

Enforcement is also inextricably linked to development management. The power to take action against unauthorised development and breaches of planning control is a fundamental element of the planning process. Without it, the credibility and integrity of the planning system would be undermined. The consultation paper seeks views but offers no firm proposals on the introduction of provisions similar to those proposed as part of reforms in Scotland, such as fixed penalty notices for breaches of planning control. The consultation paper re-examines the issue of criminalisation. The paper sets out in more detail the advantages and disadvantages of making it a criminal offence to commence development without the required planning permission, and it seeks current public opinion on those matters.

I am considering the role and content of planning policy statements. I propose that they should, in future, provide strategic direction and regional policy advice. The new councils would subsequently interpret that information in local development plans. I have asked my officials to ensure that future planning policy statements are shorter, more focused and prepared more quickly.

Another key proposal relates to the role that consultee bodies play in the planning process. I propose to expand the list of statutory consultees to ensure that, post-RPA, planning authorities consult relevant statutory bodies. In conjunction with that, I intend to introduce a statutory obligation on the relevant authorities to respond within a specified time frame.

Although I recognise the current extremely difficult economic climate, there is an important debate to be had in relation to the contribution that the development industry can make to the provision of the infrastructure that is necessary for Northern Ireland's economic and social improvement, and on the best, or most suitable, efficient, and effective ways for securing such contributions. The consultation paper will begin the debate on those issues.

In view of the previous and continuing interest from some parties, I have re-examined the case for third-party appeals as part of the planning-reform programme. Although there are benefits claimed for third-party appeals, there will also be costs and impacts on the planning system. The proposals relating to front-loading third-party involvement in the planning system will promote better-quality plans and policies that will then provide a firmer basis for decision-making. Therefore, the consultation paper does not propose to make provision for third-party appeals in the current package of reform that is to be brought forward by 2011. However, I am keen to take views on the issue. All views will be fully considered before a final decision is reached.

Building capacity, both in the planning system and with stakeholder bodies, councils, consultees, developers, and so on, will be critical to the success of the proposed reforms. Neither I nor my officials can build that capacity into the system. It requires all stakeholder organisations to consider their roles and to play their part in increasing understanding, knowledge and capacity in order to improve the planning system.

Of course, we cannot ignore the issue of funding. We are talking about a different approach to planning as it is one of the new functions to be delivered by the new councils. I recognise that funding needs to be explored carefully in the new operational arrangements. Although planning fees will continue to be set centrally post-transfer, the arrangement will be reviewed in the future.

If accepted, many of the proposed reforms will require legislative changes, which take time. Of course, we will continue to take immediate steps to improve the planning system where we can, particularly to introduce measures to speed up the system so that it contributes to the Executive's top priority of promoting economic growth. My officials have taken forward work in a range of areas to improve effectiveness in the short term. In May 2011, the responsibility for the majority of planning functions will move from the Planning Service to the 11 new councils, creating a two-tier system of planning, with new roles for central and local government. The reform proposals were prepared in that context.

Local representatives will become the decision-makers on the majority of planning applications and will set the context for those decisions through their new local development plan functions. The only exception will be a small number of applications that have regional or sub-regional significance. Those will be processed by central government and will be determined by the Minister of the Environment. The new district councils will also act as consultees on regional plans and policies, including the regional development strategy. They will also carry out enforcement against the breaches of planning control. In addition, local government will assume responsibility for associated resources, including the planning staff who will transfer with the relevant planning function. That represents a solid foundation for the development of strong, effective local government that delivers a broader range of services.

Of key importance is the provision of high-quality, efficient services that respond to the needs of people and continuously improve over time. As already indicated, the consultation commenced on 6 July and will close on 2 October. Stakeholder consultation events are running throughout September in each of the 11 new council areas. Planning officials are attending each of those sessions to discuss and to respond to queries on the proposal. Details of the stakeholder events that are still to take place are available through the Planning Service website. I encourage everyone who has an interest in planning to attend one of the remaining events if they have not already had the chance to do so, and to respond to the consultation paper.

All responses will be considered carefully before final policy decisions are taken. If the public consultation process indicates support for the proposals, significant change will be required by all players in the planning system to adapt to new and different procedures and to change culture and mindsets.

The publication of the consultation paper lays the foundation for transforming the current planning system and is a significant step on the journey to securing greater effectiveness and responsiveness for all users of the system. It is important that everybody contributes to the debate on how to ensure that Northern Ireland has a first-class planning system that serves the needs of all the people. I commend the planning reform consultation paper to the Assembly.

The Chairperson of the Committee for the Environment (Mrs D Kelly): I thank the Minister for his statement. Last week, his officials drew my Committee's attention to the fact that no budget has been secured beyond this financial year for the additional staff needed for the planning reform process. The officials indicated that there are insufficient funds of almost £1 million to cover the cost of staff required to address the extensive programme of work needed to reform the planning system and to prepare for the transfer of planning functions to the new councils by May 2011.

How does the Minister anticipate funding the delivery of his planning reform proposals? I welcome his commitment to grow the economy and to give weight to planning applications of an economic bent. However, given the length of time required and the present dire need to grow the economy, will the Minister now advise his Department on decisions on current planning applications that have an economic focus?

The Minister of the Environment: I thank the Committee Chairperson for her question. I will bid for the full anticipated requirement for the delivery of planning reform, which is vital for the well-being of Northern Ireland. I anticipate receiving the support of the Committee in those bids, because it always strengthens a Minister's case to have Committee support in making such bids. I assume that the Committee will be unanimous in providing that support.

I will give, and have given, a clear direction to the Planning Service that it must issue decisions in light of economic conditions. I wish to deal with many issues that relate to the existing backlog. I will seek to encourage faster decisions, even if they are refusals, because people prefer certainty rather than uncertainty. It is better to issue refusals than to have indecision followed by refusal two years down the line. I want decisions that benefit the local economy and that can be acted on by applicants.

Mr Weir: I thank the Minister for his statement. A major frustration for Members who have been involved in local government and in the planning process is the length of time that it takes for a planning application to come to fruition. That can frustrate applicants, those dealing with the issue from a local government perspective and, sometimes, objectors.

The length of time that statutory consultees take causes big delays. Will the Minister outline how his proposals will address the problem of the length of consultation time for statutory bodies? Will he expand on his statement on that issue?

The Minister of the Environment: Statutory consultees have improved, and many organisations that are not related to my Department have improved considerably. I acknowledge the help of other Departments in that improvement, but there is more work to do.

The worst organisation, the Northern Ireland Environment Agency (NIEA), is in my Department. Although it has made considerable improvements, I want it to make greater improvements. In England, for example, the deadline for responses is 21 days. As part of our reforms, we will seek to introduce a deadline of 21 or 28 days. We await public feedback on what is best. That is how we intend to improve statutory consultees' reporting processes.

Mr Boylan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Cuirim fáilte roimh ráiteas an Aire.

I welcome the Minister's statement, and I wish him every success in his new role. Perhaps it will be third time lucky for me, and there will be no new Ministers until the end of the mandate.

Third-party appeals are a live issue. If there is strong support for third-party appeals, either in verbal or written form, will the Minister seriously consider implementing them in the final policy?

I wish to raise the matter of the economic benefits of a development proposal as a material consideration.

In the absence of draft area plans, people have made submissions to develop ground. Given the potential economic benefits, will the Minister consider examining some of those applications, even in the absence of area plans, because it will be some time before the policy is operating? Go raibh míle maith agat.

The Minister of the Environment: We are considering other systems to deal with third-party appeals. People have asked us to consider various examples, and we are happy to do so. We have to weigh up the advantages of third-party appeals, which provide the public with extensive opportunities to become involved throughout the planning process. However, there are disadvantages. For instance, they can slow up the planning system, and I would be deeply concerned that that might cause the system to stagnate, which would not benefit anyone. Nevertheless, we have certainly not closed the door on third-party appeals, and we will consider the matter further.

I particularly ask people to consider the benefits of front-loading applications, whereby public consultation takes place at an early point. We want developers to consult with the public and, when possible, come to an agreed way forward. We are looking for real and meaningful discussion between those who are developing projects and members of the public, but we will not be satisfied with a box-ticking exercise. We will weigh the advantages of third-party appeals against front-loaded applications, which make the argument for third-party appeals less compelling. Nonetheless, we will consider them.

Given the absence of area plans and the fact that some developments may wish to proceed but not as much land has been approved as might otherwise be available, we are probably not in a position in which there is such a huge demand for development as there was two years ago. With many sites in Northern Ireland, the biggest problem for developers is selling houses. Consequently, many sites are not going ahead as quickly as we would like. Therefore, we need to be careful about introducing additional land that is outside current development plans.

Mr Beggs: I welcome the Department's intention to produce more flexible development plans to enable projects to be developed locally. Will the Minister confirm the continuing role of the regional development plan and how it will interact with local area plans? Will he also clarify what will happen to outstanding local area plans that are at an advanced stage, such as the Antrim, Ballymena and Larne area plan, which was consulted on many years ago?

The Minister of the Environment: Area plans are working towards completion, and we hope to finish them before 2011. If it is believed that it is not possible to finish plans before that date, we will enter into discussions with the new councils' transition committees to see how the plans can be completed. That is the route that we intend to take.

Mrs Long: I welcome the Minister's statement and the emphasis on dealing with area plans. I trust that he will focus on trying to ensure that they are in place in a timely fashion to avoid a recurrence of the current vacuum.

What contact has the Minister had with DRD to ensure that the regional transport strategy, for example, dovetails with area plans? I am also interested in the Minister's views on appropriate weighting for economic arguments versus, for example, built heritage, environment, local amenity, and so on.

The Minister of the Environment: Our linking up with the regional development strategy has, of course, always taken place. That will not be lost, because the local transition committees, which will become the local councils, will take over the DOE function of engaging with others on the development of plans. The new council, with those powers, will act in a similar way to which the Planning Service currently acts in identifying the infrastructural needs of the local community and will work closely with DRD on that particular issue.

On the issue of economic development versus built and natural heritage and other issues, we have a planning system that goes through a consultation process whereby each Department and statutory consultee brings forward its opinions. The Planning Service does not lightly overlook those opinions at any point. What Minister Wilson indicated in his statement was that, when a decision was marginal and was not a clear-cut refusal, economic development considerations would be given precedence. So when there is a decision that planners may previously have found slightly more difficult to make a judgement on, if there are considerable economic development benefits, that decision should come down on the side of the economic development benefit.

Mr Deputy Speaker: As Question Time commences at 2.30 pm, I suggest that the House takes its ease until that time. Questions on the Minister of the Environment's statement will continue after Question Time, when the next Member to ask a question will be Mr Alastair Ross.

The business stood suspended.

2.30 pm

(Mr Speaker in the Chair)

Oral Answers to Questions

Mr Speaker: Before we begin Question Time, I advise Members that from today we do not have any advance notice at the Speaker's Table of Members who wish to ask supplementary questions. We are therefore relying solely on Members rising in their place if they wish to be considered for a supplementary question. Members need to keep rising at the end of the Ministers' replies if they want to be called. Let me make it clear: I will call only Members who are on their feet. In the past, there has been reluctance from Members to rise in their place during Question Time; there does not seem to be reluctance when they are making points of order. It is vitally important that Members rise in their place. In the Chamber, there are Members from another House who can demonstrate how it can be done.

In the past, Members have got up halfway and sat down again, and I am not sure whether they are serious about asking a supplementary question. There are also some Members who nod up to the Chair. Let me make it clear: if Members do not rise in their place, from today onwards they will not be called for a supplementary question.

HEALTH, SOCIAL SERVICES AND PUBLIC SAFETY

Hospital Waiting Times

1. Mr Moutray asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety what is the anticipated reduction in waiting time for a bimaxillary osteotomy, and how many patients have had their waiting time for this procedure reduced since the introduction of the new waiting list initiative. (AQO 1/10)

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Mr McGimpsey): The waiting list initiative has halved the time which patients can expect to wait for inpatient treatments such as bimaxillary osteotomy. The current waiting time target is that patients should not wait more than 13 weeks for inpatient treatment. That compares with a 26-week wait in 2006-07. In June 2009, there were no patients on the elective waiting list for bimaxillary osteotomy.

Some patients will have this procedure as a planned case — in other words, the operation is part of a staged treatment plan, which involves a planned series of treatments over a number of years. Such patients are placed on a planned waiting list rather than on the elective waiting list. In such cases, their waiting times for treatments are determined by clinical need rather than the elective access waiting time targets.

Mr Moutray: I thank the Minister for his response. However, one of my constituents in Lurgan, Mr Niall McSherry, was supposed to have the surgery in November 2008. That operation has been delayed several times. Will the Minister agree today to look into the case as a matter of urgency so that Mr McSherry can have his surgery?

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: The elective target times do not apply as part of planned treatment. Many people, such as children who are not yet mature enough to have the operation, have been waiting for treatment for many years. I heard what Mr Moutray said about the individual concerned. If the individual has been in a fit state to have the operation since November, he has been waiting for too long. I will be happy to investigate the case and come back to Mr Moutray, if he gives me his constituent's name again.

Mrs O'Neill: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. What percentage of patients are being referred to private healthcare providers so that the waiting list initiative targets can be met?

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: Without the Member specifying the area where she is talking about the independent sector being applied, it is difficult to be specific about its use. Is she referring to the particular issue of bimaxillary osteotomies, or does she have some other procedure in mind? It is part of my policy to eventually build the capacity within the Health Service so that we do not need to resort to the independent sector. At the moment, however, the independent sector provides additional capacity, and that allows our patients to be seen.

Mr O'Loan: I do not think that there is any doubt that there has been a dramatic reduction in many of the waiting lists, and that is welcome, but I wonder at what cost. One of the mechanisms for addressing the problem has been to bring in, with considerable fees attached, consultants from elsewhere. They have been brought in at weekends and put up in hotels, and the whole administration around that has been considerable. How sustainable is that policy, and has there been any analysis of the costs that are involved? What does the Minister have to say about creating a sustainable system that will keep waiting lists under control?

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: To illustrate Mr O'Loan's point, I have allocated a large sum of money for extra cardiac operations, allowing for an extra 700 cardiac operations over three years. I did that because our waiting lists were too large and too long, and patients were literally coming to harm waiting for their operations. I put that money in place to provide life-saving operations. We do not have the capacity in our hospital system to provide those operations, and it will take approximately five years to build that capacity. Therefore, the question was whether I should have waited for that capacity to be built and allowed patients to die on the waiting list or whether I should have taken the initiative. I took the initiative.

The Member asked at what cost those procedures have been made available, and I ask how the cost should be measured. Is a patient's life measured in pounds and pence? I do not do that, and I think that doing so is the wrong way to proceed.

We have a large number of patients, and we have a capacity issue throughout the Health Service, because, as Members are well aware, the Health Service was seriously underfunded over many years. There was a serious underinvestment in infrastructure and resources; therefore, the capacity is not what is required.

I must decide whether I allow our patients to come to harm or whether I find the capacity somewhere else. I think that the Member has answered that question for me.

Belfast Health and Social Care Trust: Urology

2. Dr McDonnell asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety to detail (i) the current capacity deficit within the Belfast Trust to meet the demand for urology services; and (ii) what steps he intends to take to address this deficit. (AQO 2/10)

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: A regional review of adult urology services was undertaken recently in response to concerns about the ability of our urology services to manage growing demand, maintain quality standards, and ensure high-quality services. The review report addressed in detail how demand and capacity have an impact on that speciality. I am considering the report, and I intend to publish it for public consultation shortly.

Dr McDonnell: I thank the Minister for his answer. However, I suggest that there is distress out there and that there is severe pressure on the service. Although staff and post holders, both medical and otherwise, work hard, their numbers are too small and they are overstretched, which adds to the stress of patients who are badly in need of urology support services.

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: I appreciate Dr McDonnell's comment. I am aware of that situation, and that is why I conducted the review and why I intend to publish shortly a plan that will allow us to create the capacity that is required.

The demand for urology services has increased year on year, with an increase of 9.3% last year alone; therefore, we have an issue with our capacity. The review addressed that, and I will publish my response to that major deficit shortly.

I will give Members an example of the sort of numbers that we are talking about: for 2007-08, the plan funded for 33,369 separate activities, but there were actually 43,000 such activities. That meant that there was a major shortfall, but we managed much of that additional activity — some 8,500 — in-house. However, a small amount still had to be bought from the independent sector. It is a stretch for staff to attempt to manage that extra capacity, and that is why I have taken steps to review capacity and resource. Demand is rising, and historically funding has not been what it should have been.

Mr McCarthy: Thank you Mr Speaker —

Mr Speaker: I remind the Member that if he wishes to ask a supplementary question he must rise in his place.

Mr McCarthy: I am up now Mr Speaker. [Laughter.] Will the Minister exercise his authority to everyone in the Belfast Trust? That applies not only to urology patients but to sufferers of ME and ADHD who need services but from whom, I understand, referrals have been withdrawn.

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: I am not aware specifically of services being withdrawn in the Belfast Trust. If the Member wishes to write to me, I will be happy to look into the situation, make investigations and come back to him.

Swine Flu

3. Mr Cree asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety for his latest assessment of the swine flu outbreak. (AQO 3/10)

10. Mr Armstrong asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety how much it has cost his Department to respond to the swine flu pandemic. (AQO 10/10)

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: With your permission, Mr Speaker, I will answer questions 3 and 10 together.

I am pleased to report that Northern Ireland, along with the rest of the UK, is experiencing a downturn in swine flu activity. Recent GP consultation rates for flu and flu-like illnesses and the number of antivirals issued — two indicators of the level of swine flu activity — have decreased. However, that recent decline in activity will not lead to complacency. Experience from previous pandemics and the advice of our medical experts mean that we must prepare for an increase in cases later this year.

My officials have developed and costed possible scenarios based on varying levels of virus spread and demand across the service, which estimate that swine flu will cost the Department between £65 million and £96 million this financial year. The best estimate, which assumes a moderate level of virus spread and demand, predicts costs of £78 million, £30 million of which has already been incurred, with £27.5 million resulting from solutions that ensure that the Northern Ireland population has the same level of protection as the rest of the UK.

I have requested permission to address the Assembly in greater detail tomorrow on swine flu, and I hope to provide an in-depth summary of the recent developments in that area.

Mr Cree: Will the Minister confirm that, as part of his Budget settlement, he can bid for extra funding, such as funding for pandemic flu? Does he agree that there will be consequences for the Health Service if he does not receive that funding?

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: Yes. The Budget deal that I did with Peter Robinson allows for the recurrent resource plus capital plus the first £20 million of in-year money, flexibility over my budget and the right to bid for pandemic flu funding. The Budget settlement specifically contains bids for pandemic flu, so it is quite clear where we are. At that stage, I had no way of estimating whether there would be a pandemic flu or of estimating how much it would cost. There will be extreme consequences for many areas in the Health Service if the bid is unsuccessful.

Mr Armstrong: Has there been any extra pressure on the Health Service over the summer because no money was made available for swine flu in the June monitoring round?

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: I have already expended £27.5 million as part of the national agreements on swine flu. Members will be aware that, as part of the UK-wide national response, the four Health Ministers from England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland meet together through Cabinet Committee, and we have agreed a series of measures. Some of those measures are already in place, and others are coming into place. I have reported on several occasions that there are sleeping contracts for vaccines, extra antivirals, extra antibiotics, personal protection equipment and so on.

Mrs I Robinson: I suggest that Members watch the House of Commons debates, and they will understand that they have to stand up every time a Member finishes his or her question.

On how many occasions has the Minister been in touch with the Treasury in London to discuss the important issue of clawing back any moneys that the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety is out of pocket for? Given that swine flu is a pandemic that stretches right across the United Kingdom, it would seem likely that the Westminster Treasury would pay that cost.

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: I am pleased to hear Mrs Robinson say that it is likely that the Treasury will pay that cost. That, indeed, is news to me, and I am sure that it is also news to the Finance Minister. We look forward to that —

Mrs I Robinson: It is a real question.

2.45 pm

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: I am answering a real question, but comments being made from a sedentary position do not allow that answer to be given. It is not my responsibility. I must not tread on the responsibilities of the Finance Minister, and therefore any input I might have to the Treasury would be through the Department of Finance and Personnel. I can report that I asked the previous Finance Minister to make such an application to the Treasury last May. The response that was given in June was negative.

I and the other Health Ministers also raised the issue at our COBRA meeting and were given a similar response from an attending Treasury Minister, but I am gratified to hear that it is likely that the Treasury will meet that cost. We will all welcome that, because the cost will be over £70 million. I have stated how much the Department of Health can contribute, and that is substantial, but it does leave a very big shortfall. Anyhow, I am delighted to hear of that successful negotiation.

Mrs McGill: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Will the Minister outline what communication he has had with the Health Minister in the South in relation to his Department's approach to swine flu? I am particularly interested in what happens in the border counties, such as Tyrone, Fermanagh, Derry and Armagh.

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: I can report, as I have done on other occasions, that my officials are in constant contact with officials from the Department of Health and Children. I have had a meeting with Mary Harney, the Minister down South, and I have had telephone conversations with her. We are taking forward and sharing all the information jointly. The information received through COBRA is also shared with the Irish Republic. We obviously have a border with the Irish Republic. One of the key steps that we are looking at taking in the UK involves the effective sharing of resources so that, if there is a swine flu surge in one part of the country but not in another, patients could perhaps be moved to areas where there is available slack. That would present great difficulties for us in Northern Ireland, but there is the possibility that there can be some cross-border sharing. That is one of the areas that I am looking at.

Action Mental Health Vote

4. Mr O'Dowd asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety to outline the reasons behind the decision to withdraw funding, from 1 April 2010, from Action Mental Health Vote project in the Craigavon and Banbridge area. (AQO 4/10)

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: The decision to withdraw funding from the Action Mental Health vote project was made by the Southern Health and Social Care Trust. The trust provided funding for 30 places on the project, but only 15 of those were taken up by trust clients. The service was not fully utilised by trust clients, so the trust has therefore decided to provide individualised services for its clients.

Mr O'Dowd: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for that answer. The scheme, although it may not have been used by trust clients, is a very effective and efficient one. It is there to provide individual learning courses to 16- to 25-year-olds with learning difficulties in the Craigavon and Banbridge area. The scheme levers in £178,000 of funding from other sources. On many occasions, sometimes quite correctly, the Minister has complained that his Department does not have enough funding. Surely a scheme that attracts £178,000 of other funding should be supported by the trust and the Department.

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: The point to stress is the one that I made in the original answer. Although the trust provided 30 places, only 15 were taken up, not all of those by clients who have learning disabilities; some were taken up by clients with learning difficulties. The Member will understand that the trust is responsible for the first of those two groups. We have to spend our money in areas that we are responsible for. I take the point that the service is valuable. It is offered to 18- to 20-year-olds, individuals who are at an important transitional period in their lives. However, if the trust pays for 30 places and only 15 are taken up, that obviously does not fit the demand that the trust has identified. The trust will now provide funding for clients on an individual basis.

I also make the point that the Health Service funds almost £1 million of transition services throughout Northern Ireland, so it is not a one-off, stand-alone service. We recognise the need for transition services, but sadly, for whatever reason, that particular service is not getting the necessary support.

Mrs D Kelly: I am also familiar with that project. Will the Minister assure the House that there was proper promotion of the service and that it was not the case that places were not taken up because people did not know about it because their key workers had not referred them to it?

Will he also give us some indication of the financial cuts to the support for such services, which are provided by the community and voluntary sector?

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: As far as cuts are concerned, the Member will know that she and everybody else voted for efficiencies, not cuts. She was aware of the plans that were available from the trust when she made that vote; therefore, whatever the detail of what the trust is doing, she voted for it. Perhaps I should be asking her what the cuts are.

Mrs D Kelly: I did not vote for them.

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: Well members of your party certainly did. I also know that there are Members who promised the unions that they would not vote in that way and then broke their word, but that is for another day.

I assure the House that the service is something that the trust is funding and does not take lightly. There was proper assessment made of the service. The Member may say that it is sad — I am sure that it is a very good project — but, of the 30 places available, only 15 were taken up, despite the best efforts of the trust. Not all of those places were taken by clients with learning disabilities; some were taken by clients with learning difficulties. Learning difficulties are not necessarily the responsibility of the trust; they may be the responsibility of another Department.

Gynaecological and Obstetric Services

5. Mr McElduff asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety what efforts his Department has made to reinstate gynaecological and obstetric services at the Tyrone County Hospital in Omagh and the Erne Hospital in Enniskillen. (AQO 5/10)

11. Mr Bresland asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety if he supports the decision of the Western Health and Social Care Trust to move all gynaecology services to Altnagelvin Hospital. (AQO 11/10)

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: With your permission, Mr Speaker, I will answer questions 5 and 11 together.

The delivery of health and social care services and the recruitment and employment of the appropriate staff to deliver those services are primarily the responsibility of trusts. I am satisfied that the Western Health and Social Care Trust has done everything possible to recruit and retain the appropriately skilled and trained staff. I am pleased to say that that is reflected in the fact that, from today, all services — outpatient, inpatient and day cases — have been reinstated.

Mr Speaker: I call Mr McElduff to ask a supplementary question.

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: I have not quite finished.

The safety of patients receiving treatment in any part of the Health Service is my first priority. To ensure their safety, patients should always be treated in facilities where the skills and expertise appropriate to their needs are available. On that occasion, due to a short-term difficulty in recruiting the appropriate staff, the Western Health and Social Care Trust was unable to assure itself of the safety of the gynaecological services at the Erne hospital: that is why the services were temporarily suspended, and I am satisfied that that was the right decision.

Mr Speaker: I now call Mr McElduff to ask a supplementary question.

Mr McElduff: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I welcome the Minister's response, particularly the news of the reinstatement of those essential health services taking effect from today. I ask the Minister to provide a categorical assurance that there will be no removal of essential gynaecological and obstetric services west of the Bann in future. The Minister will know that the mere mention of removing those services causes huge anxiety and inconvenience among women who are already disadvantaged by residing west of the Bann.

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: Seventeen women were sent to Altnagelvin Area Hospital; some have now been returned as they did not require treatment in Altnagelvin and have gone back to the Erne Hospital. Altnagelvin, as I understand it, is west of the Bann.

Although I appreciate and understand the anxiety that Mr McElduff referred to, the Health Service — this relates to a previous answer that I gave to another Member — has been seriously under-resourced over many years. Specifically, that under-resourcing relates to the recruitment of junior doctors. To address the problem, we have increased the number of students going through medical school by 40%, from 150 to 246, per annum. However, they must work their way through the course, so it will be 2012 before we start to see the benefits. That is why that problem occurred.

I will always work to ensure that those services are retained, not just west of the Bann but in Omagh and Enniskillen. However, I will not do so at the risk of patient safety.

Mr Bresland: Thank you, Mr Deputy Minister. Does the Minister accept that the forced closure of the gynae services in the Erne and Omagh hospitals a few weeks ago because of a shortage of junior doctors reflects badly on mismanagement of the Health Service? There are similar shortages in other hospitals in Northern Ireland.

Mr Speaker: I call the Minister.

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: Thank you, Mr Speaker, or “deputy master”, as you were referred to.

No, I do not accept the Member's assertion at all. The Western Health and Social Care Trust is, clearly, very well managed, as is the Health Service throughout Northern Ireland. However, we must consider the large numbers of patients and staff whom we are dealing with and the difficulties in a number of areas. I just explained in a previous answer the difficulty of recruiting junior doctors. We recruit about 1,700 junior doctors per annum. In this case, although the Western Trust could not have known it, of the six doctors who were allocated to it, one began work; two are awaiting visas; two withdrew at the end of July within a week of their start date; and one did not meet the required competencies, so the trust will look at that through retraining.

We are now back in a satisfactory position. It was one of those situations that could not have been foreseen. However, there are difficulties because, as I said, the capacity is not there, and, therefore, we are relying on recruitment, currently from inside the EU and then from northern India. Historically, northern India was a very fruitful recruiting ground for the Health Service for doctors, but we are not allowed to recruit there until we have exhausted Europe. That is the issue, and that is one of the problems that we face.

Full service was restored in two weeks, and I expect that we will be able to carry on, but I give this caveat: we have a shortage of doctors. I have increased the numbers going through medical school by 40%. When those graduates start to come through, I expect that our problems in this particular area will be obviated.

Dr Deeny: We are, hopefully, talking about top-standard and high-quality junior doctors. Is the Minister not surprised how quickly those places were filled: in two weeks? Was there competition for those places, were there interviews, or were doctors simply found somewhere and put in place?

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: The Western Trust is discerning in its recruitment. Two applicants were awaiting visas. I do not know the exact circumstances, but I presume that those visas have come through. Two withdrew because they got better offers somewhere else, and one is undergoing more training. Therefore, the trust has been able to extend the recruitment period. This has occurred not only in gynaecological vacancies and not only at the Erne Hospital, but five out of six applicants falling through was a most extreme situation. That is very unusual, but within two weeks the trust was able to plug that gap, and I am assured that the quality of patient care and safety will not be compromised.

Mr Elliott: I am pleased to hear the Minister say that services have been restored to the Erne Hospital as from today, but will he tell me whether any discussions are taking place with the body that is responsible for appointing those junior doctors to ensure that this situation does not reoccur in this or any other service?

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: I have arranged to talk in depth with the trust. However, of course we undertake HR planning as far as the various competencies are concerned. It was not entirely in the trust's control that two people withdrew at the very last minute to take what, I suppose, they regarded as better jobs, or that two others had visa problems. That was the situation. As I said, we have an historical shortage of junior doctors.

Demand on the Health Service is rising all the time. To deal with that, I have increased the numbers of students who will go through medical school by 40% from 150 to 246. The benefits of having those extra 96 students will be seen by 2012. Perhaps that action should have taken earlier, but that is not for me to say. I can talk only about my time in charge, and I believe that the steps that I have put in place will go a long way to meeting the need.

3.00 pm

Mr Gallagher: Does the Minister agree that the fact that people appointed to those posts can withdraw two weeks before starting time or not turn up because their visas are not in order shows that the procedures in the Department, the trust or the Northern Ireland Medical and Dental Training Agency must be reviewed? Will procedures be reviewed in whichever place the responsibility lies?

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: I have largely answered that question. Responsibility lies with the people who, historically, made the decisions on the number of students at medical school. The answer is to recruit more students to train at medical school. There is no problem in recruiting very high-quality students to the medical school at Queen's University. The increased recruitment should have dealt with the issue by 2012.

Issues regarding visas are outside the Department's control, as is the withdrawal of two individuals to take a better job. I manage the situation as it stands, and we are where we are. I am not clear that I can put a stipulation on a student going to Queen's University that they must take whatever job they are offered through our local recruitment process. The two individuals who withdrew at the last minute were irresponsible, and that is obvious to all of us. I wonder, with some trepidation, what sort of doctors they will eventually make.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Flood Prevention

1. Lord Browne asked the Minister for Regional Development what work is being carried out to prevent the repeat flooding in East Belfast. (AQO 16/10)

2. Mrs Hanna asked the Minister for Regional Development, in light of the recent floods and those which occurred during the previous two years, if he will develop a preventative strategy for flood management. (AQO 17/10)

3. Mr Weir asked the Minister for Regional Development what strategy his Department is pursuing to provide long-term solutions for households which are vulnerable to flooding but which are not on flood plains. (AQO 18/10)

The Minister for Regional Development (Mr Murphy): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. With your permission, I will reply to questions 1, 2 and 3 together. I apologise in advance that that will result in a much longer answer than would ordinarily be the case.

Roads Service is responsible for the maintenance of storm water carriageway gullies that are part of the public road network, and it aims to clean all gullies in urban areas twice a year. That policy ensures that a reasonable level of maintenance is carried out on the drainage system, while taking account of the Department's finite funding and staff resource levels. Work has been carried out in east Belfast in accordance with that maintenance policy.

Roads Service has completed flood alleviation schemes in Orangefield Lane, Merok Crescent and Tudor Drive. New gullies have been installed at Sandhill Park and Earlswood Road, and a number of replacement gullies has been installed in the lower Ravenhill Road area. In addition, further works are planned for Clonduff Drive and Wynchurch Road in the next six weeks, and investigatory work is continuing in Carnamena Avenue and Rosetta Road. However, even with the most careful and thorough planning, gullies, road drains and watercourses can simply be overwhelmed by a deluge of rain falling in a short period of time.

Northern Ireland Water (NIW) is currently undertaking a drainage area study of east Belfast, and that is scheduled for completion later this year. From that study, a drainage area plan will be formulated and subsequent proposals for flood alleviation will be considered. The implementation of any proposals will be subject to funding being available from NIW's capital budget.

NIW recently held site meetings with residents and elected representatives at Hamel Drive, Houston Park and Cooneen Way to discuss flooding that occurred on 31 August 2009. The company has also undertaken to carry out remedial work ahead of full implementation of proposals generated by the drainage area study. That work is programmed to take place in the next two weeks.

The Rivers Agency has also advised that it proposes to undertake river flood alleviation works in east Belfast on the Loop, Knock and Connswater rivers. The agency is also working alongside the East Belfast Partnership to integrate flood alleviation measures into work associated with the Connswater community greenway.

With regard to a preventative strategy for flood management, Roads Service is involved with the implementation of the draft Water Environment (Floods Directive) Regulations. Those regulations establish a framework for managing flood risk which is aimed at reducing the adverse consequences of flooding on health, environment, cultural heritage and economic activity. They place obligations on government to identify areas of potential significant flood risk by undertaking a preliminary flood-risk assessment of all river basin and coastal zones by December 2011.

Flood-risk management plans must be produced by December 2015. The plans will focus on prevention, protection and preparedness and will detail objectives and measures to reduce significant risk in those areas. Rivers Agency will take the lead in implementing the directive in the North. The directive represents a shift to a more integrated, proactive and holistic approach to reducing flood risk. It emphasises the use of sustainable flood management.

In order to provide long-term solutions for households that are vulnerable to flooding, responsibility for drainage infrastructure is shared among Roads Service, DARD — through its Rivers Agency — and NIW. Procedures for liaison and co-ordination of emergency responses among those organisations are set out in the best practice guidelines. Those guidelines are currently being reviewed.

There is also a shared flooding hot-spot list, which identifies the areas that are at greatest risk of flooding as well as the lead drainage organisation for each location. The organisations also take the lead in developing and implementing measures to reduce the likelihood of future flooding at those hot spots. Each drainage organisation also holds its own hot-spot list and has its own programme for dealing with those on a priority basis.

Following the extreme flooding that occurred in 2008, a flood improvement action plan was developed. Measures to deal with emergency planning, actual response and the clean-up and recovery phases are currently being implemented by all three aforementioned organisations.

NIW has advised me that most of the core sewer systems in the North are combined sewer systems, which take storm water as well as foul sewage and are, therefore, susceptible to flooding during high rainfall events. Long-term solutions are being developed that are based on flooding records and hydraulic modelling. Each solution will be costed and prioritised according to the severity of the flooding.

It is intended that expenditure will be focused on properties that are at risk of external — sorry, internal — flooding. Pardon my mistake. Progress on work to resolve flooding issues will depend on the outcome of funding that is available to NIW as a result of PC10 — the price control for 2010-13 — which is currently under consideration.

Lord Browne: I thank the Minister for his reply. I am sure that he will agree that we can too easily forget the impact that flooding has on families and individuals. A 93-year-old lady who lives in the Cregagh estate in my constituency of East Belfast has been subjected to flooding on no fewer than six occasions. None of our constituents should have to endure that situation, never mind a lady of 93 years of age. I understand that similar situations have occurred throughout east Belfast. What co-ordination has there been and what meetings have taken place between the Department and all the relevant agencies to ensure that the remedial work that is necessary in those areas is carried out as soon as possible?

The Minister for Regional Development: I understand the personal stories that are heard often. In 2008 and, indeed, in 2007, I had the opportunity to visit people who had been affected by flooding in east Belfast. I appreciate that flooding causes great distress as well as damage, particularly when it is foul sewage as well as storm water flooding that gets into people's homes. I wish to see those issues addressed sooner rather than later.

In my answer, I outlined that meetings had taken place and courses of action been agreed, some of which will take place during the next two weeks in specific areas where there have been problems. Of course, a study that is specific to east Belfast — the drainage area plan — is ongoing and is intended to be completed by the end of 2009. A set of measures will emerge from it. Rivers Agency has also done work on the three rivers in east Belfast, because the swelling of those rivers contributes to the drainage backup that causes flooding in the Cregagh estate and other areas. Therefore, measures are being taken in the short term. The agencies that are involved will be happy to meet the Member and any other elected representatives on site to discuss those issues. Longer-term measures are being put in place through studies.

Mrs Hanna: The Minister has mentioned budget. Is a plan in place or a budget available to replace the entire worn-out and out-of-date drainage infrastructure, particularly in Belfast? I am aware that bits and pieces are being done. However, I have heard that all existing infrastructure is old and worn out. Is there a requirement to address the loss of natural drainage owing to overdevelopment in places such as south Belfast?

The Minister for Regional Development: I have not had the same kind of feedback as the Member has had about the general state of the infrastructure, which is considered to be satisfactory.

Building infrastructure that will cope with some of the summers that we have had recently would probably require the Executive's Budget for a number of years. If we were then to have several dry summers, people would ask, quite rightly, what the point of all that investment was. The issue is about getting infrastructure that can cope with as much as we expect it to cope with. Our infrastructure could not possibly have coped with the deluges and torrential downpours that we have experienced over the past number of summers. However, to provide infrastructure that could cope would drain not only the DRD budget but the entire Budget substantially.

There is a sense that a piecemeal approach to the issue has been taken in Belfast. Studies have to be focused on areas that have a history of repeat flooding in order to address the problems there. Wider studies have been conducted into the persistent problems in east Belfast over the past number of years.

There were problems in south Belfast, particularly in the lower Ormeau area. The sewerage project in that area will have an impact on the Lagan and on the type of backup that was taking place in times of heavy rainfall. We have already seen those problems being addressed, and there have not been the same incidents that there were in that area four or five years ago. Then, it seemed like flash flooding in the lower Ormeau Road area was becoming a repeat occurrence.

The areas that are becoming hot spots are being addressed, and measures are being taken. I do not get the sense that the overall infrastructure needs the type of upheaval that the Member suggested.

Mr Weir: Like most MLAs, I am faced with a situation every time there is a heavy downpour. It seems to be the case that it is always the same two or three streets and the same two or three households that suffer and that there is a lack of long-term solutions to the problem.

I welcome the Minister's remarks about co-ordinated action to provide long-term solutions. However, will he confirm that the long-term co-ordinated plan will not act as a barrier to finding solutions as soon as possible for hot spots that are being hit on a constant basis? Flooding makes a relatively small number of people's lives a misery.

The Minister for Regional Development: I agree absolutely. Actions are being taken on different levels, and some of them are dealing with specific local problems. Actions have been taken, and some have been proposed for the next number of weeks. I can see that those actions have been effective in some areas, and that they are no longer on the hot-spot list. Unfortunately, other areas have gone on the list. Lord Browne mentioned someone whose house had been flooded six times: we are getting repeat occurrences. I have always encouraged and will continue to encourage Rivers Agency, Roads Service and NIW to meet elected representatives and residents in those areas in order to try and find local solutions that will affect the here and now while long-term solutions are developed.

Mrs Long: It is clear that the drainage area study will need to be funded and implemented, and that may take a considerable length of time: I agree with the previous Member about that. In the interim, will the Department for Regional Development and NIW be talking to the Planning Service about any need for restrictions in development and further intensification in areas in which the infrastructure has been shown to be inadequate? Have there been any discussions at the Executive about the potential for schemes to help residents insure their properties, because people often find that difficult. In England, the Government have arranged such schemes.

The Minister for Regional Development: Planning applications involve consultation with Roads Service and NIW on whether the infrastructure exists to cope with developments. In certain areas, NIW has said that there should be no more developments because the infrastructure has to be brought up to a higher standard, while others complain that we are frustrating developments. I exclude the Member from that, but we get it from both sides. In an area where the infrastructure is either not appropriate, is not at a level to service, or the problems are ongoing, NIW will tell planners that the infrastructure cannot cope with further development, and planners have taken decisions to refuse planning permission on that basis.

The answer to the other part of the Member's question is that the Executive did meet. In the first instance, there is a fund to assist people with the immediate effects of flood damage. There were discussions about insurance at previous Executive meetings, and one of the big concerns was that many households had no house insurance.

If there is anything that the Executive can do to help, I am sure that they would be happy to discuss proposals. No specific proposals have been brought forward, but we want to encourage people at least to try to get insurance in the first instance. If there are insurance companies that are unwilling to insure properties because of a history of flooding, the Executive would want to try and assist those affected.

Mr McNarry: Trying to be called to ask a supplementary question is very good exercise.

There were concerns about communications. What discussions has the Minister had with the Minister of Finance and Personnel about the effectiveness of the emergency telephone service, particularly during the most recent flooding in east Belfast? Was he able to extract any guarantees about improvements to that helpline?

The Minister for Regional Development: I received a briefing after the flooding in east Belfast, because I was made aware, through the media in particular, of complaints that people were unable to access the helpline. In previous incidents of flooding, there had been confusion about which agency was responsible. Some of the agencies involved are outside the Executive's control, so the response to incidents of flooding is a complex picture, particularly in bigger occurrences where the clean-up may involve local government, the police, the Fire Service and the agencies that are directly under the control of DARD and DRD.

There was a discussion about the provision of a single helpline; there was some argument that it had not worked as well as people would have liked it to. In the briefing that I received, I was told that people felt that a helpline was a good idea and that problems included a lack of staff, which was due to the absence of a severe weather warning.

The helpline service is worthwhile. There were one or two complaints from people who did not get the full benefit of the helpline, but it provides people with a one-stop shop to access the service that they require. Often, the wrong agencies are called out, which leads to a delay in their response to people who need their services. The helpline is a good idea, but, as with any new service, it sometimes takes teething problems to iron out the edges, which was the case in this instance.

Roads: Eglinton to Limavady

4. Mr Campbell asked the Minister for Regional Development, following completion of the work on the dual carriageway between Maydown and Eglinton Airport, if there are any plans for the continuation of a dual carriageway bypassing Ballykelly to Limavady. (AQO 19/10)

The Minister for Regional Development: Roads Service has advised that the programme of strategic road improvements proposed over the 10 years of the investment strategy for Northern Ireland for the period 2007-2018 is in the investment delivery plan for roads. The plan contains one further scheme for the section of the A2 between the City of Derry Airport and Limavady — a dual carriageway bypass at Ballykelly, which will be approximately 6 km in length. Roads Service anticipates completion of that scheme towards the end of the delivery plan period.

Mr Campbell: I trust that the outstanding access issue that I understand to be still ongoing at Campsie with regard to the existing dual carriageway will be resolved this week. I know that senior Roads Service officials are speaking to businesses that have been affected.

In relation to the proposed link between Eglinton and Limavady, either through or around Ballykelly, can I take it that there will be intense discussions with landowners and public representatives to avoid the problems that emerged with regard to the proposed dual carriageway from Tyrone to Londonderry?

The Minister for Regional Development: As the Member may be aware from his own tenure in the Department for Regional Development, there is rarely a road-building scheme that proposes to go through open countryside that does not involve land issues. Some of those issues can be managed; others are more severe. The scheme that the Member referred to — the construction of a road between Derry and Aughnacloy — is the most substantial road scheme that we have ever been involved in and will involve the largest ever number of landowners. Therefore, that scheme will have the most significant effect on landowners of any scheme to date.

There is standard procedure in place. It has been deployed on the Dungannon to Ballygawley road, the Newry bypass, the Belfast to Newry road, the Derry to Belfast road, and on all other major road-building schemes which required the same type of process because roads had to go through farm lands or other properties had to be removed. That procedure is deployed where there is discussion with elected representatives, negotiation over compensation or access issues for people. That is an inevitable part of road-building schemes and one which sometimes takes much longer than building the road itself.

The Member is quite right to draw attention to this. People have rights and, where proposed schemes go through their land or affect their properties, they have the right to be consulted, to be compensated for access issues, and for other issues that they raise to be properly dealt with. In the course of doing that, it is always the case that local elected representatives who have an interest should be involved and be kept abreast of how those things are happening. We must make sure that they have an opportunity to have an input.

Mr Dallat: I am sure that the Minister will be absolutely horrified to learn that yesterday there were tailbacks of several miles at Ballykelly. The question being asked is: what is the timescale between producing plans and constructing the necessary improvements? I am thinking in particular of Dungiven, where the plans exist, but there is no indication yet as to when the people of that town will be relieved of the pollution from which they are suffering.

The Minister for Regional Development: The Member must not have attended any of the public events at which the indications and time frames were given in relation to the Dungiven bypass. Similarly, in relation to the Ballykelly bypass, the land acquisition process and discussions around access issues have started. We went to Dungiven and spoke to the community about the process that is unfolding and the time scales involved. Of course, in common with the people in the area that I represent, they would have preferred it had the road been built 30 years ago; however, they understood fully the process that we have outlined and the time frames involved and were satisfied that, at last, someone has taken the initiative and is pushing those schemes forward.

Corporate Social Responsibility

5. Ms Anderson asked the Minister for Regional Development to outline his Department's policy on corporate social responsibility. (AQO 20/10)

The Minister for Regional Development: My Department is strongly committed to corporate social responsibility and has articulated how it aims to develop that in its corporate and business plans for 2009 to 2011. We are committed to being a socially and environmentally responsible organisation and an excellent employer. Therefore, my Department's policy focuses on four key themes: community, environment, workplace and responsible procurement. My officials are in the final stages of developing a formal corporate social responsibility policy for DRD which will take into account the wide spectrum of measures that we will take now and in the future. It is my intention to launch that policy in the autumn.

We are very keen to support our staff in making a personal contribution to the community. One of the ways we hope to achieve that is through our partnership with Business in the Community. That will allow us to participate in schemes such as the Time to Read initiative, which 15 members of staff have enrolled in for the 2009-2010 academic year.

We wish to develop areas such as research development where we can, through internships and work placements, engage in partnership with undergraduates and graduates to work on research associated with promoting sustainability. In spring of this year, under the corporate social responsibility banner, I decided to launch a student bursary scheme with the aim of encouraging studies in subjects relevant to DRD objectives. The scheme offers an opportunity for students in their final year of studying for an MSc in engineering at Queen's and those studying for a BSc in engineering or a BSc in transport at Jordanstown. There are a total of 10 £1,000 bursaries available, which will be awarded to five students from each university. I intend to present the bursaries to the successful candidates later this month, and I will continue to engage with my Department's corporate social responsibility policy as it goes forward, to implement further new initiatives and to drive through its implementation.

Ms Anderson: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for his answer. How is his Department providing the social requirements in the procurement contracts, particularly in relation to the positive community and social benefits that will be ensured when those contracts go through?

I thank the Minister for his intervention during the week, which ensured that the trains coming into Derry will now arrive at 9.00 am. Go raibh míle maith agat. Stand up for Derry.

The Minister for Regional Development: My Department is following guidance prepared by DFP's Central Procurement Directorate and the Equality Commission on sustainable development and equality of opportunity in public sector procurement. In line with that guidance and at my instruction, action plans have been produced by Roads Service, NI Water and Translink.

Those will include proposals for implementing critical community impact and social objectives, such as increasing access to public sector procurement opportunities for small and medium-sized enterprises, encouraging the economically inactive back into the workplace and encouraging training and skills development through, for instance, apprenticeships. Roads Service's action plan ensures that social and environmental factors are considered alongside financial factors when making procurement decisions. The plan has a package of actions to deliver the step change that is needed to ensure that Roads Service and its partners are focused on better design, low waste, higher recycle content, respect for biodiversity and delivery of its wider sustainable development goals.

Mr B McCrea: Will the Minister outline any achievement highlights from his corporate social policy? How much did that cost the taxpayer?

The Minister for Regional Development: I am surprised that the Member feels that promoting corporate social policy should be restricted by cost. All Departments have a duty to display a socially responsible attitude to procurement and actions taken. I will repeat one initiative that I mentioned in my previous answer: the bursary scheme. Later this month, after the successful candidates have been selected, the Department intends to award bursaries. It is designed to encourage students from here and to assist them with areas of their studies that relate to Department for Regional Development policy. Five students from Queen's and five from Jordanstown will receive £1,000 bursaries; that is £10,000 for starters.

Mr Shannon: In the Minister's response to the initial question, he mentioned opportunities that are available to university students. Will he confirm that such bursaries will also be available to students who attend colleges of further education? The Minister is probably aware that student numbers are greater this year than ever before. Therefore, there is an eagerness to take advantage of bursaries and job opportunities and to ensure that everyone receives an equal chance.

The Minister for Regional Development: The Member is correct. I highlighted one scheme: in my previous answer, I said that Roads Service, NIW and Translink, in the contracts that they secure, encourage the use of apprentices and encourage the economically inactive back into work. The Department has specific proposals on scheme sizes, the number of apprentices that we expect the scheme to employ and the number of economically inactive people who return to work as a result of it. The bursary scheme is particularly directed at universities, but a range of other measures aims to bring people in through skills and offers them opportunities to be involved. Some major infrastructure and engineering schemes are ongoing here, and they provide tremendous opportunities for young people to become involved, learn skills and gain experience.

Belfast International Airport: Links

6. Mr Kinahan asked the Minister for Regional Development to outline his long-term vision for improvements to transport links to Belfast International Airport. (AQO 21/10)

The Minister for Regional Development: The infrastructure connections to our airports are important, particularly for economic competitiveness, tourism and leisure markets and the convenience of the travelling public. The strategic relevance of those connections will be considered in the review of the regional development strategy and the regional transportation strategy.

My Department's investment delivery plans outline a £3.1 billion programme of investment in roads over the next 10 years that will transform the strategic road network in the North. Despite the fact that it is the largest ever programme of investment in our road system, resources are finite, and choices had to be made. Those choices have been made in line with the guidance contained in the regional transportation strategy and the supporting transport plans. Although it has not been possible to include an upgrade of the link from the M2 to Belfast International Airport, the proposal will be assessed, along with other potential schemes, for inclusion in future programmes.

The investment delivery plan includes schemes that will improve accessibility for passengers travelling to Belfast International Airport from across the North and, indeed, from the South. For example, the scheme under construction from Beech Hill to Cloghoge at Newry will complete the dualling of the A1 from Sprucefield to the border and will significantly improve access from the South to Belfast International Airport. Accessibility to the airport is further enhanced by the completion of the M1/Westlink and M2 improvement schemes. There will be further improvements when the A4 Dungannon/Ballygawley scheme is completed.

Major dualling schemes are planned for substantial sections of the A6 between Derry and Randalstown and the A26 between Coleraine and Ballymena. Proposals for a number of two-plus-one carriageway-widening schemes are being considered for the A26 Nutts Corner to Moira road. Roads Service has carried out a study of that route, and a route management strategy is being prepared.

3.30 pm

Mr Kinahan: I thank the Minister for such a thorough answer. He has taken half of my supplementary question away with it. However, I wish to emphasise the urgency of improving the links from the airport to the M2 and, to the South, through to the M1 at Moira. Will the Minister look at doing an urgent feasibility study, reusing the statistics, so that the development of the rail link to the airport is also encouraged?

The Minister for Regional Development: As I said, a number of improvement works are in progress, although not immediately akin to those connected to the airport. I had discussions with the operators of Belfast International Airport in which they highlighted the fact that they were getting more traffic from the South, from Sligo across to County Louth, because of the road improvement schemes that have been put in place. I take the point that several others, including the airport operators, have made about the importance of the connection through Templepatrick between the motorway and the airport. Although it is not in current plans, the review of the regional development strategy will allow a reassessment of the importance of the gateways here to take place.

The railway connection was the subject of an assessment in 2006, which stated that passenger numbers would have to double to make the connection economically viable. I know that passenger numbers have increased significantly, and I will keep that matter under review.

Mr Burns: Has the Minister had any further discussions with the Kilbride Group about the railway line between Lisburn and Antrim? Will he consider giving it funding for a feasibility study?

The Minister for Regional Development: I have not had any further discussions with the Kilbride Group. I know that funding for feasibility studies has been given to various people who have an interest in developing the rail network, but I am not sure whether the Kilbride Group has received any such funding. I will determine that and get back to the Member. I met that group's representatives, and I know that they are interested in developing that part of the railway line. I encouraged them to continue their work because I am interested in developing the rail network. I will determine whether the Kilbride Group has asked for or received any funding, and if I make plans to meet its representatives in the near future, I will inform the Member in due course.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT

Reform of the Planning System in Northern Ireland

Business resumed:

Mr Ross: In his statement, the Minister of the Environment made reference to the need to build capacity. Given that significant powers will be devolved to local government from the Assembly, what consideration has been given to running pilot schemes or similar schemes in local government to help build that capacity?

The Minister of the Environment (Mr Poots): Building capacity is the key to the success of the reform measures. In looking ahead to 2011, my officials are working with other sectors, through the review of public administration (RPA) implementation structures, to explore opportunities to enhance capacity in the system, particularly to ensure readiness for the changes that will arise in the context of the implementation of the RPA and planning reform.

Capacity is not developed by simply getting people to attend training events or by allocating extra resources. It comes through many opportunities, and the stakeholder engagement sessions provide a means of starting to build capacity through enhanced understanding. The potential pilot work between the Planning Service and some of the transition committees on the new development plans will constitute capacity building. The joint working between the Planning Service and the Construction Employers Federation is important. Initiatives undertaken by the Northern Ireland Local Government Association (NILGA), the Royal Town Planning Institute (RTPI), the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors (RICS) and others will also contribute to capacity building.

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Minister for his statement, and I congratulate him on his recent appointment. I am obviously trying to ingratiate myself at an early stage.

His statement rightly refers to the economic growth aspect of planning decisions and the enforcement responsibilities of his Department. Hopefully, the consultation will provide a way forward in achieving a balance on those issues.

However, I am concerned about the gap that exists in policy direction for economic growth and planning enforcement. The former Minister, and indeed, the present Minister, is aware of the number of cases in my constituency where the Department is pursuing enforcement —

Mr Speaker: I ask the Member to come to his question.

Mr Kennedy: The Department is pursuing enforcement cases that will have a very serious impact on local jobs and small businesses. Does the Minister have any plans in the short term, and in the intervening period until the new policy is consulted on and established, to bring forward a policy that will deal with those problems?

The Minister of the Environment: We certainly have a policy to deal with those problems; that is why we have enforcement officers. Whenever there are breaches of planning applications, it is the job of enforcement officers to ascertain the veracity of any complaints that are lodged against individuals who have perhaps started a development in advance of having received planning approval.

I understand that not every case is clear-cut. There are often significant complications and confusion, and it is up to the applicants to make their case very clearly if they feel that they are not in breach of planning regulations. Regulations and policies are in place, and the enforcement officers are there to implement them.

Mr Gallagher: I thank the Minister for his statement. In bringing forward planning reform, it is important to tie up any loose ends that remain in the planning business, not least those concerning draft PPS 21 and the report of the independent working group. Does the Minister expect that that report will be completed and that its findings will play into planning reform?

We are aware of the 'Foundations for the Future' report and its view on third-party right of appeal. Does the Minister still see third-party right of appeal, with restrictions, emerging from the planning reform?

The Minister of the Environment: I am meeting the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to discuss that issue, and we hope to be in a position to finalise draft PPS 21 in this parliamentary session.

The work of the independent working group on non-farming rural dwellers has not enabled me greatly to move that issue forward. It has not identified different ideas as to how the group might enable non-farming rural dwellers to develop without causing a proliferation of buildings to be built across our countryside. That was why PPS14 was introduced in the first instance. Were we to allow such a proliferation, it would not meet current EU regulations.

Therefore, we must be careful in our considerations. The independent working group's paper will be published in due course. I have agreed to forward it to the Committee in the first instance, and Members can then draw their own conclusions from it.

Mr I McCrea: I congratulate the Minister on his appointment, and I welcome his statement. It is good to see him back on the party's ministerial team.

The Minister did not make specific mention of concerns about permitted development. Does he intend to consult on permitted development through the planning reform?

The Minister of the Environment: I thank the Member for his question and for pointing out the wisdom of the party leader.

We seek to create more opportunity for permitted development rights and propose to extend the range of minor developments for which planning permission is given without a planning application. The list will be wide-ranging and will include those that are available to householders, industry, waste management, electronic communications, the commercial and retail sector, agriculture, electricity undertakings, mining operations and institutions such as universities, hospitals and schools. We will also provide specific permitted development rights for small-scale renewable energy generation.

Extended permitted development rights will save time and money for developers and the planning authority. If we get the balance right, a significant number of schemes each year will no longer need an application for planning permission, and resources will be redirected to developments that are of greater strategic and economic importance. Consultants have been engaged to advise on the scope for extending existing permitted development rights and introducing additional categories of permitted development. We expect to consult on the outcome of that work very shortly.

Mr B Wilson: I thank the Minister for his statement. I welcome the emphasis on the economic aspects of planning and the need for quicker decision-making. However, I am concerned that reform will be achieved at the expense of the local community. In his statement, the Minister referred to:

"enhancing public and community involvement at appropriate points".

Will he clarify what is meant by that?

The Minister of the Environment: I thought that the statement was clear that the most appropriate point for the community to be involved is the starting point. Currently, the community cannot have its stake or say at that early point, and people often come in to fight the battle when the opportunity to speak has gone. It is far better for the community to become involved when the planning application is being drawn together, where people are engaged with those who are drawing up proposals and can have a greater influence on them. The individuals who are drawing up the proposals will welcome the support of local communities and will want to work with them to gain that support. We are getting it right by offering communities the opportunity to be involved at the front end rather than coming in when the battle is already lost.

Lord Morrow: Will the Minister confirm that, technically, people do not need planning permission to commence development? That is a fundamental weakness in the current system, and I am pleased that the Minister sees it as an area that needs to be addressed in any new system. When someone commences a development, which is then brought to the attention of the planners, the developer has to submit an application. The planning process can take two or three years before a decision is made. Does the Minister agree that something has to be done to change that situation? I impress upon him the importance of closing that loophole so that developers cannot start to develop before planning permission has been granted.

The Minister of the Environment: Developers who start work without planning permission do so at risk. Mr Kennedy appealed for more leniency and Lord Morrow wants me to be stronger on enforcement issues; so it is a case of identifying where the balance lies.

It is inappropriate that people can start a development without planning permission and not be deemed to be doing anything wrong. We will look at that matter in the proposals. I have also looked at what has happened in Scotland, where provisions have been introduced recently to require developers to notify the planning authority when they commence and complete developments. People there are given the opportunity to pay a penalty as an alternative to prosecution, which frees up planning officials to do other work. We will use the consultation paper to seek views on the introduction of similar provisions, and we welcome all input to that.

Ms Lo: I, too, welcome the long-awaited consultation on planning reform.

I have been to a couple of public meetings, one of which Community Places organised specifically for the community sector. Individuals and community groups have many concerns about the third-party right of appeal being ruled out. People fear that they and the developers will not share a level playing field. They welcome and appreciate the front-loading approach that will greatly increase their involvement from the beginning of the process. However, they feel that a last resort should be available to enable them to address any issues.

3.45 pm

The Minister of the Environment: As I said earlier, the door is not closed, because the consultation process is ongoing. My officials and I will give due consideration to that matter. At this point, we consider that the case for a third-party right of appeal is made less compelling by the other opportunities that we wish to create for members of the public to consult on public issues. We want them to have a clear and effective voice before they reach the stage of launching a third-party appeal.

We want a planning process that works, is efficient and does not become bogged down or stagnant. We must find a balance, and the consultation paper is a good starting point in identifying that. We will continue to work through the issues and to consult. Hopefully, the right balance will have been achieved for everyone involved when I return to the subject in the Assembly.

Mr Shannon: I thank the Minister for the opportunity to question him on planning reform, which, as everyone in the Chamber who works hard in their local areas knows, is an important issue. It is important that local politicians will be making the final decisions. That must be good news, and it may remove the perception that the current attitude in the Planning Service is one of “can’t do”. Its replacement with a “can do” attitude would be important to everyone who wants progress.

Earlier today, comments were made in the Chamber about third-party appeals. I am extremely concerned about any changes to those. Planning reform seems to place an onus on bringing about change whereby members of the public would no longer be able to attend appeals at which they could express their views orally. They would be able to do so only through written communication. Does the Minister consider that to be the best process for development projects? Does the removal of the opportunity for an oral hearing not remove the opportunity for questions and discussion?

The Minister of the Environment: Mr Shannon should realise that I will claim credit for all that is good in the paper, and I will blame my colleague and predecessor who is sitting behind me for everything that is not so good.

As regards oral hearings, I am being pressured by all sides: developers, potential objectors and community representatives. Everyone wishes to have their say, and that will drag out and extend the process. Nonetheless, my officials and I are always keen to hear what the public tell us. Thus far, all sides of the community have spoken with one voice during the consultation.

Mr Kinahan: I congratulate the ex-Minister and the current Minister on the many good points in today’s statement. However, I have one concern that is shared by many people outside the Chamber. Does the Minister envisage any checks and balances being imposed on local representatives to ensure appropriate transparency, particularly when a development is likely to have a significant effect on the economy?

The Minister of the Environment: In short, yes. Once established, the new councils will be subject to codes of governance that will apply to every individual councillor. We have been examining the codes of governance that are in place elsewhere. Some of those are excessive and others can result in councillors being unable to carry out their work until unsubstantiated claims are dealt with. We hope to put a practical system in place.

However, I have to say that over the lifetime of my political career, most, if not all, of the people whom I have worked with have not been corrupt. I will lay that on the line: politicians, whatever their faults, are generally not corrupt. That is not to say that there will not be exceptions, because in every business of the world, there are people who let that business down. We will put checks and balances in place, but when it comes to local authorities making the decisions, there is no more likelihood of corruption than is currently the case.

Although it has quite often been suggested that there is corruption in the current process, I have yet to see any evidence of it. I am not aware of any court cases in which it has been proven. Therefore, we do not need to build up that type of allegation too far because people want to work for the general good of their communities.

Mr Ford: I thank the Minister for his statement and for the paper. During his answers, he placed considerable emphasis on the economy, although his statement referred to providing the infrastructure that is necessary for Northern Ireland's economic and social improvement. Where does the enhancement of our environment fit with those objectives? Where does the Executive's well-known commitment to building a shared future fit among the social objectives?

The Minister of the Environment: I have never regarded the economy and the environment as either/or matters. The economy is key to a quality environment because if people are in good, well-paid jobs, they will want to look after and create a quality environment to live in. We will certainly be responsive in creating that particular environment. Very strong powers have been put in place for our natural heritage, and the Northern Ireland Environment Agency (NIEA) is quite firm in enforcing those.

It does not help very much when a Minister makes a statement that promotes the economy and people who are involved in business take judicial reviews against this House when it promotes the economy. I find it reprehensible that businesses, for their interests, seek to subjugate the will of this Assembly, which approved Minister Wilson's statement. There was no objection to that statement. It is a sad day whenever people seek to judicially review such statements when we are trying to promote jobs and push the economy forward in difficult circumstances, but individuals, for their own selfish reasons, seek to stop that.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

Compensation from the Libyan Government

Mr Speaker: The next item of business is the motion on compensation from the Libyan Government. The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer will have 10 minutes to propose the motion and 10 minutes in which to make a winding-up speech. All other Members who speak will have five minutes.

Mr Donaldson: I beg to move

That this Assembly notes the decision by the Scottish Government to release the Lockerbie bomber from prison, and supports the case being taken by the victims of IRA terrorism to claim compensation from the Libyan Government who supplied arms and Semtex explosives to the IRA; and further calls on the UK Government to apply diplomatic pressure on Libya to pay this compensation.

I welcome the opportunity to propose the motion. First, I will give some background to the case, because it is important that the House understands that this issue did not recently arrive on Members' desks, as it were. In fact, it is a legal case that was initiated in early 2006 when a number of victims of IRA terrorism decided to launch a class action in the courts of the United States of America against the Libyan Government. On 21 April 2006, 141 victims of IRA atrocities, mainly involving the use of Semtex explosives, lodged a class action with the American courts.

Those victims included people whose families had lost loved ones in the Harrods bombing in 1983, the Canary Wharf bombing in 1996, the bombing of the Arndale shopping centre in the same year, and the bombing of the centre of Warrington, in which two young boys lost their lives. The class action included victims of terrorist actions in Northern Ireland, including the Enniskillen bombing, bombings in Belfast and in places as far apart as Lisburn, Londonderry, Portadown and Banbridge.

Many towns, villages and cities across the United Kingdom were affected by the actions of the Provisional IRA using weaponry supplied by the Libyan Government. The most lethal of that weaponry proved to be Semtex explosives, which clear evidence shows were supplied to the IRA by the Libyan Government in the early 1980s. That Semtex was subsequently used in bombings to devastating effect in lost and broken lives, in people maimed and in the destruction of property. Damage running into millions of pounds was caused during the period that those weapons were used.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair)

The question has been raised in the public domain as to why there should be a focus on this particular aspect of what has become known as the Troubles. The answer is clear: it was the victims themselves who initiated this legal action, not the politicians. It was the victims who decided that they wanted to seek compensation from the Libyan Government, and they did so on the basis of sound legal advice from their lawyers and in the aftermath of the Lockerbie bombing, where the victims of that particular atrocity, which, as we know, was also sponsored by Libya, were able to successfully secure compensation from the Libyan Government.

It is also the case that victims of Libyan-sponsored terrorism living in the United States have subsequently been successful in securing compensation from the Libyan Government. I believe that it is fair for the victims who are pursuing this case to ask why they should be treated differently. We have an instance, Mr Deputy Speaker, where an American citizen who was injured in the Harrods bombing in London in 1983 is now to receive compensation from Libya. That compensation has been agreed and secured for him by the American Government, yet victims of the same bombing in London who are British citizens are not to be compensated by the Libyan Government.

Therefore, it is perfectly legitimate for those victims to ask why they are being treated differently. The answer is clear: they have been treated differently hitherto because our Government in London has failed to pursue the question of compensation from the Libyan authorities and to press the case with Colonel Gaddafi and the Libyan regime, despite having been urged to do so and despite meetings having taken place with the Government. They cannot plead ignorance about this issue; there is a paper trail of correspondence between me, my friend the Member for North Belfast, and other Members of Parliament who have raised this issue in another place. The victims themselves have pursued the matter with the Government.

Until very recently, the attitude of the Government has been that the need to secure normalised trading and diplomatic relations with Libya came before the need to compensate the victims of IRA terrorism. The Government were quite clear that oil came before victims' needs. That was entirely wrong. Many of us will have been horrified at the weekend to discover yet another development: our own Government signed some kind of agreement with the Libyan Government, so that the family of a young British police officer who was shot outside the Libyan embassy in London will not get justice. The suspect in the murder of PC Yvonne Fletcher will not be brought to trial because some sort of deal has been reached, and the British public are right to be appalled.

That is symptomatic of what has been happening here as a result of our Government's relationship with Libya. Thankfully, after the application of much pressure, and particularly in the wake of the release of the Lockerbie bomber by the Scottish Executive, the Government in Westminster have realised, belatedly, that this matter must be addressed. It is a question of justice that the victims of IRA terrorism have the right to pursue their claim for compensation from the Libyan Government, and they should receive diplomatic support for doing so.

I welcome the turnaround in the Government's attitude at Westminster. However, we want the Prime Minister to go further; we want him to make it clear to the Libyan Government that he expects the matter to be settled, and settled quickly. It should not be just a question of going through the diplomatic niceties and the motions of providing diplomatic support; it should also be a question of the Government actively supporting the case for compensation, just as the Bush Administration actively supported and worked for compensation for American victims of Libya-sponsored terrorism.

We welcome the change in the Government's attitude, but we are bringing this matter before the House today to secure also the support of this Assembly for the case that is being taken against the Libyan Government. We are not asking people to change their political position or to put their hands in their pockets. We are not asking this Assembly to compensate those victims but to recognise that there are citizens of Northern Ireland — Protestant and Roman Catholic, unionist and nationalist — who were killed or injured as a result of IRA bombs and actions and who are deserving of compensation. It is not a question of unionism seeking to score some kind of political point. It is about people, and it is an opportunity for all of us to come together today, behind the victims, to support their case for compensation. Then it will not be a party political issue; it will be a question of this Assembly recognising that in this case justice should be done.

Some have suggested that we ought to be looking at other cases as well. We, on this side of the House, have made it clear that victims of terrorism should be adequately compensated for their loss. Where there is a difference, of course, is that we are very clear that the people who should be compensated are those who were the real victims and not those who went out in the name of a paramilitary organisation to maim and murder. We do not believe that a perpetrator can be equated with a victim, and that is why, in time, we will seek to change the definition of a victim so that that matter can be properly addressed.

Today, our focus is specifically on the case that is being taken by victims against the Libyan Government. We hope that the House can unite on this issue in supporting the victims in their quest for compensation. If others come forward with similar legal actions, this Assembly can have an opportunity to consider whether their cases are worthy of support. However, today, the focus is on this particular case, and I urge the House to support the motion.

Mr Adams: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Sinn Féin opposes the motion. It is unfair and partisan. Let me say for the record that Sinn Féin is not opposed to any victims lobbying any Government anywhere in the world for compensation. Let me also say that I am very mindful of the suffering of those families whose loved ones were lost or injured as a result of IRA actions. I believe that it is the responsibility — certainly a part of the responsibility — of republicans to acknowledge that and to do all that we can to build a better society for all the people of this island. I also believe that others need to do the same.

It would have been better had the Members who proposed this motion consulted with the other parties to bring forward a motion that would have united, rather than divided, us and that would have reflected the suffering of all victims. The motion suggests that there is a hierarchy of victims, and that is wrong. The only way that political parties, in particular, and society in general can deal properly with all these issues is on the basis of equality of treatment for all. The motion, therefore, fails on that most important hurdle.

It is understandable that some of the families who have been bereaved or injured focus entirely on those who are responsible for their loss; that is their right. However, we who are in political leadership should be concerned with representing all citizens and all victims. Many of those who have suffered most are among the most magnanimous and forgiving of our people. We in this Assembly should follow that example.

The motion calls upon the British Government to apply diplomatic pressure on Libya. The proposers of the motion must surely appreciate the inappropriateness and hypocrisy of any British Government making or supporting such a demand of any other Government, given the London Government's long history of involvement in violence in Ireland. That includes the killing of citizens from Derry to Ballymurphy, from Newry to the Shankill, and on many other occasions.

It includes directing, arming, training and providing information to unionist death squads, and involvement in numerous cover-ups, including, as was revealed recently, the Loughinisland killings. Remember, a LeasCheann Comhairle, taxpayers' money was used to fund those killings. What greater scandal is there? Is that not a matter of concern for the Assembly or the DUP?

I will give one brief example. In the summer of 1985, with the full knowledge of British intelligence, a British agent Brian Nelson was sent to apartheid South Africa to get weapons. To finance the trip, the UDA, the UVF and Ulster Resistance, which was established by the DUP, carried out a bank robbery on the Northern Bank in Portadown, which netted £325,000. That was used in South Africa to purchase a shipment of arms. Those arms were brought back to this country, and in the three years after that, unionist paramilitaries killed 224 citizens and wounded countless others.

Although I understand why our friends in the DUP moved the motion, I put it to them that no unionist leader has ever acknowledged the role of the state or political unionism in fomenting and sponsoring conflict in our country.

The rejection of the Eames/Bradley group's report and its proposal for a recognition payment is another example of that, and I am disappointed that the Member for Lagan Valley Jeffrey Donaldson reinforced that point today. This is not about viewing the person who was killed as the only victim; it is about the families of those who have been killed. There is a misguided notion that one set of families can be designated as unworthy or of lesser value than another set of families.

State killings and collusion, which were an administrative practice and part of the British Government's strategy, have to be dealt with. That Government — the very Government that the proposers are asking to lobby the Libyans — refuse to co-operate with inquiries, hand over files or publish reports. That is evidence of their unwillingness to end the cover-ups and take responsibility.

We have to deal with all the issues. There are big challenges for us, and I hope that our unionist friends can join with us in meeting those challenges.

The SDLP's refusal to sign a petition of concern today is another example of that party's short-sightedness and lack of vision. Go raibh maith agat.

Sir Reg Empey: Libya's record as a state sponsor of terrorism throughout the 1980s and 1990s is well known. Throughout the Middle East, Libya sponsored terrorist groups that were opposed to the Israeli-Palestinian peace process. Such sponsorship of terrorism extended to Colombia, although some organisations closer to home also supported terrorism there. Sponsoring terrorism in western Europe, Libya was responsible for the murder of United States service personnel in Berlin in 1986. It is against that background that we must understand Libya's support for the Provisional IRA as part of its campaign of backing far-left and anti-Israeli terrorist organisations committed to furthering their extremist agendas through violence and terror.

The fact that Gaddafi's regime provided extensive supplies of weaponry and explosives to the Provisional IRA in the 1980s is not denied by anyone. The murder and mayhem wrought by the IRA in Northern Ireland, the rest of the UK and in the Republic throughout the 1980s was supported and enabled by Gaddafi. His support, however, does not in any way absolve those who undertook the terrorist campaign in Northern Ireland. Gaddafi provided the weapons, but the triggers were pulled, the bombs planted and the murders undertaken by people much closer to home.

From the early part of this decade, I have been in contact with Her Majesty's Government regarding the matter. It was clear from the responses that I received from the Foreign Office that Her Majesty's Government had little or no intention of undertaking anything like the approach to Libya that was pursued by the United States and France, an approach that resulted in compensation for victims of Libyan-backed terrorism before Libya was readmitted to the international community.

As my colleague Alan McFarland MLA said, yesterday's revelations in 'The Sunday Times' that the Prime Minister apparently vetoed an attempt to force Gaddafi to compensate victims of Libyan-backed IRA terrorism is a depressing confirmation that the present Government have decided that those in Northern Ireland and the rest of the UK who suffered because of Libyan weaponry in IRA hands have been forgotten by their Government.

The fact that Her Majesty's Government (HMG) have directed the SAS to train Libyan special forces surely suggests that we are far past the point when HMG would support those who were the victims of Libyan-backed IRA terrorism.

I support the motion not because I believe that Her Majesty's Government or the Gaddafi regime will necessarily pay attention to whatever we say. I support it in solidarity with those who have suffered because Libyan support allowed the IRA to murder people across Northern Ireland.

I also sound a note of caution: we must be careful that the victims' families are not exposed to extra coverage and publicity, and are not led into an agenda that will go nowhere. Now that the Libyan regime has been readmitted into the international community, it has sent non-governmental organisations, armed with sovereign wealth from the Libyan treasury, that are proposing to offer investment in various countries. I believe that they have been in the United Kingdom, here and in Scotland, and that they are very active on the ground.

When one adds the whole thing up, it is perfectly clear that the policies that the Prime Minister is pursuing were determined eight years ago, and that he is carrying on from where Tony Blair left off. The priority to stop Libya using its resources to develop nuclear weapons, and to stop the spread of those weapons, has overcome the desire of the United Kingdom Government to pursue compensation.

Furthermore, it is also not entirely clear what was the source of the 2008 compensation moneys, and it is not clear whether it came from the Libyan Government. It may well have come from a number of oil companies who are trading in Libya, some of which are American-owned, and it is not beyond the realms of possibility that British-owned companies were also involved.

There are a range of issues that must be examined, and I am anxious that the victims' families are not led up the garden path. The Libyan regime has set its face against paying compensation, and both Gaddafi's son and the Libyan Foreign Minister have ruled it out. Nevertheless, if there is any opportunity for the victims' families to receive recompense and recognition, the Ulster Unionist Party will support it.

Mr Attwood: From the outset, I wish to make it clear that, with caution, the SDLP backs the motion. An SDLP amendment to the motion was not accepted by the Speaker, and we believe that that amendment would have more generously reflected the situation with respect to victims and survivors. The SDLP amendment acknowledged that violence and human rights abuses had been perpetrated not just by the IRA using Libyan weapons, but also by agencies acting on behalf of the British Government, and by all the other paramilitary groups. In general, we believe that part of the fabric of a healed and reconciled society is the acknowledgment of the pain and the experience of the other, however it arose. A broadly phrased motion, which included all of those who have suffered violence at the hands of an illegal group, or through the actions of a Government, would have been a better statement from the House.

That is particularly important in the run-up to Christmas, because the British Government are currently consulting on the proposals of the Eames/Bradley group. They have made it very clear that they will legislate on those proposals only if there is political consensus, which is code for the lowest common denominator. For elements of the RUC, the security services, the British Army, and the leadership of the IRA, the UDA and the UVF, the lowest common denominator is the suppression of truth and the denial of justice to the victims' families.

Therefore, it is important to send out a broader and particular message to the British Government that all victims of violence and human rights abuses have to be acknowledged and their entitlements have to be respected, which includes their entitlements to truth and justice. The danger is that a partial, selective motion such as this sends out a message to the British Government that plays into the hands of those in illegal groups and state organisations who have anything but truth and justice on their minds. However, the SDLP still supports the motion because, on balance, victims and survivors need to be acknowledged rather than further victimised by the playing of politics on the Floor of the Chamber. We will not go down that road.

In one way, I find it difficult to accept some of the DUP's good faith in this regard, because many cases have been taken by victims and survivors to secure truth and justice. Many victims, including victims of state violence, have gone to court to assert their entitlements and have gone all the way to the European court to assert their entitlements to due process and truth and justice, but I have not heard from the DUP on any of those cases. When victims have taken legal action to protect their entitlements, the DUP has not stood up and supported them along that path.

Towards the end of his speech, Gerry Adams said that the SDLP was being short-sighted and lacked vision. He beat up on the motion, as well he might, because it calls on the British Government to apply diplomatic pressure on Libya. That is the same Government that Gerry Adams says should be persuaders for Irish unity. He is prepared to rely on the British Government in that regard, but beats up on them in respect of Libya. It is the same British Government that Gerry Adams relies on when it comes to the role of MI5 in the North, yet he beats up on the British Government when it comes to their role in respect of Libya. Gerry Adams said that we should not call on the British Government because they lack standards in respect of their behaviour and have a culture of cover-up and disclosure. In that regard, he speaks some truth. However, he should apply the same principles to the illegal organisation known as the IRA, which killed half of the people who were killed during the Troubles in the North, including hundreds of so-called innocent civilians. When will the truth and disclosure of all that come out at the hands of the IRA?

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member should draw his remarks to a close.

Dr Farry: The Alliance Party is happy to support the motion. Although we recognise that the motion is piecemeal with regard to the issue that it is trying to address, it is, on its own terms, the right thing to do.

As a liberal internationalist, I am extremely comfortable with the notion that we hold states and their leaders accountable for their actions, including severe and gross breaches of human rights and, arising from that, any sponsoring — including state sponsoring — of terrorism. A range of different means is available, including the International Criminal Court, the International Court of Justice, the European courts with all of their various terms of reference, and our domestic courts through the principle of extraterritoriality, which has been well established through a large number of precedents.

There is strong evidence that Libya has been involved in sponsoring terrorism, not only in relation to what has happened in these islands, but elsewhere in the world. Although the actions of a large number of Governments in the West may suggest that that is now a thing of the past, nevertheless there is an issue of accountability for actions that have gone before. When we talk about the true interests of the United Kingdom and any other country with regard to their relationship with Libya, it is important that we do not lose sight of those wider interests with regard to establishing respect for human rights and opposition to terrorism. Indeed, the manner in which we react to past examples will go a long way in sending signals to people elsewhere in the world who may be tempted to go down similar lines regarding to the type of response that they will receive from our Government and other Governments. So, it is right that we seek to hold Libya accountable for what has happened.

I recognise that that is only one aspect of what we can do to address the past and what has happened in our country in a very tragic manner. People have spoken about the need for a global response to dealing with the past. The Alliance Party certainly endorses that, as well as the approach of trying to get a body such as the Eames/Bradley group to recommend a set of proposals to take matters forward. However, until we reach that point, we have to look at the individual ways in which we can address the different issues concerning the legacy of the past in our society. I will certainly support any individuals or groups who wish to find redress through the means that are available to them, either domestically or internationally. That is the right thing to do.

I was interested to hear Sinn Féin members making the point about the need for a more overarching response to how we deal with the past and criticising the motion for being piecemeal. If they are prepared to engage more willingly with the Eames/Bradley process and recognise that it is the only show in town, that would be tremendous progress and may give us some platform on which to build the way forward.

There are certainly flaws and difficulties in what we have seen so far, and it is up to the parties in the Assembly to try to reach a consensus that will allow some proposals to be progressed. It is also important to recognise that the needs of victims are very diverse. Some people have a desire for compensation, and the motion before us is a call for compensation. In some respects, that may be all that is available to them. There are also demands for justice, truth and discovery, and for people to be able to tell their story and have that placed on the record. There are also the individual needs of victims, including support that they may need for healthcare, education and so on.

Mention was made of a hierarchy of victims, but it is worth making a distinction between two issues. I do not recognise that there is a hierarchy of suffering. When people suffer, particularly when a family suffers from the loss of a life, in many respects the suffering is equal. However, we must be clear that there is a hierarchy of circumstances in which events occurred. We cannot describe the circumstances in which lives have been lost as being equivalent, because there are different standards in the way those circumstances meet the rule of law. That is an important point that needs to be clarified.

It is important that the Assembly is serious in how it deals with the past and that it treats such issues responsibly. Although it is fine to address matters on a piecemeal basis, the main prize is to try to find an overarching way forward on the issue.

Mr Dodds: I welcome the opportunity to speak in this important debate, and I am glad that the first private Members' motion in the new Assembly term is about victims. When we talk about the issue of compensation from Libya, it must be noted that the needs of victims are different, as the Member who spoke previously mentioned. When we talk to different groups and individuals, it is clear that their needs differ as much as their circumstances.

One thing that struck me about the statements made by many people from the United Kingdom — not just people from Northern Ireland, but people from right across the United Kingdom — who are involved in the class action in the United States is that it is not so much the issue of financial compensation that is central, but the issue of ensuring that culpability on the part of the Libyan Government is recognised. There must be some form of facing up by Libya, and, necessarily, by others to their role in what happened to people's friends, relatives and families. Finding closure is far more important to many of the victims than the issue of financial compensation is, although that is not to say that there are not many people who are in need and who suffer day and daily. Those people do not just suffer emotionally because of the scars that have been inflicted by what has happened to them; they suffer financially, too. We must also address those issues.

I welcome the fact that the British Government have had a change of heart on this issue. I remember that Jason McCue, the lawyer who has been involved intimately in pursuing a class action in the United States on behalf of victims, received a letter from the Prime Minister on 7 October 2008. In that letter, the Prime Minister made it clear that the British Government were not going to get involved, primarily for the reasons that my Rt Hon Friend the Member for Lagan Valley outlined. At that stage, it was very difficult to see circumstances in which the matter could be progressed. However, I must say that it has progressed and has got to this stage, and that has not been because it has been driven by politicians.

Whenever we talk about leading people on and so forth, it is important to make the point that the campaign has been driven and is being led by the victims. That is the key issue. It is not a campaign that has been whipped up by any group of politicians; it has progressed because the victims initiated class action, which their legal representatives have been assiduous in pursuing, and because the victims have now sought the assistance of their elected representatives, which we have been glad to give. As a result, pressure has mounted on the British Government.

The circumstances in which the Lockerbie bomber was returned to Libya have created a situation in which the Prime Minister has realised that there is simply no credible or arguable defence for saying that, on the one hand, we should have compassion for a perpetrator of violence by sending him back to Libya to live out his last days and, on the other hand, we should adopt a flint-like response to the needs and cries of the victims. They deserve to be helped, and that is what is now happening. I welcome that, and the vote on the motion is a clear opportunity for all Members and parties in the Assembly to stand together with victims.

We are dealing with one particular set of circumstances, but that is the particular set of circumstances that the victims have brought to this House, as it were, and to us as politicians. It is now up to us to respond. When the Division is called, it will be an opportunity for us Members to say either that we are on the side of victims by helping them through our actions as well as through our words or that we are simply going to pay lip-service to the needs of victims and, when it comes to the chance to demonstrate where we stand, we are going to go into the "Noes" Lobby and vote against the motion. It will be a sad reflection on any Member who decides to take the latter action.

We hear the issue of a hierarchy of victims being trotted out time and time again. I agree with Dr Farry on that issue. We all recognise the suffering that has occurred across the Province, but there is a difference between the circumstances of those who go out deliberately to murder and who are then dealt with according to the rule of law and those of the innocent victims of those terrorists. We should never ever get away from facing up to and recognising that difference, both in fact and in law. Hopefully, that will be recognised in law sooner rather than later.

Mr Molloy: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. First, let me restate what my party has said time and time again: all victims should be equal, and their families should be treated equally in every way and treated with respect. It is regrettable — we are not surprised in one sense — that Jeffrey Donaldson MP, who was a junior Minister and who had responsibility for dealing with victims, is party to proposing the motion, which makes a one-sided attempt at dealing with victims.

We are a society coming out of a conflict situation, and I would have thought that, at this stage, all parties would be trying to deal with all victims equally, to respect them, to help them with their worries and concerns resulting from the trauma that they have gone through and to give that support to their families, instead of engaging in publicity stunts and using the issue for electioneering purposes. The issue of victims is much more serious than that, and it should be treated in that way.

Families should be treated with respect. We should be trying to help the families of victims to resolve issues, to respect differences and to move into the new opportunities that are in front of them, which politicians have moved into already. However, I feel that some politicians would like to hold victims in the state of victimhood and play on the emotions, worries and concerns of victims and their families.

All families should be treated equally, and this motion does not treat all families equally. This motion deals with one side only.

Mr Donaldson: I am not sure what the Member means by one-sided. We support all the victims who were affected by the use of that weaponry, and that is not exclusive to the unionist and Protestant community.

I am sure that the Member will be familiar with 'Lost Lives'. Let me briefly quote the case of Patsy Gillespie, a Roman Catholic father who was taken from his home in front of his family by the IRA and made into a human bomb and who lost his life as a result. His widow is quoted in the 'Belfast Telegraph' in 1991 as saying:

"Me and Jennifer were here together on the chair, and he just sat on the arm of it and put his arms around us and said, 'Everything will be all right, don't worry.'"

I am speaking out today for the Patsy Gillespies of this world, every bit as much as I am speaking out for unionist victims. Therefore, this is not a one-sided motion.

Mr Molloy: I do not see it as unionist victims. I listened to Mr Donaldson and I did not hear any acknowledgement of the victims of British atrocities, the victims of collusion or the victims of the regiment of which he was a member, a regiment that so badly abused so many people that it had to be disbanded such was the disrespect in which it was held across the community, just like the organisation that it replaced, the B-Specials.

The B-Specials were another loyalist paramilitary organisation — a Protestant force for a Protestant people — and one of the first organisations to commit murder, killing a young Catholic man at a peaceful protest in Armagh city. Agents of the British Government carried out a long list of atrocities in which the British Government and the British Army, FRU, MI5 and other undercover forces colluded.

Others acted indirectly. Loyalist paramilitaries and the UDR colluded to murder and to set up others to be murdered. The murder of Catholics under the UDR across the murder triangle is notorious because it was clear that it involved a mixture of RUC, UDR and loyalist paramilitaries. Some come from the constituency that Mr Donaldson represents, yet I have never heard him speak out in any way whatsoever on behalf of those victims.

The motion is one-sided because it does not deal with any of the issues for which the British Government were responsible. Mr Donaldson does not call on the British Government to seek compensation from those who armed loyalist paramilitaries; he does not ask the British Government to seek compensation from Ulster Resistance, which the party to which Mr Donaldson now belongs was key in setting up. Some were also clerks and secretaries of the Ulster Clubs, which was part of Ulster Resistance. Mr Donaldson might have been in a different party and wearing a different beret at that time. He was wearing the green beret of the UDR while his colleagues were wearing the red berets of Ulster Resistance; however, they were part of the same force, all colluding in bringing about the murder of Catholics across mid-Ulster and beyond. They operated not only in the North but across the border, and the Dublin Government, despite their silence, could be asked to compensate the victims of the murder and mayhem that was created by the collusion between the British Government and loyalist paramilitary forces.

It is important that we state today that all victims are equal. What victims want is compensation from the British Government for what they did to citizens here, but they also want the truth, which is a form of compensation. The British Government could easily end all the inquiries by simply telling the truth. Directing loyalist paramilitaries did not happen with a few renegades around Lisburn or Portadown or mid-Ulster.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I ask the Member to draw his remarks to a close, please.

Mr Molloy: It happened through direction from the very top.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr Molloy: From Downing Street and from MI5.

Mr Irwin: I welcome the opportunity to contribute to this timely and important debate on the release of the Lockerbie bomber and compensation for the victims of Libyan-sponsored IRA violence.

The disgust and betrayal felt by the families of those who were murdered in the Lockerbie bombing, after witnessing the release of al-Megrahi and the fanfare that greeted his arrival in Libya, were felt across the nation. The arguments for his release, which were based on his ill health, in contrast, gave little regard or acknowledgement to the well-being of the families who suffered the terrible loss of their loved ones. This issue is at the centre of how Governments treat the victims of terrorism. Megrahi made a decision to take life. He did not have to take the decision to murder 270 people. In light of his actions, surely he cannot have the luxury of release on compassionate grounds. The lives that he took and the families that are left behind are the sole focus of our debate. The release of the bomber on compassionate grounds is an affront to the memory of the people whom he murdered.

Libyan-exported arms and explosives have wreaked havoc across the world, with mainland Britain and Northern Ireland having their share of the carnage through the IRA's campaign of violence. According to statistics, around six tons of Libyan Semtex were brought to Northern Ireland by the IRA. Along with the import of arms and ammunition, that accounted for many innocent lives being lost and families being ruined.

At the height of the Troubles, my constituency of Newry and Armagh was considered to be a hotbed of IRA activity, including planning of attacks, making bombs, hiding material and, of course, carrying out some of the most bloodthirsty acts of murder imaginable. The victims of IRA violence in that area still bear the scars of that campaign, and their memories of lost loved ones are as real today as ever they were. The campaign to secure compensation from Libya for the carnage that it sponsored is a campaign that must be won. The voices of the Assembly must be united to send a clear message to Libya and its Government that their ridiculous decision to supply the IRA with explosives and weapons was the direct cause of much suffering.

In recent days, much has been said about the new trade links that Britain is forging with Libya. There are more important issues to address than trade relations. Will Libya recognise its part in the loss of many lives here, and will it, at the very least, acknowledge its mistake by compensating the families of the people who lost their lives? The campaign by the victims will force that message home, and, along with my party, I fully support the campaign. Libya must be held to account for its actions. I support the motion.

Mr Kennedy: No amount of compensation can ever make up for the heartache and emptiness caused by the loss of loved ones through the wicked and cruel actions of terrorists and those who cynically provided them with the means to carry out their acts of terrorism. That is an important message from the House.

Although Libya provided the lethal materials, those materials were used by Irish republicans. Even more unpalatable and difficult to come to terms with is that some Members of the House may have used those materials on behalf of the republican movement. Worse still, perhaps, they may have been used by Members who have gone on to serve in the Executive.

I praise the representatives of victims' groups who have campaigned tirelessly on the issue. I assure them of my support and that of my party in their continuing campaign. The failure of Gordon Brown's Government to link the issue of compensation for the victims and relatives of victims of IRA terrorism to the bilateral negotiations that have taken place between the United Kingdom and Libyan Governments has resulted in a perception that the Lockerbie bomber was released in return for oil concessions for UK firms. That has resulted in a serious loss of leverage for the UK Government in obtaining further concessions from Libya. The Brown U-turn on compensation for IRA victims is, of course, window dressing. Libya is unlikely to respond, because the matter is outside the mainly commercial terms of the bilateral talks. It will now be raised only through the normal official diplomatic channels that involve Foreign Office officials in Libya.

The worry is, therefore, that very limited leverage is left with which to persuade the Libyans to agree to compensate victims. That is why Colonel Gaddafi's son issued such a robust rejection of the claim for compensation for IRA victims. He basically said that the matter would be left to the two sets of lawyers to sort out.

The uncomfortable truth is that Gordon Brown made his most recent of U-turns only because English newspapers and other mainland media raised the issue of compensation for mainland victims of IRA atrocities, such as Warrington, the Baltic Exchange and Canary Wharf. It appears that Northern Ireland's victims of IRA terrorism, which Libyan explosives facilitated, were far from the Prime Minister's mind.

I want to register my deep concern about the damage that will be caused by the latest foray by Gordon Brown's long-discredited Government into cynical and commercially motivated negotiations with a regime that is dubious, to say the least, and about what that, in turn, will do to the relationship that this country and nation has with the United States. During the past 10 days, newspaper headlines in New York have spoken of a possible end to the special relationship between the UK and the USA. Ministers here must be concerned about the damage that Gordon Brown has done to the special relationship.

I am also concerned about the level of personnel being brought to the negotiations. I wish to show no disrespect at all to the individuals concerned, but a top-level UK political delegation must be sent that involves, at the very least, the Foreign Secretary and potentially the Prime Minister himself, if the UK Government are serious and if they want to be taken seriously by the people of Northern Ireland. I want the negotiations to go well. However, the delegation would have a greater chance of being taken seriously if it were to include the British Foreign Secretary or even the First Secretary of State, Lord Mandelson, who seems to be on such good terms with Colonel Gaddafi's son.

I do not want the hopes and expectations of many victims of terrorism in Northern Ireland to be built up to an unrealistic level, only for them to be dashed. That would be both cruel and unprincipled.

Mrs D Kelly: As I make my contribution to the debate, I am mindful of the fact that, in the majority of cases, financial compensation is not the real issue for victims. Certainly, in this case, victims' groups have made it clear that the issue is getting recognition of their pain and suffering. We all know, however, that, although it cannot buy health or happiness, money makes life considerably easier. As a result of the tragedy of our past, many families have been left without their main breadwinner and, consequently, have experienced severe financial hardship.

In setting out the context of the debate, the proposer of the motion, Mr Donaldson, made it clear that Libya has conceded the principle of compensation by already making payments to United States citizens. That is a fact. It is also a fact that the campaign has been instigated by victims' groups themselves, not by a political party. It is unfortunate, therefore, that the House will divide on the motion. We in the SDLP are disappointed that our amendment was not accepted for debate. It would have broadened the debate and would have given all Members the chance to support it.

The issue of a hierarchy of victims has been raised in the debate. Although there can be no moral equivalence between a perpetrator and a victim, there is a substantial and, indeed, increasing grey area as to who the victims and perpetrators were during our tragic 30-year conflict. That 30-year conflict was entirely unnecessary. That is one truth about the past on which I hope we can all agree. However, revisionism suits Mr Adams and Sinn Féin as they try to erase the IRA's brutal past. After all, the terrorist organisation murdered more Catholics/nationalists than the loyalists and the British security services put together. That is another truth about the past.

The SDLP is opposed to violence from any and all quarters and has nothing to fear from supporting the principle of the motion and the victims' call for compensation. I support Mr Empey's comment that we must not falsely build up the expectations of the victims' groups for getting compensation from Libya. Libya has already drawn the battle lines in that matter. We should not be shy or retiring in supporting the victims in their quest.

Mr A Maskey: My remarks were in no way a reflection on any of the families that are involved in the motion. Does the Member agree that motions such as this, which relate to a narrow section of victims' families, and the way in which they are dealt with can often cause even greater and further hurt to families that are not included in such motions?

Mrs D Kelly: Many of the contributors thus far said that the pain and suffering of victims' families are the same and that they should not be penalised. Mr Donaldson has regularly and routinely been quoted as having made such comments. In proposing the motion, Mr Donaldson said that the rationale for the debate is the fact that the issue is very much in the public forum after the call for victims' compensation and the recent decision by the Scottish Cabinet Secretary for Justice to free the person convicted of the Lockerbie bombing.

I also support the comments of my party colleague Mr Attwood. He said that, in the past, the DUP was put to the test in supporting individuals and groups of victims in their search for truth and justice, whether that be through inquiries or compensation, and that he hopes that the party will reflect on Mr Donaldson's comments and consider carefully the proposals that come forward either through the Eames/Bradley group or from other individuals or groups that have been made victims by terrorist organisations in the past. We will watch closely, and we expect the DUP to live up to its obligations in supporting all victims of the past.

Ms J McCann: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. All victims of the conflict and their families are entitled to compensation. Like my colleagues, I feel that the motion creates a hierarchy of victims, and that is unacceptable. Our priority and focus should be to ensure that all relatives are treated with respect and dignity and that every effort is made to support them, irrespective of their religious or political affiliation. There should be no hierarchy of victims, and all families need to be treated with that respect and dignity.

The proposer of the motion forgot to mention the victims of the British Army, the RUC and the unionist death squads. The motion does not acknowledge the fact that the British Government were a combatant force in the conflict. It is, therefore, unacceptable that a state that was responsible for murder itself, either directly or indirectly, through the policy of collusion should hold any other country to account.

Gordon Brown would be better placed to take responsibility for his predecessors and come clean to the families of the victims that his Government were responsible for killing, either directly or indirectly. It would suit him better to do that.

In the days that followed internment, in west Belfast alone the British Army murdered 11 people, including a Catholic priest and a mother of eight children. That same group of paratroopers went on to murder 14 innocent civilians in Derry on Bloody Sunday at a civil rights march, and many more people, including young children, were killed by plastic and rubber bullets. From the Shankill butchers era in the early 1970s to the murder triangle killings and the years of the LVF, Catholics of all ages and sexes were systematically targeted and murdered without mercy by unionist paramilitaries, including members of the RUC and the UDR.

Mr Donaldson: Will the Member give way?

Ms J McCann: No, I will not give way; you have spoken enough.

Three hundred Catholics were murdered, and, to this day, their deaths remain unexplained. They were killed —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. I ask Ms McCann to take her seat. I also ask Members to make their remarks through the Chair. The debate has been good natured until now, so let us keep it that way.

Ms J McCann: We are talking about facts, not allegations, about the Glenanne gang. The fact is that serving members of the UDR and RUC and security service agents were directly involved in murders and bombings, including the Dublin and Monaghan bombings, in which 33 people lost their lives, and the Miami Showband killings.

For people who are a bit confused about collusion, I will explain how it works. The Force Research Unit, better known as FRU, was a unit of the British Army that was responsible for the recruitment and running of British agents, including Brian Nelson, to murder Irish citizens. That unit, in turn, was answerable to the task co-ordinating group, which comprised the RUC's

Special Branch, the Chief Constable and other intelligence services. That group was accountable to the joint security committee, which is now known as the joint intelligence committee. The committee is directly responsible to the British Prime Minister and has overall control over all security issues. Therefore, the British Cabinet, including the British Prime Minister, is aware of everything that is happening in intelligence circles.

In the 1980s, loyalists were armed with weapons that were smuggled in from South Africa. I have not heard many Members talk about that today.

[Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry, Ms McCann, you will have to resume your seat again. I remind Members that remarks shouted across the Floor are not recorded in the Hansard report, so they are a waste of time.

Ms J McCann: There was an upsurge in killings, including that of human rights lawyer Pat Finucane. For three years after the South African shipment, unionist death squads killed 224 citizens and wounded countless others. Even today, we are awaiting the final report on the Loughinisland murders.

Ms Ruane: Go raibh maith agat. Tá an fhírinne de dhíth ar gach teaghlach, agus go raibh maith agat as an idirghabháil sin. As the House will know, the murders at Loughinisland were a dreadful atrocity. The families of those killed were supposed to get the report into the incident on Wednesday but have now been informed that that will not happen. Let us look at that case.

[Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: I ask the Member to resume her seat. I must insist that all remarks be made through the Chair. If I do not do my job properly, I will rightly be criticised. I ask Members not to make remarks across the Floor.

Ms Ruane: That case shows the importance of treating all victims fairly. There was no proper investigation into the Loughinisland killings. The RUC destroyed key evidence and paid agents. In our society, we need to move forward —

Dr W McCrea: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Is the Member making a speech or is she making an intervention?

Mr Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order.

Ms Ruane: Each family deserves the truth — no family is more equal than others. Let us all move on and create a fair society and make sure that there is truth and justice for all families.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Interventions are supposed to relate to the subject under debate, and they are supposed to be short and to the point.

Ms J McCann: There are Members in the Chamber who shared platforms with notorious killers, such as Billy Wright, but that seems to have been forgotten as well. Members would be better representing the interests of all victims and asking the British Government for an independent and international truth inquiry so that all families can know the truth about what happened to their loved ones.

Mr Easton: The motion addresses one of the vilest human rights-abusing organisations that the world has ever known: the criminal terrorists of the Provisional IRA. The IRA stands judged at the bar of world opinion as a cowardly and ruthless terrorist organisation that perpetrated its evil on an innocent population. From the torture and mutilation of the innocent to the abduction and premeditated murder of a single mother of ten through to the murder of ordinary children, its human rights abuses knew no bounds.

5.00 pm

The Provisional IRA deliberately operated outside the democratic process, seeking to wreck democracy and the rule of law through the systematic destruction of the human rights of the innocent population. I suspect that, over the coming months, it will attempt to wreck democracy in the Northern Ireland Assembly. Thank God that it failed and that it will continue to fail. Its actions will continue to be subject to examination, and history will continue to be its harshest critic.

A special place has been reserved for the role of the IRA in the annals of shame. All right-thinking people celebrate the failure of terrorism, but we must not forget that many innocent victims still bear their loss, still carry their disability, and still live with the wounds of the IRA torture, mutilation and murder machine.

In part, the death squads of the Provisional IRA received their tools of evil from Libya, and it is from Libya that a response is so desperately required. Unfortunately, time does not allow me to document the suffering of the innocents at the hands of IRA equipment, or its missions of death with Libyan arms and Semtex. However, time will not run out for those who call for justice and reparations for the innocent victims. In a world that has respect for human rights, the shortcomings of the Gaddafi regime can no longer be concealed, and no longer can terrorists hide from their crimes. Let us not forget that although Tripoli supplied the tools, it was the rejectionists of democracy and the rule of law who used those tools in their futile murder machine.

I challenge the Prime Minister to come out fighting. It was British citizens who were brutalised by the Tripoli terror tools. It is entirely right and fitting that those people, without whom the IRA could not have perpetrated with such ferocity its terrorism against an innocent population, take their responsibility and compensate the innocent. It is the only morally suitable response from the Gaddafi regime.

Some will fear this debate taking place, and some will be frightened at the spotlight being put on the cruelty of the IRA. Some will wish to hide from the human rights glare as it exposes the nakedness of the republican movement and leaves it having to own up to its systematic, inhuman and degrading treatment of the people of Northern Ireland.

Mrs Foster: Does the Member agree that one of the most appalling human rights abuses of the past 35 to 40 years was the systematic ethnic cleansing that took place along the border, where Protestants were forced out of their homes by the IRA? Does he agree that the human rights abuses that were perpetrated then should be brought to account and that the truth should be given to all those people?

Mr Easton: I thank my colleague for her intervention, and I totally agree with her comments. There is a lot of hypocrisy coming from the Benches across the way: on the one hand, they go on about their human rights, but on the other hand, they were the ones who were involved in abusing human rights in the first place.

This is not the time to listen to the arguments of the republican movement, however morally incontinent. They may as well attempt to push water up a hill as seek to prevent the innocent victims of its terrorists getting compensated by those who supplied the tools. American victims of terrorism are rightly compensated as they live with the loss and the brutality inflicted by terrorism. Are we saying that British victims are to be treated less well because they are British? As we rightly acknowledge the evil of the 9/11 terrorist attack and the suffering and loss felt by families as a result of that evil, let us not morally equivocate the terrorism of the IRA using the Tripoli terror tools. It is every bit as wrong, every bit as evil, and the impact on the innocent is just as hurtful. The only difference is one of scale.

Let us face facts; Tripoli terror tools aided and abetted the IRA in perpetrating its evil campaign. Without the Tripoli terror tools, that campaign could not have been sustained with such cruel vigour for the 35 years that it was. Put bluntly, people would be alive today had it not been for the Tripoli terror tools. Whether it be the slaughtered innocent parents and children on the Shankill Road in 1993, who were deprived of the most fundamental human right of all, namely, the right to life, or the many other innocents, not least at the Baltic Exchange in London, an unstoppable momentum for justice is gathering pace, and the people across the way need to recognise that. There is a moral principle that determines the fairness of action; it is known as justice. World opinion, I dare to suggest, has already determined and judged that compensation is a fair treatment for the innocent.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Again, I remind Members to please make all remarks through the Chair and not across the Floor; otherwise, I may have to name someone.

Mr Elliott: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. First, I thank those who proposed the motion. Secondly, I thank those in the campaign groups who have continued to seek restoration or compensation from Libya.

The connection with Libya started in 1972 when Gaddafi praised the IRA as allies in a struggle against Western imperialism. He embraced the IRA at that time. I wonder whether today's debate is about Libya; I hear some people across the Chamber exclaim that it is about the British Government. Part of the debate is that the British Government did not support the real victims of the Province enough. We need to return to the real debate: Libya providing arms and explosives for the IRA and for terrorist organisations in the Province. If Members want to debate issues of the British Government at another time, they can propose such a motion.

We want to concentrate on the real issues, which Members on the opposite side of the Chamber have not mentioned. I have not heard any of them mention the Enniskillen bomb or the Ballygawley bomb that killed a number of soldiers on a bus. I have not heard them mention the Warrenpoint bomb — the anniversary of which took place recently — that killed so many soldiers or the murder of Lord Mountbatten, who was a member of the Royal Family, in the Irish Republic. I have not heard people on that side of the Chamber mention those atrocities, which can be directly linked to arms and explosives brought from Libya. Although others want to hark back to other issues, those are the real issues that we should be discussing today.

I would have thought that it would be incumbent on Sinn Féin today to try to strike a blow against their former colleagues in the dissident republican groups and show the party's stance on devolution in Northern Ireland and support for law and order in the Province. If Sinn Féin has moved on, it is time for it to recognise that and to tell Members on this side of the Chamber. We want to hear that; we want to hear that those people have moved on in society. We want to hear that they have left those bad old days behind them and that they support policing and law and order.

A colleague from my constituency, Arlene Foster, mentioned ethnic cleansing of people around the border, not only in Fermanagh and south Tyrone, but in other places such as Newry and Armagh, south Down, west Tyrone and Foyle. That happened on a systematic basis, and I want to hear some Members say that it was wrong. We must support those real victims; Sinn Féin now has the opportunity to support the real victims of the Province. I want to hear it do that. Unfortunately, if it does not, it will be hard for many of us to continue or to build any trust in society. Our party wants to build trust in the community. However, unless others are willing to stand up and accept the wrongs of the past, that will be difficult.

Lord Morrow: I thank Mr Elliott for giving way. Some of us find it extremely difficult to understand Sinn Féin: on one hand, it says that it is time to move on, but its Members are standing in the Chamber today in stark denial. They cannot accept that they contributed to the events of the past. Does the Member agree that Libya supplied the Semtex that was the lifeline of the terrorists in the IRA who prolonged the campaign? Indeed, it supplied many more weapons of destruction that were imported by the Provisional IRA. If that lifeline had not been supplied, the war would have been over 20 years earlier.

Mr Elliott: I thank the Member for his contribution. It was not only about Semtex; it was about a much wider range of support and assistance. Libya breathed oxygen into the campaign for years on end.

I would like to hear Members on the opposite Benches support the call for the Prime Minister, Gordon Brown, to get behind us and do what he should do, which is demand of Libya the compensation that is the right of the real victims in this Province.

It is not only Libya, but the Irish Government that have a lot of questions to answer about this whole escapade and about the Troubles in general. Let us not forget that they were behind the times when our security forces in Northern Ireland were looking for co-operation from the Republic of Ireland. Let us be blunt about it: they often turned a blind eye to some of the goings-on when people were skirmishing across the border to a secure hideout after they had done their dirty deeds in Northern Ireland.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member must bring his remarks to a close.

Mr Elliott: I support the motion.

Mr G Robinson: I support the motion. As other Members said, there is no doubt about the connections between Libya and the IRA. That numerous deaths, injuries and suffering were caused in Northern Ireland thanks to Libyan-supplied weaponry and explosives is apparent and accepted by most of us. I support fully those victims of IRA terrorism who have the courage to seek compensation from those who supplied that weaponry and who probably trained the perpetrators of those heinous and callous crimes. In that, I include unionist and nationalist victims.

I, therefore, urge the Prime Minister, Gordon Brown, to now stand by his word and to have no more U-turns on this issue so that justice can be done in favour of the victims and be seen to be done. The fact that compensation was paid to the relatives of the Lockerbie murder victims has set a precedent. There is no way that Libya can deny that. Libya should, therefore, further admit its involvement in the murders of many people in Northern Ireland by its desire to arm, and likely train, the cowards who carried out the murdering. There is no difference between bombing an aircraft full of civilians and bombing a street full of civilians: both are wrong.

The United Kingdom Government must now stand up and be counted. They must put pressure on the Libyan regime through diplomatic channels to ensure that the Northern Ireland victims of Libyan-supplied weapons and explosives are treated in the same manner as the victims of the Lockerbie bombing.

Mr A Maginness: Every death during the Troubles was wrong, whether they were caused by the IRA, the UDA, the UVF or, indeed, state forces. All those deaths were wrong. I condemned the deaths on Bloody Friday, I condemned the deaths on Bloody Sunday. There is no distinction between them, as far as we are concerned: all deaths are wrong. Violence was wrong. The IRA campaign was futile, counter-productive and morally and politically wrong. We paid a mighty price for that and for the campaigns of the UDA and the UVF. We want justice for all victims, and we do not adhere to any hierarchy of victims.

In the case of Libya, however, two points must be made. First, Libya has declared openly that it supplied arms and explosives to the IRA, and it accepts that what it did was wrong. Secondly, it is a fact that the United States of America obtained compensation from Libya for the victims of terrorism — terrorism that was instigated or supported by Libya. That was a remarkable concession. If the USA could get that, why could the families of victims here not get the same compensation? What is wrong with victims of violence here receiving that compensation as well? That is what distinguishes that situation from others.

We talk of collusion, and there was massive collusion between state forces and loyalists, as well as some elements of the IRA and other republican organisations. We do not know the truth of that, but there is a story to be told there. That is different from the instant case, where the Libyans have accepted culpability and have given compensation to the Americans. What is good for them must equally be good for victims here. That is just, right and proper. How that might be carried out, whether as collective or individual compensation, remains to be seen, but people should support the proposition.

If people seek redress in other ways, they can do so. They can sue the British Government for collusion; indeed, people have done so. People have sued the British Government and the Ministry of Defence for killings, deaths, injuries and damage, and they can still do that. People are right to do that when evidence exists: it is within their rights.

Equally, if one looks at the Omagh judgement, one can see that the defendants, although they were sued individually, were sued also as an unincorporated association that was identified as the Real Irish Republican Army. At least two of the defendants were sued on their own behalf and as representing that organisation. Therefore, theoretically, the option is open to people to sue the IRA. It is probably a practical impossibility, given that we do not know who members of the IRA were. If there were known representatives, they could be sued. In that sense, people could claim compensation if assets were forthcoming.

However, we are dealing with theoretical possibilities. It is right and proper that justice be shown to the victims of IRA, UDA —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member must draw his remarks to a close.

Mr A Maginness: — and state violence. Therefore, it is right to support the motion.

Mr Donaldson: I thank Members who have contributed to the debate. I will not deal with all the comments that were made, but I will respond to some of them.

I am disappointed that Sinn Féin, even if it cannot support the motion, did not take the opportunity afforded by the debate to acknowledge, at least, wrongdoing against the victims who are taking the case — wrongdoing that they have suffered, and are seeking compensation for. That is regrettable, because it does not move us on, as the Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone Mr Elliott and others pointed out.

Sinn Féin instead presented us with the usual “whataboutery”. We were quoted statistics about killings by the army, police and others. I did not want to reduce the debate to that level, but I will deal with it. In reality, the Provisional IRA killed considerably more people in the Troubles than the police and the army put together. They were responsible for almost 50% of all murders during the Troubles, including many murders of Roman Catholic civilians.

We heard a lot about what happened to Catholics from Sinn Féin Members. Ms McCann talked about the murder of Catholics by all and sundry, but she did not mention that the IRA murdered hundreds of Catholics — more so than some of the loyalist paramilitary organisations. There was no recognition of that at all.

In fact, between them, the republican paramilitaries murdered almost 60% of all the people who were killed in the Troubles. The Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone Mr Molloy mentioned the Ulster Defence Regiment (UDR), which I was proud to serve in. I remind the Member that the UDR was responsible for a total of eight deaths in the Troubles.

Mr Adams: Will the Member give way?

Mr Deputy Speaker: I think that it is clear that the Member does not wish to give way.

Mr Donaldson: Some of those eight people were members of paramilitary organisations. That is eight deaths compared to the 1,768 deaths for which the Provisional IRA was responsible, yet the Member seeks to make some kind of equivalence. Frankly, I am at a loss to understand where the Member — [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. The rules apply to either side equally: there should be no shouting across the Chamber.

Mr Molloy: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Perhaps Mr Donaldson will correct himself: I am not a Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone.

Mr Donaldson: I am happy to correct that point for the record. I remove my disparaging comment from the Fermanagh and South Tyrone constituency and attribute it to the Mid Ulster constituency, although some very good people reside there.

If the Member wants to trade statistics, the facts speak for themselves. Those are not my facts but the facts of the historical record. We heard a lot about the truth today. It would be nice if the Members on the Benches opposite and the organisations that they represent told the truth about what happened to the victims of IRA terrorism.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Donaldson: In the Saville Inquiry, almost £200 million has been spent in an attempt to get to the truth. However, members of the party on the Benches opposite gave evidence to that inquiry but refused to tell the whole truth. Do not talk to us about the truth. Yes, we want the whole truth. However, when are we going to get the whole truth from Sinn Féin about what the IRA did and about the victims that it created in Northern Ireland? By all means, let us have the truth, and let us have it out in the open. Then we could examine and consider it for ourselves, but we do not get the truth.

We also hear talk about a hierarchy of victims. The Member for North Belfast Mr Maginness, the Member for Upper Bann Mrs Kelly and others were absolutely right in their explanation of how they regard that hierarchy. We are not talking about these victims being different from other victims of terrorism, but it is clear is that they have a strong legal case against the Libyan Government. That is why the motion is before the House today, and it simply asks Members to support the case of those victims.

Therefore, it is disappointing that Sinn Féin has not taken the opportunity to support the motion. It was an opportunity for Sinn Féin to demonstrate that it has moved on and that it is rising above what has happened in the past. It was an opportunity to acknowledge that there was wrongdoing and that there should be compensation for wrongdoing. I thought that Sinn Féin might have accepted and agreed to that principle and supported the case that is being taken against the Libyan Government.

I welcome the support of the SDLP, the Alliance Party and the Ulster Unionist Party for the motion. The SDLP especially has come to a measured judgement on the matter, and I welcome the comments that have been made by Members. I want to single out Mrs Kelly's comment that there should be no moral equivalence between perpetrators and their victims. That is absolutely right, and there is common ground across the Chamber that we must recognise that there is a difference between the people who sought to carry out acts of violence and engage in terrorist activity and those who suffered as a result of acts of terrorism. Let us hope that we will be able to build a consensus in the Chamber as to how we address that matter when we return to that issue in the future, because it is important to the victims of terrorism.

I endorse Sir Reg Empey's view that we should not raise the expectations of victims. We must not raise expectations, but today we should be supporting the victims in their quest for justice in this case. That is precisely what we ask the House to do this afternoon: give its support to a just cause.

Ms Ruane mentioned several cases in her constituency about which the truth must come out. I simply say to the Member that I could quote instances in South Down where people were murdered by the IRA. The truth about their deaths has never come out. One such instance was Warrenpoint where, on a bloody day some 30 years ago, 18 soldiers lost their lives. Are their families not entitled to the truth about what happened in that incident?

If we are going to go down the road of talking about the truth, let us talk about the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth in every case. Members who are not prepared to be honest about the circumstances behind more than half of the murders that occurred in Northern Ireland cannot talk about having an international truth commission. Republican paramilitaries committed more than half the murders, and almost all those were carried out by a single organisation, namely the Provisional IRA.

Yes, let us talk about the truth, but let us also have the truth. Those who, in the past, supported the actions of the IRA now have a responsibility to say that that organisation should tell the truth. If only we had heard that today. Even if Sinn Féin cannot support the motion, if we had at least heard from the Benches opposite a willingness to tell the truth about what the IRA did, it would have offered something to the victims of IRA terrorism to indicate that there is a process worthy of taking forward.

I hope that in the days and weeks to come the Assembly can address those issues in a mature manner. Instead of getting into "whataboutery", of which much has been heard today, I hope that we can begin to examine the broad principles that must be addressed to determine how we handle the past. One such principle must surely be that the victims of terrorism are entitled to be compensated for their loss. Many people have not been properly compensated.

The compensation arrangements that were in place in the 1970s, during the early part of the Troubles, were totally inadequate. Many of those cases are not necessarily covered by the legal action against Libya. We must know what we are going to do for those victims and how we address that issue. It is not only a question of money but of the recognition of suffering, not just in the loss of a loved one but in single mothers having to struggle to bring up families.

I recognise that that suffering crosses the political divide in Northern Ireland. Therefore, as legislators and people seeking to build a better future for Northern Ireland, we have a duty and a responsibility to address that issue. However, we must also address what happened in the past. We must be honest with ourselves and the people and find a way of dealing with those issues.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member draw his remarks to a close, please?

Mr Donaldson: Today's debate did not encourage me that the political maturity yet exists for that to happen.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr Donaldson: I urge the House to support the motion.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly notes the decision by the Scottish Government to release the Lockerbie bomber from prison, and supports the case being taken by the victims of IRA terrorism to claim compensation from the Libyan Government who supplied arms and Semtex explosives to the IRA; and further calls on the UK Government to apply diplomatic pressure on Libya to pay this compensation.

Adjourned at 5.29 pm.

NORTHERN IRELAND ASSEMBLY

Tuesday 15 September 2009

The Assembly met at 10.30 am (Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Molloy] in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT

Swine Flu

Mr Deputy Speaker: I inform Members that the Speaker has received notice from the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety that he wishes to make a statement regarding swine flu.

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Mr McGimpsey): I take this opportunity to provide an update for Members on the Northern Ireland response to the swine flu virus. There have been a number of developments during the summer recess. During the summer months, I have continued to participate in regular Cabinet Office meetings with ministerial colleagues from across the UK. My Department remains in regular contact with officials in the Republic of Ireland.

Worldwide, there have been more than 275,000 cases and more than 3,000 deaths. In the UK, there have been more than 70 deaths. In the main, the illness continues to be mild and self-limiting, although, for some people, it can be severe. To date in Northern Ireland, we have had 217 laboratory-confirmed cases. However, the actual number of cases is much higher, with almost 9,000 courses of antivirals having been prescribed to people who have been clinically diagnosed as having swine flu. In addition, the number of people who are consulting their GPs with flu-like symptoms is significantly higher than in previous years at this time.

Until now, 94 people have been hospitalised with swine flu in Northern Ireland. I have also been informed of a second death that was possibly associated with swine flu. Obviously, every death is tragic, and my thoughts and sympathies are with the family. Members will understand and respect that it is not appropriate for me to make any further comment at this time.

Although the levels of flu have been decreasing since their peak at the end of July, we should not be complacent. The scientific experts have advised that it is unlikely that that downward trend will continue. We are preparing for a surge in cases later this year and potentially for a more severe pandemic strain.

We now know more about the virus and its effects, and we have been able to revise our planning assumptions. We have gathered more information from experiences of the pandemic in the UK and internationally, which has allowed us to refine our reasonable worst-case scenario. The timing of a possible pandemic wave has also been reassessed. In the worst-case scenario, we can still expect around 30% of the Northern Ireland population to be affected by the virus in a future wave. That means that approximately 500,000 people or one third of the population may become ill with swine flu over the course of the next wave. In addition, 5,000 people could be hospitalised owing to the virus, and up to 525 could die. During the peak week, as many as 113,000 people could be affected. Those are not predictions; rather, they are assumptions that enable us to plan for the very worst that could happen. Scientists have advised that a substantial peak in the virus may occur in mid- or late October.

I announced during the summer that advice had been received from the Joint Committee on Vaccination and Immunisation (JCVI) on which groups should be prioritised for vaccine. When the vaccine is licensed, it will initially be offered to individuals aged between six months and 65 years in the current seasonal flu clinical at-risk groups; all pregnant women, subject to licensing considerations; household contacts of immunocompromised individuals; and people aged 65 and over who are in the current seasonal flu clinical at-risk groups.

Those priority groups have been selected because they are at higher risk of severe illness from swine flu. Prioritising them ensures that we make best use of our initial quantities of vaccine. Front line health and social care workers will also be among the first to be vaccinated. The close contact that they have with patients means that they are at additional risk of contracting and transmitting the virus.

I expect to have sufficient vaccine for all those in the initial priority groups by the end of November. I anticipate that a licence will be granted in October; however, that is the responsibility of the European Medicines Agency (EMA), and I await its decision. I will continue to monitor the emerging evidence and the expert scientific and medical advice before taking any decisions on extending the programme beyond those initial priority groups. Planning assumptions will also need to be revised to take into account the impact of the vaccination programme.

I am pleased to announce that a UK-wide deal has been agreed with the General Practitioners Committee (GPC) on administration of the vaccine this autumn. The Department has agreed that GPs will receive £5.25 per dose of vaccine given and that district nurses will assist by vaccinating housebound people, in line with existing seasonal flu arrangements.

I am grateful to GPs for their willingness to take on that major vaccination programme. I am satisfied that their co-operation represents value for money in delivering the programme. Preparations for GPs to immunise the priority groups once the vaccine is licensed will now begin. Vaccination is our best defence in the battle against swine flu, but we must also be prepared for a significant increase in hospitalised cases. Experience elsewhere has shown that up to a quarter of hospitalised cases may require intensive care. Plans are in place locally and nationally to increase critical care capacity to cope with the potential demands of swine flu. I intend to more than double capacity in adult critical care. To provide that capacity in Northern Ireland, 47 adult ventilators are being procured.

The Department also plans to increase substantially the number of paediatric critical care beds and recognises that some older children may need to be cared for in adult critical care facilities, while receiving the necessary support from paediatric staff. The number of appropriately trained staff must be increased to support that additional capacity, plans for which have been developed.

Doubling critical care capacity will allow many more people to benefit from critical care than would otherwise be the case. To achieve such a significant increase, hospitals must deploy their trained workforce differently, and they may also have to postpone non-urgent, planned operations to concentrate staff and resources on the most seriously ill patients.

Keeping the public informed is a key element of our preparations. To that end, I have a major communications programme planned for the autumn and winter to maintain public confidence and awareness. That programme will build on the work that has been done to date, including the very effective bus panel advertisements that use the “sneezing man” image, which stresses the need for good hand hygiene. To reinforce the message that people should stay at home if they are experiencing swine flu symptoms, I ran a local advertising campaign. My Department is developing leaflets and other public information to accompany the swine flu vaccination programme.

In the summer, England launched the National Pandemic Flu Service in response to significant pressures experienced by GPs there. However, the number of cases to date in Northern Ireland and the fact that our primary care services have been coping well has not merited its introduction here. The situation is constantly under review and, should the need arise, that facility can be introduced quickly.

To date, most of the focus in the pandemic response has centred on the Health Service. However, if a more severe pandemic wave is experienced later this year, we can expect to see significant pressure on schools and local services. Recently, I met my ministerial colleagues from the Department of Education and the Department for Employment and Learning to stress the need for business as usual as far as possible during the pandemic, and I am pleased to note that children have returned to school as normal following the summer break. The Public Health Agency continues to work closely with schools to ensure that local risk assessments are provided if significant absentee rates are reported. Now that schools have reopened and with the onset of the autumn/winter flu season, I do not expect the recent decline in the number of cases to be sustained.

Yesterday, I met the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment. A future pandemic wave could have a very disruptive effect on businesses due to absences and difficulties with delivering normal services.

I also met the Finance Minister to discuss funding for the swine flu pandemic; later this week, I will meet him to continue those discussions. The bill for dealing with the pandemic could be £80 million or higher. To date, we have spent almost £30 million, most of which relates to national initiatives, such as antivirals, vaccines, personal protection equipment and antibiotics. That figure does not include costs such as the delivery of vaccinations, antiviral distribution, staff backfill for sickness absences and extra capacity in intensive care. There can be absolutely no doubt that costs will rise.

My officials have developed and costed three possible scenarios: a relatively benign estimate, assuming a moderate peak in demand; a reasonably prudent estimate, factoring in our best assessment of the extent and place of the pandemic; and a reasonable worst-case scenario. I have placed a bid of £77 million for scenario 2 on the basis that it represents the most realistic estimate of the costs that are likely to be incurred. Against that, I can find a total of £27 million, which is more than one third of the cost. I must remind the House that without funding there will be serious consequences for the health and social care service, patients and the public.

Regular hand washing and respiratory hygiene remains the single most important thing that people can do to protect themselves and prevent the spread of the disease. If people have flu-like symptoms, they should stay at home and call their GP, who will provide advice. People should not go to their GP surgery or to a hospital, as they may spread the disease to others.

We cannot predict with certainty when the pandemic will peak in Northern Ireland or the number of people who will need hospital treatment. However, our robust preparations enable us to ensure that we can respond to any scenario, even the worst case that I outlined at the beginning of my statement.

We must not be complacent. Although this is not a killer virus, it can kill; therefore we must continue to put plans in place that are proportionate to the threat. I am confident that our Health Service will cope with any increase in the number of cases in the coming months. I will continue to keep Members updated on a regular basis, and I commend the statement to the House.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Mr Wells): I thank the Minister for his statement, and I also thank his staff for the regular updates that Members of the House and members of the Committee have been receiving.

As the Minister knows, the Chief Medical Officer and his assistant briefed the Committee on this issue. Indeed, during quite a long meeting, they also briefed the Deputy Chairperson and me. Openness and transparency throughout the process will reassure the community, so I hope that that trend will continue.

I extend my sympathy to the family of the baby who apparently — we are not yet certain — died as a result of swine flu, the second victim in Northern Ireland. I am sure that the House will join me in extending our sympathies to that family.

I am, however, concerned about the decision that was taken on a UK-wide basis to pay GPs £5.25 for administering each swine flu vaccine. If everyone in Northern Ireland is vaccinated, the bill will be almost £9 million. Given that GPs secured an extremely generous pay review three years ago, which has led to a 50% increase in their pay to an average of £108,000 per annum, it is a bit rich of the BMA to ask for further payments for the administration of vaccines. Frankly, GPs should have agreed to do that as part as their contract.

My questions about that decision are as follows: first, is it binding on Northern Ireland, or do we have any choice in the matter; and, secondly, has that figure of £9 million been built into the Minister's assumptions for the future cost of the swine flu pandemic, which has gone up from £55 million to approximately £70 million? Will the £9 million be included in that figure, or are we expecting that some form of grant aid will become available from the mainland? Finally, on a minor point, will the Minister reassure us that student nurses will be included on the front-line services priority list for vaccination?

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: I assure Mr Wells that all front-line Health Service staff will be vaccinated as a matter of priority. Without the staff, we obviously cannot continue to operate our hospitals and Health Service.

On the substantial point that Mr Wells made about GPs, Members will be aware that the GP contract is negotiated nationally and applies to England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. Although I was kept informed throughout, this negotiation was carried out in London with the GPs' contractors. GPs are independent contractors who operate in the Health Service through the GPs' contract that is agreed nationally. They provide two essential work streams: essential services and additional services. Part of the additional services is referred to as directed enhanced services, and that is where this negotiation and deal comes from, because it is work outwith their normal workload.

Whether the contract negotiated three years ago was prudent is not a matter for me at this stage; I was not involved in that. In general, GPs in Northern Ireland provide an extremely good service for our patients. The front line is moving forward towards primary care, and our focus — the shift left of the Health Service in Northern Ireland — is about prevention being better than cure. Our GPs are very much in the front line of that, and their services are increasing all the time. People are aware that, when they go to the GP now, it is not simply a doctor; a whole range of services is being provided. I anticipate that GP services will increase. It is clear that this is an additional service that GPs provide.

We want GPs to administer the vaccinations because they have their patients' records and know who is in the priority risk groups. GPs can easily identify priority risks and deal with them accordingly.

Ms S Ramsey: Go raibh maith agat, Deputy Speaker. I thank the Minister for his statement and for the updates that we get on a regular basis. I also thank all those who have been working either directly or indirectly on the issue of swine flu. We should recognise that hard work has been done on swine flu by the health sector.

Like the Minister, I extend my sympathy to the family of the child whose death, it seems, is the second associated with swine flu. It is unwise for the Minister to make any additional statement at this point, but it would be useful to have further details through time.

The Minister indicated that 94 people had been hospitalised. It will be useful to have an idea of how many of those 94 people were in intensive care. I am hearing reports that people have been ill enough to go into intensive care.

The Minister went on to say that people who have symptoms that they think are associated with swine flu should not go to their GP or their local hospital. I am still hearing reports of people ringing GPs' surgeries and being asked to come to the surgery, even though they say that they have the symptoms that are associated with swine flu. There is an issue with that. Has the Minister heard any of those reports? If so, what can we do to ensure that GPs' surgeries do not allow that to happen? If those people have swine flu and they end up in surgeries or in hospitals, the purpose of the measures that the Minister is advising in his public statements is being defeated.

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: I am surprised at the Member's second point about people phoning their GPs and being told to come to the surgery; that should not be happening. Perhaps there is confusion over the symptoms being reported or what the proper response should be, but the proper response is for people to stay at home and not come out and spread the swine flu.

A number of people are in intensive care. I do not have to hand the number of people who went to hospital and ended up in intensive care, but it is a substantial portion of those whom the Member mentioned. I will determine what that number is and respond to the Member in writing.

Mr McCallister: I thank the Minister for his statement, which he made immediately upon coming back for the new term. I associate myself and my party with the Minister's remarks about the death of the small child. It is very sad that a family is in mourning. It would be useful to receive any further details if they become available. Our thoughts and prayers are very much with the family at this time.

The Minister spoke about a future surge in cases. That will, of course, create extra costs for and pressure points on the Health Service. When does the Minister think those pressure points will arise, if the financial arrangements as to who is paying for the associated costs are not sorted out quickly? Where will that hit? As we go into the autumn and winter, knock-on effects will be felt. In his statement, the Minister mentioned the effects on services. If the finance is not sorted out quickly, when will those effects start to bite?

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: I have given a robust and realistic estimate of the costs, and that is the middle scenario. To date, we have expended around £30 million, with more to come. That is what is required to protect the population. In my budget settlement letter, along with the other parts of the settlement, I stated that I will bid for resources to deal with pandemic flu. That is what I am doing at the minute, and I am discussing that bid with the Finance Minister. It is clear that if we do not live up to our budget settlement, there will be issues not only for the Health Service, but for every Department and for all of us. Discussion on that is still going on.

With regard to a white knight coming from the Treasury, I listened to Mrs Robinson's optimistic response to me that the Treasury was going to pay the swine flu costs. I still have no knowledge of that, so I am waiting to hear of any developments.

Jim Wells made a point about the costs. All the estimates for the costs, as far as the GPs are concerned, are contained in the amount. I am trying to hold the money and the costs as best and low as I can alongside achieving value for money and so on. Ultimately, however, we have a responsibility to protect our population, many of whom will come to harm if we do not take the steps that we are taking.

Mrs Hanna: I thank the Minister for his statement. I extend my sympathy to the baby's family. It is a sad time for them.

I share the Health Committee Chairperson's concern about remunerating the GPs individually for each vaccination. They do a good job, but they are well paid already, and this situation is a health crisis.

Does the Minister have a particular communications strategy in place for ethnic minorities, who may not be so aware of or understand our public health system and issues around health and safety?

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: I understand what Mrs Hanna has said about GP remuneration. However, as I have said, those payments are being made as part of a national deal and contract of which we are very much part and, frankly, one from which we benefit more than we lose.

As far as ethnic minorities are concerned, the Department will be making every effort to ensure that everyone receives the proper and correct information. I am re-examining that for the autumn, and the Department will continue to upgrade and refresh that information as we go along. The Department has already made considerable efforts in the production of a guide to the Health Service for ethnic minorities who come from a different linguistic tradition and who are not completely fluent in English. I will continue to re-examine that, because it is very important that people receive the necessary information and that the Department provide that information to them.

Dr Deeny: I thank the Minister for his statement. I also thank him and his Department for their work since this major health issue became a global one. The Minister's statement has answered some of the questions that I intended to ask him, and I am delighted to see that the priority groups will be vaccinated by the end of November.

Is the Minister happy that the vaccine safety checks have been completed and that the safety profile of the vaccine will be good enough? I am aware that that is a European issue, but what is the view locally? Furthermore, will any surplus vaccine be made available to the general public after the priority groups have been vaccinated? Moreover, will regulations be made that will mean, for example, that we cannot vaccinate the general public until priority groups have been covered?

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: As far as priority groups are concerned, decisions are very much determined by the Joint Committee on Vaccination and Immunisation. That committee advises COBRA — the civil contingencies committee — on those issues, and the groups that I have detailed are the groups that COBRA considers to be most at risk. However, that will be only the initial phase of the vaccination programme, and, as I said, we should be in a position to have all the initial priority groups vaccinated by the end of November. We also have a delivery schedule for vaccines, and we will move through the general population after the priority groups have been vaccinated. Again, the Joint Committee on Vaccination and Immunisation, after taking expert advice from the Scientific Advisory Group for Emergencies (SAGE), will determine the steps to be taken.

By the end of December, we anticipate having almost 1.5 million individual doses of vaccine to hand. The current plan is that everyone will receive two doses of the vaccine, although I understand that in China the entire population is being vaccinated on a one-dose strategy. That is something that the Department will monitor carefully, and it will take the advice that is offered.

Vaccine safety is governed by the European Medicines Agency, which is examining the safety of the new vaccine, just as it does for other medicines and vaccines. As I understand it, the vaccine will not involve injecting a live virus into anyone. The H1N1 vaccine will be very similar to the H5N1 vaccine that is used to treat seasonal flu, with some modifications made to take account of the new virus. Therefore, tried and proven medical and scientific technology, knowledge and expertise will be applied as it is every year with seasonal flu. That should provide comfort for everyone.

Mr Easton: I praise the Minister's Department for the good work that it continues to carry out.

Will the Minister commit to being the first man in Northern Ireland to receive the vaccine? That would show goodwill to the people here and would demonstrate that the vaccine is safe. Furthermore, the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety was told last week that around 9,000 people here have received Tamiflu, and I also understand that quite a number of people diagnosed with swine flu has not been given antiviral drugs. Will the Minister give the accurate figure for the number of people in Northern Ireland who have had swine flu? Does having had swine flu mean that those people do not need to get the vaccine?

11.00 am

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: I do not fall into the priority risk groups for those who will receive the vaccine and, therefore, I am not entitled to it. However, if I believe that public confidence requires it, I will be happy to be the first person to step forward and take the vaccine, because I will be absolutely certain that it is safe. Based on my knowledge, I will also advise members of my family to take the vaccine.

Prescriptions for over 9,000 antivirals have been issued so far, and that is a good indication of the number of people who have taken the swine flu medication. We do not know whether those who have had swine flu will be free from the risk of getting it again. We do not know how the virus will perform, so I think that the advice would be that those people should be vaccinated. The advice is also that those people may have immunity for a year or two, but we cannot be certain: therefore, we will always put safety first.

Mrs McGill: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his statement and commend his Department for the work that has been done.

One of the difficulties is that so much is based on speculation and assumption about what might happen. The Minister said that there has been a decrease in the number of cases since July. We expect that there will be a peak week in mid-October, but the vaccine will not be licensed until late October and will not be available until November. How can we reconcile that chronology to ensure that what is happening will be an effective means of dealing with the swine flu pandemic?

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: We can have confidence because, as the knowledge of the virus increases with experience, so the planning assumptions can be modified, and that is the case. We are working on assumptions and not on predictions, but those assumptions inform us as to how we model what will happen. The assumptions now tell us that there has been a reduction in the estimate of the number of fatalities involved and the number of hospitalisations. Nevertheless, the numbers are substantial. Those numbers will be revised again, and they may move upwards or downwards. The situation is based on international, national and regional experience.

The vaccine will be available for use in a vaccination programme once the licensing process is complete. We will always put patient safety first. The licensing process will take place in October. We will then be able to go forward and give the population the protection that it requires.

Mr Gardiner: I thank the Minister for keeping us informed during the summer months about this serious epidemic that has hit Northern Ireland. It is regrettable that we have had two deaths as a result of swine flu. On behalf of my party, I extend my sympathy to the family of the infant who died.

Approximately £8 million will be required to deal with swine flu. Does the Minister agree that, if the Finance Minister does not meet that bid, it will have serious consequences for the Health Service? The situation is urgent, and I hope that when the Minister makes his bid the Finance Minister will heed the call. Northern Ireland is crying out for it, and the people of Northern Ireland deserve the best treatment that is humanly possible.

I also record my thanks and appreciation to the officials from the Minister's Department who will attend the Health Committee and brief us in the days and months ahead.

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: As far as the necessary resource is concerned, as I outlined in my statement, a robust estimate of the amount needed has been made, and I am having discussions with the Finance Minister. As everyone is aware, the budget settlement included provision for pandemic flu.

The response is a national response: the approach being taken in England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland is the same, and I will be having another discussion with the Finance Minister in due course. The swine flu pandemic is a serious challenge to the health of the population of Northern Ireland, and the Health Service has a duty to meet that challenge. Obviously, there will be a resource implication for whatever steps are taken. I have outlined that from the beginning, and I anticipate that the House will not be found wanting as far as protecting our people is concerned.

Mrs D Kelly: I thank the Minister for his statement. At all times he has tried to bring us as much information as possible, but sometimes we are concerned about some of the detail that we do not know.

In his statement, the Minister said that he hopes to increase the number of critical care beds and train up staff. I welcome that because even in normal times there are not enough beds to meet the needs. In my constituency, two children had to be transferred to England and Scotland during the Christmas and New Year period last year. In relation to children and young people, in particular, how many new beds will be provided and where will they be located? Is the budget for the provision of critical care capacity included in the Minister's bid, or is it additional? The Minister stated that £27 million could be found: are any other services being impacted adversely because of the need to move money around?

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: As far as the challenge ahead is concerned, hospitalisation in many cases will require critical care capacity, a point made by Sue Ramsey. I anticipate that critical care capacity, as far as beds are concerned, will more than double and that paediatric critical care beds will follow suit. Clearly, there is an issue regarding associated staffing, and we are planning for that at the moment. Robust plans are in place, and the trusts have worked very hard to get those plans in place. It will have an effect on other activities in hospitals, and I have outlined those possible effects in my statement.

The amount of money needed is included in my estimate of costs, as it properly should be. That is part of the response as we work our way through vaccinations, medical countermeasures, workforce planning, the steps being taken nationally as well as regionally, and the steps that we are taking on critical care capacity. All of those steps must be taken to ensure that the Health Service is able to cope with the anticipated demand. We expect, and the modelling shows, that the period will last for around 15 weeks and will peak roughly halfway through that 15 weeks. There could be more than 100,000 cases during that critical period. That will present a huge challenge to primary and secondary care in our hospitals and will affect the capacity to treat people through critical care, particularly priority risk groups such as young people and the elderly.

The £27 million that I have contributed is money that I have been able to identify in the health budget. Obviously, I would rather spend it on something else, but we all have to prioritise. When money is short, the thing to do is prioritise what is most needed.

Dr Farry: I thank the Minister for his statement. I want to ask about communication and the impact of swine flu on the management of the Health Service. The Minister has rightly pointed out the advice to people not to go to hospitals or GPs if they have flu-like symptoms. How does that sit with one of the other stated objectives of the Health Service, which is that of trying to manage the level of people keeping appointments, particularly at hospitals? I have come across cases of people who have cancelled appointments being lectured and warned that if they cancel further appointments they may miss their opportunity to see a specialist. How can we reconcile the different messages that are being given out?

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: This is an emergency; we are not dealing with our normal situation. Cancelled appointments represent a considerable expense for the Health Service, and we are trying to reduce them as much as possible. The percentage of people who do not up for appointments is running at around 10%. That represents a large number of people, and it costs the Health Service a lot of money.

Against that, however, we are asking people to be responsible and to exercise some personal judgement, and that involves not turning up at the doctor's surgery or the hospital if they believe that they have symptoms of swine flu. Those symptoms are available for all to see through the various strands of the communication strategy that we have been involved in. That communication strategy is about keeping the general public as informed as possible. We have done that to date, and we will continue to do that because, as far as our population is concerned, keeping them informed is crucial.

North/South Ministerial Council

Language Body Sectoral Format

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Speaker has received notice from the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure that he wishes to make a statement on the North/South Ministerial Council (NSMC) meeting in language body sectoral format.

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure (Mr McCausland): In compliance with section 52 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998, I wish to make the following report on the eighth North/South Ministerial Council meeting in language sectoral format. It is the fourth such meeting since the restoration of the Northern Ireland Executive and Assembly, and this report has been endorsed by Caitríona Ruane MLA.

The meeting was held in Gweedore on 9 July 2009. In it, my first meeting, I represented the Northern Ireland Executive as Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure, along with Caitríona Ruane, the Minister of Education. The Government of the Irish Republic were represented by Éamon Ó Cuív TD, Minister for Community, Rural and Gaeltacht Affairs. The meeting dealt with issues relating to the language body and its two constituent agencies: Tha Boord o Ulster-Scotch, the Ulster-Scots Agency, and Foras na Gaeilge, the Irish language agency.

I will now present a summary of the issues discussed by the Council on 9 July 2009. The Council received progress reports from the chairperson and chief executive of the Ulster-Scots Agency, Mr Mark Thompson and Mr George Patton respectively, and the chairperson and chief executive of Foras na Gaeilge, Mr Liam Ó Maoilmhichíl and Mr Ferdie Mac an Fhailigh respectively.

The Council noted the ongoing collaboration between the agencies on a range of projects. Those include working with Irish language officers in district councils with a view to offering the lecture series ‘aspects of our shared heritage’; a film in Irish about the Ulster-Scots language and culture, which has been completed and will be broadcast on TG4; continuing co-operation on human resources and corporate governance issues; the preparation of a joint disability action plan; and the preparation of a joint policy on child protection. There have also been joint stands at a number of events; for example, the national ploughing championships and the Tall Ships event in Belfast.

The Council noted the progress made in regard to the annual reports and accounts for the North/South Language Body, including the presentation of the 2004 accounts to the Northern Ireland Assembly and both Houses of the Oireachtas in February 2009. Both agencies, in conjunction with the sponsor Departments, are continuing to address outstanding issues in relation to the 2005 and subsequent annual reports and accounts as a priority. The Council requested a further report on progress for the next NSMC meeting in language sectoral format.

11.15 am

The Council discussed staffing issues in Foras na Gaeilge and the decentralisation of Foras na Gaeilge staff to Gweedore. The Council asked the sponsor Departments to continue to examine the Foras na Gaeilge staffing submission in light of the 2009 financial allocation. The two posts for Belfast, which were approved by the NSMC in 2008, were filled in February 2009.

The Council discussed and approved the introduction of a revised financial assistance scheme for use by the Ulster-Scots Agency. The amended scheme extends to consideration of applications relating to travel claims, community workers and project start-date payments for events. Those and other changes are designed to improve the practical operation of the scheme.

The Council noted the resignation of Mark Thompson as chairperson of Tha Boord o Ulster-Scotch and acknowledged his contribution to the work of that body. The Council approved the appointment of Peter Gallagher to the board of the North/South Language Body from 9 July 2009 to 12 December 2011. Mr Gallagher will have responsibility for exercising the functions of the body through Foras na Gaeilge.

The Council agreed to hold its next meeting in language sectoral format in November/December 2009.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure (Mr McElduff): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Ba mhaith liom mo bhuíochas a ghabháil leis an Aire as a ráiteas inniu.

I thank the Minister for his statement. He said that the 2004 annual accounts of the North/South Language Body were presented to the Assembly and to both Houses of the Oireachtas in February 2009. However, the accounts for 2005 to 2008 are still outstanding. That is of particular concern to the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure, which has been examining how the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure manages its arm’s-length bodies, in particular their financial accountability. When does the Minister expect the outstanding accounts to be signed off?

The Minister also said that the chair of Tha Boord o Ulster-Scotch, Mr Mark Thompson, had resigned. When does the Minister expect a new chair to be appointed? Finally, was the development of an indigenous languages strategy discussed at the meeting in relation to the Irish language and to Ulster-Scots? If not, when does the Minister intend to consult Foras na Gaeilge and the Ulster-Scots Agency on the draft strategy?

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: I thank the Member for his questions. He asked about the delay in publishing the annual reports and accounts of the North/South Language Body. The accounts for 2000 and 2001 were qualified by the Northern Ireland Audit Office. There was, therefore, a delay in signing off the body's consolidated accounts. That eventually happened in 2004, but, as a result of the delay, the 2000 reports and accounts were not published until 2005. Subsequent annual reports and accounts were also delayed, as the Northern Ireland Audit Office must audit the accounts chronologically.

The 2001 report from the body was published in June 2006, and the 2002 and 2003 reports were published in May 2007. The 2004 report was published in February 2009, and, at the NSMC meeting in July, the Council requested a further report on progress for the next NSMC meeting in language sectoral format. The matter is, therefore, being progressed as quickly as possible. There is a general concern to get this matter back on track and totally up-to-date, but the problem originated in 2000 and 2001, and there has been a chronological knock-on effect.

A new chair will be appointed to Tha Boord o Ulster-Scotch as soon as possible.

Finally, the indigenous languages strategy is an internal Northern Ireland and United Kingdom matter. Therefore, it was not discussed at the North/South Ministerial Council and is, consequently, not a matter for discussion this morning but for another occasion.

Lord Browne: I thank the Minister for his statement. I would be pleased if he could confirm that the 2009 budget for the language body has been approved. If not, when is it likely to receive endorsement from all sides?

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: For a number of reasons, work on the budget for 2009 is still in progress. The draft 2009 business plan for the North/South Language Body is still under consideration by both sponsor Departments and both Finance Departments, in line with budgetary processes in Northern Ireland and the Republic. The sponsor Departments will work together to finalise the business plan and budget and bring it together for approval at a future NSMC meeting.

At their meeting on Thursday 10 September 2009, the Executive noted the efficiency saving guidance for North/South bodies that was agreed by both Finance Ministers. It was agreed that the Department of Finance and Personnel will circulate the guidance to sponsor Departments. North/South bodies, like all other public bodies, need to maximise efficiency in light of the current economic climate.

Mr K Robinson: I thank the Minister for his somewhat sparse statement. I feel for him somewhat because I am sure that his expedition into deepest Donegal was a very lonely experience and that the die had been cast before he got there.

I am struck by the fact that the report indicates that there has been a lack of progress in the Ulster-Scots field. Historically, the Ulster-Scots language has lagged behind the island's other minority language. Was there any discussion at all about the way in which that quite obvious leeway should be made up?

The report appears to contain several points that show where the mechanics of getting moneys, help and aid to the Ulster-Scots community have been allowed to drift. Can the Minister assure the House that, under his tutelage, those matters will be addressed much more forcefully than they have been in the past?

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: I note Mr Robinson's point that the report is sparse; however, it is an accurate reflection of what was discussed at the meeting.

I share the Member's concerns about progress on Ulster-Scots language and culture. I am keen to see those matters taken forward. A number of areas needed attention, and my predecessor highlighted those at an earlier stage by saying that community development and community empowerment for the Ulster-Scots community must be emphasised. There is a renewed focus on those matters; such a focus had not been in place in previous years, going back to 2000-01. That is reflected in the financial assistance scheme, which has now been brought forward. Prior to that, there was difficulty with funding workers in the community, and that area will now be accommodated by the financial assistance scheme.

To paraphrase Ken Robinson, he talked about moving towards parity and equality. If we are to have a shared and better future in Northern Ireland to which we are all committed, our society must be based on equality. I am committed to the Executive's desire to work towards that shared and better future, but good relations will be sustainable only if they are aligned to the equality agenda; they cannot be built on unequal foundations. Therefore, I will seek to address the current imbalances between Ulster Scots and Irish and strive to achieve parity of esteem and parity of funding for both. I think that we have made significant progress to date. For example, between 2005 and 2008, funding allocations from the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure to Ulster Scots almost doubled, and funding for Irish increased by just over 6%.

Progress is being made. However, I agree with the Member that there is still some distance to go.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Cuirim fáilte roimh an ráiteas ón Aire, cé go bhfuil sé tanaí go leor ar a lán bealaí. Tá béim mhór ar an mhaorlathas agus níl go leor béime ar thionscnaimh teangan. Ba mhaith liom níos mó béim a fheiceáil ar thionscnaimh teangan.

Cúis bhuartha domh go raibh dhá nuachtán Gaeilge againn sa tír seo go dtí le déanaí: nuachtán laethúil sa Tuaisceart, ‘Lá’; agus nuachtán seachtainiúil sa Deisceart, ‘Foinse’. Tá an dá nuachtán sin ar shiúl anois. Ba mhaith liom a fhiafraí den Aire ar pléadh ceist na nuachtán sin ag an chruinniú i nGaoth Dobhair.

Chomh maith leis sin, ba mhaith liom —

Lord Morrow: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Is it not protocol in the House that, when a Minister makes a statement, questions are asked? It is not an opportunity for a Member to make a statement in a language that 80% of the House probably does not understand.

Mr McElduff: On a point of order. Perhaps Mr Morrow is more of an expert on procedures than I am. Is it in order to raise a point of order during a debate on a Minister’s statement? It may be.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I am quite certain that the Member will come to a question as soon as possible.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Le fírinne, sílim gur chuir mé ceist nó dhó le linn na cainte a rinne mé, agus tá brón orm nár thuig an tiarna uasal thall an méid sin.

Ar aon nós, míneoidh mé an scéal sin go mion nuair a dhéanfas mé aistriú ar —

Mr Deputy Speaker: I ask the Member to come to his question.

Mr D Bradley: Creidim go bhfuil sé de cheart agam labhairt i nGaeilge anseo, agus go bhfuil sé de dhualgas orm an méid a deirim i nGaeilge a aistriú go Béarla ina dhiaidh sin.

Lord Morrow: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I will take any points of order at the end of the debate. Again, I ask the Member to come to his question. It is not the time to make a speech.

Mr D Bradley: Thank you very much, Mr Deputy Speaker. I believe that, under the rules of the House, I am permitted to speak in Irish and that I am obliged to translate whatever I say in Irish into English. I intend to do so. During my contribution in Irish, I asked a number of questions. I understand that Lord Morrow may not have realised that. I assure him that I asked several questions.

I thank the Minister for his statement, although it is, as Mr Ken Robinson pointed out, rather thin. There is an overemphasis on bureaucracy and an underemphasis on actual language projects. I ask the Minister whether, during the Council meeting, the question of Irish language newspapers was raised. There were two in Ireland: ‘Lá’, which was published in Belfast and unfortunately, due to lack of funding, had to wind up; and the weekly newspaper ‘Foinse’. Was that issue discussed at the meeting? If so, can the Minister report on it to the House?

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: I am fascinated that such a long speech in Irish contracted to such a short question. Interestingly enough, Irish language newspapers were discussed. I was interested to be informed by the Republic’s Minister that, in fact, there are larger sales for English tabloid newspapers than for Irish language newspapers in the Gaeltacht.

Mr McCarthy: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his statement. I congratulate Dominic on his contribution. In fact, his contribution was much longer and contained a lot more detail than that which the Minister provided today. Well done, Dominic.

11.30 am

I wish to let the Minister and Members know that, during the recess, some members of the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure were not always on holiday. We spent some time on the north Antrim coast visiting language groups, which we are discussing today, including Carntogher Community Association, the Ullans Speakers’ Association in Ballymoney and Gaelscoil an Chaistil in Ballycastle. Those three visits proved very interesting; however, the most interesting of them was —

Mr Deputy Speaker: I remind the Member that he must ask a question on the statement.

Mr McCarthy: The question is coming now, Mr Deputy Speaker. The most interesting visit was to the Ullans Speakers’ Association, which is made up of the Ulster Speakers’ Society, the Ulster-Scots Agency, the Ulster-Scots Community Network and the Ulster-Scots Academy. All the groups said that their funding is inadequate, which is an issue that Ken Robinson spoke about earlier. The association said that the council discussed and approved —

Lord Morrow: Mr Bradley spoke about that, too.

Mr McCarthy: I am speaking in English, yet Lord Morrow is not even giving me a chance. Where do we go from here?

The council discussed and approved — that is the important point, Mr Deputy Speaker — the introduction of a revised financial assistance scheme. I am sure that the Ullans Speakers’ Association will be delighted to hear about that. The group had the highest commendation for Éamon Ó Cuív TD from the South of Ireland and for his contribution —

Mr Deputy Speaker: I will ask the Minister to answer that question, if it is one.

Mr McCarthy: I hope that the Minister can answer that question. Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: I thank the Member for his comments and his question. I think that the report accurately reflected the meeting, which was brief and businesslike. I can only report what actually took place. I acknowledge the Member's comments about the Ulster-Scots Agency financial assistance scheme, which the Ulster-Scots community very much welcomes. The financial assistance scheme is in keeping with the previous Minister's commitment on community development and empowerment. In fact, it represents the outworking of that commitment.

The revised financial assistance scheme was approved at the meeting of the North/South Ministerial Council in language body sectoral format on 9 July. Applications are being evaluated and determined by the Ulster-Scots Agency's board to ensure compliance not only with the scheme but with the agency's strategic, corporate and business plans. My understanding is that the agency is also holding a number of roadshows so that people will be properly informed about the opportunities that are now available through the scheme. The general point about equality of funding is one that I have already dealt with and that I fully endorse.

Mr Shannon: Members will be glad to hear that I am not going to give an account of my holidays and of where I was during the summer. I will simply ask questions on the Minister's statement.

I welcome Mr McCausland to his new position as Minister. It is great to see him here. I also pay tribute to Mark Thompson, the Ulster-Scots Agency's outgoing chairperson, for his hard work and for the significant contribution that he has made.

First, the Minister spoke about progress reports in his statement. He said that the Ulster-Scots Agency and Foras na Gaeilge had a joint stand at last month's Tall Ships event. I presume that the stand was there. I am sure that everyone who attended the event enjoyed a very nice day, but I certainly did not see the joint stand there. Will the Minister confirm where it was located? Was it hidden somewhere near a burger stand or placed out of the road?

Mr D Bradley: Ask a question.

Mr Shannon: That is a question. That from the man who asked five questions.

Secondly, we are all aware of the significant numbers of people who are involved in Ulster Scots in Donegal.

Will the Minister indicate what the cross-border bodies have done to encourage members of the Ulster-Scots family in Donegal? What have they done to ensure that every contribution and effort is being made to make them feel fully part of the process? Sometimes they feel as if they are not involved.

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: The Tall Ships event was a success. So many people were there that I must confess that I did not see the stand, even though I was there on a couple of occasions. However, I am reliably informed that the joint stand was at Custom House Square.

The Ulster-Scots community in Donegal is concentrated mainly in the Lagan area of east Donegal and along Donegal Bay in south Donegal. There are Ulster-Scots groups in both of those areas, and work is being done through the agency and the Ulster-Scots Community Network with those groups in a number of ways, such as through projects and cross-border activities. It is good to maintain the relationship between Ulster-Scots communities in the Republic and Northern Ireland. There were some very good projects such as festivals in Donegal and publications about the contribution of Ulster Scots to the Donegal area.

Mr Brolly: An cheist atá agam: an bhfuil a fhios ag an Aire cad é an cineál taispeántais a bhí ann ag an Tall Ships agus a bheas ann i gCill Dara an tseachtain seo chugainn?

What kind of stall or joint exhibition was at the Tall Ships event, and what kind of stall will there be at the National Ploughing Championships in County Kildare?

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: I did not see the stall at Custom House Square. [Interruption.]

However, having seen displays by both bodies on other occasions, I assume that the stall consisted of publications by Foras na Gaeilge and the Ulster-Scots Agency as well as displays of various aspects of both languages and cultures.

In answer to the comment that was made from a sedentary position, the point was already made that the Tall Ships event was such a success and attracted so many people that it was difficult for anybody to see everything that was on display.

Miss McIlveen: I thank the Minister for his statement. I will be much briefer than other Members. Will the Minister clarify whether the Ulster-Scots Agency can fund travel by community groups outside Northern Ireland or the Irish Republic?

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: The issue of travel is long-standing and has been a difficulty for Ulster-Scots groups, particularly those in east Antrim that look across the sea to Scotland. Although Scotland is their nearest neighbour and is only a short distance away, they have been unable to access support for joint projects with, and visits to, their counterparts there.

The agency has reviewed its financial assistance scheme, which was approved by the North/South Ministerial Council on 9 July. That allows the agency to consider the provision for travel arrangements for community groups to travel outside the island of Ireland. Obviously, the particular focus will be on Scotland.

In determining whether a particular application will be approved, the agency will take a number of factors into account. Groups may wish to travel to undertake research that will lead to a report or publication; attend a conference or seminar to promote greater understanding of the Ulster-Scots language and culture; or to facilitate community representatives who need to travel to undertake joint projects with groups that are based in Scotland and that will ultimately benefit the Ulster-Scots language, culture or history.

Ms Anderson: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for his statement. I was very impressed with his comments about a shared future based on equality and human rights; he did not actually say “human rights”, but I assume that he concurs with the sentiment. He talked about the notion of building good relations based on equality, which is something that he along with others could give leadership on and is something that we would concur with.

The Minister talked about the decentralisation of some Foras na Gaeilge staff to Gweedore. Is there a time frame for that likely decentralisation?

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: I note the Member’s comments on a shared and better future. It is not within my ministerial remit to comment on that, but I did comment on it on a radio programme this morning and explained the reasons for the delay in bringing forward the strategy for cohesion, sharing and integration. That delay is not due to Members on this side of the House.

The delay in filling Foras na Gaeilge’s posts is due to a number of issues. Obviously, the Irish Government’s decentralisation policy applies to Foras na Gaeilge, but there have been protracted negotiations between the unions and management regarding the posts that will be moved to Gweedore.

Due to market forces, Foras na Gaeilge has had problems with staff retention. Finally, the recruitment of specialist staff who speak Irish and who wish to live in the Gaeltacht has been problematic. It is an ongoing piece of work, but it is not something for which a particular date was given. Therefore, I will have to look into it and make further enquiries. In due course, I will provide a written answer. I am not sure how informative that answer will be, but I will endeavour to do that.

Mr T Clarke: I declare an interest as a member of the Randalstown Ulster-Scots Society, which sits in the Randalstown Memorial Orange Hall.

The Minister referred to financial assistance and travel costs. What criteria will the agency apply when supporting travel claims?

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: I think that I covered travel costs a moment ago: they have to be for something that is going to produce real benefit. For example, travel might involve attending a conference in Scotland on an appropriate theme or a joint research project that involves co-operation with a Scottish group.

Quite a number of Ulster-Scots organisations in Northern Ireland are members of parent bodies in Scotland. There are already strong links, particularly between east Antrim coastal groups, in places such as Ballycarry and Cairncastle, and groups in Scotland. To ensure that we get value for money, there would have to be clearly demonstrable results from any travel, and it must bring the maximum benefit to the wider community.

Mr Deputy Speaker: That concludes questions to the Minister on that statement. The Speaker has received notice from the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure that he wishes to make a statement regarding the North/South Ministerial Council.

Lord Morrow: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I will take that point of order before we conclude this item of business.

Lord Morrow: There is a facility in the House for Members to speak in English and Irish. There is a clear onus upon those who decide to speak in Irish that they must give a full interpretation, in English, of what they have said. Mr Deputy Speaker, I would like you to look at what has been said in Irish today, because when I heard the interpretation in English, it took around a quarter of the time than when spoken in Irish. I would like the Speaker’s Office to take a look at the translation situation.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I will ask the Speaker’s Office to come back to you on that, Lord Morrow.

Mr McElduff: On a point of order, a LeasCheann Comhairle. On a practical level, it would be very helpful if all Members could avail themselves of the simultaneous translation system that officials benefit from. The infrastructure is already in place — córas aistriúcháin — and Members’ understanding of what is being said in Irish would be aided and speeded up by access to that system.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I will ask the Speaker to deal with that and come back to it.

Mr D Bradley: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. In relation to the enquiry that Lord Morrow asked you to make to the Speaker's Office, nuair a bhí mé ag caint i nGaeilge ní ba luaithe agus nuair a rinne mé iarraidh an méid a dúirt mé i nGaeilge a aistriú go Béarla gur chuir tusa faoi bhrú mé deireadh a chur le mo chuid cainte.

When I made a contribution earlier in Irish, I proceeded to attempt to translate it into English. However, Mr Deputy Speaker, you hurried and harried me and asked me to bring my remarks to a conclusion. If a full and frank translation was not provided by me, it was not out of any lack of intent to do so, but because of the time constraints that you placed upon me.

Mr Deputy Speaker: That will be part of the review. I will also review your challenge to the ruling that I gave you to ask a question.

North/South Ministerial Council

Inland Waterways Sectoral Format

Mr Deputy Speaker: I have received notice from the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure that he wishes to make a statement about the North/South Ministerial Council (NSMC) meeting in inland waterways sectoral format.

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure (Mr McCausland): With your permission, I will make a statement, in compliance with section 52 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998, about a meeting of the North/South Ministerial Council in inland waterways sectoral format.

The meeting was held in Gweedore, County Donegal on 9 July 2009. The Executive were represented by the Minister of Education, Caitríona Ruane, and me. The Government of the Irish Republic were represented by Éamon Ó Cuív TD, Minister for Community, Rural and Gaeltacht Affairs. The statement has been agreed with Caitríona Ruane, and I make it on behalf of us both.

Mr John Martin, chief executive officer of Waterways Ireland, provided a report on progress that included several significant achievements. The Council noted that Waterways Ireland received a sustainability award for its headquarters from the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors. Moreover, Boyle marina in County Roscommon received the award for best marina development at the local authority management awards.

The Council noted that 79m of additional moorings had been provided, with 23m at the Round O in Enniskillen, 20m at Camus on the Lower Bann and 36m at Portglenone on the Lower Bann. The Council noted the further development of the Lakelands Initiative campaign for the Erne/Shannon system from Belleek to Limerick, which will continue with the distribution of brochures under the overarching title 'Lakeland and Inland Waterways'. The 2009 sponsorship programme has been well received, and over 50 events have been approved.

The Council received a presentation on the restoration of the Royal canal and noted its successful enhancement to further develop access to the waterways and waterside activities and to complete its connection to the Shannon. The Council received a progress report on the restoration work for the Clones/Upper Lough Erne section of the Ulster canal, including a survey of that section of the canal, which was to be completed by mid July. The Council also noted the recent consultations with local stakeholders and the programme for completion of the project. The Council noted Waterways Ireland's annual report and accounts for 2008, which were presented prior to being laid before the Assembly and the Oireachtas.

The Council agreed proposals for a number of property disposals in the context of a range of development projects on the waterways and noted progress on property-management issues, including the pilot registration project. It also noted future plans for property registration on the Royal canal and the Grand canal. The Council agreed that its next meeting in inland waterways sectoral format will take place in November or December 2009.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure (Mr McElduff): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Tá an tAire gnóthach sa Teach inniu; níl aon amhras faoi sin.

I note with pleasure the Minister's reference to Waterways Ireland's achievement in obtaining a sustainability award for its headquarters in Enniskillen. In May 2009, the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure held its weekly meeting at the Waterways Ireland headquarters and toured the building. It is a very impressive setting.

The Minister referred to a programme for the completion of the project to restore the Ulster canal from Upper Lough Erne to Clones. The Committee has a keen interest in that matter. Will the Minister indicate when the Ulster canal will reopen? He will be aware of ongoing interest in the matter, led by the Blackwater Regional Partnership, which is based in Caledon. A recent public information event there was attended by his ministerial colleagues, including Mr Poots and Michelle Gildernew. Will the Minister provide some hope to the campaigners who are involved in the restoration of the Ulster canal?

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: Waterways Ireland is working on the section of the Ulster canal between Clones and Upper Lough Erne. That project will cost €35 million. The construction cost of that section is being funded by the Irish Republic. Waterways Ireland intends to seek planning permission for that project by mid-2010, which will be followed by tendering for a detailed design and build contract.

Lord Browne: I thank the Minister for his statement. I would be pleased to ascertain whether he is considering the appointment of a board to Waterways Ireland, and, if so, what the likely composition of such a board would be.

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: Since taking office, I have been of the opinion that there is much to commend the appointment of an oversight board. Arising from the St Andrews Agreement, a review of the effectiveness and efficiency of North/South implementation bodies is under way. If that review recommends a board for Waterways Ireland, Ministers in the NSMC will have to consider that issue along with our counterparts in the Irish Republic. It would be premature to comment on the composition of such a board at this stage. However, I am interested in that matter, and I know that it is being considered.

Mr K Robinson: I welcome the Minister's statement, which is much meatier than his previous one. He mentioned the pilot registration project. It would be helpful to Members if he could explain what that project entails.

I note also that the Minister's statement mentions the obvious progress that has been made on inland waterways in the Republic of Ireland. That is to be welcomed: it will give a great boost to the tourism and leisure industry down there. However, the emphasis in the statement is on the link between the Shannon and Erne systems, and the Ulster canal link to those waterways. I remind the Minister that the Ulster canal runs into Lough Neagh near Maghera, on the River Blackwater. That area could do with some development. Given, in particular, the current favourable exchange rates, will he consider ways in which that section of canal could be brought forward for scrutiny, approval and, eventually, perhaps, a rebuild?

I also welcome the work that has been done at Camus and Portglenone on the Lower Bann system. I am sure that my colleague from East Londonderry will comment on the potential of the Lower Bann and the Lough Neagh basin, which generally remains untapped. We have an opportunity to build the good practice that we have seen south of the border into our own infrastructures for the benefit of leisure and tourism in Northern Ireland.

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: The pilot registration scheme is nothing to do with registering pilots: it is about registering property. There were issues about the ownership of land and how that land, previously owned by various people, came together under the aegis of Waterways Ireland. The pilot scheme is operating in the Republic; registration of ownership of land in Northern Ireland is being dealt with separately.

There are currently no plans to develop the next section of the Ulster canal. The outline business case that was submitted to the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure in December 2006 concluded that the preferred option was to restore the south-west end of the canal. However, when the decision was taken to proceed with the south-west section between Clones and Upper Lough Erne, Ministers in the NSMC agreed to keep the remainder — from Clones to Lough Neagh — under review. The matter is now under review, but there are no plans at present.

I will pick up on Ken Robinson's point about the economic and other benefits of improvements to the Lower Bann system. In 2008, Waterways Ireland completed 36m of additional moorings on the Lower Bann at the Vow, near Coleraine. Works on the Lower Bann include jetties and moorings at Christie Park in Coleraine, which were completed in 2003-04; jetties and moorings at Kilrea, which were completed in 2005-06; and refurbishment of the lock house at the Cutts in Coleraine. Several works were carried out at Mount Sandel in 2006-07, which cost approximately £386,000. Work is ongoing to an extent, bit by bit, on the Lower Bann. I agree with the Member about the benefits of such improvements. I am sure that, as lots more money becomes available in future, those projects will be taken forward. There are financial constraints on that; nevertheless, it is very much in mind.

Mr Dallat: Ken Robinson has stolen my thunder to some degree.

I welcome the 20m of additional mooring that has been provided near Coleraine, and acknowledge that Waterways Ireland, with responsibility for the development of the Lower Bann, has been outstanding in its performance. Sadly, the other Government agencies have not been.

When will an overall plan be announced for the development of the River Bann, which would have the potential to create hundreds, if not thousands, of new jobs in leisure and tourism? Could that be a topic for discussion at the next meeting of the intergovernmental body? I do not care whether that is held in Gweedore or Cullybackey; the important issue is that the potential of the Lower Bann is not missed.

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: Unless Gweedore moves into Northern Ireland, the next meeting will not be held there. The next meeting will be held in Northern Ireland.

I share the Member's interest in the Lower Bann. I will write to the Member with some thoughts on that. That would be the most appropriate and effective way of dealing with that question.

Mr McCarthy: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I am disappointed by the response that the Minister gave to an earlier question on the Ulster canal. The Minister said that there were no plans to complete the restoration of the Ulster canal up to Lough Neagh. I understood that the restoration was starting from Lough Neagh. The report includes the words:

"the programme for completion of the project."

It is not a completion. If it were a completion, it would go up to Lough Neagh. The Minister has said that there are no plans to do so; will he elaborate on that?

The report also states:

"The Council agreed proposals for a number of property disposals in the context of a range of development projects".

Will the Minister tell us whether there have been any discussions with property owners in those consultations? Do they agree with the plans for the Ulster canal?

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: The project that is under way is to restore the canal from Clones to Upper Lough Erne. At present, there are no specific plans beyond that. People will recognise a desire to have the network completed in due course. However, that is the situation at present.

Waterways Ireland disposed of six properties that required NSMC approval. They were all in the Irish Republic; there were none in Northern Ireland. None of the disposals was financially significant.

Mr Shannon: I thank the Minister for his comments on the proposals. The Minister's report refers to receiving a presentation on the restoration of the Royal canal. It is good to see the Royal canal being highlighted. Will the Minister confirm what contribution the Irish Government are making to the improvement work on the Royal canal through the North/South bodies?

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: I share the Member's delight in the affection for all things royal in the Irish Republic.

The funding of capital works in the Republic is entirely a matter for the Government of the Irish Republic. They fund 100% of capital works in the Republic; we do not contribute. We pay 15% of the revenue costs for Waterways Ireland, and the Republic pays 85%, which is proportionate to the amount of miles of navigable waterway in Northern Ireland and in the Republic.

Mr Durkan: I thank the Minister for his statement, and thank him and his ministerial colleagues for the work that was done at the meeting. The Minister kindly indicated the budget for a section of work that is being carried out on the Ulster canal. Will he tell us whether that programme and its budget have already been subject to the kind of efficiency tests that the two Departments of Finance are subjecting the North/South bodies to?

Will the budget be subject to such a test in the future? Have the proposals been passed by "An Bord Snip" in the South, or will they be under review?

12.00 noon

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: At the meeting, there was no mention of any derogation from the Irish Republic's commitment to fund the project. That section of work, from Clones to Lough Erne, is entirely funded by the Republic. There was no mention that the Republic would step back or withdraw from that, and there the matter rests.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. An t-am seo ba mhaith liom a fhiafraí den Aire an bhfuil aon phleananna ann chun scéimeanna nua a thabhairt isteach faoi obair na Comhairle. Are there plans to bring any new schemes into the council's work?

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: I will make a further comment on the previous question before I come to that one. At the meeting, it was mentioned that there will be efficiency savings, North and South. However, there was no specific mention of funding of the Ulster canal.

I have now forgotten Mr Bradley's question.

Mr D Bradley: Are there plans for any new schemes?

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: I assume that the question refers to whether it is intended to bring any other waterways into Waterways Ireland; there is no intention to do that. I have a list of the other waterways in Northern Ireland, but those are not in the domain of Waterways Ireland. There is no further consideration as the situation stands.

Mr Savage: I also congratulate the Minister on his statement. There has been much talk about two particular canals this morning. However, has the Minister any plans for the Lagan canal, which I consider to be the most important canal in Northern Ireland?

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: With regards to the Lagan canal and linking Belfast to Lough Neagh, the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure owns residual property rights that remain in Government ownership as a successor in title to the former Lagan Navigation Company. Those are primarily the locks and towpath on the 12-mile lower Lagan navigation, which links Stranmillis in Belfast with Sprucefield and Lisburn. Capital projects of that nature, even if viable and feasible, are unlikely to be wholly financed by central government.

The Department met local authorities and other bodies that have an interest in the Lagan navigation with a view to developing a strategy for possible reopening in the future. To that end, the Lagan Canal Restoration Trust was established in 2008-09. It is funded by the four local authorities, the Northern Ireland Environment Agency and my Department, and it aims to explore the scope for funding and delivering the 27-mile project. By way of support, my Department agreed to fund the trust in commissioning an economic appraisal for the potential reopening of the lower Lagan canal. That report is due for completion in September 2009.

I am also delighted to confirm that works to restore the Department's lock three at Newforge, with financial assistance from the Heritage Lottery Fund, will be completed by the end of October 2009. That will complement the restoration of the adjoining lock house, which was recently completed by Castlereagh Borough Council.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE BUSINESS

Forestry Bill

Second Stage

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development (Ms Gildernew): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I beg to move

That the Second Stage of the Forestry Bill [NIA 11/08] be agreed.

Our current forestry legislation dates back to 1953 and reflects the priorities of an era when commercial timber production was the main focus. The legislation has served its purpose for much of the period since 1953. However, it has been evident for some time that forestry is of significant importance for reasons other than timber production, although timber production continues to be important, particularly for the North's economy and in supporting local industry and rural jobs.

The impact of continued deforestation on climate change and biodiversity has raised concerns globally. It is widely recognised that increasing forest cover can enhance the many benefits that forests already provide, be they environmental, economic or social. The North is significantly under-forested, with only 6% of the land area covered, compared with 10% in the South, 12% in Britain and 33% on average throughout the EU.

The forestry strategy that my Department published in 2006 acknowledges the need for the sustainable management of existing forests and a steady expansion of tree cover. It seeks to deliver a more competitive forestry industry in the North, and it provides for a balanced approach between producing commercial timber, protecting the forest environment and providing increased opportunities for forest-based recreation. Legislation must be in place to provide a statutory framework to deal with those issues.

The new Bill will address my Department's contemporary and evolving commercial, environmental and social objectives for forestry. It will allow us to obtain better value from the forest estate through creating new revenue-generating opportunities, and it will enable us to secure better use of recreational facilities and buildings. It will help to protect all forest trees from damage, reintroduce a restriction on the felling of trees in private woodland and provide a public right of access to state forests. Those are the key principles of the Bill.

Before I comment on the generalities of the Bill, I want to thank all those who responded to the consultation exercise that was carried out by my Department last year on the proposals for new legislation. I also thank the Chairperson and members of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development for facilitating presentations from my officials on two occasions, and for their comments.

The Bill contains 39 clauses and two schedules. It provides a statutory framework within which the Department can deliver its forest expansion and sustainable forestry objectives. Members will be glad to hear that I do not intend to comment on every clause, because many deal with related aspects of the same key provisions. However, I would like to explain the thinking behind the main provisions.

Clause 1 creates the foundation of the Bill and describes the Department's duty to promote forestry. That has been expanded beyond the duty to promote traditional forestry, as outlined in the Forestry Act 1953, to include the wider economic, environmental and social context of modern forestry. The Bill thus seeks to reflect the modern understanding of what is meant by sustainable forestry.

Clauses 2 and 3 provide the Department with the main powers to engage in and support the afforestation of land and forest activity, including the acquisition and disposal of land. It also enables the Department to provide facilities on forestry land to improve its amenity.

That provision will enable the Department to deliver social and recreational forestry. Through arrangements with partners, for example, it will be able to facilitate the provision of nature trails, viewpoints, car parks, toilets, and so forth. Recently, the Department published a strategy to develop the recreational and social use of its forests. Those provisions will provide the Department with the powers to support the implementation of that strategy.

Clause 4 includes provisions to allow the Department to use or develop its forestry land for a purpose other than forestry. The aim is to allow the Department to develop or facilitate what might be regarded as non-forestry opportunities. Those include tourism opportunities, such as the provision of forest chalets or cabins in forests and the development of renewable energy possibilities, such as wind farms. The provisions will enable the Department better to realise the full potential of its forests and, at the same time, obtain better value from the public forest estate. However, in exercising those powers, the Department will be required to have due regard to its general duty to promote forestry, as outlined in clause 1.

Clause 5 creates a new power to enable the compulsory acquisition of land for any of the functions under the Bill. The Department seeks that power primarily to help it to deal with situations in which its forests and associated timber assets are landlocked, and access, even after reasonable negotiation, cannot be secured. In those situations, the public value of mature timber, which is the result of many years of public investment, could be lost. Other circumstances in which land may be required include the facilitating of access to planned recreation, tourism initiatives and for biodiversity purposes.

The power is widely drafted because the Department cannot foresee the full range of contingencies that may require such a power. Nevertheless, I appreciate that such a power could give cause for concern. Indeed, the Agriculture Committee has already commented on that provision. I assure the Committee and other Members that the power will be used sparingly and only with ministerial supervision. The vesting process is described in schedule 1 to the Bill and is based around the procedures that are used under the Local Government Act (NI) 1972, which is considered to be the cornerstone of modern vesting law, with all the established rights, including representation, recourse to an inquiry by the Planning Appeals Commission, and compensation, etc.

Clause 6 provides for the Department to carry on inquiries and to collect and disseminate the results, including the preparation and publication of statistics for the purposes of any of its functions under the Act. That is largely a carry-over from the 1953 Forestry Act.

Clause 7 is a new power that allows the Department to:

“do anything which appears to it to be conducive or incidental to the discharge of its general duty under section 1(1).”

That clause also allows engagement in partnerships or participation in a body corporate in support of the Department's general functions, which could, for example, include future recreational or renewable-energy initiatives. The Forestry Commission in England and Wales has such powers under the Forestry Act 1967. That power is not intended to be additional to the general duty, but to supplement it.

Clauses 8 and 9 are intended to protect forest trees from damage by wild animals. Clause 8 will allow the owner or occupier, in the event of damage by wild animals to growing trees on his land, to cull such animals at any time, either in his woodland or in any adjoining land that he owns. That clause will apply to owners of any woodland, private or public.

Clause 9 provides the Department with a power to deal with damage or likely damage to any woodland, public or private, by wild animals that live in adjacent lands in other ownership. The Department may serve a notice on the occupier of the adjacent land that will require him or her to deal with the problem. Failing that, the Department may enter the land and control the wild animals on that land.

That provision has been the subject of concerns from stakeholders with a game-shooting interest. However, our long-term aim is to double the area of forest in the North, and that is likely to increase the habitat that is suitable for forest-dwelling animals, including deer, which have the capacity to damage woodland and to hinder woodland regeneration. Those powers are designed to enable the Department to limit possible damage and would be exercised only where landowners are unable or unwilling to address the problem.

Similar provisions are contained in the 1953 Forestry Act and in legislation in Britain and in the South, but the proposed provisions in clauses 8 and 9 of the Bill go further in certain respects. For example, deer are now included under the definition of “wild animal”. On that point, we need to appreciate the protections that have been put in place for the Irish hare. I would like the Irish hare to be outside the definition of “wild animal”, given that it is a distinct subspecies and given the work that is going on in my Department and with the Department of the Environment.

Clause 10 is a carry-over from the 1953 Forestry Act and is a standard provision in forestry legislation that is aimed at protecting woodlands, both public and private, from the threat of fire damage. It permits the Department to serve a notice on the occupier of adjacent uncultivated land where vegetation poses a fire risk to an area of forest. If the owner does not respond to the notice, the Department may enter the land and remove or destroy any vegetation that poses a risk. Some stakeholders have expressed concern about that provision, but I refer again to our long-term aim of doubling the area of forest in the North and the need for the Department to have powers to protect woodland, whether in private or public ownership.

Clause 11 offers protection to woodland owners or the Department’s authorised officials who take action under clauses 8, 9 or 10 of the Bill against prosecution under the Wildlife Order 1985 or the Game Preservation Act of 1928. Clause 12 includes provisions to restrict the burning of vegetation that is close to forests and is another carryover from the 1953 Forestry Act. Clause 13 amends the Plant Health Act 1967 to provide powers to make subordinate legislation to control the tree disease that is posed by wood packaging.

Clauses 14 to 29 deal with the felling of trees, and the key provision is the requirement for anyone who wishes to fell trees on land of 0.2 hectares or more to have a felling licence granted by my Department. That will help to underpin the strategic objective of sustainable forest management. The aim is to ensure that private landowners manage their land with due regard to sustainability, including restocking, where appropriate, sites that have been felled.

To obtain a felling licence, the landowner will have to prepare a felling management plan for my officials to consider. The aim will be to keep the management plan as simple and straightforward as possible. Felling licences are already required in England, Scotland, Wales and the South; introducing them in the North is consistent with the principles of good forest management.

A number of exemptions to the requirement to have a felling licence have been included in the Bill; for example, the felling of fruit trees, the topping or lopping of trees and the felling of trees in gardens. Again, that is a pragmatic approach that does not place undue restrictions on people and that will, hopefully, enable us to move forward without undue bureaucracy.

To safeguard the interest of private landowners, the Bill contains provision for compensation in the event that an application for a felling licence is refused. There is also a right of appeal against a decision not to grant a felling licence. A further important provision, which includes an appeal mechanism, is the power to require restocking after unauthorised felling. Procedures related to an application for a felling licence and the requirements of a felling management plan will be prescribed in subordinate legislation, which will be subject to separate consultation.

Clause 30 introduces a statutory right of pedestrian access to the Department’s forests for recreation purposes, subject to by-laws, and that has been welcomed by a range of stakeholders. The remaining clauses 31 to 39 include powers of entry; regulation-making powers; provision for amendments and repeals; and provisions that relate to commencement.

I commend the Bill to the Assembly. It provides the necessary legislative framework to enable the Department to meet Government objectives in relation to forest expansion and the sustainable management of existing woods and forests, through which the many diverse social, economic and environment benefits can be realised. Go raibh mile maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development (Mr Paisley Jnr):

At the outset, I must say that if I have to leave the House early, it will not be out of discourtesy to the House, the debate or the Minister; it will be because there is an Agriculture Committee meeting later on. I hope that it does not clash with the debate, but it may.

The Second Stage offers the House the opportunity to debate the Bill’s principles. The Minister has taken us through those principles and outlined the Bill’s exact intention. The Bill is wide in scope and will repeal the Forestry Act (Northern Ireland) 1953, replacing it with a largely new set of provisions to regulate forest and commercial tree felling.

When it was created, the 1953 Act was relevant for the times in which people lived. In 1953, Britain still bore the scars of the Second World War, and evidence of a war-torn Europe was everywhere. Open bomb sites with their crumbling buildings were set amid a new kind of architecture of half-built blocks of flats.

Those were the first signs of a redevelopment and regeneration that demanded source materials, of which wood took primacy. The production of timber was the thrust of the 1953 Act. No account was taken of developing leisure activities, which remained very much the preserve of the upper classes. The Act was unashamedly about timber production, because that was, rightly, the priority of the day.

More than 25 years ago, the great social historian Sir John Colville wrote in his book 'The new Elizabethans, 1952 – 1977':

"Whatever their station in life, the way people now conduct their affairs differs, voluntarily or involuntarily, in both opportunity and amenity from what was customary twenty five years ago. They feed and dress differently, they talk, live and spend their leisure differently, and they do so partly by choice and partly by force of circumstance."

Now that we have a further 25 years on the calendar, how much truer and more accurate Sir John's statement is today; how much greater the emphasis that is placed on leisure; how much more conversant we have become about our environment and the amenities that are, and should be, available to us and to the people; how much greater the opportunity, then, through this Bill, to produce a forestry Act that will be central to the strategic development not only of the Forest Service, but of the strategies across which the Northern Ireland Executive act; how great is the opportunity to link our forestry strategy with health, tourism, environmental, cultural, education and energy strategies; how great is the opportunity to engineer the circumstances that would see the use of our forests heralded as an example of best practice across the world — what a great opportunity is available to us.

Unfortunately, due to the circumstances and missed opportunities that have been outlined, the Bill falls some distance short. The Bill's primary thrust remains timber production, with lip service being paid to other potential opportunities, such as economic, social, environmental and recreational ones. Those are the opportunities that the Bill should seize and exploit to their fullest extent.

Of course, the Forest Service must be reorganised, but I believe that its potential is not being realised fully. For example, substantial sporting tourism revenue is being lost as a result of the service's potential not being utilised properly and exploited. Independent research from consultants that has been made available to us identifies the fact that "sporting shooting contributes more than £45 million annually to the NI economy, sustaining 2,100 full-time equivalent jobs."

In Northern Ireland, we spend a further £10 million a year on conservation and on managing something like 990,000 hectares of forest around the Province.

Given that significant resource, it seems to me that the consultation should read into and consider the needs of those people who could play a greater role in developing even more opportunities on forestry land.

I hasten to add that those views are not necessarily mine or, indeed, those of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development; they are the views of stakeholders and those who wish to see the strategic development of and investment in our forests. Indeed, they are the views expressed in the European Community, which recognises that through regulation, forests can contribute both to the Lisbon objectives concerning economic growth and competitiveness and to the Göteborg objectives concerning the conservation of natural resources.

In order to maintain that contribution, the Bill must be adapted to be more open to the global market and to the current strategic frameworks that are being developed through the Executive Departments. It needs to be open to increasing our communities' diverse recreational demands, to those visiting our country, to the enhancement of our unique biodiversity, to the development of the Northern Ireland economy, and to the competitiveness that is necessary. The Bill must open up opportunities, and I believe that it could, and should, do that. Indeed, we should see to it that it is amended to that effect.

It is important that the Bill strikes a balance between the commercial, social, economic, recreational, environmental and strategic interests in our community, and I know that the Committee is keen to play its role in that difficult task. The Committee wishes to see how those strands can be woven together and how the Bill can connect the various sectoral strands and interests that have been recounted to us today. We will listen to the representatives of the key stakeholders. When necessary, we will challenge the Department and the Forest Service to open the Bill to the diverse interests that people have in our forests, and we will test the Department and the service to see whether they can come up with a Bill that addresses our priorities today and those that will arise in the future.

We do not need a Bill that deals only with some limited aspects of the timber industry; we need something that addresses the wide role that can be exploited through our Forest Service.

As it stands, this Bill is about timber production. It is about giving regulatory powers to the Department and to the Forest Service. It is about strengthening the hand of the Forest Service, where it needs to be strengthened, and the Department, and about protecting departmental interests. The Committee recognises that those are important aspects that cannot be overlooked. However, the Bill should and could do so much more. The House should be determined to make it do so in order that the entire community can benefit where it can and should from the forests and forestation in our country.

The Department also needs to ensure that it protects our communities through exercising the proposed powers bestowed upon it by the Bill in a considered and balanced manner. The Committee will, therefore, scrutinise the Bill to ensure that the principles are appropriate and that they do what they are intended to do in an appropriate manner and do not go beyond that.

The Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development looks forward to receiving the Bill in Committee Stage.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to meet immediately upon the lunchtime suspension. I therefore propose, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the sitting until 2.00 pm. The sitting is, by leave, suspended.

The sitting was suspended at 12.26 pm.

On resuming (Mr Speaker in the Chair) —

2.00 pm

Mr W Clarke: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. This Bill is the first piece of forestry legislation to be introduced in the North of Ireland in over 50 years. We have to take a bit of time and get it right. It is long overdue.

During recess, I had discussions with a number of stakeholders, including the Woodland Trust, members of the private sector, the Countryside Access and Activities Network (CAAN), local community groups in my constituency and council officers who have responsibility for access and tourism. I will base my contribution around those discussions.

Forest policy reviews in 1970 and from 2000-06 indicated the desire to double the amount of land under woodland in the North of Ireland by 2050 from its current 6% to 12%. In the past five planting seasons, new woodland creation in the North of Ireland has fallen by almost 50% to its lowest level, and it is below the target of 550 hectares per annum. The new Bill needs to address that major shortfall, and I think that it will.

Everyone with whom I discussed the Bill thought that the clause that deals with the felling licence was a useful tool in forest management. The private sector was concerned about the cost of felling licences and stated that there was no requirement for fees linked to felling licences in England, Scotland, Wales or the South of Ireland. Perhaps the Minister will clarify that issue.

There were also reservations about the need for farmers and woodland developers to draw up a management plan for all woodland/forestry plantations. It was felt that that was an unnecessary obligation, given that all plantings are undertaken only when grant approval has been agreed. That grant approval process takes care of the development of long-term objectives, so people were asking why there was a need for duplication.

Premier Woodlands is concerned that the Bill does not make clear who the Forest Service is answerable to in the context of carrying out its activities. Premier Woodlands believes that, as currently constituted, the Bill gives the Forest Service free rein to carry out its activities on an unscrutinised basis. I am sure that the Agriculture Committee and the Minister will deal with that.

Recreation and tourism access, including community well-being, needs to be on a level footing with timber production. Local communities need to be able to feel ownership of forests, and there is potential for community groups and new councils to investigate working with the Forest Service in building high-quality play parks for tourists and locals. I welcome the opportunity for Forest Service land to be used for other reason, including renewable energy, through wind farms, as well as the development of tourist facilities. I would like to acknowledge the Minister's clarification that log-cabin holiday accommodation will be included in the proposals.

During recess, along with other interested parties, I visited Yorkshire to investigate the potential for the Forest Service to diversify into sporting provision and eco-holiday provision. The Forest Service has taken great steps in relation to the recreational provisions in our forests, but it is time to complete the journey. The Bill has the potential to do that. Proposals are being developed in relation to activity tourism on such measures as a high ropes project in Tollymore and a high-profile development of mountain biking — a recreational industry that has the potential to become a multi-million-pound success story. It is being planned for the south Down forests. Those projects will complement the tourism projects that are in place in south Down, the rest of the North and the island in general.

I find it difficult to envisage how a long-term strategy for forestry and woodlands in the North of Ireland can advance without consideration of the impact of climate change and sustainable development. We need to take a strategic approach to our forests and maximise their use to combat climate change, be that through the planting of floodplains, for instance. That would provide a good opportunity to alleviate problems of flooding. I am interested in the Minister's thoughts on that.

I have spoken to the RSPB and the Woodland Trust, and they are calling for the new legislation to ensure the protection of ancient woodland, a resource that is particularly scarce in the North of Ireland. Both organisations are also keen to see the promotion of biodiversity through a sustainability duty that will encompass all state, public and private woodland. In addition, they feel that such a duty should encourage the expansion of the native woodland cover in the North of Ireland.

Perhaps the Minister will tell the House how the general duty on the Department will enable the creation of new native woodland for community and recreational access. Evidence has shown that increasing native woodland cover can help to deliver on a range of policy issues, including climate change and public health. Not only is native woodland rightly considered to be a beautiful and relaxing backdrop, but those woods and trees support an array of wildlife and biodiversity. Therefore, native woods will assume a great importance in delivering on Executive priorities such as the Programme for Government targets of creating 1,650 hectares of new woodland by 2011 and halting the loss of indigenous species and habitats by 2016.

Clause 10 of the Bill deals with the removal of vegetation close to forests. I see the need for that given the risks from gorse fires, the bills for which regularly run into hundreds of thousands of pounds, especially in my constituency of South Down.

In conclusion, forests must become multi-functional; they must be relevant to all of our lives; and many more people must be able to use them for recreation and to earn a living. Forests must be developed to provide renewable energy opportunities, and although timber production is essential, the Forest Service must have flexibility, particularly in relation to social use and recreation.

The Bill is the first piece of forestry legislation for 50 years, and it could give the Executive, its Departments and agencies the legislative authority to deliver fit-for-purpose forestry management in an ever-changing world. Together with the Agriculture Committee, I look forward to working with the Department, the Forest Service and the Minister in progressing the Bill. Go raibh maith agat.

Mr Elliott: I declare an interest as a farmer and the owner of a modest area of forest.

In broad terms, the Ulster Unionist Party welcomes progress on a new Forestry Bill. The last Forestry Act dates back to 1953 and is much outdated. Therefore, we are pleased that there will be some progress on that at least. However, that does not mean that we are absolutely delighted with the new Bill: we are pleased with some aspects of it, but, to be blunt, we will seek changes and amendments in others.

Like Mr Willie Clarke and other Members, my party colleagues and I met various stakeholders in the industry and forestry officials during the summer recess. We thank those stakeholders for those meetings and for making their time available.

There are a number of issues that I want to deal with specifically, the first of which is ancient woodland. I am concerned that the Bill does not afford enough protection to ancient woodland. I do not know where it even defines ancient woodland. Perhaps the Minister and the Forest Service could clarify that aspect as the Bill progresses through its various Stages.

In her opening remarks, the Minister alluded to meeting the objectives of the forestry strategy, but I am concerned that the Forest Service is not even meeting the Programme for Government targets of planting an additional 550 hectares of forest and woodland per year, and I hope that the Bill can help to redress that issue. Another area of concern is the Forest Service's overall target of doubling forest cover in Northern Ireland by 2050, which is a huge task and, given the amount of new planting taking place, it is a target that will never be met.

Furthermore, I have noticed that the Department's replies to questions in recent months have included short-term coppice in the figures for newly planted woodland and forest, and I am not sure that it should be included in that category.

I am hugely concerned about the overall control that the Bill will give to the Forest Service and the Department, because the Forest Service is involved in the commercial production of timber, and it should not have an advantage over private industry. I believe that the Bill will give the Forest Service a huge advantage.

If you will permit me, Mr Speaker, I will look at a couple of issues, many of which the Committee will deal with; however, I want to highlight one or two for the Minister's pursuance.

The first issue is the disposal of forestry land, and I assume that there will need to be some sort of acceptance of the public interest in such disposal. I also assume that the Forest Service cannot dispose of forestry land if and when it so desires; if that is to be allowed, there would need to be good reason that is in the public interest. I would like clarification on that point.

My second point relates to clause 4, which deals with the use or development of forestry land. Clause 4(1) states:

"The Department may use or develop forestry land for a purpose other than forestry."

Does that mean that the Department will take that land out of forestry use and develop it for use as something else? Clause 4(1) is not clear about that, and I would like it to be clarified.

The compulsory acquisition of land puts the Forest Service at a huge advantage over private industry. It allows it to take land off any farmer or landowner that it so desires for its own purposes. That is dealt with under clause 5, and if the provisions of that clause are combined with those of clause 4, the Forest Service could develop forestry land for a purpose other than forestry. That would give the Forest Service wide-ranging powers, and, unless there is a good reason for it to acquire land, such powers are not acceptable. Clause 5 should be narrowed to mean the compulsory acquisition only for reasons of access to land, and if that were the situation, that power should also be available to private landowners.

I have huge concerns about clause 7, which deals with incidental powers, and I must say, I wish that I had those powers at home. Clause 7(1) states:

"The Department may do anything which appears to it to be conducive or incidental to the discharge of its general duty under section 1(1)."

That gives the Department the power to do almost anything. I would love to go home and tell my wife that sometimes, but the problem is that she would just not listen. I would like some clarification on that issue from the Forest Service.

There is huge concern that the Bill will allow for the Forest Service to control not only forest land, but adjoining land. That also means lands that adjoin any forest, not just those that are under the management of the Forest Service for the control of animals. That will create huge problems for sporting and shooting organisations in the Province.

Clause 14 deals with the felling licence. Although there are reasons for having a felling licence, it must be subject to some flexibility, particularly where the management plans are concerned. I have not heard anything from the Department and the Forest Service that specifies clearly what those management plans will entail. I am concerned about the fact that the Forest Service will be immune from the need for such a management plan and licence. Again, that puts the Forest Service at a huge advantage over the private sector. The private sector will need a management plan to get a felling licence but the Forest Service will not. There is great unfairness in that, and it needs to be resolved quickly. I suggest that the Forest Service should also need a management plan and felling licence and that there should be an external audit group that could be overseen by people from the Forest Service and private industry. I do not want to create additional bureaucracy, but that must be looked at.

There has been no consultation with sporting organisations or with those who have the sporting rights over forestry about pedestrian access to all forestry and woodland. There must be genuine and proper consultation on that matter because there could be huge conflict in that area. We heard earlier about how much that industry brings into the Province, and we must take cognisance of that.

I look forward to going through the Committee Stage of the Bill in conjunction with the Department. Obviously, I do not believe that we will agree on everything at this stage, but I look forward to progressing the matter.

2.15 pm

Dr Farry: I must first apologise to the House for the absence today of David Ford, who was hoping to speak on the Bill, but whose mother-in-law sadly passed away last night. I am sure that all our thoughts are with David at this time.

On behalf of the Alliance Party, I warmly welcome the legislation, as well as the fact that, on the second day of the new Assembly session, we are getting around to discussing legislation, which is, after all, our primary purpose as MLAs. I certainly hope that we can do the subject justice and have a debate as long as, if not longer than, the debates on private Member's motions.

The Bill presents an important opportunity for Northern Ireland, one that does not come along very often. The Bill is the first piece of legislation in this area for some 56 years, since the Forestry Act (Northern Ireland) 1953, and already there has been considerable consultation — in some cases going back quite some time — leading up to the introduction of the Bill. That shows how rare an opportunity it is to progress that type of work.

The Alliance Party will certainly support the Second Stage of the Bill, because we need to take the matter forward. Although we welcome large aspects of the legislation, it is only right to say that there are a number of deficiencies in the Bill as presented. We look forward to those issues being addressed, either during Committee Stage or, if necessary, in the Chamber through the amendment process.

I am particularly grateful for the comments and input from the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds and the Woodland Trust. Both organisations have been extremely active on behalf of the community in Northern Ireland in protecting our natural environment, and we all owe them a great debt of gratitude for their ongoing work.

The management of our woodland is clearly a critical issue. Ian Paisley Jnr has already spoken of the balance between the economic, social and environmental aspects. It is also worth stressing the importance of the contribution of forestry to tackling climate change. The Minister has already alluded to the fact that Northern Ireland is poorly wooded; some 6% of our land mass is covered by trees. It is useful to compare that figure with the figures internationally: in the rest of the UK, the figure is around 12%; in the Republic of Ireland, it is 10%; and in the rest of Europe, it is, on average, around 44%. When one considers ancient woodland in particular, those figures appear even worse. Northern Ireland is in an even more difficult position, as only around 0.6% of our land mass is covered by ancient woodland, compared to around 2% in the rest of the United Kingdom.

The casual visitor can see the different levels of tree cover when flying over the countryside of different parts of the world. Having travelled through the north-east of the United States, for example, I was struck by the fact that virtually every small town and village is obscured by a canopy of trees. That adds to both the built and natural environment there, and is something that we should aspire to here. The historical evolution of these islands has been very different to that, and there tends to be a lot more open countryside, but perhaps we can address that over time. In the past, as Members have mentioned, the emphasis has been on the regulation of timber supply. It is clear that the emphasis now needs to change to sustainability, which should be front and centre in the Bill.

I will now make some specific comments on the Bill. Clause 1 outlines the general duties on the Department. It is important that a clear duty is included in the legislation to ensure sustainability in relation to forestry policy and practice and the regulation of all woodland types. That should apply not only to forests that are in public ownership but to private land. It should also be cross-referenced with biodiversity. The issue is not simply the trees that are being managed, but the wildlife that exists in our forests, both flora and fauna. The Bill should make very clear references to things like the UK biodiversity plan.

I agree with Tom Elliott's comments that some of the terminology used in the legislation is somewhat vague. Perhaps that terminology can be spelt out more clearly.

Careful consideration needs to be given to the compulsory acquisition powers that are set out in clause 5. No doubt something is required in that area, but great sensitivity is necessary, and we also must respect people's property rights.

I support the intention regarding inquiries and information in clause 6. However, the tenor of that clause should be one of "shall" rather than "may". There should be a requirement for information gathering, rather than simply a hope that it will happen. Indeed, any information that is gathered should be made publicly available.

Arising from that point, I must stress the need for a proper inventory to be taken of the woodland in Northern Ireland. We would like the Bill to include a statutory duty on the Forest Service to survey and monitor the extent and condition of all Northern Ireland's woodland — that is an essential requirement.

We appreciate that a certain degree of information on the extent and location of forests, woodland and trees in Northern Ireland is already available, but, in some respects, data can be rather disparate and out of date, and there are gaps in the coverage. The Forest Service probably knows what is in its estate, but it is with what lies outside its estate where much of the difficulty arises.

It is worth pointing out that holding proper inventories is the case in the rest of the UK, the Republic of Ireland and most of Europe, so Northern Ireland's current approach is out of step in that wider context. It is worth highlighting that the Forestry Commission of Great Britain has recommended such an inventory for Northern Ireland and regards it as being essential.

The fundamental point is that we cannot measure our progress, particularly on the protection of ancient woodlands, if we do not have baselines and do not know from where we are starting. Therefore, taking an inventory to establish where we are starting from is critical if this legislation is to have credibility. The Minister has acknowledged that those limitations exist, but the challenge for her is to follow up on her words and commit fully to taking a proper inventory.

Clause 7, to which Mr Elliott also referred, covers incidental powers. In any exercising of those powers, the Bill should contain a very clear sustainability duty.

I welcome the clauses on the felling of trees, but, at this stage, I want to stress three points. First, there should be a presumption against granting a felling licence for ancient woodlands; the bar for granting one should be set extremely high. Secondly, the Forest Service should not be exempt from the need to request a felling licence. As things stand, who is there to police the Forest Service? That is an important and necessary safeguard. Thirdly, I am somewhat sceptical of the need for compensation should a felling licence be refused. We need to shift our priorities from the traditional notion of our economy more towards the protection of the environment. I must again stress that the concept of sustainability means that, as far as I am concerned, the protection of the environment and the economic development of Northern Ireland go hand in hand.

We on these Benches would welcome some stakeholder advisory input on the way forward for the regulation of practice and policy. Although we consider the Bill to be a good start, the opportunity with which we are presented should be seen as a platform on which we can build. I look forward to the Bill's being improved as it goes through its various Stages, and we are happy to support the Bill's Second Stage.

Dr W McCrea: I realise that the Bill is at Second Stage, so we are undertaking a general review rather than going into all the detail.

Although it is true that the Minister has outlined the Department's emphasis in respect of most of the clauses, we need to ensure that those matters that we identify as deficiencies will be gone into in depth during the Bill's Committee Stage. That is, of course, what Committees are engaged to do. The Committee will engage with the Department in seeking to tease out some of those deficiencies, as well as those things that we believe need to be put right.

The explanatory and financial memorandum to the proposed Forestry Bill states that the general duty of the Department is:

"to promote forestry on a wider footing than the traditional primary role of developing afforestation, the supply of timber, and the maintenance of reserves of growing trees."

In addition, the explanatory memorandum states that the Bill:

"places equal importance on protection of the environment and social and recreational use."

I appreciate that that is laid out as a general principle. However, many are concerned that lip service is being paid more than dealing with the issues, because the Bill seems to have more to do with the regulatory powers that are being given to the Department, rather than tackling many of the issues that the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development will, clearly, identify.

It has been emphasised to me that the monetary, health, educational and environmental benefits need to be clearly identified and taken account of. We need not only identify the issues but how we move them forward in a specific way. Many consultees welcome the broad basis of the Bill but are concerned that the commercial production of timber is still, in the Department's eyes, the primary benefit of forestry. I understand that the Woodland Trust made a statement to the Committee emphasising that the primary function should be the promotion of sustainable forest management, and that the social and environmental value of forestry must be accorded equal importance to commercial production. Therefore, the Bill must strike a balance between commercial concerns and all the other issues that we have identified.

I will not go into all the issues today, clause by clause, and I am sure that everyone will be delighted about that. I, as a member of the Committee, will have the opportunity to go through the Bill, clause by clause, during its Committee Stage. However, we have to lay down certain parameters and state clearly that the amount of woodland in Northern Ireland compared with the rest of the United Kingdom or the rest of Europe is unacceptable. It is vital that we ensure real protection for our ancient woodlands, but we must also ensure that we have a process and a specific programme to realise the desire for more tree-planting and more woodland in Northern Ireland.

That aspiration is one thing, but how do we take that forward? The Department desires to double the woodland in Northern Ireland. Yet, until now, all the Department's efforts in that respect have totally failed. Therefore, we must ensure that something is done and a programme is outlined that will take us to that vision. It is important that we protect endangered ancient woodland, and that we not only aspire to have more woodland but establish a programme by which we can achieve that, and measure our progress along the way, because it will take time. If we are going somewhere, we have to see how well we are progressing.

Clause 4 of the Bill is entitled "Use or development of forestry land". Paragraph 4 of the explanatory and financial memorandum states that that clause will provide a power for the Department:

"to develop its land to obtain better value from the public estate — for example to allow for the creation of wind farms or the development of tourist facilities on forestry land."

The Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development received excellent information from the RSPB, the Woodland Trust, Farm Woodlands Ltd and the district councils. We are thankful that those bodies are actively engaged in considering the Bill, and we must keep them engaged. The Committee was told that the Department's powers, as outlined in clause 4, should be subject to planning laws. I want the Minister to consider that to see how the Department will be subject to planning laws.

2.30 pm

Clause 5, which deals with the compulsory acquisition of land, is widely drafted. I am always concerned about giving Departments wide, sweeping powers, because, in the past, I have found that they use such powers and push them to the limit. The Minister will know that the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development always seeks to ensure that the power of the Executive and of Departments is restricted. It seems that any powers that are granted are used very quickly.

Ballymena Borough Council said that landowners should have the right of appeal in regard to that power. When a Department is granted the power of compulsory acquisition of land, people wonder whether they own anything. With such powers, Departments can tell people what to do with their own land, and people find that they do not really own anything and that the Department has more interest in the land than the landowner.

The control of animals in forests is an important aspect of the Bill, and it was drawn to the Committee's attention that the Forest Service has to control the vermin in state forests. Will the Forest Service and the Department be included in legislation to control wild animals and vermin that might attack and undermine forest on their land so that it is not only farmers who have to do so? The Department should lead by example in what it is enforcing on ordinary farmers.

Dr Farry mentioned the felling of trees. I agree that it is important that the Bill should include a presumption against felling in ancient woodlands. We must ensure that we protect the ancient woodlands. If we acknowledge the fact that we have little enough woodland in Northern Ireland and that ancient woodland is part of our heritage, we should do everything in our power to protect it. Clause 14 concerns the requirement for a licence for felling trees, and the Department should also come under that legislation. Protection must be in place not only from unscrupulous persons who would fell trees but to prevent the Department from felling trees for monetary gain.

Farm Woodlands Ltd raised concerns about the possible length of time to process applications for a licence. It also disagreed with the requirement for a management plan for private forestry. If it is right to have a management plan for private forestry, should the Forest Service also be required to have a management plan to fell trees? That is another issue that was raised in response to the Committee's request for the community to make its voice heard.

I am concerned about the proposed unlimited power of entry. I have major concerns about granting that power to the Department. I also have concerns about infringement of adjoining land rights. It must be ensured that the rights of farmers on adjoining land are acknowledged as much as those of the Department.

It ought to be said that much of the Bill is welcome. It takes forward the provisions of the previous Act, which is long out of date. That is important. However, I make a simple appeal to the Department to ensure that, during the passage of the Bill, it continues to engage with people who have a keen interest and who have taken the time to return information to the Committee, including those who represent bodies that I mentioned earlier, such as the Woodland Trust, the RSPB, district councils and Farm Woodlands Ltd. The Committee will do likewise. In the end, we must ensure that the final Bill will take forestry to an advanced stage and, in years to come, will leave a heritage for the next generation of which we can be proud.

Mr Doherty: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I welcome the Second Stage of the Forestry Bill. During the debate, it has been mentioned a few times that it is 56 years since the Forestry Act 1953 was passed. It is slightly younger than me. At that time, forestry was simply a matter of growing trees, cutting and selling them. The Bill is much more expansive than that. Of course, it includes that basic facet of forestry; however, it also covers its potential for tourism, recreation, wind farms and so on. The Bill has a strong environmental and social aspect, which is welcome. However, there will be areas of concern, one of which I will mention. During the past year or so, the Committee, the Minister and the Department have developed a good, solid working relationship whereby we can raise deep concerns with the Department, it will respond, and we end up dealing with those issues. I am sure that we will be able to do that as we progress through Committee and the Bill's various stages.

I want to flag up a particular area of concern so that the Department and the Minister can consider it. Often, forestry is carried out in remote areas where the roads infrastructure is just about sufficient to service local communities and their farming needs. Suddenly — not even every year, as it occurs only now and again — trees are felled and massive, heavy lorries converge on those small country roads. I want the Department to respond to that and potentially to develop a protocol with Roads Service as to how those roads are maintained during such phases and repaired when that work is finished. In those areas, that can cause huge difficulties for local farming communities and rural dwellers in general.

I would like the Minister to deal with that issue in her response to the debate and throughout the Bill's various developments. I am sure that all matters will be dealt with in the thorough manner to which the Committee has recently become accustomed.

Mr Irwin: I welcome the opportunity to comment on the important Bill that is before the House. The previous Member to speak mentioned that the Forestry Act (Northern Ireland) 1953 was passed 56 years ago. That was a long time ago, before my time.

Northern Ireland's forests are a cherished part of the landscape. They provide great amenity space for thousands of people each year. The Province's tourism industry also relies heavily on its various accessible and well-known forest parks. In presenting the Bill, I believe that the Department wants to improve the overall conditions of those forests, which will be to everyone's betterment.

As the Bill shows, the forestry industry is more than just a reserve of timber. As the importance of leisure and amenity space grows, so does the public's use of forest parks. Likewise, as environmental issues gain prominence, the need to maintain forests and increase tree cover becomes more important. Amenity space and facilities are dealt with in clause 3, and the Department could do much more to make greater use of forest parks to the benefit of tourism.

In my district council area, a number of forest park areas have been utilised, such as Gosford forest park in Markethill and Clare Glen, to great effect for caravan owners. However, I ask that there is greater focus, on a Province-wide basis, on improving amenity spaces by making them bigger and by improving the facilities on offer.

I am concerned about the compulsory acquisition of land that is mentioned in clause 5. In my role as a public representative, I have come across vesting issues in which constituents have come to me for advice. One thing is always clear: the vesting of land is a very traumatic experience for landowners who cherish the land that they have worked for many years. Although I acknowledge that the full right of appeal will be available to the landowner in any vesting procedure, I ask that caution be exercised in any attempt to use such powers.

The Bill refers to the traditional function of the development of afforestation. Forest cover in Northern Ireland stands at around 6%. How the Department moves forward to increase forest cover will be complex as the area of suitable land available and the population density are factors in how targets for increasing woodland cover are worked out.

The spread of rural dwellings and the small-in-size-but-large-in-number nature of farm holdings reduce the opportunity for large-scale forestation in Northern Ireland in comparison with our European neighbours. As I have stated in a previous debate, Northern Ireland is a compact land mass in comparison with Great Britain and other EU countries.

The Forest Service is on record as stating that it will be trying to improve opportunities for grant-aided woodland expansion. It is through grant-aided schemes that, I feel, the Forest Service will have the best chance of encouraging landowners to consider tree-planting. However, I do not believe for one moment that doubling the area of woodland is achievable. With an ever-growing population across the world, food is becoming increasingly important, and that may dictate the use of land in future. The situation is changing, and a certain amount of flexibility must be built into the Bill to account for changes in how land is utilised.

I welcome the Bill. However, the Committee will have much to discuss about how the Bill will affect and shape the future of forests in Northern Ireland.

Mr Savage: I broadly support the Bill, which represents the long overdue reform of the Forestry Act (Northern Ireland) 1953. That Act reflects a past priority to establish a strategic reserve of timber and maintain a timber supply in Northern Ireland. For a long time, my party has been calling for elements that are contained in the Bill.

With that in mind, I strongly support those aspects of the Bill that seek to protect the environment and encourage the enjoyment of land by the public. However, I am concerned that, in the Bill, the duty on the Forest Service to sustainably protect native woodland and the biodiversity that it supports is not strong enough. There is a greater need for sustainability criteria in the Bill, and that must be examined in Committee.

In bringing forward the legislation, the Department rightly recognises that forestry is now a complex and multifaceted enterprise, with increasing economic, social and environmental purposes and benefits. The Department endorses the view that the Forest Service needs to move with the times in order to maximise the benefits of the public estate.

I wish to further qualify my support for the Bill by making some observations about items that caused my colleagues and me some concern. From a commercial forestry standpoint, the overarching concern is that the Bill gives too much power to the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development and the Forest Service with no meaningful checks and balances.

Regulatory and compulsory purchasing powers are being acquired, held and exercised by an agency that also owns and operates a monopoly over publicly owned forests. In light of the percentage of forested land that the Forest Service owns and the percentage of timber production that it is involved in, there is a real danger of market implications for the private forestry industry in Northern Ireland.

2.45 pm

From an environmental point of view, the overarching concern is that the Bill does not place a strict enough duty on the Forest Service to protect native ancient woodland and biodiversity or to manage forests in a sustainable manner. Concerns have also been raised about powers that the Department may give to the Forest Service that will allow it to cull any animal on forestry land or adjoining land that poses a threat to forestry. That will exempt the Forest Service from wildlife protection, hunting guidelines and other legislation.

There are many issues that we could talk about, but there is nothing in the Bill to indicate how the Forest Service will double forest cover by 2050. Forest Service policy suggests a development with the private market. However, there are convincing arguments that suggest that current grant schemes will not deliver the required development. That raises a certain level of concern in the long term about the Forest Service's compulsory purchase power. Those matters need considerable examination and resolution during the Bill's various stages. The implementation of appropriate safeguards would have a big impact on the future of the Forest Service.

I support the Bill. I also ask the Forest Service to think seriously about the large amount of open space in high areas of our community, which could play a big part in the production of forestry in Northern Ireland.

Mrs D Kelly: I, too, welcome the opportunity to speak in the debate on the Bill. I had the privilege of being born and reared in Derrymore in the townland of the Montiaghs. The Minister may know that Doire Mór translates as the "big oak tree" and that seven Doires make a Montiagh. Woodland was very much a feature of the landscape and provided many of the names for our local areas and roads, many of which are still used.

Unfortunately, the Plantation of Ulster led to the ravage of Ulster, and much of our woodland was felled and shipped across to England to fuel smelting in the iron furnaces that adorned Stratford-upon-Avon. Therefore, it falls to the Minister to set out a vision and a strategy for the next 50 years to replace some of what we have lost and to go beyond that. The Forestry Bill is welcome, although there are some amendments that should be looked at. In their contributions this afternoon, many Members referred to those amendments.

Mr Dallat: Does the Member agree that people have shown great affection for our trees, even to the point of hugging them? Does she agree that the Forest Service should not have sole responsibility for the targets and that other Departments, particularly the Department of Education, have a major role to play in encouraging our young people to show the same affection for our trees as some of our leaders?

Mrs D Kelly: I agree with the bid that the Member made for the involvement of the Department of Education. I am sure that the Minister will not take the approach of her party president and run about hugging trees and telling people that all will be well. I hope that she will demonstrate her intentions in the Bill.

The Bill must also look at sustainable development and the promotion of biodiversity in state, public and private woodland. It should also encourage the expansion of Northern Ireland's woodland cover in line with the Forest Service's existing commitments. The Minister said that there is a commitment to move from 6% cover to 12% cover. Perhaps she can define what that means in acreage so that we can get an idea of what our base is.

In bringing forward the final legislation, it would also be helpful if the Minister would consider setting up a stakeholder advisory committee, similar to those that exist elsewhere. In that way, the organisations and individuals with expert advice to give and a vision for the future can help to develop sustainable forest management policy, regulation and practice. I would be grateful if the Minister could give us her thoughts on that.

I concur with the Members who talked about the woodland survey and monitoring requirement. That is something that we need to take cognisance of. I come from the Craigavon area, where, to this day, vesting is a very sore point among many whose lands were vested and taken from them, so any vesting powers in the legislation will have to be very sensitively dealt with through very clear guidelines. Land vesting cannot be done on a whim; it has to demonstrate how we are going to improve, whether economically or socially. The other side of the coin is the impact that any such vesting would have on biodiversity and sustainable development.

I support the principle laid out in clause 6, under which research will be carried out in respect of the wider social and economic benefits of forestry. Information gathered should be freely available to all stakeholders. Perhaps the Minister might give some thought to publishing that research on the Department's website, particularly if we want to engage the wider public in the debate on the protection of our woodlands.

It is not good enough that other state agencies, authorities and Departments might be exempt from the requirement to hold a fell licence. That is another amendment that the Minister might wish to consider.

I welcome the fact that the Bill is before us. It is good to see that at least some legislation is coming to the House at the start of the session. I hope that the Minister sets challenging targets for sustainable development because, as many know, we are here for only a very short time, and we have to protect the environment.

Mr Kennedy: We are here for four years.

Mrs D Kelly: Perhaps less in some case, which might be a godsend for some members of the public.

When it comes to sustainable development, we are very much the custodians of the land. We have to take a carrot-and-stick approach. It is all very well to have regulations and prohibition notices, but we must recognise the hard work of farmers and the fact that, over the years, many farmers have been the custodians of our land services. We have to help farmers and other landholders to protect and enhance our environment.

Mr Speaker: I must interrupt proceedings. I ask the House to take its ease until we move into Question Time at 3.00 pm.

The debate stood suspended.

Oral Answers to Questions

Mr Speaker: I remind Members, if they need reminding, that they must continually rise in their place — the word “continually” is important — if they wish to ask a supplementary question.

SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

Housing Executive Grants

1. Ms S Ramsey asked the Minister for Social Development if she has intervened in any cases where people have been turned down for housing renovation and disability grants, and if so, how many were overturned due to her intervention in the South Down constituency in 2008-09. (AQO 31/10)

The Minister for Social Development (Ms Ritchie): The short answer is that I did not intervene in any cases in which people were turned down for private grants in South Down in 2008-09. I am disappointed by the implied suggestion in the question that I might have used ministerial authority to ensure that my South Down constituency was given preferential treatment over others.

Members are aware of the shortfall in the housing budget, which has affected the delivery of certain housing programmes. In particular, the level of funding for home improvements in the private sector is insufficient, and applications for discretionary renovation, replacement and home repairs assistance grants are now unlikely to be approved, save in exceptional circumstances.

The disabled facilities grant scheme is, of course, unaffected. I have received many representations about that scheme, several of which were made by colleagues here, on behalf of constituents. I have also received numerous representations from members of the public about individual applications. I have looked into and responded to each and every one of those representations. I have not, however, intervened in any cases that resulted in the overturning of decisions taken by the Housing Executive. Since it was not necessary for the Housing Executive to refuse or cancel applications that were made in 2008-09, it is a fact that no such enquiries were made to my office during that period, although that was the case subsequently, because of budgetary problems.

I have done my utmost to protect the most vulnerable households by ring-fencing budgets for new social housing to help those who are in housing stress. In fact, the Member may be interested to know that in the past two years, 236 new social housing units have been started in her constituency, costing almost £38 million.

Ms S Ramsey: Go raibh maith agat, Mr Speaker. I thank the Minister for her honest answer, but I do not know why she is disappointed. I am entitled to ask questions in the House when people raise issues with me. The reason I asked the question was to get to the bottom of some of those issues. I am glad that the Minister gave that answer; maybe it will put a lot of rumours to bed. Can the Minister tell me how many decisions were overturned last year and this year?

The Minister for Social Development: I do not have those figures to hand; I will write to the Member with that information. However, bearing in mind the £100 million shortfall in the housing budget this year, it is important that all Members join the campaign, along with the Ministers who represent their parties, to ensure that, once and for all, housing is put on a sound financial footing and that capital receipts are decoupled from the overall housing budget. The Executive inherited that situation from the direct rule Administration, and it must be rectified urgently.

Mr Shannon: The Minister will be aware that people in the neighbouring constituency of Strangford are having difficulties with the disabled facilities grant scheme. Does she know that there is a three-year waiting list for those grants in my constituency? I am sure that she is endeavouring to address that situation. Will she confirm that the concerns of people who are on that list will be addressed, and that there will be a greater emphasis, as she has said before, on making those grants available, and specifically in the Strangford area?

The Minister for Social Development: Disabled facilities grants can be divided into two types: mandatory, which are not affected by the scheme, and concern internal alterations to houses; and discretionary, which are affected because of the £100 million shortfall in the housing budget.

In deciding the housing budget for this year, I was given a certain pot, with which I decided to protect the vulnerable. I am sure that no one in the House would disagree with that. The vulnerable are those who are homeless or in housing stress, hence the protection of money for newbuild; those who are vulnerable because of fuel poverty, hence the protection of funding for the warm homes scheme, and those who are in institutions or in the community and who may not be well. It is important to protect people through the Supporting People programme in order to ensure that they can remain in the community, with the support of family and friends, instead of being admitted to an institution.

The Member raised another fundamental issue, and I urge him to have further discussions with the Minister of Finance and Personnel. I was very grateful for the £20 million capital allocation that was made in June, but that simply deals with what is already in the pipeline. We still need financial assistance to cover the shortfall in order to deal with the people in the pipeline.

I instructed the Housing Executive to ensure that nobody lost his or her place in the queue because of the lack of finance for improvement grants. As soon as money becomes available, those grants will be dealt with: money will flow to them. It is important that housing is put on a sound financial footing so that those problems can be rectified.

Remember, there is not one person in the House or in the community who is responsible for the economic downturn: it has beset us globally. However, the one budget that has been deeply affected by the downturn is the housing budget. That must be rectified as a matter of urgency. The Member's good offices with his Minister for Finance and his ministerial colleagues in the DUP would be greatly appreciated.

Mr P J Bradley: I was also curious about the question about South Down. Now that I have heard Ms Ramsey's contribution, I am doubly confused as to why people with queries about South Down are going to a representative in Belfast.

Will the Minister advise the Assembly on how the Executive can make good the overall shortfall in the housing budget without having to cut expenditure on other services?

The Minister for Social Development: I advise the Member to read the SDLP document 'New Priorities in Difficult Times'. In that document, the party has set out where more money should be spent in areas such as housing, renewable energy and upskilling, as well as stating where the money should come from. It is a unique document and an important contribution to the economic debate. I understand that the Ulster Unionist Party has also published a document highlighting where money should come from.

For my part, I have suggested measures such as the reprofiling of the Housing Executive's debt, the sale and leasing back of assets, and other measures to free up additional funding without necessitating cuts to services. However, such initiatives require the approval of the Department of Finance and Personnel.

Social Housing

2. Mr Lunn asked the Minister for Social Development to outline the anticipated need for newbuild social housing for (i) the remainder of the 2009-2010 financial year; and (ii) the 2010-11 financial year. (AQO 32/10)

The Minister for Social Development: Housing need is a continuum. It would not be very insightful if I were to reply in the context of a single year; the figures must be taken across several years.

The most recent social housing needs assessment by the Housing Executive shows that there is a regional requirement for 3,000 new social housing units each year; that is year-on-year for the foreseeable future. The Executive have been unable to provide that quantum of resources for housing investment. With the budgets available to me, I plan to provide 1,750 new homes this financial year, and 2,000 in the financial year 2010-11.

There have, nonetheless, been significant increases compared to recent years, when an average of only 1,250 houses were started. I have made the increased supply of housing my priority. I will continue to lobby Executive colleagues for additional funding in order to put housing on a firm financial footing once and for all.

Mr Lunn: I thank the Minister for her answer. Indeed, she has anticipated my supplementary question well. Can she advise whether the Housing Executive has funds to purchase lands at Ballymacoss in Lisburn and complete a social housing project for 160 new homes?

Mr Kennedy: Is that in South Down? [Laughter.]

The Minister for Social Development: I am glad that Ballymacoss is not in South Down, but I am aware of the case. Discussions are ongoing, and, when I return to the Department, I will check on the situation between the Department, the Housing Executive and Lisburn Borough Council. I have received representations on the matter from Members of the House and from members of Lisburn Borough Council.

Mr K Robinson: I thank the Minister for her answer. The Minister will recall that, on several occasions, I have asked about social housing projects in Monkstown in my constituency. Can the Minister assure me that those projects are on target despite the budgetary constraints?

The Minister for Social Development: I hope that a fair proportion of houses will be built in various locations throughout Northern Ireland. I say again that I would be very grateful for the support of all Members to ensure that housing is put on a sound financial footing, as that would ensure that we can deliver the best-quality housing to those who deserve it.

Ms J McCann: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. What discussion has the Minister had with the credit union movement regarding the proposal that it brought to the Executive and the Department for Social Development to work alongside her and help to finance the social housing project?

The Minister for Social Development: I thank Ms McCann for her question. I met the credit union movement several months ago and was given detail on its thinking on the matter. The credit union movement subsequently met officials and was advised that it should submit a proposal if it wished to continue with the plan. I understand that no proposal has been forthcoming, although the credit union movement is due to meet Department of Finance and Personnel officials shortly. I want to encourage as much financial innovation in housing as possible. I was surprised by the comments of certain Sinn Féin representatives, which were reported in local newspapers, to the effect that I may have rejected a proposal from the credit union movement. Suffice to say, I welcome all proposals. All proposals will be duly assessed, but we need to receive them first.

Housing Executive Grants

3. Mr Buchanan asked the Minister for Social Development when she proposes to allocate funding to the Housing Executive's grants department to allow applications awaiting approval to be released.

(AQO 33/10)

The Minister for Social Development: I welcomed the Executive's release of £20 million in June, which was made available for social housing in the last monitoring round. Fifteen million pounds has been allocated to private-sector grants and £5 million to disabled adaptations. That additional funding will cover only existing commitments on private-sector grants and limited approvals for grants in cases where exceptional circumstances have arisen in-year. Additional funding is required to cover those grants, and a bid was submitted in the September monitoring round to cover the shortfall. I personally ensured that the Housing Executive held the details on file of people whose grants were cancelled or refused and wrote to them to explain what will happen if additional funding becomes available.

I would like to clear the pipeline of grant applications, because I have great sympathy for all those who find themselves in such difficulties; indeed, I would like to reopen the grant scheme to new applications. However, a significant injection of additional funds is required to do that. We will be debating the issue, presumably in less than an hour, and I look forward to the Member's contribution.

3.15 pm

Mr Buchanan: First, I must tell the Minister that, unfortunately, I will not be present for the debate on home improvement grants, because I have another meeting to attend.

I welcome the fact that disabled facilities grants have been ring-fenced. I have heard the Minister say much about social housing. The Housing Executive has identified houses that are eligible for grants for replacement dwellings, but they are sitting in the system now and cannot be progressed. Does she not agree that such houses form part of social housing? As far as I am concerned, they do. She, however, is not investing the money to allow the grants to be released and the replacement dwellings progressed.

The Minister for Social Development: Mr Buchanan and I discussed that subject yesterday in the corridor. He makes a fair point, and I have great sympathy for people who find themselves in that predicament having applied for grants for improvement, home-repairs assistance or renovation. However, my point is that the shortfall of £100 million in the housing budget means that my Department can deal only with its existing commitments. I need the support of all Members, and I suggest that Mr Buchanan have a word with his colleague the Minister of Finance and Personnel and other DUP Ministers about putting housing on a sound financial footing.

Given that we are talking about that subject, I must mention that I have seen documentation that was republished yesterday. It suggested that I diverted funding from grants to the social housing development programme. I put on record that that is totally untrue. All I did was protect the vulnerable in Northern Ireland. Would the House not expect me to do so?

Ms Anderson: Go raibh míle maith agat. I thank the Minister for her answer. Perhaps she will clarify something for me. I thought that, when answering question 1, the Minister said that she had instructed her Department to ensure that no one waiting for home improvements or adaptation should lose his or her place in the queue. However, when responding to Tom Buchanan, she outlined a criterion of exceptional circumstances. I raise the point specifically because I speak as an elected representative who has been inundated with queries from constituents. By vulnerable people, I mean elderly, and particularly disabled, residents whose applications for vital home improvements and adaptations have been refused or suspended.

Certain people, whose applications were originally approved, subsequently spent a considerable amount of money on planning applications and surveys, only to be told that the process had been suspended. I am not sure whether those people now satisfy that criterion of exceptional circumstances. Alternatively, are they still on the waiting list? If so, will they keep their place on that list?

The Minister for Social Development: Ms Anderson's question contains two separate issues. First, exceptional circumstances relate to the level of a property's structural disrepair. If the Member, as a public representative, tells the Housing Executive that she believes that a level of structural disrepair in a particular property has been previously disregarded by a Housing Executive inspector, that house can be reassessed and a recommendation made to the committee that deals with the criterion of exceptional circumstances.

The second part of the Member's question relates to all those who have been sent letters stating that their applications cannot be dealt with at present because of the lack of financial assistance. To be honest, having realised that those letters were slightly harsh, I instructed the Housing Executive to ensure that no one lost his or her place in the queue. Why did I do that? I did it to ensure that, when the money becomes available, those people will not lose their place in the queue and that the money will flow to them as it should have done originally.

However, we come back to the very kernel of the debate: everybody in this House, particularly those who have Ministers who sit round the Executive table with me, should ensure that they support me in my quest to have housing put on a sound financial footing. I have no doubt that that would enable all our constituents and all the people of Northern Ireland to be dealt with in a fair and equitable manner, and for them to have access to a good standard of housing.

Mr McGlone: I thank the Minister for her response. There have been a number of cases in which people have been left out of pocket — I think that that is what Ms Anderson referred to earlier — because they have had to commission a structural engineer, in cases where there is a replacement dwelling, or an architect. What measures are in place to compensate those people for that out-of-pocket expenditure that they necessarily incurred as part of their application process?

The Minister for Social Development: I thank Mr McGlone for his question. I am very clear about this. I understand that quite a number of people have been left out of pocket because of their grant applications. That means people who have had to use architects, consulting engineers and various other types of consultants in order get their application for grant aid processed. Coupled with that is the application for planning permission for the replacement house.

I want to help those people. As a result, I have asked my officials to look again at that particular issue because the current statutory provision that enables the Housing Executive to recompense expenses that are incurred by applicants is quite specific, in that such fees are only recoverable if the grant is approved and the works are satisfactorily completed. I realised that there was a little problem that we needed to address, so I asked my officials to have a look at the issue. It may be possible to provide help for some applicants who have reached the latter stages of the grant-approval process and whose grant would have been approved had money been available in relation to the costs that they have incurred directly as a result of advancing their application, such as fees for architects, planning consultants or civil engineers.

However, the proposition requires more work before the scheme can be launched. I am working on it, because there are certain details that I have yet to finalise with officials, but I will be happy to come back to the Member when that is fully completed.

Warm Homes Scheme

4. Mr Armstrong asked the Minister for Social Development for her assessment of the effectiveness of the warm homes scheme in the current financial year.
(AQO 34/10)

The Minister for Social Development: The warm homes scheme is my Department's main programme in tackling fuel poverty, and I remain committed to alleviating fuel poverty in Northern Ireland. As the Member knows, the scheme has been extremely successful and hugely popular. Since 2001, we have spent over £118 million on the warm homes scheme, making over 71,000 homes warmer. The scheme was subject to a Northern Ireland Audit Office review and a subsequent Public Accounts Committee hearing. Following a series of recommendations, which I welcomed, changes were made to ensure that money was targeted at those people who were most in need of help to improve the energy efficiency of their homes.

Following a competitive tendering process, the new warm homes scheme contract was awarded on 1 July; H & A Mechanical Services Limited and Bryson Charitable Group are the new scheme managers. I am pleased to say that, for the first time, young families who are in receipt of working tax credit can now benefit from improvements to the heating systems in their homes. I encourage Members to advise them to contact the new scheme managers. People who are over 60 can also benefit from the scheme. I encourage Members to advise their older constituents to apply to the scheme.

Despite enormous budgetary pressures, I have increased this year's warm homes scheme budget to £20.5 million, and I have set a public service agreement target in this financial year of 10,000 homes to be assisted by the scheme. I expect that target to be met.

Mr Armstrong: Is the Minister content with the progress that her Department has made in meeting the fuel poverty commitment that is in the Programme for Government?

The Minister for Social Development: My Department, with the Housing Executive and the other stakeholders that are involved, has done a sterling job. What would have been the case if we had not implemented a warm homes scheme? What would have been the case if we had not issued 167,000 households with a fuel poverty payment earlier this year? What would have been the case if I had been unable to enable last year's increase in the winter fuel payment from £25 to £100? Hopefully, I will be able to do that this year. Therefore, we are addressing fuel poverty, and I hope that I will be able to address energy efficiency in all the homes in question as a result of the revised warm homes scheme.

Mr Molloy: Thank you, a Cheann Comhairle. Do applicants who applied and were knocked back under the Eaga scheme have to reapply now? Will the new applications cover new central heating systems in new projects?

The Minister for Social Development: I assure Mr Molloy that those who have applied already to Eaga will not have to reapply, because the two scheme managers have been told that they must address what is in the pipeline. They are contacting everybody who is on the waiting list, and I have been told to expect that that will be completed by the end of November. Naturally, I hope that it will be done much earlier, and I will urge the managers to do so.

The second part of Mr Molloy's question goes back to the fundamental issue, which is why the Department revised the scheme. Heating replacements will not be dealt with under this scheme. We want to ensure that all houses, particularly those without central heating, can access such heating. If the Member has a specific issue to address, he may like to pass it to me for investigation.

Mr Gallagher: I commend the Minister and her Department for locating one of the warm homes scheme provider's offices in Enniskillen, a town in the constituency and the county that has by far the greatest level of unfitness. However, as we all know, when all these schemes are done, we will still have people who face fuel poverty. Does the Minister foresee anything more that can be done about that poverty?

The Minister for Social Development: More can be done. Mr Gallagher's question follows on from that of Mr Armstrong. The Department also funds a substantial investment in heating replacement schemes in the public housing stock.

The Housing Executive has invested heavily in the energy efficiency of its stock, including a substantial programme of conversion to natural gas. I would like to see all public housing stock converted to cleaner, more efficient natural gas where it is available, and I support the extension of the gas network to more parts of Northern Ireland. I am conscious that there will be an Adjournment debate on that issue this afternoon.

Fuel poverty is not about energy costs alone; it is also about low incomes. Alongside the warm homes scheme and heating replacement programmes, one of the Department for Social Development's key priorities is to maximise household incomes through the benefit uptake campaign, which aims to help people to claim their benefit entitlement. The current annual campaign, about which Members were notified, started on 17 August 2009.

As I informed Mr Armstrong in my answer to his question, my Department also administers the winter fuel payment that everybody aged 60 or over is entitled to receive. That will help elderly people to meet energy costs during the winter months.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE BUSINESS

Forestry Bill

Second Stage

Debate resumed on motion:

That the Second Stage of the Forestry Bill [NIA 11/08] be agreed. — [The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development (Ms Gildernew).]

Mr Shannon: I support the motion, but I also wish to raise some issues. In particular, although I welcome many provisions in the Forestry Bill, I want the Minister to take on board the fact that other aspects of it give me serious cause for concern.

The Forest Service recognises that the demand for forest use is changing, but it is silent on all matters relating to shooting and, particularly, deer stalking, despite significant reference having been made to the service's desire to acquire additional powers for itself in that regard in its strategy for sustainability and growth.

Aa the minnit the Forest Service dales wi' the shuitin community es yin o' hits uiser curns bae gien oot permits fer gaime shuitin an' control o' vermin, sae the fect at thair isnae onie mention o' shuitin ir deer stalkin' i this consultation bes raire. The Service hasnae yet seen the fu' extent, importance an' validity o' recreational sportin' shuitin' an' the parallel roul fer recreational deer stalkers i' the management o' plaintins an' the bag sportin' tourism earnins at ir bein' loast.

Independent research bae consultants, PACEC, has shewn at sportin' shuitin pits mair nor £45 million intae the Norlin Airlan economy ivry yeir an hefts 2,100 fu' tim' equivalent joabs. Forebye thon the shuitin community i Norlin Airlan spens £10 million oan conservation waark ivry yeir an' hes owresicht influence oan 990,000 hectares aroun' the Province. Oan account o' thon A wud ax the Meenester fer wie she hasnae yet tuk thon intae account.

The Forest Service currently engages with the shooting community, as one of its user groups, through the issuance of permits for game shooting and vermin control, so the absence of any mention of shooting or deer stalking in the consultation that took place on the Bill is surprising. The service has clearly not recognised the full extent, importance and validity of recreational sporting shooting, the parallel role for recreational deer stalkers in forest management and the substantial sporting tourism revenue that is being lost.

Independent research by consultants at PACEC identified that sporting shooting contributes more than £45 million annually to the Northern Ireland economy, sustaining some 2,100 full-time equivalent jobs. The shooting community in Northern Ireland also spends £10 million a year on conservation work and has management influence on 990,000 hectares around the Province. Therefore, I ask the Minister why she has not yet taken that into account.

Among the main concerns that exist is a proposal for Forest Service staff, possibly including those non-staff to whom they delegate powers, which is a worrying point, to be authorised to go on to all land that is adjacent to forestry — not just the Forest Service's land alone but all privately owned woodland — to shoot deer. The Forest Service has confirmed its intention to double woodland and forestry in the Province from the current level of 6% to 12%, as well as confirming that the increase will largely be delivered by private owners. I welcome that fact, because it is good news, and, in a small way, I am playing my part, because we have planted 2,500 trees, so we are doing our wee bit to try to make that target achievable. However, the problem is that the Forest Service wants powers to allow its rangers to go on to private land that is adjacent to private forestry to shoot deer. Staff are to be able to shoot deer day or night, 365 days a year, and they are to be exempt from the provisions of the proposed new wildlife Order and the game Acts.

I want to look at things through the end of a scope — not through the end of a barrel — at a Forest Service that is trying to control shooting rights on its land. I suggest that, if one can be both, it is probably poacher and gamekeeper at the same time, and that concerns me.

When speaking to my colleague Lord Morrow beforehand, I was reminded of a saying in a magazine that he and I both read, 'Shooting Times', which states that the wildlife of today is not ours to dispose of as we please; rather, we hold it in care for those who come after. Therefore, Mr Speaker, it is important that the Forestry Bill ensure that wildlife be protected, as should be landowners with land close to Forestry Service land.

The Forestry Commission wants to be able to cull deer that might cause damage, not just those that are actively causing damage, and to recover the cost of such deer culling on private land — supposedly for the benefit of other private woodland owners — from the owners of the adjacent land. That is outrageous. Indeed, the commission wants the adjacent landowners to pay for it as well.

Access to sporting shooting and deer stalking should be given equal status with other sports and forest uses, and there should be formalised engagement with the representative bodies for deer stalking and shooting sports. The Chairperson of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development, Mr Ian Paisley Jnr, commented earlier on recreational shooting and tourism. There is potential to be realised.

In recommending the partnership solution, the British Association for Shooting and Conservation (BASC) proposed that the Forest Service join with the voluntary sector and other relevant bodies in a deer forum. I suggest to the Minister that that is, perhaps, a way of addressing the issue so that that opportunity can be extended, the voluntary sector can play a role in further deer management, and the Forest Service can reduce its overheads and direct commitments. That seems sensible, and I ask the Minister to take it into account in her response.

Roger Pollen of the BASC informed me that the association welcomes the principle of equality and access. If the process is to be equality-proofed, which according to the legislation it is, we must have equality for everyone. At present, we do not have equality for deer shooters and country sports enthusiasts. It has to be genuine and inclusive.

The omission of shooting and deer stalking from the terms of reference of the consultation causes widespread concern about the commitment to genuine access and equality. To date, access for deer stalking has been restricted to members of the Forest Service to the exclusion of the public, even though the equivalent services in the rest of the UK allow extensive public access for deer stalking. Thus, the current approach in Northern Ireland is suppressing public value on at least three levels.

It is limiting tourism potential. There are places in the Province to which people come from across the water — from Germany, Denmark, France and Belgium — to shoot deer. Why do we not use that potential to create tourism and put the money back into the borough? The current approach is denying equality of access to the shooting community; it is failing to reduce public-sector costs; and it is failing to gain income from the public purse. The potential exists; let us realise it. The consultation recognises increasing afforestation, with associated challenges and opportunities, yet makes no reference to necessary deer management or to sharing the forest with the shooting community.

To answer the question, I do not believe that charging is a significant barrier to participation; in fact, charging for deer stalking could produce significant revenues. Money could be put back into the economy, the Forestry Commission and the system. Access to the forest for shooting is already closely regulated. Therefore, extending access to deer stalking should present no significant challenges but should be undertaken to ensure fair opportunity.

There are recreational and social benefits to be derived from engaging with the shooting community. Those benefits, when applied to deer stalking, must not be underestimated. Thus, in asking whether the main opportunities have been identified — a question that the Minister and the Forestry Commission asked through the Forestry Bill — it is clear that a huge opportunity has not been identified: deer stalking. It has been entirely overlooked as a local demand and a tourism resource. It is a sure money earner. I am sure that the Minister will not pass on exploiting that potential.

Scotland, for example, and other parts of the UK have embraced those opportunities with the establishment of publicly funded posts to promote country sports tourism. The data revealed in the PACEC report show the current value of shooting to the Northern Ireland economy, but there is further potential to be realised, and the Forest Service has a role to play in its development. When considering that sporting shooting provides an excellent off-season tourism opportunity, it is clear that there is scope for promoting it as a separate marketing strand. Partnership with the main representative bodies, noted in my introduction, could ensure effective marketing of that opportunity. Do it right and take full value of what is there.

I have, as have, perhaps, the Minister and other Members, been contacted by landowners of adjacent properties who are concerned that clause 30(4) gives a blanket public right to access on foot to all forestry land for the purpose of recreation. As the definition of forestry land is land that is owned by the Department, that does not mean land that is privately owned. However, there is concern that there will be cases of “right to roam”, as has happened in Scotland and other parts of the UK. If any forestry or Department land has shooting rights attached to it that belong to someone else, there is a possibility that those rights will be interfered with. It is important that we have protection for the landowners of adjacent land and that we have a system that does not encroach upon that.

There is also concern that clause 31, which allows a power of entry to any land and which seems to be in reference to the felling of trees, will give rise to the need for private landowners to have a felling licence for felling their trees. Such a licence will only be issued with a management plan, and that puts the landowners under more unwarranted strain. The decision to fell trees that are not protected is a decision for the owner, not the forestry division. Moreover, clause 14 issues a blanket ban, which, I believe, cannot and should not be enforced on private landowners and which could be construed as the Department having control of private woodlands and, subsequently, as a nationalisation proposal. Therefore there is a question mark over where this is going. It is feared that this is the compulsory acquisition of land, and that leaves the Department in complete control at a time when it is underfunded and, in some cases, ill-equipped to be so, regardless of whether it is fair to landowners. Where is the fairness for the landowners in that process? They are the people for whom I am fighting the bit today.

Those are the concerns that the Minister must address directly in order to assure us that that is not the purpose of those clauses of the Bill, as it would be grossly unfair if those concerns were found to be justified. The Minister will respond to us on that. I ask the Minister to put those concerns to rest and to qualify and quantify the issues.

I welcome the concept of better access to the public forest, as will many in the Chamber, but the Bill must also represent genuine equality of opportunity. The shooting community should not and must not be ignored and omitted from this process any longer, and neither can the private landowners have their management rights to their own land taken from them. That has to be addressed as well.

The Bill will come back to the Committee, and the Committee members will have a chance to look at those issues, but I ask the Minister to take my comments on board. They are serious, genuine and honest comments. I represent a large number of people in the Province, as do many Members, who will be affected disproportionately by the legislation if it goes the wrong way.

Mr Kinahan: I congratulate the Minister and her Department for the work that has been done on the Bill, and I thank the Department for meeting us in the summer. I also thank the consultees who responded. A great deal of useful information was provided, much of which Members will have heard before.

Since I am not a member of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development, Members might be wondering why I am speaking in this debate, but many people rang me this summer and asked me to get involved. As my colleague Tom Elliott has done, I must declare an interest; I am the owner of some five acres of woodland that are as old as I am — about 50 years young.

There is an imbalance in the objectives of the Bill. There is too much power placed in the Department's hands with not enough checks and balances, and there are many areas that need clarification. We need the stakeholder advisory committee, which many Members have mentioned. I am not going to go into every matter, despite the ream of paper that I have in front of me. There is an imbalance in the Bill's objectives. It promotes forestry and develops forestation, primarily in line with its wish to supply trees and timber.

However, we need to improve the balance; it needs to protect the environment and encourage the enjoyment of the forests. It should balance the supplying of trees and timbers with economic, social, environmental and recreational uses.

Forestry is a long-term business. I agree with the need to double the amount of land that we have in forestry from 6% to 12%, but we need to be careful about how we do it. The Bill is definitely a step in the right direction.

3.45 pm

In the long term, we do not know what is in store for us. Global warming, whether our fault or not, a population explosion, and the loss of good farmland worldwide mean that we may have to grow more, but we must also educate more, and the use of woodland is essential in that. At the same time, we must respect private landowners and their pastimes. We need an independent forestry body that has teeth and that will be listened to rather than just be consulted.

On the matter of too much power: reading the text shows that the Department wants to acquire land by agreement; erect such buildings and execute such other works on forestry land as it considers necessary; provide facilities on the land that it considers desirable, and compulsorily acquire any land it requires in order to perform any function under the Bill. The Department also wants to act in its role as the occupier of the land and be able to kill, cull or destroy any wild animals on that land, or on adjoining land; impose reasonable fees or other charges as it may prescribe; make by-laws for the preservation of trees or timber on forestry land and prohibit or regulate any act that may injure or deform forestry land. If one adds powers of entry to the land; the need for permission to fell trees, and the power to set fees, one will realise that the Department is seeking extremely strong powers, which I do not think it requires.

I know that the Bill is a wish list, or probably more of an intend-to-have list. I also know that the Department would not use all of those powers unless it had to do so. However, we must take great care. If one takes all of the powers contained in the Bill together, the Department could flatten a forest or woodland and build a housing estate; it could buy anyone out, and it could control the market and the value of the land. The Department could also kill any animals and pests when it feels it needs to do so; and, as I have said before, it could set fees and charges, whether farmers or others could afford them.

I know that the Department will only use the powers in the Bill in exceptional cases. However, the Assembly must ensure that the proper checks and balances are in the Bill.

Many points require more clarification and a bit more thought, such as the Department being subject to planning law at all times. Charges and fees must be discussed in detail and, like planning fees, must be passed by the Assembly, if they are required at all. Moreover, the Department, or Forest Service, owns 80% or more of the trees, so why make the small, possible powerless, private sector pay? There will be little in return, and it is not fair to ask that sector to pay if the Forest Service does not.

Who will decide whether animals are doing enough damage to merit a cull, and who will ensure that breeding cycles, animal welfare and every other factor is considered? Who will decide when the Department can go onto someone else's land to cull or clear threatening crops?

Rights of appeal are set out in the Bill, but the time frame for appeals also concerns me. We must have a really dynamic and fast appeals system. The present system in the Department is incredibly slow, as are other matters, and improvement will require much more resources. We are meant to be considering cut backs.

As regards some specific items in the Bill: the Department wants felling licences to be applied for, which will give total control for trees in woodlands over 0.2 hectares, trees over 10cm thick, and in areas where there is 5cu m of timber. That is good thinking, but it is also very dangerous. Why does the provision not include all trees in all areas? That would stop developers felling trees at weekends. Indeed, perhaps we should examine a retrospective law on that point so that they do not start doing it tomorrow.

I want all trees between 100 and 150 years old to be protected. On two or three occasions today, the term "ancient woodland" has been mentioned, but I wonder how many Members know that that means trees that are pre-1600, which accounts for very few of the trees in Northern Ireland. We should increase that to 100 or 150 years old.

The proposed licensing is in line with mainland legislation and seems sensible. However, it should be in the form of a licence that is linked to a plan of over five years, in which the private forestry farmer is free to fell within his licence whenever timber is needed by the market. The Forest Service must also be required to get a licence. If trees are being planted and managed according to the UK Woodlands Assurance Standard, which is sustainable, they should be exempt; perhaps other areas should also be exempt.

With regard to access, clause 30 states:

"the public shall have right of access on foot to all forestry land for the purposes of recreation."

It has already been clarified that that means forestry land only, and I am grateful for that.

Members of country sports clubs and other users also have major concerns about the Bill. In Tardree forest, which is in my locality, we have game shooting, horse riding, quad bikes, cross-country bicycling, ramblers and one or two more unsavoury uses. We need the balance of a central body, probably a voluntary body, to manage that. We need to respect the rights of all and consult and work with all users. We need an independent advisory body.

There is conflict among the people who use the Belfast hills, where opening up the land means that farmers have problems with insurance. There has been damage to fences, cattle have been let out — or let in — and many other things.

The Bill seeks the power to cull pests, and that seems reasonable. However, who knows best? We need an advisory panel for checks and balances.

When trees are being felled, it is a dangerous situation. When the trees are young, there is the risk of fire; when the trees are being felled, there is even more danger. Advice will be needed when the by-laws are being drawn up.

Mr Shannon: Does the Member agree that a forum could be used as one method for reaching agreement? I suggested a deer forum, but there could be a forum that would include all the other bodies.

Mr Kinahan: I agree entirely; whether it is one forum or a group of different bodies, advice is always needed.

With regard to sporting bodies, shooting rights exist on private and departmental land. The BASC states that the value of sports to our economy is worth £45 million, and some 2,100 full-time jobs rely on it; Members have already heard those figures. That is evident at game fairs and country shows throughout Northern Ireland. Those rights should not be compulsory on the Department, but they will need to be discussed with the groups.

The power to cull all animals includes the wish to enter forestry land and adjoining land to cull animals. That is against the present gun and wildlife laws. That should be done only through an independent body, by agreement and within the law.

To conclude — Members will be pleased as I have been going on for too long — there is the possibility of too much power without enough checks and balances. We need an advisory body that will include wildlife groups, biodiversity groups, timber groups, countryside groups, sports groups and many others. There are many points that I have not addressed, but I welcome the need for an inventory. We do not want compulsory purchase, other than for access. The Committee has much to do, and UUP Members look forward to being able to help it.

Mr B Wilson: Like other Members, I support the proposed legislation. However, it must be strengthened in a number of ways.

The importance of woods and trees to our environment has never been more apparent than it is today. They are essential for climate regulation; for the flow and quality of water; for mitigation of air pollution; for soil conservation; for storing carbon; and for our society to adapt to climate change. They also encourage exercise, improve physical health and reduce mental stress.

As other Members have pointed out, Northern Ireland has fewer trees and less woodland than almost any other country in Europe. Woodland accounts for a mere 6% of our land, compared with the European average of 44%. Even the UK and the Republic are better, with 12% and 10% woodland cover respectively.

It is even worse if we consider ancient woodland. Of the 6% woodland cover, only 0.08% is ancient woodland. Indeed, since felling licences were abolished in the 1960s, 273 of Northern Ireland's ancient woods have been lost to felling. We have failed to protect our woodlands and are now paying the price.

Those statistics give cause for alarm, because ancient woods are our equivalent of the rainforest. They are rich in wildlife, and one of the foundations upon which we can restore our natural environment. The Bill, although belated, is welcome. However, as it stands, it does not give adequate protection to ancient woods. The general duty of the Department should be amended to ensure that both DARD and its agencies are able to deliver on all the benefits accruing from native woodland and the biodiversity that it supports. Protecting native and ancient woods should be part of the Department's general duty.

The clause must include a clear definition of sustainability, a term generally understood as referring to development that meets the needs of the present without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs. By ensconcing sustainable forestry at the heart of the Bill, the Minister can ensure that forestry practice encompasses environmental and social issues as well as continuing to recognise the need for commercial harvesting.

In the Bill's current form, the definition of forestry land is limited to:

“any land held by the Department for the purposes of any of its functions under this Act”.

That is incompatible with the challenges on the ground, because some of the most beautiful ancient and native woods are not owned by the Forest Service. DARD and the Forest Service should therefore have a responsibility to advise and assist landowners in the public, private and charitable sectors on how best to manage their woods, should that help be required. The Bill should be strengthened to take that into account.

In light of the loss of ancient and native woods, I welcome the fact that the Bill proposes to reintroduce the requirement for felling licences. In fact, I have raised the need for tree-felling licences in the Assembly on a number of occasions. They are required in the UK, and throughout most of Europe, but were abolished in Northern Ireland in the late 1960s. I have no doubt that the abolition of felling licences played a major part in the destruction of our woodlands over the past 50 years.

It is also disappointing that the new felling regime outlined in part 3 of the Bill fails to explicitly mention ancient woods. A number of other Members have referred to that. In practice, that means that ancient woods will not be afforded any additional protection, and they are still under threat from clear felling. I support Dr Farry and Dr McCrea in asking the Minister to insert a new clause in the Bill that offers a presumption against granting a felling licence in respect of all woods identified on the ancient woodland inventory. That inventory was completed by the Woodland Trust in 2006, and is based on sound research and field survey. It identifies all recognised areas of ancient woodland in Northern Ireland, and is used by the Planning Service as a material consideration in all planning applications.

As I previously mentioned, ancient woodland covers only 0.08% of our landscape, and its protection would not place an onerous duty on either Departments or landowners. Indeed, by including such a new clause in the Bill, the Minister would be able to reassure the Assembly that ancient woods will be appropriately protected, both now and for future generations.

I am also concerned about clause 16 of the Bill, which authorises DARD to pay compensation to an applicant should they be refused a felling licence. In my view, there is absolutely no justification for that compensation, as public money should not be paid for simply obeying the law. If public money is used in that way, it would have a detrimental effect on other Executive commitments, such as the doubling of woodland cover and adapting to climate change. In fact, if the clause were introduced, it might actually deter DARD or the Forest Service from refusing a felling licence, even if there are valid environmental grounds for doing so. I ask the Minister to remove that clause from the Bill.

4.00 pm

I am also concerned that the land owned by Government Departments is exempt from felling licences. As that land accounts for 70% of the total forest area, it is necessary to reconsider that provision.

In the coming weeks, the Assembly will have an invaluable opportunity to shape forestry legislation to ensure that it provides a framework for meeting the challenges of the twenty-first century. With that in mind, the Bill needs to be strengthened to offer greater protection to ancient woods. That is achievable by amending both the general duty on the Department and the proposed felling licence regime and by removing the clause providing compensation to developers refused felling licences. I support the Bill.

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development (Ms Gildernew): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Second Stage Forestry Bill: part three. I appreciate the indulgence of the Speaker and Members; I know that this debate has been a wee bit disjointed. I also appreciate the nature of the debate, in which all involved have been very good humoured. There is cognisance of the fact that the Assembly's primary purpose is to legislate, and it is a good sign that this legislation has had its Second Stage on the second day of the new session. I hope for similar indulgence from the Assembly on other legislation that I plan to bring forward over the coming months.

As many Members have pointed out, the current forestry legislation is 56 years old. From that point of view, although Members have challenged my Department on the vagueness of parts of the Bill or have said that there are not enough specifics in it, our hope is that this Bill is written in such a way that it is fit for purpose and lasts into the future. I hope that it will not be another half century before new forestry legislation is passed, but certainly the legislation needs to be vague enough to cover issues that we do not foresee today but that may be important in five, 10, or 15 years. Therefore, the detail on a lot of the issues involved will come in subordinate legislation, and the Committee and stakeholders will have ample opportunity to contribute to that subordinate legislation and to help us to get it right.

I will now go through Members' contributions. I apologise in advance if I do not cover everything, but I will refer to the Hansard report and follow up on any questions that have been put to me and that I have been unable to answer.

The first contribution was from the Chairperson of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development, Ian Paisley Jnr. He challenged us on the recreation aspects of the Bill and argued that what we do needs to become more widely encompassing. I agree with him fully; I have made recreation and getting people into forests a ministerial priority, and my Department has recently published a strategy to bring that about. Through this Bill, I am determined to have a more balanced arrangement between timber production and the use of our forests for recreation and leisure. In establishing that, I have responded to the views of stakeholders and reflected my own view that we must increase our recreational provision. However, I am very happy to work with the Committee to ensure that we get it right and that there is a proper regional balance in leisure provision.

Some of the recreation and leisure facilities that we already provide include woodland walks, cycling and recreational shooting. Earlier this year, I announced that the Forest Service had appointed an operator to deliver high-trees adventure facilities in Tollymore Forest Park, and hopefully that will open next Easter. A lot is being done, but I agree: we need to do an awful lot more, and we will want to do that in the time ahead.

Willie Clarke alluded strongly to the tourism aspect and to getting the balance right. He talked about log cabins and the recreational use of forests and made a local plug for south Down. We see a lot of potential in south Down, but in areas such as the Sperrins there is also potential to develop recreational pursuits in Forest Service areas. Willie also talked about native woodland, which was certainly a theme throughout this afternoon's debate. A lot of people were concerned about the need to protect our native and ancient woodlands.

Tom Elliott described a modest area of forestry; I would love to know what he means by "modest". He asked for a clarification of what constitutes ancient woodland. "Ancient", as I believe Brian pointed out, means that a woodland dates from the 1600s onwards, and "long-established" means that it dates from the 1830s onwards. Members are right: we absolutely do not have enough of our ancient and long-established woodlands protected. They are a valuable resource, and I do not mean from the point of view of cutting them down. The uniqueness of the flora and fauna in those long-established and native woodlands is something that we are all very proud of.

Tom also asked whether short-rotation coppice could be categorised as trees. Short-rotation coppice refers primarily to willow, but there are other woodland short-rotation systems. A native tree that might be used in short rotation is ash, and eucalyptus can also be used. Therefore, short rotation applies to not just willow. Willow is from the same family as sally and, obviously, is a tree. There is now a use for willow, as Mr Elliott will know, because companies such as Balcas are turning it into woodchip and pellets and providing alternative and renewable energy sources.

We have to be pragmatic and ensure that we are increasing our forestry cover, and we will not do that with just broadleaf or native species. There must be a mix to ensure that we get the coverage that we are aspiring to. Members said that that is not achievable, and it might not be. However, I will give it my best shot and do everything that I can to double the rate of our forestry cover because, as many Members pointed out, 6% coverage is not good enough. It will be a difficult target to achieve, but I will do everything that is in my power to do that.

Tom Elliott also spoke about the disposal of forestry land. I can see why that question came up, but, under the 1953 Act, the Department has the power to sell any land that has been acquired for forestry, and it does so from time to time when the land is not required. However, any disposal of land will be considered carefully and in the context of our strategic aim to double forest cover. Therefore, there might be times when we want to dispose of some land in order to buy more to give us, for example, more scope, but there are reasons for that.

Again, like many other Members, Mr Elliott, the Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development, talked about the wide range of powers that the Department is seeking to introduce through the Bill. Compulsory purchase powers will be used sparingly under existing, well-established government compulsory purchase arrangements. They are intended, principally, to enable access to land-locked timber resources that have been created at public expense. There might be other circumstances in which land might be required; for example, to enable access for recreation or tourism initiatives. That is why that provision has been widely drafted.

In the current economic climate, which I do not foresee changing radically over the next period, we do not have the money to buy land to put into forestry. I would love it if we had, but we do not. Therefore, I see compulsory purchase powers being used very little. In fact, the Bill will be going before the Committee for scrutiny. It is more a case of, perhaps, buying a corner of a field or something in order to get access to timber that is mature and that has a value to the public purse. Believe me, however, this is not about buying up swathes of land and putting it into forestry production; the resources for that are simply not there.

Mr Elliott also spoke about clause 7, which deals with incidental powers. That issue came up in the debate time and time again, and Dr McCrea also made significant mention of it.

That clause allows engagement in partnerships or participation in a body corporate for the general functions that are carried out by the Forest Service, which could relate to future recreational or renewable energy initiatives. The Forestry Commission in England and Wales has such powers under the Forestry Act 1967. The power is intended not to be additional to the general duty but to supplement it. I am loath to give swingeing powers to anyone without checks and balances. We want those powers to be used responsibly, and that will be dealt with in Committee. We want the Committee to have its role in scrutinising the Bill.

Mr Elliott also raised the need for the Department to have felling licences. I assure Members that the Department is bound by fairly stringent standards such as the UK Woodland Assurance Standard and the Forest Stewardship Council. The Forest Service is audited annually on the standards that we have to comply with. We are more than happy to be part of that and for robust standards to be in place. We have a duty to enhance tree cover; it is not in the Department's interest to chop down trees. Where there is a commercial aspect, we will reinvigorate it, and where trees are harvested, they will be replanted.

Fairly stringent standards already apply to the Department, and if it were to be regulated through felling licences, as some Members have suggested, it would lead to duplication and unnecessary bureaucracy. The Department would have to apply to the Department, and we all require Departments to make best use of their resources and not carry out unnecessary work. That work certainly would be unnecessary, given the standards that already apply to the Forest Service in its duty of care. If necessary, Mr Elliott can come back to me on any of those issues.

Stephen Farry had much to say on the need for increased cover. I fully acknowledge that our cover is not good enough, and I am committed to forest expansion. That is one of the Forest Service's key policy objectives, but, as a policy issue, it does not require a statutory position. Mr Farry also talked about climate change contribution, and he acknowledged the importance of the role that forestry can play. I fully concur with that. Our contribution to that will be within the context of the forestry standard and associated climate guidance. I noted Mr Farry's comments on clauses 4, 6 and 7 and on other points. I am happy to reflect on those and take his views forward on the matter.

Dr McCrea talked about the use of forest land for tourism purposes and about planning permission and integration into planning strategies. That will certainly be done, and the Department would be subject to the same planning permission considerations and scrutiny as any other body or agency. We will need planning permission if we are to create tourism projects, and those would also be subject to environmental impact assessments. Checks and balances will be in place.

Dr McCrea also talked about the need for the Department to have felling licences and about its proposed powers of entry, which is always a controversial power. The Department will want to take the time to discuss those issues carefully with the Committee to give it a role in helping us to make the Bill a piece of legislation of which we can be proud. He also pointed out issues about recreation, and I emphasise that other Departments have a role in that, whether it is the DOE, which has a role with environmental aspects, or DCAL, which has a role with recreational aspects. However, we will also look to other partners, such as local councils. We have already heard good examples of how we work together to improve the recreation product of forestry land.

Dr McCrea also talked about controlling wildlife in state forests. We have established that that needs to be done. He also talked about the time that it takes to process licences. I agree that we want to do that with as little bureaucracy as possible. We want it to be a simple procedure that does not take long, because it is to no one's benefit if it does. We also want to work with landowners to ensure that those licences result in woodland sustainability. We want them to be straightforward. The detail will come through in subordinate legislation. I want to emphasise the Committee's role in that.

Pat Doherty mentioned that the Forestry Act 1953 is 56 years old and that, therefore, it is younger than him. I am not sure about that; Pat is looking youthful these days. He talked about rural roads. Certainly, in my constituency, we share those concerns about the ability to put roads back to their original condition. I agree with him wholeheartedly: it is a huge difficulty for local communities. We will want to address that during the coming weeks and months.

Tourism was a theme of William Irwin's remarks. He said that more could be done. He covered clause 5 and was one of the people who said that he did not believe that large-scale forestation is achievable.

Although I do not want to rush through my comments, I do not want to repeat what Members have already said and to go through clauses that have already been talked about. Mr Savage said that the Department is looking for too much power and that there are no meaningful checks and balances. Again, he is on the Committee, so I will be able to sit down with him and others to work through those issues.

Dolores Kelly described the Bill as a vision for the next 50 years. No pressure then, Dolores. John Dallat made an intervention about tree-hugging. I am not sure whether he was talking about him or me. The words "mighty oaks" and "little acorns" sprang to mind. Dolores went on to talk about addressing the ill effects of the Plantation. Certainly, we would all love to be in a position to do something about that.

Dolores raised a point about the stakeholder advisory committee, which was a theme throughout the debate. She also mentioned the woodland survey and inventory. We do very much take stock of what is already recorded on the inventory because we accept the importance of native woodlands and want to ensure that it takes cognisance of what we have in order for it to be protected.

I think that Dolores also mentioned the amount of tree cover. Six per cent tree cover equates to 80,000 hectares. The Department's plan is to double it, which is an extremely ambitious target.

Jim Shannon talked about shooting deer — he has never seen 'Bambi', then — and about giving the voluntary sector a role in controlling deer and the equality element of that. Obviously, the Department has looked at the issue. It would be remiss of me to bring forward a Bill that did not encompass everyone's equality. I take his point about country sports and tourism.

The "right to roam" applies only to Forest Service land. I know that that issue gave people some cause for concern. It is about giving all of us pedestrian access to Forest Service land and forests so that we can better enjoy and appreciate what we have.

I believe that it was Danny Kinahan's first involvement in a debate with me. He mentioned his five acres of land. We all get precious about the few trees that we have. Would it not be lovely if we all had more? Fair play to him. He talked about a better balance between timber production and social, environmental and recreational needs. He also talked about climate change and the powers that the Department has introduced in the Bill.

I was taken aback by Mr Kinahan's comment that the Department could flatten a forest to build a housing estate. We could not and would not do that; that is not what we are here to do. As set out in clause 1 of the Bill, our primary focus is to protect forestry and ensure that we continue to roll out forestry cover. The suggestion that the Department would do otherwise flies in the face of clause 1. That is not what we are here to do.

Mr Kinahan also said that we need a dynamic appeals system. That is certainly something that I am trying to get through all aspects of the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development. He spoke about the need to have trees in all areas and about developers felling trees at weekends. We all know of such issues in our constituencies. However, tree preservation orders are still the remit of the Department of the Environment. I want to be careful not to overstep the mark and tread on the work of other Departments.

Brian Wilson spoke about the benefits of trees, forests and our ancient woodlands. He, too, pointed out that the abolishment of felling licences in the 1960s had a detrimental impact. It is, therefore, important that the requirement for a felling licence be included in the Bill to ensure that we protect our native woodlands. Mr Wilson also raised environmental and social issues and said that we should look at the issue of a presumption against a felling licence, which was a point that was raised earlier.

We are at only the Second Stage of the Bill, and we have a long way to go. We will appreciate the co-operation of the Agriculture and Rural Development Committee in working to create legislation of which we can all be proud and which, hopefully, will last well into the future — although not another half-century.

We must ensure that we double our forestry cover and that we protect wildlife, both flora and fauna, and the environment in forests. We must also ensure that we have more habitats for animals and flowers in forests and that there is more scope for them to flourish. We have a big job to do. It is great that so many Members contributed to the debate today and that so much goodwill has been shown towards the Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That the Second Stage of the Forestry Bill [NIA 11/08] be agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

Home Improvement Grants

Mr Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes to make a winding-up speech. All other Members who wish to speak will have five minutes. One amendment has been selected and published on the Marshalled List. The proposer of the amendment will have 10 minutes to propose and five minutes for the winding-up speech.

Mr F McCann: I beg to move

That this Assembly urges the Minister for Social Development to explain why the Housing Executive has suspended the payment of home improvement grants, despite the Department for Social Development being awarded an extra £20m in the June monitoring round for housing; and further calls on the Minister to remove the suspension of these grants, which are vital to meeting the Decent Homes Standards to enable essential maintenance and home improvements work to be carried out.

Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I am sure that there will be widespread support in the Chamber for this motion as the issue under discussion affects people in all constituencies. How many Members have had people call to their offices and homes about home improvement grants? How many times have we received phone calls from people, young and old, who are in despair after learning that the Housing Executive has turned down their application for help towards home improvements?

As if that were not bad enough, how many of those people were encouraged to make an application only to be told by the Housing Executive at the last hurdle — after having gone through the entire process — that, because of budgetary problems, their grants would be frozen and that they would have to continue to live in the terrible conditions that they were trying to improve by applying for grant assistance?

The Minister said that she would rather put a roof over people's heads than worry about kitchen replacements. What about the people who are sitting in homes with leaking roofs? What about the people whose electricity supply is substandard and in a dangerous condition? What about the people whose homes are riddled with damp and crumbling because of that?

What about people who live in a rural setting, have to endure intolerable living conditions and are waiting for help, only to be told that the Minister has redirected the money? She would rather put a roof on a new house than tackle the atrocious conditions that exist in many of the houses that have been refused assistance.

Perhaps the Minister can tell us how many of the houses that had a grant application refused were checked to ensure that they met health and safety standards. Are there ramifications for the health of the families who live in those houses? Two such families attended one of her infamous roadshows in Newry to ask that question, but they were shouted down and heckled by SDLP members. Where is the concern for those families?

The Minister needs to explain why she does not spread her budget more evenly to ensure that houses that are in a bad state of repair can be assisted along with the newbuilds. She needs to explain why rotten kitchens and heating systems that affect people's health will not be replaced. Does she not realise that she is storing up a financial nightmare for the future? Does she not realise that rotten and decaying kitchens and doors affect the fabric of a house and cost more to put right further down the road? Does she not also realise that a heating system that is not repaired or replaced affects the fabric of a house?

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Member put on record his recognition that the housing budget has a shortfall of more than £100 million?

Mr F McCann: I have no difficulty agreeing that there is a shortfall in the housing budget. However, the problem with the budget has been that the Minister has redirected all the finances towards newbuilds, which created the mess that we are in today. Over the past number of monitoring rounds, considerable amounts of money have been given to the Minister to deal with some of the problems that I mentioned, but she has chosen not to.

What costs can be matched against the damage to a person's health? Those are questions that the Minister needs to answer. She should not blame other people, which she usually does. She should not evade the hard questions or play with words, which she has become famous for. Too much depends on this. Thousands of people are waiting for answers to those questions; hundreds of people who are employed in the sector, including Egan contractors, depend on the work to put bread on the table for their families.

I am sure that all Members have received letters from small contractors who are involved in the renovation sector saying that they are among the 900 small contractors who rely totally on the business from the home improvement grants to survive. That sector will go to the wall because of decisions taken by the Minister.

The Minister should admit that her interference led us to this crisis; she should admit that she made a mistake. How much of the money that should have been used to fund an improvement programme or those working on the Egan contracts has been used to purchase properties from private developers?

Does the Minister know how much money people have spent on preparing documents to supply the Housing Executive with plans for the work that they intended to carry out? How can that money be recouped? It is my understanding that some 14,700 people applied for grants, and the Housing Executive had a statutory responsibility to complete the work in 4,000 of those cases. In 9,700 instances, applications for a grant were refused or suspended. How do those people recoup the money that they spent in preparation for the receipt of a grant? They include elderly people who cannot afford to lose that money and families who had to borrow money to fulfil the requirements that were laid out by the Housing Executive. Will the Minister tell the House if she will guarantee that those people will receive refunds? Many people only took part in the scheme on the back of advice that they received from the Housing Executive, only to be told at the last minute that their grant had been frozen: where is the fairness in that? There are many questions for the Minister to answer and, as elected representatives, we require those answers to ensure that our constituents are given the correct information. We await the Minister's explanation.

Even this morning, Members from across the House approached me to tell me horror stories from people in Derry, Strabane, Newry, Armagh, Fermanagh and across the board. Many people in rural areas live in atrocious conditions. The Minister said earlier that any case put forward would be investigated, but we continually put cases forward, and they are continually knocked back. That is the problem, and the Minister needs to deal with it right away.

4.30 pm

Mr Burns: I beg to move the following amendment: Leave out 'remove' and insert: "review"

I am delighted to make my first speech of the new Assembly term on such an important topic. Last year, the House saw many Sinn Féin motions that were directed at the Minister for Social Development. The SDLP did not support those motions, and it will not support this one without the acceptance of the amendment that I have proposed.

We all recognise the importance of the private-sector housing grants scheme, as detailed in the motion. I am a strong supporter of that scheme, which is an important tool for tackling bad conditions in private-sector housing. Those grants help people on low incomes who own their own homes to get their houses up to the decent homes standard. There is a real need for those grants, of that there is no doubt, and we can all agree on that aspect of the motion. People who need grants come into my constituency office, and they are desperately disappointed that those grants have been deferred or suspended. People need those grants to help to bring their houses up to a better standard.

At the same time, however, we all know that the Minister is caught in a catch-22 situation. She did indeed receive £20 million in the June monitoring round, but that money had conditions attached: DSD had the money spent before it was received. The Minister will no doubt explain in detail that that money needed to be spent on Egan contractors, kitchen replacements and bathroom replacements. Even with that extra £20 million, the budget for the Department for Social Development is still far short of what is required.

Mr F McCann: I think that most Members have been lobbied by people who work under Egan contracts. They say that the work that they are in the process of carrying out will shortly dry up and that they will be back to square one. As far as Egan contractors are concerned, £5 million of that £20 million was set aside to deal with their contracts. What happened to the rest of that money?

Mr Burns: As you very well know, the Egan contractors who lobbied everyone had been given a commitment about all the work that needed to be completed for public-sector housing. Everyone knows that.

Originally, DSD needed an extra £100 million; that figure is now a mere £80 million. The reasons for the budget shortfall are well known, so I will not repeat them; the SDLP has been repeating those reasons for a long time. However, I remind Members of the reduction in income caused by the global economic downturn. I am happy that the Finance Minister is listening; Mr Wilson clearly understands the SDLP's arguments. We will continue to press him for more money, and perhaps the social-housing budget will once again be put on a firm footing.

It is because of the lack of money that grants have been suspended. No doubt, all parties in the Assembly care about the people who need those grants. However, we cannot spend money that we do not have. That is why our proposed amendment calls for the Minister to keep the suspension under review. To open up a grants free-for-all when we do not have the money would not be wise.

Members must understand that within the funding shortfall, DSD has to consider carefully how every penny is spent, and providing new homes is the main priority. All Members will have people who are on housing waiting lists coming to their constituency offices.

Thousands of new homes are required as a matter of urgency, and current market conditions are well suited to building new houses. For that reason, the SDLP is committed to new building targets. The money for that is protected, and we will meet those targets.

The budget for the warm homes scheme is also protected to help householders who live in fuel poverty, as is the money for the Supporting People programme. The Minister has said many times that she will protect the most vulnerable in our society, and she deserves credit for that. Beyond that, given the budget shortfall, savings will have to be made somewhere. The Minister of Finance and Personnel knows that the money cannot be raised through the sale of land or houses, and, therefore, he must come up with additional funding. If he does that, the Minister for Social Development will be able to review the suspension, as proposed in our amendment.

Let me make it perfectly clear that there is no lack of will to provide the grants; the problem is a lack of money. I am hopeful that the suspension will be temporary, and I urge the Minister of Finance and Personnel to double his efforts to find the money to balance the DSD budget once and for all.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Social Development (Mr Hamilton): I will speak initially in my role as Chairman of the Committee for Social Development. The Committee considered the Department's June monitoring round submission prior to the summer recess and endorsed the Department's bids. However, members felt that, given the budgetary challenges facing the Executive at that time — indeed at all times — all bids, which amounted to £130 million, were unlikely to be met in the June monitoring round.

The Deputy Chairperson, Mr Hilditch, spoke in the House in July and warmly welcomed the outcome of the monitoring round, which included, as has been mentioned, an additional £20 million for renovation grants and for disabled adaptations. Most Members will be aware of some people's frustration about renovation grants. Those householders want to improve their homes. They have made grant applications and, perhaps, incurred costs in doing so. They lodged those applications with the Housing Executive and had hoped that the extra money announced in June would lead to payment of their grants. It is now my understanding, as has been mentioned, that the backlog of applications was such that the additional money announced in June would only cover the cost of statutorily and contractually committed renovation work that was already in the system.

The Committee recognises the budgetary pressures and the difficult choices facing the Minister. However, the Committee expects important statutory housing obligations — for example, in relation to the special purchase of evacuated dwellings scheme (SPED) or certain disabled adaptations — to be met at all times. The majority of Committee members also expect a good and appropriate balance to be maintained in the delivery of the housing programme's other objectives.

One other objective is the achievement of the decent homes standard in social housing, which is mentioned in the original motion. As the House will be aware, the Savills report, which is on the Minister's desk, reportedly shows significant improvements in Housing Executive stock in that regard. The Committee intends to review progress on the decent homes standard when the Department makes the Savills report available to it. I encourage the Minister to share with the House and the Committee the difficulties and challenges that she faces and the successes that she has achieved with regard to housing.

I will use the remaining time to make some comments in a personal, party capacity. As I said in a Committee capacity, I fully understand, appreciate and empathise with the budgetary difficulties that the Minister faces, and I entirely understand the difficult situation that she was put in and the choice that she had to make to move money around in her budget. However, it is worth pointing out that doing that is not without consequence. There are many consequences of moving money around in that way. The pressure is biting really hard because we previously had a £40 million tap of money that flowed into renovations at a fairly steady rate each year.

That flow has not been reduced to a trickle: the tap has been turned off completely. That is where the consequences and some of the pain are coming from. That pain is being felt not only by those who are applying for funds but by those who carry out the work; not big building firms but owners of small businesses, some of whom would have been depending on two, three or four small grants jobs each year for their livelihood.

Mr A Maginness: The Member, as Chairperson of the Committee for Social Development, seems to be implying that the Minister should rearrange the budget internally. The Minister has indicated that newbuild is a top priority, as are the warm homes scheme and the Supporting People programme. The Member is suggesting that some of those priorities should, in fact, be altered or their budgets reduced. Which of those does Mr Hamilton, either as Chairperson of the Social Development Committee or as an ordinary Member, suggest should be affected adversely?

The Chairperson of the Committee for Social Development: The Member knows that it is unfair to ask that question of me as Chairperson of the Social Development Committee. I have already made comments that the Member, I am sure, subscribes to personally.

The point that I am getting at is that when the constant flow of money stops dead, there are ramifications. Small businesses are downsizing or are going out of business quietly as a result of this. They are local family firms that employ local people and use local building supplies to do their work. We cannot procure preferentially in any way, but we all know that grants work benefits local firms first and foremost.

We need not turn the tap back on to £40 million a year: it is not possible to do that. However, some small infusion of cash back into the renovations area would greatly assist those businesses and the people who benefit from those schemes. Perhaps not £40 million or even £4 million: £400,000 would be better than what is going through the system at the moment. It would let 20 small grants jobs go ahead, which is better than nothing, which is the case at present.

Problems are being stored up for the future. I take the Member's point about the other priorities. Nevertheless, there is an onus on the Minister to ensure that, if in making those difficult choices at the end of the financial year there is money left over in any of those schemes, and I have particular concerns about the warm homes scheme and the slow start being made by the new scheme —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member must bring his remarks to a close.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Social Development: I know of one energy firm that has made 82 referrals, of which only three have gone through so far. There are issues developing, and it is absolutely necessary that the Minister ensures that having made the difficult choices, all the available money is spent on those other priorities. I welcome the debate.

Mr Armstrong: It is no secret that there is a major problem with the Executive's finances. The Minister for Social Development has repeatedly highlighted difficulties in her Department's budget, and in particular, the problems that have been caused by the huge drop in revenue from house and land sales as property values have plummeted and income from sales has dropped from £100 million to £8 million in one year.

It is all very well for some Members and their parties to seek to attack the Minister as part of a political grandstanding exercise, but she cannot create money out of thin air as if by magic. The Executive Budget, never mind the DSD budget, is finite, and hard choices must be made, although we would not think so when we listen to some Members. I am not here to attack the Minister or her Department. I know that she wants to increase funding for public housing stock, public- and private-sector home improvement schemes and to combat fuel poverty. However, the problem is that we do not live in an ideal world: we live in the real world.

The motion appears to be slightly confused in that it refers to home improvement grants, which are for private homes, but goes on to mention the decent homes standards, which apply to public-sector housing.

On the first point, it is clear that there is a growing crisis with regard to home improvements. The motion identifies an additional £20 million that was allocated to Housing Executive funds in the June monitoring round. That may seem to be a large sum of money, but it would only partly cover those grants in which formal letters of approval have been issued. In other words, that money has already been spent, and the result is that no new money is available for further grant aid.

Over 13,000 private homes have applied for grant aid, some of which are in the final stages and are nearing approval. Over 9,000 of those homes have received letters from the Northern Ireland Housing Executive informing them that grant aid can no longer be provided. Furthermore, over 900 small and medium-sized family-based contracting firms, which have been actively engaged in contracts involving the Housing Executive grant, face the prospect of work drying up in early January 2010. With no approvals being issued, those firms are facing closure. That will throw even more people onto the dole queue. Even if contractors were redeployed to work on social housing projects, many of them are only at the early stages of planning and will not be ready for commencement until 2011.

I appeal to the Minister to do all she can to secure funding to support grant aid in the private sector, and to alleviate the genuine fears of those firms whose main business is drawn from the private-sector grant schemes. As I said, I will not attack the Minister or her Department, as I understand the financial situation in which she has to operate and the difficult choices that have to be made. I urge her to look within her budget to see what can be done to support home improvement grants in the private sector and to meet the decent homes standards in the public sector.

The answer, as always, is more funding. If the Minister cannot find that in her budget, Members from other parties must pressurise their party colleagues in the Executive to allocate funds to the Social Development Minister. There is no other way.

Ms Lo: One of my constituents recently contacted my office seeking help. He had made a statutory application for a Housing Executive improvement and repair grant. The gentleman had already incurred associated costs of £987 when he was informed by the NIHE that his application would not be honoured, due to budget constraints. This 60-year-old gentleman has endured living in a property in the Village area without central heating or an indoor toilet for over 15 years. He was recently made redundant from his long-term employment without any redundancy package, and is suffering serious health problems, having had several heart attacks in the past year.

The Housing Executive reconsidered only after pressure from other elected representatives and me, and was forced to introduce a set of guidelines to deal with exceptional circumstances such as those of that gentleman. People should not be left in limbo waiting for grants to improve their unfit homes. That can have a very negative impact on their health and well-being. Delays in repairing some properties can also make those homes uninhabitable in the long run, thereby reducing the housing stock.

I call on the parties in the Executive to work together to give DSD the housing budget necessary to carry out the many aspects of its work. The Housing Executive is facing serious funding shortages of £100 million each year following the collapse of the housing market. The home improvement grant has been curtailed, like so many other programmes, due to a shortage of funds.

I recently attended a DSD public meeting when the Minister was present. It was embarrassing to watch her appeal to members of the audience, on several occasions, to lobby their elected representatives and respective parties to put the Department on a sound financial footing. That is indicative of what little support the Minister is getting from the Executive.

It took 'The Stephen Nolan Show' to resolve the difficulties of the SPED scheme. The situation is a disgrace, and when I spoke to the police officer in question, I realised the stress that it has put on him and his family. Last year, the Housing Executive spent more than £9 million on the SPED programme. This year's budget was only £1.5 million, to be increased by scraps in monitoring rounds. That is no way to run any Department.

Mr McCarthy: Does the Member agree that the problem was experienced not only by one ex-police officer but by a number of police officers? Indeed, other members of the public found themselves in exactly the same position. Extra resources are needed to meet those people's demands.

Ms Lo: I absolutely agree.

Mrs D Kelly: Does the Member agree that the two main parties' failure to give leadership in tackling sectarianism is partly at the core of the problem?

Ms Lo: I absolutely agree.

People do not really care what Department is responsible for what. I think that the layperson on the street does not know what Department does what. All people want is for the Government to deliver public services to meet the needs of their citizens. Marginalising one or two Ministers from the smaller parties merely shows up the lack of cohesion in the Executive, who are so often playing party politics rather than working together for the common good.

The housing downturn was not the Minister's fault. We must ensure that, in future, funding for important and much-needed schemes, such as the SPED scheme and the home improvement grants, are secure and not subject to fluctuating incomes from the receipt of house and land sales.

Mr Hilditch: I support the motion, and I welcomed the Minister's announcement back in July. More than 20,000 people are deemed to be in housing stress, and 9,000 are registered as homeless. On top of that, 17% of our housing stock is below the decent homes standard. Investment is required to replace properties' obsolete and inefficient systems and functions. I understood that the £20 million that was awarded in the June monitoring round was to allow for the necessary maintenance work to proceed while providing important support for the construction sector in these difficult times.

Mr McCann took us on a geographical tour of the west of the Province, but we could all give examples from our own constituencies, including those in the east. On my doorstep, an area of social deprivation in Castlemara has been hit particularly hard and has had a number of maintenance schemes and cycle maintenance cancelled. The suspension of home improvement grants comes on top of that. Indeed, constituents have been told not only that there is no funding but that they will have to reapply when money becomes available again.

Many of those people are in vulnerable positions: they are unable to move away from Housing Executive property or to purchase properties elsewhere. Now they are being told that they cannot have the grants that are necessary to complete priority maintenance work. Like many constituents —

Mr McQuillan: Does the Member agree that people who were approved for a home improvement grant are worse off now than they were previously? Those people have gone to the expense of getting plans drawn up and had planning applications ready to submit. Some of those people will be out of pocket and will be up to £1,000 worse off than they were before they started.

Mr Hilditch: That is accurate, and I intended to refer to that matter later.

Mr A Maginness: The Member said that applicants would have to reapply for grants. I understand from the Department that applicants will not have to reapply. Rather, their applications are effectively frozen.

Mr Hilditch: In researching today's speech, I obtained some information from the grants office in Ballyclare. If it is not correct, I am sorry.

All Members know about individual cases. Last night, I had an opportunity to visit an elderly woman who has spent two winters with rain coming in through the front windows of her house. Now that her application has been turned down again, she is not looking forward to a third such winter.

In my East Antrim constituency alone, 244 grants have been cancelled and 67 applications for home repair refused. I was horrified to learn that 94 renovation grants for properties that have been deemed unfit have also been refused. That means that 94 homes throughout the constituency are occupied despite their being unsafe. People's lives are at risk because those dwellings are dangerous and in need of urgent repairs, such as rewiring, roof work, extensions, plastering, and so forth. To make matters worse, some of those households, as my colleague said, have been further penalised through having already paid for plans for extensions to be drawn up. The Housing Executive has offered no reimbursement for that expense.

I am thankful that the disabled facilities grant scheme will continue. However, more than 13,000 private homeowners have applied for grant aid, and some of their applications were at the final stages or nearing approval. Despite that, 9,000 of those applicants received letters from the Housing Executive to inform them that grant aid is no longer being provided. That is unacceptable. This year, the Housing Executive will approve only 2,000 grants approximately. Given that it approved some 7,000 last year, that is a shocking reduction.

Everyone has the right to live in a safe home, and it is unreasonable and unjust to concentrate solely on the provision of newbuilds. If the Northern Ireland Housing Executive is to remain committed to bringing all homes up to the decent homes standard by 2010, it is imperative that the Minister concentrates on both issues. The Housing Executive must be dedicated to providing quality housing services, and it must work with others to create safe and confident communities. It must take into account the importance of improvements and repairs, as well as address the needs of the homeless.

I ask the Minister to revoke the suspension of the grants and move towards supporting the construction industry. The crisis cannot be ignored, and the Department must start to approve grants again. Otherwise, the future of Housing Executive offices and their staff will be at risk, private housing is likely to deteriorate further and the companies of the contractors involved will face closure. I support the motion.

Mr P Maskey: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. If Members compare Sinn Féin's motion with the SDLP amendment, only one word differs. The amendment replaces "remove" with "review". What does review mean? It could apply to a review lasting three weeks, three years, or for ever. Although that one word is the only difference between the motion and the amendment, it is unclear and jeopardises the entire motion.

Mrs D Kelly: The SDLP is not in the habit of using the same definition of the word as Sinn Féin, when it referred to the reviews of the programme of cohesion, sharing and integration, of the anti-poverty strategy or of the Civic Forum. In contrast to Sinn Féin, the SDLP has time frames.

Mr P Maskey: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Member for that point of information. Although Dolores may think otherwise, the matter that is being debated is important, and we should not be getting it mixed up with any other issues. It never fails to amaze me how Dolores manages to introduce sectarian issues, as happened earlier when she raised a point of order.

Mrs D Kelly: When?

Mr P Maskey: The subject matter was slightly different, but she talked about how the two main parties on the Executive and in the Chamber are not dealing with sectarianism effectively.

The Sinn Féin motion refers to "essential maintenance and home improvements". The key word is "essential".

Some of that was mentioned. I think that Simon Hamilton touched on the figure, but the fact is that it was cut down, seemingly as a matter of urgency. It did not seem that any real thought went into closing the door. Perhaps the Minister has not given the right direction to her staff in the grants offices because people have received letters that state that the grant scheme is closed and that they will have to reapply.

5.00 pm

During a telephone conversation, I was told by a member of staff that the scheme will probably never even be opened up again. Perhaps the Minister could give better direction to her Department's staff.

Mr Molloy: In connection with what the Member said, and in response to Mr Maginness's point, I have a letter from the Housing Executive that very clearly states that people will have to make a further application if grant aid becomes available in the future.

Mr P Maskey: It seems that all of the points from the rest of the Members and parties in this Chamber back that view. That is the message that quite clearly is coming from the Minister's Department. The Minister refuses to recognise that point, but a number of her party colleagues have questioned whether that is the case. Perhaps better direction needs to come from the Minister on that issue.

Mr McElduff: I have one question about exceptional circumstances that I want the Minister to address. The Housing Executive's website states that it expects that applications for discretionary grants may be approved only in exceptional circumstances. We are talking about the current state of play.

There is a lady who lives in Carrickmore, County Tyrone, who has twice been a victim of the conflict. She recently had an intruder in her home, and her repair grant application is to secure her back door. There is an 80-year-old lady from Mountfield, County Tyrone, whose guttering is rotting away. She is fearful of infestation of mice and rats, and she is cold in the winter months. I want the Minister to give an assurance that she will review cases such as those here and now so that they will qualify as exceptional circumstances because, all too often, MLAs are being told that exceptional circumstances do not apply.

Mr P Maskey: I thank the Member for that intervention. On no fewer than six occasions during Question Time today, the Minister stated that the housing budget needs to be placed on a sound financial footing. That is exactly right, and every single Department in the Executive has to ensure that all of its moneys are on a sound financial footing. If they fail to do that and fail to work the system in a proper way, they are accountable to the elected Members of this Chamber and to the entire community outside.

I have heard more money being asked for in this Chamber before. Does it come out of the health budget, or does it come out of the education or roads budgets? What budget should it come out of? That is the question that the Minister has to answer because it must be remembered that all of us have to answer to all of our constituents. In recent times, I have had a number of people in my office because of the door being slammed in their faces when it comes to the grants that they had applied for.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member should draw his remarks to a close.

Mr P Maskey: Those constituents had been brought to the wire and they had been promised those grants, yet they were refused.

Mrs M Bradley: I support my party's amendment to the motion. We have before us an impossible situation that has been caused by a £100 million shortfall in the housing budget. That shortfall was brought about by the economic downturn, and everybody should remember that.

I am well aware that there are huge pressures on the Finance Minister's bank balance. However, the simple fact is staring us all in the face. Although Sinn Féin would have us believe otherwise, the housing budget is inefficient, ineffective and is unfairly portrayed. I applaud the Finance Minister for giving £20 million in the June monitoring round to the Department for Social Development. However, that merely fed the historical black hole that already existed due to the Department for Social Development starting the financial year from behind because of deficits that were caused by the collapse in land and house sales, as assets could not be sold at a good price. The case today is the same as it was last year, and the Minister will make that case again today. Hopefully, her plight will be listened to this time.

However, for those who need it spelled out, the bottom line is that the housing budget is totally unfit for purpose, even though the Minister has suggested ways forward that might help.

A motion such as this serves as a pathetic point-scoring exercise. Yesterday, we heard the Education Minister ask the Assembly to work with her to move forward. The SDLP is asking for the same sentiment to be afforded to the Social Development Minister. The Executive exist to create a better quality —

Mr F McCann: Will the Member give way?

Mrs M Bradley: No, I will not give way. The Executive exist to create a better quality of life for the people of Northern Ireland. Surely, one of the most basic rights is to have a decent roof over your head. I ask Sinn Féin and the DUP, as the majority —
[Interruption.]

I did not say anything when Mr McCann was speaking. Please have manners.

I am asking Sinn Féin and the DUP, as the majority vote holders in the Executive to put their money, literally, where their mouths are and give the Minister what she needs to make that provision a reality for those people who need the help of home improvement grants.

Mr McGlone: Does the Member agree, and I am sure that her ministerial colleague does, that we have heard Assembly debates ad nauseam about housing grants and affordable housing — so many that you could paper the Chamber with Hansard reports of them — with commitments left, right and centre? Maybe, left and right, depending on how the political axis is viewed at the minute.

However, to re-emphasise the point, if Sinn Féin and the DUP are interested in putting their money where their mouths are, could they put it into the most practical form of affordable housing to help people by way of a home repairs grant, a renovation grant or a replacement grant at minimal cost to the public purse? Will the Member accept that point and reflect it in the debate?

Mrs M Bradley: I certainly will, I agree with that point. My office is inundated, as are many others, with constituents who have suffered due to the grant process being restricted. I can see only one way out. If we are to help those who voted for us, they and the parties must know that the DSD cupboard is bare because of external factors.

The Minister is not a magician. She can work only with what she has. It is obvious to me that we should all support her efforts to seek further funding, rather than score points at the behest of our constituents. We should deal with constituents' problems by supporting the housing budget. To use Paul Maskey's word, it is "essential" that everybody in the Chamber supports the Minister and her housing budget.

Mrs D Kelly: Last year, we heard Mr Fra McCann tell the Minister to stop whingeing and take the money, but the Minister fought on and got additional money for her budget. Thankfully, she did not listen to Sinn Féin that time round, and I am quite sure that she will not listen to Sinn Féin this time round.

It is clear from the debate that Sinn Féin intends to carry on this term the same way that it left off in June: attack the sole SDLP Minister without once directing any of its anger or concerns at the Minister of Finance and Personnel, who has refused the Minister for Social Development any additional funding to relieve the housing budget. As far back as December, Sinn Féin would not allow the Minister to reallocate her own £38 million within her Department to meet housing need.

Mr McElduff: I have a question that I would love to have answered, if possible. Did any of the £20 million given to the Minister for Social Development in the June monitoring round go to Housing Executive grants offices in Omagh and Derry, for example, where I have constituents who are anxiously trying to get redress?

Mrs D Kelly: I am sure that the Minister herself will answer that question. However, on that point, I have a copy of a letter dated 30 June 2009 from Sinn Féin Minister Michelle Gildernew to the Finance Minister. In it, the Sinn Féin Minister wrote:

"I am perplexed by the proposal to increase the capital overcommitment by £20m in respect of housing improvements for DSD."

No support came from Sinn Féin in the Executive on that occasion. The letter continues:

"Whilst I am sure that this bid has substantial merits, the paper does not spell out why this particular bid should be met at the expense of any other capital bid, and there is no compelling rationale as to why we should make an exception".

Shame, shame, shame on Sinn Féin and Michelle Gildernew for not supporting the SDLP in the Executive when Margaret Ritchie was looking for money. Everyone in the House ought to know, because the Minister has told them often enough —

Mr P Maskey: Will the Member give way?

Mrs D Kelly: In a moment. There are substantial restraints on where that £20 million can be spent. Of course I will give way to Mr Maskey.

Mr P Maskey: I have not heard or seen that information, so I am wondering where it came from. Maybe she is just making it up, or is it confidential stuff from the Executive that should not be given out?

Mrs D Kelly: I assure the House that I am not a tout. I do not inform on sources. As far as I am aware, there are no touts in our party, unlike some parties, which have major concerns about informers in their midst. Indeed, the document is not marked confidential, but it is a matter of record, and I hope that it will be read into the record. Perhaps Mr Maskey would do better to ask Michelle Gildernew why she would not support the SDLP Minister for Social Development in meeting the real and pressing needs of people in housing stress.

Mr F McCann: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. The Member keeps quoting information that nobody else is aware of. To put the record straight, at every Executive meeting when monitoring rounds have come up, Sinn Féin has fully supported additional money going to the housing budget to deal with the DSD's problems.

Mr D Kelly: Mr Deputy Speaker, I do not think that that was a point of order. That is the same Member who, only a matter of months ago —

Mr O'Dowd: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. I am aware that, on previous occasions, Speakers have ruled with respect to documents that Members have referred to during debates and that the reference document must be verified. All that we are asking is whether the document is an Executive paper and whether the Member is prepared to lodge it in the Assembly Library.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Perhaps we can allow the Member to answer your question.

Mr O'Dowd: With respect, Mr Deputy Speaker, I raised the point of order with you. On previous occasions, rulings have been made on that subject.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Yes, but it is necessary for the Member to say whether she is willing to lodge the document in the Library.

Mrs D Kelly: I am more than happy to lodge the document in the Library, and to allow all and sundry to read it and see Sinn Féin's real purpose in the Executive, which is to attack the SDLP in the hope that it will fail in its Ministry. While Margaret Ritchie remains as the SDLP Minister, there is no chance of that happening, and I have every confidence in her being the shining star in the Executive that she is today, and will be tomorrow. I seem to have hit a sore point with Sinn Féin Members, so they really should take the matter up with Michelle Gildernew.

There are ways to spend money more efficiently and effectively, and that is exactly what Margaret Ritchie has done in respect of the Housing Executive. For example, she told Housing Executive officials to use brownfield sites and existing housing land to ensure that there is less cost to the public purse. Margaret Ritchie is driving efficiencies and effectiveness through the Housing Executive to the best of her ability, and often, as Mr Deputy Speaker knows, her efforts are being held up and not supported by the so-called main nationalist republican party in the House, which tries to say that it speaks for the most vulnerable people in society. The SDLP started out speaking on housing matters and for the most vulnerable and marginalised people in society, and, next year, we will go into our fortieth anniversary on the same platform: ensuring that the most marginalised people in our society are protected.

Mr McGlone: I am sure that most of us are deeply concerned about the needs of our constituents; I hope that that is the case. I also hope that Sinn Féin will reconsider the strategy that it is employing. Many people are being held up and cannot get grant aid. Many people are looking to have houses built. If we had a bit more co-operation in this place, yesterday and today, we would have been faced with an Executive showcasing to the world what they are doing for the people of the North, rather than having silly and juvenile debates.

Let us have a bit of co-operation at Executive level. Let us see delivery for those who really count: the people, including those who have applications in the grants system.

5.15 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker: Mrs Kelly, your time has run out.

Mrs D Kelly: Oh dear.

Mrs Long: I share a lot of the concerns that Sinn Féin has raised in relation to the suspension of the housing grants scheme. Most Members share those concerns. I am willing, or I was willing, to consider the notion of a review, but I am slightly worried by what I have just heard, because it sounds increasingly as though the issue is no longer about a review but about people digging in and taking entrenched positions. I am not sure that that is helpful. I am waiting for the Minister's reassurance that if we say that something should be reviewed there is a commitment to review it. As Dolores Kelly rightly pointed out, the word "review" is often a euphemism in the Assembly for doing nothing. The public do not want that: they want a proper review in the light of all the information.

The other thing that impresses me about the debate, and others like it, is Sinn Féin's almost relentless pursuit of the DSD Minister on every issue. If that energy were put into working with the other parties in the Executive to create better collectivity, we would be able to move forward a lot faster, and the public might be more impressed by the Executive that are representing them.

Mr O'Dowd: I thank the Member for giving way. All of us in the Chamber are hard-nosed politicians, including the Minister for Social Development. If any Minister is not a hard-nosed politician, he or she should not be a Minister. I know that the media have portrayed the Minister as "Saint Margaret of DSD", but, at the end of the day, Margaret Ritchie is a Minister who has to be held to account by the Executive. As regards funding for DSD, if anyone wishes to read Sinn Féin's submission on the Budget, it states clearly that Sinn Féin would support extra funding for social housing — [Interruption.]

Mrs Long: I thank Mr O'Dowd for what he said. I come from a particular tradition that is not really into sainthood, but we are not into relentlessly demonising people either. This is about looking at the issues on their merits. Nobody who objectively analyses the number of issues brought to the Chamber by Sinn Féin that are directly related to DSD could miss the point that it has been relentless in its pursuit and criticism.

It is also not fair to say, despite my reservations about the suspension of the grants programme, that the DSD Minister has been the worst performing Minister in the Executive. That is telling, because if people were pursuing other Ministers with the same relentless passion when they are not performing, we might get more out the other end of the Executive.

Mr F McCann: Will the Member give way?

Mrs Long: No, I will not give way, because I want to finish what I have to say.

I want to focus on the issue, which is the impact that this has had. I hope that the Minister will consider a review. The debate was slightly pre-empted by Question Time. However, I listened to the Minister, and she said that she had focused on protecting the vulnerable. That is very worthy, and I can understand that in difficult budgetary constraints it is what she must do. However, some of the people we are dealing with in this discussion about the grants are vulnerable people who also need to be protected. There has to be some balance between building new houses and maintaining the housing stock that we already have. The pendulum has, perhaps, swung too far.

For those who clamour about where the money would come from, we need to look, realistically, at freeing up what are relatively small amounts of money for the grants scheme from the newbuild scheme, if necessary, in order to provide an opportunity to maintain the housing stock. We can expand the housing stock, and we can be more cost effective in how we do that, if we can maintain, adapt and renovate existing properties or those properties that are falling out of use and bring them back online more quickly. There is also the danger that if it is not done, the cost of doing it down the line, when the scheme reopens, will be a lot greater because the properties will be in a worse state of repair. There are also knock-on effects for neighbouring properties in many cases, particularly mid-terrace properties. For example, when roofs start to leak when a terraced house becomes abandoned, and there are all sorts of other issues, that has an implication for the rest of the houses in that terrace. There are also issues about how quickly uninhabited houses can be restored to full use.

The suspension of the payment of home improvement grants can impact on the waiting list, because if people cannot adapt their homes to their needs, they will join the waiting list and seek a home that suits their needs. Those two issues are not separate. They are linked in that the people who will join the waiting list will be people whose homes could be adapted if the money and support were available. Therefore, there needs to be a balance on this issue.

The impact that living conditions have on the health and well-being of individuals is crucial, which Anna Lo and other Members mentioned. I am concerned about that. There are also financial implications, and a number of Members have spoken about the professional fees that people have incurred when making their applications. There are also people who bought properties, which required modernisation to make them habitable, on the understanding that they would be able to rent out those properties and return them to the market. Those people are also incurring costs from properties that cannot be let. They still have to pay their fees, and they will suffer from not being able to get insurance if they cannot return them to a habitable state. There are all sorts of other wider financial implications. Such issues need to be addressed.

Mrs Long: The impact on industry has been touched on, but, as a result of this debate, I would like the Minister to indicate that she is willing to review the suspension of the grants and other Members to indicate that they are willing to co-operate.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I call on the saintly Minister for Social Development, Ms Margaret Ritchie.

The Minister for Social Development (Ms Ritchie): I thank the Members who contributed to the debate, and I welcome the opportunity to respond to those contributions, not least because it gives me the opportunity to clarify and correct some of the issues that were raised. I will try to address all the questions and points that Members raised, and I assure the House that I will study the Hansard report and write to any Member who has raised an issue that is not covered in my response.

The motion asks me to explain why the Housing Executive has suspended the payment of home improvement grants, despite being awarded an extra £20 million in the June monitoring round. I am happy to provide that explanation. The SDLP amendment has asked me to review the position on that suspension of grants, and I am happy to do that as well.

I welcome the opportunity to talk to Members again about the difficulties that I face, because they are all aware that, due to the downturn in house and land sales, the housing budget started this year with a £100 million shortfall, which has impacted on all spending programmes. I remind the House that I started last year with a shortfall of £80 million. Difficult decisions have had to be made, and the Housing Executive has had no choice but to prioritise its expenditure in all budget areas. The outcome of that is that it has ultimately affected the delivery of certain housing programmes. In those circumstances — and I emphasise this — I have listened to the political grandstanding this afternoon, and I question whether certain Members are really interested in the vulnerable and in wee Maggie down the lane who is waiting for an improvement grant. I sympathise with that sort of person, because I live in the countryside, and I know what it is like to have to wait for an improvement grant.

Mr T Clarke: Will the Minister give way?

The Minister for Social Development: No. I will not, because Members have given way already. I want to continue and explain the problem. That is what is wrong; people do not want to listen to the problem. They want to politically grandstand and attack rather than help.

I have done my utmost to protect the most vulnerable households by ring-fencing budgets for newbuild social housing to help those in housing stress; for the warm homes scheme to help those in fuel poverty; and in support of people living independently in the community rather than in institutions. I have heard Members from around the House say that that is what they want as well.

I have also decided on the provision of newbuild social housing within the social housing development programme. It is a priority, because the current market conditions are more suited than ever before to increase investment in social housing, to stimulate the economy, to protect jobs in the overall construction industry and to help the most vulnerable and needy in society by providing them with a home.

There is a falsehood out there that I have somehow diverted money from the provision of grants, and I heard Fra McCann saying that today. It is a pity that he does not listen better at the meetings of the Social Development Committee; perhaps then he might have some answers. There is a falsehood out there that I have somehow diverted money away from grants, and from other parts of my Department's budget, to concentrate solely on the provision of newbuild social housing. I can categorically state that that is not true.

Let me say it again: I have protected only three areas from the full impact of the £100 million shortfall, and the Housing Executive has had to absorb pressures right across the housing budget. However, there has been no diversion to social newbuilds. What was given to Members yesterday in documents sent by a certain gentleman, representing a certain organisation, was a misrepresentation of the facts.

However, as I have said, difficult decisions have had to be made. As the level of funding available for home improvements in the private sector is insufficient, applications for discretionary grants, including renovation grants, replacement grants and home repairs assistance, may now be approved only in exceptional circumstances. However, I have ensured that other grants such as disabled facilities grants, which provide adaptations to enable disabled people to remain in their own homes, and repair grants approved on foot of statutory notices given by district councils will continue to operate normally.

In such difficult circumstances, I welcomed the Executive's decision to make £20 million available for social housing in the June monitoring round. I have ensured — to answer some queries made, I believe, by Barry McElduff — that £15 million has been allocated to private-sector grants and £5 million has been allocated to disabled adaptations. However, as Members will know, that £20 million addresses only part of what is a £100 million shortfall in the housing budget, and I must continue to bid in future monitoring rounds to protect the housing agenda.

Members may not be aware that the additional funding is conditional on the release of £20 million from the existing resources to Egan contractors, who carry out maintenance works such as kitchen replacements on Housing Executive properties. The Executive are perfectly within their rights to attach conditions to the release of £20 million to housing, but in this instance, and for someone trying to manage the budget proactively, those conditions were not helpful. In order for the Housing Executive to release the £20 million for Egan contracts, it had to cut back other planned maintenance and related works. Effectively, I was given £20 million and asked to fund £40 million — £20 million for Egan contracts, and £20 million for grants and disability adaptations — from the June monitoring round allocation.

Historically, there has been a time lag between grants being approved and the eventual application for payment, which has resulted in a significant commitment being built up in the grants system. As a result of the economic downturn, the availability of builders has meant that previously approved grants are now resulting in payment requests being received sooner. Therefore, the additional funding allocated in the June monitoring round will only allow the Housing Executive to meet commitments for private-sector grant applications which have already received formal approval, and to fund the statutory grant approvals this year. However, I have ensured that any cancelled or refused grant applications will be held on file in the place they were in the queue against the event that additional funding becomes available at some future date. I have also ensured that the Housing Executive writes to all applicants who have had their applications cancelled or refused, to explain the approach to be taken.

David Hilditch raised an issue that he had taken on board from the Ballyclare grants office, and Francie Molloy raised a similar issue.

If Members know of cases where people have not received those letters, please let me know. My instructions were that nobody was to lose their place in the queue and nobody had to reapply. I want to make that absolutely clear.

5.30 pm

I know that many people have been disappointed by the non-approval of their grant, but they will not have wasted their efforts in bringing their applications to an advanced stage. Many people are out of pocket on various consultancy, architect and civil engineering fees advancing their grant applications, and many of those people are on low incomes. As I advised my colleague Patsy McGlone earlier during Question Time, I am looking at what can be done to help those people ahead of their grants receiving final approval. I hope that I get the support for that scheme when it comes forward.

I sincerely hope that the Housing Executive's restriction on grants will be temporary. I hope that I will be able to help everybody whose applications are in the pipeline. I bid for additional funds in the September monitoring round, which will allow the Housing Executive to approve the grants received this year, and which it has not been able to process due to a lack of funding.

Many issues were raised during the debate. At one stage, I thought that Mr McCann was in a state of confusion, because he mixed up improvement grants with Egan contractors and planned maintenance.

Mr F McCann: Not in the least.

The Minister for Social Development: He sounded confused to me, because they are distinct issues. However, it might be better if Mr McCann were to encourage his colleagues to support me round the Executive table to put housing on a sound financial footing. His words would be put to more profitable use if he were to deploy them to that end.

I thank Mr Burns for his helpful comments. Simon Hamilton recognised the frustration that many people have about improvement grants, which I also recognise. I note, sadly, that as Chairperson of the Committee, he is not in his usual place. I agree with him that many of those issues are not without their consequences. He raised the issue of the warm homes scheme, and I addressed that during Question Time when I said that everybody in the pipeline will be dealt with by scheme managers and everybody should be contacted by November. I would like to think that that will happen earlier, and I will be urging them to do so.

I hope that the Chairperson and the Deputy Chairperson of the Committee will provide strong support and urge their ministerial colleagues in the DUP to put housing on that illusive sound financial footing. Why do we want that? For too long the funding of housing has been predicated on capital receipts. However, capital receipts have now dissipated, as has the level of house sales. In this new financial situation, which was pointed out by my colleagues in our document 'New Priorities in Difficult Times', we need to look at housing to ensure that it is put on a sound financial footing.

I welcome the support of Billy Armstrong and Anna Lo, and I sympathise with her constituent. Many of us have constituents who have found themselves in such difficulties, and I echo her clarion call to put housing on a sound financial footing.

I have already answered David Hilditch's question about the Ballyclare grants office. Anna Lo also raised the issue of people who have spent money on architects' fees. We are dealing with that issue and I hope that I will be able to come forward with a clearly worked-up scheme.

I hope that Mr McCann will urge his Sinn Féin ministerial colleagues in the Executive to support me in putting housing on a sound financial footing rather than carping and trying to make a political football out of people's misery and suffering. Dolores Kelly is absolutely right: I remember in October 2007 Mr McCann saying me that I should accept my lot and stop whinging. He then changes his tune to suit the political moment, save for the fact that he does not always have his facts correct.

Paul Maskey raised an issue and, again, there seems to have been some misinformation, which I have already corrected.

Barry McElduff raised the issue of exceptional circumstances. The criteria used to determine exceptional circumstances are clearly laid out. An exceptional circumstance is one in which an imminent and significant health and safety risk exists; a serious risk under structural stability exists, or any other circumstance that is considered to be exceptional exists. There is a simultaneous application for disabled facilities and renovations, and where works are required, the adaption is allowed to proceed. If Mr McElduff knows of applications that fulfil those criteria and have not been properly addressed, I suggest that he refers them to me and I will ensure that they are assessed again. Such matters should be addressed in a totally professional, adult and mature manner.

Patsy McGlone and Mary Bradley raised the issue of affordable housing and the need for funding. I could not agree more that there must be an investment of resources, that housing should be put on a sound financial footing, and that the needs and suffering of people should be recognised. Dolores Kelly put in a sterling performance and referred to the fact that I am stretching my budget like an elastic band, that we are witnessing a miracle akin to that of the loaves and fishes, and that I have been doing things with the budget to prove that it can be stretched.

First, we can increase the level of resources by securing further financial commitments from the Executive. We can also be innovative through the transfer of sites, leasing and other measures. I would appreciate the support of the House in securing additional funding for housing. The problem is an overall lack of finance, not a lack of desire to provide all private-sector grants and enable essential maintenance and home-improvement works.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Minister's time is up.

The Minister for Social Development: The answer is not to rob the vulnerable to pay another group, which some people want me to do.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Minister's time is up.

The Minister for Social Development: We must secure more resources in total for housing. Let me be absolutely clear: there is not enough money for housing, and I look forward to the full support of the House to achieve that goal.

Mr A Maginness: I have a feeling of déjà vu in relation to the debate, because we have seen many previous attacks on the Minister for Social Development. The motion is no more than a thinly veiled attack on the Minister. Naomi Long and other Members have indicated that, in fact —

Mr F McCann: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: I will, very quickly.

Mr F McCann: You and Naomi Long have made that point. What you are both actually saying is that if I, as the housing spokesperson for Sinn Féin, have any major complaints about the way the Minister runs her Department, I should not bring them up because they might annoy you, her, or your party.

Mr A Maginness: I will repeat the point: if Margaret Ritchie of the SDLP were not the Minister for Social Development, the motion is unlikely to have reached the Floor of the House. That is the situation.

Mrs Long: Does the Member agree that if Mr McCann, as housing spokesperson for Sinn Féin, were genuinely concerned about housing issues, we would all accept his right to raise them with the Minister, and, indeed, with his party colleagues who are Ministers in the same Executive, and with other Ministers, who would be able to give the Minister support so that she could get the money?

Mr A Maginness: Naomi Long has made it very plain. Not the SDLP, but the Alliance Party, and indeed Billy Armstrong, have made it very plain that the motion and debate are part of the relentless pursuit of the Minister for Social Development. That is the situation. The Minister has made it very clear that she is under severe budgetary pressures. She has effectively lost £100 million of funding. I ask Sinn Féin: in similar circumstances, could a Minister from its party perform as well as the current Minister has performed, and would its Minister — [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. It has got to the stage where I am having difficulty hearing. Members should make their remarks through the Chair.

Mr A Maginness: I will speak more loudly.

Any other Minister, faced with a loss of £100 million in funding, would be presented with the same difficulties. The Minister has said that there are three priorities: the warm homes scheme, the Supporting People programme, and newbuild housing. From which of those priorities is the Minister to take in order to provide grants? In this situation, additional funding for the Department for Social Development is required so that the legitimate concerns of all our constituents can be met. We should all support the Minister in demanding that.

Have we heard one word of criticism from Sinn Féin of the Department of Finance or the Finance Minister? No; not one. That is because the motion is part of a political vendetta against the SDLP Minister. Innumerable motions have been brought by Mr McCann and his colleagues against the Minister, for which the only reason is political. It is not to defend the vulnerable —

Mr A Maskey: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: It is not to improve things for people —

Mr A Maskey: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: It is to attack the Minister and the SDLP because the Minister is performing well —

Mr A Maskey: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: And because the Minister has had an outstanding record.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. When it is obvious that a Member is not willing to give way, another Member should not persist in asking.

Mr A Maskey: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: I have given way; we do not get time added when making a winding-up speech.

I thank Anno Lo, Naomi Long, Billy Armstrong and my colleagues for supporting the Minister on this issue. What is now required is for the House to support the SDLP amendment, which asks for a thorough review so that we can get to grips with and resolve this problem in the same way as the special purchase of evicted dwellings problem was solved last week. That was done by two Ministers — the Minister of Finance and Personnel, Sammy Wilson, and the Minister for Social Development — coming together and working out that issue. However, that needs the support of all Members and all parties in the Assembly. I hope that people would not be perverse in pursuing a party-political attack on, or vendetta against, a Minister, to the detriment of the interests of their constituents. We want to resolve the issue for vulnerable people, not make the situation worse.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I ask the Member to bring his remarks to a close.

Mr A Maginness: All I ask is that colleagues are supportive and not critical of the Minister for Social Development in these circumstances and that they support the Minister so that she can get the extra funding that everyone wants her to.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I call Mr Mickey Brady to make a winding-up speech. I ask all Members please to give him the Floor.

Mr Brady: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. From the content of the debate so far, it is clear that the issue of grants being stopped is a serious one. Private-sector grants deal directly with unfitness and include replacement grants and potential unfitness with home-assistance repair grants. All those grants are means-tested and applicants have to prove their financial hardship. The grants are targeted at those homeowners who have no disposable income and they are primarily designed to ensure that owners and residents of substandard private accommodation can acquire a decent standard of fit accommodation and remain in their homes. That will reduce the increasing burden on public-sector housing. Surely that is reason alone to ensure that the grants are prioritised.

The number of fit newbuild properties is decreasing dramatically, and as a consequence of the decision to stop grants, unfitness in the private sector will increase. The withdrawal of grant funding will cause unemployment, as such funding generated approximately 700-plus jobs in the construction industry, across all the trades and among component suppliers to that industry.

People who live in poor housing experience poor health and poor standards of living generally, and that affects their daily lives. Housing fitness needs to be made a priority and needs to be actively pursued.

The Minister, in responding to the debate, talked about vulnerable people and how sympathetic she is. However, at a recent public meeting in Newry that was hosted by the Minister for Social Development, I was appalled by the cavalier attitude of the Minister and her party colleagues. Some people who had come to the meeting to explain the dreadful condition of their homes — the dampness and disrepair — were heckled and ridiculed by an SDLP MLA and a number of SDLP councillors.

5.45 pm

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Member give way?

Mr Brady: No, I will not give way; I was at the meeting and the Member was not.

The SDLP representatives were not prepared to listen to, or sympathise with, people whose living conditions are dire and unacceptable. Given the tenor of Mrs Kelly's contribution today, it still seems to be a source of amusement to her that those people continue to live in those dire conditions.

Sinn Féin has always supported bids for more money for social housing, and it has supported the Minister, a fact of which she is well aware.

Ms J McCann: Will the Member give way?

Mr Brady: Of course I will.

Ms J McCann: Does the Member agree that there is an onus on all Ministers to be proactive in looking for moneys that are not there? In the Minister's answer to my earlier question about her discussions with the credit union organisation, which has indicated that it could provide a substantial sum of money for the social housing programme, she stated that she met that organisation several months ago, which is not acceptable. Does the Member agree that the Minister needs to be more proactive in chasing that funding?

Mr Brady: During the debate, several Members mentioned the substandard conditions in which people are living, and the types of repairs that are required, such as fixing leaking roofs and windows. Mr McCann referred to that issue.

Thomas Burns talked about the global economic downturn, which we all know about. He also said that Sammy Wilson, apparently, clearly understands the SDLP arguments. I am glad that someone does.

Mr D Bradley: Will the Member give way?

Mr Brady: No, I will not. Simon Hamilton, speaking as Chairperson of the Committee for Social Development —

Mr D Bradley: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. During Mr Brady's contribution, he referred to me. I was the only SDLP MLA present at the DSD meeting in Newry. He made an unfounded and spurious attack on me. I think that I deserve the right to answer.

Mr Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order, but it can be referred to the Speaker.

Mr Brady: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Simon Hamilton, as Chairperson of the Committee for Social Development, talked about the problems that the Committee and, indeed, the Department are facing because of the lack of funding. He made an appropriate point that there has to be a balance in the delivery of housing standards, and that budgeting difficulties — in the sense of moving money around — are not without consequences.

Billy Armstrong was something of a cheerleader for the Minister, so I will simply pass on his points. Anna Lo mentioned specific cases in her constituency, to which we can all relate. David Hilditch spoke about there being 20,000 people in housing stress and 17% of housing stock being below decent homes standards; that is an appalling statistic. Where is the £20 million that was allocated from the monitoring round for construction and the alleviation of social deprivation?

The Minister was asked about the issue of reapplying. People come into my constituency office with letters from the Housing Executive that state that they have to reapply. Perhaps the Minister should, and could, clarify that issue with her officials.

Paul Maskey talked about the difference between the words "remove" and "review". There is a vast difference. In her intervention, Dolores Kelly went into the semantics of defining the word "review". To be perfectly honest, I am not quite sure what she was on about, but if she did not know herself, that probably explains it.

Mary Bradley said that the housing budget was not fit for purpose. We all sympathise with the fact that not enough money is there, but it has to be recognised that money is not available.

Dolores Kelly talked about Mr McCann whingeing and about his attack on the SDLP Minister. That is par for the course at the moment. I ask the same question that Fra McCann put to Naomi Long: if the Minister is not performing well, should we accept it?

Mrs Long: I am happy to answer that and to clarify my position. It is right that the Assembly should hold all Ministers to account. The problem is that one Minister is being singled out by one party for party-political reasons. If the Member wishes to look closer to home, there are a few underperforming Ministers to deal with. The Alliance Party has said that we support the Minister's request for additional funding, and we support a review of her decision; we do not support the current position.

Mr Brady: That is magnanimous, coming from a Member from a party that does not have a Minister. Mrs Long said that she does not come from a tradition that goes in for sainthood. Perhaps she recognises martyrdom, because it seems that, according to her party colleagues, the Minister is being sacrificed on the altar of the Department for Social Development.

The Minister talked a lot about the difficulties that she faces — the downturn in housing sales. We have heard her mantra of “give me the money and I will build the houses”, but many vulnerable people are not getting the service that they need and deserve. The Minister seems to be somewhat fixated with Mr McCann. I was trying to think whether they had a D H Lawrence kind of relationship. Is it “love-hate” or “hate-hate”? The SDLP appears to be paranoid about Mr McCann, and I am sure that he lies awake worrying about that. Alban Maginness also appears to be paranoid about the issue, but I shall rest our case there.

I support the motion, and I do not support the amendment. I ask the House to support the motion. Go raibh míle maith agat.

Question put, That the amendment be made.

Question accordingly negatived.

Main Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly urges the Minister for Social Development to explain why the Housing Executive has suspended the payment of home improvement grants, despite the Department for Social Development being awarded an extra £20m in the June monitoring round for housing; and further calls on the Minister to remove the suspension of these grants, which are vital to meeting the Decent Homes Standards to enable essential maintenance and home improvements work to be carried out.

Motion made:

That the Assembly do now adjourn. — [Mr Deputy Speaker.]

ADJOURNMENT

Natural Gas: Strangford

Mr Deputy Speaker: I remind Members that the proposer of the topic for the Adjournment debate will have 15 minutes in which to speak. All other Members who wish to speak will have approximately seven minutes.

Mr Hamilton: It is a pleasure to speak in this debate. Indeed, it is a pleasure to participate in what should be a positive debate on energy. All too often, we have been used to energy debates that were framed by unfortunate price rises in oil, gas or electricity. This evening, we have an opportunity to debate something positive about energy, bringing energy choice and real economic and environmental benefits to more people in Northern Ireland.

As Members will be aware, the Strangford constituency already has natural gas. Towns in the old Strangford constituency, such as Carryduff and Dundonald, which will move out of the constituency, already enjoy the benefits of natural gas. Newtownards already has natural gas, and Phoenix Natural Gas recently had its licence extended to include Comber, which is now also enjoying the benefits of natural gas.

I and, I am sure, my colleagues in the constituency want to see further expansion. We consider ourselves fortunate that there is a natural gas supplier that wants to invest in the infrastructure in our area, namely Phoenix Natural Gas, which recently applied for a further extension of its licence area to include Saintfield in mid-Down. Many Members will know where Saintfield is and how it is growing. I consider Saintfield to be a strategic staging post and a very important area in the further development of natural gas, not just in Strangford but further afield.

In many ways, the application to extend natural gas to Saintfield is a no-brainer for three broad reasons: the energy choice that it will provide; the economic benefits that it will bring; and the resultant environmental benefits. With regard to energy choice, Saintfield is typical of many of the small rural towns in Northern Ireland in that there is little or no real energy choice. Householders and businesses have to choose between coal and oil for their heating, which some might say is a difficult and unacceptable choice in this day and age. We all know about the volatility of the price of oil and coal, and many of us will struggle to remember a time when the price of oil went down significantly; it always seems to be on the rise. Likewise, the price of coal has been going up. Moreover, all Members will be mindful of the carbon-heavy nature of oil and coal and the damage that they do to the environment. Therefore, bringing natural gas to Saintfield and elsewhere in the Strangford constituency and beyond has created an energy choice.

There are obvious economic benefits to expansion, which I want to touch on. First and foremost, householders and businesses will benefit. In recent days, we have seen the 19% price cut by Phoenix Natural Gas, and Firmus Energy today announced a price cut of nearly 18%. In the case of Phoenix Natural Gas, the decrease is on the back of a similar price decrease earlier this year. Natural gas prices are as low as they have been for many a year, which provides an economic benefit for householders who use it.

It is not just the people who live in the Saintfield area and elsewhere in Strangford who would benefit; clearly, businesses would benefit. I am very mindful of the economic disadvantage that a lack of energy choice brings to our competitiveness and of the negative impact that it has on that competitiveness. For example, for businesses in the Saintfield area that could perhaps avail themselves of natural gas, particularly those that use a heavy load of gas, the benefits resulting from extending the network could be massive. Natural gas could reduce their overheads and bills significantly, and in the current climate for some businesses that might make the difference between keeping people in jobs and letting others go. Indeed, the savings that could be made might allow some small businesses to expand, such would be the impact on their bottom line if they had a wider energy choice.

The expansion of the natural gas network presents an opportunity for the public sector. Indeed, the public sector could lead by example in this matter. In some respects, the public sector has been leading by example already in the area of energy. For the past number of years, natural gas has been the fuel of choice for housing associations for newbuilds and conversions. In areas where natural gas is accessible and money has been available for conversions, homes have been switched to natural gas. In the Saintfield area and further afield, if we are lucky enough at a future date, Housing Executive stock and housing association newbuilds could be converted or built to use natural gas. Natural gas creates obvious savings for the householders who use it, and it is a much more efficient fuel, given that the efficiency standard in boilers is around 95% compared with that for very inefficient oil, Economy 7 or coal.

Natural gas is not just for housing. In the public sector, schools could convert to natural gas, and in some areas many have done so already. Leisure centres, community centres and clinics could convert to natural gas and make some savings. The previous debate centred on a lack of resources in a particular area, and that resource challenge will only increase as the years go on. Anything that can save the public sector money is worth examining, and extending the natural gas network would provide that opportunity in the Strangford constituency.

Economically, there is great benefit to be had from the infrastructural investment that would come purely from putting the pipes into the ground. Roads have to be dug up and pipes have to be laid, and men and women have to be employed to prepare for the digging and laying of the pipes. It is my understanding that, if natural gas were brought to the Saintfield area, some £2.6 million of infrastructural investment in the natural gas network would be made. That is a huge amount of money, and it is certainly not to be sniffed at in these very difficult times. I wonder how many people that will keep in employment and how many others it will give jobs to. Money going to local contractors to lay those pipes and to put that infrastructure in place will obviously create a spin-off for the wider economy as workers spend their money in shops and services in the local area.

It is important to remember that that is £2.6 million of private investment; it does not represent a begging-bowl approach, and we are not looking for a handout from the public sector. The initial investment will come largely from the private sector, and that is an opportunity that is not to be sniffed at. When the pipes are laid and the infrastructure is in place, people will want to convert to natural gas. That, in turn, will bring economic benefit for small, local installers who make a living from converting homes, businesses and the public sector estate to natural gas. There are a lot of people out there who, through small jobs in converting, will do well out of any network extension.

From the beginning to the end of any such project, consumers, businesses, the public sector, investors and installers will feel a massive economic benefit as a result of that £2.6 million investment in the infrastructure. Economically, an extension has great potential for this part of the Strangford constituency.

There are also well-recognised environmental benefits to natural gas, as opposed to other carbon-heavy fossil fuels. It is a lower-carbon fuel, and gas can certainly help Northern Ireland to make a contribution to lowering harmful greenhouse gas emissions. It is widely recognised that a gas-condensing boiler emits up to 50% less carbon than, for example, an oil boiler. That is a huge difference, and, given that we are all increasingly conscious of the damage that carbon-heavy fuels do to the environment, we must not miss this opportunity to encourage more people, more businesses, and more of our public sector estate to contribute to lowering carbon emissions in Northern Ireland.

As we look to the future of energy in Northern Ireland, we should not accept natural gas being confined to a small area around greater Belfast and to 10 towns along the North/South pipeline from Newry to Londonderry. We should not take a narrow view that gas can only be viable in those places and that everybody else should make do with the old, inefficient, carbon-heavy fuels or some hotchpotch of micro-generation renewables. We need to consider expanding our natural gas network as far and wide as possible.

That has already happened in microcosm, in Comber, where the licence area was extended. It can happen again in Saintfield, which, as I said before, is a critical staging post for the expansion of the natural gas network. From there, we can, in the future, move further north to expanding towns, such as Ballygowan, or further south through Crossgar into big towns, such as Downpatrick, where benefits could be immense for business, consumers and the public sector estate. We should expand the network; this is an important first step towards expansion into the south-east.

I am heartened by the inclusion in the draft strategic energy framework of a reference to expanding the natural gas network, not only in the south-east of Northern Ireland but into the west. I commend the Minister for her efforts towards achieving that aim. She obviously has a constituency interest in the expansion of the natural gas network in that direction, and she is right to fight for that. There are particular benefits in moving west, especially for business. Many big businesses in the west of Northern Ireland would benefit immensely from the availability of natural gas.

I appreciate that technical issues need to be considered and that the Utility Regulator needs to complete an economic appraisal of the proposal. Every “i” must be dotted and every “t” crossed, and I expect nothing less. Although we are debating the matter today, and the Minister is present to reply, I appreciate that she cannot deal with the issue herself; it is a matter for the Utility Regulator. I am happy to leave him to do his job, but I urge and plead with him to listen to the people of Strangford when making his assessment. He should listen to the businesses there and, most importantly, to the views of the elected representatives of that constituency, which have been expressed here today. He should ensure that the natural gas network extends to Saintfield and, hopefully, with further investment in the future, beyond, so that the energy choice and economic and environmental benefits of natural gas reach as many people as possible in Northern Ireland.

Mr McCarthy: I support this evening's proposal. During the first period of devolution, my colleague Sean Neeson led the campaign to extend natural gas to the north-west and elsewhere in Northern Ireland. Sean and the Alliance Party continue to support that notion.

In its strategic energy framework, the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment committed to encouraging a shift away from domestic dependence on oil for home heating to natural gas. We certainly agree with that sentiment, and I am glad that the Minister is present in the Chamber.

The natural gas industry arrived in the 1990s, and there are now 125,000 gas customers in the greater Belfast, Larne and Lisburn licensed areas. In greater Belfast, the vast majority of Housing Executive homes have been connected to natural gas. Almost all newbuild properties, nearly every large business and, I am informed, over 60% of smaller businesses have gas as their means of energy. In the 10 years up to and including 2008, approximately 200 new customers were connected to the natural gas network every week right across Northern Ireland.

As Mr Hamilton said, natural gas will deliver real enterprise and economic value to the proposed new areas. In addition to their private shareholder natural gas investment, the wider natural gas industry is investing in the local economy. Over £500 million has been invested by all involved in the gas industry over the past 10 years, most of which has employed local labour to convert homes and businesses to natural gas.

Phoenix Gas estimates that rolling out the natural gas network to new areas could add approximately 1,000 new jobs to the local construction and service industries, which is surely good news for everyone in Northern Ireland, particularly in these trying times. Natural gas makes Northern Ireland more marketable to inward investors who wish to locate their businesses here. Diversification of energy supply reduces prices for consumers: Minister Ritchie mentioned that earlier, and we all welcome those efforts.

Along with Simon Hamilton, the Alliance Party welcomes the Phoenix Gas planning application to extend its network throughout the Strangford constituency and into the Saintfield area. Natural gas should be made more available to increase energy competition, leading to a further reduction in prices for consumers. Reducing fuel prices is a key weapon in the fight against fuel poverty, and extending the natural gas network will have a range of other benefits, including a reduction in greenhouse gases and the creation of jobs in installing the required infrastructures.

We welcome the recent 19% reduction in gas prices. It is not so long ago that we were on the opposite side of the fence, when there were huge increases in gas prices that would have been a deterrent to conversion.

Hopefully, we are entering a new dispensation; many will say that the 19% reduction is not before time. Let us hope that that trend continues.

The Alliance Party looks forward to natural gas being made more widely available to consumers in rural areas. I must mention my constituency now: I have a particular interest in the Ards Peninsula and mentioned it a number of times to the gas providers. They said at the time that, if there was sufficient demand in that area, they would consider it, but why should the residents of the Ards Peninsula or, indeed, any other area in the Strangford constituency be denied the choice of cheaper energy for their homes and businesses? In the meantime, we welcome the proposals that are afoot and support the Adjournment topic.

Mr Shannon: I support the Adjournment topic and congratulate Simon Hamilton on giving us the opportunity to comment on it. As a representative of the Strangford constituency, I am keen for natural gas to be installed and available for all the people there.

I do not wish to sound like an advertiser for Phoenix Gas or any other natural gas provider, nor do I want to repeat what everyone else has said. However, having read the Phoenix Gas information booklet, I want to take a slightly different angle and look at the benefits of natural gas for householders.

I read an information booklet from Phoenix Gas today, and I could not help but see the real benefits that come from using natural gas, whether at home or in business. The sales pitch states that natural gas offers choice and flexibility. It can be used to power central heating or single appliances. It is not unlike electricity in that appliances can be used for cooking, and, although I have never used a tumble dryer, those can still be used too.

Natural gas offers choice in how to run the home. It offers control, and that is an option that a lot of people in Strangford do not have. Natural gas central heating is ideal for all lifestyles: for someone like me, who comes home in the early hours of the morning, or my wife, who is at home all day with the boys. At the touch of a button, enjoy cosy warmth and plenty of hot water — I sound like an advert on the television — without the need for an expensive immersion heater. There are cost savings, which we should be encouraging.

I like an open fire, but living-flame fires look and feel like genuine coal fires without the soot, ash, dirt and cleaning. There are advantages for an almost single man: I am married, of course, but I am almost like a single man in relation to my home.

A natural gas cooker can transform the way in which one cooks, giving total control and an instant precise response from a gas hob. For someone who used to live on Chinese takeaways before becoming diabetic, that is of great advantage. I sound as if I am making a sales pitch, but the choice of cookers, hobs and ranges has never been more exciting. As Members can hear, I am enthralled by natural gas appliances.

I will come to a serious point: natural gas costs less than electricity. That is why we want to have it in Strangford. A newspaper headline today pointed out that NIE has dropped its prices by 5%. “Bully for NIE” is all I can say. The prices were dropped by 10% a while ago. Every one of us receives an electricity bill. People regularly come to my office to tell me of their concerns about debt and the fact that their electricity bill is two or three times higher than it used to be. For NIE to drop prices by 5% or 10% is not sufficient. That can be balanced against the natural gas tariffs. Phoenix Gas has dropped its tariff by 19%. That matters. It was dropped by a significant figure a short time ago.

Gas-powered tumble dryers do not just cut back on charges compared with NIE, they also reduce electricity usage. That is the type of effect that we want to see. Here is an interesting fact for those who aspire to look after their own home — I am not sure whether I am one of those people: running costs of a natural gas tumble dryer are half that of an electric one. The typical annual running cost of a gas-powered tumble dryer is £25.20, compared with that of an electric tumble dryer, which costs £65.91. There is a clear difference.

It is all about choice. My colleagues Simon Hamilton and Kieran McCarthy have said that the people of Strangford deserve and should have a choice. I cannot sign up for this miracle of modern life, this gas, at my home address, because it is not available there. Nor can I do so at my work address. I cannot get natural gas at work or at the office. That is not just Jim Shannon talking; it is all the people in the Strangford area who live in Newtownards and who cannot get natural gas. I cannot get the wonderful money-saving aid in a time of economic depression to help my constituents in the Strangford area or anywhere down the Ards Peninsula. Some areas of Newtownards have access to natural gas, but there are a great many other areas that do not. On the whole, it is not readily available. We hope that gas will be available in Comber and Saintfield soon.

It is long past time that our rural constituents have access to the gas network, especially given the well-publicised downturn in gas prices. For that reason, I join my colleague Simon Hamilton in asking the gas company to take note of the needs of the Strangford people and take action. It is very important that natural gas be made available to the new houses that have been built in Strangford over the last while and that people there can take advantage of the price reductions.

Northern Ireland has the best broadband coverage in the UK. If that can be achieved in rural areas, then surely natural gas can be made available to everyone who wishes to purchase it. It is long past time that our rural constituents are afforded the same opportunities as those in the rest of the Province. It is long past time that natural gas output was extended throughout Strangford: to the Ards Peninsula; all of Newtownards; Comber; Saintfield; and to Crossgar and Ballynahinch, which will soon become part of the Strangford territory. I support the motion.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I have no doubt that Phoenix Gas will be rushing to the Ards Peninsula in the morning to get Mr Shannon to sign a marketing contract. [Laughter.]

Mr P J Bradley: I thank Mr Hamilton for introducing the Adjournment debate on the extension of the natural gas network in the part of County Down that he represents. I fully support the views outlined by him and his constituency colleagues; I will call them the Strangford three from now on.

My support is twofold. First, I always support proposals that I consider to be of benefit to the people of County Down. Secondly, if the desired pipeline eventually makes its way further into the Strangford constituency, it will be just one step removed from South Down, which is the part of the county that I represent.

If the gas pipeline is extended within the Strangford constituency, and I sincerely hope that that it is, it would be relatively easy to make a similar case for the residents and businesspeople of Saintfield, Ballynahinch, Crossgar, Downpatrick, Castletwellan and Newcastle. The western part of South Down will be serviced by a different pipeline, thus my comments relate to the area bordering the Strangford constituency. However, I have fears regarding Kilkeel, which, geographically, is so far removed from both pipelines that it may have to wait for another day.

Extending the natural gas pipeline within the Strangford constituency will enable many new customers to be served. Towns, communities and individuals stand to benefit economically. Mr Hamilton referred to the potential benefits that an extension of the natural gas pipeline will bring, and I agree with him. New investment will provide valuable jobs in the gas installation industry. Heating engineers will have a role to play, and the private house-building sector will experience additional benefits in its field of expertise. From a social perspective, the introduction of a mains gas supply to family homes should improve the standard of living and leave occupants with more disposable income.

In its document ‘New Priorities in Difficult Times’, the SDLP proposes the establishment of a £12 million investment fund in 2009-2010 to kick-start the facilitation of the maximum penetration of natural gas in Northern Ireland. It is not enough to run spurs from the main transmissions into adjacent towns. Distribution networks need to be rolled out to as many towns as possible, thereby offering choice to all customers. Phoenix Gas and Firmus Energy will require an element of public subsidy and/or sympathetic regulations to accelerate the development of the two networks into new areas.

I support the request that Mr Hamilton made on behalf of his Strangford constituents who are still without a gas supply. I have no doubt that the Members for Strangford will support me when the time comes for the pipeline to be extended to South Down.

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (Mrs Foster): I am sure that we were all enthralled by Jim's description of domestic chores.

Mr Hamilton: He is a domestic goddess.

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment: He is a domestic god rather than a domestic goddess. He spoke about how he will do the cooking and the tumble-drying. I cannot wait, and Mrs Shannon must be very excited by the whole prospect. [Laughter.]

On a serious note, I congratulate Mr Hamilton for securing the Adjournment debate. I very much welcome the opportunity to discuss this important issue in the House today. The debate is timely because, as was mentioned, the new strategic energy framework for Northern Ireland is out for consultation. One of our chief goals is to improve the security and diversity of supply. The extension of Northern Ireland's gas network is a key element of our planning in that respect.

I want to set out a bit of the background to the gas industry in Northern Ireland. Natural gas is a relatively new phenomenon here. It arrived in 1996 via the Scotland to Northern Ireland pipeline, known as SNIP, which is the undersea gas pipeline. Initially, it was principally intended to help to fuel electricity generation by way of a new combined cycle gas turbine at Ballylumford.

Since then, the industry has expanded steadily. In addition to being Northern Ireland's primary source of power generation, gas now brings the cleanest burning fossil fuel to many homes and businesses throughout greater Belfast, including, as Mr Hamilton mentioned, areas in the Strangford constituency, as well as to other parts of the Province.

In the past decade, Phoenix Natural Gas has constructed significant networks, and it has grown its customer base in the licence areas of greater Belfast and Larne to approximately 125,000. That has helped to establish natural gas as a major competitive source of fuel for the commercial and domestic energy sectors. I do, however, accept that the company operates in a specific area of Northern Ireland, and I will touch on that subject later.

Further development of the gas infrastructure has taken place over the past five years, with the construction of a major gas transmission pipeline to the north-west of Northern Ireland in 2004. That not only supplies fuel to the electricity power station at Coolkeeragh but brings gas to businesses and householders in the urban areas of Londonderry, Limavady, Coleraine, Ballymoney and Ballymena.

The construction of a gas transmission link with the Republic of Ireland through the South/North pipeline was completed in 2006 and provides security of supply in the event of the pipeline from Scotland becoming unavailable. It is important for Northern Ireland not to be reliant on only one source. That link has also led to natural gas being provided to the towns and cities of Newry, Banbridge, Craigavon and Antrim.

Firmus Energy has approximately 5,000 customers in the areas adjacent to the north-west and South/North pipelines. It continues to roll out the gas infrastructure in the area for which it is licensed. That sets the current network of gas in Northern Ireland in context.

To turn now to Strangford, natural gas has been available in the northern part of the constituency for some time. Phoenix Natural Gas, as part of its original development plans for greater Belfast, has been supplying customers in Newtownards, Dundonald and Carryduff for several years. In 2007, Phoenix applied for, and was granted from the regulator, permission to expand its gas network in the Strangford constituency to include Comber and a quarry on the edge of the constituency at Temple.

As Members know, and as was mentioned in the debate, other parts of the Ards Peninsula are less densely populated and, therefore, an economically viable gas network may not be possible. That is the position from an economic perspective, but bear with me and I speak more about that later.

We are undertaking work to consider the potential for the roll-out of natural gas elsewhere. That may have some direct relevance to rural areas in the rest of the Strangford constituency and in the South Down constituency.

I am aware that the gas industry has been considering how the roll-out of gas can be further increased. Within the past six weeks, Phoenix has applied to extend its licence area to bring natural gas to Saintfield. The application is with the Utility Regulator who has the main responsibility for issuing gas conveyance and supply licences. I spoke to him only yesterday, when he told me that he was working through the application. Work is, therefore, ongoing.

Indeed, Phoenix has been giving thought to how the gas network might be extended to east Down and further, to Downpatrick.

The Department is conscious of the need to encourage the continued development of the gas network to those rural areas that may not be covered. We are undertaking a number of initiatives to realise that. Along with the Utility Regulator, we recently commissioned consultants to undertake a study to consider the technical issues and the costs and benefits that are associated with extending the gas network. That will involve a feasibility study to look at the potential pipeline routes and gas loads in the towns to the west and north-west of Northern Ireland. That study's conclusions will provide me with some information that will not only be useful to the areas that are directly assessed but is likely to have direct relevance to other areas of Northern Ireland for which proposals are being considered by the wider gas industry.

We have heard from the Members present that there are clear benefits to be obtained from extending the natural gas network in Northern Ireland, such as the diversity of fuel supply and a reduction in carbon emissions. To that extent, we must consider the future development of the natural gas network to help us to encourage a shift in domestic use away from oil to more efficient use of gas. Therefore, in conjunction with the Utility Regulator and major gas stakeholders, it is proposed to establish a gas strategic development group, which will consider how the Northern Ireland gas market can be further developed.

However, it must be stressed that, at present, the expansion of the gas network to towns in the west, the north-west, the Strangford constituency or anywhere else in Northern Ireland can take place only where it is economically viable to do so. An important part of our gas extension study, and any consideration for extending the gas network, must be an assessment of the realisable gas loads in the respective areas. Indeed, there are locations in the existing gas licence areas in which the take-up of natural gas has been disappointing in some sectors. We are very keen for businesses and domestic users to consider gas and, perhaps, dual fuel as an option.

Mr McCarthy: I thank the Minister for giving way. On the last point that she made, does she agree that the enormous hike in the price of gas in the past year or so — I think that there were two huge increases — is enough to put off anyone converting to gas? Will she also ensure that the price of gas will be regulated when the number of customers is substantial? There should be some mechanism in place so that companies — whatever company it may be — do not have a monopoly and are unable to charge whatever price they like to the customers who use their supply.

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment: Indeed. That is why we have the Utility Regulator to deal with those very issues. Although Members may think that I should not have to, it is important to state that the Utility Regulator is completely independent of the Government. He does not fall under my remit or the remit of anybody else: he is completely independent.

Last week, I had the opportunity to meet the head of all the European regulators. We made the point that all the regulators in Europe should be completely independent from Governments and should also be on a level playing field. We have concerns about some countries in that regard, but the Utility Regulator is completely independent in Northern Ireland. He will take into account the issues that the Member raised.

With natural gas now established as a major fuel source for industrial and domestic consumers in many parts of Northern Ireland, I very much welcome Phoenix Supply's recent announcement that it is to reduce its gas tariffs by 19%. Firmus Energy has brought down its price for domestic customers by nearly 18% in its licensed area. Those announcements are extremely welcome for their customers in what are, as many Members have said, very difficult economic times.

In conclusion, the debate is timely, given that we are developing a new strategic energy framework. It has given me another opportunity to underline the importance of people making known their views on that strategic framework, and to say that I regard our energy infrastructure, including extending our gas network, as a key element in that framework moving forward.

Adjourned at 6.45 pm.

NORTHERN IRELAND ASSEMBLY

Monday 21 September 2009

The Assembly met at 12.00 noon (Mr Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

ASSEMBLY BUSINESS

Mr Attwood: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. You will recall that, before the summer recess, I raised a point of order about the time that Ministers were taking to reply to questions from the Floor, and a useful ruling was made.

I wish to raise a point of order on a separate matter. There is concern about how much time Ministers are taking to reply on issues that have been raised by Committees. For example, on 7 July 2009, the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister wrote to the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister (OFMDFM) about the Child Poverty Bill. The Ministers replied 71 days later, 36 minutes before a Committee meeting began. The late receipt of that 10-page letter gave Committee members little time to consider the issues that had been raised.

Requirements for how quickly Ministers reply to matters that are raised by Committees should be laid down, because replying 71 days after matters have been raised, and 36 minutes before the beginning of a Committee meeting, is ludicrous and unreasonable behaviour that needs to be rectified.

Mr Speaker: I hear what the Member said; he raised a number of issues. First, I do not see this as an issue for the Assembly. It is certainly an issue for the appropriate Committee, and the Member's remarks are now on record, so I would like to think that that Committee will take up and deal with that matter. However, at this moment in time, it is not a matter for the Assembly.

Mr Attwood: I acknowledge that, Mr Speaker.

Further to that point of order Mr Speaker. If it is necessary for you to safeguard the interests of the Assembly with respect to Ministers replying in good time to matters that have been raised on the Floor of the House, it seems consistent that the same principle should apply to Ministers replying to Committee issues. I suggest that where there are clearly unreasonable periods of time before matters are replied to, and those replies are made beyond the eleventh hour, that is a matter not only for the Committees, but for you.

Mr Speaker: I have some sympathy for what the Member is saying. I suggest that, were he to table a motion to the House, it would further highlight the issue and the problems that relate to that particular Committee.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT

North/South Ministerial Council Agriculture Sectoral Meeting

Mr Speaker: I have received notice from the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development that she wishes to make a statement on the North/South Ministerial Council agriculture sectoral meeting.

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development (Ms Gildernew): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. With your permission, I wish to make a statement in compliance with section 52 of the NI Act 1998, regarding the tenth meeting of the North/South Ministerial Council (NSMC) in the agriculture sector, held at the Greenmount Campus of the College of Agriculture, Food and Rural Enterprise (CAFRE) on 21 July 2009.

The Executive were represented by the Minister of the Environment, Edwin Poots, and me. The Irish Government were represented by Brendan Smith TD, Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, and Éamon Ó Cuív TD, Minister for Community, Rural and Gaeltacht Affairs. This statement has been agreed with Edwin Poots, and I am making it on behalf of us both.

At the meeting, Ministers reviewed developments on EU agriculture matters and welcomed the European Commission's actions in addressing the dairy market situation. Ministers also welcomed the recent concessions secured in Brussels in relation to the implementation of sheep electronic identification and emphasised the importance of ongoing co-operation on the matter.

Ministers noted progress on activities for the delivery of the draft all-island animal health and welfare strategy and welcomed arrangements for a cross-border event in the autumn. That event will bring together key stakeholders to discuss the delivery of the strategy. It will help to build genuine partnerships in the development of policy and will enable stakeholders to discuss a strategic approach and a forward work programme.

The Council noted that the final report from the plant health and pesticides steering group on a joint strategic approach to plant health and pesticides will be presented to a meeting of the North/South Ministerial Council in the autumn.

Ministers welcomed a presentation from the International Centre for Local and Regional Development on its recent study on rural restructuring, which considers the impact and future of rural restructuring policy and practice throughout the island.

The Council welcomed the positive impact of co-operation on the 2000-06 EU programmes for the cross-border rural economy, including the creation of 80 new rural enterprises and assistance to 600 enterprises through the rural development measure of INTERREG IIIA.

Ministers also welcomed the opening of the rural development sub-theme of the EU INTERREG IVA programme for applications; the approval of a Peace III project that seeks to address issues of sectarianism and racism in a rural context, and the allocation of funding for co-operation projects, including cross-border projects, under the LEADER elements of the rural development programme 2007-2013.

The Council agreed that its next meeting in agriculture sectoral format will take place in November 2009.

Mr Speaker: Before I call any other Member to ask a question, I remind the House once again that the convention that the Speaker permits the relevant Committee Chairperson or Deputy Chairperson some latitude to raise more than one matter on behalf of the Committee does not extend to any other Member. I refer the House to my ruling of 26 January 2009 in which I dealt with the matter at some length. If it would be helpful for me to summarise what I said at that time, I will do so.

Questions following a ministerial statement are not an opportunity for speeches or debate; long introductions will not be allowed; and Members who are called may ask one question relating to the statement. If I, or my Deputy Speakers, consider that those simple conventions are being abused, the Member concerned will be asked to resume his or her seat and the next Member will be called.

In the House, I have often said that ministerial statements are important: they give Members an opportunity to ask a question and to hold the Minister and the Department to account. However, they are not an opportunity for debate, nor do they provide an opportunity for Members to make long introductions or ask multiple questions. If any Member abuses convention, my intention is to ask him or her to take his or her seat, and we will move on to the next Member. I hope that that is clear.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development (Mr Paisley Jnr): Thank you, Mr Speaker, for your invitation, generosity and latitude; they are most appreciated.

I welcome the Minister's statement. I think that everyone will welcome the measures that Commissioner Fischer Boel announced last week to help the dairy sector in the short, medium and long term. It is appropriate to pay tribute to the work of Commissioner Fischer Boel as she moves to another role, because she had particular and significant interest in what happened in this part of the European Community. Given the weakened state of our industry, any help, no matter how little, is more than welcome. My Committee will meet with Commissioner Fischer Boel's cabinet next week, and we will be placing the state of the dairy industry high on the agenda. I am sure that the Minister agrees that price fluctuations create and generate uncertainty in the milk industry, and anything that can help us through that uncertainty will be beneficial to the sector.

Will the Minister advise the House of the outcomes, to date, of the dairy task force, and of what those outcomes mean in a practical sense to the dairy industry in Northern Ireland? Will she also tell the House whether she has succeeded in removing the overbearing bureaucracies in imposing the electronic identification scheme for sheep, which has caused some concern, and on which I would like her update.

Does the Minister agree that the draft all-island animal health and welfare strategy, as mentioned in her statement, has lost considerable credibility, given the dioxin issue? If we do not get access to all of the information all of the time, as was the case with the dioxin incident, any credibility that an all-island animal health and welfare strategy will have will be lessened. My Committee will be reporting very soon on that issue, so we will be following the Minister's comments with interest.

Development: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank the Chairman of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development for his question. I also add my comments to his about the outgoing commissioner Mariann Fischer Boel, because we had a genuine working relationship with her. She understood fully the challenges that we were going through on a wide range of issues. At the September Agriculture Council meeting, she made a presentation on the dairy sector, and she used our example as an industry that was very hard hit by the depressed world market. She had a great grasp of the issues, and she understood fully the challenges of farming in the North. We were glad to welcome her to this year's Balmoral Show, at which she spoke at the Thursday morning breakfast event. In fact, now that she is moving on, we are especially glad that she attended this year's show. We have full admiration and respect for Commissioner Fischer Boel. We wish her well, and we will have to work hard to build up the same level of relationship with her successor.

Mr Paisley Jnr raised a question on the all-island animal health and welfare strategy. In view of the example of the dioxin incident that the Chairman gave, it is more important than ever that we have strong measures and protocols in place and that we work together to ensure that the difficulties that arose from the dioxin issue do not happen again. The likes of the all-island animal health and welfare strategy will be crucially important in protecting us from difficulties such as those that arose from the dioxin incident last December.

On the day in October on which the auction price for the dairy sector came through, I had a meeting with the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (DEFRA) Minister, Hilary Benn, on another issue. When we got the auction price, we raised the issue of export refunds with him.

DEFRA's normal position is to stay away from intervention and such measures to support the market. The Department argued very strongly, as it did earlier in the year for the pig sector, that export refunds were required to protect the industry and to create a floor to prevent prices from falling further.

I have just come from a meeting with our three MEPs in which that very issue was discussed. I told the MEPs that the European Commission must be made aware that export refunds are an invaluable tool and that without them many more of our dairy farmers would have gone out of business. Although prices have been slightly more encouraging of late, the Department accepts that there is still a long way to go before the industry returns to its previous levels of sustainability.

On the issue of sheep electronic identification (EID), the Chairperson of the Agriculture Committee will be aware that the Department worked very hard last year to ensure that our keepers were not forced into having to double-tag their sheep. Scotland, Wales and England all moved to double tagging in January 2009. The Department knew that the sheep EID system is to be introduced here by January 2010, and it felt that to put two systems in place in a very short space of time would have been hugely problematic for our sheep keepers. Therefore, it resisted moving to double tagging and is now set to move to the sheep EID system.

The EU has set a compulsory implementation date for sheep EID of 31 December 2009, so we have to have the system in place by the end of the year. The purpose of EID is to enable sheep movements to be recorded on an individual basis. The Department is working closely with the South and Britain to ensure that systems are put in place that will minimise the volume of administrative work and the cost burden that is placed on keepers here. As part of that, the Department published a consultation paper on the new rules for sheep EID on 11 September 2009, and I would encourage all who are involved in the sheep industry to submit their views.

The Department has received some very useful soundings from the industry already, and it has secured a number of very important derogations to help to minimise the risk of introducing sheep EID. It wants to continue to work with the EU and the sheep industry to ensure that sheep EID does not pose a threat, but rather becomes a valuable tool. Go raibh míle maith agat.

Mr Doherty: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. In some ways, the Chairperson of the Agriculture Committee has already touched on my question. Indeed, that reminds me of a comment that was made that the more we work together as a Committee, the more we become like each other — even politically.

Mr Paisley Jnr: You are setting yourself very high standards.

Mr Doherty: Absolutely.

My question is perhaps more specific than those posed by the Chairperson, and it is whether there are any plans to hold a stakeholders' conference on an island-wide basis to discuss how to advance the all-island animal health strategy? Furthermore, if such plans do exist, how advanced are they?

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: At the NSMC meeting in the agriculture sectoral format on 20 March 2009, Ministers agreed to convene a cross-border event later this year. That event will bring together key stakeholders from across the island to discuss the delivery of that strategy and the all-island strategic approach to animal health and welfare. The steering group met in early June, and again last week, to progress the plans for the event, and arrangements are well in hand to hold that meeting this autumn. The two Departments agree that cognisance of stakeholders' views must continue to be taken in the delivery of the strategy.

It is expected that a date for the event will be agreed soon, and the attendance of members of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development would be welcomed. Indeed, it would be beneficial if members of the Agriculture Committees on both parts of the island attended that event and made a positive contribution to it.

Mr Elliott: I also thank the Minister for her statement to the House today. Does the Minister accept that the operation of the sheep EID system will be unfair, given that a number of other European countries will not be required to implement it as they have smaller numbers of sheep than we do? Has the Minister had any discussion with European Commission members on that issue, because we are being placed at a significant disadvantage?

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: I have spoken with the relevant Commissioner, Commissioner Vassiliou, on the issue of electronic tagging. During those discussions, I stressed the need for us to have an appropriate system in place, because I do not believe that a one-size-fits-all approach will work for everyone.

Our industry here has a huge amount of trade with the South. When we discussed the issue of double tagging, we told the commissioner that animals exported across the water would comply with the double tagging regime in Britain but we wanted to keep the trade going on the island, as it is absolutely massive compared with trade anywhere else.

We are still working on a number of issues relevant to us, especially cross-border trade, and we will continue to seek flexibility on that. There is a concern around traceability, as we saw during the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in 2001. We want to be able to protect our traceability. The industry has been very good and has worked closely with the Department. It recognises the benefits that EID would bring, especially in light of the derogations that we got, such as individual flock keepers not needing to purchase readers because their flocks can be read at the mart or the abattoir. We are trying to find a system that is as cost effective as possible and that will maximise the benefits of EID. I am co-operating and having discussions with European Commissioners and their officials on an ongoing basis.

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. In paragraph 4 her statement, the Minister referred to reviewing developments in relation to EU agricultural matters. Will she expand on what those developments are and how they benefit the local agricultural and rural development sector?

Development: I am not sure what the Member is referring to. Paragraph 4 covers sheep electronic identification and matters to address the dairy market situation. Hopefully, I have covered as much of the sheep EID as is necessary, but if I have not, I will be happy to reply to him in writing. With regard to the dairy market situation, the discussion at the meeting on 21 July was around global milk pricing and the difficulties that we were experiencing. The situation in the South is similar to ours. We also had a discussion about export refunds and the need for those to continue.

Mr Ford: I thank the Minister for her statement. She has given some very comprehensive answers regarding the early part of the report. Unfortunately, other aspects of the report are a bit like so many other reports. For example, we were told that Ministers welcomed the presentation on the issue of rural restructuring. Will the Minister explain what that report was? With reference to the report expected on plant health and pesticides, will the Minister give a commitment as to when it will be published, as opposed to it being discussed at the next NSMC?

Development: A joint strategic approach on the issue of plant health and pesticides will be presented at the next meeting. The report is not ready for publication; I will come back to the Member when it is. The report will be presented to our meeting in the autumn, which I think will be in November.

I am glad that the Member asked the question about the International Centre for Local and Regional Development's (ICLRD) rural restructuring report. I had the privilege of officially launching that report at the Rural College in Draperstown in June this year. I thought that the report's findings were particularly relevant to the issues discussed at the NSMC agriculture and rural development meeting. On that basis, I invited the ICLR to come to the Council and make a presentation on the study. The report provides a comprehensive perspective on the challenges facing rural areas and on how we ensure that effective and sustainable solutions are developed through partnership and working with all stakeholders.

The social capital in our rural communities is highlighted as a means of ensuring a strong and vibrant economy. That fits well with the support available through my Department's rural development programme and other rurally focused initiatives, such as the rural aspect of the new INTERREG programme.

Over the next few years, our new anti-poverty and social exclusion programme will offer communities and people in rural areas the opportunity to tackle and address local poverty and exclusion issues in their areas. That will contribute to ensuring a balanced and inclusive rural society, which is so important in the overall challenge of rural restructuring. The presentation by ICLR generated interesting discussions between Ministers, and I am confident that that will help to further focus our collective efforts on rural development across the region.

As an aside, the report considered three areas: an area in Cork; Draperstown in County Derry; and the Aghnacloy/Emyvale area on the border between Tyrone and Monaghan. I would be delighted to pass on a copy of the report to the Member so that he can read it himself. Were I to list everything that was discussed at the meeting, Members would be shouting at me for boring them to tears. I try to give a summary and Members can ask questions on that basis.

Mr Shannon: I thank the Minister for her statement. The mind boggles when one thinks of electronic ID for sheep and, literally, hundreds of thousands of sheep with chips in their ears. There will be some work to do there.

The Minister mentioned the EU programmes for the cross-border rural economy, specifically 18 new rural enterprises and assistance to 600 enterprises. It seems to be a massive undertaking. Will the Minister confirm that all parts of the Province will be involved in the rural economy through the rural enterprises and assistance, and, specifically, will that include my constituency of Strangford? It would be remiss of me not to ask. I am sure the Minister will tell me that it will —

Mr Speaker: The Member must come to the question; that is a long introduction.

Mr Shannon: Will the rural enterprise programme involve the Strangford constituency?

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: Absolutely. I hope that it will involve areas right across the Six Counties. I would be disappointed if the Member did not mention Strangford to me at least once a day. The Department's proposals, including a rural White Paper and the enhancement of rural proofing, were agreed by the Executive in July. The White Paper will be key to defining our vision for rural areas. I recognise that it is not an easy task, but one that can be developed only by harnessing the skills and experience of people who know what it is like to live and work in a rural area.

We have the tools in place to help us to ensure that every part of the rural economy can be involved in, and contribute to, the overall economy and can play a role in building a sustainable and vibrant rural community.

Mr W Clarke: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I too thank the Minister for her statement. What preventative measures has she put in place to deal with the threat of bluetongue?

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: At the meeting on 21 July we, thankfully, only touched on the issue of bluetongue. It is obviously an ongoing issue, and we are being very vigilant, but I am grateful that, at this stage, we are not having full-scale meetings about bluetongue and the need to protect our island. The range of preventative measures that we have in place to minimise the risk of bluetongue reaching the island are working. We carry out post-import testing of all imported sheep and cattle from Europe and Britain, and we are taking steps to ensure that importers know the risks and the measures that they can put in place to minimise them. For animals coming from bluetongue zones, pre-import testing is one of the conditions laid down by EU regulations, although is not always necessary if the animals satisfy other conditions. We have worked closely with industry stakeholders, and other measures are not considered necessary at this time.

least daily for signs of disease and to report any suspicions immediately. To help farmers to do that, my Department has issued all cattle and sheep owners with a leaflet that outlines the clinical signs and symptoms that they should look out for.

I will use this opportunity to reiterate the message that has been expressed many times in the House and in other forums. If we are to keep bluetongue out of the North, farmers must not import cattle from bluetongue-infected areas. That message was expressed very strongly earlier this year, and I reiterate it now and ask farmers and dealers not to import cattle from bluetongue-infected areas, so as to minimise the risk of our cattle catching the disease. We have been very fortunate so far in keeping it out, but I need the support and co-operation of the farming industry to ensure that that remains the case.

Mr Savage: I thank the Minister for her statement. Will she outline the benefits that her discussions with Minister Smith will bring to the agri-food industry here in Northern Ireland?

12.30 pm

Development: My discussions with Minister Smith cover a wide range of work. Obviously, out of necessity, one of the areas that we discuss is disease control. We have to work closely to try to protect the island against infectious diseases. We also co-operate closely on diseases that have already had an impact; for example, we still have a problem with brucellosis, but the South has applied for brucellosis-free status.

Co-operation is important, especially given the nature of the farming industry on the island, as people tend to go to marts to buy stock wherever those marts may be on the island. There is cross-border trade between marts and abattoirs, and, as we saw from the dioxin incident, feed and other products cross the border. This is a small island, and farmers operate across the border every day. We want to ensure that the processes that the two Departments put in place support farmers, enable them to trade across the border and remove some of the burdens and difficulties that they face in keeping their stock levels up and in continuing to farm.

A lot of milk that is produced in the North is processed in the South, which raises issues with the dairy sector. Similarly, a lot of the South's pork is processed in the North. Therefore, co-operation is important. Discussions are ongoing between the Departments, and, as I said, we converse regularly on a wide range of issues.

We still have a long way to go, and a number of difficulties are still being experienced. For example, some Members have written to me about people who have shown cattle in one county but faced difficulties when they tried to show them in a neighbouring county that happened to be across the border. We want to see an end to some of those difficulties for farmers so that they are able to compete across the island and maximise the profitability from their farming enterprises.

Mr Burns: I thank the Minister for her statement. She referred to an all-island animal health strategy. Will the Minister tell us whether there was any discussion about tuberculosis and its eradication on the other side of the border? I know that considerable work is being done on this side of the border, but what work is being done on the other side of the border?

Development: The actions that are being taken in the South on TB vary slightly from the work that we are doing. For example, for a number of years, the South has been involved in a wildlife strategy, which is not necessarily the route that we are taking. We want to improve our figures on TB, and last December, we outlined a new strategic approach for how we will deal with TB, having taken on board the work of the TB core stakeholder working group. Therefore, the approach has been developed with our key stakeholders, and it is an agreed joint industry/Government approach.

Brendan Smith and my counterparts in the South have taken various decisions about TB, and their systems are different from ours. For example, they have a cap on animal disease compensation levels that we do not have. They also have different arrangements for social security benefits for when herds are bought out and farmers cannot reintroduce cattle to their holdings. Although there is a lot of co-operation, we may not necessarily want to go down the same route that they have taken. We will continue to liaise closely with our counterparts, but, in this instance, we do not have a strategy that covers all 32 counties; we have different strategies for tackling TB and brucellosis.

Mr Molloy: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle agus a Aire. Will the Minister consider taking a similar approach to that taken in the South, given that it now has brucellosis-free status?

Development: The South has now applied for brucellosis-free status, and we look with envy at that situation. It is a terrible disease, and we have worked hard to try to eradicate it and to try to get us to the same situation that exists in the South. We are considering what further steps we can take to intensify our efforts to push towards achieving official brucellosis-free status in the North.

Obviously, there is nervousness. We were nearly free of brucellosis and the South was still facing difficulties with it. We got reinfected, and now it is back. We want the entire island to be brucellosis-free, and we are one of the very few places left in Europe that still has a problem with the disease. We can take steps by working together, particularly with the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development. We may need to continue to be creative and imaginative in how we deal with brucellosis.

It will be important how we deal with the disease at policy level, as well as at farm level. The Department has had very good co-operation from farmers, with three working groups set up in three areas to examine the problems of brucellosis and how to tackle it. More needs to be done, and we must not be found wanting.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE BUSINESS

Water and Sewerage Services (Amendment) Bill

First Stage

The Minister for Regional Development (Mr Murphy): I beg to introduce the Water and Sewerage Services (Amendment) Bill [NIA 3/09], which is a Bill to enable the Department for Regional Development to continue to make payments to water and sewerage undertakers for a limited period.

Mr Deputy Speaker: That constitutes the Bill's First Stage, and it shall now be printed. The Bill will be put on the list of future business until a date for its Second Stage is determined.

Financial Support for Sports Clubs

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer will have 10 minutes in which to propose the motion and 10 minutes in which to make a winding-up speech. All other Members who speak will have five minutes. One amendment has been selected and published on the Marshalled List. The proposer of the amendment will have 10 minutes in which to propose and five minutes in which to make a winding-up speech. All other Members who speak will have five minutes.

Mr Kennedy: I beg to move

That this Assembly calls on the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure to ensure that no sports club, which facilitates a commemoration or glorification of terrorism, receives financial support through his Department, either directly or indirectly.

I am grateful to have the opportunity to move this important motion. I hope that the tone of the debate will be appropriate. The debate needs to be held in the context of the wider debate on a shared future. Clearly, the GAA will be an important contributor to sporting and cultural life in Northern Ireland.

The motion is not an attempt to close down the GAA or to prohibit it from organising its games, or, indeed, from getting financial support. As a member of Newry and Mourne District Council, I have supported grant applications from GAA clubs in my area. However, the issue that is being raised today is that a leading sporting organisation, the GAA, is being used — and, to some extent, abused — by some elements to glorify terrorism, and thereby promote sectarian attitudes. That was represented at Galbally in early August.

I recognise that there are those in the GAA who are attempting to promote change and a role for the organisation in a shared future. However, Galbally is a sharp reminder that, alongside those elements, some are prepared to use the GAA to promote a very different future: one marked by division, sectarian attitudes and the glorification of terror and violence.

The motion calls on the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure to be a persuader for a shared future, and to use the influence and funding available to his Department — if necessary, by using his powers — to ensure that no sporting organisation facilitates the glorification of terrorism. I welcome the Minister's attendance and look forward to what he has to say.

All Members who believe in a genuinely shared future hope that the Minister will set out how he will seek to use his influence, and, if necessary, his powers, to ensure that no sporting organisation will allow its premises, resources or grounds to be involved in acts that glorify terrorism.

The recent upsurge in republican activity underlines the importance of the motion. In my view, to glorify the terrorists and terrorism of the 1980s is to encourage the terrorists of 2009. To celebrate the cult and ideology of the violence that wreaked havoc in our society since the late 1960s is to encourage the young people of 2009 to again embrace violence and to again bring pain and suffering. For Sinn Féin to issue a document about a shared future after two years of that party delaying the process and being indecisive and to somehow defend the glorification of terrorism and sectarian violence at an event such as that which took place at Galbally only gives succour and encouragement to those in our society who are determined to repeat the history of recent decades.

The rules for administering public funds must be consistent. If public funds are not permitted to be used to support party political activities, how can they be permitted to be used to sponsor and support any organisation that permits its premises to be used for the type of heavily charged political or quasi-political event that occurred on Sunday 10 August 2009 at Galbally? The event in question was hardly even a political event in the normal sense of the term. It was a highly charged political event with strong paramilitary undertones that appeared to glorify violence as a means to achieve political objectives. That flies in the face of the normal politics that all sides of the House are supposed to espouse.

The Galbally GAA club has received some £200,000 of public money from Sport Northern Ireland in support of its sporting activities. That is a substantial sum of money, and with it, it brings a duty for the club to behave responsibly and to permit its premises to be used only for law-abiding events that do not glorify violence as a legitimate means of political expression.

As part and parcel of its letter of offer for the receipt of public money, the GAA club in question should have been made to give an undertaking that it would not permit its premises to be used for the glorification of paramilitary violence. In the days of the old Stormont Parliament, which some people continue to criticise, the terms of the grant aid that that Administration provided always included safety measures to ensure that the glorification of paramilitary activity would not take place.

The mixture of sport and politics can be fairly toxic. Questions still lurk in the background about the GAA's receipt of public money and about how it relates to some of the overtly political connotations of some of its aims and objectives. Those include the objective in rule 2 of its official guide, which states:

"The Association is a National Organisation which has as its basic aim the strengthening of the National Identity in a 32 County Ireland through the preservation and promotion of Gaelic Games and pastimes."

Rule 15 deals with the flying of the Irish flag at grounds where games are played. It is time that the GAA moved into the twenty-first century and addressed the issues around those rules. Post-Belfast Agreement, it must recognise that, under the principle of consent, there is no prospect of a united Ireland or a 32-county all-Ireland republic. It must realise that and change its rules accordingly.

Mr Boylan: After the Armagh minor team won the all-Ireland football final yesterday at Croke Park, will the Member agree that the funding that that club received went to good use? Go raibh maith agat.

Mr Kennedy: The Member has fallen immediately into a trap, in that he has ignored the true purpose of the debate. On the basis of sporting achievement, I am happy to congratulate the Armagh team. Let us concentrate on the issues that are before us, which confront and face not only Sinn Féin and the nationalist community, but the GAA as an organisation. Why does it allow itself to be used and abused by a small number of people to promote a particular agenda?

In the past, the GAA has reached out to unionism, and a number of unionist politicians have accepted invitations to attend matches. I have no difficulty with that. However, the Galbally incident indicates clearly that the time has now come for all sports clubs that receive Government funding, either directly or indirectly, to be forced to give an undertaking about the use of their premises.

The motion aims to promote and support a shared future for all Northern Ireland's people. It is designed to ensure that the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure will advance the notion of a shared future and will also, if necessary, apply sanctions to those bodies that ignore or seek deliberately to undermine such a policy by their actions.

I note the Alliance Party's amendment. The motion is clear and deserves widespread support, and I commend it to the House.

Dr Farry: I beg to move amendment No 1: Leave out all after "ensure" and insert

'that his Department recognises the excellent work done by sports clubs, particularly in providing community facilities, encouraging healthy activity, and promoting a positive lifestyle for young people; further, noting cases of sectarianism and support for terrorism carried out in sports clubs, this Assembly urges the Minister to use his good offices with governing bodies to ensure that sporting facilities provide a welcoming atmosphere for everyone; and while recognising the excellent work that has already been done in this regard, this Assembly believes a withdrawal of funding would be appropriate after repeated and deliberate incidents of sectarianism or glorification of terrorism.'

The Alliance Party's amendment intends to provide a much more rounded view of the motion. I must say that Danny Kennedy made a decent fist of trying to be impartial and reasonable, although as he progressed through his speech, he drifted into a wider criticism of the GAA, rather than discussing the specific case that sparked the motion. I will perhaps deal with that in a few moments.

It is clear that the motion was sparked by the events that occurred in August at the Galbally GAA club in County Tyrone. That demonstration was not just political; that would, in itself, have raised questions about its appropriateness at a sports ground. The demonstration also raised the issue of the glorification of terrorism. To be quite frank, the Alliance Party has a fundamentally different view of the hunger strikes and their place in society than Sinn Féin. However, my party recognises that people have different views of history and want to have their own particular commemorations. In saying that, however, there can be no excuse whatever for any commemoration that has paramilitary or terrorist trappings.

Clearly, that event has given rise to many issues that Sinn Féin and the GAA must address. It has set a bad example, particularly to young people and especially to those who are involved with the club. Not only that, the event has sent a dangerous and sinister message to the rest of society at a time when it is trying to move towards democracy and the rule of law.

That said, it must be acknowledged that concern has been expressed in GAA circles about the incident. Certainly, that is appropriate and welcome. I stress that, in the first instance, it is for sports' governing bodies to address that type of situation. The GAA, as an organisation, is respected greatly in society, as, indeed, it should be. Certainly, I congratulate the Armagh minor team on its victory, albeit through gritted teeth, given that I am from County Down. I also extend our congratulations to Kerry, which is at the opposite end of the island of Ireland.

The GAA is a focus of communities, particularly in rural areas. It provides an important function, especially as it trains and develops young people and takes them away from less productive activities on the streets.

It is important, however, that we, as an Assembly, are not one-sided in the criticisms that we make and that we recognise that there are problems in sport in Northern Ireland as a whole, and in different areas of sporting activity in particular.

In many respects —

Mr T Clarke: Will the Member give way?

Dr Farry: Yes.

Mr T Clarke: You just referred to criticisms. I hope that you do not mind my criticising your amendment, because —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. All remarks should be made through the Chair, not directly to another Member.

Mr T Clarke: I apologise, Mr Deputy Speaker. Through your good office, Mr Deputy Speaker, I wish to say that the Alliance Party's amendment is very weak, because it states:

“a withdrawal of funding would be appropriate after repeated and deliberate incidents of sectarianism or glorification of terrorism.”

If the Alliance Party was being sincere, the whole emphasis of its amendment would have been on trying to stamp out any such incidents, not just “repeated and deliberate incidents”. The incident, whether it is repeated or not, was deliberate. One instance is deplorable enough. Does the Member agree?

Dr Farry: I understand from where Mr Clarke is coming. No doubt he is keen to protect certain things and direct his criticism at one aspect of society. The point that I was coming to is that if spectators chant sectarian songs and if paramilitary trappings or signs are on display at any sporting event, it is logical that funding be withdrawn from that club, if it is judged not to be sufficiently forceful in trying to tackle those issues.

We tabled an amendment because the implications of the Ulster Unionist Party's substantive motion are considerable and far-reaching and because we dispute how far the party has thought its motion through. Our amendment is much more reasoned, because it recognises the balance of problems in society and looks to the governing bodies, and to the Minister in particular, to work in a proactive manner to address them. It also recognises the fact that the potential threat of moneys being withdrawn from sports clubs is quite appropriate. It is more important, in the first instance, to use the carrot —

Mr T Clarke: Will the Member give way?

Dr Farry: No, I have already let the Member make one intervention

It is important that we try to encourage sports clubs to play their role in a shared future. That is the argument for our amendment. Sport is contentious in societies, and that fact is not unique to Northern Ireland. It is also a feature of many societies elsewhere in the world. I recognise the good work that different governing bodies have done, in particular the Irish Football Association (IFA) and the excellent work of its head of community relations, Michael Boyd. Tremendous moves forward have been made in recent years.

We must also recognise the fact that the Northern Ireland Office is carrying out a consultation exercise on legislation for the regulation of spectator sports, which should address problems such as inappropriate chanting and displays at sports grounds. Clearly, a problem exists that is not unique to the GAA but is far-reaching across society. Clubs and a host of different sectors must face up to the issues. Let us move forward in a balanced way by looking at all the problems and issues and by ensuring that we are proactive in trying to address them.

This issue, and how we address it, will have an important role to play in moving towards a shared future. Sport is a major aspect of people's social lives in Northern Ireland. Several sports are organised on a cross-community basis and played in a genuine cross-community manner, and that is to be welcomed. However, there are aspects of sporting and leisure life in which segregation is implicit, sometimes for historical reasons and sometimes because barriers have been erected.

Sport must be part of the solution to building a shared future. It is important that that be worked into whichever approach we take. On another occasion, we will no doubt talk about the wider problems that the Executive face with their policy on community sharing and integration; however, that is not the topic that we are debating today.

In proposing the motion, Mr Kennedy focused, quite rightly, on the inappropriate political use of sports grounds and the glorification of paramilitarism, which I think that we all abhor.

However, he then stretched his remarks to criticise the GAA for its political aspirations towards a nation and a united Ireland. Neither I nor my party share that aspiration. However, the Good Friday Agreement, which, in case Mr Kennedy forgets, his party was central to, recognises the legitimacy of different aspirations and traditions on the island. Therefore, although the aspiration in question may not be to my taste, I do not see anything inherently wrong with it: it is the association's choice and is included in its rules. When we focus on what is inappropriate, it is important that we maintain the correct focus and do not stretch our remarks to make wider political points about organisations.

A shared future is about people living and working together, but it is also about how people are educated and play together. There is a huge opportunity to get that right through sport. Therefore, it is important that the Assembly sends out the constructive message that it is not out to bash any particular organisation, but that it recognises the problems in sport, which is, in a sense, a microcosm of society. It is important that we address those issues constructively.

Dr W McCrea: Let us be frank; the sight of men armed with replica guns and with balaclavas on their heads was an offence to sport and to this community, which has been through 30 years of terrorism. Surely, the Member should condemn that instead of trying to cover it up.

Dr Farry: If Dr McCrea had listened to the start of my speech, he would have heard me saying that any paramilitary display was completely inappropriate. I am more than happy to condemn that activity; my party has consistently condemned other similar displays of paramilitarism from loyalists and republicans across Northern Ireland and elsewhere. Our credibility on that issue is not in question.

Lord Browne: I support the motion. I am a keen supporter of sport. In many instances, sport has brought together people from all communities. However, events like the one at Galbally in August have had the opposite effect; they further divide our communities.

I have been a member of the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure for the past two years. During that time, I have had the opportunity to hear from and engage with officials from the GAA's Ulster Council. Surely, they must be aware of the deep suspicion with which their sports are viewed by people in the unionist community. The martyrdom afforded to a wide variety of terrorists and criminals, spanning well over a century, ensures that the sport remains firmly off limits for those who might otherwise be attracted by the various sporting activities that the GAA conducts.

I recognise that there are members of the GAA's Ulster Council who are motivated purely by sport and are endeavouring to remove the self-constructed barriers that for so long have tarnished Gaelic sports as just another political tool.

Mr Shannon: Does the Member agree that there is something obscene about a member of the Dungannon and South Tyrone district policing partnership (DPP) donning a paramilitary uniform and marching to commemorate the suicide of the terrorist hunger strikers? Does he also agree that that kind of behaviour is inappropriate for any member of a public body and does not contribute to good community relations or the celebration of support, which is what it is all about? The use of a sports facility for such a purpose, in this case a GAA club, is a misuse of that facility, which calls into question its real purpose and its place in Northern Ireland. That is the crux of the motion.

Lord Browne: I thank the Member for his intervention and agree that the behaviour of that member of the Dungannon and South Tyrone DPP could be considered as divisive. We should all be working together to improve community relations, not to alienate one another.

As I said, the events at Galbally in August can only detract from and destroy the efforts to remove the barriers that I mentioned. Nothing can be more distasteful to the unionist community than the use of GAA stadiums for paramilitary commemorations. As a sporting body, that is something that the GAA should distance itself from unequivocally.

Mrs Long: Does the Member agree that it is not just members of the unionist community who find the glorification of terrorism offensive in that context? Many people across the community would also find that offensive.

1.00 pm

Lord Browne: I take the point; I am sure that many people from all communities would condemn displays of paramilitarism. The sight of masked men carrying what we presume to be, at best, replica weapons, is not only alarming, but provocative and illegal. It is a destabilising move that has once again shone a bright light of suspicion on Gaelic sport within the Province.

The role of Sinn Féin is even more depressing, if not entirely predictable. In an attempt to justify those actions as role play, the Member for West Tyrone Mr McElduff displayed either a huge level of naivety or, as I suspect, scant regard for the view of the GAA within wider society and the real damage that such actions can do to sport in general. We know that such commemorations are contrary to rules 1.11 and 5.1 of that sporting association's constitution, namely, that the GAA should remain non-political and that all grounds and stadia are to be used solely for sporting purposes.

We can all recall the view of the GAA's ruling body and, indeed, the editorial of 'The Irish News', when, in 2006, Casement Park was to be a venue for a similarly provocative parade. 'The Irish News' said that Sinn Féin had placed the GAA in an unenviable position, and it appears to have done so once again.

Members opposite may try to defend the GAA; however, they are indirectly responsible for the motion coming to the House, and they will be responsible for any consequences. If we link this debate with last week's debacle over the cohesive strategy to tackle sectarianism, it is clear that although Sinn Féin members may talk the talk, they are left severely wanting when it comes to substance.

Sport in society is moving on. Look, for example, at the tremendous work that has been done by the Northern Ireland amalgamated supporters club, and the IFA's effort to give bigotry in football the red card. I believe that Sinn Féin's short-sighted initiatives are greatly damaging to the GAA. Commemorations such as the one at Galbally may play well among some core supporters, but they do nothing to promote Gaelic sports or to enable progress towards the shared and inclusive society that Sinn Féin so often talks about but does nothing to promote. I support the motion.

Mr McElduff: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I am speaking in a personal capacity, not as Cathaoirleach an Choiste Cultúir, Ealaíon agus Fóillíochta. I am a member of St Colmcille's GAC in Carrickmore, County Tyrone. At the weekend, I attended a series of underage championship matches

— a blitz — a big championship match in Carrickmore, where 6,000 people watched Dromore beat Errigal Ciaran, and, of course, the all-Ireland finals were yesterday.

I will make history as a Tyrone man by commending the Armagh minor team and the Kerry senior team for winning the all-Ireland titles yesterday. I respectfully suggest that, at least for the Armagh minor team, we have a proper Stormont reception for those who carried the Tommy Markham Cup back over the border.

I oppose the proposed amendment. Sinn Féin tried to table an amendment that said that there should not be discrimination against any sports club. To me, the Ulster Unionist Party motion smacks of an old-style unionist desire to show who is boss and to enter into discrimination. Sinn Féin will not tolerate discrimination in this society as regards this matter or any other matter. Discrimination lies beneath the surface of modern-day unionism, and, occasionally, finds expression in a motion such as this.

Definitions of terrorism are always interesting and contested. One man's freedom fighter —

Mr T Clarke: You say that our definition of terrorism is limited. What is your interpretation —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order, order. Please make your remarks through the Chair.

Mr T Clarke: Sorry. What is the Member's interpretation of a man carrying either an imitation or a real Armalite or someone wearing a balaclava?

Mr McElduff: Are you talking about the SAS?

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. My ruling applies to both Members. If you have something to say, you must direct your remarks through the Chair.

Mr McElduff: I ask the LeasCheann Comhairle whether the Member is referring to the SAS. One man's freedom fighter is another person's terrorist. One of the proposers of the motion was a member of the Ulster Defence Regiment, which was so good that it had to be disbanded. In our part of the world in rural County Tyrone and in many other places, the question of who is a terrorist is very interesting.

The Galbally community has been mentioned a lot today. That community has an excellent sports club and excellent facilities, as do all other GAA clubs throughout Ireland. It does not have a hand-out mentality and has built up the bulk of the facilities itself. Why would that community not apply to the Government for additional assistance to provide facilities at its heart?

The commemoration has been severely misrepresented. The parade comprised a series of role plays and re-enactments, which fully complied with Parades Commission rules and regulations. It was legal in every sense. The parade was attended by thousands of people within sight of the home of Martin Hurson, a highly respected, politically motivated hunger striker who died for the cause of Irish freedom.

Mr Campbell: Will the Member give way?

Mr McElduff: I will not give way.

He died for the cause of Irish freedom in 1981. Martin Hurson was the president of the local club. Kevin Lynch, another hunger striker, captained Derry's under-16 hurling team to an all-Ireland title. I contest the assertion that those hunger strikers were terrorists; they were not. They were politically motivated and were supported by their community. In fact, another hunger striker, Bobby Sands, secured 31,000 votes and became MP for Fermanagh and South Tyrone during his imprisonment and hunger strike.

All the sports governing bodies are doing their best to reach out into the future and to broaden their appeal. The GAA is not like the Orange Order, and I will tell the House why: GAA membership is open to everyone, unlike the Orange Order. Therefore, comparisons between the two organisations are spurious. When tabling the motion, Danny Kennedy drifted, in the words of Stephen Farry, into sectarian criticism of the Gaelic Athletic Association. Sinn Féin will not tolerate that.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I declare my membership of St Patrick's Gaelic Athletic Football Club, Carrickcruppen, County Armagh.

Mr Kennedy: Are you going for the leadership?

Mr D Bradley: It is a bit early for that.

On the day after the biggest event in the Irish sporting calendar, the all-Ireland Gaelic football finals in Croke Park, I want to congratulate a young Ulster team that, in the 125th year of the GAA, is celebrating a famous victory in the minor football final and has brought the trophy back to its native county of Armagh after an absence of 60 years. I extend my congratulations to the Kerry senior team, which has achieved yet another great feat.

I pay tribute to the young players of Armagh who have trained hard all year to achieve the highest honour that they could achieve. That is a cause for joy and celebration, and I urge the House to join in that joy and celebration and to congratulate those young men. I have already written to the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure to ask him to host a reception for the team at Parliament Buildings. I hope that he will respond positively.

All our sporting organisations have much to be proud of, much to celebrate and much to offer society. They are, generally, forward-looking organisations that make a huge investment in people across the age spectrum, regardless of race, creed or colour in areas of health and fitness, and in social and cultural life.

They do so in an exemplary and professional manner and with the help of thousands of volunteers who give their time and expertise freely for the good of their communities and society as a whole. The work of those volunteers is supported and extended by a relatively small number of full-time staff. The sporting bodies invest huge amounts of their resources back into their clubs at the grass roots, and they are also funded by Departments here, as is right and proper.

The Ulster Council of the GAA and the Irish Football Association have joined forces to support the Unite Against Hate campaign. The campaign's message is simple:

"Hate crime is violent, wrong and will not be tolerated. There is no room in society for this."

That campaign will promote leadership, optimism and hope and will offer a practical channel to encourage, empower and support people to express their opposition to hate crime. That is a positive contribution to society under present conditions. I welcome the fact that the sporting bodies also have programmes to promote health and well-being, to include people with a disability or special needs, to welcome new populations, to include all educational sectors in their games and to promote a shared future.

The motion is misdirected: it misses the point. It would be more accurately directed at censuring those who exploit sporting organisations, whether for political or sectarian motives. We must get the message across to them that political or sectarian exploitation is unacceptable. It was not acceptable when it took the form of robberies at Casement Park, at Thurles or at other grounds, nor is it acceptable in any other form.

The way to end political or sectarian exploitation is not by threatening clubs, which are doing sterling work, with the withdrawal of funding, but by harnessing public opinion against such exploitation and by co-operating with the sporting bodies. We have seen the problem of sectarianism at sporting venues being tackled and hugely reduced.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member must bring his remarks to a close.

Mr D Bradley: That was achieved through the influence of public opinion. We can deal with this particular problem in that way. The Alliance Party's amendment —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr D Bradley: The Alliance Party's amendment more accurately supports the views of the SDLP, and we will support that amendment.

Lord Morrow: Needless to say, I support the motion. I am sorry that it looks as though it will not get universal support in the House. That is regrettable, because there was a golden opportunity for — to say “everyone” may be taking it a bit far — most parties, at least, to support the motion as tabled by Mr Kennedy and his colleagues.

We would not expect Sinn Féin to support the motion. No doubt it is playing to the gallery; it must reassure its foot soldiers. [Interruption.]

Well, Sinn Féin could have said that it took on board the concerns that were being expressed in the House and that it could see exactly where unionists were coming from. However, Sinn Féin never attempts to stand in the shoes of others; it always wants to stand in its own shoes because, I suspect, it feels more comfortable in them, and it is more difficult for it to take on board the views of those whom it regards as its political opponents.

What happened at Galbally on that particular day fell far short of the expectations of decent and right-thinking people; it was a tragedy beyond degree. I suspect that we will never get the true answer as to whether the GAA allowed its premises to be used or whether they were hijacked. It appears that there was some degree of being less than factual and truthful with Galbally GAA.

I am prepared to give the benefit of the doubt at times, and it is up to Galbally GAA to prove otherwise as time goes on. I understand that Galbally GAA is holding an inquiry into exactly what happened on that dreadful day.

1.15 pm

The PSNI has not covered itself in glory on this occasion. It had a distinct and profound responsibility to move in and take control of a situation that, as Lord Browne said, will doubtless have a destabilising effect on communities across Northern Ireland. It is a challenge for Sinn Féin: where does it stand on law and order? Where does it stand on the future for Northern Ireland? What is it trying to prove to those who do not think as it does?

We are often told that it is time to move on. Sinn Féin repeatedly uses that mantra and says that it has moved on to a new era. Have we moved on? Some of us feel that every time that there is a possibility of moving on, Sinn Féin will use a situation to ensure that its foot soldiers are reassured and kept happy. If Sinn Féin feels that all the risks are going to be taken by the unionist community, it must learn a wee bit quicker. It also has to take some risks. It must be able to bring its community along and say that things have to be done differently from here on in.

In press coverage after the event, one newspaper referred to mass morons — uniformed teenage Provos pointing replica guns at kids.

Mr McElduff: Was that ‘The Sun’?

Lord Morrow: If anyone thinks for a second that that is the way to move that community on by dressing in combat gear, trying to commemorate the most atrocious activities of the past 30 years —

Mr McElduff: Was that ‘The Sun’?

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order.

Lord Morrow: If Sinn Féin feels that that is the way to move communities forward, it does not get it.

Mr McElduff: Was that ‘The Sun’?

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order.

Lord Morrow: Sinn Féin will have to learn.

If the Member wants to know which newspaper it was, I suspect that there are plenty of people who will run around and get you that press. As a matter of fact, I will see that you get a copy of it; I will put it in your pigeonhole. Will that do? Perhaps that will keep you happy. I assure you that it does not bring any credit to your organisation. Perhaps you would prefer not to receive a copy.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order, order. As I advised colleagues and other Members from across the Chamber earlier, you should direct all your remarks through the Chair. Visual aids are not allowed to be used in your speeches.

Lord Morrow: I apologise; I thought that visual aids were allowed when one was making a reference. I understand what you have said.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member draw his remarks to a close?

Lord Morrow: As I thought I had made clear, I was trying to report back, through the Chair at all times, to Mr McElduff, who seems to either not understand or not be able to hear. Perhaps it is a combination of both.

Mr Molloy: Go raibh míle maith agat. It is important to put this event in the right context. The event took place on Sunday 16 August not 10 August. It did not glorify anyone; it simply commemorated the hunger strike of 1980-81. For Irish republicans, that was an important turning point in Irish politics.

The event took place at Galbally Community Centre, which was built by local people at a cost of £600,000, without any grant aid. The event spilled over into the surrounding GAA grounds. Like the GAA club, Galbally Community Centre has provided its facilities itself. The facilities did not come about as a result of a begging bowl held out to the Department, unlike some other bodies that depend on official local authority fields.

I declare membership of Clonmore Robert Emmets GFC. I commend the people of Galbally for commemorating Martin Hurson. As my colleague said, Martin Hurson was born a short distance — one field — away from where the event took place.

The event was a re-enactment, and others across the Chamber know exactly what re-enactments are about. The re-enactment incorporated the Parachute Regiment, the UDR, the RUC reserve, and the RUC, all in full gear; there were no B-Specials uniforms, so they could not be included. The re-enactment also had IRA imagery, but it was all about imagery. There was imagery of all the events that took place at the time of the hunger strikes, and it was not a glorification of anyone. Indeed, depending on how one looks at it, perhaps the event's inclusion of RUC men and the Parachute Regiment was a glorification of terrorism.

If people are so concerned, perhaps we should look again at all re-enactments. The sham fight at Scarva on 13 July has been going on for hundreds of years, but the same people win no matter how many times it happens. It includes violence, with people going at each other with swords.

We also need to look at the use of council property and other places. The Orange Order, for example, has used public parks in Belfast and elsewhere for the field and assemblies. That is quite right; there is no problem with that, because those places are public property. The DUP uses the council chamber in Castlereagh for party meetings, electing leaders, and so on. We need to look at a number of issues concerning the use of public property and public places.

Local people did not have a problem with the re-enactment. I do not think that the local unionist community had a problem, apart from Tom Elliott and some others.

A Member: Were you there?

Mr Molloy: I am sure that quite a number of people passed there. About 8,000 people took part in the event, and there was not one incident of disorder in the whole day. Compare that with the millions of pounds that it costs to police Orange Order parades in Ardoyne. The re-enactment did not cost the public sector anything at all.

Mr Kennedy: Will the Member specifically address the motion's objection to the glorification of terrorism? It is all very well to lease football fields and other facilities for cultural events. However, we are talking specifically about the glorification of terrorism at Galbally.

Mr Molloy: I said at the beginning of my speech that there was no glorification of terrorism. This week's 'Farm Week' includes a piece about a boot camp at Ballykinler army base. The young farmers' clubs, which have connections with Mr Kennedy and other members of his party, are pictured in British Army uniforms and carrying British Army guns. I am sure that none of those young farmers is a member of the British Army. Across the page is a photograph of the Minister meeting the young farmers' clubs to discuss how his Department can fund their activities. Will the Minister now say that the Department cannot fund them because they have been photographed carrying British Army weapons and wearing British Army uniform?

Mr McElduff: On viewing that newspaper article, my colleague could have run to the Business Office and tabled a motion for discussion today. He could have asked for funding to be withdrawn from young farmers' clubs if they are going to glorify British Army terrorism in the way that they are pictured doing in the farming newspaper. It is a disgrace.

Mr Molloy: I thank my colleague —

Mr T Clarke: Will the Member give way?

Mr Molloy: No; I have given way enough already.

The Department funds various events and organisations, and the Ulster-Scots Agency gives funding to loyalist bands. Some of those bands glorify terrorism through depictions on their banners and drums of organisations such as the UVF and the Young Citizen Volunteers. One of the bands that receives funding is the Burntollet Sons of Ulster Flute Band, which is a name that strikes a chord within nationalism. There does not seem to be a problem with those organisations being funded by the Ulster-Scots Agency or the Arts Council.

What is the real complaint? Is it simply that unionism is so against the hunger strikes, having realised the effect that they had and the commitment and dedication of the hunger strikers? I am proud to say that I was part of the organising committee for the event at which the republican community of Galbally commemorated one of its young people who died in tragic circumstances at the hands of Maggie Thatcher.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I ask the Member to draw his remarks to a close.

Mr Molloy: It is very important to recognise that those young people are being commemorated in their local areas to this day.

Mr I McCrea: I thank the Members who tabled the motion for debate in the House today.

Recently in my constituency, we witnessed the ugly side of the GAA when its premises were permitted to be used for a sickening event that glorified terrorism. The Member who spoke previously questioned the fact that that event glorified terrorism. I am not sure what planet he is living on because it certainly did.

[Interruption.]

The Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr T Clarke: Does the Member agree that it was a bit funny that when the Sinn Féin member spoke about a re-enactment of the hunger strike, he did not refer to empty chip boxes being given out?

Mr I McCrea: I thank the Member for his intervention.

The GAA cannot wash its hands of the hunger strike rally that took place in August this year in the grounds of Galbally GAA club. Photographs of that event show masked men carrying firearms and men wearing paramilitary-style uniforms while marching in GAA grounds. That event was nothing other than the sickening glorification —

Mr Molloy: I will clarify the situation for the Member: all the re-enactments took place on the county road, not in the GAA grounds.

Mr I McCrea: Perhaps it will be in order to speak to Roads Service about that issue. However, men in uniform did walk on grass at that event, and I do not think that there are too many grassy roads in that area.

As my colleague Lord Morrow said, the police have a lot to answer for regarding what took place, and that is certainly the case if it was held on the county road, as has been suggested. I have raised my concerns with the police and am glad that they will investigate the matter. I am also glad that those responsible, who openly broke the law and brandished weapons — I am yet to be informed whether they were actual guns or replicas —

Mr P Maskey: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. We are being told that people have broken the law. I want to know what legislation is being referred to, because that is an important part of this debate. Maybe the Member will point out what laws were broken.

The Deputy Speaker: Thank you for that point of order, Mr Maskey. It is not for me to make a ruling on that issue; it is up to the Member to explain his remarks.

Mr I McCrea: Members will know exactly what I am talking about. Carrying weapons, whether they are replicas or not, is not legal, nor is wearing balaclavas.

Dr Farry: Will the Member give way?

Mr I McCrea: No; I have to finish my remarks.

I call on Sinn Féin to unreservedly condemn the activities that took place at Galbally, and I ask its members to come out and strongly state that such events are no longer required in society.

That was not the first time that the GAA allowed its grounds to be used to glorify terrorists. In August 2006 at Casement Park, a hunger strike commemoration rally was held. In July 2008 at Plunkett Park in Pomeroy, events were held to commemorate Seamus Woods, an IRA terrorist who was killed by his own bomb while he and his fellow terrorists attempted a murderous attack on Pomeroy police station.

Mr Molloy: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. The event in Pomeroy did not take place in GAA grounds. I ask that the Member withdraws that remark.

The Deputy Speaker: Again, that is not a point of order. Mr McCrea can respond.

Mr I McCrea: It is obvious that a raw nerve has been hit. The Member should listen; I said that events were held to commemorate Seamus Woods, parts of which were on the GAA pitch. Pictures were taken that show what I am talking about.

In August 2008, the Loughmacrory GFC rooms were used by the so-called Drumnakilly Martyrs Commemoration Committee for a lecture, exhibition, parade and football tournament to honour IRA terrorists Gerard Harte, Martin Harte and Brian Mullin.

1.30 pm

As well as events being held in GAA grounds, some of the grounds are named after terrorists. The Kevin Lynch Park is named after a terrorist from Dungiven. The Louis Leonard Memorial Park is named after a Fermanagh terrorist. The Lochrie/Campbell Park is named after a south Armagh IRA terrorist. There are also teams that are named after republican terrorists.

Mr Brolly: Will the Member give way?

Mr I McCrea: No. In my constituency, we have the Pomeroy Plunketts, which is named after Joseph Plunkett, who was a republican terrorist of the 1916 era. There is Galbally Pearses GAC, which is named after Patrick Pearse, who was also a republican terrorist of the 1916 era. There is also Ardboe O'Donovan Rossa, which is named after a prominent republican terrorist of the early 1900s, who was responsible for organising the first-ever Irish republican bombing campaign of English cities, known as the dynamite campaign.

Following the IRA hunger strike event that was held at the GAA grounds in Galbally, I called upon the sponsors of GAA teams to take into consideration the thousands of people across Ulster, both Protestant and Catholic, who were murdered by republican terrorists and the thousands more who suffered as a result of those terrorists' evil and murderous deeds. The GAA must earn the right to be recognised and accepted as a legitimate sporting body by taking decisive steps to address the naked sectarianism that is at its heart and foundation.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member should draw his remarks to a close.

Mr I McCrea: It needs to extend parity of esteem to all sections of the community and to all other sports without exception. I call on this House to ensure that no sports clubs that facilitate the commemoration or glorification of terrorism receives financial support from any Department.

Mr McNarry: At a time when deplorable difficulties have arisen when agreeing the definition of “victim”, surely no such party political prevarication will be tolerated in this House when defining a terrorist, particularly the Provo type to which this motion clearly refers and that Mr McElduff sets on a pedestal.

It is abominable that the Provo franchise has been conveniently carried on by those who are now called “dissidents”, which, to unionists, is a crass and meaningless distinction. Some were recently called “traitors” without explanation of their treachery and without stipulation of which cause they had betrayed. That left people to ask what the difference is between the man who made the “traitors” charge and the terrorists to whom his remark was directed.

Is there now some kind of code of honourable hierarchy that exists in the defunct Provo wing of Irish republicanism, which distinguishes between one brand of republican terrorism and another? From what unionists saw of the disturbing proceedings at the Galbally Pearses GAA ground, the bad old days of the past were commemorated and the glorification of past terrorist activities were celebrated.

However, the focus did not shine on the Provo organisers alone; the glare of that obscene event rebounded on the GAA in one provocative act of Provo self-glorification. The skilful PR charm offensive in which the GAA was participating fell apart when the photographs that we saw shattered the professional work that had been carried out by the GAA in what I thought was a genuine effort to engage with unionists.

The GAA had reached highly commendable standards with its community involvement and its explanations about its sporting achievements. In its public presentations, the clear message to unionists was that the GAA is a sporting organisation that is moving on and with the mood that wishes to keep sport apart from the deep-rooted nuances of past beliefs and perceptions. Now, after Galbally, unionists must wrestle with the thinking that their ideas about the GAA were, perhaps, correct all the time. How inglorious the event turned out to be is something that unionists must react to because, from the minute that the Provo event hit the news, the focus on the GAA took on a new complexion.

The GAA's charm offensive was destroyed. For many unionists, that single, predetermined act of Provo militancy was a demonstration of incitement in which the GAA was a willing, culpable supporter. Many unionists view that defiant act of provocative glorification on a GAA sports ground as a betrayal.

I was one of those willing to look upon the GAA as a sporting organisation and to listen to how the association saw itself in our society. The incident at Galbally swung the door in my face and reversed it shut, closing it to the extent that the sport itself must feel ashamed and abused by what took place in a sporting stadium. Is the GAA embarrassed or remorseful? Is it guaranteeing that such an event will not happen again? Has the GAA unwittingly allowed its sport to be brought into disrepute? Or has what happened at Galbally exposed the real normality of the GAA movement? I do not know, but I would like someone to tell me whether that is GAA normality.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member must draw his remarks to a close.

Mr McNarry: Apart from the Galbally incident, what impact will the answer to that question have on the Minister's outlook on future funding for the GAA?

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure (Mr McCausland): I welcome the opportunity to debate the issues raised. I have listened carefully and have noted all the comments on the motion, the amendment and, more directly, the events at Galbally GAA ground in County Tyrone on 16 August.

The issue raised is not new; it has been around for some time. In 2001, there was an IRA colour party at Casement Park as part of that year's commemoration and again in 2006, when a Member of the House, Francie Brolly, was the soloist and another Member, Fra McCann, was dressed as a hunger striker.
[Laughter.]

I have publicly and clearly expressed my deep concern and alarm about what took place during last month's commemoration at Galbally GAA ground. I have seen photographic evidence of the event, which was, frankly, appalling, and demonstrated the totally inappropriate use of a sports facility. I have already called on the GAA to investigate the matter, and I am pleased to say that an investigation is being conducted. I also understand that the police are making their own inquiries. Since both investigations are under way, I consider it right that we reserve any final judgement on the Galbally event until those investigations are concluded.

However, the motion and the amendment raise broader issues. Both are underpinned by a desire to move Northern Ireland away from the sort of past that was re-enacted at Galbally and forward into a shared and better future that is based firmly on equitability, diversity and interdependency. In that context, the motion and the amendment pose questions about the appropriateness of using sport as a political platform or for the glorification of terrorism.

I will consider that question in the context of the Executive's priorities. The Executive are committed to working to heal divisions in our society and to building a more peaceful and inclusive community. For instance, the Programme for Government is underpinned by two cross-cutting themes, one of which is a shared and better future for all.

That vision, which has at its heart the promotion of good relations among the people of Northern Ireland, should pervade the work of all Departments. Good relations, as defined by the Equality Commission, are relationships that:

“acknowledge the religious, political and racial context of this society, and that seek to promote respect, equity and trust, and embrace diversity in all its forms.”

That good-relations vision applies to all sectors of my Department: culture, arts and leisure. My Department has a particular responsibility to contribute to good relations and to a shared and better future, which is something that I have already made a priority in the Department.

Sport is a major part of culture and leisure. Government recognises the importance of sport and its tremendous potential to contribute to a range of priorities, including health, education, economic development and the improvement of Northern Ireland's image at home and abroad. Sport can also do much to help to bring the community together and to contribute to the promotion of good relations in a way that is consistent with the aims of a shared and better future.

People across Northern Ireland enjoy participating in a wide range of field sports, including football, Gaelic football, rugby, hurling, hockey and cricket, to name but a few, and sport enriches the lives of the participants. The vast majority of the adults and young people participating in such sports do so as sportsmen and sportswomen to achieve the best that they can as members of a team and, in turn, they enjoy the health and social benefits that such sports bring. As Minister for sport, I cannot commend too highly the many organisations and volunteers who freely give up their time and effort to ensure that such activities continue to a high standard.

That however is not the whole picture. Like many other activities, sport reflects the society from which it comes; sadly, therefore, some sports can on occasion be seen to perpetuate community tensions, division and exclusion. The key question is how we overcome that problem. How do we ensure that the benefits of sport are maximised in the interests of all? How do we protect sport from influences that would draw it away from the agenda of a shared and better future?

First, the Government have a responsibility to act for the good of the whole community and to support what is best for that community. Government also has a responsibility to declare publicly what is acceptable to the wider community and what is not. Government has a further and important responsibility to press and encourage sports to recognise their shortcomings and to support them in doing what is necessary to move from exclusion to inclusion and to become more accessible. My Department, together with its arm's-length body, Sport NI, is already taking active steps in that regard.

The role of sport in helping to deliver the shared and better future has been identified as an important factor in the emerging sports strategy for Northern Ireland. The need to overcome traditional patterns of exclusion and segregation in sport has also been recognised as a key requirement. Improving representation and promoting community cohesion through sport is recognised as a major priority in the strategy.

Responsibility in that area does not rest wholly with me, the Department or Sport NI; there is also a requirement for sports bodies, clubs and associations to demonstrate commitment in that regard. Some do so already. The IFA has a “Football for All” initiative, which is an excellent example of good practice in that respect.

1.45 pm

The GAA, which has been mentioned frequently in the debate, has, in recent years, started to address some long-standing concerns about its ethos, rules and wider relationship with the entire community. I am glad that it has started that process. The association has abolished some of its more contentious rules, particularly the one that prevented members from participating in non-Gaelic games and the one that excluded members of the security forces. One of the leadership programmes that is run on behalf of my Department through Sport Northern Ireland is entitled “Sport for All”, and that is the way that it should be; not sport for nationalists or sport for unionists, but sport for all.

Turning to the local, grass roots level, some GAA clubs have clearly adopted practices that drag us back to the past, instead of taking us forward, including naming clubs, grounds and competitions after Irish republican terrorists. Some examples have been given, and such practices should be totally unacceptable in any sport. I am particularly alarmed that some of the competitions that have been named after Irish republican terrorists are for children under the age of 12. It will seem to most people that that is an attempt by the organisers to use sport for political indoctrination. Let me ask the House: are terrorists good role models for children?

Turning to the Galbally incident, which, as I said, was certainly not the first occasion on which GAA grounds have been used to host Irish republican rallies that are designed to celebrate terrorism. In passing, I note Francie Molloy's comment that all re-enactments took place on the road. It is clear from photographs that are circulating and that have already been published in some newspapers that a number of things that happened on the pitch were totally unacceptable; ranks of people dressed in paramilitary uniform and, indeed, masked men with guns being photographed in the car park adjacent to the pitch.

Of course, I am aware that the GAA is investigating those circumstances, and I welcome that investigation, but I also hope that it will prompt a broader and urgent debate in the association about particular aspects of its rules and policies and the practices of some constituent members. Many of those things are, no doubt, products of a bygone age. However, in my view, they have no place in a modern, twenty-first century sports body, or in a shared and better future.

Sport Northern Ireland, acting on behalf of DCAL, is responsible for developing sport, including the distribution of funding. In discharging that responsibility, Sport Northern Ireland provides Exchequer grants to voluntary sports clubs. All clubs in receipt of such awards are required to comply with specific terms and conditions of award, including the requirement to operate an equal-opportunities policy and equality of access for membership, facilities etc. Those conditions are entirely in keeping with the principles of a shared and better future.

However, given recent public concerns, I believe that there is a need for the Government and their arm's-length bodies to do more. I have already written to Sport Northern Ireland, which is the body that dispenses funding, and I also intend to engage with the Community Relations Council about those matters. Sports' support and encouragement to question existing practices and to draw away from such activities are an essential part of that process, but equally, so is firm action to impose penalties, where necessary, on those who celebrate terrorism and ignore, or refuse to heed, the call for a shared and better future.

I believe that the Government must look to see what more can be done, particularly in specifying what constitutes the proper and improper use of facilities that have been developed with the assistance of public funds.

In response to what occurred at Galbally, I have asked for an urgent review to be undertaken of existing terms and conditions of public grants to sport. That review will focus specifically on strengthening the requirement to promote a shared and better future. In that way, we can ensure that commemorations of terrorism in any form would not be in keeping with conditions of award. The review has already been raised with Sport NI —

Mr Molloy: Will the Minister give way?

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: No, I am running out of time. I have commissioned the work to be undertaken by Sport NI. I have asked that it be completed and any necessary and practical changes be implemented as soon as possible.

For the most part, sport in Northern Ireland offers a valuable and constructive service to the community. Through the emerging sports strategy for Northern Ireland, sports bodies have shown that they are willing to embrace the principles of a shared and better future and have expressed a wish to play their part in delivering that vision. Progress has been made, but there remains, in some areas, a distance to go. However, all at least publicly recognise the need to promote the role of sport in creating that shared and better future. Any sports body that sincerely strives to move further in that direction can count on my full support.

Mrs Long: I thank the Members for bringing this matter to the House for discussion and hope that we will reach an agreed way forward. Along with Danny Kennedy, who proposed the motion, I believe that the emphasis must be on a shared future. That is a theme to which I will return a number of times.

There are issues around the justification of violence and the glorification of a conflict, and people need to be cautious as they discuss this issue because, when Danny referred to the often toxic mix of sport and politics, he was touching on something that runs very deeply in our community. He was raising deeper questions about whether sports and cultural organisations can or, indeed, should express political aspirations; whether doing so, even in a peaceful way, is a problem; and how we recognise that although they are allowing wide participation, organisations may still be grappling with their grass roots. Those questions raise a number of issues that need to be addressed.

As Stephen Farry said when he was proposing our amendment, it is never acceptable to have paramilitary flags and trappings and overtures in any situation in public or private life. For that reason, we utterly condemn the commemoration and are unreserved in that.

There is a particular risk to young people, and I hope that those who are calling for me to give way are listening. Young people are extremely impressionable and that sort of activity can groom them into thinking that the way to get respect in their community is to be a hero of the kind that is commemorated in those events. They are then ripe pickings for those who would continue to recruit into dissident organisations. We need to find ways of recognising our past without perpetuating its damage.

A lot of people in GAA circles also have concerns around the commemorations. That is why we would like, in the first instance, to give governing bodies the opportunity to rectify those situations internally, through working with their memberships, rather than applying punitive measures from external forces. We believe that the message would be much stronger if conveyed internally. However, our amendment recognises that the Minister should have the opportunity to introduce punitive measures if those corrections are not taking place.

A number of Members raised issues about individuals hijacking events, for example. I think that Trevor Clarke raised that issue and I know that Lord Morrow did. Lord Morrow mentioned giving people the benefit of the doubt. We believe that it is not enough to simply have a knee-jerk reaction to one set of circumstances; we need to look at the wider situation and at how to get organisations to respond. That does not mean that we should be lenient in circumstances in which people are being blatantly offensive, but we should give clubs and others an opportunity to rectify situations. It is important that we do that.

Francie Molloy, in his contribution, referred to the commemoration as only “imagery”. We all know in this society just how potent imagery can be. It has been proven under the Terrorism Act 2006 that imagery can be seen to glorify terrorism. For example, the Terrorism Act 2006 has been used to deal with flags and emblems. There is no question, therefore, that the use of imagery is an important aspect.

Francie Molloy also raised some wide-ranging questions, as did Danny Kennedy. We will not answer those questions in this debate, but they need to be answered at some stage. They asked questions about how we should commemorate, mark and interpret contentious periods in our history; how we develop shared values and protocols for the use of public spaces for such commemorations; and whether sports grounds and other public spaces are appropriate places for such events to take place. That brings me back to the issue of a shared future, because the cohesion, sharing and integration strategy was an opportunity to explore those issues. There has been an abject failure by the Executive to grasp the nettle and deliver collectively on that challenge.

I welcome the Minister’s statement with regard to what he said about his Department, but this issue cannot be advanced in departmental silos, despite the enthusiasm of some Ministers. Nor can it be advanced by independent political parties producing their own documents. It requires joint leadership and vision for which we need collective governance on the issues.

I am glad that we had the opportunity to hold this debate, but the issues that it raises are more fundamental and wider than the scope of the motion. If we want to tackle the issue in any real way, we need the cohesion, sharing and integration strategy to be brought forward jointly by OFMDFM, and we need to see an end to the failure to deliver on that issue.

Mr Elliott: I thank Members who took part in the debate. The House will not be surprised to hear that I agreed with some of the comments that were made and disagreed with others.

The first Member to speak in the debate was my colleague Danny Kennedy, who proposed the motion. He highlighted the reasons underlying the intention of the motion, and the importance of working together towards a shared future — something that the Alliance Party has talked about, and an issue on which I thought that it would have been keen to base support for the Ulster Unionist Party motion, particularly when one looks at the issues around Galbally. Those were highlighted by Mr Kennedy in his opening remarks and by Mr Farry, who tabled the amendment. He deliberately referred to the Galbally rally as well, and that was no surprise. I hope that the Alliance Party will support our substantive motion.

Lord Browne from the DUP was the next Member to speak. I thank him and his colleagues for their support for the motion. He acknowledged that many in the GAA authorities are concentrated solely on the sporting element of the organisation. That is correct. However, he also highlighted the fact that many of those who are involved with the organisation are interested only in its wider cultural and political elements. It is right that we point out that difference.

The debate continued with Mr McElduff from Sinn Féin. It was no surprise that he went back to his old position of the protection and defence of republican terrorists, and he lowered the tone of the debate in that respect. It is obvious that he had written his speech before he heard the tone in which the debate began. We know where he was coming from. He said that the GAA was open to everyone. Will he tell that to young Darren Graham of County Fermanagh? He is a young Protestant whose father was in the UDR and was murdered by IRA terrorists. Darren Graham played GAA games, and he was intimidated so much that he gave up those sports. Perhaps the Member would like to explain to Mr Graham that the organisation is open to everyone.

Mr Molloy: Does the Member accept that the GAA authorities made sure that that young man was able to play Gaelic football back in Fermanagh? Perhaps he should tell the whole story. Will he also clarify his role in respect of the motion, which ignores a lot of the issues that are in front of us with regard to funding from DCAL for UVF groups and bands that promote terrorism in its real form?

Mr Elliott: The Member is at liberty to take up those issues with the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure, if he wishes.

I am trying to deal with the motion that has been tabled, and the fact was that Darren Graham had to go to America to continue his sporting activities. What a shame on this Province that someone, because of his religion, had to leave his GAA club or sporting organisation and move to America.

2.00 pm

Dominic Bradley spoke next and insinuated that the GAA held the biggest sporting occasions in Ireland. I cannot remember what event he referred to, but I feel that I must remind him of the North West 200, which is one of the biggest sporting events in this Province, and which is clearly non-sectarian and non-political.

Lord Morrow spoke next, and I thank him for supporting the motion. He highlighted the issue of how Galbally GAA club may have been used by the organisers of the event. He also suggested that Sinn Féin has no wish to move forward in this society or to progress to a much better society for us all.

Mr Molloy, who has just intervened, spoke next. He alluded to the fact that the demonstration at Galbally was only about imagery, and other members have agreed with that view. However, we must remember what that imagery was. It concerned those who murdered their fellow citizens in this Province — members of the IRA who skulked about at night and shot and blew up the people of this community, some of whom were their neighbours.

Mr Molloy: Will the Member give way?

Mr Elliott: No. The Member has had his say.

Mr Ian McCrea developed the topic of the event at Galbally and gave some significant information.

My colleague David McNarry spoke next, and he described, in some detail, the operation of the “Provo franchise,” which is being carried on by the dissident republicans and which, in my opinion, is being supported by many in the mainstream republican movement. His allusion to a code of republican hierarchy was a nice turn of phrase and one that I must remember to use in the future.

I thank the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure for his response to the debate, his deliberations on the matter and for sensibly and sensitively exploring the issues around it. He said that the event at Galbally was nothing new and that similar events have occurred before in Northern Ireland.

The Minister said that the Government must act for the good of all in the community, and those who are involved in sports must recognise that they must do more to incorporate a wider representation. He also said the clubs must take action in that respect and that DCAL is there to assist them with that process. I am pleased that the Minister has taken up the issue with Sport NI and other organisations. We look forward to the result of those deliberations.

Naomi Long made the winding-up speech for the Alliance Party’s amendment. She reminded the House how damaging such events as the Galbally event can be for our society. She particularly highlighted the effect and influence those events have on our young people, and she made it clear that such matters must be addressed.

Interestingly, a few weeks ago Colm Bradley, the GAA correspondent for my local newspaper, the ‘Fermanagh Herald’, wrote a significant article on the Galbally incident. Colm plays GAA sports, including Gaelic football, and he wrote:

“I was disappointed to see GAA people profess the oft held belief that the GAA is not political and worse still that it was just a sporting organisation ... The GAA is about the promotion of Irish culture and we should all be proud of that fact ... Thank God for the GAA and their promotion of Irish culture. So please, no more pandering to others by claiming the GAA is just a sporting organisation. It’s not. It is much more.”

That is from someone from within the GAA.

Furthermore, he states that rule 2 of the GAA was amended back in the 1970s to read:

“The Association is a National Organisation which has as its basic aim the strengthening of the National Identity in a 32 County Ireland through the preservation and promotion of Gaelic Games and pastimes.”

The wording of that rule was changed and strengthened from the previous, much weaker rule, which simply alluded to preservation of Ireland’s national games and pastimes. Why was there a need to harden that attitude in a time of difficulty in our society in the 1970s? That gives me great concern.

Colm Bradley also wrote in his article that:

“In all honesty the reaction to the event at Galbally has no doubt made it more difficult for the GAA as it tries to extend the hand to the Unionist community.”

There, I am afraid, we have it. There are, unfortunately, people in the GAA who want to use it for their own political and cultural ends.

I do not mind people being involved in the GAA; that is their right, and I am quite happy to accept that. I accept their playing their sport on Sundays and closing off towns and villages when there is a big game on. I am willing to accept that in this society. However, there must also be an acceptance of other people’s culture, which is what many people from that community fail to do. They fail to recognise other people’s culture and tradition, and they want it all for themselves. Unfortunately, that sentiment has been demonstrated at Galbally and other places. It was a charade, and we cannot allow it to be repeated.

The motion asks the Minister and his Department to ensure that such acts are not repeated, otherwise the Province will not move on. I will leave Members with a sentiment that I received from a constituent:

“The GAA does not have to ask Foreign Orange Planter Bigots about flying their colours. The GAA colours will be flown in all of our 32 counties at football matches and nobody cares whether Foreigners are glad or sorry Fermanagh won or lost the match, it’s just none of your business.”

That is the type of people who are in our society — GAA supporters who do not want to give us a say in this community.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

Civil Service Recruitment

Mr Deputy Speaker: In accordance with the Business Committee's agreement to allocate additional time when two or more amendments have been selected, up to one hour and 45 minutes will be allowed for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes in which to propose and 10 minutes in which to make a winding-up speech. Two amendments have been selected and published on the Marshalled List. The proposer of each amendment will have 10 minutes in which to propose and five minutes in which to make a winding-up speech. All other Members who wish to speak will have five minutes.

Mr Campbell: I beg to move

That this Assembly notes the efforts made by the Northern Ireland Civil Service in recent years to address the under-representation of Protestants among those applying for, and being recruited to, occupational groups which have most employees in the Civil Service; and calls for continued monitoring of all the grades, but particularly those grades where thousands of people are employed, in order that those from all community backgrounds can have confidence in the recruitment process.

The subject of the motion is one on which myself and my party have campaigned, advocated and lobbied for a considerable time throughout Northern Ireland, in the House of Commons, in other countries such as the Irish Republic, and in Europe and America.

We carried out that intensive lobbying over a considerable period because of the importance of the issue and because of its resonance for tens of thousands of families in Northern Ireland.

Some progress has been made. We have had meetings with previous Finance Ministers, previous direct rule Ministers and a number of successive Equality Commission chiefs. All of those meetings were designed to restore equity to the Civil Service, particularly in the areas where most civil servants are employed.

The problem is partially that the Equality Commission in particular, and others, keep repeating the mistake of using figures on the overall composition of the Civil Service to try to prove or disprove fair participation and to demonstrate what they say is happening in the Civil Service or with other large employers. They keep doing that despite the fact that we keep telling them that they need to show us the trends in the people joining the Civil Service. Over time, a trend becomes the factual position; if the Protestant community is under-represented in large parts of the Civil Service, which it is, it will become significantly under-represented in the entire Civil Service if the trend is not addressed and changed.

The Assembly's Research Service has provided a very good information pack, but it falls into a similar trap in that it does not refer to the wording of the motion, which addresses recruitment. Recruitment is always the key. Over time, it becomes difficult to change the situation if there has been a problem with recruitment.

There are two main problem areas in the Civil Service, and the motion does not intend to, nor does it, sidestep or put one aside at the expense of the other. One is the under-representation of Protestants in the general service grades, and the other is the under-representation of Roman Catholics in the Senior Civil Service.

Both amendments mention the Senior Civil Service. The problem is not a denial that either problem exists; it appears that some people are determined to put more emphasis on one than on the other. The general service grades, where the under-representation of Protestants occurs, employ 20,000 people; they are a huge area of employment. The Senior Civil Service employs less than 300 people, but some people keep on and on and on about those grades.

I come to the nub of the issue: although there are two main problem areas, the under-representation of Catholics in the Senior Civil Service is declining year on year. The documentation, including that which the Department of Finance and Personnel released during the summer, shows that the number of Roman Catholics in the Senior Civil Service continues to increase each year. The problem of under-representation is, therefore, lessening among the 300 people who work at that grade. On the other hand, a minuscule change has taken place in the grades that employ 20,000 people. In fact, in some cases, there is a lack of any improvement. As I mentioned at the outset, there has been improvement in other cases.

For the information of Members and the wider public, I turn to the '2007 Review of Fair Participation', which was released by the Department of Finance and Personnel during summer 2009. Page 18 has a section entitled 'Progress towards past goals'. It demonstrates that in 2005, when the most recent review of the Civil Service was carried out, there was a lack of fair participation, or under-representation, in four categories.

In one category, the upper grades — grade 5 and above — there was a lack of fair participation by Roman Catholics in 2005. According to that document, the achievement that was required in that category by 2007 has, indeed, been reached. Therefore, the problem that used to exist in the Senior Civil Service is no longer an issue.

In three other categories, there was under-representation of Protestants; at EO2, AO and AA level. Those categories just happen to employ 20,000 people. Here, we find that the goal of a 10% increase in Protestant applications for EO2 posts by 2007, the year that is covered by the review, has not been achieved. The same occurs at AO level: a 10% increase in Protestant applications has not been achieved. In the final category, AA — administrative assistant level — the 10% increase in Protestant applications has been achieved.

Therefore, Protestant under-representation applied to three of the four categories where there were problems in 2005. Goals have not been achieved in two of the three categories. They have been achieved in only one of those categories. In the one problem area where there was unfair participation by Roman Catholics, goals have been achieved. That is the precise area to which the amendments refer. I would have thought that that would have negated the need for those amendments. Seemingly, it has not.

At present, those ongoing problems remain. I do not criticise the Department of Finance and Personnel at all: as I have said, some progress has been made. That progress has taken a long time. I recall that I met Richard Needham, who people will remember. I also met the late Bob Cooper, who, at that time, was the chairman of the Fair Employment Agency. We raised the issues with them, and with subsequent Ministers.

Therefore, the matter has been ongoing for a long time. Progress is being made very slowly. We need to keep that going. In 20 years' time, I do not want either me or a successor to have to stand in the Chamber and say, "We are nearly there: we have almost achieved fair participation for Protestants in the Northern Ireland Civil Service". That must be achieved much more quickly than has been the case in the past. We have made significant progress towards that. However, it seems to be halting.

Therefore, the motion's purpose is to ensure that civil servants who are involved with the Equality Commission do not take their eyes off the ball, and that the wider public understands that regardless of who else takes their eyes off the ball, the DUP will not. Our campaign is for equality and fair participation in the workplace. We intend to proceed until we get it.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. As Question Time begins at 2.30 pm, I suggest that the House takes its ease until then. The debate will continue after Question Time, when the next Member to speak will be Mitchel McLaughlin, who will move amendment No 1.

The debate stood suspended.

Oral Answers to Questions

OFFICE OF THE FIRST MINISTER AND DEPUTY FIRST MINISTER

Shared Future

1. Mr D Bradley asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister to explain why undertakings on producing and publishing a shared future strategy have not been honoured. (AQO 46/10)

Cohesion, Sharing and Integration Strategy

5. Mr Kinahan asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister for an update on the cohesion, sharing and integration strategy. (AQO 50/10)

The First Minister (Mr P Robinson): With your permission, Mr Speaker, I will answer questions one and five together. The draft programme for cohesion, sharing and integration was originally meant to have been brought forward before the end of last year. That and subsequent commitments on timing were made in good faith, and it was our expectation that those would be met. It was not possible to meet that date. However, reaching agreement on the cohesion, sharing and integration strategy (CSI) remains one of the top policy priorities of OFMDFM.

While we continue to work intensively towards an agreed strategy that will benefit everyone now and over the longer term, work to promote community relations and good race relations has continued over the past two years, led and supported by the deputy First Minister, me and the whole ministerial team.

There are many examples of that commitment: we have invested £29 million in good relations work in the current comprehensive spending review (CSR) period to build a shared and better future. That, in my view, is not insubstantial. Additionally, we provide match funding to EU funding under the Peace III programme. OFMDFM, as the Department that is accountable for three priorities in the programme, is strategically placed to ensure co-ordination of local activities at the local level.

The junior Ministers continue to chair the north Belfast working group, which focuses on interface issues in Belfast and across Northern Ireland. During the summer, we have spent £500,000 on resourcing work for summer intervention programmes.

After the death of Mr Kevin McDaid in May, we worked proactively with our key partners, both statutory and non-statutory, in Coleraine, and we are providing an additional £23,000 to Coleraine Borough Council for diversionary work on top of the £86,000 that was awarded to the council for good relations activities. The junior Ministers will meet key partners again on 23 September as part of our ongoing commitment to the area.

Similarly, in Craigavon, the junior Ministers have been chairing meetings with all key partners on the issues and tensions there, and we are supporting and facilitating diversionary work on a multi-agency basis.

Since 2006, the Institute of Irish Studies at Queen's University has undertaken flags monitoring on our behalf. Its last survey will be conducted at the end of this month, and we expect to receive the report by the end of the year.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh míle maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Chéad Aire as an fhreagra a thug sé. I thank the First Minister for his answer. After last week's farce, when there was a clear demonstration of a divided future, what is being done to resolve the logjam on this issue at the heart of the Government? Will the First Minister give us a definitive date for the strategy's official publication?

The First Minister: I do not think that the SDLP has any reason to be smug about the issue, because it and the Ulster Unionists failed to agree such a strategy themselves. Indeed, the strategy being employed is that which was agreed by the direct rule Administration. I understand that the Member probably practised asking his questions in front of the mirror and that he, therefore, did not bother listening to what I had to say. However, as I indicated in my response, a very considerable amount of work has been done on the overall policy for cohesion, sharing and inclusivity.

The Member is smiling, but the strategy is not just the responsibility of OFMDFM. Whether or not the Member agrees with the way in which documents on a shared future strategy were published, there are two such documents in the public arena — the recently published Sinn Féin document and the document on which OFMDFM officials and both my officials and the deputy First Minister's officials had been working.

Therefore, the Committee has the information before it, and it should remember that the Assembly can take decisions and Ministers are legally bound to comply with the decisions of the Assembly. So if the Committee, or indeed any Member of the Assembly, were to bring forward one of those documents or one of those documents as amended and it were to be passed by the Assembly, we all have a legal obligation to follow through.

I would like the strategy to have a Northern Ireland thumbprint, instead of it being a product of direct rule. However, irrespective of the strategy that we are operating under, the work on the ground will continue. The deputy First Minister and I are committed to that and have both been deeply involved in ensuring that that moves forward.

Mr Kinahan: I thank the First Minister for answering part of the question. Documents have been published, but does he accept that there is a continuing failure to have a vision or a will to deliver a cohesion, sharing and integration strategy, particularly in the House? Does he also accept that that in itself is a contributory factor to the ongoing community tensions that manifested themselves in the summer?

The First Minister: I accept that the failure of the SDLP and the Ulster Unionists to agree has been followed, thus far, by a failure by others to agree. We want to see that issue resolved. We know what the differences are, and we can discuss them in detail; I am content to go into in detail on the differences between the DUP and Sinn Féin on the matter.

There seems to be a sense of surprise, particularly among the press, that two parties do not agree on a particular issue. I suspect that there is a greater level of agreement on many of the issues that we have faced than there would have been if the Conservative and Labour parties were in Government together at Westminster. The fact that there are some issues on which we take a different approach should not surprise anybody. I emphasise that the Committee now has been provided, in an open way, with the type of documentation on which it can give us its view.

Mrs Long: Has taking into the public domain the dispute over the strategy, which it is fair to say most people were aware was ongoing, furthered community cohesion and a shared future, or detracted from it? Will the First Minister provide an assurance that, despite the public nature of the dispute, he and the deputy First Minister will continue to pursue the strategy, because their joint leadership on the matter is of huge importance to its ultimate delivery?

The First Minister: Mr Speaker, you would not allow me the words that I want to use in answer to the Member, because they might be considered unparliamentary. The Member has stood up time after time after time to make public the differences on the issue. Perhaps a little more honesty would do us some good — I am not talking about honesty from the Member; I am talking about honesty on our part by having transparency so that people can understand where the differences are.

If the differences are real and not synthetic, the public are more likely to understand them. Incidentally, we have not had the debate on what those differences are in public. I readily agree with the Member; I want to see agreement on those issues. Maybe the Member will tell us in due time, if not now, which of the documents, if any, she can endorse.

Mr Donaldson: If a single party continues to resist agreement on an issue as important as this, will the First Minister clarify whether a mechanism is available to the Assembly or Executive to enable us to move on?

The First Minister: During Question Time, I am not going to go back over remarks that were made in the Ulster Hall. However, under the Pledge of Office and the ministerial code, the existing rules, regulations and procedures require that every Minister complies with the decisions of the Assembly. If the Assembly takes a decision, it is the responsibility and obligation of Ministers to comply with that decision. That is the present legal position; it shows strength in the system and respect for the Assembly.

If, in the circumstances under discussion, the Assembly took the view that it was worth while for the Committee to bring forward one or other of those documents or, indeed, an amended document, and the Assembly were to support it, my ministerial colleagues and I would have to implement that and carry it out. Those are the rules of the Assembly.

Mr P Maskey: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle agus a Aire. Given the recent public statement by the former OFMDFM junior Minister about the relationship between equality and good relations, and given that the Programme for Government was agreed by the Executive, will the Minister remind the former junior Minister and the Assembly of PSA 7, and the aligned objective 5, for which the agreed target is to implement a programme of cohesion and integration?

The First Minister: The Member asked that question in a way that I do not quite understand. However, every Minister has a responsibility to act in accordance with the Programme for Government. That document has been agreed not only by the Executive but by the Assembly. All Members are entitled to their own views on any issue. However, in working out Government policy, we are bound by the Programme for Government.

Mr Speaker: I warn those Members, on all sides of the House, who are reading out supplementary questions that I will rule them out of order and move on to the next Member.

Policing and Justice: Budget

2. Mr K Robinson asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister for an update on any financial negotiations in respect of the devolution of policing and justice. (AQO 47/10)

4. Mr O'Loan asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister for an update on the current negotiations in respect of the budget for policing and justice following devolution. (AQO 49/10)

The First Minister: With your permission, Mr Speaker, I will answer questions 2 and 4 together.

Preparations for the devolution of policing and justice powers have progressed in line with the process paper that we made public after our attendance at the Assembly and Executive Review Committee (AERC) on 18 November 2008. Following the Assembly's approval of the AERC's report on the arrangements for the devolution of policing and justice matters on 20 January 2009, the Committee has been working on a second report to deal with a further range of issues, including financial provisions, that need to be resolved before devolution. On 29 June, the deputy First Minister and I attended a briefing by the Committee's specialist adviser on those financial issues. We look forward to the outcome of the Committee's consideration.

On a number of occasions over the past year, the deputy First Minister and I met senior Whitehall Ministers to discuss financing issues in relation to devolution. On Wednesday 16 September, we met the Prime Minister, and we intend to meet him again early this evening at Downing Street.

In addition, our officials, and those from the Department of Finance and Personnel, engaged in detailed discussions with Whitehall Departments, including the Treasury, the NIO and the Northern Ireland Court Service, to establish the financial implications of devolution. A series of meetings has also been held with front line justice and policing agencies to examine the pressures that they will face in delivering services in the coming years.

It is our firm view that devolution should be accompanied by adequate resources to meet the challenge of the new responsibilities and to deal with financial pressures. We remain committed to the achievement of a satisfactory conclusion to the ongoing financial discussions and to working faithfully through the other remaining steps that were identified in the November process paper.

Mr K Robinson: I thank the First Minister for that very detailed reply and for setting the issues out chronologically.

Given the sums involved, the potential that exists for derailing the entire process of devolution and the impact that it will have on the Assembly Budget, have the First Minister and his colleagues, at any stage, engaged in a procedure whereby there could be a process of rolling devolution for policing and justice?

2.45 pm

The First Minister: The Member is right; the Assembly and Executive Review Committee identified some considerable additional pressures. Indeed, it even assisted us in dividing those pressures into those that were truly inescapable; that is, those that involved legal or contractual obligations that could not be escaped in any way. Moreover, it helped to identify areas for which there was high pressure to put funding in place although they did not legally or contractually require additional funds. Other elements were clearly discretionary.

When we look through the report, we can see several areas that we might have expected a Department, in any circumstances, to deal with using its own budget. For example, slippage may have been allowed in one area to deal with additional pressure on another. However, the Assembly and Executive Review Committee's report involved some significant big-ticket issues, if I may use that term. In my view, it would be unwise for this Administration to take devolution on while those issues remain in their present form, because it would require those payments to be made. If the funds were not in the initial baseline, it is clear that the money would come from areas such as health, education, housing, agriculture and the environment, and so forth. We have been dealing with those issues seriously.

The Member asked about rolling devolution. The answer to his question is that not much is left to roll. If we look at the responsibilities that the Chief Constable and the police carry out independently and impartially, and if we look at the role of the Policing Board, it is clear that, beyond policy, nothing else is left to be rolled. Similarly, the judiciary is independent, and only policy and legislation would need to be rolled. Therefore, the high-end level remains. I do not see how that can be desegregated further in any way before one final move towards devolution. As we have indicated, that requires us to have other things in place.

Mr O'Loan: Members will note that the First Minister is a little tetchy today. Perhaps public criticism of him for the Office of the First Minister and the deputy First Minister's failure to deliver on cohesion, sharing and other matters is getting to him. He is unable to indicate a firm date for the devolution of justice and policing. Will a date not be absolutely necessary before Downing Street commits to its bottom line on funding?

The First Minister: I understand why the Member wants to take attention away from his party's problems — they will see the leader standing down for an older man or woman.

If one accepts the Member's argument, the situation is one of chicken and egg. I argue that if one were to set a date for the devolution of policing and justice, all that the Government would have to do is sit there with their arms folded, do absolutely nothing and wait for the date. That forces us to devolve those powers before the funding issue has been resolved adequately. We all know that it is vital to resolve the funding issue before devolution, because it will not be possible to resolve it thereafter, particularly as financial pressures and restraints continue to press down on the Treasury. That is particularly the case if there is to be a new Government that will talk about even more cuts.

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful for the opportunity to ask the First Minister a question. In coming to conclusions, will he take the advice of his party's deputy leader, Mr Dodds, or that of one of his party's Policing Board members, Mr Ian Paisley Jnr? Given recent events, is he prepared to express full confidence in Mr Paisley?

Mr Speaker: Order. Once again, the Member is abusing the House's procedures. That question in no way relates to the supplementary question, and the Member knows that quite well.

Mr A Maskey: I thank the First Minister for his responses so far. On a general point of principle, the First Minister, aside from all the commentaries made so far, has made the point that further public expenditure cuts will be made in future comprehensive spending reviews. In light of that, is it wise or appropriate that the future financial arrangements for policing and justice here be left in the hands of a British Government Minister?

The First Minister: I hope that there is a desire throughout the Chamber for us to have the maximum level of devolution in Northern Ireland, including policing and justice. I am not embarrassed to say that; I follow a long line of unionist leaders who believed that it was an imperative. The founding fathers of this state, Carson and Craigavon, would not have accepted devolution at Stormont without policing and justice powers being devolved. Even Brian Faulkner, in his day, would not allow the continuation of devolution in Northern Ireland because policing and justice powers were taken away. My clear view is that I want to see policing and justice powers come to Northern Ireland. However, we must remember that even if policing and justice powers lie in Northern Ireland, the budgetary arrangements will still lie with the Treasury. Simply having the responsibility here allows the Treasury, to some extent, to have it at arm's length. That is why it is vital that we get the right arrangements from the Treasury before we take the responsibility.

Mr Hamilton: Will the First Minister outline to the House what role he envisages that the Assembly and Executive Review Committee might have in considering any package that Her Majesty's Government would propose for the devolution of policing and justice powers?

The First Minister: The Assembly appreciates the role that the Assembly and Executive Review Committee has already played. It brought a report to the House on the institutional arrangements that found favour with Members, and I believe that our institutional arrangements will enjoy the confidence of the community. The Committee has moved on to the next stage, which is to examine the funding arrangements. I know that it has done a considerable amount of work and has brought in a specialist adviser to assist it.

The deputy First Minister and I have taken many of the Committee's suggestions on board in our discussions with the Prime Minister and others. I understand that the Committee will want to finalise its report on the financial arrangements. It may want to see the deputy First Minister and me again before it does so, and I am pretty sure that we will be content to meet the Committee once again. The Committee's report is one of the essential elements of the process that we agreed last November: that the Committee would come back to the Assembly with its report on funding and other arrangements.

Investment Strategy

3. Mr Irwin asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister for their assessment on the delivery of the Executive's investment strategy. (AQO 48/10)

The First Minister: The investment strategy for Northern Ireland (ISNI) has enabled the Executive to concentrate on the delivery of our capital investment programmes and projects in these most difficult of times, in which the credit crunch has hit our local economy. In 2008-09, gross capital investment in public works totalled almost £1.7 billion, up 20% on the year before, and without significant underspend. In contrast, investment levels in the first part of this decade were typically around £650 million per annum up to 2002-03.

New capital investment is at record levels, and the Executive are determined to continue investing in our future to the maximum extent possible, with the resources that are available to us. We will do that not only because to do so is to support essential services but because it gives our local construction industry an important stimulus in these difficult times. Some examples of the progress that we have made include the completion of the M2 roads project ahead of schedule at a cost of £20 million; the construction of a new further education campus for Belfast Metropolitan College in the Titanic Quarter, which is now under way; and the commencement of the construction of the new £270 million acute hospital outside Enniskillen, which will sustain 850 jobs, 180 of which will be newly created.

There are 55 projects, worth about £265 million in total, for which the construction contract was recently signed; there are a further 40 projects, worth about £950 million in total, for which procurement is in progress. That includes a £600 million design-and-build contract for the A5 road upgrade. In addition, there are about 40 construction projects across Departments, worth £200 million in total, for which procurement is planned for the near term, but which have not yet commenced.

Our investment programme is making an enormous impact on the local economy, particularly on the construction industry. In many of the cases that I mentioned, there are opportunities for subcontractors and suppliers to bid for work in the supply chain. The bulk of investment strategy for Northern Ireland projects are planned and delivered by local firms using local materials and labour. We are very conscious of the key role that the local construction industry plays in the economy of Northern Ireland, a topic on which Members have frequently raised concerns.

Although the Government cannot substitute for the loss of business in the private sector housing market, we have done all that we can to maximise the implementation of Government spending to support the construction sector. That is evidenced by the record outturns in 2008-09, and by the ongoing work programme.

More public works are being undertaken today in Northern Ireland than at any time in our history. This Executive and their achievements to date in bringing forward their programme of infrastructure investment have been significant, and we are confident — subject to resources — that we will be in a position to build on that success for the benefit of our people in future as we climb out of recession.

Mr Irwin: In the past week, both the SDLP and UUP published documents in relation to the Budget, claiming that there is a £2 billion hole. Does the Minister have any comments to make on that?

The First Minister: We all know the wonky economics in both those documents. It does this community no service for people deliberately to inflate areas where there is expenditure and to ignore entirely areas where we have been bringing in funds in order to cause concern and fear. I say “deliberately”, as there is always the possibility that they are economically illiterate and do not know any better.

The Executive will be able to fund their Budget like any other Executive. There will be pressures for additional funds; swine flu and water charges will put pressure on the Budget. However, there are always slippages, particularly in the capital budget. Almost £600 million was underspent in the 2006-07 financial year, as opposed to the additional Budget that was supplied for capital. There is always slippage to compensate in a Budget, to some extent, and where it does not compensate, the Executive have to look at their programmes to identify their priorities.

Dr Farry: I thank the First Minister for his answer. Although we recognise the scale of the capital investment and its effect on the pump-priming of our economy, will the First Minister outline whether any opportunity has been taken of the scale of capital investment to change the fundamentals of our economy to tackle the structural weaknesses that have been identified and to modernise and rebalance our economy?

The First Minister: As I said, we are now investing more than twice as much as in previous CSR periods, with £1.7 billion being spent on housing, roads, education and hospitals. That is a very significant sum. Under the procurement directives, we can examine the social implications of our spend in how we purchase those services and assets.

The Executive have had the growth of our economy as their priority. Many an Executive might have been blown off course by the recession, but because we have always had the growth of the economy as our priority, we have continued on course, although, at times, it has become difficult. The Executive found that it was important that capital spend was made to fulfil the Programme for Government, particularly in relation to the construction industry and the gap that it was feeling through the lack of house building.

Coming out of recession, we are well-positioned to take advantage of all the work that we have done.

AGRICULTURE AND RURAL DEVELOPMENT

Ambulance Service

1. Mr McCarthy asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development what discussions she has held with the Minister for Health, Social Services and Public Safety regarding adequate ambulance service cover in rural areas. (AQO 60/10)

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development (Ms Gildernew): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Provision of adequate ambulance cover is obviously a very important issue for rural communities. Being mindful of that, I requested a meeting with the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety when the proposals for the Ambulance Service efficiency savings were published in July 2009. A meeting has been arranged for next week, at which I intend to discuss the Minister's decision to support those proposals. I will also seek assurances that the potential impact of the changes on rural areas has been fully investigated and that there will be ongoing monitoring of those changes.

Mr McCarthy: I thank the Minister for her response. She is getting to talk to the Health Minister about ambulance provision earlier than me. The Minister acknowledged the Health Minister's endorsement only last week of a document that will lead to the loss of 70,000 ambulance-staff hours. Does the Minister, who, like me, represents a rural constituency, fear that cutbacks and a lack of ambulance provision will put extra strain on rural communities and put lives at risk?

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: I am speaking as a Minister and not as a constituency MP. As the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development, it is my responsibility to advocate across Government on behalf of rural communities and rural constituencies, such as the Member's. I sought a meeting with Minister McGimpsey to ensure that the issues that the rural community highlighted during consultation have been fully considered and that there is a realisation of the potential impacts on rural areas.

It is of great concern to me that, in the past, rural proofing has been shown not to work. I am keen that that the needs of rural people and rural communities are met by all Departments, which is why I brought my proposals for a rural-wide paper to the Executive. I am pleased that they are supporting me as that project is worked through.

Mr Shannon: The Minister will be aware that there is an Assembly all-party group on rural sustainability. Ambulance cover in rural areas is a key issue that has been raised by that all-party group. The Minister said that it is her job, as the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development, to represent the rural community. We need her to assure us today that her Department will make every effort to ensure that there is sufficient ambulance cover for the rural areas that we represent and that lives will not be lost as a result of road traffic accidents or accidents on the farm. Those are the key issues for representatives of rural communities.

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: We must ensure that there is adequate ambulance provision. There have been reductions in services at some hospitals, and rural dwellers rely on ambulance cover, given that they have to travel further to hospitals. Ambulance cover is one of the issues that I will discuss with Minister McGimpsey. I will be keen to ensure that there is adequate provision in rural areas. We already have to deal with difficult conditions on the roads to some hospitals, so it is more important than ever that rural areas have adequate provision of ambulances and, indeed, all primary care. I hope that we will have a good, constructive discussion about all those matters next week.

Mr McElduff: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. What rural proofing has been undertaken in the development of the proposal? Has the Minister's Department had a role in the matter?

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: As I said, rural proofing did not work in the past, hence the recent announcement for a reinvigorated rural-proofing process. Departments need to take full account of the way in which their policies will be delivered to all communities. My Department's role in rural proofing is to provide support for the process. That role is reinforced by consultation and approved by the Executive. My Department will advise on the how and why of rural proofing, but individual Departments are ultimately responsible for obtaining all the evidence and information that is required to define their priorities and to predict impacts on rural communities.

Through the Executive, I have undertaken actions to deliver and enhance the rural-proofing process and training programme for all of Government.

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Go raibh maith agat, a Aire, as ucht an fhreagra sin.

As the Minister represents and lives in a rural area, as I do, she will presumably be aware of some of the concerns about the provision of services in rural areas, particularly to the likes of the Mid-Ulster Hospital at Magherafelt. The Minister revealed that she would meet the Health Minister. Will she provide or put on record the detail of any objections or concerns that she has about the proposals for the rapid-response vehicles and the level of ambulance provision in our rural areas?

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: The use of rapid-response vehicles is the responsibility of the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety. Although I recognise the potential benefits of the use of rapid-response vehicles and do not doubt the standard of treatment that individuals will receive, I want to explore further with Minister McGimpsey the use of those vehicles in rural communities. I will happily make the outworkings of that meeting known to the Member.

Farm Modernisation Programme

3. Mr Donaldson asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to outline the criteria to be used for distributing funds under the next round of the Farm Modernisation Scheme. (AQO 62/10)

10. Mr McFarland asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development, in relation to the Farm Modernisation Programme, how many and what percentage of applicants have received letters of offer. (AQO 69/10)

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: With your permission, a Cheann Comhairle, I will answer questions 3 and 10 together. In relation to the criteria for distributing funds under the next round of the farm modernisation programme, my officials are still developing the additional criteria for tranche two. I have asked for a paper on that matter by the end of this week. It is my intention to seek the industry's views on the additional criteria for that important and popular programme as soon as I can.

As regards letters of offer, 1,268 farmers received a letter of offer under tranche one of the programme, which is 13.68% of the large number that applied. It is well known that the scheme was hugely oversubscribed, and I am happy to reiterate my intention to work to secure more money for the programme. All applicants under tranche one have now been notified of the outcome of their application.

Mr Donaldson: The Minister rightly points to the popularity of the programme. Will the Minister consider widening the criteria for the next round of the programme to enable farms that keep pigs or grow cereals to be included, so that farmers from that kind of background are able to benefit from the scheme?

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: It was my hope that all farmers, whatever their focus, would be able to buy into the scheme. We tried to include items in the programme that would be of benefit to a wide range of people, so no sector was purposely left out. However, the programme is for farm modernisation, and the items that a pig farmer needs to modernise are very different from the items that a dairy farmer, for example, needs to modernise. We want to look again at the list, and we will take views from the industry as soon as we can, when the additional work is done on tranche two. We want to include additional criteria so that the programme is as effective as it can be.

Mr McFarland: I thank the Minister for her answer. Presumably those who were unsuccessful in the first round will be able to reapply. Do they have to apply again, or will the Department automatically consider their first-round application as their subsequent-round application?

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: The short answer is that they will have to apply again. As the Member knows, the application form is very succinct and simple to fill out. We want to go through the process again because a farmer who did not apply the first time because no items on the list pertained to him or her may find that the new list is more appropriate to their needs. We do not want anybody to be disadvantaged, so we are asking farmers to reapply and to look at the new list to see what they need. Farmers can apply for all of the tranches providing that they do not go above the threshold that has been set down. What each individual farmer wants to do is up to them.

Mr Irwin: When does the Minister expect the scheme's second tranche to be opened?

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: I have said that the second tranche will not open until at least spring 2010; it will be worth in the region of £6 million. As I said earlier, I will do all in my power, in light of other urgent priorities and financial restrictions, to get more money into the programme. There is likely to be an opportunity to move money from one scheme to another, but it will be next spring before tranche 2 opens.

Mr Savage: It is interesting to hear the Minister say that the second tranche will be available in 2010. When will people have their applications approved?

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: Is the Member asking about approvals for tranche 1 or tranche 2?

Mr Savage: Sorry, tranche 2.

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: The Department has a great deal of work to do before tranche 2 is finalised and the criteria set. We will talk to the industry, and we want to get the money out as quickly as possible after tranche 2 closes. I cannot yet say, categorically, how long that will take.

Food Processing

4. Mr I McCrea asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development if the Processing and Marketing Grant scheme is the sole capital support for food processing businesses. (AQO 63/10)

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: The agrifood and forestry industries in the North account for a significant proportion of economic activity. Therefore, they have a vital role to play in the evolution and restructuring of the local economy and are highly dependent on external markets. The aim of the processing and marketing grant scheme (PMG) is to improve economic performance and international competitiveness in those sectors.

The PMG is my Department's main vehicle to support the food-processing sector. The rural development programme (RDP) that was approved by the European Commission has utilised a provision under article 28 of the programme legislation, which provides easement for funding of annex-1 products otherwise excluded under state-aid rules. Subject to fairly strict conditions, those products can be funded under axis 1 of the rural development programme.

To date, the processing and marketing grant scheme has received 63 applications and issued 16 letters of offer, committing almost £5 million of funding. Added to private funding, that comes to a total investment in the sector of more than £12 million, which is a significant amount in difficult economic times.

A number of food processors of non-annex-1 products is being signposted to axis 3 of the RDP. I know that a small number of cases does not fit comfortably in the processing and marketing grant scheme or access 3, and I have asked my officials to review all the support mechanisms available to the processing and marketing sector. Cross-axes meetings have already been held and I await a report and recommendations. Invest NI also has a range of measures under which food businesses can receive aid. Those complement aid available from my Department and mean that the Executive are providing substantial support to food-processing businesses.

Mr I McCrea: I welcome the fact that there will be, hopefully, some clarity on cross-axes issues, because there was some uncertainty about whether businesses could apply. Will support for farm shops under axis 3 include capital grant aid for food-processing equipment?

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: I cannot say exactly what will be covered under that grant scheme or whether we will be able to find a mechanism to do anything for farm shops until I see my officials' report and recommendations on those cross-sectoral meetings. I certainly intend to try, but I do not yet have that detail.

Mr Cree: Will the Minister clarify the level of funding available for food-processing companies outside the rural development programme?

3.15 pm

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: I apologise to the Member; I do not have that information with me, but I will happily write to him with it.

Mr W Clarke: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Will the Minister outline why applicants to the process and marketing grant scheme under axis 1 cannot purchase second-hand equipment?

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: Although I accept that it is important for the agrifood industry to be at the cutting edge of new technology and to avail itself of the most efficient equipment, I also acknowledge that being able to purchase second-hand equipment may provide a more cost-effective way forward in these difficult financial times. Therefore, I have asked my officials to carry out a review of the procedures under the processing and marketing grant scheme as quickly as possible, with a remit to examine the options to purchase second-hand equipment that is fit for purpose. I want to assess the outcome of that review before making a final decision.

Mr Speaker: The Member is not in his place to ask question 5.

Community Relations

6. Mr Neeson asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development what action she is taking to promote community relations in rural areas.

(AQO 65/10)

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: In recent years, my Department has been instrumental in fostering good community relations in rural areas through the rural development programme and other rural initiatives. For example, under axis 3 of the current programme, local action groups are required to reflect the agenda of the shared future triennial action plan in their local development strategies. At the same time, community groups that are funded through the rural community network and sub-networks are cross-community based and work to principles that promote the shared development of rural needs.

Other initiatives include the funding of a programme aimed at supporting the specific needs of isolated Protestant communities in border areas. Furthermore, funding the Rural Women's Network helps to ensure that the rural women's sector is able to embrace many cross-community themes in its rural work programmes. Young people, too, are not overlooked. Through my rural childcare programme, exciting opportunities exist for early-years integration, which can only establish and foster good community relations for generations to come.

Mr Neeson: I thank the Minister for her answer. Many people regard community relations as an urban issue, but that is clearly not the case; one need only look at the numerous sectarian attacks on Orange halls and GAA clubs in rural areas. Will the Minister assure me that her Department will make every effort to improve community relations in rural areas, which could be done, in particular, through the rural networks?

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: The rural networks are very much a vehicle for doing that, and all parts of the North have had a rural support network for a considerable time. In the current funding round, two networks could not meet the pre-funding conditions, one of which decided to close. However, as a result of that and due to the nature of the sector, neighbouring rural support networks are providing cover across boundaries to ensure that the sector continues to carry out its valuable work in all areas.

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Ba mhaith liom buíochas a ghabháil leis an Aire as an fhreagra sin.

I thank the Minister for her answer. What work has her Department carried out to promote equality and good relations throughout all areas of its work?

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: Since I took office in May 2007, the promotion of equality and good relations across the range of my Department's work has been a key objective of mine. In this year's business plan, I outlined that I am committed to ensuring that equality and good relations are at the heart of our business and that we work to achieve measurable outcomes.

An equality steering group, comprising senior officials from across the Department and chaired by the permanent secretary, meets quarterly and reports to me on a regular basis. In addition, my Department is fully represented on all interdepartmental working groups and at equality-related meetings to provide the rural input to various strategies and action plans, such as the anti-poverty strategy, the gender action plan, the children's strategy, the sexual-orientation action plan and the racial equality strategy.

Mr Kinahan: In the Minister's efforts to promote community relations, has she abandoned plans to develop the Forkhill army base?

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: No, I have not abandoned either the project or the good people of Forkhill, and I believe that that project has the ability to strengthen good community relations, as opposed to the Member's inference that it might diminish them.

Fertiliser

7. Mr P J Bradley asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development, in light of the poor weather conditions, what consideration she has given to an extension of the dates for (i) the application of nitrogen to grasslands; and (ii) the start of the closed period for slurry spreading. (AQO 66/10)

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: The closed period for spreading chemical nitrogen fertiliser is based on sound scientific evidence. Chemical fertiliser that is supplied up to mid-September, together with the mineralisation of nitrogen that is already in the soil and organic manures that can be applied up to 15 October, is sufficient to meet the requirements of reduced grass growth in the autumn. There is no need for the application of chemical nitrogen fertiliser after the cut-off date of 15 September 2009. A three-year research study has been conducted at the Agri-Food and Biosciences Institute (AFBI) Hillsborough, and no scientific evidence was found to support applications of chemical nitrogen fertiliser after mid-September. National fertiliser recommendations RB209 state that there is no economic response to chemical fertiliser application on grassland after mid-September.

Dealing with the second part of the question, I recognise that the poor weather conditions this summer mean that some farmers are experiencing practical difficulties with spreading slurry. The closed period for slurry spreading is a regulatory requirement under the Nitrates Action Programme Regulations. The NI Environment Agency is responsible for the inspection and enforcement of those regulations. Therefore, any regulatory matters are primarily for the Minister of the Environment to consider. I have provided him with details of the advice that my Department has been able to offer farmers recently, and I explained some of the difficulties that farmers are having with managing slurry. I certainly recognise the challenges that exist, and I sympathise with farmers about them.

Mr P J Bradley: I thank the Minister for her answer. I want to ask a supplementary question on the first part of my question. It is 15°C outside, and summertime does not end until the end of October. Does the Minister not agree that application of fertiliser through September and even into early October would cut down the use of winter feeding stuffs? There is a valuable saving for the farmer to be made in so doing. Indeed, the cut-off date of 15 September is anti-farming.

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: As I said, AFBI's research showed no benefit in applying chemical fertiliser to the soil after 15 September. I am not a scientist, and I would not want to argue with a three-year programme. Given the professionalism and the nature of the team at AFBI, I have no reason to misdoubt the findings of the research.

Dr W McCrea: Does the Minister agree that, in the light of the change in weather patterns, she should work with the Department of the Environment to ensure that there is flexibility on slurry spreading and that she should not be tied to an unacceptable timetable? Sense tells us that there should be such flexibility.

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: The deadline for slurry spreading is 15 October. The Member asked questions that Sinn Féin raised during the consultation process about the fact that the weather can be suitable for spreading slurry during the closed period. However, again, the evidence exists. The Minister of the Environment had a derogation last winter; I understand that that flexibility is not available to him this year. That is not of his or my making; it is a European Commission regulation. I am sure that the Minister of the Environment would be happy to take questions that are directed to him about that.

Mr Brady: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Mr Bradley has been encouraging me recently in our local press to take an interest in agricultural affairs, so I thought that I would ask a question. [Laughter.]

The closed period for the spreading of chemical fertiliser has been extended in the South. Why has that not happened here?

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: The growing season, particularly in the south-west of Ireland, is longer than that in the North. Given his extensive agricultural knowledge, the Member will know that there is quite a bit of arable land in that area. Spreading chemical fertilisers for a further short period can help to boost grass growth in the South. As I said, the local scientific research that was conducted at AFBI Hillsborough supports the closed period for the application of chemical nitrogen fertiliser in the North, and there is no scientific evidence to support applications of fertiliser after mid-September.

Mr K Robinson: Has the Minister considered carefully the impact that any extension of the slurry period will have on urban dwellers, streams and rivers? If so, what steps will she take to minimise that impact?

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: I am pleased to report that it is not only urban dwellers who benefit from clean streams and rivers; we in the rural community have an interest in them as well. Spreading slurry in adverse weather conditions is dangerous to our water quality and water courses; that is why we have advisers who advise farmers on when and, more importantly, when not to spread slurry. Farmers are not allowed to spread slurry if heavy rain is imminent or if the ground is waterlogged.

My Department's advisers also work with farmers to provide advice on how to cope if they find that they have a shorter fodder later in the year. Clean water courses are of equal importance to rural and urban dwellers, and we are keen to achieve that. Furthermore, slurry spills or seepage into a river can have a terrible impact on fish, especially when water levels are low.

Hunting with Dogs

8. Mr B Wilson asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development if she would consider introducing legislation to ban hunting with dogs similar to the Hunting Act 2004 for England and Wales and the Protection of Wild Mammals (Scotland) Act 2002. (AQO 67/10)

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: There has been little political or public debate on hunting in the North. Any decision to introduce a ban on hunting here is not solely a matter for my Department and would have to be taken in conjunction with ministerial colleagues in the Executive. My Department has limited responsibilities towards animals in the wild and it has no powers to prohibit or regulate hunting or coursing with dogs.

Section 15 of the Welfare of Animals Act 1972 exempts from its provision the coursing or hunting of any animal other than a domestic animal. That provision does not legitimise hunting or coursing, but excludes those activities from the offences of cruelty contained in the Act. However, it should be noted that the hunting exemption in the Welfare of Animals Act 1972 does not apply if unnecessary suffering is caused to an animal or if the animal is released in an injured, mutilated or exhausted condition. Similarly, the exemption does not apply if an animal is hunted in an enclosed space from which it has no reasonable chance of escape. Therefore, a prosecution can be made here under existing legislation — unlike in Britain — if sufficient evidence is forthcoming that unnecessary suffering has been caused to an animal during a hunt.

Mr B Wilson: I thank the Minister for her response. However, given that the rest of the United Kingdom has banned this barbaric and cruel sport, I am disappointed that the Minister appears to have no powers. She refers to the Welfare of Animals Act 1972, which provides the power to prosecute in instances in which an animal is injured, mutilated or exhausted. Will the Minister use that power? It is obvious that most animals will be in such a state if they are being hunted. Therefore, there are grounds for prosecution under the Welfare of Animals Act 1972.

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: The Member is right. We can legislate for animals that are released in an exhausted or mutilated state. It is clear that any decision to introduce legislation to ban hunting with dogs is a matter for the Executive. We are introducing some major pieces of legislation. The legislation should be enforced, and the PSNI has the power to enforce the Welfare of Animals Act 1972.

Mr Shannon: I love this question. [Laughter.] Why would the Minister want to introduce legislation that is immoral and unwise? Why would she want to alienate large groups of people in the rural communities? That is what happened when such legislation was introduced across the water. Why would she want to introduce legislation that has not even been able to be arrived at through the courts? Why would she bother introducing the legislation that Brian Wilson wants when she knows that it is unworkable?

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: I do not want to comment on what the Member says. There is little public appetite for a debate on this matter. However, I would welcome a debate if Brian Wilson chose to bring it to the Floor. I would not be guided in what I do by what Mr Shannon said about alienating people in the rural community; I will be guided by doing the right thing for animal welfare. There is much more in our legislation than was in place in Britain before the ban was introduced.

Mr Speaker: That ends today's Question Time.

ASSEMBLY BUSINESS

Mr B McCrea: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. Earlier today, in response to a question from my colleague Mr Kinahan, the First Minister said:

“the Assembly can take decisions and Ministers are legally bound to comply with the decisions of the Assembly. So, if the Committee, or indeed any Member of the Assembly, were to bring forward one of those documents or one of those documents as amended and it were to be passed by the Assembly, we all have a legal obligation to follow through.”

That is not the first time that the First Minister has made that assertion.

On 10 November 2008, the Assembly passed a motion that stated:

“That this Assembly calls on the Minister of Education to end the uncertainty facing parents and teachers of children in Primary 6 by continuing with the existing post-primary transfer test until a replacement is designed and piloted by CCEA.” — [Official Report, Vol 35, No 1, p19, col 1].

Does that resolution of the Assembly have legal standing and is it legally binding on the Minister of Education? If that is not the case, could Members please have some advice about how we should frame future resolutions, so as to meet the assertion made by the First Minister?

Mr Speaker: I thank the Member for his point of order. The Member will be aware that his question deals with the complex issue of the powers of the Assembly, including its power to direct Ministers. The Assembly has not, as such, asserted that power; inasmuch as it has, it has not done so in a way that tested the limits and extent of that power. I ask the Member, and any other Members who are concerned about that issue, to speak to me outside the Chamber because, as I have said, those issues are complex. I would be extremely happy to talk to the Member outside the Chamber.

Mr McLaughlin: Further to that point of order, Mr Speaker. It was unclear whether Mr McCrea was directing his concerns towards the Minister of Education. It is a matter of record that the Minister had developed firm proposals that she wished to put to the Executive but was prevented from doing so by other Ministers. Therefore, is the Member's concern about those who prevented the debate occurring rather than being about the Minister of Education failing in her duty to put proposals in front of the Executive and the Assembly?

Mr Speaker: I hear what the Member has said, although I am not sure that it was a point of order. However, there seems to be a general issue with respect to the power that the Assembly has in directing Ministers. I have said to the whole House in the past that those are complex issues, and if any Members wish to speak to me about that issue outside the Chamber, I would be happy to do so.

Mr B McCrea: Further to that point of order, Mr Speaker.

Mr Speaker: Is it a further point of order to the one that has been discussed?

Mr B McCrea: Mr Speaker —

Mr Speaker: Order. I ask the Member to take his seat. I cannot add anything more to what I have said on that issue. If the Member wishes to discuss a different issue or to make a different point of order, I will be happy to allow him to speak.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

Civil Service Recruitment

Debated resumed on motion:

That this Assembly notes the efforts made by the Northern Ireland Civil Service in recent years to address the under-representation of Protestants among those applying for, and being recruited to, occupational groups which have most employees in the Civil Service; and calls for continued monitoring of all the grades, but particularly those grades where thousands of people are employed, in order that those from all community backgrounds can have confidence in the recruitment process. — [Mr Campbell.]

Mr McLaughlin: I beg to move amendment No 1: Leave out all after the second “Civil Service;” and insert

‘notes the continued under-representation of Catholics and women in the most senior grades of the Civil Service; and calls for continued monitoring of all grades, the immediate publication of the ninth Equal Opportunities Unit report which the DFP Equality and Diversity Plan (para. 6.2) stated, in October 2008, would be published by the end of 2008 and the continued publication, in their traditional format, of the major DFP Equal Opportunities Unit reports detailing NICS workforce recruitment, composition and promotion patterns in order that those from all community backgrounds can have confidence in the recruitment and promotion processes.’

Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. It is important to emphasize that the proposed amendment is not an attempt to dilute or divert the concern that exists about under-representation of Protestants in the occupational groups that have the most employees in the Civil Service. I regret that Gregory Campbell is not in the Chamber at the moment. We share a long history of being elected representatives from the city where he, I and the Speaker come from. However, this is the first time — and I really want to get this off my chest — that I have been able to state that I agree with what Gregory Campbell has said on a particular issue. My party also shares that concern and strongly supports effective and legally permissible affirmative action to redress that injustice. Of course, my party wants to apply that scrutiny to every level and structure in the Civil Service, and I expect that all parties would agree that that is a laudable and worthwhile exercise.

I urge all parties, particularly the party whose members proposed the motion, to consider in an open-minded fashion how the Sinn Féin amendment will have the effect of addressing each of the issues that have been identified in the motion. The amendment adds, in a constructive manner and intent, the issues that will deliver the employment and monitoring processes of the Civil Service that will command the confidence of all sections of our community.

We must address the question of why we need special measures, fair employment legislation, anti-discrimination measures, section 75 and ongoing monitoring. The reason is obvious: our history reflects systematic and institutionalised discrimination. When we accept that that has been the case for generations, that legacy will be with us for some time. There is a need to have an affirmative action programme designed to meet milestones on the way to creating a truly representative workforce. Sinn Féin acknowledges that those issues are being addressed. However, the question is whether they are being addressed in the most effective and the most timely fashion. The report indicates that more needs to be done.

The fact that, in some of the lower grades, we have 50:50 representation — or a figure approaching it — does not in itself indicate a fair reflection of the workforce as a whole. It is the benchmark against which we must test the effectiveness of policies that are developed to ensure an end to discrimination on political or religious allegiance — or perceived allegiance — and to determine whether one would have a career, a job opportunity or a fair opportunity in all circumstances. It behoves us all to develop those robust, stringent and ongoing measures.

The Sinn Féin amendment adds a caveat: it is not a departure; it is an addition to the issues that were addressed by Gregory Campbell in proposing the motion. It argues for the continuation of the publication of the monitoring processes that are already in place. Those monitoring processes are resourced and have been utilised over time. Mr Campbell and I relied on those reports in compiling our contributions to the debate, as, I am sure, did all party spokespersons. Equally, the useful briefing paper, which Gregory also acknowledged, was prepared on the basis of those various monitoring processes and the periodic reports that they have generated.

Information is the key, and the differences or the potential divisions on the issue are more apparent than real when we recognise that we are all relying on the same data and on the objective accumulation of that information. If the information shows that there is Catholic or Protestant under-representation, we should be fearless in pursuing and developing our responses to it, wherever it may be, and we should do that on the basis of negotiated and agreed timetables and targets for redressing such imbalances.

Our unfortunate history means that we will have to address legacy issues for some time; however, that does not justify any perpetuation of those patterns. All new employment should be carried out using rigorous criteria when addressing suitability. If we acknowledge and accept that there has been progress, we can, in a spirit of co-operation, agree that we can develop agreed processes on the way forward.

Sinn Féin's amendment does not take away one iota from the motion; it genuinely adds to the basis on which we can assess, identify and highlight under-representation, irrespective of which community it reflects.

I ask for support for our amendment, hopefully from the proposers of the motion as well as the rest of the Assembly. It will ensure that the full range of the monitoring processes, which have been developed over a considerable period of time in response to the endemic problems caused by discrimination in the past, will not continue to blight our approach in the future. I ask for support for the Sinn Féin amendment. Go raibh maith agat.

Mr O'Loan: I beg to move amendment No 2: Leave out all after "people are employed" and insert:

"to ensure that achievements made to address historic imbalances throughout the Civil Service workforce are sustained; and recognises the continued need for a specific focus on encouraging religious and gender equality and ethnic diversity, not least in the Senior Civil Service, in order that those from all community backgrounds can have confidence in the recruitment and appointment processes."

In one sense I strongly welcome the original motion. I will make some, hopefully measured, criticisms of it, but I welcome the implicit DUP support for the fair employment process and the legislation that underlies it. We know that that party stood very strongly against the whole concept of fair employment legislation — as did its unionist colleagues in the Ulster Unionist Party — and did so until very recent times. I welcome the fact that, in the wording of the motion, the DUP is embracing the mechanisms laid down in the fair employment legislation and urging that they be used in particular ways.

The motion specifically calls for monitoring of the workforce. I recall that, when the concept of monitoring was first proposed, the DUP said that our businesses and organisations would be overwhelmed if they had to do that work. Now that party is obviously totally persuaded of the value of that legislation, and is embracing it to the extent of wishing it to be used in the ways proposed in the motion. However, I am very critical of the DUP's focus on the Protestant workforce exclusively. The proposer, Gregory Campbell, did not clear the decks on that with the words that he said, because the words as printed are as printed. For a party that needs to be demonstrating its fundamental belief in a shared future for us all to bring forward a motion worded in partisan terms does us no good at all. The DUP is failing to exert the leadership that it should when it does that.

I will now make some comments on the factual accuracy of the motion. I take a lot of my information from the most important report issued in June of this year, the '2007 Review of Fair Participation' published by the Department — the article 55 review — which gives the state of play in 2007. It states that, in relation to the overall Northern Ireland Civil Service workforce, the Protestant component is 51.9% and the Catholic component is 45.6 %. Now, all statistics should be used carefully. The report makes comparisons with the 2001 census, and there is obviously a six-year gap. The proportions that we might expect in the workforce, particularly for individual sections of the Civil Service, are not necessarily exactly in accordance with other categories that one can discover in the census.

With all those caveats presented, most people would conclude that there is something like broad, fair participation across the Northern Ireland Civil Service by the two major religious communities in Northern Ireland. That is a very major statement to be able to make. The proportion of females is described as 50.4%, and I presume that the remainder are males. Therefore, once again, there is a remarkable degree of balance. Taken broadly, if there is a variation in favour of, for example, Catholics in one place, there is going to be compensation in favour of Protestants in another place. Therefore, the fundamental premise presented in the original motion is false.

Using the words “grades where thousands of people are employed” creates an utterly false impression, because, taken as a whole, the statistics present a picture of a balanced workforce with regard to gender and religious composition. That did not use to be the case; however, it is now broadly the case. The achievements are that the headline figures, as I stated, show broad fairness in gender and religious participation.

The second major achievement is that we have religious balance in the Senior Civil Service. The report tells us that, for the first time, there is fair participation for Catholics in the senior levels at grade 5 and above. That is the group of approximately 199 persons generally referred to as the Senior Civil Service. For that reason, I am not quite sure of the factual basis for that element of the Sinn Féin amendment.

That is the report as presented. I can only assume that those facts are accurate, and for them to be reported for the first time is a hugely important achievement that we should mark. When we first embarked on fair employment legislation, the lack of balance in our public service was one of the key areas that needed to be addressed. To find now, for the first time, that Catholics are fairly represented at the highest levels of the Civil Service is an important achievement, and an absolute vindication of the fight to achieve fair employment legislation — a fight that was hard fought and hard won. It is also a vindication of the quality of that legislation, because it is achieving what it is supposed to do. I will not aim at commenting on whether there are nuances in those figures on the Senior Civil Service. However, certainly on that group, the report says what it says.

What remains to be done? On the religious category, there are significant imbalances in certain sections and grades. I might summarise those as the need to ensure fair participation by Protestants in the administrative assistant, administrative officer and executive officer grades of the general service group, and by Protestants and Catholics in the professional and specialist groups. Therefore, there are weaknesses. There is substantial work to be done and deep analysis of those areas as to why participation is not even, and further methods need to be adopted to address those weaknesses. In AO grades, for example, the report says that the lack of fair participation by Protestants is likely to continue. Such a message should sound alarm bells and make managers look further and more deeply and attempt to find measures that will remedy that situation.

The 2007 report is not specifically about gender; indeed, it identifies the need to do a further in-depth report on gender. However, it presents provisional conclusions, some of which are worrying. I again point out the headline figure, which shows that there is broad equality, but the report says that in the general service group, men are under-represented in the administrative AA and AO grades, in which only 32% of staff are male, and that in the general service group, women are under-represented at senior levels of grade 5 and above, in which 24.1% of staff are female. Women are also under-represented in some professional and specialist occupational groups. The report does not refer to the fact — and I have little doubt that it is true — that women are under-represented in the Senior Civil Service. That is my own observation, and, I think, probably the observation of most people. There is significant work to be done on gender in some areas.

There is also a job to be done on ethnic diversity. In the Programme for Government, PSA 21, objective 2.3, has as its target:

“The NICS is more reflective of the diversity of Northern Ireland’s society by 2011.”

However, it is a very modestly presented target, and all that has been done so far is to set in place a plan to achieve that.

I wish to qualify the following words, which appear in the motion and in both amendments:

“can have confidence in the recruitment ... process”.

My party and I use those words in a different sense to that in which they are used in the motion, which tells the Protestant community that it cannot currently have confidence in the recruitment process. That is not fair to the managers in the Civil Service. The system is broadly fair, but, because of the elements that I have pointed out, further work needs to be done to enhance that.

The Prison Service makes up a small percentage of the Civil Service, but its results are stark. Catholics comprise 9·8% of the workforce, and 17·8% of the workforce is female.

Mr Speaker: The Member must draw his remarks to a close.

Mr O'Loan: The serious reports that have been produced recently on Maghaberry prison suggest major cultural problems that may well be associated with those religious and gender issues.

Mr Kinahan: I will digress for a second. I feel that this is the time for the people who are in the Building today to test blood pressure to come and test ours.

Due to our circumstances, recruitment to the Civil Service is an issue that we may be destined to debate back and forth for years to come. We must pay attention to two undeniable facts. First, there is a shortage of applications from Protestants for recruitment to the Civil Service, which results in a widening gap between Protestants and Catholics in the junior grades. Secondly, it is also true that Catholics are underrepresented in the senior grades of the Civil Service. Neither of those indicators is desirable; nor is the shortage of women in some grades and men in others. However, we must not get involved in a phoney argument about discrimination. It must be recognised that Northern Ireland has a difficult past that means that it is often correct to take the levels of representation in the public sector workforce into consideration. The motion correctly draws attention to one of those instances. In 1990, twice as many Protestants as Catholics were employed in the Northern Ireland Civil Service. By 2007, that gap had been closed to the point at which the overall figure is at a balance that fits well with the overall demographic picture.

As the motion highlights, a lack of Protestants are applying for positions in the Civil Service, resulting in fewer Protestants at administrative and junior management grades. If that trend were to continue, there would be a danger of reaching a reverse position to that of the 1990s, and all Members will agree that that would not be an ideal outcome.

I remind Members that successive DUP Finance Ministers have been aware of those issues and have assured the House that there is no need to change employment practices. The current First Minister, in his previous job as Minister of Finance and Personnel, said in July 2007:

“The latest statutory review by the Northern Ireland Civil Service shows that employment and selection policies and systems are fair, objective and non-discriminatory. Protestants and Catholics are fairly represented in many grades and good progress has been made in some areas of under-representation.”

By all accounts, that is a fair representation of the situation. There is no systematic or structural discrimination in recruitment to the Civil Service. Although that may have existed to some extent in the past, there is certainly none today.

It is bordering on the reckless for the motion to imply, if not to state, that there could or should be a lack of confidence in the recruitment process due to discrimination. There is a problem with the number of applications from Protestants to the Civil Service, and there is a range of different reasons for that. The recruitment process is surely not one of them. Just over two years ago, the First Minister said that the process was fair. Is Mr Campbell now saying that it is not fair?

My party wishes to see representative numbers of Catholics and Protestants, men and women and all other groups applying and being appointed to positions in the Civil Service on the basis of merit. We are mindful of the words of the now First Minister, who said in 2007 that the Civil Service's employment practices are “fair, objective and non-discriminatory”. However, there is a problem with other elements of those practices. I am sure that the Finance Minister will inform the House as to how he will deal with those issues.

Dr Farry: To follow Mr Kinahan of the Ulster Unionists, I should say that it is only appropriate that we acknowledge the appointment on Friday 18 September 2009 of a former UUP Minister to the Equality Commission. There is no doubt that the House wishes the new commissioners well; they will have an interesting relationship.

The Alliance Party finds itself in the position of being able to support any of the three proposals that have been made. They each address the issue in their own different ways, although I do not believe that any of them is brilliant. Indeed, I would probably say that the SDLP's amendment is the best. However, they are not mutually exclusive. The spirit of the Alliance Party is always to be optimistic, so we are happy to give support. We shall see which way the voting goes at the end of the debate.

That said, I want to make a number of points from my party's perspective on the motion, and perhaps I will discuss a few of the flaws of Members' arguments. At the outset, I stress that I agree that recruitment should always be carried out on the basis of merit — the best person should get the job. That is the only fair way to recruit people. However, it is only right and proper to look at any imbalances that exist in the pool of applicants for positions, to encourage diversity, and to address any barriers that may exist — and I stress the word “may”.

We must also recognise that, in certain respects, the issues may lie beyond what the employer — in this case, the Civil Service — can do and look to what governance as regards policymaking can do to address underlying imbalances in society.

Mrs Long: I thank the Member for giving way. Does he agree that when such debates take place and there is, if you like, political and partial discourse on the matter, that in itself can often create barriers for people who may feel that it is not worth their while applying?

Mr Speaker: The Member will have an extra minute added to his time.

Dr Farry: That is correct. We must be careful with the language that we use and the approach that we take to such debates, particularly the notion that one side of the House battles for Protestants and the other side battles for Catholics. That does not do justice to the issue.

Mr O'Loan: Will the Member care to say who is battling for Protestants and who is battling for Catholics? I certainly would not like to hear it suggested that I was battling for one group more than the other in my speech.

Dr Farry: One only has to look at the Order Paper and the Marshalled List. The motion mentions only Protestants, while one of the amendments mentions only Catholics. That makes the point fairly clearly.

My party's concern is the approach that is taken to monitoring in Northern Ireland. The Alliance Party certainly supports the concept of fair employment, with which it has no difficulty; indeed, an Alliance Party member was instrumental in setting up the former Fair Employment Agency in the 1970s. My party has a problem with the approach that is taken to monitoring, in that it misses many of the subtleties that exist in our society.

We must recognise that whenever we use the terms "Protestant" and "Catholic", we are often talking about "unionist" and "nationalist". Those are code words. However, it is fallacious to assume that everyone's identity lines up as neatly as that and that every Protestant is a unionist and is also British and that every Catholic is a nationalist and is also Irish. That does not reflect how people see themselves as individuals; rather, it pigeonholes people and puts them into blocks of voting fodder.

Using those terms does not recognise mixed identities or the fact that someone may have differing political, national and religious identities. It does not take into account the fact that there is a growing number of people who are the product of mixed marriages or who are in mixed marriages or relationships.

It does not take into account the fact that new residents come to Northern Ireland who do not fit into the traditional paradigm that is used. They are cast aside and are not part of the equation when the number of Protestants is measured against the number of Catholics. The joke is that if the previous Pope had to come to Northern Ireland to look for a job, he would not have been treated as a Catholic.

Whenever we talk about the under-representation of Protestants or Catholics, we may miss some of the dynamics that occur in the different traditions in Northern Ireland.

It is worth pointing out that some in the Protestant population have the highest level of educational attainment in society and some have the lowest. As my colleague pointed out earlier, we are running the risk of polarising the issue and making it extremely contentious.

4.00 pm

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Molloy] in the Chair)

We need to be careful not to fall into the trap of assuming that an imbalance means that there is a fundamental problem that must be addressed. An imbalance may be benign or malign, depending on the reasons for it. For example, an imbalance can easily occur within the range of statistical error.

When looking for solutions to the problem, we need to be clear that we are talking about equality of access and treatment. I believe that our procedures are fair and provide for that. Equality of access is a different concept from equality of outcome. Some Members have come very close to demanding the latter by calling for a precise balance of representation throughout every grade in the Civil Service. Equality of treatment and access is where the line should be drawn. That may or may not produce equality of outcome for perfectly good and acceptable reasons. With those reservations, we are happy to support the flow of the debate.

Mr Hamilton: The debate has been interesting thus far. Although differing positions have been stated, most contributions have been well researched and well thought out. Hopefully, Members will be able to say that at the end of my contribution.

As a young unionist growing up in Northern Ireland, my contemporaries and I heard the prevailing propaganda that discrimination or under-representation in employment was one-sided in Northern Ireland for many years. We heard that Catholics were under-represented in all walks of life and that Protestants were over-represented. That sort of propaganda was rammed down our throats for decades.

It will be interesting for many people to note the argument that my colleagues Mr Campbell and Mr Weir put forward in respect of under-representation among tens of thousands of civil servants at general service grades. I appreciate that it is impossible to reach exact and fair representation in any walk of life or any employment sphere; that is well accepted. However, historically and at present, it is right and proper that we should endeavour to address the prevailing problems behind under-representation.

Although I accept the principles or desire behind fair employment — I say that in acknowledgement of Mr O'Loan's point — we need to debate the detrimental impact that the legislation can have on some small businesses, such as a typical two-, three-, four- or five-man company in Northern Ireland. We should debate that issue in a proper and mature way at a later date.

Dr Farry: I am grateful to the Member for giving way. He makes a valid point about the burdens that are placed on businesses. I will be happy to engage in that discussion. Does the Member recognise that the thresholds for monitoring apply to only certain sizes of businesses and that there is a danger that a large degree of segregation in the labour market in Northern Ireland will fall under the radar, particularly in very small, one- or two-person companies?

Mr Hamilton: I understand the Member's point. My party and I resist the imposition of draconian, far-reaching and expensive monitoring requirements on very small companies in Northern Ireland. That would be a retrograde step for that sector as it tries to increase its competitiveness, particularly in the current situation. That is a debate for another day, and I will not go into that now.

Mr O'Loan criticised the substantive motion for not addressing Catholic under-representation at senior grades. On more careful reading of the motion, he will see that it calls for representation at all grades of the Civil Service, and that includes the problem that we acknowledge exists at senior levels for Catholics and women. Indeed, the amendment that Mr O'Loan and Mr Attwood proposed does not take away from Mr Campbell and Mr Weir's substantive motion in respect of the focus on Protestant under-representation at the general service grades, so they might want to reflect on that.

The make-up of Civil Service staff is more or less where it should be in its reflection of the wider community. However, as Danny Kinahan mentioned, a worrying trend is developing, which could result in the situation being flipped, going from a historical under-representation of Catholics to an under-representation of Protestants.

The concentration on the percentage of Protestants in the general service grades is due to the much bigger numbers involved. Roughly 20,000 people work in the general service grades. There are 3,000 people employed at AO grade alone, compared with 260 people employed at grade 5 and above.

There has been a worrying change where there has been action to address the under-representation of Catholics at the higher grades. Between 1997 and 2007, the number of Catholics working at grade 5, grade 6 and grade 7 increased from 17% to 35%, 21% to 39% and 26% to 40% respectively. The employment of Catholics at those grades has almost doubled in that 10-year period, yet in the same period the percentage of Protestants working at the AO grade has decreased from 54% to 48%, which reflects the overall general service grades, in which 48.6% of the 19,000 employees are Protestant and 49.8% are Catholic. Therefore, although there has been an improvement in Catholic under-representation at the senior grades, there has been a fallback in the representation of Protestants at the lower grades. That is the problem that we need to get to grips with.

I am not saying that the system is unfair, but we need to look at the prevailing factors behind the issue and find a way for the system and the recruitment process to address them. I welcome the acknowledgement from the Minister's predecessor that there was an increase of some 10% in applications from Protestants in a recent recruitment drive. Part of the problem is that simply not enough Protestants were applying for such positions, so hopefully that increase will yield some positive results.

I do not have time to talk about problems with other aspects of the public service, such as the Housing Executive and the Equality Commission — it is ironic that the body charged with monitoring the issue is so under-representative of Protestants.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I ask the Member to bring his remarks to a close.

Mr Hamilton: Member must recognise that there is a problem that we need to get to grips with. If we do not, the trend will get worse and a problem that some might have baulked at when the shoe was on the other foot will develop in the Protestant community.

Mr O'Dowd: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Thus far, the debate has been somewhat predictable, but it is unfair, particularly of Dr Farry, to present it as being one that we have heard before and a case of one side being as bad of the other. Dr Farry needs to read the Sinn Féin amendment — it does not exclude the section on Protestant under-representation at the lower grades of the Civil Service. Mr McLaughlin was at pains — and was in pain — to agree with Gregory Campbell on some of the points that he raised about the under-representation of the Protestant community at the lower grades of the Civil Service.

Members on this side of the House are not saying that Catholics are being discriminated against and that we do not need to worry about the Protestant section of the community. If there is a difficulty with that, it should be pointed out. I always find Dr Farry's speeches interesting and I have a lot of respect for him, but his speech today was all over the place. He was trying so much to walk the middle ground, he fell off the tightrope and missed an opportunity.

The debate should be about equality of opportunity, equality of employment and quality of employment. Regardless of community background, my party believes that people should be employed on merit; both qualifications and experience should be taken into account. If there is a concern about the Civil Service recruitment process, that concern should be expanded on and the process should be examined.

Mr O'Loan said that the senior grades in the Civil Service now have a fair balance. I am paraphrasing him, so I am open to correction. I am not sure of the figures that he is working with to conclude that there is a fair representation of the Catholic and Protestant communities in the Civil Service.

If one looks at the report and lumps a cohort together, one can come to that conclusion. However, on further examination, there is still a discrepancy between employment of Catholics and Protestants among the most senior posts in the Civil Service, with Catholics, and women in particular, losing out. Although there has been work done, and we welcome that work, there is clearly much more to do if we are to reach equality of opportunity and equality of posts, particularly in the Civil Service. I am not sure if I am misquoting the Member on that point.

In debates, facts and figures can be used to support either argument. However, sticking to the heart of the debate and to what the motion should be about, we must ensure that when someone goes for interview they are judged on the merit of their application, experience and qualifications, and not on their community background.

Mr Spratt: What about the Police Service?

Mr O'Dowd: I will come back to that comment.

Mr O'Loan: I was very clear in my remarks. Read the '2007 Review of Fair Participation in the Northern Ireland Civil Service under article 55 of the Fair Employment and Treatment (Northern Ireland) Order 1998'. It states, quite specifically, that in relation to religious composition, there is now fair participation in the Senior Civil Service at grade 5 and above.

I believe that the Member is right about the gender issue, which I referred to. Although no figures are presented, further studies are being done on gender across the Civil Service, and I have little doubt that that will expose gender issues as a major problem at senior levels.

Mr O'Dowd: I am dealing with figures from a written answer to a question from March 2008; and, to me, the position is not balanced. We recognise that work has been done, but more work needs to be done to ensure that there is equality of opportunity and equality in the workforce.

Applications, regardless of the level, must be judged on the basis of qualifications, experience, and the value that the applicant will bring to the post. Judgement should not be based on community background. Where there is evidence of discrimination against any section of the community or any individual, it must be investigated. Robust measures must be taken against the groups or individuals involved in such discrimination.

A Member has just said that it does not work like that when it comes to the Police Service. That was a unique set of circumstances, which has had to be corrected through positive discrimination. Many years ago, the same argument could have been used about the Civil Service; that positive discrimination was necessary to ensure that a state of fair play was reached.

Dr Farry: Does the Member accept that there is a potential difficulty with respect to police recruitment? Looking at the Catholic nationalist community in very broad terms could result in the quota being filled by people from a particular background, particularly a middle-class background. It runs the risk, in the Member's own words, of under-representing people from a working-class, republican background. Perhaps that type of bi-national quota misses those subtleties.

Mr O'Dowd: I am not sure that I want to get into a debate on policing, but perhaps I will.

Mr O'Loan has a point, and I think that Mr Mandelson, the former British Secretary of State here, has a lot of questions to answer in relation to that. If memory serves me, the Patten report included a reflection of the republican nationalist community. Republicans come in all brands: they are not just working class; there are middle-class republicans too.

I support the amendment and I ask the House to do the same. It is not about Protestant or Catholic; it is about fair employment, equality of opportunity and equality of jobs.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I was already in shock about the debate being tabled, and I listened in shock as the Member for Upper Bann extolled the virtues of a merit only employment system. For the past number of years, we have been berated for suggesting that that is applied that to policing and justice and the recruitment of police officers. If police officers were employed on the basis of their ability to do the job and not on the basis of the community that they come from, we would hear a cry that that is not acceptable, will not be allowed, and has to be changed. Today, a marker has been put down. If employment is going to be a meritocracy, Sinn Féin, the SDLP and others should accept that police officers can no longer be employed on a 50:50 recruitment basis: they must be employed on merit alone.

4.15 pm

I will outline why we are having today's debate. At a meeting of the Committee for Finance and Personnel, I remember clearly that Mr O'Loan asked a senior civil servant to outline discrimination in the Civil Service. I remember the shock on that Member's face when he was told about the levels of discrimination against Protestants, because he expected the years-old propaganda that only Roman Catholics are discriminated against in Northern Ireland to be confirmed. The vast majority of people —

Mrs Long: Will the Member give way?

Mr Paisley Jnr: I will give way in a moment. The vast majority of people discriminated against in the Civil Service are Protestants. That is the point. That matter should be addressed, and that is why we tabled the motion. It is most disappointing that Members on the other side of the House will not join the debate and recognise that the issue must be reconciled and resolved. They could resolve the matter if they join with us and support the motion.

Mrs Long: Does the Member accept the difference between under-representation and discrimination? Does he accept that evidence of under-representation is not necessarily evidence of discrimination? The use of the two words interchangeably can create more of a problem than it solves.

Mr Paisley Jnr: The Member has obviously fallen for the years-old propaganda used by nationalists on the issue, through which they wrongly describe under-representation as discrimination. The Member's point is well made; if the perception is created about under-representation, a whole generation, class and community are discriminated against. The Protestant community is under-represented in the largest section of the Civil Service. That must be fixed. It can be fixed, and I hope that the House supports the motion, which will give the Minister the encouragement to try to resolve those issues so that under-representation and discrimination against the largest section of the community in Northern Ireland are addressed once and for all. I have considered the amendment —

Mr O'Loan: Will the Member give way?

Mr Paisley Jnr: No. I have considered the amendment in the name of Mr O'Dowd, Mr McLaughlin and Ms McCann, which mentions under-representation in the most senior grades. Those grades account for only a small proportion — approximately 250 or 260 — of civil servants. It does not consider the 19,000 staff in general Civil Service grades. That is why the matter should be addressed urgently, before our ability to address it runs out. The Government should make a decisive drive to address the issue. The House should unite behind that drive, because any under-representation affects the confidence of the entire community and the entire House. I support the motion.

Mr Shannon: I support the motion. Some Members raised the issue of 50:50 recruitment. I do not, in any way, support that principle. It is wrong, and I believe, as other Members have said, that recruits must be fit for purpose. There is a need for greater monitoring of the process. That was highlighted in July 2007 when Peter Robinson, who was the Minister of Finance and Personnel at the time, released a statement that highlighted under-representation at some levels of Civil Service employment. The DUP previously noted that issue, and, as such, the matter was flagged. A better spread of job allocation has been applied since our time in Administration.

This aw bein saed it cleerly haesnae reeched tha staeg yit whor ther is reel equality an this haes bin brought tae me bi' sim o' tha fowk that A represent, whau hae passed ther entrance exam intae tha Civil Sarvis but er noo waetin tae be placed alang wi' mony ithers.

Whun this metter cums up ther seems tae be a questyin as hoo they er selected an oan whut basis. It seems tae me tae be daft whun fowk whau leev in Portavogie trevel tae Bilfaust whun they cud be soarted oot wi' a joab oan tha saem level in Rathgael in Bangor. Shairly it wud mak maer sense tae keep fowk closer tae whor they wrocht. This needs lukin at again.

However, we have clearly not reached the stage of real equality. The issue has been flagged up to me by constituents who have passed their Civil Service entrance exam but have been waiting for positions longer than many others.

When that issue arises, there are questions about how people are selected and on what basis. It seems absurd to me that there are people who live in Portavogie who travel to Belfast to work in the Civil Service while, at the same time, the Department of Education employs people at the same level who travel from Belfast to work in Rathgael House in Bangor. It would make more sense to keep people in the closest available and suitable posts: that should be considered.

I have every confidence that that issue will be looked into, but it is not the only issue that must be examined. A February 2009 National Audit Office (NAO) report, 'Recruiting civil servants efficiently', found that it costs between £556 and £1,921 to recruit each Civil Service position in central government. The report claimed that those costs could be slashed by 68%, delivering savings across government by up to £35 million a year and:

“without compromising the quality of the candidates recruited.”

The NAO report also suggested that having online application forms and contacting only successful applicants could save the Ministry of Justice in Westminster approximately £250,000 a year. In a related article about the report, the head of the NAO, Tim Burr, said:

“External recruitment is a key component of ensuring that the Civil Service has the right skills and the capacity to deliver. Departments often pay too little attention to how they manage the recruitment process. External recruitment currently takes longer and consumes more internal staff than it should.”

The article went on to say:

“Anticipating recruitment demands, using resources more effectively and, where possible, standardising the recruitment process — which currently takes up to 16 weeks — would help speed up the process, says the report.

Other failings in the Civil Service’s recruitment process included a lack of quality testing of the recruitment process and little information on staff turnover or surveys of candidates. The NAO questioned why managers were not routinely used to identify the successes and failings of the recruitment process.”

I believe that a new process should be implemented in which people from all sections of the community could have confidence. At present, a great many people in the Protestant community do not have that confidence. The fact that the candidate surveys and staff turnover are also issues on the mainland shows that any new-style process will have a positive effect throughout the UK. We can lead the way in implementing a new way of recruitment that will benefit all civil servants and prospective civil servants in the UK.

I am confident that the new Minister of Finance and Personnel, Sammy Wilson, will continue to address those matters, among others, with the Civil Service. Members will agree that monitoring must be put in place to ensure that people who are best equipped to do the job are given employment. However, we must also ensure that the dearth of Protestants in the categories stated in the motion be continuously gauged. We cannot and must not have alienation in the Protestant community or of people in that section of the community who feel that they cannot apply for a job or receive equality.

The wording of the motion is clear. Our Minister continues to work hard, and he will make the Civil Service a more efficient and sensible place for business. I support the motion.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel (Mr S Wilson): I notice that the Member for South Antrim Mr Kinahan is not in his seat. He said that perhaps the people who were monitoring blood pressure in the Building today should be doing so in the Assembly this afternoon. That may have been a wise comment on the part of the person who wrote his speech before the debate took place. However, no one could describe the debate as one that has caused blood pressure to rise or faces to redden. I will, perhaps, seek to do that in the next 15 minutes, if I can.

I thank all those who participated in the debate, and I will deal with some of the issues that have been raised. At the outset, however, I will make two or three points. First, as the Minister of Finance and Personnel, I believe that when we recruit people to the Civil Service, the only criteria should be whether they are fit to do the job. There is no point in having a public service that is more concerned about political correctness or being pushed in one direction by one pressure group or the other if we do not get the people who can do the job properly.

I rely on my officials to give me advice. I do not always take it, but I rely on them to do so in the most professional way. I do not care about their name, their background, or what church they go to.

As far as I am concerned, the question is whether the advice is good and whether the person is capable of doing their job. I believe that most Ministers and people who interface with the public service are only interested in that.

Secondly, we now have an equality industry that has grown up around recruitment; an expensive equality industry. That has now permeated, because, as Members have pointed out, people will listen to the monitoring figures that they like and dismiss the ones that they do not like. I sometimes wonder what the use of monitoring is.

The monitoring and accompanying figures do not come about by magic. They require resources, personnel, documentation and databases to produce the figures. That is costly, and monitoring in the Civil Service costs hundreds of thousands of pounds. Some Members have mentioned the costs to industry and small firms.

People will still bring their prejudices to the figures. I will give an example: Mr O’Loan started making a very moderate speech, recognising that Protestants sometimes faced disadvantage, and Catholics faced disadvantage, but that by and large, the Civil Service was an equal employer, and we should not be cherry-picking. However, he could not resist a bit of cherry-picking. In the very last sentence of his speech, he had to mention the Prison Service.

Mr O’Loan: There was no cherry-picking. This is a serious debate, and my points deserve to be properly presented. I said that there was overall balance, and I said that there are specific areas and grades where there was imbalance, and that all of those areas need to be addressed.

We need to be grown-up enough to recognise that, if there is overall balance, then if there is compensation for one particular religious grouping in one area, there is bound to be compensation in another way in another area. That must be analysed, and an attempt needs to be made to iron it out. I am totally consistent in my position. I feel absolutely entitled to point out particular areas that are problematic, including the Prison Service.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: I do not know whether that was an intervention or another speech, but the fact that the Member rose to justify himself in such a long intervention shows that I struck a chord.

The words “cherry-picking” were used by the Member. He did cherry-pick, and his proposed amendment does not even reflect the report to which he referred. Mr O’Dowd made the same points, as did Mr McLaughlin, about the imbalance at Senior Civil Service level. Mr McLaughlin and Mr O’Dowd, who claimed ignorance of the report, could not be blamed for deliberately ignoring some figures, because they had not read the June report. Mr O’Loan, by his own admission, has read the report. In fact, he waved the report in the air. That report makes it clear that there is fair participation at the senior level of the Civil Service.

Mr O’Loan: I said so.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: Well, what does the SDLP’s proposed amendment say? It states that there is a need for continued, specific focus, not least at Senior Civil Service level. Either the Member read the report, or he did not. Maybe he read the report and still needed to say something about it, because historically the SDLP has believed that there is an imbalance, so he just ignored that part of the report.

Mr O’Loan: Will the Member give way?

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: I gave the Member a long intervention last time. Regardless of what monitoring figures are available, people will still believe what they want to about those figures. Mr O’Loan has identified that today.

I will address some of the other points that were made during the debate.

Mr Campbell talked about the importance of looking at trends in the figures. He is right: we should look at trends for the longer-term picture. Indeed, some encouragement can be found in those trends. Appointments of people from a Protestant background to AO level increased from 45% to 58% between 2005 and 2007. Appointments of people from a Protestant background to AA level increased from 47% to 58% between 2006 and 2007. That trend bears out the point, which was made by my predecessor, that action is being taken to make improvements. That action includes visiting schools, advertising on radio, and so on.

4.30 pm

Mr McLaughlin argued the traditional Sinn Féin view that imbalances are a result of systematic discrimination, but I have some difficulty with that.

Since there was neither a unionist Government nor a nationalist Government, the figures must have come about as a result of systematic discrimination on the part of direct rule Ministers. Perhaps the imbalances were brought about by unionists 30 years ago? Is Sinn Féin now so paranoid that it believes that what unionists did, or what it claims that unionists did, was continued by direct rule Ministers? There have been Administrations here periodically since 1998. Therefore, in the past 11 years, have nationalist, unionist, Sinn Féin and DUP Ministers engaged in systematic discrimination? That is the implication of Mr McLaughlin’s words if he is putting the figures down to systematic discrimination.

Mr McLaughlin talked about under-representation at Senior Civil Service levels. I make the case again that the most recent monitoring, which was done in June 2009, indicates that there is fair participation. That finding is based on methodology that was laid down, and accepted, by the Equality Commission, so it cannot be argued that the Civil Service has somehow set its own rules to produce the right figures.

I wish that Mr Kinahan had got the facts right in his contribution. First, he also did not get the figures right on Senior Civil Service grades. Secondly, he claimed that the motion referred to discrimination in recruitment — I do not see that in the motion — and claimed that there must then be discrimination in recruitment in the Civil Service. He ruled that out, but I think that he misread the motion in the first place. I emphasise the fact that action has been taken where monitoring has shown there to be an imbalance. Action has been taken by visiting schools; by advertising on radio; by changing qualification requirements; and by doing a whole host of other things. At a time of very low recruitment, there is a difficulty in trying to make the changes quickly.

Dr Farry talked about the importance of equality in access and treatment, and my earlier comments make it clear that I agree with him. Provided that there is equality of treatment in recruitment and equality of access to encourage people to apply for jobs, it is important that people are chosen on merit. That, of course, brings its own benefits, because the wider the recruitment pool, the better the choice of candidates will be. All employers would want that. That is why the initiative of going into schools to highlight the opportunities in the Civil Service is important.

Mr O’Dowd mixed his metaphors. He said that Dr Farry was walking the middle ground, but falling off the tightrope. I do not know which of the two it is, but either he is on the ground or he is on the tightrope. More importantly, Mr O’Dowd also mixed up the facts. He showed that he had not done his research very well. For a debate such as this, I thought that he would have at least examined the latest figures. Had he done so, he would have realised that the amendment that was proposed by Sinn Féin — and I emphasise this point — does not bear any relation to the facts regarding the senior grades in the Civil Service. Indeed, an imbalance at the senior grades in the Civil Service was identified, and the proposer of the motion accepted that progress was made on that issue. Furthermore, DFP's own monitoring system shows that progress has been made on that issue and that there are now fair levels of representation. Therefore, as I said, Mr O'Dowd mixed up the facts.

If the position on the grade of AO is as a result of discrimination, I am surprised that Sinn Féin, and maybe even the SDLP, did not suggest 50:50 recruitment. That was what I was waiting for, but they did not do that. I do not advocate 50:50 recruitment and I would not like to see it used for the Civil Service, but, for consistency, I thought that we may have heard some suggestions about that from the nationalist side of the House.

DFP has taken the appropriate actions. Through our monitoring system, we are aware of the issues that have been raised about the Civil Service. Through the actions that have been taken on the senior grades, by the trends that I outlined for AA and AO grades, and by the actions that we have taken to try to widen recruitment and get more applicants, we have shown that the issue has been taken seriously and is being dealt with. Furthermore, we will continue to work at it.

Mr Attwood: The essential problem with the Minister's reply is that it reflects a lack of understanding and breadth of knowledge about the issues that need to be addressed, particularly those that are addressed by the SDLP amendment. The Minister stuck to one single theme, namely that the June 2009 figures show fair levels of participation in respect of religion. He beat up Declan O'Loan on that issue, but the SDLP amendment does not simply refer to fair levels of participation based on religious background; it refers to gender and ethnic diversity.

Mr Campbell: It does not say that.

Mr Attwood: The amendment does say that. The fact that the Minister parked himself on the sole issue of religious representation in the Civil Service, and the fact that he failed to comment on gender and ethnic diversity, and the equality of those groups across the Civil Service, including at the senior grades, suggests that the Minister has missed an opportunity to demonstrate a breadth of understanding and knowledge about the vast array of equality issues that face him and the public services in Northern Ireland generally.

Mr Campbell: Does the honourable Member accept the figures that I outlined and that others indicated, which reveal that, in total, there are fewer than 300 people of all genders and ethnic backgrounds in the Northern Ireland Senior Civil Service, and that there are almost 20,000 in the general service grades? Does he accept those facts?

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute in which to speak.

Mr Attwood: Of course. That is a matter of fact and public evidence. However, our amendment goes beyond the issue of religious representation and covers the full range of participation in the Civil Service. The broader issues were not taken up at all in Mr Campbell's opening speech or in the Minister's reply. It was the same for all the speeches from the DUP ranks. Not one of them referred to the broader equality issues in the Northern Ireland Civil Service, which was the very essence of the SDLP amendment.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: I thank the Member for giving way. He should recognise that all the speeches concentrated on the religious aspect of Civil Service recruitment. Even though the Member's amendment referred to ethnic diversity and gender equality, those issues accounted for a very small part of any of the speeches that were made. I make it clear that, when it comes to ethnic diversity, the Civil Service in Northern Ireland is broadly in line with the Civil Service in the rest of the United Kingdom, so we have addressed that issue.

Mr Attwood: I welcome the fact that the Minister thinks that the issues of ethnic diversity and gender equality in the Northern Ireland Civil Service have been addressed. That will come as a hell of a shock to women and to people from ethnic minorities in the North. The Police Service, for example, has not yet addressed the issue of ethnic minorities and still has not fully addressed the issue of the women's representation. There is an unmet need across a range of employers out there that the Minister only now, when he has been put in the spotlight, suddenly thinks that he has to comment on. That says a lot.

I am also concerned because the Minister referred, in rather contemptuous ways, to the "equality industry". By now nodding his head, the Minister is confirming that he meant it contemptuously. Let me say this to the Minister and to the DUP ranks: if it had not have been for the equality architecture — the powers, legislation and penalties — and the fact that the inequality on the religious side of things was a source of alienation over many decades in our society, that boil would not have been lanced over the past 20 or 30 years and would have remained a rubbing point in our politics.

Mr Campbell: That is the case now.

Mr Attwood: I will come to that. It is simply not a credible position to beat up on the so-called equality industry if people do not recognise that that industry was essential over 20 or 30 years to move Northern Ireland to the point at which the Minister can rely on the information that he put before the Assembly today. It is because of that industry, those laws and that architecture that the DUP today can say that there is under-representation of Protestants in certain ranks of the Civil Service. We can all say that equality in the North is at a place where it has never been before.

I will not even reply on the issue of 50:50 recruitment. If it were the case that 8% of the Northern Ireland Civil Service was Protestant and 92% was Catholic, as was the case in 2001 with the police, I would be arguing for 50:50 recruitment in the Northern Ireland Civil Service. We do not object to the principle of 50:50 recruitment; we wanted it for women in the police, but the European Court of Human Rights would not allow it. We do not walk away from any of those issues. The DUP has come to the table late. I welcome that it has come at all.

Ms J McCann: This is a very important debate. It is unfortunate that the proposer of the motion referred only to under-representation at the lower levels of the Civil Service. There is huge under-representation of young Protestants at that level. I know that people have already spoken about that. The Minister has said that measures have been taken to try to challenge that under-representation by sending people into schools and by setting entrance criteria at NVQ level, so that working class people who apply to the Civil Service have equality of opportunity.

Members have touched on two areas of under-representation that were not mentioned by Gregory Campbell when he moved the motion. One of them is in the higher, very senior grades. It was said that fewer than 300 staff occupy those grades, but those staff should still reflect the make-up of wider society. It is unfortunate that the under-representation of women in higher grades of the Civil Service was not included in the debate. I welcome the proposer's campaign to get equality in the workplace, and I hope that that campaign will include people from all backgrounds — ethnic minorities, women and the gay and lesbian community — because equality is important for all those people.

In moving the amendment, my colleague Mitchel McLaughlin supported affirmative action to challenge all forms of under-representation at every level in the Civil Service. It is important that we agree to consider under-representation at all levels and right across the board. He mentioned that legislation and robust measures were needed to proactively challenge institutional discrimination and inequalities in the workplace. That is what our amendment looks to do; it argues for the publication of the report of the equal opportunities unit so that we can monitor, agree and be proactive about putting measures in place.

Some Members have referred to positive discrimination or action, and I have argued in the Chamber on previous occasions for positive action to be taken to address the lack of female representatives in the Chamber and on public bodies. Our amendment calls for the report from DFP's equal opportunities unit to be published. We must have that type of robust monitoring, and it must be public so that every aspect of it can be considered.

Declan O'Loan welcomed the fact that the DUP is now embracing fair employment measures, including monitoring. I disagree with what Mr O'Loan said about there being fair participation across all the higher grades in the Civil Service. The figure quoted — that 30.4% of the Senior Civil Service are Catholics — does not reflect equality of participation right across the board. I am not citing a whole load of statistics, because, as everybody, including the Minister, has mentioned, we must be aware that statistics can be used to support everybody's arguments. We must take a broader view.

Danny Kinahan from the Ulster Unionist Party felt that the recruitment process was fair, and he was a bit at odds with the DUP's motion. Stephen Farry said that he could support the motion and all the amendments. He also believed in appointing on merit — that the best person for the job should be appointed. I do not think that anybody could disagree with that. However, I do not believe that someone should be denied equality of opportunity in getting the best-paid jobs just for being a Catholic. That is very important.

Mrs Long: I thank the Member for giving way, but I am afraid that there is a conflict in her stated position. One cannot accept the principle of merit-based appointments in all cases while at the same time talk about favouring positive discrimination. If merit-based appointment is believed in, the only thing that should matter is the quality of the person and not their background, which can be monitored subsequently. Therefore, some conflict is opening up in what Sinn Féin has said in the debate.

Ms J McCann: I do not think that. What I am saying is that the educational qualifications of a person from an area of disadvantage may not be as good as those of someone from a middle-class area. Sometimes there has to be positive action to ensure that all people have equality of opportunity. That is what I am saying. I am not saying that there should necessarily be discrimination against any particular section, but that sometimes we need to look at taking positive action where there are inequalities.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up. She should bring her remarks to a close.

Ms J McCann: I ask that people support the Sinn Féin amendment. It does not exclude the fact, which has been mentioned by my colleagues, that Protestants are under-represented at the lower levels of the Civil Service; that is wrong. Everyone should have equality of opportunity and the amendment is the best way to take that forward.

Mr Weir: As the Minister said, we have had a fairly reasoned debate in which we avoided the temptation — raised as a concern by Mr Kinahan — of raising the blood pressure too much. Nevertheless, we have had a robust debate, and that is to be welcomed. In summing up, I will address a few of the remarks that have been made.

I will deal first with the motion's proposer, Gregory Campbell. Gregory hit the nail on the head with the three key points in the debate. First, the debate is not about Civil Service promotion or composition, but about recruitment and its trends. That goes to the heart of the debate. Mr Campbell, Mr Kinahan and others pointed out that trends in recruitment potentially lead to long-term imbalances in composition if they are not addressed correctly.

Secondly, Mr Campbell dealt with the other key point that we are looking at the vast bulk of the Civil Service. In dealing with those grades, as opposed to the senior grades, we are dealing with roughly 99% of the Civil Service. Numerically, that is where the focus should be. Thirdly, the trends that we are trying to tackle have, until very recently, been getting worse rather than better; gaps in the expected outcome have been widening rather than narrowing. To some extent, that deals with a number of the points that were raised by other Members.

Some Members mentioned under-representation in the Senior Civil Service. Indeed, that is one of the main thrusts of the Sinn Féin amendment. Yet that involves fewer than 300 people. Mr Hamilton highlighted that the trend has led to a narrowing of the gap year on year, to the extent that the number of Catholics in Senior Civil Service posts doubled between 1997 and 2007. Even Mr O'Loan and others acknowledged that we are very close to a balance.

Gender issues were similarly highlighted. There needs to be a clear focus on the important issue of the promotion of women in the Civil Service. Any cursory examination of the trends, even in the Senior Civil Service, will show that there has been a massive improvement over the past 10 years, with the number of women in senior posts virtually trebling during that period. Therefore, although work remains to be done, at least the gaps are closing.

By contrast, as was highlighted by Mr Hamilton, Mr Campbell and others, the under-representation — at least it was the case up to 2007 — of people from the Protestant community at the lower grades has got worse instead of better. That is why the focus of the motion is as it is. It also highlights why the two amendments offer a degree of diversion from what should be the main focus, despite the best attempts of the Members who tabled them. The main focus should be on where there is a problem; where, despite the efforts that have been made in the past couple of years, a problem remains; where a marker needs to be put down, to which a number of Members referred; and where we need to keep an eye on the ball.

Mitchel McLaughlin proposed amendment No 1. I do not know whether he or Gregory Campbell should be more worried, because Mr McLaughlin started off by saying that he agreed, to a large extent, with Gregory Campbell. It is fortunate that Mr Campbell was not in the Chamber when that statement was made. Mr McLaughlin went on to say that the key point is that we need to look at the most effective way in which to deal with the problem. I agree with him in that regard: if we are to be effective, we must deal with the main problem. It is clear that the main problem has been the under-representation of the Protestant community at the lower Civil Service grades.

Mr O'Loan, in proposing amendment No 2, said that he was embracing a wider motion. I am not sure whether he read the SDLP amendment, because he indicated that he wanted to create a motion that was not discriminatory and that did not refer to one community only. However, the SDLP amendment leaves in all about the under-representation of the Protestant community and does not mention the Catholic community. I suspect that the amendment that the SDLP tabled was not the amendment that it wished to table, but its Members have gone into it nonetheless.

I wondered whether Mr O'Loan's speech and Mr Attwood's speech were merely speeches or, given the events of the past 24 hours, more an audition for future vacancies that may arise. It was the early stages of an SDLP 'The X Factor'.

Mr Hamilton: Mark Durkan is the ex factor.

Mr Weir: Indeed.

I was reminded by a colleague that it is perhaps appropriate that the leader of the SDLP is not in the Chamber, given the presence of Mr Shannon, and his penchant for aiming at lame ducks. It is just as well that the SDLP leader was absent from the Chamber during Mr Shannon's contribution.

Mr Shannon: I do not aim at lame ducks; I make sure that the ducks that I aim at are flying fast and strong. When I hit them, it is a job well done.

Mr Weir: I do not want to question the prowess of Mr Shannon.

Mr Kinahan made a number of important points when he talked about the long-term trend and the widening gap. My only concern about Mr Kinahan's remarks was that the more that he went on, the less clear I became on the position that he was taking on the motion. Despite some of the good remarks that he made, I was not clear by the end of his speech whether the Ulster Unionist Party supported the motion. No other Ulster Unionists took the opportunity to speak in the debate, so I look forward with interest and no little trepidation to see which Lobby its Members go through.

Stephen Farry made a lot of valid points, albeit in an ecumenical manner that was in keeping with the Alliance's Party's position. He indicated that the Alliance Party would support just about everything in the debate in respect of any resolution. I am sure that that generosity, which was spread around the Chamber, was welcomed by all. There can be a situation in which there is a difference between equality of treatment and equality of outcome, as was highlighted. Dr Farry also said that underlying discrimination can occur at low levels. I have a slight concern that if the equality legislation were to be employed to a greater extent on very small firms, it would merely add to their burden.

Mr Paisley Jnr and Mr Shannon highlighted the hypocrisy of some of the parties opposite, particularly the SDLP and Sinn Féin. The watchword is always "equality". They talk about equality of opportunity yet support 50:50 recruitment for policing. It seems that it is all very well to have equality, except in particular circumstances. Long queues of people from the Protestant community have been discriminated against in PSNI recruitment in the past number of years. Fortunately, and thanks to the efforts of my party, an end to 50:50 recruitment has been negotiated. I welcome a time in which recruitment is based purely on merit.

The Minister said that we need something that is fit for purpose, and he highlighted the genuine progress that has been made in the past two years on such issues as advertising and the targeting of particular schools. Such initiatives have started to improve the imbalance in the lower ranks of the Civil Service. That is to be welcomed, and it is acknowledged in the DUP motion.

The motion is to ensure that a level playing field is created for everyone. That means tackling the problems where they exist and allowing progress to continue where it has already been made. We must ensure that the eye is kept on the ball, and that the marker is put down, as several Members have called for today. I call on Members to keep the focus on the problem and to support the motion.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. Before I put the Question on amendment No 1, I advise Members that if amendment No 1 is made, amendment No 2 will fall. The Question on the motion, as amended, will then be put.

Question, That amendment No 1 be made, put and negatived.

Question, That amendment No 2 be made, put and negatived.

Main Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly notes the efforts made by the Northern Ireland Civil Service in recent years to address the under-representation of Protestants among those applying for, and being recruited to, occupational groups which have most employees in the Civil Service; and calls for continued monitoring of all the grades, but particularly those grades where thousands of people are employed, in order that those from all community backgrounds can have confidence in the recruitment process.

Adjourned at 5.01 pm.

Tuesday 22 September 2009

The Assembly met at 10.30 am (Mr Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT

North/South Ministerial Council

Health and Food Safety Sectoral Format

Mr Speaker: I have received notice from the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety that he wishes to make a statement on the North/South Ministerial Council (NSMC) meeting in health and food safety sectoral format.

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Mr McGimpsey): I wish to make the following statement on the eighth North/South Ministerial Council meeting in health and food safety sectoral format, which took place in Farmleigh House, Dublin, on Wednesday 10 June 2009. I represented the Executive as Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, along with Michelle Gildernew MP MLA, Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development. Minister Gildernew has endorsed this statement.

The Irish Government were represented by Mary Harney TD, Minister for Health and Children, and Barry Andrews TD, Minister for Children and Youth Affairs, who, because Minister Harney was required to attend the Dáil for the latter part of the meeting, shared the chairing role.

Ministers discussed the priorities for health promotion on the basis of a paper prepared by the Institute of Public Health. Those priorities are likely to include programmes in school and/or workplace settings; prevention and management of chronic and preventable diseases; shared learning on population health and tackling health inequalities; and shared skills development. We also agreed that co-operation will take account of feasibility and sustainability, especially in the current economic climate.

We welcomed progress to date on the prevention of suicide and endorsed proposals for the Irish Association of Suicidology and the Samaritans, in association with the two Health Departments, to issue revised media guidelines, incorporating advice on new technologies, including Internet-related suicides.

We also welcomed the progress that had been made on co-operation on child protection. That included a valuable exchange of information and ideas on issues such as Internet safety, the development of a protocol for the movement of vulnerable children and families across the border, and the development of advice and guidance material for parents, carers and employers, aimed at strengthening safeguarding arrangements on both sides of the border. The continuing collaborative work in both jurisdictions on the management of sex offenders was also welcomed.

The Ministers received a progress report on the work of Safefood, the food safety promotion board, since its last meeting in May 2008. The report was presented by the chairperson Mr John Dardis, the vice-chairperson Mr Campbell Tweedie and the chief executive Mr Martin Higgins. We noted the following points: progress made on the development of the obesity action forum, which the Council had endorsed at its meeting in May 2008; the range of promotional activities undertaken by Safefood, including a healthy-eating campaign targeted at parents, and various seasonal campaigns; and the completion of three consumer-focused reviews in 2008 on beef, milk and pork. Those reviews highlighted that consumer confidence in those products remains high.

Ministers also received a presentation on proposals for the development of an enteric reference service for the island of Ireland. They noted the work done to date by Safefood. The Council also discussed Safefood's business plan for 2009 and noted its annual report and accounts for 2007.

It was agreed in June to plan towards holding the next meeting in those sectors in the autumn of 2009. Both Departments are currently assessing progress across the ongoing areas of co-operation in health and food safety with a view to finalising an agenda and agreeing a date for the next meeting.

Mr Wells: I thank the Minister for his statement. I note that the issue of swine flu did not feature in that meeting, although I suspect that that was because concern about swine flu was only starting to emerge at the time of the meeting. I note that the Minister intends to call a second sectoral meeting in the autumn of 2009. Can he assure us that the issue of swine flu will be discussed at that meeting?

Can the Minister also assure us that he believes that the authorities in the Irish Republic are doing everything possible not only to control swine flu in their own country, but to ensure that there is no possible spread of the disease across the border? Is he content that the authorities are doing everything they can to stop that happening?

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: In relation to Mr Wells's first point, I did, in fact, have a discussion on swine flu with Mary Harney and her officials at Farmleigh House in June, prior to the meeting of the North/South Ministerial Council. That discussion included both of our Chief Medical Officers and was very wide-ranging. I was able to give her some of the information that I had received the previous day from COBRA. The two Departments keep in constant contact, and it is my intention that swine flu will be the main issue on the agenda at the next North/South Ministerial Council meeting, so Mr Wells has sensibly predicted what the main issue will be.

In relation to the performance of the Irish Republic, authorities there are following much the same steps as we are following. They are not part of the UK-wide response, but their response matches the national response in the UK, and we share progress as we go along. Citizens in the Irish Republic can also take confidence from the fact that their Government, as far as I can ascertain, are at the point where they should be as far as protecting the population is concerned. The Member mentioned crossing borders, but he will be aware that there will be no border as far as swine flu is concerned. It is the fastest-moving virus that we have seen for many generations, and when the surge comes it will engulf us all.

Ms S Ramsey: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. It is great to hear the Minister say that there is no border in Ireland when dealing with health and health inequalities.

It is important that we welcome the statement, because many important issues were covered at the meeting. It is great to see both Health Departments on the island working together and being proactive on those issues.

The Minister mentioned the issues of suicide prevention and of child protection. It is important that the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety receives, if possible, a copy of the papers that were provided on the issues that the Health Departments have endorsed. The Committee regularly deals with issues to do with children and vulnerable adults and with the issue of suicide.

The Minister is well aware that the Health Committee is due to sign off on its report on its inquiry into obesity. What progress has been made on the issue of obesity? Will the Minister assure us that the Committee's inquiry will be brought to the next meeting at which obesity is on the agenda? It is important not only that Departments and Ministers across the island work together but that Committees across the island tackle the issue.

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: Sue Ramsey will be aware of the Institute of Public Health in Ireland, which has provided an amount of salient advice on that ongoing work. Since that body was established, a Public Health Agency has been set up in Northern Ireland, which will take the lead on obesity and a number of other issues, although it has been somewhat ambushed by the swine flu pandemic.

I am happy to share information on obesity and suicide as the Health Departments work together on them. It is a shared experience and some issues are universal; for example, how new technologies such as the Internet impact on the well-being of children and, in turn, issues such as suicide. We are working on a number of areas and are developing protocols, particularly on child protection, that overlap with suicide prevention. When I next come to the Committee, which will be within the next month, I will be happy to share the information that I have.

Mrs Hanna: I welcome the Minister's statement, particularly his comments on co-operation on child protection. Has any discussion taken place on potential European funding for cross-border initiatives, perhaps through the Lisbon Treaty?

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: I do not have to hand information on European funding for cross-border initiatives through routes such as the Lisbon Treaty. I can write to the Member with the information that she seeks. Funding is a serious issue and, as with other areas, the area of North/South initiatives is one that I look at carefully.

Mr McCallister: I welcome the Minister's statement, which covered some important issues of mutual concern. Do the 3% efficiency savings, which the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety is required to make, apply to North/South bodies, such as Safefood?

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: The 3% efficiency savings apply to all Health Service activities. As Members are aware, I am required to find some £700 million in efficiency savings over three years. That is on top of the fact that our budget is £600 million behind providing the same Health Service provision as that in England. Trusts are in financial distress. Efficiency savings are being considered throughout the Health Service and that, of course, includes North/South bodies. Health Service activity is constantly rising in a number of areas because birth rates, the number of older people, the number of people using accident and emergency and the number of inpatients as a result of that are all rising extremely quickly. In some cases, the numbers are rising by 8% or 9%.

In 2009, the increase in real terms, which includes inflation and excludes GDP at 2.7%, is 0.9%. That sum is not difficult. In many areas, there are increases of around 9%.

10.45 am

Mr McCarthy: I, too, welcome the Minister's statement and the progress that has been made on various issues. As regards suicide prevention, can the Minister tell the House how information on new technologies, and so on, will be filtered down to all those important groups, particularly in Northern Ireland, who work continuously to improve suicide-prevention initiatives and, it is to be hoped, to prevent suicide in the first place.

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: The groups to which Mr McCarthy refers are very much at the cutting edge of finding initiatives in the drive against suicide. A sizeable part of the North/South work on suicide involves sharing information, because a large number of groups in the South have equally valuable experience. We ensure that that information is shared. That is our initial step.

We also have an all-Ireland suicide action plan. Therefore, a number of initiatives is ongoing that concern sharing information, and ensuring that all groups get that information. That is what we aim to do.

Mrs McGill: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his statement. I welcome particularly, under the heading "Health Promotion", the reference to shared learning on population health and tackling health inequalities.

In order to tackle health inequalities, has a mapping exercise been carried out throughout the island to identify where those inequalities occur? If that exercise does not exist at present, can that information be obtained for the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety? To assist the all-island agenda and information-sharing, it would be welcome.

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: As far as Northern Ireland is concerned, that mapping exercise has existed for a number of years. We are well aware of where pockets of health inequalities are located. There is a considerable number of them. Similarly, Mary Harney has knowledge of where pockets of health inequalities are located in the Irish Republic. We are able to share information where necessary. Health inequality is a common problem on both sides of the border.

As Members are aware, health inequalities go hand in hand with social disadvantage, educational disadvantage and unemployment, as well as with misuse of alcohol, tobacco and drugs, with obesity, and so on. That is very much the focus of the Public Health Agency that I set up, and a feature of shared experiences that are brought to the table at North/South meetings.

Mrs D Kelly: I thank the Minister for his report. Can he indicate when the results of the North/South Ministerial Council's review on health matters will be published or made available?

Moreover, I understand that the number of suicides in the North has increased in 2009. I am not entirely sure whether the pattern has been similar in the South. As we are all aware, health funding is under intense pressure on both sides of the border. Was bed sharing in acute admissions for people who are at risk of suicide discussed at the meeting? I understand that there is a shortage of such beds in the North.

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: The Member has mentioned suicide numbers, which, in the past three years for which figures are available — 2006, 2007, and 2008 — have been 255, 242, and 282 respectively. There are underlying reasons for that, not least the increased likelihood of people to report and more accurate reporting of numbers. Nevertheless, it remains for me a consistent anxiety and worry and a consistent target, which we are taking steps to reach.

The Member asked about bed sharing. In fact, a new mental-health hospital is being completed near Forestside in south Belfast. That hospital will have a unit for children and adolescents, as well as a family unit, and it will create around 33 additional beds. In fact, I think that that number can be stretched a bit further. We seek to address — and are addressing — the issue of bed sharing to ensure that we have an adequate number of beds available and that they come on stream.

I have noticed that a new private mental-health hospital for adolescents is being built in Templepatrick. I have no knowledge of that hospital, except for the details that I have read in newspapers and seen on television. The hospital certainly has no contact whatever with the Health Service. The one thing that a recent report that I saw neglected to say about the hospital was that in order to be admitted, one must pay. However, the new mental-health hospital in south Belfast is provided by the Health Service, and access to it is controlled by a person's citizenship, not their ability to pay.

My Department and I, together with Minister Harney, are considering the results of the review on health matters that the North/South Ministerial Council in health and food safety sectoral format carried out.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE BUSINESS

Department of Justice Bill

Second Stage

The First Minister (Mr P Robinson): I beg to move.

That the Second Stage of the Department of Justice Bill [NIA 1/09] be agreed.

Last November, following our attendance at a meeting of the Assembly and Executive Review Committee, the deputy First Minister and I announced that we had reached agreement on a number of key issues relating to the devolution of policing and justice matters.

The arrangements that we proposed will apply on an interim basis until 2012 and will be subject to review before permanent arrangements are put in place. Following that meeting in November 2008, we made public a paper that set out the process by which devolution can be achieved and the clear steps that will need to be taken to achieve devolution without undue delay.

One of those steps was the drafting and introduction of Assembly legislation. That legislation is the Department of Justice Bill, which we are debating today. The Bill flows from the Assembly's approval on 20 January 2009 of the report of the Assembly and Executive Review Committee on the arrangements for devolution of policing and justice matters and is not the result of any subsequent negotiations. The report and the Assembly endorsed our view that there should be a single justice Department with a single Minister who is elected by the Assembly.

Earlier this year, legislation was enacted at Westminster to make the necessary legislative amendments that arose from the Assembly and Executive Review Committee's report and from our decisions, which were announced on 18 November 2008. That legislation was the Northern Ireland Act 2009, and it provides the essential framework for the present Bill. The Act includes a sunset clause that will dissolve the new Department of justice in 2012 if the Assembly has not extended the arrangements in the Bill or adopted new arrangements by that time.

The Secretary of State has also made an Order to increase the maximum permitted number of ministerial offices to accommodate a Minister of justice. That Westminster legislation was also among the steps that were identified in our November process paper.

Another step is now being taken with the introduction of this Bill. The Bill itself does not seek to give effect to devolution. That can happen only when the Assembly passes a specific resolution requesting that the Secretary of State transfer the relevant responsibilities and when the necessary legislation has been passed at Westminster. However, the Bill makes preparations in advance of those final stages so that the process at that time is as straightforward as possible. It is, therefore, enabling legislation.

Its purpose is to facilitate the creation of a future Department of justice, which will assume most of the responsibilities that are planned to transfer. The Bill will also establish a legislative basis through which the Assembly can appoint a Minister of justice. The Bill reflects the arrangements that were proposed by the Assembly and Executive Review Committee, endorsed by the Assembly and legislated for at Westminster by the Northern Ireland Act 2009.

The Bill is quite succinct. Clause 1 establishes the Department of justice, and clause 2 sets out a process for the appointment of a Minister of justice by vote of the Assembly, requiring that not only a majority of Members vote on the resolution, but that a majority of designated nationalists and designated unionists vote.

That condition ensures cross-community support for the new Minister. The deputy First Minister and I have already stated that, initially, neither of our parties would nominate one of its own members for the post of Minister of justice.

Significantly, the third clause ensures that the preceding clauses, which are the operative parts of the Bill, will not come into operation until the deputy First Minister and I jointly make a commencement order. That would take place in the final stages before devolution and, as I said, would happen only after a cross-community vote in the Assembly.

There is also a technical schedule to the Bill, which will tidy up a number of references to the future Department in existing legislation by amending them to use the new title of Department of justice. The content of the Bill and its introduction have been agreed by the Executive. The OFMDFM Committee has been briefed on the Bill's contents, and I look forward to its further engagement during the Committee Stage.

This enabling Bill gives legislative authority to put in place the arrangements that the Assembly has already agreed are necessary for the future devolution of policing and justice. The Bill's passage will enable us to act decisively, once the Assembly resolves that the time is right to request the transfer of those powers. I commend the Bill to the Assembly.

The Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister (Mr Kennedy): As the Chairperson of the OFMDFM Committee, I am grateful for the opportunity to talk about the Bill. I will then add my own party-political views.

At its meeting on Wednesday 9 September, the Committee received a briefing from departmental officials. A number of questions was asked and answers given; officials undertook to send further information to the Committee, which was provided in a reply dated 21 September and circulated to all members of the Committee.

It was proposed in the Committee that the Bill should not proceed in the Assembly until the publication of the next report of the Assembly and Executive Review Committee. That proposal was defeated, and the Committee agreed to place a public notice in newspapers after the First Stage of the Bill to advertise a closing date — a fortnight later — for receipt of submissions. I can confirm that that notice was published on Friday 18 September, and it indicates a closing date of 12 noon on 2 October. At its meeting on 7 October, the OFMDFM Committee will consider likely oral evidence sessions and whether to extend the Committee Stage of the Bill. That is an accurate reflection of how the OFMDFM Committee has dealt with the Bill in its statutory role.

As a member of the Ulster Unionist Party, I will now address some issues raised by the potential devolution of policing and justice to the Assembly. I declare an interest as a member of the Assembly and Executive Review Committee.

In principle, the Ulster Unionist Party is not opposed to the devolution of policing and justice at a proper point in time. However, that point has not yet been reached, so we will oppose the Bill's passage today.

11.00 am

We are consistently told that we are part of a four-party mandatory coalition. However, the Ulster Unionist Party has not been consulted on, or involved in any way in, the ongoing negotiations at Downing Street and with senior Treasury figures. We are not, therefore, involved in briefings and meetings with officials.

The First Minister: Are you sure about that?

The Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister: We believe that we have no ownership —

The First Minister: Your leader has not had any discussions?

The Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister: The Ulster Unionist Party believes that it has no ownership of the process.

Mr Speaker: Order.

The Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister: If the First Minister wishes to say something, I am happy to give way.

The First Minister: That would be useful. Is the Member telling the House that his party leader has not had any discussions with the Northern Ireland Office on the devolution of policing and justice powers?

The Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister:

That is altogether different. There may well have been discussions and conversations with the Secretary of State and others; however, we have not been involved in the ongoing, detailed negotiations, and, therefore, our fingers are not in this pie. The First Minister will have to explain to his own party, and to the wider community, how and when decisions are to be made.

Mr Poots: Will the Member give way?

The Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister:

Sorry, I have progress to make.

I simply reiterate that we feel that we have no ownership of the process. It is a bit rich for the First Minister, who often reminds us that this is allegedly a four-party mandatory coalition, to expect the blind support of other parties, particularly the Ulster Unionist Party, for the early devolution of policing and justice powers.

Dr Farry: Will the Member give way?

The Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister: I am sorry, but I will not give way.

We need to consider community confidence. In the wider community, the prevailing view is that the Assembly and Executive have not yet substantially proved themselves before the people of Northern Ireland. Devolution is not all that it was cracked up to be or what was promised, and we see that in the business of the Assembly. For example, the issue of education is in deadlock.

Mr Speaker: Order. I remind the House that, at Second Stage, Members must speak to the principles of the Bill. If Members decide to wander outside the principles of the Bill, I will very quickly bring them back. In Committee and at Consideration Stage, Members will have an opportunity to discuss all the issues. However, today's debate concerns the principles of the Bill, and only the principles of the Bill.

The Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister: I am happy to bear that in mind, Mr Speaker. I was attempting to allude to the wider perceptions that affect the conditions under which this enabling legislation could be progressed. I am striving to make the point that there is no community confidence in the Assembly or the Executive to permit the early enactment and realisation of the devolution of policing and justice powers.

Community confidence has been shaken by recent events, and by the ongoing serious threat from republican dissidents. That is a matter that concerns us all and, in the context of devolving policing and justice powers, is surely an important consideration. I detect a very strong concern in the unionist community, which believes that republicans, even those in the House who are directly involved in the negotiations for the possible devolution of policing and justice powers, are not doing enough to bring the necessary information to the PSNI so that it can deal with those republican dissidents, as they are called. We need to see information that details the activities of some of the erstwhile colleagues of those in the mainstream republican movement.

Mr Poots: Will the Member give way? I hear what the Member says —

Mr O'Dowd: Will the Member give way?

Mr Poots: Mr O'Dowd will get his chance to speak later.

I hear what the Member says, and I am at somewhat of a loss to understand him. In 2005, when republicans had not signed up to policing and justice, the Member's party wanted to rush headlong into the devolution of those powers. Now that republicans have signed up to the devolution of policing and justice powers, he wants to delay the process. I am somewhat confused by his stance.

The Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister: I am happy to confirm that the Member seems to be confused permanently. The situation that he described was not the case; therefore, his comments are not relevant to today's debate.

Given past performance, serious questions must be asked about the ability of DUP/Sinn Féin to negotiate a proper financial package to support the devolution of policing and justice. Any financial package for the transfer of policing and justice powers needs to be tested rigorously for financial sustainability, risk management and contingency planning against potential shortfalls. Only then, and only after a period of time, should powers be transferred fully. Clear, robust guarantees must be given that Westminster will not allow the Northern Ireland Budget to suffer in the event of additional demands being made on policing, such as those that are created by civil disorder. Only on that basis can we consider the devolution of policing and justice powers responsibly.

For well over a year, my party has been saying that the time is not right to devolve those powers unless and until this place steps up to the mark on other issues. A year later, there has been no movement; we have had only more paralysis from the DUP/Sinn Féin axis. Simply adding the Alliance Party to that axis is hardly a recipe that inspires confidence. Therefore, we oppose the Bill, not because we oppose the principle of the Northern Ireland Assembly having charge of the powers, as is the plan, but because we do not believe that the community has confidence in devolution at this point. Moreover, given that the Executive cannot sort out the mess in education and other areas, how on earth can they be expected to deal effectively and efficiently with policing and justice? The Ulster Unionist Party will, therefore, oppose the motion.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr McClarty] in the Chair)

Mr Spratt: I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak during today's debate. I declare an interest as Chairperson of the Assembly and Executive Review Committee and as a member of the Northern Ireland Policing Board. I clarify that I am not speaking in my capacity as Chairperson of the Assembly and Executive Review Committee.

As Members are aware, the issue of the devolution of policing and justice has been in the political arena for some time. I support the Bill, the creation of a Department of justice and the appointment of a justice Minister when the necessary conditions are met. However, as Members are aware, the purpose of the Bill is merely to create a Department of justice and to enable the appointment of a justice Minister. It does not state when devolution will happen or, indeed, what powers will be devolved. It is simply a stepping stone along the way. However, we are making progress and are moving in the right direction.

Before policing and justice functions can be devolved, two things need to happen. First, we need to ensure that appropriate funding is in place, and I know that the First Minister and the deputy First Minister have been lobbying the Prime Minister and the Treasury to ensure that that happens. Secondly, we need to safeguard the continuity of the justice Department beyond 2012. To do so, we must ensure that community confidence exists. If devolution is to be sustainable, all sections of the community must have confidence in it.

The Assembly and Executive Review Committee has made a number of practical recommendations about devolution, which begin with suggesting that there should, in fact, be an additional and separate Department for policing and justice, which should be known as the Department of justice. Following on from that, the Committee recommended a number of control measures for the removal and replacement of a Minister, which would apply until 2012. Those measures would be contained in what is known as a sunset clause, which means that the Department would dissolve in 2012 if the Assembly did not agree on a more permanent arrangement. In the interim, it was also agreed that neither the DUP nor Sinn Féin will nominate a Member from their respective parties to be justice Minister.

Bearing in mind what I said about community confidence, it is important that any future justice Minister ultimately be appointed by a majority of unionists and a majority of nationalists, as well as an overall majority of Members. To those Members who are concerned that that is a departure from d'Hondt, and it is, I can say that the Assembly will have an opportunity to revisit the proposal before 2012.

The Assembly and Executive Review Committee —

Mrs D Kelly: In confirming that that measure is a departure from d'Hondt, and, therefore, a departure from the principles of the Good Friday Agreement, does the Member agree that Sinn Féin has conceded that veto to the DUP?

Mr Poots: Does the Member agree that that measure would be part of the dismantling of the “ugly scaffolding” of the Good Friday Agreement, a phrase which was used by the soon-to-be former leader of the lady's party?

Mr Spratt: I am happy to agree with that. [Laughter.] I am also happy to hear what Mrs Kelly said; I have heard it many times before, not only from her, but from her colleague Mr Attwood, who is sitting beside her.

The Assembly and Executive Review Committee still has work to do before the devolution of policing and justice can take place. I mentioned earlier that finance is key; I want to commend the work of the First Minister and the deputy First Minister in their negotiations with the Prime Minister and the Treasury. Those talks have taken place against the background of particularly difficult economic times, and it is certainly not an easy task.

The Assembly and Executive Review Committee will continue to consider the non-modality issues, and will finalise its second report soon. There was some discussion about that in the Committee's meeting earlier this morning. The Committee aims to present its second report to the Assembly before the end of 2009. I commend the Bill to the House.

Mr A Maskey: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Obviously, on behalf of Sinn Féin, I support the Bill. As the First Minister said, it is a succinct Bill, which contains three clauses that simply provide for the establishment of a justice Department and the appointment of a justice Minister. The Bill, in my view, ably and simply speaks for itself.

I heard some of the comments that Danny Kennedy made when he was speaking as a member of the Ulster Unionist Party. Although I wish it were different, the Bill does not specify when the Department will be established. That is something that we are working on. I welcome the fact that Jimmy Spratt mentioned that the First Minister and the deputy First Minister are engaged in ongoing discussions with the British Government and others to try to ensure that we make the necessary progress on issues such as the budget, and that we can move speedily towards the establishment of a justice Department in the near future.

Members will have become familiar with the phrase “revolving justice”. We have all heard members of the public, particularly victims' families and others, who have regularly and routinely complained to us about the revolving nature of the justice system, whereby repeat offenders are in and out of the courts. Most members of the public feel that the levels of justice that are meted out are inappropriate or not balanced.

What we have heard from Danny Kennedy this morning is an example not only of a revolving policy, but of the UUP going round in circles. He finished his remarks by saying that the UUP would oppose the Bill, not because it is against the principle of the transfer of policing and justice powers, but because it does not think that the time is right. That is a familiar unionist phrase; we often hear that the time is not right or that the Assembly has not stepped up to the mark.

Although I wish that it did, the Bill does not provide a date for the transfer of powers. Therefore, there is no reason —

Mr Kennedy: Does the Member accept that the Bill's passage through the various Stages in the Assembly raises an expectation that the date for the devolution of policing and justice is not far off and is not a political lifetime away, as some people once predicted?

Mr A Maskey: The Member needs to make up his mind whether he wishes to be mischievous or whether he wishes to contribute to the debate. In my view, much of what he said this morning has done neither.

The fact is that the Ulster Unionist Party signed up to the Good Friday Agreement. The St Andrews Agreement was an add-on to that. Further discussions took place; some of the topics we supported and some we were not so happy about. Nevertheless, the Ulster Unionist Party has two Ministers in the Executive as a result of the Good Friday and St Andrews Agreements.

Mr Cobain: As the Ulster Unionist Party is represented on the Executive, has it been in detailed discussions with the First Minister and deputy First Minister about the devolution of policing and justice?

Mr A Maskey: I think if the Member — [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr A Maskey: Had the Member been in the House earlier, he would have heard reference to the fact that his party leader has already been part of a number of discussions. [Interruption.] I must also point out that members of his party sit on the Assembly and Executive Review Committee. In fact, Danny Kennedy chairs the relevant scrutiny Committee, so the UUP has had ample opportunities to be involved in discussions.

The difficulty for the Ulster Unionist Party — and Mr Kennedy alluded to it earlier, possibly inadvertently — is that it did not get the mandate to be among the leadership of those negotiations. That is a problem that the party has to square in its own mind. I do not believe that it has squared that circle just yet. Other parties suffer from the same problem. As a result of the choice of the electorate, the DUP and Sinn Féin are the two lead parties, in that they are the holders of the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister. They are mandated and obligated to take those discussions and negotiations forward.

Mr Kennedy: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maskey: No, I am sorry, but I have already done so. The Member will have plenty of time to speak later on if he wishes to. He has stated that he will deal with that in the later stages of the Bill, and I look forward to that.

The reality for the Ulster Unionist Party is that it did not get that mandate. It is free to seek a new mandate later on, but, for the time being, the current First Minister and deputy First Minister are leading the discussions with the British Government on a budget. They are not doing that in isolation. Members of all parties, with the exception of the Alliance Party, sit on the Policing Board, which has also been routinely involved in discussions on the necessary budget for policing — and I should declare an interest as a member of the Assembly and Executive Review Committee and as a member of the Policing Board. I am sure that members of Mr Kennedy's party have made representations directly to the NIO on budgetary and other matters. Indeed, I think that that has already been acknowledged.

The Ulster Unionist Party still has ample opportunity to input into this very important debate. What it has not shown, in my opinion, is any sense of leadership whatsoever. I am not a unionist, but I can tell the Member that Policing Board members who are here today would acknowledge that the board frequently meets people from every community across the North who routinely complain that the system is not joined up and that good aspects of police work fall foul of the Magistrate's Court or the Public Prosecution Service (PPS). Those disputes are taking place. People from all communities want a justice system that is joined up, effective and solves problems collectively. They, and members of all parties, including the Ulster Unionist Party, routinely make representations to the Policing Board about the need to ensure that the system is joined up more effectively so that the general public, whom we serve collectively, get the justice system that they are entitled to, that they want and, more importantly, that they can shape in the future.

The only real opportunities for many people to have an input into important justice matters are through current affairs programmes or the letters pages of newspapers. Everyone here will acknowledge and accept that it is simply not good enough that the public have no real input into how the criminal justice system works. Some people want to have legislation introduced on a whole range of matters, others want to change Government policies. However, they do not have a local Minister whom they can hold to account for the rights and wrongs of the system or to whom they can suggest changes that would benefit the community.

The legislation is necessary simply to ensure the realisation of the agreement that I hope is imminent. The vast majority of the public welcome that and, indeed, want it to happen sooner rather than later. Considerable community confidence will be built if members of the parties represented in the Chamber today come together to establish the justice Department and to appoint a Minister and a scrutiny Committee. That will also help the budget process. I do not accept that there is not widespread community support. However, other parties have made that argument, and so be it. Along with the vast majority of the public, a LeasCheann Comhairle, I look forward to the transfer of power on justice matters: that is very important to all the people whom we serve collectively from the Chamber.

Mr Spratt referred to the fact that the appointment will be made outside of the d'Hondt procedures, and I accept that. However, I make it clear on the record yet again that the arrangements are temporary. The DUP and Sinn Féin have generously abstained from taking the post for the first period.

Mr P Ramsey: Why is Sinn Féin so spooked by the prospect of an SDLP justice Minister? Will the Member and his party support an SDLP nomination?

Mr A Maskey: The Member might want to refer to the former leader of his party, or is he still the leader? I am not quite sure of the leadership situation in that party. Nevertheless, the former, or current, or putative in/out leader, has had discussions on the matter. We are on public record as saying that our preference is for an SDLP Minister of justice, although I must say that I would not have a lot of confidence in many of the SDLP Members on the Benches to be competent Ministers.

Mr P Ramsey: Would you support an SDLP nomination?

Mr A Maskey: Our preference is an SDLP Minister of justice, and we would support that nomination. I am not sure what part of that the Member cannot understand. We have said that repeatedly, and I repeat it again today.

The Good Friday Agreement and the St Andrews Agreement contain an absolute requirement that we establish the institutions and maximise devolution and the transfer of powers. It is not a cherry-picking exercise: it is an absolute requirement. Policing and justice is an essential element of what was agreed in both the Good Friday Agreement and the subsequent St Andrews talks.

The purpose of the Bill, a LeasCheann Comhairle, is to ensure that a Department will be established as soon as possible. I have already said that the DUP and Sinn Féin have generously abstained from nominating a Minister of justice at this point. Given the difficult circumstances in which we all find ourselves, we have made an accommodation to ensure that a Department of justice will be established and that a Member of the House will be appointed as Minister of justice. That will also ensure that the general public are given a sense of the justice system's twin pillars of accountability and independence. The people whom we represent collectively will have a say over how those matters are delivered in the time ahead.

As Mr Jimmy Spratt said, the Bill contains a sunset clause that means that the interim arrangements have to come to an end by May 2012. There is no fallback position. If we wish to continue with the devolution of policing and justice powers after 1 May 2012, it is up to any Member or any party to make alternative proposals prior to that date. As I said, the current arrangements are temporary and are merely an accommodation.

If policing and justice powers are transferred in the near future, I imagine that the practical outworkings and the experience that will be gained by the parties between that time and May 2012 will be important. Danny Kennedy said that power sharing is not working. However, that practical experience, along with other work, will inform us by May 2012 of whether it is appropriate to continue with the arrangements beyond that time. If it is not appropriate to do so, we will make other arrangements. Any such alternative arrangements will be discussed and will have to be in place by 1 May 2012. That is important.

Mr Durkan: Will the Member take a question?

Mr A Maskey: I will, as long as it is a question. Please keep it brief.

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for giving way. He said that arrangements will have to be in place before May 2012. If arrangements are not in place before then, what will happen?

Mr A Maskey: The Member has been involved in politics for a few years — he did say, though, that he is only 49, so I will take that as an indication of his political experience — and as he has said in the past, we do not know what will happen. His former deputy leader, Séamus Mallon, was on record as saying that we can only legislate for what we can legislate for ourselves. We cannot legislate into the future. I do not know what the situation will be in 2012. I do not know what the situation will be next week; I have a fair idea, and I am working on that basis, but who knows?

The fact is that the arrangements are in place, and I hope that they will get the support of the parties in the Assembly, because those arrangements provide for the establishment of a Department of justice and the appointment of a Minister of justice. By 1 May 2012, alternative arrangements will have to be in place. The Bill does not provide for a fallback position. Therefore, if such arrangements are not in place, there will not be a Department of justice. If an impasse —

Mr Durkan may wish to hear himself talking, but I do not want to hear him. I want to get on with the debate.

If we reach an impasse at that time, one would presume that there are other political difficulties, and we will have to deal with those in the round.

I will make one simple point in response to Mr Durkan: at no time during his leadership of his party, or during Seamus Mallon's leadership in the Assembly, did they make any specific proposals to the House for the delivery of policing and justice powers, nor indeed, if I recall correctly, did they even publicly put forward such a strategy. It is all very well to say that it was in the Good Friday Agreement. Sinn Féin supported the Good Friday Agreement, and I remind the Member, although he does not like to acknowledge it very often, that we were involved in the negotiations that led to the Good Friday Agreement. It was not solely the SDLP that tidied up that bit of business; a number of people, including those from Sinn Féin, were involved in those talks. At no time did the SDLP put forward any strategy for the delivery of policing and justice powers. Its members can criticise Sinn Féin —

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maskey: I have already given way a number of times. The Member will have ample opportunity to state her case.

People can state that they want something to happen; however, the general public want their political leaders to deliver. How can we do that? This Bill, as an accommodation between Sinn Féin, the Democratic Unionist Party and OFMDFM, sets out the means for the establishment of a Department of justice.

11.30 am

I want the SDLP to tell people whether it supports the Bill. When Mark Durkan spoke against the Westminster Bill on the matter, he got his party into quite a kerfuffle by leaving — he did not stay for the vote. Therefore, we must be clear about our positions. The SDLP must tell the general public whether it supports the transfer of policing and justice powers and whether it will support the current legislation to enable that transfer.

Earlier, in answer to Pat Ramsey, I stated that Sinn Féin would prefer a member of the SDLP to be the justice Minister; that may or not happen. However, our priority is to facilitate the transfer of powers on policing and justice to ensure that the general public whom we represent receive the best policing and criminal justice system that we can deliver.

That means putting our shoulder to the wheel, establishing the Department and taking responsibility for delivering those matters into the hands of locally elected people who are accountable to the public and who will be able to answer those families who ask why they have not received justice. Instead of people having to run headline campaigns in the ‘Belfast Telegraph’ or having to appear on ‘The Stephen Nolan Show’, perhaps the Assembly will take responsibility by passing the relevant and appropriate laws and by developing a policy for the wider criminal justice system that will help to prevent crime and enable the police to detect more crime. That would enable the judicial system to deal appropriately with offenders while being respectful of, and responsive to, the victims.

I conclude by reiterating that the arrangement is temporary, based on an accommodation reached by the DUP and Sinn Féin through OFMDFM. I have no difficulty with that because as part of the ongoing negotiations on the budget and other matters, Sinn Féin is determined that a Department be established. Sinn Féin and the DUP have absented themselves from consideration for the ministerial post. That demonstrates that Sinn Féin’s priority, through the establishment of the Department, is to meet not our narrower party political interests, important as those may be, but the wider public interest, whoever the Minister may be and to whichever party he or she belongs.

Others who want to contest the Bill must tell the public how they intend to meet their need. Communities are experiencing problems with crime, and there is a lack of confidence in the criminal justice system and in many aspects of its delivery. Other parties may criticise Sinn Féin and the DUP as much as they wish. However, they must tell the public how they intend to achieve the establishment of the Department and the appointment of a Minister, so that, collectively, we can get on with the job of delivering and servicing the needs of the people whom we are all supposed to represent. Go raibh mile maith agat.

Mr A Maginness: I am interested in what Mr Maskey said about the “temporary” arrangement with the DUP. I recall that Lloyd George described partition as temporary; the term, therefore, has some historical resonance.

I want to make it clear that the SDLP supports fully the devolution of justice and policing powers to the House and to Northern Ireland. However, we do not support it on the basis of the Bill. The Bill is defective and flawed because it does not permit a stable and inclusive method by which justice and policing powers can be transferred.

Let us take an example —

Mr Hamilton: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: No; the Member may intervene all he wants after allowing me to develop my argument.

All Members should be aware that a sunset clause builds into any transfer of justice and policing powers a continuous instability in the Department and in its future. The temporary arrangement to which Mr Alex Maskey referred will create all sorts of political difficulties throughout the life of the Department, if it comes about. Therefore, the Bill is defective at least on that basis. That is a fundamental flaw in relation to this legislation.

Another point, which was made very openly by Mr Spratt in his observations of the Bill, is that the process is a departure from the d’Hondt mechanism. Mr Alex Maskey endorsed that and openly admitted that it was a departure from d’Hondt. Of course, the d’Hondt system is central to the Good Friday Agreement. Once one starts to chip away at a fundamental aspect of the agreement, one undermines the entire agreement.

Dr W McCrea: Hear, hear.

Mr A Maginness: I hear some echoes from the DUP Benches that are in support of that proposition. Of course, Sinn Féin has sold the pass in relation to the Good Friday Agreement. By accepting that there should be a departure from d’Hondt in relation to the justice and policing Ministry, the party is accepting that the principle of d’Hondt is expendable. That is what Sinn Féin is doing by accepting the departure that the DUP has welcomed. Of course, this is a DUP agenda and not a Sinn Féin agenda. It is an agenda to which Sinn Féin has acquiesced. In fact, the party has betrayed a basic principle of the Good Friday Agreement.

The leader of the Ulster Unionist Party called —

Mr Kennedy: He is not here. [Laughter.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr A Maginness: I thought that Mr Kennedy was a little confused. [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr A Maginness: The leader of the Ulster Unionist Party, outside this House, is on record as referring to the arrangement as a gerrymander. It is a gerrymander by the DUP and Sinn Féin. They have agreed to all sorts of carve-ups, but they cannot agree on this one. They are implacably deadlocked in relation to this issue, so the alternative that they have used is a gerrymander of the office. It is a crucial office in government; one that is very contentious and is very important for the future of justice and security here in Northern Ireland. Their agreement is quite wrong indeed.

What is required is to adhere to the method of selecting Ministers, which is a basic principle of the Good Friday Agreement. The d'Hondt mechanism is to be preferred because it is fair. It allows parties, in a fair manner, to select the Departments in which they wish to involve themselves.

Mr M McGuinness: For the purposes of this debate, will the Member outline for the Assembly one occasion when the SDLP proposed that policing and justice powers should be transferred to the Assembly and the Executive under the d'Hondt mechanism during the time when Séamus Mallon and Mark Durkan were in the lead in regard to the nationalist community and respectively held the position of deputy First Minister alongside David Trimble?

Mr A Maginness: The SDLP has never departed from the principle of d'Hondt, because —

Mr M McGuinness: Will the Member give way? I have asked a simple question.

Mr A Maginness: I am answering that question. The principle of d'Hondt is central to the Good Friday Agreement, because it is a fair system by which to appoint Ministers and distribute offices — [Interruption.]

Just listen to me: d'Hondt establishes a reasonable and fair pecking order, and that is why that system was adopted. What Mr McGuinness is doing — [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. Members must not make references or statements from a sedentary position.

Mr A Maginness: The deputy First Minister, Martin McGuinness, in leading his party in the Assembly, has departed from a fundamental principle of the Good Friday Agreement. Therefore, he has undermined that principle itself. The next time we form an Administration, the DUP may decide to get rid of d'Hondt altogether and have Ministers based — [Interruption.]

That is the response that one gets. They have sold the pass in relation to d'Hondt, and I emphasise that.

Mr M McGuinness: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: I have already given way to the deputy First Minister. I will not give way again. Let me develop my argument. The point — [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker, the deputy First Minister is very exercised by this issue, because he realises that he has sold the pass in relation to d'Hondt and that that is a betrayal — [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. Which part of not making comments from a sedentary position does the deputy First Minister not understand?

Mr Durkan: The record shows that when I was deputy First Minister, I advocated beginning to work towards the devolution of justice and policing powers. The record also shows that the First Minister at that time did not agree with that position. The record further shows that Sinn Féin was completely opposed to the Policing Board at that time and was attacking and criticising those of us who were on it and who were trying to make the Patten Commission's reforms work.

Mr A Maginness: I thank the Member for his intervention. I go back to the point about the cross-community election of a Minister, which, in reality, in contrast with d'Hondt, allows a veto over the appointment. That is reflected in the statement of the Ulster Unionist leader, Sir Reg Empey, who said that the process would be a gerrymander because it would permit a veto.

Sinn Féin and Alex Maskey in particular have generously decided not to seek the justice Ministry: some generosity. Sinn Féin also said, very disingenuously, that it would support an SDLP appointment to the justice Ministry. That is so generous — [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr A Maskey: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. How can the Member refer to the fact that we "disingenuously" said that we would support an SDLP Member being appointed Minister of justice? That is a negative implication, which I reject absolutely. My party put it clearly on the record, and I have repeated during the debate, that Sinn Féin's preference was for an SDLP Member to be appointed Minister for justice. I resent Alban Maginness describing that offer as disingenuous; it was far from it.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Mr Maskey, you have adequately clarified your position.

11.45 am

Mr A Maginness: I am not sure whether that was, in fact, a point of order. It was more of an intervention. Nonetheless, Sinn Féin has professed support for the SDLP taking the justice Ministry, but that is a disingenuous position to adopt because it knows well that, some months ago, outside 10 Downing Street, the First Minister said that he would veto any SDLP nomination for the justice Ministry. So, Sinn Féin claimed to be supporting the SDLP, knowing quite well that there would be a veto from the First Minister. Of course, that is the veto to which Sinn Féin agreed by openly departing from d'Hondt.

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: In one moment. If d'Hondt had remained in place, the SDLP would certainly have had a claim on that Department, except in circumstances in which d'Hondt were rerun completely. If there were a topping-up according to d'Hondt, the SDLP would certainly have that position. However, whether or not the SDLP gets the justice Ministry is immaterial. The important thing is to preserve d'Hondt, because it guarantees fairness to everyone in the House, and that is central to the Good Friday Agreement. I am sure that most parties, apart from the DUP and Sinn Féin, would agree.

Mrs D Kelly: On the question of whether Sinn Féin was being disingenuous, it is a matter of public record that Martina Anderson said that the Alliance Party would be entitled to the justice Ministry. In fact, in the Assembly and Executive Review Committee, did it not fall to Alex Attwood to point out to Sinn Féin what, in a letter from the OFMDFM to the Committee, "at all times" meant in relation to a cross-community vote for the justice Ministry?

Mr A Maginness: I am grateful to my friend for raising that issue because when Martina Anderson said that she was accepting the position "at all times", she certainly sold the pass on this issue. Of course, Sinn Féin hastily unscrambled that position, by which it was deeply embarrassed, and from which it had to resile as quickly as possible.

However, my point is that once one departs from d'Hondt for exceptional reasons — and Mr Maskey has attempted to make the best of a bad case — one undermines the basic principle and the mandate of everyone in the House.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Does the Member recognise that the spectacle between nationalism and republicanism that we are witnessing from this side of the House is the clearest possible manifestation of the fact that, no matter which party is in the lead position in this place for nationalism, those parties have collectively failed to deliver their republican agenda on policing and justice? That is what we are witnessing today.

Mr A Maginness: If the Member wants me to go through the SDLP's history with respect to policing and justice and the way in which it brought about a new departure on policing by creating a new Police Service in Northern Ireland, I will do so. However, the Deputy Speaker would probably stop me. In answer to the Member's intervention, the SDLP has a proud record on policing, justice and human rights, and it will stand by that record and commit itself to justice, policing and human rights, which have been ignored by the party to my right.

I was interrupted while speaking about mandates. Mr Maskey has a peculiar attitude to them. He maintains that there are superior and inferior mandates. He does not accept that mandates are equal in this House. He does not accept that my mandate is equal to his. He maintains that, as he is a Sinn Féin member, he has a mandate plus; DUP members have a mandate plus; and, perhaps, SDLP members have a mandate minus.

In fact, all Members of the House have an equal mandate. We all have a right to be consulted and a right to inclusive decision-making in relation to important and contentious matters such as justice and policing. The SDLP has been excluded from that process, and it is excluded from consideration of which party should head that Department.

Mrs M Bradley: I remind Mr Paisley Jnr of the 'Hearts and Minds' programme in February 2009, on which he stated:

"I do believe that, if the SDLP had more people here, we certainly would not have been able to get away with some of the things that we have been able to get away with."

That means that the nationalists on these Benches did not fail, and I thank him for his words. [Interruption.]

Mr Paisley Jnr: Collectively, you have failed.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order, Mr Paisley.

Mr McNarry: What planet are you on, Ian?

Mr Deputy Speaker: You are in this Chamber and on this planet, so please, Mr Paisley. Mr Maginness may continue.

Mr A Maginness: I find it strange that Mr Paisley should talk about failure, because there have been certain failures in respect of Mr Paisley and his party in recent days.

I return to the subject of mandates. Mandates are equal in this House. The Assembly is inclusive, not exclusive. However, the two major parties have adopted a position of exclusion. They are inclusive to one another, but they exclude other parties. They exclude the Ulster Unionist Party and the SDLP, and they would exclude anyone who does not suit their purposes.

My party believes that every Member has a mandate and a right to be included in decision-making. The Assembly was established on a power-sharing basis. Every Assembly Committee is constructed proportionately. That is the spirit of partnership, and the DUP and Sinn Féin are forgetting that. Partnership involves a coming together of all parties. That is reflected in the d'Hondt system but not in the Bill.

The Sinn Féin attitude to the SDLP is difficult to fathom. During the long argument over decommissioning, when there was great pressure on the SDLP in relation to the exclusion of Sinn Féin, the SDLP remained firm to the principle of inclusion in Government, because it wanted everyone to be involved in decision-making. This fractured society demands that everyone be included in decision-making. That spirit of partnership and inclusivity is important. I hope —

Mr A Maskey: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: I have already given way, but if the Member wants to speak, I will do so again.

Mr A Maskey: I respond to Mr Alban Maginness's last point. It is not that long since the SDLP joined unionist parties on Belfast City Council to exclude Bobby Lavery from the chairmanship of a relatively minor council committee. Mr Maginness knows that his colleague Alex Attwood has tried to defend that publicly. Bobby Lavery was an elected member of the council who had secured exactly the same mandate as Mr Maginness. Mr Lavery's brother and son had been shot dead by loyalists. Yet the SDLP unseated Mr Lavery from the chairmanship of a silly committee in Belfast City Council. That is an example of the SDLP's inclusivity.

Mr A Maginness: If that is Mr Maskey's strongest point, it is not really a point at all.

The SDLP's involvement in Government has been to include people, not to exclude them, and we are committed to that process, which is based and founded on the Good Friday Agreement.

I wish to refer to the financing of the Department. There are indications that progress has been made on the financing of policing, in particular, and justice, which is to be welcomed. However, I warn the House that the prospect of a Labour or Conservative Government taking power over the next months means that very firm guarantees are needed. Either of those parties, individually, or in a coalition with the Liberal Democrats, could bring about severe public sector cuts that could affect policing and justice in Northern Ireland. There must be guarantees to prevent that happening.

In conclusion, I am pleased to see that there is a better attitude towards the whole issue of devolution. At some stages, it was felt in the House that the DUP was not intrinsically in favour of the devolution of justice and policing. I remind Members that the last Prime Minister of Northern Ireland, Brian Faulkner, resigned over the taking away of policing and justice powers from the Northern Ireland Parliament and Government, so serious did he view that. Therefore, I sometimes have difficulty with unionists being reluctant to see the transfer of justice and policing. Clearly, it is an important power and something that all of us want to see happening sooner rather than later.

Dr Farry: The Alliance Party will be supporting the second reading of this important legislation, and —

Mr Kennedy: Does the Member have any more revelations?

Dr Farry: As I hear the heckling coming from both my left and my right, I will express my extreme disappointment that two parties in the Chamber are intent on opposing the legislation. Mr Maginness has just praised the DUP for getting us this far down the road to devolution, and yet the SDLP will vote against the Second Stage of the Bill today: that is a very confused message.

I am under no illusions: this is not the perfect way to deliver the devolution of policing and justice. However, we have to be realistic about where we are coming from. We do not have devolution of policing and justice at present. The history of the Northern Ireland peace process over the past years has been about making arrangements that may seem to be unusual, but that is what we have had to do to get over the various humps in the road and to ensure that we keep the journey going. Clearly, devolution is at a critical stage, and it is a critical step that has to be taken for confidence in the wider political process. Let us not make the perfect the enemy of the good. Let us accept what is before us in a pragmatic manner and recognise that this is a means to an end, and that that end is the devolution of policing and justice.

Devolution is important for three reasons. First, it is a critical step in our peace process. Policing and justice have been held back; they should be part of the devolution settlement. Secondly, it brings important accountability in relation to control over policymaking and resource considerations, which is something that the House should have. Thirdly, and perhaps most critically, it gives us opportunities for joined-up government. Policing and justice do not sit by themselves in a silo. The issues that they deal with cut across boundaries. For instance, levels of offending involves the areas of health, education and housing, and requires co-operation by different Departments. Devolution provides opportunities for enhanced joined-up government and better solutions for the people of Northern Ireland.

A lot of reference has been made to the issue of confidence. I want to say a few words on that.

The confidence needed for the devolution of policing and justice does exist. When I go round the doors, I do not hear people say that we should hold it back; they are ready for it to happen. Reference has been made to the problems in the Executive. Let me be clear: the devolution of policing and justice is part of the solution for overcoming those difficulties in the Executive, given that the lack of progress on devolution until now has been a source of discontent. Therefore, the logic follows that if policing and justice is devolved and there is agreement between the main parties in the Executive, we will be in a much better position.

12.00 noon

Developing confidence has to be seen as a process; it will not be achieved by devolution happening on a certain day. It will be an ongoing process, even after devolution happens, and it is about showing the people of Northern Ireland that the devolution of policing and justice can make a real difference to people's lives and will result in tangible differences.

Mrs D Kelly: Some 53 papers are being held up in the Executive by the two main parties. How does that inspire confidence in the public?

Dr Farry: The Member is aware of what the Alliance Party has been saying about its frustrations with the performance of the Executive, but devolution will help overcome the existing problems rather than add to them. I thought that the SDLP was in favour of devolution and not against it, as its members seem to be arguing today.

Wider points have been made about confidence. At the outset, Danny Kennedy stressed that his party is opposed to the devolution of policing and justice at this stage. In particular, he raised the spectre of the problems of dissident republicans and said that it would be unwise to devolve policing and justice at the moment. Holding back the devolution of policing and justice plays into the hands of dissident republicans. The Ulster Unionists need to reflect seriously on why they find themselves in common cause with the dissident republicans on that agenda. That is a sobering reality that they have to face up to. Dissident republicans will feed propaganda about devolution not being in local hands and being under the control of the British state. It is important that we undermine any arguments that are being used by dissident republicans and allow the security forces to deal with the continued threat that they pose.

Mr Kennedy: In an earlier media broadcast, Dr Farry described the Ulster Unionist Party as a "can't do" party. It seems that the Alliance Party cannot do enough to please the DUP and Sinn Féin in order to get the feet of one of its Members — not necessarily Dr

Farry's — under the ministerial table. Any linkage, or suggestion of there being common cause, between us and republican dissidents or paramilitaries is offensive. The Member has made a foolish and regrettable statement against the Ulster Unionist Party on his own behalf and on behalf of his party. He should be ashamed of himself.

Dr Farry: It may not be a deliberate and co-ordinated agenda, but the two parties share a common objective, which is to frustrate the devolution of policing and justice. It is clear that that is what the dissident republicans want to achieve, and the Ulster Unionist Party has said here today that it wants to frustrate the devolution of policing and justice. Therefore, they are working to the same objective.

Mr Kennedy: For the avoidance of doubt, the Ulster Unionist Party's position is that, in principle, we favour devolution. We have worked hard to create the right conditions in which to devolve policing and justice. We are different from the Alliance Party in that it wants to rush the devolution of policing and justice before it is dealt with properly, and we are significantly different from the dissident republicans because they do not want it under any conditions. Those are the clear differences between the Ulster Unionist Party and the Alliance Party and republican dissidents.

Dr Farry: It is over 10 years since the Good Friday Agreement, so we are hardly rushing the devolution of policing and justice; it has been a long-standing objective for many people. The Ulster Unionist Party says that it supports the devolution of policing and justice, but when does it want it to happen? The issue is a dot on the horizon that seems to be going further and further away rather than coming closer to us. They have to reflect upon that.

With regard to confidence and coalitions, I remind Mr Kennedy that not only is the Ulster Unionist Party a part of the four-party mandatory coalition; it is also a member of another coalition with the Conservative Party, as part of UCUNF.

Mr Kennedy: So is Ian Parsley.

Dr Farry: Indeed, and you are welcome to him — [Interruption.]

The central point with that arrangement is that the Conservative Party is committed to devolving policing and justice powers to Northern Ireland today — as of now. Indeed, I have spoken to Owen Paterson about that issue and he has assured me that that is the case. Therefore, the Ulster Unionist Party and the Conservative Party are in coalition, yet on one of the most significant issues facing the devolution settlement, they are at odds with each other. If Danny Kennedy has said that the Alliance Party is naive for championing the devolution of policing and justice, what has he said to David Cameron and Owen Paterson, whose position is the same as ours?

I have a number of comments to make in relation to the method of electing the new justice Minister, which is at the heart of the Bill. The Alliance Party welcomes the fact that a cross-community vote will be used to elect the new Minister. Indeed, my party has been advocating that approach for some time. That approach sends out a powerful signal, because a cross-community vote demonstrates that all sections of the House have given their assent to whoever is appointed to the post, and that backing from all quarters of the Chamber also sends out an important signal of legitimacy for any Minister. “All quarters” may be a step too far given some of the comments that have been made during the debate today, and “two sides of the Chamber” may be more apt, but cross-community support is something that we should all welcome.

The opposite of that cross-community support for the new Minister would be the continued use of the d’Hondt methodology, which allows Ministers to essentially pick their portfolios based on a randomly generated list. That process does not add to power sharing or legitimacy; rather, it leads to a system of carve-up whereby the spoils of office are handed out to different parties. Furthermore, the connectivity in the system is weak at best, and, as a result, Ministers are very powerful in their own fiefdoms, and are able to impose their own party political agendas on policies, rather than reflecting the consensus of the House. One example of that non-consensus is demonstrated in our education system. At least four parties in the House have called on the Department to avoid the current anarchical situation in relation to the 11-plus by introducing some form of interim testing. However, the Sinn Féin Minister of Education has her own ideas, which prevail over the overwhelming democratic wish of the Chamber, and thus of our society. Similarly, four parties also supported the creation of an independent environmental protection agency, but the DUP, the party that controls the Department of the Environment, did not support that view, and that agency was not created.

That is not democratic, and it does not reflect power sharing. Power sharing means parties coming together to compromise and work through difficult issues and produce shared outcomes. That is not what we have at the moment, and the d’Hondt system contributes to that.

The d’Hondt system is not an underlying principle of the Good Friday Agreement, which is about power sharing and proportionality. There is a whole host of means of achieving proportionality, and d’Hondt is only one method. D’Hondt produces many anomalies, and, in fact, produces a very strange system of proportionality —

Mr Campbell: I thank the Member for giving way, and I am glad that he has raised that issue. In some areas of Northern Ireland, district policing partnerships were appointed on the basis of d’Hondt, and in Londonderry, where the unionist community make up 22% of the elected members of the council, unionist members received only 10% of the seats because d’Hondt was used. Does the Member agree with me that d’Hondt is not the precise mechanism that some try to make it out to be?

Dr Farry: I agree entirely with the Member’s comment; it is a very good example. I will also refer to the elections to the Northern Ireland Forum in 1996 in which no unionists were returned in the Foyle constituency. The mirror image of that was the Lagan Valley constituency, where there is a considerable non-unionist population. In the same election, five unionists were returned in that constituency, which was not a proportional outcome.

Let us look at the central example. Due to the way in which the first mandate of the Assembly worked out mathematically, the d’Hondt system produced an equal number of unionists and nationalists in the Executive. In subsequent elections, the overall number of nationalist seats in the Chamber has increased. However, using the d’Hondt method of so-called proportionality, the ratio in the Executive is 60:40, unionist and nationalist. How can a so-called proportional system produce such a bizarre result?

The anomalies that Mr Campbell referred to, and that I have mentioned, appear when the d’Hondt method is used right across the system. When it is applied to a small number of individuals, it produces very bizarre results: therefore, we need to be acutely aware of the limitations of that system.

If we were to run the d’Hondt system for the justice Ministry, the notion that it would be left to the last pick and that the party that qualified next for a seat would automatically get that Ministry is a major fallacy. We must recognise that policing and justice will be one of the most important Departments for this society, and I would be stunned if it were left to the end. If we were to use the d’Hondt system, we would have to rerun it completely, and I imagine that policing and justice would be one of the first Departments to be chosen, if not the first.

I welcome a move away from using the d’Hondt system. A useful message can be sent out that there is a different way of providing power sharing and legitimacy in this society. I have ambitions to see a voluntary coalition established in the Chamber. A voluntary coalition is consistent with power sharing under the Good Friday Agreement, and any party would be eligible to be part of such a voluntary coalition, including Sinn Féin. However, it would provide greater coherence of policymaking in advance and greater collectivity. Having said that, I realise that this is not a Trojan Horse for a voluntary coalition, and I reassure Sinn Féin on that point. I wish that it were otherwise, but it is not. We will have to have that debate on another day. I am aware that a number of parties are interested in having such discussions. I stress that different methods are consistent with the underlying principles of the Good Friday Agreement: it is not a threat to that agreement. What happened in 1998 was never meant to be set in stone for perpetuity; we must evolve with the times to meet the needs of a changing society.

The Alliance Party has been referred to a lot in relation to the post, and we have heard the speculation in the media. However, we had not heard the comment from Martina Anderson, and we will let her off the hook on that one.

Ms Anderson: Totally untrue.

Dr Farry: I accept what Martina Anderson says about it being untrue, for different perspectives, and we probably share that analysis.

The Alliance Party wants to see the devolution of policing and justice, irrespective of who takes the post, as it is important for our society. The Alliance Party has always looked to the wider interests of the people of Northern Ireland and has always tried to be constructive. The Alliance Party does not look to its own internal interests only: it has a wider concern. However, in the event that the post is offered to a member of the Alliance Party, or if one of its members is proposed for the post, it will need to reflect on whether what is being put forward is in the best interests of the people of Northern Ireland. I want to make it clear that that is far from automatic.

The Alliance Party has a number of concerns about the way in which the issue is being taken forward. Although we support the legislation and the methodology put forward for the election of a Minister, a number of implications arise as a result of that and it is right that they are put on the record. We feel that those concerns should be addressed between the point of the legislation being passed in the House and devolution eventually coming.

First, the method of electing a Minister is the mirror image of the method for the removal of a Minister; it is done by a cross-community vote in the Chamber, as established by the Westminster legislation. At present, the terms of removal of any Minister are left wide open and are not defined. No criteria have to be met for the removal of a Minister. That would leave a potential Minister somewhat exposed and open to being removed from office by a cross-community vote in the Chamber, although parties might come to that vote from entirely different angles.

It is important to respect that any justice Minister will have to take a number of very tough decisions, particularly over sensitive matters. That Minister must have the freedom to do that. No Minister should be given a blank cheque and allowed to do things without accountability, but there must be some protection against a situation wherein Ministers are routinely removed from office through a cross-community vote. Although some might say that a Minister from the same party may well be reappointed, a situation involving a series of mini crises is not in the interest of stability. A stop/start situation is never in the interest of any Department. In the context of policing and justice, where important decisions have to be taken, it is important to have stability.

I also want to stress the point that I made earlier about confidence being an ongoing issue. Building confidence is not something that happens in a day; it is an ongoing process. It is important that, when devolution does happen, irrespective of which party holds the post, there is an active agenda for the Minister of justice, the Executive and Assembly in relation to what they do on the different issues. Confidence will come when the Assembly is able to prove to the people of Northern Ireland that justice can make a real difference to their lives. We cannot have a situation in which devolution happens and we are then in an almost free situation until the 2012 deadline comes along, at which stage we try to renegotiate a different way of doing things. That first number of months and years will be critical to how the issue is going to be moved forward.

Similarly, returning to the issue of confidence and the ability of a Minister to deliver, I take on board Dolores Kelly's point about the problems in the Executive. It is important that any Minister is not pulled in a number of different directions by the big parties in the Executive and there is an understanding of the need for a Minister to move ahead with actions.

Mr A Maginness: The Member raised an interesting point about accountability to the Assembly on a cross-community basis and the possibility of removing a Minister through a cross-community vote. That situation would not arise were the Minister appointed under d'Hondt. That reinforces the value of d'Hondt, because d'Hondt prevents vetoes.

Dr Farry: My point is that the system outlined in the Bill is, to our minds, the lesser of two evils. The d'Hondt system, as I have already outlined, is completely flawed and creates a situation in which Ministers have no accountability whatsoever. A lot of the anomalies that I have mentioned so far in my critique of the methods set out in the Bill would be addressed and removed if there were a purely voluntary coalition. However, we do not have such a coalition; that is not on the table at this stage and I accept that. While recognising that a cross-community vote is the better way of doing things, we are also quite right to point out the potential drawbacks and negative implications of that. It is then important that we turn our minds to overcoming those potential pitfalls.

The Alliance Party's conclusion is that it is important that parties discuss policy issues regarding policing and justice as far in advance of devolution as possible. The greater consensus there is in the House on what should be done on policing and justice in those critical initial months and years, the better placed we will be and the less likely it will be that there are crises and political fallout.

I fully accept that events will happen that will create major difficulties for any Minister, the Executive and the Assembly, but the more planning that is done in advance and the greater the policy discussions that take place on what can be done under devolution, the greater the chance of minimising the risks of those things happening. Our party leader, David Ford, has written to the other party leaders in the Chamber to seek discussions on those issues, notwithstanding who the Minister will be. I stress that that issue is open to the House. Given our concern that devolution must happen and that it must be done right so that it delivers, the discussions regarding policy are critical and they need to start as soon as possible, if not now.

Mr M McGuinness: Will the Member agree that the point that was raised about d'Hondt is an interesting one, specifically because it came from the SDLP? The SDLP has argued that, in the interests of inclusivity, a proposal should be put to the Executive and the Assembly that a justice Minister be appointed under the d'Hondt mechanisms. Is the Member aware of any occasion during Seamus Mallon's or Mark Durkan's time as deputy First Minister when any such proposal was put to the Alliance Party? No such proposal was made to Sinn Féin.

Dr Farry: I am certainly not aware of that happening. Much progress was made on the reform of policing under Patten, but devolution was always the big issue that was left. I welcome the progress on the issue, and we are now on the brink of the critical moment when devolution is agreed.

Alban Maginness stressed the importance of inclusivity. The system of designations in the Chamber requires the Alliance Party to designate as "other" because it is not a unionist party or a nationalist party. Our votes, therefore, count for less when a cross-community vote is taken. How is that voting system inclusive? Is the SDLP saying that it is in favour of inclusivity but that the votes of unionists and nationalists are more inclusive than those of the Alliance Party, the Green Party, Kieran Deeny and the people who we represent? The subject of inclusivity must be considered from a wider perspective to ensure that all voices in the Chamber count equally, because, at present, they do not.

Mr Campbell: A considerable amount of effort has been expended in discussing the timing of the devolution of policing and justice. I am somewhat surprised by the pronouncements from the SDLP and the Ulster Unionist Party, because no matter when the devolution of policing and justice occurs, the step that is being taken today must be taken, whether it is taken this year, next year or the year after that. It is necessary that a set of stages be undertaken, and the Second Stage of the Bill is one of them. I would have thought that everyone who supports the devolution of policing and justice would support a necessary stage in the Justice Bill being enacted. There is no serious opposition to the principle of devolving powers, as Mr Kennedy and others said.

For the DUP's part, we have stated that both cash and confidence is needed for the powers to be devolved. The fact is that neither of those is currently in place. The physical act of proceeding to accomplish devolution receives setbacks when Sinn Féin and others keep trying to bring the date forward when neither of the two criteria has been met. The public have not been made aware of the possible additional resources that would be required if the dissident threat were to continue at the present level or if the situation were to worsen. That is in addition to what the public are only too well aware of: the less than adequate Sinn Féin response over the summer to, for example, the closing of Mountpottinger police station; its attitude and response to the burning of Orange Halls in rural areas; and its attitude to Loyal Order parades. All those issues set back community confidence rather than bring it forward.

That is not to say that progress has not been made; we must keep reiterating that: progress has been made. Sinn Féin is in a different place now than it was five, 10 or 20 years ago. The key is to ensure that it continues to make progress. My party intends to do that.

During the past few months, Sinn Féin has allowed the briefing of journalists to continue, which indicates that it will raise the stakes on policing and justice in the autumn. In the short term, it would be disadvantageous for that party to pursue the dangerous game of edging the Assembly towards the so-called political abyss, as it did in 2008. Sinn Féin, and everyone else, knows what happened then.

Sinn Féin's pursuit of that agenda, in the mistaken belief that it might force another impasse that, this time, will be followed by an Assembly election, could have the doubly negative effect for that party of precipitating the required change that is needed in the designation and underlying system in the Assembly before it could resume.

Let no one be under any illusion: the political realities in Northern Ireland in autumn 2009 are similar to how they will be in 18 months' time. Therefore, my party sees no big distinction in facing an Assembly election in autumn 2009 or in 18 months' time.

Mr O'Dowd: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Although it might be interesting to explore the dark recesses of Gregory Campbell's mind, I am at a loss as to what any of that has to do with the Bill's principles.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Thank you for that point of order, Mr O'Dowd. I remind Members to stick to the subject, which is the Department of Justice Bill.

Mr Campbell: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. I note the total irrelevance of that point of order. However —

Mr O'Dowd: Further to that point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Does the Member suggest that your ruling was incorrect and that my point of order was not a point of order at all? I am sure that I would not rely on a ruling from him, the muppet.

Mr Campbell: As I said, the facts are what they are. People who believe that those facts will change will find that they are mistaken.

The changes to which I have referred are necessary. It would be deeply unfortunate if the wider community had to go through another impasse in order to arrive at a destination that will have to be reached in any case.

It is pointless and counterproductive to keep falsely raising people's hopes and expectations that the criteria for the devolution of policing and justice will be met soon, when everyone in the Chamber knows that that simply will not happen in the immediate future. However much we might like it to be the case, and must work towards its being the case, it is not the case at present.

In the past, in the wider political realm of requiring Sinn Féin's support for the police and courts before proceeding to establish a system of government, it has been proven that insisting on such criteria is better for everyone in the long run. Even if that necessitates those of us who want to do the right thing and get the right deal being lambasted yet again, we intend to keep doing that.

If Sinn Féin is serious, the job of Martin McGuinness and other senior representatives in that party is to convince me and hundreds of thousands of others by their actions, not by their words, that they can agree and deal with the perfectly reasonable and legitimate criteria that we have set out. At that point, the Assembly can move forward with the entire community's confidence. I support the Bill.

12.30 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has arranged to meet immediately upon the lunchtime suspension. I therefore propose, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the sitting until 2.00 pm.

The sitting was suspended at 12.31 pm.

On resuming (Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Molloy] in the Chair) —

2.00 pm

Ms Anderson: Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I declare an interest as a member of the Policing Board.

Arrangements are in place for the process to deliver policing and justice powers into the hands of locally elected politicians. The Bill represents the fact that the process is moving forward. Key stages in that process have already been implemented, including the Assembly and Executive Review Committee's report and legislation that has passed through the Executive and on to the Assembly. Undoubtedly, there is more work to be done, and we heard reference to that today, not least the securing of a suitable financial package and arrangements post-2012. I note the First Minister's positive comments last night, when he said that significant progress had been made on the financial package, and I wish him and his deputy, Martin McGuinness, well in their efforts to secure a financial package.

A sunset clause makes it imperative for all of us to secure agreement post-2012, particularly as a local Minister would do a better job than a British Minister. Many in our society would concur with that. The SDLP flagged up the issue of the sunset clause; I remind its members that they said that the sunset clause in the St Andrew's Agreement was a success and claimed credit for it. Whatever the truth about that claim, the SDLP's 2007 manifesto stated:

"Above all, we have ensured a sunset clause — so that the DUP will not get any of the changes conceded by others to the workings of the Agreement if they do not go into Government by 26 March 2007."

So, the SDLP does agree, in principle, to sunset clauses. If a sunset clause is the mechanism that we need to secure the devolution of policing and justice, there is no more important time than now to support it. However, the SDLP may have changed its mind, because after that manifesto assertion, the former, or current, leader — whatever sort of leader the SDLP has — talked about the ugly scaffolding of the Good Friday Agreement and how it should be dismantled. That was news to me, and it was news to the Alliance Party.

I see Dolores Kelly coming into the Chamber. Earlier, she claimed that I said that the Alliance Party should get the policing and justice ministerial position. I want to make my position clear. I took part in a radio interview with the leader of the Alliance Party in which I said that his party should not assume that it will get the ministerial post. I have also stated that Sinn Féin supports the allocation of the ministerial post to the SDLP.

At this juncture, it is important to remind all the parties that supported the 1998 Act, which emanated from the Good Friday Agreement, of its detail. Section 17(4) of that Act states:

"The number of Ministerial offices shall not exceed 10 or such greater number as the Secretary of State may by order provide."

Section 17(5) states:

"A determination under subsection (1) shall not have effect unless it is approved by a resolution of the Assembly passed with cross-community support."

That was agreed by all the nationalist parties in the Assembly and some of the unionist parties.

I understand that some parties have difficulties with the arrangements for appointing a Minister. However, what is proposed is a temporary measure, necessary to move the process forward. It is Sinn Féin's position that, post-2012, the process should refer to d'Hondt.

That notwithstanding, Sinn Féin and the DUP have shown great leadership by saying that we do not intend to nominate at this point. In taking that position, we are prepared to set aside our party interests in the interests of all the people of the North.

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Member agree that those two parties are being generous in setting aside not only their own selfish party interests but in setting aside nationalists' interests, because the Member is saying that under the procedures of this legislation, no nationalist need apply for the ministry of justice?

Ms Anderson: No; that is totally wrong. The Member was not in the Chamber when I quoted the SDLP manifesto with regard to the principle of a sunset clause, so it is worth repeating:

"Above all, we have ensured a sunset clause — so that the DUP will not get any of the changes conceded by others to the workings of the Agreement if they do not go into Government by 26 March 2007."

The SDLP was quite prepared to accept and support the principle of a sunset clause in those circumstances.

We should not forget that some of the parties that criticised the process are the same parties that said that the transfer of policing and justice could never happen. They did nothing to bring it about, and now that it is happening, they prefer to snipe from the sidelines rather than admit to their failures. Whatever they say, however, the transfer of policing and justice powers from London into the hands of locally elected politicians is part of the St Andrews Agreement. It is not an optional extra; it is a British Government obligation.

The people are demanding a justice system that delivers for everyone in the North regardless of religious denomination or political affiliation. They are sick and tired of the revolving-door justice system that allows hoods and thugs back onto the street hours after being arrested. [Laughter.] Members may find that funny, but people in the North are very concerned about the judiciary and the kind of sentences that are being meted out.

It strikes me as odd, when one considers what has happened in our society, that some parties oppose a statutory framework being put in place as a result of the transfer of policing and justice powers to allow people access to a local Minister. That is crucial. I would like the SDLP to clarify — because I was a little confused about their contribution — whether it supports the Bill. I know that Dolores Kelly will speak on the debate, and I am sure that Alex Attwood will clarify the situation, because when the OFMDFM Committee dealt with the issue last Wednesday, the SDLP member voted with the rest of us. The only Committee members who did not vote for this crucial Bill were from the UUP, although I thought that they indicated this morning that they opposed the Bill. Therefore it would be extremely helpful if the SDLP provided clarification.

Mr A Maskey: Perhaps the parties that oppose the Bill could explain to the rest of us how they intend to bring about the transfer of policing and justice powers. It is all very well criticising us on those matters, but it would be more relevant if those parties told us how they would seek to do that rather than just talk about it.

Ms Anderson: I agree with the Member, and hopefully, by the end of the debate —

Mr B McCrea: Does the Member agree that more than just a two-party coalition should be talking about these issues and that all parties should be involved, that all parties should be aware of any deals that are on offer, and that if we had open and transparent discussions in this place, we might get somewhere?

Ms Anderson: The Member should talk to his party leader about that. If he had been here earlier — [Interruption.] I would say to you that UUP members are on the Assembly and Executive Review Committee and on the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister, which the Bill has been proceeding through. It is our role to scrutinise the Bill.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. I ask all Members to make their remarks through the Chair.

Ms Anderson: I am sorry about that. The Member knows that there is UUP representation in the forums that I listed.

People have had enough. They have had enough of seeing death drivers walk free on bail, able to continue to attack our communities, whether that happens in the Shankill, the Falls, the Bogside or anywhere else. A lot of people are very sickened by the revolving-door sentencing policy of the type of judiciary that has been in place for a long time. Following the transfer of policing and justice powers to the Assembly, the statutory framework governing what constitutes a crime and what appropriate penalties should be put in place will become the responsibility of the Assembly's justice Minister. Sexual offences, for example, could be dealt with more appropriately in that framework. That is what people in our society want.

We accept, without doubt, that there are issues that we still need to resolve, discuss and engage with each other on. We must use the time ahead to secure the consensus that is needed. The process is moving ahead. That is the reality, and I think that people will be very grateful for that. In common with many other things, the process will move on with or without the UUP or the SDLP. That will happen, regardless of whether they vote against the motion; however, as I said earlier, I was a bit confused by what happened in the OFMDFM Committee last week. Those parties now face a choice.

Mr Attwood: I was going to respond at the end of the debate. However, given that the Member has raised the matter for a second time, I must interrupt. I know that she is quite new to politics, especially legislative politics, and, therefore, perhaps does not quite understand Committee procedures. The procedures are simply that a Committee decides to vote in favour of consideration of a Bill, and it then votes in favour of consulting and taking evidence on that Bill. Voting in favour of a discussion of a Bill is very different from voting in the Assembly to reject a Bill.

If the Member cannot understand that difference, I refer her to the Committee on Procedures, to any of the Committee Clerks, or to anybody else in the Assembly who knows fully the difference between a vote in the Assembly and a procedural vote at a Committee to allow legislation to be considered. If the Member has not learned that much in two and a half years, that says a lot.

Ms Anderson: The Member had ample opportunity at the Committee to raise any —

The First Minister: It seems that even those who have been around for more than two and a half years do not quite understand the purpose of the debate. This is a Second Stage debate, which is the equivalent of a Second Reading debate in the House of Commons. The purpose of the debate is to consider the general principles of the Bill, not the details of the Bill, which can be amended at Committee Stage. The principles that we are dealing with is whether a Department of justice should be set up and whether a mechanism should be in place in to appoint a justice Minister. Those are the two principles of the Bill; the mechanisms can be dealt with, if necessary, by amendment at the Committee Stage. It is the Committee that has to deal with the detail; this debate deals with the principles. On the basis of what the SDLP said, I thought that it agreed with the principles of the Bill.

Ms Anderson: I thank the First Minister for his intervention, and I agree with him. Those of us who sit on the OFMDFM Committee with the SDLP would have expected to hear opposition or concerns raised about the Department of Justice Bill. However, there was no utterance whatever from the SDLP.

Those parties opposing the Bill now face a choice. They can either continue to ignore the political reality or they can become involved in the process and play a constructive and meaningful role in building the sort of justice system that people are demanding and that they deserve. Go raibh míle maith agat.

2.15 pm

Mr Moutray: I welcome the opportunity to speak during the Second Stage of the Department of Justice Bill. The devolution of policing and justice powers is a prevalent issue, and I welcome the fact that the Bill is before the House today.

The Department of Justice Bill puts in place the framework to progress towards the transfer of policing and justice powers. It goes without saying that policing and justice is one of the most important issues that our society faces. If devolved, we will have responsibility for several issues that we do not currently have responsibility for, many of which are of particular concern to people in our community.

At this stage, it is important to note that my party's position on the devolution of policing and justice powers has been very clear. We, as a party, will insist that there be no devolution of policing and justice powers until all our conditions have been met, particularly on community confidence, Treasury financing and other issues. Although, owing to the complexity of its architecture and structure, massive issues have been overcome, the Bill will serve two purposes: first, it will allow, at some stage, for the creation of a Department of justice; and, secondly, it will make arrangements to enable the appointment of a justice Minister. However, both elements will not happen until the conditions laid out by my party have been met. Furthermore, I welcome the fact that the Bill in no way states a specific time frame for devolution. Its three clauses are a result of work carried out by the Assembly and Executive Review Committee and by the First Minister and the deputy First Minister.

The content of clause 1 is logical. If the conditions that the DUP has outlined are met, I will welcome the establishment of a Department of justice, which will be responsible mainly for the devolvment of policing and justice powers. Devolution is a long-term requirement, as it was for all the other Northern Ireland Departments.

I have heard others in the Chamber complain about an issue in clause 2, and, to be honest, their argument is flawed. Quite simply, the arrangements in the Bill for appointing a Minister of justice are clearly different from those used to appoint other Executive Ministers. I have heard much reference to the Belfast Agreement, which envisaged that all ministerial portfolios would be allocated under d'Hondt and that a cross-community vote would be used to elect the First Minister and the deputy First Minister. Those Members who have complained must realise that what was negotiated as part of the Belfast Agreement was rewritten in the St Andrews Agreement, which ensured that the DUP had a veto over when devolution of policing and justice powers would take place. The party also ensured a veto over who the Minister would be, by virtue of the fact that the appointment of a justice Minister will require cross-community support.

On clause 3, some Members are obsessed with setting a date for the devolution of policing and justice powers. Again, my party's view is that, for the institutions to succeed, it is essential that the financial resources be made available and that the public have confidence in how the institutions will operate. It is, therefore, important that the necessary safeguards be put in place to ensure that cross-community support exists. That is why our party leader has stated that he will seek discussions on the confidence issue with the leaders of all the parties in the House.

Finally, much work must be done on the issue, and it is not a case of setting dates. The Bill is an important element in the devolution process. However, it will not give effect to devolution. It will, in essence, pave a path for other essential legislation in the process towards the implementation of devolution. Our party believes that conditions need to be fulfilled before any devolution; the triple lock will inhibit that end until they are fulfilled. The Bill in no way expedites the process to devolve policing and justice powers but is merely one of several essential pieces of legislation that are needed to give effect to devolution.

It is my position, and that of my party, that devolution should be accompanied by adequate resources and community confidence. Today is a demonstration of how we are working in good faith towards that goal. I support the Bill's being granted its Second Stage.

Mr McFarland: I declare an interest as a member of the Assembly and Executive Review Committee.

Before I put these matters in context, it is worth pointing out that colleagues talked earlier about how important it is to devolve policing. However, policing has been devolved to the Assembly and to Northern Ireland since 2001; it has been here for eight years. We should remind ourselves that the Policing Board looks after the buildings, finance and personnel for policing in Northern Ireland, while the Chief Constable is independent and responsible for operational matters. That is all here and has been in place for eight years.

The Court Service is being turned into an agency before its responsibilities are devolved, and the judiciary is independent and makes its own rules according to United Kingdom-wide norms. Despite what Ms Anderson might wish, the thought that a justice Minister — from the Alliance Party or otherwise — would be able to interfere with the judicial system when policing and justice are devolved, is a serious proposal even from Sinn Féin.

Mr A Maskey: At no time did Martina Anderson, or anyone else, suggest that. The Member should reflect on what Martina Anderson actually said. Earlier, I made it clear that the twin pillars of the justice system were democratic accountability and the independence of the judiciary. That is the clear position of our members. With all due respect to Alan McFarland, what Martina Anderson was reflecting on was that, in the context of the transfer of powers, the Assembly and the wider public would have an opportunity to input into those matters; it was not that they would be able to take away from the independence of the judiciary.

Mr McFarland: The Member has heard what he has heard; no doubt the Hansard report will reflect what I suggested.

Mr B McCrea: I am not sure that I heard Ms Anderson's point properly, but I think that I heard her talk about the sentencing of sex offenders and how the justice Minister would have an input into that. I wonder whether Mr McFarland finds that surprising, given the independence of the Parole Commissioners for Northern Ireland, which is the sentencing review body. In reference to Alex Maskey's intervention, how can there be input without it affecting independence?

Mr McFarland: My colleague has made good points; Members will be able to reflect on those issues in due course. I will move on.

The Minister, therefore, is left with making policy. As we know, the law can only be changed by bringing forward new legislation to the Assembly. In the end, the Assembly has a say in what the Minister can bring into law. The Bill paves the way for the devolution of policing and justice, but the key question, which my colleagues have referred to today, is whether we are ready. Are the Assembly and the Executive ready for the devolution of policing and justice? At the moment we have a DUP/Sinn Féin axis in the Executive that is not inclusive, despite what they say. Two parties in the Executive are left out of most decisions, and the DUP and Sinn Féin go into a huddle before Executive meetings to decide how they are going to operate. There is no consultation in the Executive.

Those of us who are members of the Assembly and Executive Review Committee know that when the time came to make moves, they were driven through by Sinn Féin and the DUP against the opposition of other parties here. However, such moves only happen when that axis can reach an agreement. Mostly, of course, the relationship is totally dysfunctional. We had over 150 days of paralysis. Just to refresh Member's memories as to why that happened, the DUP would not do as it was told on policing, so Sinn Féin called the whole thing to a halt until November 2008, when the DUP agreed to do what it was told on policing. It was then that we had the famous Robinson/McGuinness letter.

Mr A Maskey: When are you going to address the Bill?

Mr Deputy Speaker: I remind Members to make their remarks through the Chair.

Mr McFarland: What other evidence does the Assembly need that this edifice that we have is unstable?

Let us examine those policing and justice issues that have been pushed through the Executive. The method of selection of the justice Minister is a corruption of a system that has stood us well since the formation of the Assembly. We may not like it, but it is our system. It is called d'Hondt, and under that system, each party gets a turn at choosing which ministry it wants and the party leader gets to choose how long that person stays in that job. The d'Hondt system stops other parties interfering with what is going on. It is a tried-and-tested method, and we mess around with it at our peril.

If we want to devolve policing and justice and create a new Department, we should use a system that works: we should run d'Hondt again. The justice Department will be very important, and colleagues made the point that some parties may want to choose that Department ahead of others.

Ms Anderson: I remind the Member that his party supported the 1998 Act. He was not in the Chamber earlier when I quoted directly from section 17, subsections 4 and 5 of the 1998 Act, which state:

"(4) The number of Ministerial offices shall not exceed 10 or such greater number as the Secretary of State may by order provide.

(5) A determination under subsection (1) shall not have effect unless it is approved by a resolution of the Assembly passed with cross-community support."

That is what the Member, and others, agreed to, and he should reflect on that. It was in the 1998 Act, and it is relevant.

Mr McFarland: I pride myself on being fairly astute, but I am completely baffled as to what that was about. [Laughter.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Mr McFarland has the Floor.

Mr McFarland: An additional Department is being created. Logically, d'Hondt should be run again, and each party, according to its strength, will get to nominate to the Department that it wants. That is the standard system. We disagree with the SDLP: just because it is next in line to make a nomination under d'Hondt does not mean that the justice portfolio should be its for the asking. If we are to have this extra important Department, we should run d'Hondt again so that every party would have a choice.

Mrs D Kelly: At no time has the SDLP stated that it was opposed to the rerunning of d'Hondt. Does the Member agree that under the rerunning of d'Hondt, the SDLP would have two Departments?

Mr McFarland: The choice of the honourable Member's colleagues on the Assembly and Executive Review Committee was that the justice portfolio would be added on to the end since the SDLP was next in line to nominate. That was the SDLP's position. Our position was that d'Hondt should be run again.

Earlier, we discussed why the DUP or Sinn Féin should or should not nominate to the justice Department; they made the right decision in not doing so. The logic is perfectly obvious: can you imagine a senior member of the IRA army council who had been serving life sentences in jail for murder and who was released under the Good Friday Agreement becoming our policing and justice Minister? Can you imagine the chaos that that would cause?

I know from discussions with Sinn Féin over the years that it views some DUP colleagues as having a similar ability to give impartial justice. I understand why those parties do not want to have that Department, but why should the Alliance Party have it? It appears that the Alliance Party is being chosen because the DUP and Sinn Féin want a tame Minister. We have no agreement on the links between the Minister, the Executive and the Assembly because the politburo is trying to concoct a system whereby it can wheel the tame Alliance Minister in for policing and justice matters and promptly wheel them out again when any important Executive business arises so that they do not interfere with the balance of power in the Executive.

I do not know how the Alliance Party feels, but it seems to be a slightly daft way of agreeing to operate, if that is what they have agreed to.

Dr Farry: The Member talks of a huge conspiracy, but he should read the legislation. The Northern Ireland Act 2009 states that the Minister, irrespective of their party, will be a full member of the Executive — there will be no wheeling in or out. The issue was settled in Westminster legislation that was supported by the Conservative Party.

Mr McFarland: The Member will find that that is not the conception that the politburo has.
[Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr McFarland: However, let us dwell on the Alliance Party for a moment: so much for it being Her Majesty's principled opposition. We have been hefted for two years by the Alliance Party as its being the only party of opposition. Purity is their call: they are the only people holding the entire Executive to account. How good it is that they are prepared to sacrifice themselves for the good of Ulster. What a decent thing to do; to sacrifice one's principles for Ulster.

It is worth reminding ourselves that the 154-day logjam was broken by the Robinson/McGuinness letter of November 2008 that produced a detailed timescale. One of the things that struck me at that time about the letter was that it got round to discussing public confidence in a blurred way. Its bottom line on that point was that public confidence will exist when Peter and Martin decide it exists. On careful reading, that is what the letter means: public confidence will exist when the First Minister and the deputy First Minister decide it exists.

Mr Hamilton: I have seen the timetable to which the Member refers. It is actually a list of 37 points or processes that need to be gone through. Will he enlighten me and the rest of the House by pointing out one exact date or time in that process paper? I am sure that he will not be able to, if previous experience is anything to go by.

Mr McFarland: I cannot. [Interruption]. However, I can point out that several of the Member's colleagues said that it would be an entire political lifetime or ten political lifetimes. [Interruption]. Barking, or what?

Mr B McCrea: Does the Member care to hazard a guess, in years, about how long a political lifetime might be?

Mr McFarland: It will be interesting to see how long the elected lifetime of the DUP will be, given the current rise of the TUV.

I want to move to the outstanding issues. On finance, it looks as though we are getting somewhere. As many Members around the House have said, that is absolutely vital. If we do not get the finances right, we can pack up and go home. We also have a major issue that has not yet been highlighted over parades. There is no room for error. If we do not tie that issue down and get a set of rules with which we can all operate and with which we are all happy, there will be no point in having policing and justice. Every summer, the parading issue will rise up and bite whoever the Minister may be.

The third issue is a pet one of mine, the Eames/Bradley Consultative Group on the Past. My view is that we need to leave this back with the NIO to deal with and pay for. At the moment, although the NIO is keeping responsibility for inquiries, it is trying to move the Eames/Bradley work over with policing and justice. In my view, that would be an absolute disaster. Trying to deal with the past is something could haunt us for 50 years. We will have enough trouble in accepting policing and justice in its current form. If we accept the Eames/Bradley work into this House, we will never get policing and justice going in a sensible way.

The Ulster Unionist Party supports the devolution of policing and justice, but not yet. There is a lovely Civil Service axiom, “the doctrine of unripe time”, which, if one thinks about it, is quite clever. The time is not right for doing this.

Ms Ní Chuilín: It is worth reminding the Member that on 21 October 2000, David Trimble, the Member’s former party colleague, or perhaps he still is the Member’s party colleague, said:

“I can think of nothing better to give everyone confidence, and to bind all the community behind law enforcement, than to see the central political policy direction of the criminal justice system – including policing – in the hands of Seamus Mallon and I, and our successors.”

I will leave that with the Member.

Mr McFarland: I agree. We are keen for policing and justice powers to be devolved. Indeed, as has been mentioned, our party brought down the entire edifice over policing and justice. There is no point in accepting the proposals if the structure at the top is completely dysfunctional and wobbly and if every serious challenge, on every issue from education onwards, causes a complete furore. What chance do we have if we bring about the devolution of policing and justice now?

2.30 pm

Mr Cobain: Do they know what they were saying in 2000 or in 1998 or in 1997?

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. I have reminded Members a few times already that all remarks should be made through the Chair. Mr McFarland has the Floor.

Mr McFarland: The proposals that are being put forward today would mean that Peter and Martin could sack the Alliance Minister the moment he or she does not do as he or she is told. The system for electing the Minister of justice will be down to the two largest parties in the House, and the system for removing that Minister will also be down to the two largest parties. The Minister of justice will be a puppet Minister, subject to the whims of Peter and Martin. The Minister of justice will be out as soon as he or she does not do as he or she is told. Imagine an Alliance Minister trying to stand up to the politburo here in a disagreement about parades or how to deal with the dissidents.

On ‘The Stephen Nolan Show’, on the radio this morning, Mr Alex Maskey said that it was dreadful that police were stopping people around the countryside. A member of the Policing Board is complaining about the police stopping people in their attempt to deal with the dissident threat. As justice Minister, what chance would “Lord” Farry or “Lord” Ford have of dealing with such issues on the Floor of the House if the two largest parties disagreed with their methods?

Dr Farry: In his opening remarks, the Member made a great play of the importance of the operational independence of the police and the other agencies that are involved in taking decisions on the ground. Rather than contradicting himself, can he make up his mind on what point he is making?

Mr McFarland: The point that I am making is that, at some stage, the justice Minister may wish to give advice on a policy decision to the Policing Board and the Chief Constable. The Chief Constable does not have to listen to him at all, but the justice Minister may wish to give advice.

Dr Farry: That is a breach of his independence.

Mr McFarland: No; the Policing Board can give its views to the Chief Constable, but he may or may not listen. If the two largest parties disagree with the Alliance Minister’s view on a parading issue or how to deal with the dissidents, that Minister will get a thick ear and will be told to behave or be sacked.

Mr M McGuinness: Does the Member recall 12 Ministers being sacked at the whim of one party on several occasions in the early 2000s?

Mr McFarland: As the Member knows only too well, that happened because there was an understanding that his organisation would take certain measures, and, if those things were not done, my party was to stop the operation of the Assembly. His organisation did not do what was required of it, and we stopped the Assembly. [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: I hope that Members will return to discussion of the Bill and address their remarks through the Chair.

Mr McFarland: Earlier, Dr Farry wiggled us about the Conservative Party’s views on the devolution of policing and justice. I remind the House of the words of the Conservative Party’s Northern Ireland spokesperson when the Bill was being discussed in March 2009. He said:

“We have therefore always supported the eventual devolution of criminal justice and policing, when the conditions were right and once the proposed model for devolution had the support of all communities.”

I am afraid that that sounds a bit like my party’s position; it is not different as Dr Farry claimed earlier.

I will draw my remarks to a close.

Mr A Maskey: Will the Member give way?

Mr McFarland: No; I have been bobbing up and down, and my legs are getting sore. [Laughter.]

The Ulster Unionist Party is fully supportive of the devolution of policing and justice, but not until government is stable. We hope that that will be soon and that we will be able to get on with it. However, there is no point in bringing contentious issues to the House when we cannot even do the basics yet. We oppose the Bill.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Ford: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Mr McFarland referred to “Lord Farry” and “Lord Ford”. He may be unaware of this, but, on two occasions, I told his former party leader that I was not interested in a peerage, which was being offered as a bribe.

Mr Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order. The Member should resume his seat.

Mr Ford: I request that Members be properly referred to in the House.

Mrs D Kelly: The guarantees of equality, partnership and inclusion are benchmarks for the conduct of government in the North, and they were hard won. However, during the negotiations about the devolution of policing and justice powers, the DUP, with the consent of Sinn Féin, took bites out of those guarantees. By altering the selection method for the Ministry, Sinn Féin conceded that a nationalist cannot now be justice Minister. Its belated concerns for the SDLP are regarded as hypocrisy.

The SDLP has a right to have a second Minister at the Executive table. However, we will end up with another unionist Minister at that table, while the mandate of another party is ignored. Democratic rights get turned on their heads by the DUP on Sinn Féin’s watch.

Mr Campbell, Mr Moutray and others talked about how they support the devolution of policing and justice powers. Similar contributions were made by members of Sinn Féin and other parties. My party colleague Mr Alban Maginness said that we are very much alive to the needs of the community, and said that legislation is required. Indeed, legislation is required to address a number of issues, not least to allow the police to do their job more effectively and efficiently.

I was somewhat bemused by Martina Anderson’s contribution, because Sinn Féin now seems to have become the “lock them up and leave them” party. She talked about the revolving doors of justice, but she did not mention anything about a fair trial.

When I was a young girl, my grandmother told me to tell all the boys that I would marry them, but not to tell them when. [Laughter.]

Mr Kennedy: Did you take that advice?

Mrs D Kelly: I did not. It seems as though Mr Peter Robinson got similar advice, because he has been told to tell Sinn Féin that policing and justice powers will be devolved, but he will not say when. We still do not have a time frame for the devolution of those powers. The Bill is simply about creating a Department of justice and providing a method to appoint a Minister of justice, rather than electing one. That is all that is in the Bill.

What was all of last year about? What was the stalemate about? What is the paralysis and logjam at the heart of government about? The DUP says that it is a party of devolution. It has devolved powers, so where are the decisions that are needed daily and that matter to people in their everyday lives? Rather than taking decisions for the greater good, those decisions are held up by the mutual veto of the DUP and Sinn Féin, and their selfish party political interests. That is what is happening with all decisions and across all public services. [Interruption.]

Mr Simpson is one to shout across the Chamber. Other Members may be reticent about naming him, but I am not: it was Mr Simpson who said that the devolution of policing and justice powers would not happen in a political lifetime.

Mr Simpson: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. I want Mrs Kelly to confirm in writing where I said that, whether in this House or another House, because I did not say it. Had I said it, I would stand over it. The Member should prove that I said it.

Mrs D Kelly: I am sure that members of the media who work in Stormont can do a trawl of numerous interviews.

Mr Simpson: Further to that point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker, if Mrs Kelly checks the House of Commons Hansard report, she will realise that I did not say that.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I ask that Members return to the issue of the Bill. [Interruption.]

Order. Members should pay attention and speak through the Chair. Once again, I ask that Members return to the subject of the Bill.

2.45 pm

Mrs D Kelly: I will happily return to the subject of the Bill. However, first I will try to allay Mr Simpson’s concerns. Had he listened carefully in the first place he would know that I did not say that he made that comment in the House. I said that I had heard it in the media. Does Mr Simpson now deny that his colleagues have made such a comment?

Mr Simpson: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Will Mrs Kelly please make up her mind? First, I understood her to say that I made that comment, but she now attributes it to one of my colleagues. Will Mrs Kelly please confirm what she said?

Mr Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order. I asked Mrs Kelly to return to the subject of the Bill.

Mrs D Kelly: I will return to the debate, but my recollection is that Mr Simpson made that comment — Mr Dodds and Lord Morrow certainly did. Does Mr Simpson now agree — [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. Mrs Kelly, I ask you to return to the Bill, because that is the subject of the debate.

Mrs D Kelly: The Bill is deficient, because it does not include a time frame for the devolution of policing and justice.

Mr Campbell: [Interruption.]

Mrs D Kelly: You are delaying the process, Mr Campbell. Mr Robinson has a problem with getting all members of his party to agree on the devolution of policing of justice, regardless of what the community wants, says or needs. How many times have Members heard on the doorsteps that the devolution of policing and justice is a matter of concern? It is not; people want policing and justice powers to be devolved. However, they also want the Good Friday Agreement to be protected because they know that, time and time again, Sinn Féin has been hoodwinked by the DUP in negotiations at St Andrews and elsewhere.

Mr O'Dowd: I assume that the last time that the Member was canvassing was for the European election, as a result of which the good people to whom she refers endorsed Sinn Féin. Where, therefore, did she hear that message?

Mrs D Kelly: The clue is in the title: it was a European election.

By referring to Sinn Féin's inability to negotiate and its having been blindsided on a number of fronts by the DUP, I seem to have touched on a sore point for those sitting on that party's Benches.

The First Minister: The Member was getting a little excited; perhaps she has now calmed down a bit and may be able to take in what I am about to say. The Bill specifically does not contain a date for devolution; it is not required to do so because it is enabling legislation. Other legislation already exists that sets out the process under which devolution takes place. There is, therefore, no requirement on the deputy First Minister and me to encourage anyone to include a specific date in the Bill. That does not make the Bill "deficient", as Mrs Kelly described it. The Bill is simply enabling legislation and has nothing to do with the date on which devolution will take place. The debate from that end of the Chamber, however, has concentrated solely on when devolution will happen. It is an enabling Bill, and Members should be addressing that aspect of it.

Mrs D Kelly: The First Minister may be used to speaking in a patronising tone to people in his party, but he will not refer to me in that tenor. He does not speak in that manner to Margaret Ritchie at meetings of the Executive; perhaps that is why the DUP does not want another SDLP Minister. [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I remind Members to make their remarks through the Chair, and I ask Mrs Kelly to return to the subject of the Bill.

Mrs D Kelly: A date is important to provide some surety. The fact that the date was also important to Sinn Féin resulted in a delay of four or five months and a suspension of the Assembly. Why should the date not be important? At this stage, why not have clarity by setting a time frame? Perhaps, in responding to the debate, the First Minister will inform the House of the date that he may have agreed last night with Gordon Brown and Sinn Féin. He did not, however, include the Ulster Unionist Party, the SDLP or the Alliance Party in those discussions. As Mr McFarland said, the so-called mandatory coalition is more of a "DUP/Sinn Féin axis".

We are well used to Sinn Féin's somersaults and cave-ins on a wide range of issues. However, we will have our voices heard and we will let the nationalist people know what Sinn Féin is doing on its watch. The SDLP will protect, and always has protected, the Good Friday Agreement. We will not be silent and turn a blind eye when vetoes are handed to the DUP, which has a record of not sharing power in any council in the North of Ireland.

Mr McKay: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I support the Bill and I declare an interest as a member of the Policing Board. The Bill will pave the way for the transfer of policing and justice powers. The fact that the Bill is before the House is further evidence of the agreements that have been reached in the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister.

There is support in the wider community for the transfer of powers. The public want to see the criminal justice system being made more accountable. The best way to do that is through locally elected representatives. Those arrangements are, of course, temporary. The process provides for a sunset clause to take effect in May 2012, by which time new arrangements are required to be in place for the continuation of the Department of justice.

Scotland has shown some initiative since having policing and justice powers devolved. The Scottish Government have led the way in introducing drugs courts, which are now being copied in other jurisdictions in Europe. Last year, a cross-party delegation from the Policing Board met the Minister with responsibility for policing and justice in Scotland, Kenny MacAskill. The benefits of having those powers devolved to locally accountable representatives are blatantly obvious, and were made blatantly obvious to those representatives who were on that trip.

Already, the four main parties work together on the Policing Board to hold the PSNI to account. We need policing and justice powers to be devolved to deal effectively and holistically with issues such as antisocial behaviour, death-driving, drug dealing, the PPS and sentence remission. Many victims of crime have suffered as a result of the serious flaws in the criminal justice system. As we are aware, hardly a week goes by when the issue is not mentioned on the news or through the media, which, in itself, highlights the extreme urgency of the problem. Victims will continue to suffer as a result of those shortcomings if the transfer of those powers continues to be put on the long finger.

Mr A Maskey: Can the Member recall, and perhaps seek clarification from, a Member who may speak later for the Ulster Unionist Party? During an intervention, Alan McFarland referred to the position of the Conservative Party in the Westminster debate on the policing and justice transfer legislation. The Ulster Unionist Party should remind this House that the Conservative Party supported the legislation that was going through the British Parliament, despite the protestations from the Ulster Unionist Party. Which part of the Ulster Unionist Party, UCUNF or the Tory Party are those Members talking about today?

Mr McKay: I thank the Member for his intervention. As other Members on this side of the House have done, he highlights all the holes in the arguments that the Ulster Unionist Party and others have put forward. All that we have heard today is a series of contradictions in relation to its position and its past positions. At the end of the day —

Mr B McCrea: We are quite prepared to engage in debate. In fact, the reason why we are doing this today is to let Members know that we have opinions — considered opinions. We are quite prepared to give answers to all the questions that Mr Maskey asked.

Mr A Maskey: Give them now.

Mr B McCrea: We will, when the questions are put to our party. It seems a little incredible that you asked a member of your own party for an answer that he does not have. We will address —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member should address his remarks through the Chair.

Mr B McCrea: We will address those issues, Mr Deputy Speaker. It is important that all parties are involved in these issues. Rather than keeping itself in the dark, why does Sinn Féin not try talking to the rest of us?

Mr McKay: The Member had the opportunity to answer the question, but he clearly did not have the ability to do so.

What we have seen today is a number of parties putting political opportunism and point-scoring ahead of the interests of the wider community. Ultimately, the community wants powers that relate to a wide array of policing and justice issues, including antisocial behaviour and drug dealing, which is a big concern in my constituency, to be devolved. People want those powers to be devolved because they want their communities to be made safer and they want to see crime reduced. That will not be achieved by the pathetic comments that have been made by Members at the other end of the House.

The Bill represents immense political progress, and the public wants to see it progressed because criminal justice is a major issue for all our communities. It is important that adequate finance is put in place to provide an effective community service, and I acknowledge the work being done to secure that funding by the First Minister and the deputy First Minister in negotiations with the British Government.

In conclusion, I support the Bill. I encourage other parties in the House to put aside their own narrow political self-interest in the wider interests of the community, because the policing and justice issue must move forward. Therefore, I urge those parties to reconsider their very inconsiderate positions.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Questions to the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure will commence at 3.00 pm, so I propose that Members take their ease until that time.

Oral Answers to Questions

CULTURE, ARTS AND LEISURE

GAA: Hunger Strike Commemoration

1. Mr B McCrea asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure if the use of Galbally Gaelic Athletic Club for a hunger strike commemoration rally meets with his Department's criteria for funding of the GAA. (AQO 75/10)

15. Mr I McCrea asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure, following the recent commemoration of the hunger strikes at a Tyrone GAA facility, what steps he has taken with the GAA to ensure sports grounds are not used for this type of event. (AQO 89/10)

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure (Mr McCausland): With your permission, Mr Speaker, I will answer questions 1 and 15 together.

I have publically expressed my concerns about what took place at Galbally on 16 August 2009, and I have called for the GAA to carry out a full investigation into the matter. I understand that the GAA's central council has already asked its Ulster council to establish the exact circumstances surrounding the use of the Galbally Pearses GAA ground for a commemoration of deceased members of the Provisional IRA. I await those findings, and I look forward to receiving the completed report.

I am also aware that, following claims that there was a paramilitary display during the event, the PSNI is making enquiries to see whether any laws were broken.

Mr B McCrea: Surely there should be consistency in the rules for administering public funds. If there is an outright ban on the use of public funds to support party political activities, surely the use of facilities that are largely supported by public funds should be subject to a similar caveat. Instead of looking to other agencies, should the Minister's Department not be taking corrective action on the matter?

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: This is not a new issue; it has been around for quite a few years, and I assure the Member that I am doing what is appropriate in the circumstances and what will be effective in dealing with it.

There is already a requirement that any body that seeks funding for ground improvements must sign what is termed an equity statement. I am in discussions with Sport NI, and, later this week, I will speak to its representatives about the nature of that commitment, its implementation and whether it needs to be reviewed. I have already asked Sport NI to review the situation, so that we can deal effectively with the sort of appalling situation that we saw last month.

Mr I McCrea: Will the Minister outline what funding Galbally Pearses Gaelic Athletic Club has received from Sport NI, and, in the light of the events on 16 August, will he inform the House of any intentions that he might have to withhold future funding?

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: In January 2009, Galbally Pearses GAC was awarded an Exchequer grant of £200,565 under Sport NI's Places for Sport programme to assist with the construction of a full-size Gaelic games grass pitch. That work is ongoing, and Sport NI has advised that, to date, the club has drawn down approximately £166,000 of the award.

Sport NI funding programmes have an equity clause as a standard condition of its grants, and, although on this occasion the situation has yet to be clarified, Sport NI has been asked to review its existing terms and conditions of grants to sport. I look forward to receiving Sport NI's analysis and, if appropriate, its recommendations for change by the end of November.

I also met informally with senior representatives of the GAA's Ulster council, when, as a public representative and the Minister for sport, I had an opportunity to represent the concerns and comments that I had received from across the community following recent publicity around the use of GAA property. In addition, I was able to emphasise my belief in the importance of sport, culture and art in building a shared and better future.

The meeting also afforded the GAA an opportunity to brief me on the governance and work of the association, including what it is doing at council and provincial level to deal with the issues around Galbally and other matters of concern. Personally, I found the exchange to be informative, and I appreciated the opportunity to express my concerns to the organisation.

Mr Brolly: Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Does the Minister accept that it would be illegal for his Department to discriminate against any sports club with regard to its funding criteria?

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: One of the fundamental principles that I have taken forward in the Department is the creation of a shared and better future that will be based on equity, diversity and interdependence. The principle of equity is very important, and, when I met them in July, I assured the three major sporting bodies that I would treat them all with fairness in every way. There will be no discrimination. I hope that folk at the grass-roots level of sport will remember the importance of social cohesion, tolerance, respect and interdependence in the future.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Does the Minister agree that the most important element is the protection of sporting and cultural organisations from political and sectarian exploitation, not the victimisation of any particular sporting body or political influence at departmental level?

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: I agree entirely with the Member. It would be wrong for any organisation — political or otherwise — to exert the sort of pressure to which the Member refers on any sporting club. I have no difficulty in agreeing with that. Many people in the GAA at the highest level were as horrified as the rest of us at the sort of event that took place at Galbally in August.

Re-imaging Communities

2. Mrs Long asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure for his assessment of the Re-imaging Communities programme. (AQO 76/10)

3. Ms Purvis asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure for an update on the costs to date of the Re-imaging Communities programme; and for an assessment of the success of the programme and its contribution to community cohesion. (AQO 77/10)

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: With your permission, Mr Deputy Speaker, I will answer questions 2 and 3 together.

The Re-imaging Communities programme was launched in July 2006. It is delivered by the Arts Council of Northern Ireland and overseen by the Shared Communities Consortium. The programme has been allocated some £3·8 million and, to date, 136 projects have been awarded a total of £3,007,634. Some 70 project proposals are also at various stages of development. There are many excellent examples of the work of the Re-imaging Communities programme across Northern Ireland. Those include the East Belfast Historical and Cultural Society project on the industrial heritage of the area; the Glenbryn project depicting prominent figures from the history of north Belfast; and the Kilcooley project in north Down, which is held up as a model of best practice by the Arts Council.

An independent interim evaluation of the Re-imaging Communities programme was completed in December 2008. The findings indicate that the programme has been a success. A survey of 2,000 participants in 10 areas in which projects have been completed showed that the majority believed that the project had been of high quality, had improved the appearance of the area and had been generally beneficial. The programme has been very successful and has met its key objectives. As a direct result of the programme, many displays of paramilitary symbolism have been removed and/or replaced with new imagery that reflects the aspirations of local communities in a more positive manner.

The interim evaluation indicated that the programme has had a significant effect on community cohesion by strengthening relationships; restoring relationships between communities and councils; developing a sense of achievement and ownership of the artwork; helping to reduce delinquency and antisocial behaviour; transforming the character of areas; encouraging community responsibility for its own environment; and highlighting the fact that the community no longer wants to be associated with division and hostility.

Mrs Long: I thank the Minister for his answer, which reflects the value of the projects. I declare my interest as a member of Belfast City Council, which was involved in the programme's delivery.

Given that it transforms not only physical places but the people in those places, is the Minister of a mind to further invest in this kind of vehicle for transformation? The programme has had a massive impact on people's confidence and sense of place and their ability to move on to other projects that will enhance their local communities.

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: The programme has, indeed, been very successful, and there is a continued demand from local communities, as evidenced by the number of proposals still being developed. Consequently, I am supportive in principle of the continuation of the programme. However, doing so will require significant additional funding, and Members will be well aware of the challenging financial environment and the increasing pressures on all areas of expenditure.

My officials and I are working together and exploring options for ways in which the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure (DCAL) may be able to provide some support to the programme. I am aware that the Arts Council is in discussions with various other stakeholders to explore potential funding streams in order to extend the programme. However, Members will be aware that we are facing a much more challenging financial environment, and there are significant numbers of pressing priorities for public funding.

Ms Purvis: I thank the Minister for his detailed response. I have first-hand experience of the Re-imaging Communities programme that exists in a number of communities, and I can see the practical benefit that it brings to all sections of the community. Has there been a difference between the uptake of the programme in unionist and nationalist areas or in the number of proposals that have been submitted to the Arts Council from each group? Is there a difference in the outcomes for those areas? Will the Minister assure the House that he will do all that he can to ensure that the programme continues, given the positive outcomes that have been experienced and the amount of work that remains to be done in deprived communities?

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: I do not have to hand a breakdown in respect of unionist and nationalist areas. I have a complete list of all the projects, but they have not been identified in that way. However, I have a breakdown by constituency across Northern Ireland, which may be of some help. It is clear that there has been a lower uptake in some constituencies than there has been in others. For instance, there was an uptake of £191,576 in East Belfast, £351,094 in North Belfast and £422,000 in South Belfast. However, there was a smaller uptake in other constituencies: only £27,000 in one case; £21,000 in another; and £15,000 in a third constituency. There is, therefore, an issue regarding the uptake across different areas.

Work is being, and has been, undertaken by the Arts Council to ensure that the programme is rolled out across Northern Ireland as far as possible. To date, projects have been undertaken in all but two district council areas in Northern Ireland — Fermanagh and Strabane — but all other council areas were included and involved.

The Arts Council has sought to address the lack of uptake by holding roadshows and funding clinics and through direct liaison with district councils. The council has been reasonably successful in that regard, and work is under way in the areas that it is targeting, including Coleraine, Ballymoney and Omagh. I understand that the Arts Council has had initial discussions with groups in Fermanagh and Strabane regarding potential projects, but progress on those will be dependent on future funding.

Mr T Clarke: Does the Minister accept that it is difficult to measure the difference that the Re-imaging Communities programme has made to the quality of people's lives? I speak from my experience in my constituency of South Antrim, particularly in Randalstown. A proposal has also been submitted for a re-imaging programme in Antrim. I ask the Minister to think about the changes that such programmes make to the lives of the people who live in the areas, particularly when funding is being considered. It is difficult to quantify that in financial terms at the outset, when an application is made, but does the Minister accept that it makes an immeasurable difference to the lives of the ordinary people who live on the estates in which the re-imaging is taking place? I invite the Minister to Antrim to see some of the work that has taken place.

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: The Member is right: the improvements are more qualitative than quantitative. It is difficult to put a value or a number on those things and to measure them in that way. That is why, in my initial answer, I indicated the areas of improvements and the help that such projects delivered. I spoke about them strengthening relationships and the sense of achievement that is felt by the people who are involved in them, and I commented on how they address antisocial behaviour, transform areas and create a more positive image of the community. Therefore, I agree with the Member that it is difficult to quantify the effects of such programmes, but that is not a reason for failing in any way to pursue the additional funding that we would seek.

Mr K Robinson: I thank the Minister for his reply. I agree with all the Members who have spoken on this question. There is no doubt that it is difficult to quantify the benefits that the programme brings to communities that have suffered and which need the re-imaging programme.

The Minister listed some of the huge sums of money that have been made available for the projects. However, given that those resources are fairly limited, will any sustainable jobs be created in those communities after the schemes have finished?

3.15 pm

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: It is more a case of additional skills being left behind when the projects have finished. As a result of those projects, people will have enhanced their experiences and acquired skills, and, in many instances, they will have been able to work with voluntary and statutory agencies and local authorities in a way that they may not have been able to do previously. Therefore, apart from the physical changes that will come about, the main improvements, and the lasting benefits and legacy, are in enhanced skills.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Question 4 has been withdrawn.

2012 Olympic Games

5. Mr Savage asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure what plans there are to host in Northern Ireland athletes attending the 2012 Olympic Games. (AQO 79/10)

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: Northern Ireland is seeking to attract 10 countries or teams for pre-games training. I have asked Sport Northern Ireland to lead a small cross-organisational working group to progress that work with representatives of local government, Invest Northern Ireland, the Northern Ireland Tourist Board and Disability Sports Northern Ireland. Twenty-six sports facilities here have registered in the London 2012 pre-games training camp guide (PGTC) for the Olympic Games, and eight sports facilities here have registered in the PGTC guide for the 2012 Paralympic Games. The Department is working already with the London 2012 Organising Committee (LOCOG) and through our sports governing bodies to attract those countries or sports to Northern Ireland.

Mr Savage: Will any of the athletes who are linked in any way, however remotely, to the 2012 Olympic Games be taking part in any sporting events in Northern Ireland?

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: The intention is to bring those athletes here for training camps; however, it would be premature of me to comment on what else they might do when they are training here. If I am to comment, I would need some information on what teams and countries are coming and what sports those athletes are involved in. I get the gist of what the Member is getting at, and I will keep it in mind.

Dr McDonnell: I thank the Minister for his answers so far. Will he give the House his assessment of the financial gains or, indeed, losses that will result from hosting athletes who are attending the 2012 Olympics? Has any assessment been made of the financial outcomes of hosting those athletes?

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: Again, the difficulty is that unless one knows what teams and sports will be coming here, it is very difficult to put a figure on it. It is clear that there will be a benefit, but to put a figure on it is difficult at this stage. Therefore, I find it difficult to respond to that question at this stage.

Mrs McGill: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Will the Minister assure the House that sports facilities in Counties Tyrone, Fermanagh and Derry will have a fair chance of hosting athletes who may come here during the Olympic Games in 2012?

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: I indicated already that 26 sports facilities have registered for the 2012 Olympics and that eight have registered for the 2012 Paralympic Games. Those facilities are spread across Northern Ireland.

Mr Craig: Will the Minister outline what financial assistance will be available to facilities such as the Salto National Gymnastics Centre in Lagan Valley? That centre has succeeded already in attracting international gymnastics teams to Northern Ireland, and staff there would be very keen to support the 2012 Olympics programme.

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: My officials have liaised with the governing body of gymnastics here, Gymnastics Northern Ireland, about the Salto centre in Lisburn. Gymnastics NI, together with all the other governing bodies of sport here, will shortly be invited to apply, through Sport NI, for limited funding to assist them in securing teams in the run-up to the 2012 Olympics. I understand that through that funding, Gymnastics Northern Ireland will support Salto's efforts to attract teams for pre-games training in 2012.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Question 6 has been withdrawn.

Maze Prison Site

7. Mr Kennedy asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure to outline his Department's involvement in the development of the Maze site. (AQO 81/10)

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: The Department, in conjunction with the Strategic Investment Board, was involved in the development of proposals for a multi-sports stadium to be used by the three main ball sports in Northern Ireland. That included the production of a robust business plan by independent consultants. The Department worked closely with the governing bodies of the three sports — football, rugby and Gaelic games — in finalising and agreeing the business plan for the multi-sports stadium.

It was the responsibility of the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister, supported by the Strategic Investment Board, to identify a preferred developer for the whole Maze site, including the stadium. In January 2009, the then Minister, Gregory Campbell, having reviewed all the material available to him, advised the Northern Ireland Executive of his decision not to proceed with the proposed multi-sports stadium at the Maze. My Department has, therefore, no further involvement in the future development of the Maze site.

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Minister for his answer. Now that plans for a multi-sports stadium have been abandoned, will the Minister outline the current culture, arts and leisure proposals that he and his Department are considering in respect of the Maze site? Will he take this opportunity to confirm that no part of the site will be used to create a shrine to republican terrorists?

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: In reply to the second part of the Member's question, I have already said that the Maze site is not within my domain. With regard to the first part of his question about the stadium development, earlier in the year my predecessor asked the three governing bodies to bring forward their preferred options on regional stadium provision. In June 2009, the Executive received an update on stadium development and a broad outline of the options that those bodies had submitted, and the Executive agreed the process for advancing the regional stadium development.

Since becoming Minister at the beginning of July, I have been actively progressing that process. I have met, collectively, with representatives of the governing bodies. A strategic outline case, which confirmed the options to be tested in a full economic appraisal, has been produced and approved by the Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP), and the commissioning of consultants to undertake an economic appraisal of the options has commenced. I expect to be able to return to the Executive by the end of the year with the outcome and the proposals to take forward the strategic development of regional sports stadia.

Mr Butler: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. The Minister referred to the development corporation and the future of the Maze/Long Kesh site. Has he given any consideration to other sporting or arts facilities being placed there as part of the development corporation's plan? When I and other party members sat on the Maze/Long Kesh monitoring group, the stadium was the main feature of the sporting facilities. However, there were also discussions and plans to have other sporting facilities on that site. Will the Minister consider those plans as part of the future of the site?

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: I am unaware of any proposals for other sporting facilities at the Maze site, and I have none under consideration.

Mr Moutray: Will the Minister say when consultants will be appointed, how long he expects the consultancy to last, and how much it will cost?

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: I expect consultants to be appointed by early October — within a few weeks — and the results of their work to be available later this year. The total cost of that work will not exceed £80,000.

Mr McCarthy: The Minister will be aware that the Department has spent almost £4 million on the Maze site to date. Has the Minister any regrets or any apology to make to the taxpayer? It has been a complete and absolute waste of almost £4 million, given that the Department probably knew from day one that the site would not be used to promote the shared future through a multi-sports stadium?

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: I will deal with the issue of a shared future, in case the Member was not listening to me earlier. I have put the creation of a shared and better future right at the top of my list of priorities. That will be implemented in all areas, whether in culture, arts or leisure. As for money that was spent in previous years, the Member will be well aware that most of that expenditure was committed at the time of direct rule, and that it was an initiative of direct rule. The decision of my predecessor, Gregory Campbell, not to proceed with the plans for the Maze site, but to provide separately for the three main ball sports was taken under devolution, and I believe that it was the right decision.

We are carrying matters forward as quickly as we can, because the real issue now is about getting decisions made, getting developments on the ground, and rolling out the sort of work that is demanded and expected — rightly — by those three sporting bodies. That is why I have set a very clear timetable. The consultants will be in place by early next month, and will report back to my Department by the end of the year. I will then be able to take the matter to the Executive.

Sport Matters

8. Mr P J Bradley asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure for an update on the sports strategy document 'Sport Matters'. (AQO 82/10)

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: The Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure, in partnership with Sport Northern Ireland, has prepared a final version of a planned new Northern Ireland sports strategy, which is now entitled 'Sport Matters: The Northern Ireland Strategy for Sport and Physical Recreation 2009-2019'. The final version of that strategy has been forwarded to the Northern Ireland Executive for consideration at a future meeting. I have been pressing, and will continue to press, for that to be considered and agreed by the Executive as soon as possible.

Mr P J Bradley: I thank the Minister for his answer. From what the Minister has learned since taking up office in July, how much of the 'Sport Matters' strategy can be delivered — I am being optimistic — in the remaining 19 or 20 months of this Assembly?

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: The difficulty with answering that question is that I am not clear when the sports strategy will be fully endorsed by the Executive. However, we are already working on the assumption that it will be endorsed, and sporting bodies are also working on that assumption. It is also difficult to provide a figure in answer to the Member's question, because the strategy covers 10 years. To ask me today how much will be done in a number of months is perhaps asking too much. What is proposed for the 10-year period is a realistic proposal; it can be delivered, and it is my hope that it will be delivered. In the remaining months of this Assembly I will certainly be doing all that I can to ensure that it will be delivered.

Mr Kinahan: Has the Minister had any discussions with the Education Minister on how his Department could augment and improve sport in schools as part of the overall sports strategy?

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure: Since coming into office at the beginning of July, I have not had discussions with the Education Minister, but the Member picks up on a very important point. The sports strategy is not simply an issue for DCAL; it involves a number of other Departments. It has implications for health, because one of the great benefits of sport is that it helps to address the issue of obesity. It has implications for the Education Department, because the issue of making schools and schools' facilities more accessible to the wider community is obviously very important. I know that that has been discussed in the Education Committee and elsewhere in the past. The Member is absolutely right to say that the sports strategy is a cross-departmental issue. That is a good thing, because good government should be joined-up government that stretches right across Departments.

QUESTION FOR URGENT ORAL ANSWER

Belfast Health and Social Care Trust

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Speaker has received notice of a question for urgent oral answer to the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety.

Mr McCarthy asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety for his assessment of the leaked proposal that the Belfast Health and Social Care Trust is to axe a total of 150 beds in the Royal Victoria and Belfast City Hospitals.

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Mr McGimpsey): For months, I have been saying that times are hard in the Health Service, with challenging efficiency savings of some £700 million and increasing demands. However, in April 2009, the Assembly refused to exempt the Health Service from efficiency savings. As I said at the time of the Budget settlement, it was as good as it gets, but it was not enough. The situation has been further exacerbated by the cost of the swine flu pandemic.

I am still in the position of having to fight for the money that I need to protect the people of Northern Ireland, and I trust that the Executive recognise that in their response to the September monitoring round. My Department has now received proposals from the trusts, including the Belfast Health and Social Care Trust, to achieve break-even, and those proposals are currently being considered. No decisions have been made.

Mr McCarthy: I thank the Minister for coming to the Chamber to answer the question. Devolution to the Assembly was meant to bring benefits to everyone in Northern Ireland. The diabolical news of the loss of some 150 hospital beds is a shattering blow to the many patients who are already waiting for a hospital bed. Indeed, Health Service redundancies are completely outrageous.

Will the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, the Minister of Finance and Personnel, the First Minister, the deputy First Minister and the entire Executive give some cognisance to the catastrophic effect that those cutbacks will have, bearing in mind the threat of swine flu this winter, which the Minister mentioned. The Minister must be as aware as anyone else that, unless those hospital beds are saved, people throughout Northern Ireland will die during the winter.

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: As I explained in April 2009, when the House debated an amendment to exempt the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety from the process of efficiency savings, £700 million of efficiency savings must be found. In addition, resources for health are inadequate; as I said at the time of the Budget settlement, an extra £600 million is needed to provide the same standard of Health Service as that provided in England. In that regard, England is behind Wales, and Wales is behind Scotland. Therefore, the resource is already severely stretched, and it is a huge stretch to catch an additional £700 million from it.

The Health Service must also face the issue of swine flu. Under the Budget settlement, the deal that I did with Peter Robinson when he was Minister of Finance and Personnel, it was agreed that the first £20 million from in-year resources would go to health, but I have still not seen a penny of that. The reason why I have been able to manage the health budget so well is because of the efficient use of money through flexibility. As part of the Budget settlement, I was given the right to bid for resources for pandemic flu, but I have still not seen a halfpenny of those or received a guarantee.

Against that, all the trusts report seriously increased demand. The birth rate has increased by 20% since 2002, and we all know about the stretch at maternity units. The older population is steadily increasing and in receipt of even more sophisticated life-enhancing treatment packages. Attendance at accident and emergency is up by 7.2%, and the number of emergency admissions via accident and emergency is up by 9%. Total inpatient activity is also up. The demand is constantly rising.

The Appleby report on efficiency recommended that the Health Service receive an increase to its budget of 4.3% a year in real terms. The Health Service never received that or anything like it, and increased demand is, in fact, around 9%. Even allowing for inflation, over the past two years, the increase has been around 1.75% in real terms. Therefore, there is a gap, and there is not enough money to do the job.

By Treasury rules, the trusts are required to break even. They have been asked for contingency plans, and those plans have been prepared and will come to me. I will look at those and determine a way forward.

If there is more activity than had been anticipated, and there is not enough money to cover it, everybody can see that that creates a gap. It is a matter for the House to determine how that gap needs to be addressed. Do we want to do some of the other things that we do, or do we want to address the gap in health?

Are curbs more important? In an ideal world, they are important, but are those sorts of activities in other areas and Departments really where we want to spend our money? Mr McCarthy is quite right: if we do not spend the money on health, patients come to harm. I made that point in April 2008. Since then, I have made it over and over again.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Mr Wells): The fact that the Minister has failed to deny the claims that have been made by the unions this morning shows that they must contain some truth. It is quite clear that 150 beds will be removed from the system. As Mr McCarthy has, quite rightly, said, that has profound implications for the ability of both the Royal Group of Hospitals and the City Hospital to deliver.

Part of the package that was given to the Minister was that, in return for not claiming money through the monitoring round, he could have total flexibility in his £4 billion budget. If the budget cuts that he suggests do have to be made, surely the last services that should suffer are front line services in the main acute hospitals.

We need clarity from the Minister about what has actually been agreed with the Belfast Health and Social Care Trust under the comprehensive spending review (CSR) plans. We need to hear very soon what implications the CSR process has for the other trusts. The Committee and the Assembly need that information immediately. We want to hear a good reason why major front line services are being cut, rather than management, bureaucracy and administration.

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: For Mr Wells's benefit, I remind him that, as far as the review of public administration (RPA) is concerned, the Department of Health is the one Department that has achieved its RPA targets. It has reduced the number of trusts from 19 to six and the number of boards from four to one. It has reduced administration by around 1,700 jobs, which saves £53 million each year. It has reduced the number of front line management staff from 180 to 61. My Department has done all of that. It has also increased its efficiency rating by 7% during the past two years. As far as productivity and the RPA are concerned, my Department's performance is better than that of any other Department.

As I have said, the fact is that demand has increased throughout the Health Service. There is increasing demand for services from an older population, as well as on maternity services and A&E attendances and admissions. All of those have gone up. Against that increasing demand, resources have not gone up. Money must be found. I have no choice.

The House voted for £700 million of efficiency savings to be made. Indeed, I have the list of Members who voted for that. Mr McCarthy was one of those Members who insisted prominently on that £700 million, as were members of the Health Committee.

The House must make up its mind where it wants to spend money. It is no use coming to me and saying that I must do this, that and the other; telling me that I must make efficiency savings, yet, when efficiency proposals are made, Members do not want to know and they oppose them. The Assembly will not put its money where its mouth is. It will not vote for that money. Therefore, there is not enough money going to the Health Service.

Funding for mental-health services is 25% pro rata below what it is in England. Demand for those services is 25% higher than in England. In the past two and a half years, I have made those points over and over again. Despite that, due to my Department's efforts, efficiency in the Health Service is up by over 7% in the past two years. It has achieved more than any other Department on RPA and productivity. However, it must also deal with increased demand.

The budget settlement promised the Health Department the first £20 million of available funds. I have not seen a penny. It also promised that my Department could bid for funding for pandemic flu.

I have not seen a penny for that either. That is the reality. However, money is being spent on other things. [Interruption.] I hear the First Minister talking from a sedentary position. I notice that resource for his office in the past year has risen from £60 million to £85 million, which is a 30% rise. Do Members want money to be spent on Peter Robinson's office, or do they want it to be spent on front-line health services? That is the issue.

Those plans — and they are plans — were brought forward to me. I asked every single trust to come forward with contingency plans; in fact, they have already done so, and I have to look at them. I keep telling Members that I have tough decisions to make, but it is not only me who has to make this decision; the Executive and the Assembly must do so, too. The Assembly cannot continue to tell me willy-nilly to increase services and provision for this, that and the other — and Mr McCarthy has been one of the most prominent in calling for more money to be spent here and there — yet, at the same time, refuse to vote to give me more money and insist that £700 million of efficiency savings be made over three years.

I have said that we can make those efficiency savings, just not in the time frame required. There is not enough money in the system to do that right now. I do not have enough money to pay the bills; I am in the position that I have been placed in. I remind Members that I put it to the House that the Health Service should be exempted from making those efficiencies. The Health Service can be exempted because moneys for efficiencies are supposed to come from the Executive: they do not have to come from each Department. By the way, it was decided in Scotland that the efficiency requirement for the Health Service should be 2% rather than 3%, because it was decided that healthcare was a key provision. Only the PUP supported my party; every other party voted against my party's motion. An opportunity exists for Members to look at the issue again, and they must do that.

The debate on policing and justice is about to resume, and I have absolutely no doubt that there will be plenty of money for policing and justice. That will be no problem. However, I think that the Health Service is at least as important as the devolution of policing and justice. I think that Members agree with me, and I am absolutely certain that the public agree with me.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE BUSINESS

Department of Justice Bill

Second Stage

Debate resumed on motion:

That the Second Stage of the Department of Justice Bill [NIA 1/09] be agreed. — [The First Minister (Mr P Robinson).]

Dr W McCrea: We return to the Department of Justice Bill, which is enabling legislation that will simply permit the devolution of policing and justice to happen at some time. Most parties have said that they believe in the devolution of policing and justice and that the powers of policing and justice should be returned to the Assembly.

I must set that in the context of the many other challenges that we face. I listened with interest to the closing remarks of Mr McGimpsey. The Assembly certainly faces many challenges. My constituents have told me that the economy is top of their agendas and that they are worried about how we are going to get through the hard times of the recession. They have also told me that the banks are still crippling small and medium-sized businesses and that those businesses have not the clout to withstand the excessive charges that are being forced upon them. My constituents have said that they are concerned about whether they will have jobs at the end of the recession. They worry that even businesses with high productivity will not be able to survive the recession.

My constituents have said that they are concerned about whether they will be able to afford their mortgages and keep their homes. They are also worried about the number of hospital beds, some of which have been lost through the Department's foolish direction in policy, and about the cuts in which we will all have to play a part.

Bearing all those points in mind, we know that Sinn Féin has held up vital decisions in the Executive in the past. There was a logjam of necessary legislation simply because that party was not getting its own way. Members may say that that is childish. It is not only childish; it is damaging to the prosperity of Northern Ireland.

3.45 pm

So, we ask ourselves what the recipe is for combating the hard economic times that we are living in. Sinn Féin's answer is to simply increase the financial burden on the Executive and the people of Northern Ireland. I want to address Sinn Féin's demand for the immediate devolution of policing and justice powers.

Given that there is a recession and that people are losing their jobs, homes and other things, why is there such undue haste? The answer is political dogma and the unrealistic promises that Sinn Féin made to its supporters. The House has no responsibility for any promises made by any party; each party will either stand or fall on its own promises at an election. We cannot be held to any timetable that is suggested by a particular party in the House just because it made promises and is unable to fulfil some of them.

My party has made it abundantly clear that there are two issues that must be addressed. The first issue is cash, which my friend from East Londonderry Mr Gregory Campbell alluded to in his speech. The second issue is confidence. I want to address both of those issues, because they are relevant to our discussion.

The First Minister and his deputy have been in talks with the Prime Minister and Treasury officials about money for the devolution of policing and justice powers. What has been the Government's response? We all know that there is a black hole in the policing budget and that the demands for increased policing have not been realised in the community. In the midst of their demand that we should immediately devolve policing and justice powers, the Government recently added to the pain by demanding £17 million of further cuts.

We also know that there are increasing demands on the police. For example, there is no package in place for members of the part-time police Reserve, who gave excellent and sterling service throughout the years of Provisional IRA terror, murder and mayhem. We have to provide financial support to deal with that demand, because it will not go away.

One of today's papers carries the headline:

"Axe falls on PSNI Drugs Squad".

In the midst of everything, we have a situation where the drugs squad will be removed despite the community wanting more police on the streets to deal with the drugs that are out there. Let us not close our eyes to the real drug problem that exists in Northern Ireland. There is a major drug problem here, although many people want to close their eyes to it and suggest that it is not as big as it is. That problem is causing the destruction of the lives of both young and old.

On top of that, there is a demand on us from the Patten report. I listened carefully to Mr Kennedy's opening remarks when he said:

"our fingers are not in this".

Let me tell him what his and his party's fingers are on. At the time of the Patten discussions, one of the leading politicians in his party at the time, Lord Maginnis, the then MP for Fermanagh and South Tyrone, entered into negotiations on the Patten proposals and agreed to a change in the name of the RUC and the destruction of that organisation. Let not Mr Kennedy try to be pious and say that their fingers were not involved: we know exactly where the fingers of the Ulster Unionist Party were. Its fingerprints are all over this; they were also all over the Weston Park talks when the Ulster Unionist Party was ready to devolve the powers of policing and justice without anything —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I remind the Member to speak to the Bill.

Dr W McCrea: I am endeavouring to point out, Mr Deputy Speaker, that Mr Kennedy was supposed to be dealing with the same Bill, yet he spoke about this very issue. Therefore, if it is being suggested that the matter is not within the Bill's remit, Mr Kennedy, too, must have been totally without the Bill's remit, because I am dealing with the issues that have been raised. It must be very uncomfortable listening for him, but rest assured that the Ulster Unionists are not getting let off on this issue.

Under Patten, there was a demand for the axe to fall on the full-time Reserve. At a time when there is a demand out there for more police on the ground, what is happening? The axe is falling on a vital part of the Police Service of Northern Ireland. Not only has the full-time Reserve given sterling service, but its members want to continue to give sterling service, yet the axe is going to fall on them. That is a recipe for disaster. Therefore, it is not enough to say that we have the devolution of policing and justice powers; the accompanying cash must be made available. Failure to provide that, and failure to put adequate numbers of police on the ground, means that drug lords and community Hitlers will continue to take control of estates and desire to take greater control of estates that they had previously lost.

I have constituents in my office daily demanding action on antisocial behaviour, which is thuggery under another name, and it is not being tackled. When I bring in the police, they tell me that they do not have the manpower to deal with antisocial behaviour. Therefore, although it is important to say that, yes, we need the devolution of policing and justice powers, we had also better face up to the reality that we need sufficient people on the ground in order to be able to do the job. Without the money to pay for them, we will not have the men on the ground. Therefore, let us not live in cloud cuckoo land.

That may be unpalatable for Sinn Féin —

Mr Beggs: Will the Member give way?

Dr W McCrea: No; the Member will, I am sure, want to make a vital contribution to this debate at some later stage.

However, Sinn Féin is saying that we must have policing and justice powers devolved now. Of course, if it closes its eyes to the reality check that is those community challenges, it is living in cloud cuckoo land.

We are told that the answer to those community challenges is police chiefs recommending the closure of police stations and cutting police numbers and overtime. That has led to a lack of confidence in the community. The First Minister said, "Let us go to Mr Brown." I appreciate the efforts that the First Minister has been making to try to get the Treasury and Mr Brown to come up with money.

However, what money can he come up with? Remember that words are cheap. Mr Brown has the certainty of tenure of only a few months before a general election is held. He has no certainty that he will be there beyond then. He can promise the world, but can he keep his promises? When we look to the past and see how easily promises have been set aside, we would be absolutely foolish not to learn lessons.

Others will say, "But what about the Treasury? It will still be there." However, let us look at Treasury figures. We know that its figures have been suspect in the past, because often when the Chancellor of the Exchequer stands up in the House of Commons, he is recirculating money that he had already promised. It is simply a recirculation. Promises have not been realised in the past.

What happens if this Prime Minister's tenure is almost over? Ah, we say, we will look to the Conservatives. Of course, we will then look to their sidekicks, or their tail: the Ulster Unionist Party will guarantee us money. There will be no problem, because Mr Kennedy will say that his party has such influence with the Conservative Party. Although the Ulster Unionists may be only the tail of the cow, they will, nevertheless, be able to assure us that we will have all the money that we need.

That is living in cloud cuckoo land. Without the money, there cannot be the proper devolution of policing and justice.

Mr B McCrea: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. I understand that, in Standing Orders, there is a rule that states that you are not allowed to compare people to animals. I distinctly heard the Member say that we were a cow. I think that Dr McCrea should withdraw those remarks.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I do not think that that is really a point of order. I will go back to the other Mr McCrea.

Dr W McCrea: I feel sorry for Basil; he is so sensitive today. I never referred to any Member as an animal, I mentioned a party. With the greatest respect, Basil, I have been in politics for a long time, so do not try to lecture me about what we are allowed to do or say.

Mr B McCrea: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. I think that it is the protocol in this place not to refer to Members by their Christian names.

The Deputy Speaker: I ask the Member to remember that.

Dr W McCrea: That is rich. I am led to believe that one of Mr McCrea's colleagues Alan McFarland used someone's Christian name earlier. Pardon me, is that "Colonel" McFarland? How am I supposed to refer to Mr McFarland? This really shows that the Ulster Unionist Party is on the run on this issue. They are certainly scared of being exposed for exactly what they are. [Interruption.]

Where was I before that interruption?

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. I ask all Members to address their remarks through the Chair and to face the Chair when speaking.

Dr W McCrea: Mr Deputy Speaker, I am very happy to address my remarks through the Chair. I was always told that it is very bad manners to turn one's back on people and refer to them at the same time. Being a good parliamentarian, I try to look around the Chamber as much as possible.

Let me explain what I was going to say before the UUP got very sensitive and very hurt. Certainly, they seem to have been scalded in some way. I was talking about the promise of money. The Tories and the Ulster Unionists are going to assure us about getting that money. However, we already know that they cannot do that. Mr Cameron and his colleagues have said that there will be 10% cuts on everything, straight across the board, and policing was not excluded. He did mention two areas that would be left out — international development and health — but, of course, that has changed. There will now be cuts to the health budget as well.

Mr Kennedy: During much of the early part of the Member's speech, I was heartened to find myself in full agreement with Dr McCrea. At one point, I got the impression that because of his consistent concerns, Dr McCrea was going to join the Ulster Unionist Party in the Lobby and vote against the Bill. Dr McCrea has rightly highlighted the issue of finance. But which parties in the House promised the mother and father of financial settlements for the mother and father of political settlements? Was that not Dr McCrea's party, the DUP? What happened to the new fairer deal?

Dr W McCrea: I suppose that Mr Kennedy thought that that would somehow put me off my stride; that somehow I would shake when he got up; that it would be like being beat over the head with a dead sheep. We never promised that there would be money for the devolution of policing and justice. That was not promised. Therefore, let him not move the goalposts.

He is representing a party that says it is going to take the leadership. As far as the Tories are concerned, they are going to sweep the boards at Westminster.

Therefore, they believe that they are the party with the wherewithal to assure the money for policing and justice; they can whistle because they have the upper lip. The truth, as Mr Kennedy well knows, is that he cannot, and I suggest, should not, take the electorate for granted.

That is an insult to the electorate. We can be sure of one thing: his leader at Westminster, Mr Cameron, has promised that there will be cuts of 10%. There is no money for the devolution of policing and justice. Interestingly, the Ulster Unionist Party is looking both ways. Before I left Westminster, Conservative Front Bench Members told me that policing and justice powers must be devolved now. They may not have told Danny because he is too far down the chain. Nevertheless, they should have told his party leader. [Interruption.]

4.00 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. I hate to break up personal contact between Members, but I ask Members to address remarks through the Chair and to address the Chair.

Dr W McCrea: I am happy to do so.

They should have told the Member's leader. However, the Member has a problem because he is looking both ways. Is Mr Cameron his leader or is it Sir Reg Empey? He does not know.

We will not run away from the issue of the money for the devolution of policing and justice. We must ask ourselves whether we can trust the promise of a Labour leader that the money is there. He is a Prime Minister who might be in office for only a few months. He could face the situation in which he has to rely on Ulster votes to stay in power. Indeed, the Conservatives could have to rely on Ulster votes to get elected. Remember this: our votes will be used to do what is best for Ulster, unlike the actions of the Ulster Unionists in the past. We will make our decision based on what is good for Northern Ireland and Ulster. Can we trust either party? [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: I ask Members to address the Chair and not to speak from a sedentary position. If Members want to make an intervention, they should ask to do so.

Dr W McCrea: Can we trust either of the two parties across the water to make the decision to provide the money? The answer is no. We must remember that, in the past, they broke their word to Northern Ireland. Mr Kennedy and his party's friends forced the Anglo-Irish Agreement onto the people of Northern Ireland even though the people rejected it. Therefore, we cannot trust them to provide honest answers to the people of Northern Ireland. They messed up the reduction of police numbers, and the policy of 50:50 recruitment, and they destroyed the RUC through negotiations. That was under the leadership of the Ulster Unionist Party.

Words are cheap, and the people of this Province have been left to pick up the pieces and work with the mess. The money to pay for the devolution of policing and justice must be promised by Westminster or raised through taxes. However, as the Assembly does not have tax-raising powers, the money cannot be obtained by our raising taxes here. So, how can we secure that money and provide the services that are demanded by the community and that will resolve the demands of a dissatisfied public? The only way to do that, if there is no money coming from Westminster and if taxes cannot be raised, is by cutting services.

Mr Kennedy: Will the Member give way?

Dr W McCrea: With the greatest respect to Mr Kennedy, he had his opportunity at the beginning of the debate and failed miserably. Will he let me continue? [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. It is obvious that the Member does not want to give way, Mr Kennedy. Again, I ask Members to address their comments through the Chair and not to speak from a sedentary position when a Member does not give way.

Dr W McCrea: It is good that Mr Kennedy wants to give an answer. It will be interesting and entertaining.

Without money from Westminster, we will have to cut services and slash budgets. My question is: where? On top of all the pressures of recession, will those cuts be in education? Will they be in hospitals? Of course, some local hospitals are disappearing under the stewardship of Sinn Féin and Ulster Unionist Ministers. Will the cuts be in housing, roads or job creation? I listen to people in the community who tell me that they want MLAs to get on with the business that they were elected to do. Instead of looking for additional powers at this time —

A Member: Will you vote against the Bill?

Dr W McCrea: With the greatest respect, Members are still shouting from a sedentary position. They know that that is the opposite of parliamentary procedure. However, I suppose that they have never been there, and never will be there.

The community is craving for us to deal with the recession. People want us to deal with the issues that are having an impact on their daily lives. The community wants more police on the streets; it wants the thugs taken off the streets and it wants our elderly people to be able to sit in their houses at ease at night without fear of an attack. However, it is not good enough for Sinn Féin to simply say that, whether or not we can pay for it, we will have the devolution of policing and justice because of political dogma, as I said earlier, or because of a promise to its electorate that it knows it cannot keep.

Sinn Féin must wake up and smell the coffee. It can shut out reality; it can demand devolution of policing and justice immediately, or else. Or else what? I will come to that in a moment.

Sinn Féin has seats in the mother of Parliaments, but it does not go there; it absents itself. However, in that Parliament, a triple lock was secured; in fact, it was a quadruple lock. We were told that the devolution of policing and justice would come about when it was decided by the politicians in Northern Ireland. There were various steps to be taken by the First Minister and the deputy First Minister, and by the Assembly and Westminster, and those were to be put in place.

Does anyone think that, after fighting hard for the triple lock to get things right, to find answers and to achieve confidence, we, as elected representatives, should just roll over to appease Sinn Féin, and hand over to it the locks that were given by the mother of Parliaments? Should we let it unpick those locks as it did the vaults of the Northern Bank? As far as I am concerned, the answer is no. That is fantasy land; it is not reality. We had better face reality in this debate.

The cost of devolution is important, but there is another issue of concern to unionist people, which is the lack of community confidence. There is no lack of confidence in the brave men and women who protect us; indeed, we salute them, because they have defended the people of Northern Ireland through very difficult times, even when they faced murder, mayhem, destruction and terror. Those who were responsible for that terror ought to be condemned and the guilt must be upon their shoulders for so doing.

We salute the memory of those members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary GC, the Royal Ulster Constabulary Reserve and the other security forces who died, because they went out to protect us. We do not have a lack of confidence in those who protect us; but there is a lack of confidence in those who are in authority over them. The suggestions of continuous closures of police stations do not add in any way to the confidence of the unionist community.

There is no use in brushing things under the carpet; I call a spade a spade, and I might get into difficulties for that. Nevertheless, I would be happy to do so, because there are other issues in the community that must be dealt with before confidence can be gained.

Let us consider the issue of parades. There are people in the republican community who do not want any Prods' feet walking on what they call their roads. They do not want any Orange feet walking on their roads. In fact, those are the Queen's highways; they do not own those roads. Therefore, people should have the liberty to walk down Her Majesty's highways without insult to anyone.

My friend the Member for Upper Bann, who sits beside me, has campaigned constantly about the situation on the Garvaghy Road. The Member for North Antrim could talk to us about Rasharkin and other places.

We now find that the Orange Halls that have been damaged and are constantly under attack are no longer being attacked with paintbrushes: tractors are trying to bust into them. Tractors are being driven into the sides of them. Those issues have to be dealt with. We talk about having confidence in the community: we have to have confidence that those who perpetrate these despicable actions against a law-abiding community will be tackled and brought to justice.

When the police take certain actions, members of Sinn Féin howl and cry about a return to brutal tactics. They say that there is no need for all of these stoppages, and that there are not stoppages in both places. Those actions were aimed at dissident republicans. I do not know why the police would go into loyalist areas to look for dissident republicans.

We must deal with these issues, but the tragedy is that some people are not willing to face them. In the midst of our greatest economic crisis, what does Sinn Féin do? It threatens to pull the place down. It intimidates unionists, and says do not give control of policing and justice to them. Sinn Féin says that it will pull the House down. I suggest that Sinn Féin thinks very carefully about its actions. Remember this: unionist representatives, and the people that they represent, did not give in to IRA weapons, and we will not surrender to Sinn Féin words. We will not give in to demands that threaten and intimidate us, and tell us to do something or else. Those days are over.

In case anyone is under any illusion, as far as I am concerned, the issues, including those of finance and confidence, must be settled before we have proper devolution of policing and justice. Those issues cannot be brushed under the carpet.

I appeal to Members across the House who really want the devolution of policing and justice, and I am led to believe that every party has said that it wants the devolution of policing and justice. How do we hasten that moment? Allow Northern Ireland to have a genuine peace; allow terrorists to be taken on and defeated; and give evidence, if anyone has evidence, on who is perpetrating such dastardly acts as were perpetrated against two of my young friends at Massereene Barracks in Antrim.

We have a job of work to do. We must instil confidence within the community. People tell me what "the people" want. Where do they think I live?

Mrs D Kelly: On Mars.

Dr W McCrea: I have three offices in South Antrim. That might be a smart remark from the Member for Upper Bann, but I will tell her something. I have three offices in my constituency, which were not there before: at the end of the constituency in Glengormley; in the heart of the constituency, in Ballyclare; and in another part of the constituency, with my colleague the Member for South Antrim Mr Clarke, in Antrim town. We are in the community. We are with the community and we are listening to them. The community is not telling me day after day that the greatest need is for policing and justice to be devolved now. They say "get it right".

First, Sinn Féin should deal with the issues that it has power over, instead of threatening to bring the House down or putting logjams on legislation in this place. We must deal with the people that are hurting because of the recession, and try to help them through the most difficult days that any community has had to suffer in the recession, and then build that confidence, to allow people to be respected throughout the Province, whatever part they are in, to allow the community to move together.

Mr McFarland: Will the Member confirm that he is agreeing with the points that my colleagues and I made earlier — that the time is not right for the devolution of policing and justice?

Dr W McCrea: As far as I am concerned, the time is not right. The Bill does not do that.

The Ulster Unionists have a wonderful time building a straw man only to knock him down. That party does not tell the truth to the people of Northern Ireland. The Bill does not say that the devolution of policing and justice powers is imminent.

4.15 pm

Is the devolution of policing and justice powers not the Ulster Unionist Party's policy? Is it not the Conservative Party's policy? I had better be careful not to look in the direction of the Ulster Unionist Benches. Conservative policy is to devolve policing and justice powers now. That is what that party has told us. I see that Mr Kennedy is shaking his head. Has he not been talking to Mr Paterson or to Mr Campbell? Or, indeed, is the conversation one way, with the Conservatives saying, "this is what you should do, Mr Empey; we make demands and tell you what to do"? Do the Conservatives say "jump", and the Ulster Unionists say, "how high, Mr Cameron?" The Ulster Unionists may ask that question because they want to stay in with their coffers and keep what they gain from their relationship with the Conservatives.

I refer the question back to the Ulster Unionists. A statement made by Mr McNarry reads as follows:

“Any financial package for the transfer of policing and justice powers needs to be rigorously tested for its financial sustainability, risk management and contingency planning against potential shortfalls. It should be rolled out over a five-year period initially being funded entirely by Westminster. Only then, on the basis of the outcomes of this five-year period, should it be fully transferred.”

Is that the Ulster Unionist Party’s policy? That is not what Mr Kennedy said in the debate. The Ulster Unionist Party wants to be able to blame everyone else, and it tries to build up a straw man, only to knock him down. I do not need any straw man; I face the facts as they are. The Bill does not hasten by one hour the day of the devolution of justice and policing powers. The Bill is an enabling piece of legislation. If Mr Kennedy believes that policing and justice powers should be devolved at some time, why would he not approve the enabling power? The fact is that he is playing silly politics. That is not a sign of maturity; rather, it is a sign of total immaturity.

We know that SDLP members play little games with each other from time to time; I suppose we should allow them to have that enjoyment while it lasts.

The motion relates only to the Bill, which is a piece of enabling legislation. I assure the House that if the Bill stated the date for the devolution of policing and justice powers, I would vote against it. However, the Bill does not do that, and Mr Kennedy should not pretend that it does. The Ulster Unionist Party should pay more respect to the people out there, because they can read. They know exactly what the Bill says. They do not accept what is read into the Bill by someone who has a political agenda of his own, failed as it is.

I say to all Members that they should face reality. They should allow Northern Ireland to have confidence and stability, and when the day comes that the devolution of policing and justice powers is appropriate, enabling legislation will be in place to facilitate it. That day will come, it will be tested, and each party will have to declare its hand.

I know exactly where I stand, but I doubt whether Mr Kennedy knows where Mr McNarry or some of his other colleagues stand on the issue.

Mr O’Dowd: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. After that 34-minute speech, we can only be glad that the previous Member to speak did not sing.

As several Members said, the Bill is a piece of enabling legislation. I am surprised that the SDLP has not clarified whether it will vote against the motion. The Ulster Unionist Party said that it will vote against it, even though it is in favour of the devolution of policing and justice powers. That is disappointing, because voting against the motion will be not done for credible reasons; however, I will go into that later.

I will work my way through Members’ contributions, including that of William McCrea. It is no coincidence, a LeasCheann Comhairle, that three of the 12 apostles are sitting side by side. Two of those Members have made the most negative contributions to the debate on policing and justice thus far. Indeed, I think that those Members’ speeches were directed to their own party rather than to anyone on this side of the Chamber. However, those matters will have to be resolved in DUP meetings and discussions.

When I sat here during the Hain Assembly, the interim Assembly and all the other Assemblies, I heard similar words from the 12 apostles. I heard all sorts of demands being placed on society, on Government and on my party. They always spoke about what they would not do rather than what they would do. “Never, never, never” was the mantra that was always used across the Chamber. However, in fairness to them, they eventually did the right thing for broader society. They agreed to share power with their nationalist and republican neighbours. I am not criticising the DUP for that, because that was the right decision. Having been so negative during that period, that party eventually made the right decision.

I hope that the right decision is also made about the devolution of policing and justice powers. Although it is being debated among politicians here, the Bill is about improving the community’s daily lot. It is about ensuring that we deliver for the community. I have heard a lot from some Members about the need for community confidence and community support. We must not deny the community its fundamental right to policing and justice. We must not deny ourselves, as politicians, authority over policing and justice, and I do not mean interference in the day-to-day operation of the courts or policing. If we deny those things, we will truly have let the community down.

William McCrea made much of financial contributions. He is right in some ways, because we need a good financial settlement. However, the argument was countered by his interactions with the Ulster Unionist Party about David Cameron’s promise to make 10% cuts across the board. Is William McCrea arguing that David Cameron will not touch policing and justice in the North of Ireland if he gets into power, with the matter having been left in the hands of the British Government? Is he telling us that David Cameron will not take 10% off the NIO budget? Of course he will; David Cameron will slash the NIO budget.

In these hard financial times, we need to ensure that it is local politicians who manage the finances. As local politicians, we must ensure that those cuts, which are designed simply to balance the books, are not made. Politics is very difficult, and anyone who entered politics, or this place, for an easy ride is foolish. Politics is about having the courage to make hard decisions, and the decision to share power was one such decision.

The Ulster Unionist Party's stance on the Bill is not sincere. That party is using the Bill as a political weapon as it seeks electoral revenge on the Democratic Unionist Party. Every party has the political right to try to increase its mandate, but I ask the leadership of the Ulster Unionist Party to reflect on its strategy. Its strategy appears to be to object to the Department of Justice Bill because it is being proposed by the DUP and Sinn Féin. The Ulster Unionist Party has hitched its wagon to the Traditional Unionist Voice.

The Traditional Unionist Voice agenda is quite simple: to tear down the institutions and the power-sharing arrangements and return us to a pre-1969 arrangement. Perhaps some members of the Ulster Unionist Party and the DUP believe that that would be some sort of Utopia. It is complete and utter political madness, and it is not going to happen. No Government involved in the process, either the British Government, the Irish Government, or, indeed, the Government of the United States, is going to agree to such a strategy for this part of Ireland. Why waste political time and energy hankering after something that is not going to happen?

The Ulster Unionist Party claims to support power sharing. I heard Mr McFarland and some other representatives of his party say that they want the Executive to work and for services to be delivered on the ground.

Why is that party choosing a strategy that, in effect, will bring an end to this institution? That is what it is about. That is what it has hitched its wagon to.

Mr B McCrea: The issue is whether the Executive or the Assembly will work in the open, transparent and consensual way that was envisaged. If the mess in education cannot be sorted out, if the Executive cannot meet and work constructively, if all Ministers are not involved in the decision-making process, a consensus cannot be achieved, there will not be community confidence and this place will be doomed to failure because it will be burdened with issues that it cannot cope with.

Mr O'Dowd: With respect, under the Ulster Unionist Party's strategy, there will not be an Executive, because Jim Allister is intent on tearing down these institutions, the power-sharing arrangements and the peace process. The Ulster Unionist Party has hitched its wagon to him, which is an electoral strategy; not a political strategy.

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Mr O'Dowd: No, I will not give way. Dr McCrea again raised the issue of community confidence, as did one of the other apostles. I want someone from the DUP Benches to tell me how they are building confidence in the unionist community. No Member from the Benches opposite has touched on that subject.

Is there a responsibility on me, as an Irish republican, to assist in that process? Yes, there is. Is there a responsibility on me, as a Sinn Féin representative, to do that? Yes, there is. However, we cannot do it on unionism's behalf. I want to know what unionism is doing to build community confidence.

Mr T Clarke: As my colleague from South Antrim Dr McCrea said, he and I are members of the Loyal Orders. We make no apology for that. Mr O'Dowd, by his own admission, said that he can help in the process of building confidence. He can help with the parades issue, which would instil confidence in the unionist/Protestant community. It is the Member's party that holds the key to achieving that. We are proud to be members of the Loyal Orders. We want to walk the Queen's highway, which the Member and his party try to prevent us from doing. Until his party help in that process, there will be no confidence in the unionist community.

Mr O'Dowd: Mr Clarke must understand that the Loyal Orders are one section of the unionist community; they are not "the" unionist community. They are an important section, but they do not speak on behalf of the unionist community.

I assume that Mr Clarke is a member of the Orange Order. If we are to build confidence for the transfer of policing and justice powers, perhaps the best thing that could happen would be for the Orange Order to start to engage with nationalist communities. It could also start to engage with Sinn Féin, which represents, through the ballot box, the majority of the nationalist and republican community. Therefore, Mr Clarke could use his influence on the Orange Order. If that organisation's representatives were to knock on Sinn Féin's door for talks, we will talk to them.

Mr T Clarke: If the Member casts his mind back, he will remember a recent parade in Rasharkin. Dialogue about that parade was suggested. However, a member of Mr O'Dowd's party openly protested on the street on the evening of the parade in an attempt to prevent the Orangemen walking down the street.

Mr McKay: It was not the Orangemen. Get your facts straight.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. During their contributions, Members should turn their attention to the Bill. They can have other discussions on another day. Also, Members should speak through the Chair.

Mr O'Dowd: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. It is important that the Bill passes its Second Stage today. I am sure that the Member opposite will agree that the legitimate right to protest is enshrined in any democracy, which will continue to be the case when policing and justice powers are transferred. I am sure that the Member has been involved in the odd protest. I want to ensure that we have the confidence of the unionist community for the transfer of those powers.

The closure of police stations has also been mentioned as being damaging to the unionist community's confidence. The closure of police stations is the operational responsibility of the area commander; it will not be the responsibility of the next justice Minister, whoever that may be, nor will it be the responsibility of any justice Committee. It will and should remain the operational responsibility of the senior police officers on the ground, who know the requirements of the communities that they serve. Those officers should consult widely with the local DPPs and should engage with community representatives, but the responsibility lies with them.

Mrs D Kelly: I thank the Member for giving way. I am sure that the Member is well aware of the proposed closure of Edward Street police station in Portadown.

Does the Member not share my surprise that only 12 members of the public attended three meetings about the closure and that just one letter was received expressing opposition to it? None of those people was a political representative.

4.30 pm

Mr O'Dowd: Some parties are using the closure of police stations as a political platform rather than dealing with the needs of the communities that they serve.

I return now to the enabling powers for the transfer of policing and justice. Mr McCrea said that there must be confidence in the PSNI and how it operates. I agree with him 100%. It is also worth noting that the PSNI's senior command structure supports the transfer of policing and justice. Confidence, therefore, exists in that organisation, and the people whom we task with delivering policing on the ground are confident.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair)

However, some people assume that the Police Service cannot be criticised. Willie McCrea and others criticised Alex Maskey for his stance today. During the summer, the PSNI arrested four of approximately 100 loyalists who gathered in a small nationalist enclave in Banbridge. Senior members of the DUP in the area were with the loyalists at the time, but none of them was arrested. However, they protested about those arrests outside the police station. Is that wrong? Were they entitled to do that? Are they, as public representatives, entitled to share the concerns of those people? I believe that they are. What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander.

I will move on to other contributions to today's debate.

Mr Simpson: Have you protested outside Lurgan police station?

Mr O'Dowd: Many times, and if I consider there to be a requirement to do so in the future, I will protest again.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I again ask Members not to speak from a sedentary position.

Mr Moutray: Does the Member agree that community relations in Banbridge were among the best in the Province until four years ago when a Sinn Féin councillor was elected to Banbridge District Council? That was the source of the discord of last summer and since his election.

Mr O'Dowd: I will abbreviate what Mr Moutray said: many loyalists were upset because the people of Banbridge exercised their democratic right to elect a Sinn Féin representative. Surely that is wrong.

Confidence is a cross-community factor. Republicans and nationalists must have confidence in the institutions, and we also face challenges. The administration of policing and justice in this part of Ireland does not have a fine history; it has, in fact, a dark history. As republicans, we want to assure, and be assured, that we get policing and justice right and that a new justice Department will not be open to the abuses of the past. As part of that, we must have confidence in the Benches opposite. We must ensure that the DUP and the Ulster Unionists operate in a fair and open-minded manner. We could come up with excuses to argue against the transfer of policing and justice.

Mr Campbell devoted his contribution to giving Sinn Féin a lecture on how it must step up to the mark. Mr Campbell, I observed you over the summer in Coleraine. You certainly have not stepped up to the mark. [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. I ask the Member to direct his remarks through the Chair.

Mr O'Dowd: Tá brón orm, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Were I to seek confidence in the unionist community from leadership such as his, I would not have any confidence at all. I am thankful, however, that Mr Campbell's stance in Coleraine is not representative of the majority of the unionist community.

Mr Campbell: The Member said that the nationalist community in Banbridge elected a single Sinn Féin councillor. Does he accept that the scenario in Coleraine is exactly the same? I happen to have been elected by many people there, and when I speak for them, I speak for them. No intimidation from anyone inside or outside the Chamber, from the Back Benches or the Front Benches, will change my attitude.

Mr O'Dowd: I agree with the Member that he was elected by the people of Coleraine. I am glad that he used the word "intimidation", since he has failed miserably to provide leadership during the ongoing intimidation and murder. He has shown moral and political cowardice throughout.

I have listened with intent to contributions from SDLP Members. I think that they have spoken for about one hour during the debate. During that entire time, I have not heard the needs of the community being mentioned once. I have not heard the word “community” mentioned once. All that I have heard about is the needs of the Social Democratic and Labour Party, what it wants and what it requires, not what is needed by the community in relation to policing and justice, or what is needed for an ongoing peace process and the establishment of a new beginning on this island. All that I have heard from SDLP Members is what they need and how badly they feel that they have been treated in recent times.

SDLP Members may believe that it is disingenuous of Sinn Féin to support a nomination from the SDLP Benches. We would do so, but we cannot persuade Mr Robinson, the leader of the DUP — or, as has already been stated, the Ulster Unionists — to support it. If the SDLP requires cross-community support, which is, as Martina Anderson stated, enshrined in the Good Friday Agreement, it is up to it alone to see Mr Robinson and Reg Empey and persuade the two parties opposite to support it. For many years, the SDLP has told us that it receives support from all sections of the community. It is now time to use that influence and get support from the Benches opposite. Sinn Féin is on record as saying that, if the SDLP nominates, it will support that nomination.

Much has been made about compromises in all negotiations. We are in a divided society. We are building a peace process, and we are moving on to a new beginning in this part of Ireland. All parties need to compromise their positions. For that, Sinn Féin does not apologise. We will not compromise on any of the basic principles of the Good Friday Agreement or what we are about. However, if the SDLP tells us —

Mr Gallagher: I thank the Member for giving way. He spoke about compromise, and I remind him that the SDLP opposes the Bill because it will stand the principles of equality and inclusion, as laid out in the Good Friday Agreement, on their head. It looks as if Sinn Féin will not assent to that. Furthermore, the exclusion of the d’Hondt principle, regardless of what party it applies to, although it applies to the SDLP in this case, is a fundamental and flagrant injustice.

Mr O’Dowd: The injustice that I have heard about so far is the one that the SDLP claims is being done to it, not to the community or to the people who need policing and justice or to the communities who need a new beginning. In a one-hour contribution to the debate thus far, two SDLP Members have not once mentioned the community.

Mrs D Kelly: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. If Mr O’Dowd has the chance to go upstairs and check a copy of the Hansard report, he will find that we spoke about the needs of the community. In fact, the SDLP led on policing reforms. The Johnny-come-latelys of Sinn Féin did not support policing for eight years.

Mr Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order.

Mr O’Dowd: I am more than happy to check the Hansard report. The SDLP’s position of giving in to the Mandelson Bill held back policing reform. As has already been said by the deputy First Minister, the SDLP never once requested the transfer of policing and justice powers to the Assembly.

The SDLP and the UUP try to present the alternative Government to the media and how things would be different if they were in charge. From today’s debate, however, it is clear that the Ulster Unionist Party fundamentally disagrees with the SDLP about how policing and justice powers should be transferred, how the Minister should be elected and what powers there should be. There would be no agreement between those two parties if they were in charge.

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Mr O’Dowd: No; I have given way enough. I am about to come to an end. Today is a stepping stone towards the transfer of policing and justice powers. Sinn Féin does not demand it because it wants it.

It is not a case of Sinn Féin putting it up to any party, or else: that terminology has not been used by any of its Members here, in private, or in briefings to anyone else. We are seeking the transfer of policing and justice because it is required, needed on the ground and because communities are crying out for it. We are seeking policing and justice because it is part of the St Andrews Agreement, which was signed up to by the party sitting opposite and by the Irish and British Governments, which also have responsibilities in relation to this issue. Sinn Féin is seeking the transfer of policing and justice because the party is about creating a new beginning for the lives of everyone on the island of Ireland.

Mr G Robinson: I commence by identifying some areas of crucial importance; namely, public confidence, budgetary requirements and infrastructure.

I do not believe that public confidence and the budget are available in significant quantities at the moment to ensure an early date for devolution of policing and justice. However, we must be prepared for the day when it eventually arrives, and the debate is concentrating on the mechanism for that event.

The motion ensures that the framework will exist and the Department will have a name when devolution occurs. People must understand clearly that the Bill is not the start of policing and justice being devolved; it puts in place the infrastructure that will be required when that happens.

For devolution to occur, the qualifying criteria of public confidence and sufficient funding to run the justice Department must be met. I do not believe that anyone could say that public confidence is anywhere near high enough throughout the Northern Ireland population for the process to begin. There are obvious and major concerns that the funding required for Northern Ireland to have the policing and justice systems that it deserves will fall far short of what is really needed.

I appreciate and thank the First Minister for his ongoing efforts to have the level of funding raised to a realistic level. Like me, he believes that Northern Ireland deserves only the best and must have the budget to ensure its delivery. As the motion is purely technical and designed to put in place the structures needed to form a justice Department, I support it.

Mr B McCrea: There is a temptation in this debate to have a little bit of fun, settle scores, and play a bit of political knockabout. Yet, there are serious issues for us to debate and discuss. In the past, I have made it clear to Members on the Front Bench that if they want to engage properly with us, we will engage. We understand the difficulties facing the Executive, the Assembly, and other matters: Ulster Unionists are prepared to discuss them.

However, we are not prepared to be presented with a fait accompli that we are asked to rubber-stamp. If nothing else has been learnt in the past, Members should have learnt that nothing progresses in Northern Ireland without consensus. Consensus is not demanded; it is built by trust. Showing that something is being done right, and well, builds confidence that something more can be done.

Our opposition to the Bill is principled. We have been vilified in the debate by Members in the Alliance Party; we have been patronised by Members in the DUP; and we have been given a lecture in the obvious from Sinn Féin. However, all of that is for nothing. You should not talk to us; you should listen to us, because we have got things to say that need to be heard. We understand that the DUP is the largest party and that Sinn Féin is the second-largest party, but both parties can move nowhere if they do not bring all of Northern Ireland society with them.

4.45 pm

At the outset, I should have declared an interest as a member of the Policing Board; I do so now. I have looked at the intimate details of the financial challenges facing the PSNI. I also talk to senior and junior officers and I understand their frustrations and the changes that they would like to see made, and I appreciate the areas of best practice in which the PSNI is falling behind other forces. The PSNI would like to address all those issues and engage positively with the Northern Ireland people in order to make things better for everyone, but it cannot do that in an environment in which nothing else works.

When addressing the motion, I must point out our performance with respect to other issues, notably, from my perspective, education, although I know that other Members mentioned parades and such like. If we cannot address those issues and find proper closure and a satisfactory way forward for all of the people of Northern Ireland, what makes us think that we can do it with policing and justice? That will be the straw that breaks the camel's back.

When it comes to putting out some of the facts, there was much discussion, and some Members were reluctant —

Mrs Long: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: — to give way, Mr Speaker, but I am not one of them. [Laughter.]

Mrs Long: With respect to the Member's point about the Executive's failures on education and on a range of other matters, maybe the Member will clarify whether he would prefer those matters to be un-devolved and sent back to be dealt with at Westminster. Would his party prefer direct rule to devolution, because that is the natural outworking of what he has said? If he is saying that underperformance in those areas makes devolution completely flawed, surely he must argue for sending the responsibility for those matters back to Westminster.

Mr B McCrea: I must say, and I do so with some reluctance, that many parents in Northern Ireland today wish that education was not devolved. They worry about the fate of their children. They want clarity and someone to make decisions, whatever those decisions might be. Instead, we have a complete and utter mess.

Mr Campbell: The Member alluded to the frustrations that we know many parents have about education. But he said that many parents would prefer the education process to be un-devolved. Does he accept that if that were the case, we would have no academic selection of any kind to complain about?

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. I encourage Members to get back to discussing the motion, which is about justice.

Mr B McCrea: I assure you Mr Speaker that I will do that, but I will briefly address the point that was raised.

Although some people have a view about academic selection, a good school is what most people want.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. Please stick to the subject of the debate.

Mr B McCrea: Returning to the debate, certain statements and calls for clarification were made about the general principle, and, because some Members believe that there is a distinct possibility that the Conservative Party will form the next Government, they have alluded to what that party thinks, does and says. For the record, and because Members do not understand, let me quote what Owen Paterson said during the passage of the Northern Ireland Act 2009:

“We have therefore always supported the eventual devolution of criminal justice and policing, when the conditions were right and once the proposed model for devolution had the support of all the communities.”

That is the standard, and I am also prepared to say — [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Members should make their remarks through the Chair.

Mr A Maskey: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: Can I answer that point? Fair enough, go ahead if you have a point.

Mr A Maskey: Once again, a LeasCheann Comhairle, the Ulster Unionist Party has quoted Owen Paterson’s remarks with respect to the legislation that passed through the British Parliament.

Would the Member care to go on to say what Owen Paterson proceeded to say and do? The Conservative Party supported the legislation’s passage through Westminster, unlike the Ulster Unionist Party. Can the Member clarify for which part of the party the UUP is now speaking?

Mr B McCrea: I understand the point that the Member opposite is making. The reason that we oppose this particular stage of the Bill is that we think that there is undue haste to devolve policing and justice powers. When the First Minister spoke, he outlined —

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for giving way. The phrase “undue haste” struck a chord, because it was Dr McCrea who said that this legislation is being driven forward with undue haste. Was that not a fine statement?

Mr B McCrea: I am grateful to my colleague for bringing that point to my attention. I agreed with many of the comments that the Reverend Dr William McCrea made during his speech — certainly in the first hour of it that I heard. In fact, Mr Kennedy said that we thought that he was coming over to support us, because all the points that he made are precisely the reason that we have an issue with the legislation. Frankly, I cannot understand why there is a dichotomy in the DUP’s position on the devolution of policing and justice powers. Why does the DUP say one thing in public but other things in private? No community confidence yet exists to move the legislation forward.

Our concern represents a principled opposition to undue haste in progressing the legislation. I think that I heard today —

Mr O’Dowd: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: I will give way in a moment. I think that I heard — I could be wrong — from the deputy First Minister that we are looking to get things done by Wednesday; that we are going to get things sorted out very quickly. That seems to me to be —

Dr W McCrea: I think that I dealt with that.

Mr B McCrea: I am not sure that the Member did, because I would not be surprised if policing and justice powers were devolved before Christmas or at least the —

Dr W McCrea: Wise up.

Mr B McCrea: I will tell the Member why, and I am putting out a challenge here. The window of opportunity to devolve policing and justice powers, if we are to do that, is open before Christmas. It is probably open in the last week in October and the first couple of weeks in November. After Christmas, we are into Westminster elections, when there will be purdah —

Mr T Clarke: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: I will finish my point and then let people in. We will go into purdah, during which time we will get no decisions from Westminster. There will possibly be a change of Government, but certainly there will be a Government that will have many financial matters to deal with in the United Kingdom. They will not be interested in this place. We will then have Assembly elections. It will be three years, at the very least, before powers can be devolved.

I do not know whether it is the case, but I have heard it said that it is politically untenable for Sinn Féin to wait that long, because it has made promises, which it is quite OK for it to do. However, we have been told that, if we do not pass the legislation now, the danger is that the Assembly will collapse. The danger is that we are trying to satisfy one set of expediencies at the expense of others. We do not want to put that particular test to the people of Northern Ireland. That is why we are saying that we should be objecting to the Bill now. I am talking directly to each and every Member of the Assembly when I say not to put my party in a box that says that we are rejecting the legislation out of hand. Do not say that this is party political posturing or that we are trying to make political gain at the expense of unionist colleagues. That is not the case. What we are saying directly to Members here and now is that there is a problem.

If Members want to come to talk to us, they can do that. Despite all the platitudes that have come in our direction, nobody has come to talk to us. Members have said in the Chamber that we have had a difference of opinion with the SDLP.

I am happy to be corrected — the SDLP can speak for itself, and I will take an intervention — but I understand that the SDLP's preference is to rerun d'Hondt in its entirety and, if that is not possible, the next party should take the office. That party happens to be the SDLP. We agree with that position. The leader of our party is on record as saying that we will support an SDLP candidate, having said what our position is first.

Mrs Long: Perhaps the Member will clarify what his party leader was raging about in the newspapers when somebody uncovered the miraculous information that David Ford is not a unionist. He said that an Alliance Party Member holding the post of justice Minister would have serious implications because it would be unthinkable that a non-unionist should occupy that office. He was, in effect, hanging a “no nationalist need apply” sign over the door.

Mr B McCrea: During this debate, Mr McFarland stated our position categorically.

Dr Farry: Reg Empey is wrong.

Mr B McCrea: Mr Deputy Speaker, intemperate remarks are coming from a sedentary position to my right. I shall ignore them and press on.

Mr Ford: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: Of course I will give way to the leader of the opposition. Sorry; he is not the leader of the opposition any more.

Mr Ford: I am delighted that the Member has given way. Perhaps he should have listened to Naomi Long's question. The simple fact is that the leader of the Member's wing of UCUNF said in the press that the justice Minister must be a unionist; now he is saying that a member of the SDLP is acceptable. Which does he mean? He cannot mean both.

Mr B McCrea: In the Great Hall, I have had to deal with some inappropriate language from Alliance Party colleagues. I find it offensive that the Alliance Party — a party that was founded on the principles of inclusivity — tried to take political advantage of a situation to realise its real ambition of making itself relevant and making one of its Members the Minister of justice. My comments are being reported by Hansard. We have serious concerns that if the proper procedures are not followed in the selection of a Minister of justice, that Minister will not be able to command the support of the entire House and of society as a whole.

Dr W McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: I am sorry; I have to carry on. — [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret that I have to ask Members again to ensure that their remarks are made through the Chair. It is my responsibility to ensure that I hear what is being said, but I cannot hear because of remarks that are being made inappropriately. Let that be the final request for respect for the Chair.

Dr W McCrea: May I ask the Member a question very respectfully so that you will hear, Mr Deputy Speaker? Did the leader of the Ulster Unionist Party in Northern Ireland say that the justice Minister would have to be a unionist? How does that equate with Mr Basil McCrea's statement that an SDLP member would do? I did not know that the SDLP had joined the unionist camp.

Mr B McCrea: That question would be best put to the man himself, who is not here. [Interruption.] For those of you who care to listen rather than indulge in pointless rhetoric, our position is that if you want to resolve the issue, you will have to start talking to the rest of the people here and not only the DUP/Sinn Féin axis.

The position of the Ulster Unionist Party, which was stated earlier by Mr McFarland and which will be stated again by Danny Kennedy, is to agree with the SDLP and to rerun d'Hondt. If that is not possible —

5.00 pm

Mr McFarland: We are clearly confused here — [Laughter.]

It was not the policy of the SDLP to rerun d'Hondt; it was the Ulster Unionist Party's. During the meetings of the Assembly and Executive Review Committee, the policy of the SDLP was to run on the end of d'Hondt, but I am happy that it has now joined with us in suggesting rerunning d'Hondt.

The Ulster Unionist Party has made it clear from the start that if a new Department is to be created, d'Hondt must be rerun. Under that, a unionist — in this case the DUP — would have first choice of Departments and could take the Department of justice. That is the context of that comment, and to suggest that it meant something else is incorrect.

Mr B McCrea: It may or may not be rubbish. [Laughter.] In the sense — [Interruption.]

I take many interventions in the House, and I am prepared to answer straight questions with straight answers. There are very few Members from whom I have refused to take an intervention, and what I now see in the Chamber is very childish behaviour.

I have precious few opportunities to offer Members a solution or to suggest what they should do. However, there are several things that the Executive must do: they must resolve the education debacle; they must prove that the Executive can meet in a totally inclusive way; they must deal with some of the more contentious issues in ‘A Shared Future’ — although I am not sure what document we are dealing with now — and they must prove that they have the maturity to deal with real issues. If they can do all those things, they will demonstrate to the people of Northern Ireland that they are making decisions, that they can make it work, and that they can be trusted. What I have seen recently does not fill me with confidence, and when people —

Mr O’Dowd: We hear a great deal from the Ulster Unionist Party about the responsibility of others. What is the responsibility of the Ulster Unionist Party on the devolution of policing and justice? Furthermore, what is unionism, and particularly Mr McCrea’s class of unionism, doing to promote confidence in the unionist community on policing and justice?

Mr B McCrea: The responsibility of the Ulster Unionist Party is to place the devolution of policing and justice in a stable political environment. Our caution to the Assembly is that if those powers are devolved with undue haste and without the appropriate consensus, such stress will be placed on the Assembly that it might collapse and we might never get it back again. That is an important issue, although some Members have said that that does not matter, and the House had a lecture earlier from Sinn Féin about what such a collapse would mean.

In 1998, the Ulster Unionist Party did the heavy lifting. It took the risks to put the Assembly together through conversation with our colleagues in the SDLP while some johnny-come-latelys from Sinn Féin tagged along at the end, and there was neither sight nor sound of the DUP.

Because we believe in devolution, we addressed the important issues: ‘A Shared Future’, the people of Northern Ireland, and the way forward, and we have taken heavy losses in doing the right thing. When Members use platitudes and tell us that we must do the right thing, I must tell them that we are doing the right thing.

We are saying that this is not the right time and that conditions are not right. You have not built the consensus; you have not got community confidence, and you have not shown us that you can do anything worthwhile. In fact, I found it particularly rich when the deputy First Minister stood up, intervened, and said that we brought the Assembly down, when he held it to ransom for 150 days. That sort of hypocrisy makes everybody else in the country look at this place and wonder what we are doing up on the hill.

Dr Farry: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Mr McCrea has accused the deputy First Minister of being a hypocrite, which is unparliamentary language. He needs to withdraw that remark.

Mr B McCrea: I have no problem with that. If there is an issue about what I said, I can say that the party is hypocritical. [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker — [Interruption.] I give way to Mr McCallister.

Mr McCallister: I am grateful to my honourable friend. Would he be surprised to learn of the Alliance Party’s stand just over a year ago when its leader, David Ford, said that the Alliance Party would not take the policing and justice Ministry? He went on to make the same argument when he said:

“The Alliance Party will not be taking the Policing and Justice Ministry. This Executive is failing in its duties, so Northern Ireland needs a strong and coherent opposition. We are providing that opposition and we will continue to do so. The Executive is in crisis over planning, the environment, the 11-plus, Irish language, and the multi-sports stadium issue”, to name but a few. [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. I am having difficulty hearing Members, and there is an important issue that I need to clear up. Did I hear Mr McCrea say that he would withdraw the remark “hypocrite”? That is necessary for the Hansard report. Mr McCrea may continue.

Mr B McCrea: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. The intervention from my colleague Mr McCallister is helpful. It shows that there are people in the Chamber who have got ambitions that do not solely rest beyond their own self interest. If the Assembly wishes to come to terms with the future and not look to the past or rehearse the old arguments, or not be a hostage to those things that were wrong, but look forward, confident in its ability to deal with the challenges that face our society, that can be done in discussion here. Those are issues.

With regard to registering our disapproval and our concern for the timescale, which I accept is not present in enabling legislation, there are other issues that lead us to believe that those decisions will be taken sooner rather than later. We wish to make it clear that any undue haste or unseemly rush to make an appointment will end in severe disappointment, and that is the point that we are trying to make. We will use whatever political platform we have to address those issues. Do not misinterpret it: do not think that we are against the devolution of policing and justice in principle. We want to have control over those issues, and we want to tackle all the problems facing society in Northern Ireland. We want to have control, but we can do so only when we have the correct conditions.

From my experience on the Policing Board, I know about the financial pressures on the PSNI, and other elements of the criminal justice system are severe and are likely to get worse. We must deal with those issues, and we cannot countenance the early devolution of policing and justice until those issues are sorted out.

I want to conclude on those matters, and I hope that I have not baulked at anyone who wanted to have a go. I hope that everybody who wanted to have a go has had a go. I see the First Minister on his feet. I was a bit worried that I had neglected him.

The First Minister: I am grateful to the Member for giving way; he has been generous in giving way when Members have asked. He indicates that the force of the Ulster Unionist Party's position is that it is a principled position; that party supports the devolution of policing and justice, but has concerns about the timing. That is a perfectly sensible position to adopt, but the Bill does not say anything about the timing of the devolution of policing and justice. It is about the principle that, at a point in time, when the Assembly decides it appropriate, it will draw down the powers. It is an enabling piece of legislation dealing with the principle alone. If his party agrees with that principle, why would it not support the Bill? If it does not agree with the timing at the stage when it is brought forward, it will have the opportunity then to vote against the transfer on account of the timing.

Mr B McCrea: I thank the First Minister. I was coming to a conclusion, so I will answer that point, and it will then be for someone else to carry on the debate.

The point that we are making is that, when a Bill comes before the Assembly for its Second Stage, that is one of the opportunities for us to outline our very real concerns. The most important thing that I can say is that we need to have a proper discussion among all parties about those issues, with a view to moving forward.

Some people may disagree with the tactic that we have chosen, and which I believe other parties have chosen, but we want to emphasise and reinforce our absolute concern about what appears to be a runaway train. We do not want the devolution of policing and justice to happen unless it is going to succeed, but we do want it to happen, and we are prepared to engage. We are not playing party politics. We are prepared to take the brickbats from others in the Chamber, because that seems to amuse them. We are trying to send a serious message to everyone: if they want to move forward on contentious issues, all parties in the Executive — in fact, I would go so far as to say all parties — need to be involved in the discussions, and their concerns must be taken countenance of.

Mr Durkan: The Bill has three clauses, and constitutes enabling legislation. Clause 1 and clause 3 present no problems for the SDLP. We fundamentally oppose clause 2, because it is a fundamental departure from the provisions and promise of the Good Friday Agreement. We stand by that agreement.

The principle of the devolution of justice and policing is one that the SDLP cherishes and champions. We have pressed, urged and called for the devolution of justice and policing for many years. While Sinn Féin was opposing the devolution of justice and policing that was taking place in 2001 and 2002 — through the establishment of the Policing Board and the transfer of powers from the Secretary of State and NIO to the Policing Board on the one hand and the Chief Constable on the other — the SDLP was making the devolution of justice and policing happen. We are not going to take lectures or questions from Sinn Féin suggesting that we have opposed the progress of the devolution of justice and policing or the implementation of the Patten report. We drove the implementation of the Patten report when Sinn Féin was still rejecting it.

When I was deputy First Minister, I sought agreement with the then First Minister on how to frame progress in relation to the wider debate on the devolution of justice and policing powers to the Assembly. I also raised that issue in meetings with members of other parties, including Gerry Adams and Martin McGuinness, when I discussed the possibility of taking some new initiatives in the Executive, including, perhaps, the appointment of additional junior Ministers from some of the other parties, because there was further work to be done to build on devolution. Unfortunately, those proposed initiatives came to nothing because of the sort of disagreements that were ongoing at that time. We know what those were, and we know what brought about suspension in October 2002.

I was on public record as saying that we needed to start framing our understanding of how we would move forward on the devolution of justice and policing. Even after suspension in October 2002, when all-party talks were convened by the two Governments, again we were saying that the whole question of making progress on the devolution of justice and policing had to be included in those negotiations.

That was included in various submissions that we have made in other talks since then, including those at Leeds Castle and elsewhere. Therefore, I do not take any nonsense from Sinn Féin that we have not been pushing for the devolution of justice and policing.

5.15 pm

We believe in the devolution of justice and policing, not only because we are democrats who believe in maximising the powers that are exercised by democratically elected people on this island but because we believe that that is clearly provided for in the vision that is set out in the Good Friday Agreement and in Patten, which stems from the agreement. We believe that the Assembly will only be deserving of the title of a legislative Assembly when it has the power to legislate on criminal law.

We are also very clear that there could be key benefits across a number of services to the community if justice and policing were devolved, because there could be better meshing of programmes, better gearing of policies and better organisation and sharing of budgets across services if they were all to come under the devolved Budget. Only a couple of weeks ago, the SDLP ran a conference in Belfast on youth justice, and we used that as an example of why we are crying out for the devolution of justice and policing.

A number of services that are already under devolved control are also relevant to justice and policing, but we do not always get proper meshing and interface between services, resulting in budget breakdowns and budget black holes. Contrary to what Mr O'Dowd says, we are very strong and positive, for good community reasons, in our support for improving our services and improving performance and efficiency as we deliver them across the sectors. We believe in the devolution of justice and policing.

We have also consistently said that the parties here should unite to deliver the devolution of justice and policing, not only by completing the Good Friday Agreement but by facing down the sinister threat from so-called republican so-called dissidents. We have said consistently that those people are still using the old Provo-speak of "Crown forces", "British police force", "collaboration" and "collusion", which is what we heard from the Provos and Sinn Féin during the 1980s and 1990s. They are using that language not only to intimidate members of the Police Service and to extend that intimidation and threat to their families but to try to create a wider sense of intimidation and fear across the community.

The best answer that we, as democrats, can give to the dissidents is to unite. We showed a united response after the murders in Antrim and Craigavon earlier this year, but we must show not only a united temporary, emotional response but united deep-running and real political unity. We can best do that by joining to deliver the devolution of justice and policing, and that is what we want to do. We know the sinister agenda of the dissidents, and we know that they are trying to use the present sense of instability and uncertainty.

I hope that some Members will be more careful with some of the language that they use in the debate. Saying that there have been all sorts of threats in the exchanges that are going on privately is dangerous talk. I hope that that is not the tone of any exchanges that are going on between Sinn Féin and the DUP and between the First Minister and the deputy First Minister. I hope that it is not the tone of any briefings that the DUP is giving to its people, because if people were to try to create the impression that we will be on the verge of collapse if someone does not get their way on this issue, it would be grist to the mill of the dissidents. They want to create and feed off the prospect of instability, so they will continue to exploit any differences and difficulties that there are around the issue. Let us resolve those difficulties sooner rather than later.

Mr O'Dowd: Given the laudable reasons that the Member has given for the need for the transfer of policing and justice, will he set aside his party's selfish and narrow interests on the matter and vote in support of the transfer of policing and justice?

Mr Durkan: The Member suggests that support for the Good Friday Agreement is a selfish party interest. It is absolutely fundamental to us, and we have stood by it.

We are aware that Sinn Féin has ditched all sorts of elements of the agreement. We all know that my Oxford speech was a defence of the agreement and an exposure of how Sinn Féin has sold it out on several levels on a number of occasions.

What is the sell-out in the Bill? Clause 2 is the sell-out. It provides that the Minister of justice will not be appointed by d'Hondt, as is prescribed by the agreement. Nor will the Minister be appointed according to democratic inclusion, which is the method that was enshrined in the agreement and included in the Northern Ireland Act 1998. The Minister will be appointed by another means that has not been provided for in either the agreement or in the 1998 Act.

Earlier, I listened to Martina Anderson quote section 17(4) of the 1998 Act, which states:

"The number of Ministerial offices shall not exceed 10 or such greater number as the Secretary of State may by order provide."

She then quoted section 17(5), which states:

"A determination under subsection (1) shall not have effect unless it is approved by a resolution of the Assembly passed with cross-community support."

Clearly, she was trying to give the false impression that the agreement provides for a Minister to be appointed by cross-community support if the number of Ministers will exceed 10. That is not what the 1998 Act says. Basically, the Act says that if there are to be more than 10 Departments, that decision must be approved by cross-community vote. The Act and the Good Friday Agreement provide that Ministers will head Departments and all Ministers will be appointed according to the rule of democratic inclusion that is used in the Assembly, which is d'Hondt. That democratic inclusion is provided for absolutely in the agreement.

Mr A Maskey: I thank the Member for giving way. On a number of occasions in the debate, he and his party colleagues said that in the past, they have advocated, urged and sought the transfer of policing and justice powers or, as Mark said, the framework for an understanding of how that might happen.

Given the fact that, obviously, none of that advocating, urging or seeking an understanding of how the Assembly might sort all that out has actually ended in the transfer of policing and justice powers, is the Member now telling us, on the SDLP's behalf, that if a positive answer to those questions cannot be obtained, he is prepared to say that under current circumstances, there will not be devolution of policing and justice powers?

The sum total of the SDLP's line is that the transfer of policing and justice powers will not happen. I ask the SDLP whether, given all that experience, it is now telling people that, because of the arguments that it has outlined, we can now look forward to a future in which there is absolutely no prospect of the transfer of policing and justice powers? That is the choice: the Assembly either does what it takes to get the transfer of those powers, or it does not.

That is a simple question that requires a simple answer.

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for his lengthy intervention. Let us be clear: the SDLP does not believe that subverting the Good Friday Agreement is the price that needs to be paid to secure the devolution of policing and justice powers.

Obviously, the Member believes that the Assembly must do whatever it takes. Why does Sinn Féin have that imperative? It has that imperative because it sold out in the St Andrews Agreement. It pretended that it had secured the devolution of policing and justice powers by May 2008. It told the public that that was signed, sealed and delivered. It said that the DUP had no choice: there would be devolution of policing and justice powers by May 2008.

The SDLP has never claimed that it has the deal done on devolution of policing and justice powers. We never claimed that we had stitched up the DUP or anybody else. We have always been honest. When we could not reach agreement, we were honest about it. We did not pretend that we reached agreements when we had not. That is what Sinn Féin did going into the St Andrews talks, and it is what it did afterwards. It misled the electorate and itself. Now the penny has dropped among its own members, who are becoming panicky.

What else did Sinn Féin do at St Andrews? It forfeited the agreement by giving new vetoes to the DUP. Those vetoes help to gridlock and worsen the situation that now exists in Government. Contrary to the DUP's claims at the time that they would improve Government, a number of the changes that were made at St Andrews have added to the difficulties that we experience at present.

If Sinn Féin had its way, there would even have been in the St Andrews Agreement the exclusion from Government of parties that did not vote for members of its party and the DUP to be First Minister and deputy First Minister.

That was in the comprehensive agreement that Sinn Féin had agreed with the DUP and the two Governments, and it was going to be included in the St Andrews Agreement. The DUP and Sinn Féin said that any party that did not vote for a First Minister and deputy First Minister from their respective parties would be excluded from ministerial office, not for breaking any law, committing an offence or wrongdoing, but simply for exercising a democratic —

Ms Anderson: [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Ms Anderson, are you questioning my ability to chair the debate?

Ms Anderson: No.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I need to know.

Please continue, Mr Durkan.

Mr Durkan: Sinn Féin obviously cannot take the truth. I have a few more truths to tell. Sinn Féin was prepared not only to sell out on democratic inclusion but to introduce a new rule to exclude parties that did not support it. Our negotiations with the DUP were the only thing that seemed to unnerve it sufficiently and change the position. Sinn Féin made no move to defend the agreement at that point; rather, it introduced a perverse exclusion of parties that exercised the right not to support people for the positions of First Minister and deputy First Minister.

Sinn Féin allowed exclusion then, and it has allowed it again this time. The Bill says that the justice Minister will not be appointed by d'Hondt or by any such means. The devolution of justice and policing should be as the agreement provided; there really should be a rerun of d'Hondt. We quickly gathered that other parties did not want a rerun of d'Hondt for different reasons, such as not wanting to upset Ministers. There were also questions about how a rerun would be engineered in such a situation. My party said that using a d'Hondt top-up as a way of meeting the problem was fair enough. That was our position regardless of who would have benefited from it. We defended other parties' interests as well as our own under the agreement.

When related legislation on the devolution of policing and justice was being debated, we opposed any election of a justice Minister, and, in particular, we protested against the method of election for a Minister that would have excluded members of the Alliance Party specifically, not on the grounds of mandate, but on the grounds that its members are not designated either unionist or nationalist. We actually defended the Alliance Party's rights in that respect. We said that the law was flawed, particularly because it was going to discriminate against the Alliance Party.

The Bill is basically a charter for discrimination, because it allows the DUP to show patronage to one party — a party of its choosing — for the Ministry and to discriminate against a party that is democratically entitled to it. That is a carry-over from the old Stormont days, when the systems of proportional representation were removed first for local elections and then for parliamentary elections. By departing from d'Hondt, this new Stormont regime has begun to remove and interfere with the proportional representation inclusive provisions that are laid down in the agreement. Those principles are fundamental for the SDLP, not in our own interests as a party, but as Irish democrats who want to honour the agreement that is the express will of the Irish people.

As for Sinn Féin's generous support of an SDLP nomination: how specious and vacuous can you get? That was an entirely empty gesture by Sinn Féin to keep itself right after it made a huge gaffe by allowing Martin McGuinness to agree with Peter Robinson that the justice Minister will be appointed by a cross-community vote at all times. I repeat: at all times. That is going to be a permanent DUP veto on a Sinn Féin Minister and, any time that it wants, on a nationalist Minister. That absolutely guarantees that no nationalist need apply.

Sinn Féin agreed to that wording, it slept in on it, and it said that it was great. However, when we pointed out the problem, the party said that the wording was not meant to mean that and that perhaps either some punctuation marks were missing or one or two words were wrong. Everyone else knew what "cross-community support at all times" meant. It was a permanent DUP and unionist veto on who could be justice Minister, which is absolutely contrary to the principles and promise of the Good Friday Agreement.

Sinn Féin did two things to try to undo that damage. It said that its preference was to support an SDLP nominee. Straight away, I said to the deputy First Minister and junior Minister Gerry Kelly that they would just support the Alliance Party nominee when the SDLP nomination was defeated. In response, I got a shoulder shrug from the deputy First Minister and something between a grin and a smile from junior Minister Gerry Kelly. Therefore, Sinn Féin's support for an SDLP nominee is an entirely empty gesture to try to cover up serious folly and a serious mistake in its negotiating position.

John O'Dowd said that it is up to the SDLP to sort out the DUP and the UUP, even though Sinn Féin handed those parties a veto that it did not need to. We already heard the reference to the triple lock and the quadruple lock. I remember the First Minister saying in the House of Commons that there would be a double-double lock, not just a quadruple lock. Sinn Féin handed those parties a veto and is now telling the SDLP to do what it can to sort them out. If Sinn Féin wants the SDLP to repair its damage, it should step aside instead of getting in the way.

Mr O'Dowd: The Member had an opportunity to vote against the Bill in Westminster, a place that he thinks highly of because he is resigning from here to go and live in Westminster. He had an opportunity to vote against the Bill, but he left before the vote took place. Why did he do that?

Mr Durkan: There was not going to be a vote; certain parties had agreed that they were not going to divide the House. We made clear our point of principle in opposing aspects of that Bill, just as we have done today. We will record our opposition by voting against the Bill because of clause 2, not because we are opposed to the devolution of justice and policing. The Good Friday Agreement does not need to be sold out to facilitate the devolution of justice and policing.
[Interruption.]

I hear more from Martina Anderson. I heard her say earlier that she never said that the SDLP was not entitled to the justice Ministry. On several occasions in the late summer of 2008, she said that the SDLP was arrogant and did not have any entitlement to any Ministry. She will find copious references to that in the media, which quote her. She was not the only one; at the same time, Alex Maskey said that the SDLP was putting petty self-interest ahead of the national interest on the devolution of justice and policing. Both of them indicated that the Alliance Party could be entitled to the justice Ministry. Of course, that was before the deputy First Minister had his moment of epiphany and told me that Sinn Féin would support the SDLP. We did not hear anything about a Sinn Féin preference to support the SDLP when Martina Anderson and Alex Maskey were having a go at us in late August and early September 2008. The record on that is clear, just as it is on the phrase that Dolores Kelly quoted about the devolution of justice and policing and political lifetimes. Mr Simpson did say that.

Mr Campbell: He did not.

Mr Durkan: He was quoted in the media; I can give those references to the Member. Why would he not have said it? The phrase came from a DUP policy document that was issued during an election campaign, and the leader of the DUP was happy to clarify it several times in Westminster. Therefore, it would be odd if some DUP MPs had not used the phrase "political lifetime".

The First Minister: I have the policy document with me. The Member should listen carefully to what it says:

“We have repeatedly indicated that in the context of Sinn Féin having a ministerial role in policing or justice it could be a political lifetime before such powers would be devolved.”

That was the context.

Mr Durkan: The document continues:

“However, we have now negotiated arrangements which allow the powers to be devolved when we are satisfied but also allow us to block a Sinn Féin Justice Minister.”

The DUP still has that power. That power is not removed by the Bill.

What were Sinn Féin’s two big ways of sorting out the gaffe in the joint letter from the First Minister and deputy First Minister that ceded that there would be a unionist veto at all times on the appointment of a justice Minister? As well as making the completely bogus promise to the SDLP of their votes on the nomination, they also secured the sunset clause of May 2012 in the Westminster Bill.

It is important that people understand how this Bill connects with the other legislation that already exists at Westminster. People talk about the need for confidence and stability before they will agree to the devolution of policing and justice powers, but it is also important that we address the need to ensure that there is absolute confidence and stability when we get devolution. The formula that has been negotiated between Sinn Féin and the DUP does not give us that.

Yes, we can elect the first justice Minister here by cross-community support, contrary to the provisions of the agreement. When the Assembly returns after an election in 2011, the justice Minister will, again, have to be elected by cross-community support. We know that all sorts of negotiations and stances might be taking place at that time. It might be a considerable time before we get a justice Minister agreed and appointed. In 2011, therefore, we could come back here and have a Department with no Minister.

Then, of course, there is the sunset clause: Sinn Féin’s guarantee that this is only a temporary arrangement and veto that cannot last beyond 2012. The sunset clause says that, in May 2012, the Department will be dissolved, unless there has been agreement to continue that arrangement or there has been agreement on other models. When I asked Alex Maskey earlier what happens if there is no agreement in May 2012, he meandered a bit but eventually said that there will have to be agreement because there is no fallback position.

That is not true. A fallback is built into the legislation, and either Sinn Féin is aware of it and is pretending that it is not there — just as it was aware of all sorts of other things that it conceded and pretended were not there. The party pretended that things going on at St Andrews — such as making sure that we could not move away from academic selection — were not there and just focused on other things. The fact is that there is a fallback.

Paragraph 8 of schedule 1 to the Northern Ireland Act 2009 provides for a fallback. Paragraphs 6 to 8 provide for the crash of the dissolution of the Department in May 2012 — Sinn Féin’s guarantee that the DUP will have to cede its veto at that time. Paragraph 5(2)(b) of schedule 1 to the Act states that paragraphs 6 to 8 of schedule 1:

“are not to apply at all if an Order in Council has been made under section 21A(7C) of the 1998 Act.”

Section 21A(7C) was inserted into the 1998 Act by the Justice and Security (Northern Ireland) Act 2007. Therefore, it is not from the agreement, and not really from even the 1998 Act. It allows the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to impose the model for the devolution of justice that was legislated for in the Justice and Security (Northern Ireland) Act 2007. Therefore, the fallback is there.

I think that the DUP knows that that fallback is there. Its members may have been careful not to show it off in public, but they know that it is there. The NIO is maybe being careful not to show it off in public and let on that it has provided the DUP with that cover of a fallback, but it is there, contrary to Sinn Féin’s claims. Again, that shows the absolute failure of Sinn Féin’s negotiation on that and other matters.

The Justice and Security (Northern Ireland) Act 2007 provides for a Minister and a deputy Minister elected by parallel consent. That model is the fallback position for May 2012. That means that the DUP will continue to have a veto over the appointment of any nationalist justice Minister. The fallback is there, and, in many ways, the DUP probably feels quite smug that it still has the at-all-times veto. If the DUP does not agree anything else with Sinn Féin, that is the fallback position.

Sinn Féin was wrong to give the DUP that veto in the first place and wrong to allow it to remain. Did Sinn Féin know that that fallback position was there? Is Sinn Féin happy with that? If so, why is Alex Maskey pretending that there is no fallback position, and that Sinn Féin will have the DUP over a barrel at that time? Can anybody tell me?

Mr O’Dowd: I will tell you.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. For the umpteenth time, I request that remarks be made through the Chair.

Mr O’Dowd: I will make my remarks through you, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

At the time of the 1998 Act, I believe that the SDLP was the largest party and had several Members at Westminster — the place that Mr Durkan feels so gracious to, feels he owes loyalty to, and, I think, swears an oath in. Is that where he is talking about that Act coming from?

Of course a justice Ministry will have to be set up. However, if that were to collapse, the clause to which Mr Durkan refers will have to get the agreement of Sinn Féin. That is what he is leaving out of his comments. Mr Durkan claims that Sinn Féin has sold the community a pup; he is saying that the community was stupid. I, for one, do not believe that.

Mr Durkan: I do not think that the community was stupid. However, Sinn Féin managed to con people on some of the issues, as it has done on several other occasions in relation to selling out on the Good Friday Agreement. That is something that we will not do.

The Member referred to the 1998 Act, but, remember, the clause was inserted into that Act only in 2007.

Mr O'Dowd: Where are you —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. I apologise, Mr Durkan. The Member appears to have a very short memory. He promised to speak through the Chair.

Mr Durkan: At the time, the SDLP opposed that Act in Westminster. We spoke against it and we exposed that issue. Today, Sinn Féin tried to pretend that there is no fallback. Yet John O'Dowd seems to be saying that, of course, there is a fallback, which totally contradicts what Alex Maskey was trying to tell us earlier.

Remember, Sinn Féin does not decide whether the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland activates that power. Potentially, we could have a Tory Secretary of State, or a situation in which there is a very narrow majority in Westminster and all sorts of deals have to be done. The Secretary of State can simply decide to activate those powers. Sinn Féin's only power of veto comes through the exercise of parallel consent during the election of the Minister and the deputy Minister. However, the DUP has a veto too. The fact is that the at-all-times veto is still there; there is no other fallback position. That mistake lives on with Sinn Féin.

A number of Members asked whether it is time for the devolution of policing and justice. I make it very clear that it is. It is not time to ditch aspects of the Good Friday Agreement. It is significant that the DUP and the Alliance Party say that they regard what is in clause 2 of the Bill as a very useful precedent, and no doubt they will be returning to that in future reviews. Those parties will say that that precedent has been conceded, and, when it has been conceded here, ask where else can we go with that. That is the position of those parties. However, do not let Sinn Féin pretend that it has conceded that precedent.

I know that the First Minister and the deputy First Minister have been in a series of negotiations, and I do not expect them to spill the beans at this stage.

However, finance is a hugely important issue, not just for the services under justice and policing but for our wider Budget.

Of course, people will want to know that the funding, whatever funding there may be, will be properly ring-fenced, not only according to Treasury terms but according to our own Budget priorities and interests.

5.45 pm

I am a little perturbed when I hear people from the DUP Benches start to write all sorts of new preconditions into the community confidence requirement. Indeed, a couple of DUP Members said today that the DUP must be satisfied on the parades issue and that that would be one of the tests of confidence.

Dr W McCrea: I thank the Member for giving way. The Member attended the debate in the House of Commons. It is not factually correct to suggest that those issues were not raised in that debate.

Mr Durkan: I do not know whether the Member is saying that I am suggesting that none of those issues was raised in that debate. I am making the point that several DUP Members today referred specifically to the parades issue as a key test of community confidence. They suggested that if people are satisfied with the position on parades and if people are allowed to parade down certain roads, that would satisfy a test of confidence.

We need to be careful about the route that the test of community confidence takes. During the history of our process to date, different issues have, at times, been bundled together during different negotiations and have been bartered for. There is a potential difficulty in that the Bill could be cleared and everything else could be ready to run, whereupon the DUP could say that it will trigger the process as long as it receives one or two more wee things. At that point, Alex Maskey will tell us that the devolution of justice and policing is so imperative that those things will be a price that we have to pay.

Dr W McCrea: With the greatest respect to the honourable Member, parading and the right to parade is not a wee thing or a wee concession; it is the community's right.

Mr Durkan: I do not want to dwell on the subject of parades only. Members did not only refer to the issue of individual parade locations. For instance, we know that the DUP wants a particular outcome on the winding-up of the Parades Commission. That is, potentially, not the only item on its shopping list. From time to time, we hear that the DUP wants to scale down and merge the Equality Commission and the Human Rights Commission. We know that it wants to bullet through the idea of a bill of rights, and we also know that its approach to the North/South review is to keep it low and go slow.

The First Minister also recently suggested changing the voting arrangements in the Assembly. One could be forgiven for thinking that people are preparing a portfolio for a review or quasi-review. I want the First Minister and the DUP to assure the House that they are not lining up those issues so that they can say that they can support the devolution of justice and policing only in the context of a review in which other changes are made. It might also want to stitch the UUP into such arrangements because it does not like how the UUP is positioning itself to take pot shots on the one side while it receives pot shots from the TUV on the other.

How will the DUP stitch the UUP in? We heard the First Minister say that all other parties must be stitched in. He might come up with the brainwave of a review exercise, through which he unveils his shopping list and through which he is able to tell Jim Allister that the DUP secured change through the St Andrews Agreement and is pursuing more change now, challenging him to outline his strategy and agenda. Of course, the two Governments will feel that they have to give Peter that review if it is the context in which the devolution of policing and justice can get over the line. That is what the Governments have always done. It is what they did with David Trimble and on other occasions since.

They will be unable to resist the review, if demanded, as the context of change, and they will be able to resist few of the demands therein. Sinn Féin will certainly not be in a strong position to resist any demands: it has not resisted any demands so far. It asked today what else it can do, because it must do all it can to achieve the devolution of justice and policing. That is how weak a negotiating position Sinn Féin has put itself in.

It agreed to the gerrymandering that is provided for in the Bill, which will allow people to deny parties their entitlements. That is not the only form of gerrymandering that Sinn Féin has agreed with the DUP. It has allowed the gerrymandering of the new local government boundaries. Three out of 26 councils that are currently, or will be, under nationalist majority are going to be under unionist control.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the Member to discuss the Bill.

Mr Durkan: Mr Deputy Speaker, I have stuck more faithfully to the Bill than most other Members have done.

I offer that as an example of the gerrymandering that Sinn Féin will allow to take place. No council areas will be moving from majority unionist control to majority nationalist control. Three council areas, and more than 100,000 people, will be moving the other way. That gerrymandering will happen without any sort of protection, and it shows that Sinn Féin does not look after the nationalist community's interests: it only looks after its own interests.

We will oppose the Bill because Sinn Féin has been so pathetic on the issues. We can have no part in supporting clause 2, and we do not want anyone in the future to misrepresent any support that we would give to clause 2 as meaning that we had agreed to concede on the agreement when we never would.

Mr Ross: There have been some lengthy speeches on what is a relatively short Bill that should be fairly non-contentious, given that it is simply enabling legislation. Nevertheless, there have been some very entertaining contributions, not least from the various SDLP Members, telling us about the dismantling of the Belfast Agreement and the many times that the DUP outwitted Sinn Féin. It is great stuff altogether, and I wonder whether they are available to speak at our party conference later in the year.

We also heard from Basil McCrea, who said that the Ulster Unionist Party now wants to support the nomination of an SDLP Member as justice Minister. Yet, on 24 August, Sir Reg Empey, the Ulster Unionist leader, said:

"Many unionists — those who are not agnostic on the issue — would be very concerned that our first Justice Minister could therefore be someone who is not pro-Union."

Basil's contribution contradicts his party leader's position, and, having given himself away so many times in the debate, he might find himself in some trouble.

The Bill will not deliver the devolution of policing and justice. It is enabling legislation, and it is simply one cog in the overall machinery required to get powers transferred to the Assembly. As was said earlier, the Bill's title has been agreed by everyone, including the Assembly and Executive Review Committee, and is non-contentious. However, clause 2, which deals with the appointment of any future justice Minister, is important. It is not only consistent with what my party has said, but it ensures cross-community buy-in.

Throughout the debate, the SDLP has been exercised on that issue. It appeared not to want to have that cross-community support for whoever the future justice Minister might be. Of course, any future justice Department will be subject to certain sensitivities and must be seen as being different from any other Department, and, therefore, maximum buy-in from both communities is important. However, that is secured in the Bill.

We have heard that there will be no Sinn Féin justice Minister. That is also important, because the prospect of a Sinn Féin Minister would not instil confidence in the unionist community about the devolution of policing and justice. We have ensured that that will not be the case. That certainty goes some way towards building confidence in the unionist community.

That is contradictory to the position of the Ulster Unionist Party. I listened to Danny Kennedy at the start of the debate, who talked about early devolution of policing and justice. We should consider those remarks in the wake of David McNarry's rogue paper — as it turned out to be — in which he said that we would not be looking at the devolution of policing and justice for another five years.

It is hard to take the Ulster Unionist Party seriously when it says things like that, because we all know that if that party had still been the largest party, it would have completed the devolution of policing and justice by 2005, and there would have been absolutely no barriers to a Sinn Féin Member becoming a justice Minister. In fact, some members of the Ulster Unionist Party said that it was inevitable that a Sinn Féin Member would become a justice Minister and that it was bound to happen. The Ulster Unionist Party is not interested in safeguards.

Earlier in the debate, we heard that even before the institutions were restored a couple of years ago, it was the Democratic Unionist Party alone that insisted that Sinn Féin had to support the police, the law and the courts system.

The Ulster Unionist Party was not interested in that. Alan McFarland said that he had a preference for d'Hondt to be rerun, and Basil McCrea talked about their justice Minister of choice being an SDLP Member.

Returning to a system of d'Hondt in order to nominate a future justice Minister would re-open the possibility of Sinn Féin taking that post. It is worrying for members of the unionist community to hear the UUP open the door once again for Sinn Féin to take the justice Ministry — even more worrying than Basil's support for an SDLP Member taking the position.

The Ulster Unionist Party also spoke about its "principled" objection to the legislation. Not many people in the Chamber think that there is anything "principled" about its opposition today. It is not a genuine concern; it is simply posturing and political point-scoring.

Mr Farry teased out an interesting point: the complete lack of confidence that the Ulster Unionist Party has in its senior party colleagues in the Conservative Party. There will be a Westminster election within the next few months, which is highly likely to result in a Conservative Government. If the Ulster Unionist Party honestly believes that the link-up with the Conservative Party will give it more influence in national politics — an idea it sold to the unionist electorate in Northern Ireland — why does it fear this legislation so much? Surely, the UUP's colleagues in the Conservative Party will block it in Westminster. I think that we know the truth of that situation; the relationship will unravel rapidly after the Westminster election.

My colleague Gregory Campbell highlighted the fact that the Bill is about supporting the principle of the devolution of policing and justice. All parties in the Assembly have said that they support — in principle — the devolution of policing and justice. Many of us, including Members of this party, have issues over the timing of it, but if Members support the devolution of policing and justice in principle, they should have no difficulty in supporting the Bill today.

The Bill will not establish a timetable for the devolution of policing and justice. There are a number of outstanding issues. One of the larger issues is that of finance, and I note that the First Minister said that some progress was made in the meeting with the Prime Minister last night. However, issues still remain, and those figures need to be tested.

The second important issue is that of confidence in the community. We have consistently said that if policing and justice are to be devolved, there must be adequate confidence in the unionist community for that to occur, and that it must be tested. The First Minister has indicated that, as a large stakeholder in the unionist community, the Ulster Unionist Party has a say in that, although listening to some of the nonsense that has come from its Benches today, I am not sure that that is altogether wise.

The Bill contains safeguards, including the cross-community element of the appointment of a future justice Minister, which I think is important. That will help to build some level of confidence in the unionist community that there will not be a Sinn Féin justice Minister. That is one of the most important issues.

The Bill is about supporting — in principle — the devolution of policing and justice. If the Ulster Unionist Party and the SDLP genuinely want to see the devolution of policing and justice, they should support the Bill.

Mrs Long: The general principle of the Bill is that policing and justice should be devolved to the Northern Ireland Assembly. I agree with the Bill on that point. The Alliance Party believes that it is important that that be done, for a number of reasons.

Devolution is not complete. We are committed to seeing devolution completed, not because we are blind to the flaws of our devolved Administration, but because we are not blind to its potential, if it is worked properly. We believe that completing this process will allow devolution to mature and move forward. If one is a devolutionist, one should be committed to running all our affairs locally.

I have been concerned about parts of the debate today because of the creeping form of people in the House who seem to feel that their interests would be best served by not having devolution of any issue to the Assembly. If people want confidence to be instilled in the community, it seems a mighty strange way to go about it — to undermine confidence in the structures that we have at the moment, and to talk up the benefits of direct rule. Therefore, I am concerned about the tone of some of those comments.

6.00 pm

I believe that we need our affairs to be run locally, and we need local Ministers to step up to the mark. In different ways, some Ministers do that on occasions. Some Ministers do not, and it is fine to be critical in those instances. Despite all the difficulties that we have experienced over recent years, I believe that we are better off with devolution than we would have been without it.

It is a sign of political immaturity for people to want to tackle only easy issues. Earlier today, in his closing remarks in a discussion on a different topic, the Health Minister said that health is at least as important as policing and justice; I agree with him. Health is at least as important as policing and justice, and we are happy to have health devolved despite all its attendant difficulties and financial pressures. We have confidence that we can handle health better than it would be handled by direct rule, yet we are nervous about doing the same thing with policing and justice.

Dr Farry: Does my colleague agree that the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety would benefit from the devolution of policing and justice? Both Departments would cut costs if they could co-operate on issues such as offending levels and alcohol problems, which contribute to the occurrence of a lot of offences.

Mrs Long: That is undoubtedly true. Indeed, a realisation of the joined-up nature of devolution would help to restore public confidence in these institutions and make people feel that devolution has benefited them.

Although it is easy and appropriate for us to hold Ministers to account week in and week out in the Assembly, little emphasis has been put by any party on defending the Assembly's record. That is largely because people are nervous of the institutions and of the people with whom they are in Government. Ministers could sell the proposition to the public more effectively if they went out and confidently argued the benefit of devolution for their people. If they sold devolution to the public rather than look nervous about their partners in Government, perhaps some parties' electoral fortunes would reflect that confidence.

In discussing the Bill, we would be foolish if we did not recognise the central role that the devolution of policing and justice powers holds in the wider devolution project. We can talk about quadruple locks, triple locks and whatever else, but no one can be in any doubt that the devolution of policing and justice powers was important to the majority of parties at St Andrews, when we discussed what form devolution would take and the time frames for its completion. The SDLP repeatedly emphasised its importance in those discussions. It was clearly very important to Sinn Féin and, indeed, had the appearance of being a make-or-break issue for that party.

It was important to the DUP, which said that it was committed to the devolution of policing and justice powers when the time was right. Some of what I have heard today makes me wonder about that, but the inclusion of the Bill for debate in the House at least indicates that the DUP remains committed to the devolution of those powers.

I also thought that it was important to the Ulster Unionist Party. At that time, it had been arguing that policing and justice should be in the hands of local politicians when the timing was right. I cannot understand that party's angst about the enabling legislation. The Ulster Unionist Party is focusing on timing, but timing is not in the enabling legislation.

The fact that a Department has come to the House in a timely fashion with important legislation that will get a full Committee Stage and proper public consideration and responses, and the fact that the Assembly will be allowed to do its job properly, is a welcome departure from what we have had in recent years with cobbled-together Bills being put in front of us and then forced through under accelerated passage. I openly, and on the record, commend the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister for that. The fact that the legislation has been brought in a timely fashion means that we will have the opportunity to explore in detail all the issues that have been raised during the debate today. Making plans for the legislative framework to be in place when the time is right for the devolution of policing and justice powers is the correct action to take. We would all be entitled to be critical if that did not happen.

The issue is about whether we are moving forward with the devolution of policing and justice powers. Earlier, my colleague Stephen Farry stated our position on the Bill and its proposed mechanisms. I do not intend to rehash that; it is already on the record.

I am happy for a cross-community vote to be introduced on policing and justice. Mark Durkan talked about a precedent being set. I simply refer him to what Stephen Farry said: although some of us may wish that appointing a future justice Minister, instead of using the d'Hondt system, could be a Trojan Horse to get a voluntary coalition, we do not think that it is.

The fact that that particular Department, in these particular circumstances, is handled in this particular way sets a rather limited precedent. Much as I might wish that it were otherwise, that is the reality. It would be wrong to suggest that it is anything other than that.

My party is on record as saying that we prefer a voluntarily coalition. The Bill does not change that, nor does it advance it. We do not take our position because we want to exclude any particular party, nor do we think that we would automatically be on the inside through those arrangements. We simply believe that running Government by having people come together to agree programmes in advance would be a more robust arrangement.

The timing of the devolution of policing and justice powers has remained the most divisive issue. It is relevant to the Bill in that that issue will be affected by the finances that are available. No one here or anywhere else would argue against the First Minister and the deputy First Minister going to Westminster to petition jointly for the best budget that they can get. It is absolutely right that they do that. It is hard, though, to conceive how they can do that if the Assembly took no active interest in the devolution project for policing and justice. The people with whom they are dealing would have no truck with them; they would say that they should be talking to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland about the budget for policing and justice. I would prefer locally elected representatives to be arguing the case for the budget for policing and justice rather than ceding that right to the NIO. I am not saying that I necessarily prefer the locally elected politicians who are doing the job, but that is democracy, and I accept it.

We must be realistic about the budget for policing and justice. It is not often that I agree with John O'Dowd, but I did today. He was correct: we are living in a dreamworld if we think that there will not be cuts. The question is: who will take the decisions on where those cuts will be felt? Whom do we trust to take the decisions about what stays open and what closes, about how many police officers we have and about where the cuts are to be made? We need to know who will be taking those decisions. Despite my reservations about how the Executive function, I still prefer such decisions to be taken by locally elected Ministers.

We also need to be realistic about timing. We need to ask ourselves from whom we will get the better deal. If we are to petition the Prime Minister or the potential future Prime Minister, we need to know who is most likely to do the better deal on the financing of policing and justice. Timing will be crucial, because we know that a general election is just around the corner. It seems that, in national politics, the pendulum has swung. Instead of politicians trying to convince the electorate that there will be no cuts, they are now in competition with each other about how dramatic the cuts that they make will be. We must be realistic and accept that the cuts will be deep. The cuts will affect Northern Ireland, not least because of its reliance on public sector employment, and they have enormous implications for policing and justice. I suspect that that now represents one of the better opportunities to strike a deal on financing the transfer of powers.

The building of confidence cannot be achieved overnight; it takes time and requires a process. Part of the frustration in the House and beyond is that, sometimes, processes do not lead to quick delivery. However, the process in itself is beneficial as it moves people forward and allows progress to be made.

As someone whose party has no Ministers in government, I fail to comprehend why everyone who belongs to a party that has Ministers in government is so negative about their performance that they cannot see the benefit of a local Minister delivering policing and justice. It boils down to a fundamental question: do they believe that direct rule Ministers would have done a better job than their Ministers? It would be easy for me to put forward that view, because my party does not have a Minister. That would be an easy get-out clause for me, but that is not my opinion. It is beneficial to have accountability and for local people to have access to those Ministers, each of whom can concentrate on a single portfolio as opposed to working simultaneously on three or four that have been lumped together. I am surprised that parties with Ministers are so reluctant to make progress on that project.

The building of confidence also requires stable devolution. For that to exist, the process of devolution must be complete. The transfer of policing and justice was always going to be the difficult element of that, but it is time to grasp the nettle. As Stephen Farry said, the security of the programme for the new Minister is crucial to confidence, because it relates directly to his or her ability to deliver. If a justice Department is to run smoothly and be capable of delivering, the programme for the Minister must be as widely agreed as possible, so that it can be brought into effect before the powers are devolved. That programme must be part of the process.

As justice lies outside the current Programme for Government, the potential exists for every decision of the justice Minister to come before the Executive. That would not be good for the Minister, the delivery of policing and justice or the Executive. As far as policing and justice are concerned, we are here to serve the public. Therefore, all parties in the House must seriously consider how to work best collectively to meet the priorities of the people in Northern Ireland.

Finally, each of us has it in our gift to create or destroy confidence through our attitudes, actions, speeches and tone. All of those factors affect people's perceptions of how confident they should be about the Assembly's structures and ability to deliver.

As I mentioned earlier, I have reservations, and those have been reinforced through listening to today's contributions from the DUP Benches. The DUP is endeavouring to create a dual-speed approach, and that has the potential to undermine confidence. Although the Bill creates an illusion of progress, the DUP is also trying to maintain, in its constituency, the belief that there is no real movement. At some point, the DUP must decide on one approach, because it can ride two horses for only so long. The strategy of riding two horses led to many of the difficulties that have been exhibited within unionism since the St Andrews Agreement and the Assembly elections, because people were uncertain as to the DUP's intent. People should confidently state their intent, believe in it, and follow through on it. They are much more likely to build confidence through doing that than through equivocation.

I understand the Ulster Unionist strategy of trying to row behind and unpick that confidence. However, the DUP should be wise to that because it is exactly the strategy that it used with the Ulster Unionists. Frankly, it was a very successful one because the Ulster Unionists equivocated. Had the members of the Ulster Unionist Party come out more confidently and defended their position, I suspect that the results may have been slightly different. I hope that that is not what is happening because it could be very damaging to community confidence.

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for giving way. I listened carefully to what she said about the terms and conditions under which the Alliance Party will assume the responsibility of policing and justice, should that be afforded to the party. I also listened carefully to her analysis of the position of the Ulster Unionist Party. The Member failed to genuinely understand the honourable and genuine position that we have taken. Although we are in favour of policing and justice powers being devolved to Northern Ireland in principle, and while we, as a party, worked very hard to achieve devolution in Northern Ireland, we do not think that current conditions — or the example that the Assembly and Executive set — are good grounds for the early devolution of policing and justice. The idea that we are simply playing political games is not correct. I wish that she and her colleagues, and members of other parties in this House, would accept that.

Mrs Long: I thank Mr Kennedy for his intervention because it gives me an opportunity to address something that I was going to leave unaddressed. It is the question of whether the UUP's concerns are genuine. If its concern is about timing, the content of this Bill is of no concern because there is no timetable in the Bill. If that concern were genuine, the party would let the Bill pass and resist its enactment.

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for again giving way. Like a great many Members of this House from various political parties, it seems that she simply does not understand that the enactment of this legislation would raise expectations that the devolution of policing and justice would take place sooner rather than later. We are simply saying that all of us should pause until the conditions for that are right.

Mrs Long: Despite Mr Kennedy's patronising tone, I fully understand that, because I can read the legislation. The creation of expectation is as much down to the pantomime tomfoolery of some people who spoke about this Bill as it is down to anything that is included in the Bill. The Bill does not create a timetable for the devolution of policing and justice powers.

Mr Kennedy said that this matter is not a game, but people seem to be enjoying it very much today. With the raucous laughter, the tee-heeing and the constant witty banter that was going on, it felt like it was a game for some people. However, it is a very serious issue. Perhaps if all the interventions and discourse had been in the same serious tone as Mr Kennedy's last two interventions, we may have been more convinced that this debate was genuine.

When we talk about the conditions being right, we have never really got to the bottom of exactly what those right conditions would look like for the Ulster Unionist Party and what its contribution to creating them will be. I do not see the contribution that the party made in today's debate outlining that or in any way giving us an indication of what its contribution to creating those conditions would be. I am happy to be open-minded about that, but, based on what I have heard, I remain to be convinced that there is more to the Ulster Unionist stance than pre-election tactics.

The other point that I want to raise relates to clause 2 and the election of a justice Minister, because that is the specific issue with which the SDLP has a problem. Some Members think that they ascended the mountain in 1998, and came back with the way in which devolution would look for forever and a day written on tablets of stone. Those Members believe that to change a dot or a comma in that document undermines some great principle. The principles of devolution are about power sharing, fairness, stability and delivery. D'Hondt is not a principle: it is a mechanism.

If a mechanism is treated as a principle, one is saying that what was good for 1998 is not only good for 2008, but is good for 2028, 2048, 2058 and 2068. That tells me that there is no opportunity for betterment, change, progress or development. That is an extremely depressing world view. I would not be happy if we were to unpick the fairness, the sharing and the recognition of people's participation that underpin the Good Friday Agreement. However, it is not the same to say that there is a principle at stake, simply because a mechanism is going to change.

That brings me to the next issue, which deals with Danny Kennedy's earlier point about the Alliance Party's role in all of this. Some people seem to think that if they shout about that long enough, we will be too embarrassed to rise to our feet to talk about such issues, which actually matter to the people who elected me, David Ford, Stephen Farry and the other Alliance Party Members. Those issues matter to us whether we or any other party end up with the justice Ministry. It is not a matter of who holds the post, but of how they conduct themselves once in that post.

When Stephen Farry cautioned earlier against working on the assumption that we would simply take the post if it is offered, he was serious. I do not expect Members to believe that that is the case, but I caution them against ignoring that we have said it. We want to see devolution working. We want to see it functioning. I suspect that unless we get clarity on policing and justice matters; unless we deal reasonably with the issues in the Bill; and unless we are willing to move forward and deal with timetabling, the Assembly will have much bigger problems ahead.

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for giving way, because her speech is very interesting. Is the Member saying that one of the Alliance Party's prime concerns is the security of tenure — until 2012 — that is currently offered in the justice Minister's post?

Mrs Long: I think it is now Mr Kennedy who does not understand, because I have not raised the issue of security of tenure. To be blunt, there would be no electoral damage to any of my colleagues if they were to be tossed out of their offices by the DUP and Sinn Féin for trying to be an Alliance Party Minister for policing and justice. Therefore, security of tenure would not particularly concern us. That is not the key point. The key point is whether the justice Minister would have security of programme and could deliver what is on the agenda for the people of Northern Ireland.

Mr Kennedy may be worried about grappling for seats and positions, but that is not our primary concern, despite the fact that he wishes to paint us in that way.

Mr Kennedy: It made the Member angry.

Mrs Long: Yes; Mr Kennedy has again spoken from a sedentary position while enjoying his own joke very much, as he always does. He is always guaranteed at least one laugh: his own. However, the reality is —

Mr Kennedy: You have not met my wife.

Mrs Long: I have not met your wife, but she gets my sympathy. [Laughter.]

I have to say that this issue makes me angry, because there can be misunderstandings about some of these things, and then there is the wilful taunting that adds nothing to the discussion and does not further the debate. Instead, it exposes the fact that some Members have treated today's proceedings as a game, rather than a debate about legislation, and that undermines their position that they are approaching it with anything like a serious attitude. If you want to be taken seriously, behave seriously, and people will read from that what they will.

I mentioned the risks to devolution if we do not deal with these issues, and earlier, the DUP said that it would not be bullied. I agree that it should not be bullied, because bullying is inappropriate and not the way to do business. Neither should the DUP be arrogant or dismissive of the needs of its partners in Government. I say partners, plural, because there are four parties in Government together. At all levels of the Executive, there must be some sense that although parties may be in strong positions due to the mechanisms and vetoes, it will only last as long as everyone else is willing to tolerate it. We need generosity, not because one wishes to be generous to those with whom one has little in common, but because a lack of generosity is likely to cost dear. For that reason if no other, people need to look at how they might co-operate better, and that, in itself, would be the biggest confidence-building measure that we could see in this House.

Mr Shannon: I support the Bill. I have been out of the Chamber, because the Agriculture Committee was meeting today, so I apologise for not being here for everybody's contribution. In between times, it became clear what issues were being raised. We have listened to the clear way in which members of the Assembly and Executive Review Committee explained the process and the progress so far, and they are to be congratulated. It is not necessary for me to go over everything that has been said, but I will highlight a few major points that can stand to be repeated so that everyone understands them.

Furst o'vau tae unnerscoar tha fact that this bill isnae tha pittin in place o' policin en justis; it is maer er less tha grun woark that gauns afoar tha basic woark sterts. It is simply apenin tha gaet o' tha fiel tae alloo tha woarkers in. Them that's gaun tae wroucht in it wullnae be allooed in tae tha wricht terms er met oan tha plans, an tha fue plennin permisshun gien alang wi' tha green paper regerdin tha go ahead.

First, I underscore the fact that the Bill does not constitute the introduction of policing and justice; it is merely the groundwork that must be done before the foundation work commences. It merely opens the gate of the field to allow the workers in; the workers will not be allowed in until conditions are met on the plans and full planning permission is granted, along with the green paper of the go-ahead.

In this analogy, the conditions that must be met are those that have been set by elected representatives, and one of the key issues is funding. Devolving policing and justice is a huge undertaking that will need a huge influx of new money, not simply another Budget reshuffle. The DUP will be working to ensure that there is adequate funding to carry out all the obligations that this will bring, including the judiciary and policing matters that go back as far as the claims for loss of hearing from when RUC officers were under fire back in the dark days of the Troubles. There must be enough money to ensure that policing on our streets increases and that confidence in the police force is built up, so that when people ring the police they are sure of a response within half an hour and do not have to wait two hours for the one car to answer a call in Portaferry before it makes its way up to Carrowdore.

Those conditions must be addressed before we get anywhere near devolving policing and justice. However, we are putting the process in place. Another condition will be to ensure that, ultimately, the justice Department is accountable to the electorate in some form or fashion, as opposed to constituents who face problems having no redress and being met with the same answer to all their questions, "this is not in our remit".

6.30 pm

(Mr Speaker in the Chair)

A lecturer in law at the University of Ulster has said that it is essential that more accountability be brought to the judiciary, which, at the risk of sounding trite, is a law unto itself. Although it is essential that there can be no political machination mixing with the appointment of the judiciary, the appointment of an Attorney General will ensure that there is greater accessibility and accountability for the public when the occasion demands. That is also very important and is something that we must consider.

We must, and will, ensure that only those who are appropriate to the role are elected to it and that that will not be determined with a political slant, but with a fitness-for-purpose angle that takes into account the character and experience of that Member. That has to be the crux of the matter as well.

The Green Paper that will allow the building of the Department of justice to commence will be a stamp of approval by the majority of the electorate. That will be when the confidence of the community is behind the Department and when enough change has occurred that people believe this to be the way forward. That is the benchmark, and that is when we will be happy for work to begin on the foundations that we have laid today.

It must also be remembered that, just as building control checks for dangers in new developments, there is one final check that will come in 2012. Should the people not be satisfied that this building is a safe one for the people of the Province, there is an automatic dissolve. The sunset clause, which others Members, including my colleague Jimmy Spratt, have mentioned, gives peace of mind for the public to know that this is not an eternal solution unless it turns out to be the right and appropriate one. That is the key.

In the end, public confidence is the most important thing for the DUP, and, as a party, we have given our assurance that public confidence is the Green Paper without which no building work will commence. The DUP continues to hold fast to the fact that our triple-lock veto remains in place and will ensure that no work will commence until the people are ready. That is clearly where we stand on this issue.

The Bill does not set things in motion. It merely allows that, once things are to be set in motion, the mechanism and structure are there, so that we can then begin. We have come a long way, and we should recognise how far we have come — all of us individually, and collectively as parties — but that does not mean that we forget all that has happened before now and do not learn from those things.

I support the passing of the Bill through this stage in the Assembly, which will allow for any of the problems and issues that individual Members have to be addressed and incorporated into the Bill before its later stages and before it becomes an Act. Therefore, there are processes that allow us to bring issues on board. I give the Bill a general welcome, with a view that the devolution of policing and justice will happen. We need to ensure that when that does happen, we are prepared and have safety guarantees and controls in operation to ensure peace of mind for all those involved: ourselves, our constituents and the whole of Northern Ireland. I support the motion.

Mr Attwood: The starting point for comment is the DUP speeches on the Floor of the Assembly today. In my view, Peter Robinson and the DUP — that is, the DUP in the Assembly and in the country — hold all the cards when it comes to the issue of the devolution of justice. For that reason, it is important that the issues raised by the DUP in today's speeches be addressed.

It was Dr McCrea's speech that captured the essence of the current DUP conundrum. From my observation, I thought that the First Minister listened very attentively to what was meant to be a definitive statement by elements in the DUP about how they see the issue of the devolution of justice. Although John O'Dowd understandably and, to some degree rightly, compared that speech with previous speeches from that element in the DUP, who eventually signed up to partnership and going into government with the other parties, the circumstances now are different from those that prevailed when the DUP made those decisions; that is self-evident.

What did Dr McCrea say in his speech? In one way he struck me as being a TUV wolf in DUP undergarments. We should not dwell on that image too long, but that was nonetheless the tone, content, character and conviction of what Dr McCrea was saying, no doubt on behalf of his colleagues in the DUP. Dr McCrea said that neither the Labour Party nor the Conservative Party in London can be trusted to provide honest financial answers. That is tantamount to saying that the financial test set by the DUP for the devolution of justice powers can never be satisfied.

He went further and said that, in his experience in his three constituency offices, the community did not have the confidence or the interest in the devolution of justice powers. That is tantamount to saying that the community confidence test can never be satisfied.

Subsequently, he went further and said that the DUP had a quadruple lock, which they would not hand over. That is the critical point, because the DUP has to make a choice as to how it goes into the Westminster election. Should it go into the election without having agreed to the devolution of justice on the basis that it can tell the unionist constituency that it did not bend the knee to nationalist requirements? The DUP has to decide whether it views that as the position of strength as it goes into the Westminster election. It was clearly the view that Dr McCrea, and whomever else he represents, was taking.

Alternatively, will the DUP make the essential choice that there is a growing majority in favour of partnership, equality and power sharing — about which I have a lot to say later — and proceed on that basis?

If Members read the tea leaves about what happened in London last night, they will see that it is clear that the bottom line has, or has all but, been reached with regard to the London Exchequer's offer to the DUP and Sinn Féin. Martin McGuinness, who was here a minute ago, might say that the financial arrangement can be reached in New York, and Peter Robinson might say that it cannot, but he and the deputy First Minister know that the moment has arrived. Whatever our differences about the Department of Justice Bill and all the other matters that I will comment on, the DUP should make that call and make it quickly.

Jim Shannon made a thoughtful speech, as he often does. He said something that the DUP has never said in the endless Assembly and Executive Review Committee meetings that went nowhere. He said that there was not enough accountability as regards the judiciary. I have not heard that from a DUP spokesperson before, and I have never heard it from a Sinn Féin member in all those meetings. I, and my colleagues in that Committee, have been talking about it, but that comment captured the very essence of why people need the devolution of justice powers now. There needs to be more accountability around the judiciary. We need to have a sentencing guidelines council that is made up of people who can give advice, but not direction, to our judges about sentencing policy and practice.

We also need to have a new phase of reform of our Public Prosecution Service, which, in hard case after hard case — which, unfortunately, represents too many cases — has proved that it has a culture of plea bargaining; does not tell victims and survivors what is going on; does not outline the height of the evidence to the judge in a trial; and, consequently, hands out inadequate sentences in too many cases.

I could go on about the unfinished business of justice and policing reform, which has been denied to the North over the past number of years and which is now so self-evident and compelling that, on those grounds alone, the DUP should go over the wall.

I do not diminish the difficulty that Peter Robinson faces, because as soon as he says that the devolution of justice is on, Jim Allister will say that he has had his four, five or whatever number of vetoes that Sinn Féin has conceded to him, and he did not use them. It is not an easy choice, but it is the rational political position and the position of strength that he must now adopt very quickly during his trip to and from America.

The reason that Mr Robinson should have particular confidence is because of the contradiction in Ian Paisley Jnr's earlier intervention, when he said that republicans and nationalists had failed to deliver agendas on policing and justice. That is self-evidently wrong. For example, the Justice Oversight Commissioner would not have signed off the implementation of the Patten report two years ago to the extent that he felt that 90% was substantially, or fully, accomplished. Furthermore, we would not have had the two pieces of criminal justice legislation that arose from the Good Friday Agreement, and I could go on.

I do not think that the point that Ian Paisley Jnr made is evidence-based, but the more important argument is that which I have said to him privately and in a number of public sessions. I believe that unionism's finest hour in the last seven or eight years was going to the Policing Board with the SDLP and sticking to the Policing Board with the SDLP. Although there was every reason for the unionist parties and the SDLP to fracture and destroy the Policing Board in the period up to 2007, that never happened. That was despite the Police Ombudsman's reports into Omagh, Operation Ballast and the activities of a serial killer in north Belfast; despite the hurt that unionists felt around the severance of so many officers from the ranks of the RUC and the running down of the full-time Reserve; despite the ongoing threats of terror; despite the fallout from the appointment of Hugh Orde; and despite the fact that toys were thrown out of the pram on several occasions. Despite all of that, unionism never walked from the Policing Board, and the consequence of that was that despite suspension, political turbulence and all of the doubts from 2002 to 2007, the parties on the board stuck to the task. Reformed policing — in our view in the image of Patten; in unionists' view in the image of something else — was delivered by the board. That is why unionism should agree to the devolution of justice.

The SDLP was also tested in the most difficult circumstances in the life of the first Policing Board, when Sinn Féin excluded itself and demonised those on the board and those who signed up to join the PSNI. However, although we stumbled we never fell, and in the most adverse circumstances, and in arguably in the hardest issue of our political lifetime, we succeeded.

Today of all days, when we have a new Chief Constable, and two months after a new Lord Chief Justice was appointed to the High Court, it seems to me that there is a coincidence of opportunity that we should not allow to be missed, and I hope that it will not.

Today, we heard from Martin McGuinness: he was up and down constantly, which was strange to see from such a passive Minister who does not normally get so agitated or involved on the Floor of House. However, he and his colleagues were on their feet constantly, making a fundamental political point in an effort to damage the SDLP legacy and contribution to the devolution of justice. Mr McGuinness thought that it was a good argument, and he essentially asked what the SDLP had done to deliver the devolution of justice when it was the primary nationalist party. For four reasons, that argument is holed with contradictions and holed below the waterline. I shall explain why and, in doing so, I shall expose what Sinn Féin has done.

The first reason is that we did not have much of an opportunity between 1998 and 2002 to do it, but that was not the point. The point was that the people of Ireland endorsed an approach to the devolution of justice and policing through the Good Friday Agreement, which states:

“the British Government remains ready ... after consultation, as appropriate, with the Irish Government, in the context of ongoing implementation of the relevant recommendations, to devolve responsibility for policing and justice issues.”

That is what the Irish people endorsed in the Good Friday Agreement, and that was the mandate that they gave to the political parties to bring about the devolution of justice and policing.

Is Martin McGuinness saying to the people of Ireland that, in 1998, Sinn Féin endorsed that approach, but that any year thereafter it can change its approach? I know that that is the standard by which Sinn Féin lives with regard to the equality and partnership provisions of the Good Friday Agreement.

Is Sinn Féin telling the SDLP that, in 2000, 2001 and 2002, it should have aborted the provisions of the Good Friday Agreement, usurped the democratic will of the Irish people and gone ahead with the devolution of justice, even though the implementation of relevant policing and justice recommendations had not been carried out? What folly it would have been to devolve policing and justice in those years when Sinn Féin did not have the confidence to go on the Policing Board. Sinn Féin should not berate the SDLP for what it did during those years, at a time when the republic movement was stealing documents down the hill, robbing banks in Belfast city centre and had not decommissioned a weapon.

Mr Speaker: I remind Members, as far as possible, to keep to the principles of the Bill. Members have been allowed a fair amount of latitude around the Second Stage. Therefore, I encourage Members, as far as possible, to stick to the principles of the Bill.

Mr A Maskey: The Member and I had a little spot on ‘Hearts and Minds’ some time ago, and I want to ask him a question on an issue that we discussed. I am less interested in all the criticism that my party receives from SDLP Members, because that is what they do: they do not do it very well, but that is how they live.

Mrs D Kelly: They do it enough to annoy the Member.

Mr A Maskey: Not really; we are now looking at a social, democratic and leaderless party. It is all very well to criticise my party, and the SDLP can do that for the next month of Sundays if it wishes. However, the electorate will make their judgement on those matters, and they have recently made some decisive judgements.

Notwithstanding all the criticisms that the SDLP may wish to make of my party's approach to the situation, could it please, for once, address how it would have, or will, secure the transfer of policing and justice powers. Will the SDLP tell us whether it can do it, will do it, or how it will be done? How will the SDLP transfer those powers? Either it adapts the SDLP approach and does its best to ensure that policing and justice are not devolved just because it cannot get a Ministry — that is how that party thinks — or does it want to look after the greater good and do its best to reach an accommodation to have the powers transferred so that we can all get on with developing accountability around the wider policing and criminal justice system with the other twin pillar of the independence of the judicial system? Will the SDLP please tell us how it will do it? It can criticise Sinn Féin for another week if it wishes, but tell us how it will do it.

Mr Attwood: I reassure the Member that I intend to answer those questions in full, consistent with the Bill. Sinn Féin cannot berate one party if what is being said usurps the Good Friday Agreement, and that is what it is saying about what happened during those years. However, it is about more than that.

During that time, because the criminal justice system was not fit for purpose, SDLP members went about the task of making it fit for purpose to prepare it for the devolution of justice at the earliest possible opportunity. That is what we did, consistent with the principle of the Good Friday Agreement about the implementation of the relevant justice and policing recommendations. We went about the business of changing policing and justice in order to create the opportunity for devolution to happen as soon as possible.

Sinn Féin knows that, because the SDLP had to sit down with Sinn Féin in what became known as the “Welly Park tutorials”, whereby the SDLP and Sinn Féin sat down with the Irish Government and had to go through — in a pretty tedious way, I may say — the changes that were required to policing and justice in order to maximise the changes and the timing of the devolution of justice. That has not been publicly known until now, but we had to sit down with Sinn Féin. Mr Maskey was not there. None of the Sinn Féin Members currently in the Chamber was there. However, two Sinn Féin members were there; the junior Minister and one of the party’s senior officials, who, mysteriously, is no longer a senior official — but that is probably another story.

We had to sit down with Sinn Féin in order to persuade and convince that party of what was required. That was done in the run-up to the Hillsborough negotiations, which happened to be in 2003, after suspension. In those negotiations, we in the SDLP won a whole series of changes to criminal justice — not as much as we desired or negotiated for, but we won them. At that stage we stated in document after document, publicly and privately, to the Irish Government, the British Government and anybody who would listen, that we believed that the standards of criminal justice could now be attained in order to fulfil the principle of the Good Friday Agreement to bring about the devolution of justice and policing.

SDLP members are criticised for what we did on our watch, but what we did was consistent with the democratic wish of the people of Ireland. Then we did the heavy lifting to change the criminal justice system and argued, publicly and privately, for the devolution of justice. At the same time, Mark Durkan, as deputy First Minister, went to the then First Minister and tried to convince him to go in that direction, because we believed, as the policing experience proved, that the earliest possible devolution of justice —

Mr A Maskey: How are you going to do it?

Mr Speaker: Order, order. The Member has the floor.

Mr Attwood: I will come to that. We believed that the earliest possible devolution of justice would demonstrate the stability and strength of the arrangements, and that there was a contradiction in the unionist argument that essentially agreed to the devolution of much policing power but held back on the devolution of justice powers. Remember the context in which all that happened — Sinn Féin had not signed on for policing and was adopting a hostile attitude to the PSNI, the Policing Board and the DPPs.

Sinn Féin has no argument because of its exposure on policing and justice issues during that period, and it has no reason or basis on which to criticise we in the SDLP for the big and difficult work that we were doing throughout that period. Let us not hear any more about what we did when we were the primary political party.

Mr O’Dowd: Will the Member give way?

Mr Attwood: I will give way in a moment.

I am a democrat, and I always have been; I have always accepted the will of the Irish people, both North and South, about how we conduct our political affairs. When 98% of the people of Ireland, in election after election, adopted the democratic approach, it was a grave error, with immense fallout, that others did not do so as well. Nevertheless, this morning Alex Maskey rightly said that the SDLP had a mandate at one time for the devolution of justice. I have answered that. He went on to say that the mandate from the nationalist community then fell to Sinn Féin, which was, he said “mandated and obligated” to take forward the relevant issues.

If we are to be judged on what we did, let us now judge Sinn Féin on how it has fulfilled its mandate to defend the Good Friday Agreement, secure the devolution of justice, and defend nationalist interests into the bargain. Gerry Adams wrote, not in 2009 or in 2008 but in 2007, to the Assembly to say that there was no reason why a date could not be agreed within a month. Martin McGuinness sent a letter to the Assembly and Executive Review Committee saying precisely that.

You have to hand it to Peter Robinson, although I suspect that he had not necessarily spotted the residual veto power that he may have through the 2007 legislation. I shall return to that in a minute.

When Sinn Féin was given the mandate granting it the obligation to negotiate on behalf of the nationalist people, Gerry Adams and Martin McGuinness said that a date should be agreed within a month. Sinn Féin sat down with the First Minister, and it emerged with a DUP veto at all times for all times. At that moment, when Sinn Féin's failure to negotiate was so brutally exposed, the history of the devolution of justice was written.

The DUP learned that when you sit down with Sinn Féin and get a veto once, you can do it twice. The DUP learned that even when you do not sit down and get a third veto, you can claim it anyway, as the First Minister did on 7 July 2009 when he came out of his meeting with Gordon Brown and said, essentially, that Reg Empey also had to agree. Having given that level of veto to Reg Empey, the issue is whether Cameron is prepared to provide satisfaction to the DUP on the financial issue.

That is what happened to the devolution of justice and the protection of the Good Friday Agreement when the nationalist community gave primacy to Sinn Féin. There was not one, not two, not three, but a family of vetoes on who makes the decision on when the devolution of justice will happen.

Mr O'Dowd: I wish to comment on the history lesson that the Member has provided. The period of history that he refers to, covering the engagement among Sinn Féin, the SDLP, the Dublin Government and others, is an interesting period on which to reflect on the issue of policing. As those negotiations went on, Sinn Féin stated to all the parties around the table that the British Government could be moved further.

The SDLP and the Dublin Government stated that the British Government would not make further legislation on policing and justice. Sinn Féin said that the British Government could be moved if the parties at the negotiations remained united. The SDLP and the Dublin Government broke ranks. The SDLP joined the Policing Board, and real change on policing was delayed by a number of years. The British Government then brought forward further legislation on policing and justice, which is exactly what the SDLP said would not happen.

If the Member wishes to give a history lesson, he should give a complete history lesson. I will sum up what he has said so far: it is Sinn Féin's fault that the SDLP did not ask for the transfer of policing and justice in the first place, and it is now Sinn Féin's fault that the SDLP will not support the transfer of policing and justice. Does the SDLP have a mind of its own?

Mr Speaker: Before Mr Attwood resumes, I must insist that, as far as possible, he relate his remarks to the Bill. He may do that in an imaginative way, but it is vital that he does so.

Mr Attwood: With all due respect, Mr Speaker, the Bill must be understood in the context of what previously transpired. Therefore, every comment is not only sourced in the debate but is sourced in clause 2 of the Bill. Everything that I am saying is relevant to that, because the issue comes down to how we got to that point and what that says about the nature of devolution and about who has held the whip hand in negotiations. That is why my comments are so important.

I want to respond to the issues that were raised by Mr O'Dowd. His comments were contradictory. He said that implementation of real change in policing was delayed for several years because of the SDLP's decision to join the Policing Board. Why then, in the run-up to Sinn Féin's decision to join the board, did Gerry Kelly say, in the 'Belfast Telegraph' and in an interview on 'Hearts and Minds' with me, that there had been unprecedented change during previous years? He is quoted as saying that on the front page of the 'Belfast Telegraph'. He has said that on record. One cannot reconcile the assertion that there has been unprecedented change during the SDLP and the unionist parties' tenure on the Policing Board with the line that Sinn Féin has sold in the debate, which is that real change was delayed for years.

Why did Gerry Adams go to the then chairman of the Policing Board, after Sinn Féin had made its decision, and tell him that, if had not been for the board's work, Sinn Féin could not have made that decision? Sinn Féin cannot have it both ways. Gerry Kelly's words are on record. That is what happened, those are not disputed matters, and they are publicly known.

I want to deal with the Alliance Party's comments. Although they were, as always, well-rounded and developed, they contained two or three essential political flaws that need to be addressed. Stephen Farry said that the Bill's provision for the establishment of a justice Ministry was the lesser of two evils. I cannot reconcile myself with that: I do not understand how giving parties vetoes on ministerial appointments is better than what was guaranteed under the Good Friday Agreement and under legislation on the entitlement to ministerial office. I cannot reconcile how a veto on who becomes a Minister is better and is a lesser evil than the rights and guarantees of the Good Friday Agreement.

Mrs Long: Will the Member give way?

Mr Attwood: I will give way in a moment; I want to finish my point.

I do not understand why, if the Alliance Party believes that there are flaws in the Good Friday Agreement's architecture, it indulges a bilateral change to the agreement rather than having a conversation with the DUP and Sinn Féin, as the DUP First Minister has suggested.

I do not understand how it is a lesser of two evils to appoint a Minister who will be the captive of the First Minister and deputy First Minister when the powers of Ministers have been eroded further because of the St Andrews Agreement and the ensuing legislation. I do not see how the Alliance Party can reconcile, and describe as the lesser of two evils, a veto, a bilateral change and a Minister's being captive with the provisions that used to exist.

Mrs Long: The Good Friday Agreement, which the Member's party has trumpeted as its structures and mechanisms, contained a veto over the appointment of the First Minister and deputy First Minister. That had to be put to a cross-community vote. When that was removed at St Andrews, the SDLP, among other parties including the Alliance Party, believed that that was a retrograde step because it removed collectivity from the Executive. Therefore, the SDLP cannot, on the one hand, argue that the Alliance Party wants to introduce a veto.

If the Member reads the Good Friday Agreement, of which the SDLP was apparently the architect, he will see that it is riddled with vetoes and is, in fact, built on them.

Mr Attwood: I note that the Member did not deal with my second and third points, regarding bilateral change and a justice Minister being a captive. However, let us deal with the issue of the veto. The political circumstances in 1998 required that a message be sent out to our community saying that there was a new order of things. In order to demonstrate that, and to show the collective wisdom and will of the people to bring about a transition from pre-1998 politics to Good Friday Agreement politics, there was an election to a joint office of the Assembly. Those were the circumstances that existed then.

The circumstances that exist now for the devolution of policing and justice are very different. The unionist parties, the SDLP and Sinn Féin are sharing responsibility for much of the heavy work that must be done on policing; no one has walked away from the Policing Board, and that board has unanimously appointed a Chief Constable. If the Policing Board has the maturity to do that, the same principle can apply to the devolution of justice and to the appointment of a Minister.

Mrs Long: I thank the Member for giving way, and I apologise for not answering his other two points. I held off on answering those, because I indicated that I wanted to intervene on the specific issue of a veto. The Member's last point raises some interesting questions. He suggested that political circumstances can change the approach that is taken. Up to this point in the debate, the SDLP has basically said that what was inscribed in 1998 could never be changed and that the appointment mechanism was immovable and untouchable. That is precisely the position to which the SDLP has been holding, so there is an issue about political change. I do not think that the SDLP was happy when the appointment mechanism was removed.

I do not believe that a justice Minister will be held hostage. My colleagues and I have said, very clearly, that the security of programme is the key to ensuring that no Minister will be held hostage. The Member is right to say that the justice Minister could be removed from the post. That situation is preferable to the current one, in which an underperforming Minister can continue to underperform ad infinitum and never be challenged directly.

I wish to answer the Member's third point on the issue of unilateral and bilateral change. We have made it crystal clear that we do not see that as either opening the door to wider change or as a Trojan horse. Other people can interpret that whichever way they want. If the Bill is passed, all other posts in the Executive will continue to be filled using the d'Hondt process, until such times as the Assembly chooses otherwise.

Mr Attwood: I thank the Member for those comments. I wish make two points: first, the Alliance Party said that the Bill has a limited precedent. However, the words and comments that have been made in recent weeks indicate that some people are beginning to think that that is not the case. There may now be a situation in which people will try to maximise the opportunity created by the removal of d'Hondt, the creation of exclusion politics, the end of equality and the denial of partnership, all of which are required by elements of Sinn Féin, on the DUP's watch. I suggest that the Member cautions herself very profoundly before she casually concedes and suggests to the House that what has been agreed has a limited precedent. In time, I think that the Member will regret those assertions.

Mrs Long: If I am wrong, I will be quite happy to say so.

Mr Attwood: Secondly, there was an inconsistency in the Alliance Party's intervention, made during Mr Kennedy's contribution, on the issue of what Mr Empey may or may not have said about who could be justice Minister. Mrs Long's contribution had substance in that regard. It is inconsistent for the Alliance Party to tell the Ulster Unionist Party that Mr Empey was basically saying that no nationalist need apply, when the Alliance Party will today vote for a Bill that will have that consequence.

The Alliance Party cannot berate a party leader for taking such a stance, even though it may be appropriate to do so, unless it, in not agreeing to the Bill's Second Stage, votes down a clause that has the same impact, because it is in the legislation and referred to in statements made by the First Minister, with the consent of the deputy First Minister —

Mr Ford: Will the Member give way?

Mr Attwood: I will finish my point first.

That is the inconsistency.

Mr Ford: I thank the Member for giving way again — at least there are some Members in the Chamber who give way.

There are other posts in the Assembly, including your own, Mr Speaker, which are filled on the basis of a cross-community vote. None of those posts specifies that no unionist need apply, that no nationalist need apply or even that no member of the United Community group need apply. The suggestion that the inclusion in the Bill of the requirement for a cross-community vote represents a veto against nationalism is simply not borne out by the facts.

That is totally different from the leader of the UUP faction of UCUNF's statement, which made particular reference to me, that the justice Minister must be a unionist. It appears that he meant that the justice Minister must be a unionist if elected by cross-community vote, although the SDLP would be acceptable if d'Hondt were used.

Mr Attwood: That confirms my point, and I will explain why. [Laughter.] Regardless of the facts in this place, the fact in this case is unambiguous and has been stated publicly — the DUP will exercise its veto on nationalist applicants for the justice Ministry, just as Sinn Féin has exercised its veto on a nationalist's holding the eleventh Ministry in the Government. That is what the legislation does. The Alliance Party can package that in whatever way it chooses, but it will be signing off on legislation that means that no nationalist party need apply for the justice Ministry.

I want to briefly return to the points that Mr Durkan made on the sunset clause. The First Minister will comment on that issue, and I look forward to his comments. I want to repeat that Mr Alex Maskey's interpretation this morning is not correct. He said that the arrangements are temporary, that there is no fallback position and that we do not know what will happen in 2012. He concluded by saying that there is no fallback position in the Department of Justice Bill or in any other previous legislation passed at Westminster. I repeat that our understanding of the relevant clause and the schedule is that there is a fallback position. Sinn Féin either knew that and did not tell anyone, or it did not know, which would show the folly of its negotiating position.

Accepting “at all times” and “for all time” was the biggest strategic error that Sinn Féin made in its negotiations on the devolution of justice and policing powers. Out of that error flowed the strength of the DUP and the weakness of Sinn Féin in the negotiations. The Department of Justice Bill is at its Second Stage, and we have the shadow of “at all times” and “for all time” over the legislation and back on the Floor.

Sinn Féin was spooked, because it knew that nationalism could not live with a situation in which the DUP had such a capacity to veto. As a consequence, Sinn Féin tried to unpick the clause and conceded even more ground. Having conceded that ground, we are back where we were when “at all times” and “for all time” meant that no nationalists need apply.

Mr Hamilton: The number of Members in the Chamber has swollen, obviously in expectation of my imminent contribution. I want to assure them that I do not intend to keep them long — just about five minutes more than the 41 minutes that Mr Attwood kept us.

It is amusing that the debate on what must be one of the simplest, most straightforward and shortest pieces of legislation to have come before the House is now well into its seventh hour — and the clock is still running. It is a simple and straightforward piece of enabling legislation, as Members have said. It simply names the Department, an issue about which I do not think anyone has raised any concern. Clause 3 refers to the commencement, which is to be carried out jointly at a later date by the First Minister and deputy First Minister; and it refers to the mechanism for the appointment of a justice Minister, which has been a bone of contention during the debate.

The legislation sets out an additional method of appointment, in that the nomination must be approved by a majority of all Members, and a majority of nationalists and a majority of unionists. I hear that method being criticised as if somehow it breaks the principle of d'Hondt, that tablet of stone set down in the agreement. The resounding response to that criticism from these Benches is: so what? The DUP has no love for d'Hondt or any abiding desire to see its continuation. To break that principle, therefore, is something in which we take pride.

Nor is what is in place representative of some sort of unionist Utopia. As much as some of us might like to, we do not get to choose who we want. The appointment of a Minister requires cross-community consensus. There are those who say that that arrangement is not inclusive, but how much more inclusive does it get than to have a requirement that the person who holds that very sensitive and important position must have been voted for in the House by a majority of nationalists and a majority of unionists? That is as inclusive as it gets. The model that the legislation will put in place also strengthens and solidifies the unionist position for which the DUP has been arguing for a considerable time. As some Members said, it ensures that, given the sensitivity of the position, no member of Sinn Féin can hold it.

There has been discussion — indeed, rancour — about timescales. Again, as has been pointed out, there is nothing whatsoever in the legislation about a precise timescale. Many other major steps are to be taken before the devolution of policing and justice can happen. There are many high hurdles — perhaps that should be high hedges — that we have to get over before we can even contemplate the actual devolution of policing and justice powers to the Assembly.

The Assembly must pass a section 4 motion of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 requesting that we have those powers devolved. Westminster must pass the relevant Orders, and there must be agreement there on that. I find some of the Ulster Unionist Party's criticism curious, given that its Members expect their colleagues, their new-found friends, their paymasters in the Conservative Party, to be in power in the coming months. I would have thought that the UUP Members would have had much more confidence in their colleagues than some of them exhibited today. A Minister also needs to be identified, and there must be a subsequent Supply resolution and Budget Bill to deal with the financial aspects of the devolution of policing and justice powers.

I want to dwell a little on the critical issue of financing. There are, as everyone is aware, serious shortfalls with regard to the financial position for policing and justice. We have all heard about the discussions of the Policing Board, and the NIO demand for further cuts to front line policing. Many of those issues have been teased out and explored in great detail by the Assembly and Executive Review Committee.

Examples include the hearing loss claim, which, at the last estimate, represented a bill of around £120 million and rising all the time; the thorny subject of the cost of inquiries, and the fact that before inquiries take even a single piece of evidence, they can already be sitting with a £15 million bill; and the legal aid bill, which is habitually overspent by £20 million to £30 million each year, and is covered by the Exchequer, year in year out.

Various figures have been bandied about in respect of the actual cost of the devolution of policing and justice powers. I do not think that it is helpful to put a precise price tag on that. Although some of those shortfalls are historical or legacy costs that should be picked up by the Exchequer, others have been put forward in an opportunistic fashion as agencies within the justice sector bid for absolutely the best of everything, with knobs on. I argue that much of that is discretionary expenditure that could be looked at, as that sort of expenditure is, during the monitoring rounds each year.

However, in the present budget there is clearly a substantial number of significant shortfalls that need to be addressed to create the confidence that we can have, and exercise, in policing and justice powers in a way that does justice to the people of Northern Ireland. It would be foolish to proceed without proper budget cover in place. The ramifications of that could be quite stark, potentially leading to further cutbacks in policing or in other front line services.

Last weekend, there were three consecutive nights of rioting in the Lurgan area. Unfortunately, rioting is something that, from time to time, can plague this part of the world. It does not take too many consecutive nights of rioting in too many places for the existing budget for public order to be well and truly busted, and for money to be sought from other areas. The knock-on effect of that could be in policing — perhaps in the rollback of community policing or some of the educational projects that the police engage in — or, there could be a cut to other budgets, for example health or education. The proper financial package and budget cover must be in place before we can move forward with confidence.

Community confidence is a very important outstanding issue. I have said before that I, and unionists in general want the devolution of policing and justice powers. We want to see the control of those powers placed in local hands and administered by the people whom they elect to represent them in the Assembly. Our forefathers fought for policing and justice powers in the 1920s, and the determination to take those powers away was one of the very reasons why our Parliament collapsed in the 1970s. The devolution of policing and justice powers has always been a unionist ideal. From the inception of the state, unionists have wanted control over those powers.

Through my membership of the Assembly and Executive Review Committee, I have examined some of the financial shortfalls. However, I have seen other shortfalls within the system that can only be amended if control is placed in local hands. For example, there are necessary reforms to be made that could put an end to the inflated level of expenditure on the legal aid bill, and sentencing policy, most Members would agree, could be toughened up, mindful of not interfering with the independence of the judiciary.

Unionists desire control of the policing and justice powers. Although we have that desire, we need to build confidence in the Assembly having those powers, and that will be helped by addressing the financial issues that underpin devolution. This is a fairly simple and straightforward piece of legislation; however, it is clearly not a simple or a straightforward matter.

We still have many hurdles to overcome before we can say with confidence that we want to have policing and justice powers transferred. The Bill in no way advances us, in time, towards that day. It is a necessary step, but we still have some significant distance to travel.

The First Minister: The debate was never likely to be easy for you to handle, Mr Speaker, or for the Deputy Speakers. The devolution of policing and justice powers is a sensitive issue, and one that is vital to us all. It is a life-and-death matter for the people of Northern Ireland. That is the nature of its importance, and the discussions in the Assembly and Executive Review Committee and in the House have been critical.

Therefore, I was glad, and I would not have expected anything else from you, Mr Speaker, that you took the sensible line of allowing Members some flexibility. Members may be thinking that I say that because I intend to stretch that flexibility, but I do not. I am responding to the debate and, therefore, to comments that have already been made. As those comments have already been made, they must have been in order. Therefore, I must be in order in responding to them. [Laughter.]

It was a bit of a stretch to understand how some issues raised today were relevant to an enabling Bill that essentially has two key elements, especially given that the Second Stage of a Bill is confined to a debate on its general principles rather than its particulars. Of course, Members can object to various elements of any Bill, but they have the opportunity in Committee and at Consideration Stage to propose and table amendments for consideration. Therefore, the Assembly has today been considering the principle of whether the Bill's Second Stage should be agreed. That was the only issue on which the House had to decide, not whether every aspect of the Bill is precisely in place in the way in which Members want. That is for further Stages of the Bill to determine.

The debate did not always reach lofty heights, and elements of it were not edifying. Sometimes, we need to stop and consider where this Province has come from over the past number of years and, perhaps, recognise each Member's important role to ensure that the Assembly continues to make progress. I am a convinced devolutionist; I have always been so, and part of my conviction that devolution is the best way forward for the people of Northern Ireland comes from my 30 years at Westminster, most of which were served during periods of direct rule. I will never agree with anybody who thinks that it is better for the people of Northern Ireland to be part of a system of government that allows people who have no roots in this community to take decisions on its behalf.

Indeed, I will go further. Decisions are taken at Westminster in a way that gives no effective say to the elected representatives from this part of the United Kingdom. My colleague Dr McCrea will know about that, because he and I are both old-timers in the House of Commons. We know the procedures, whereby Orders in Council were passed after an hour and a half of debate, sometimes at 3.00 am. Those matters were shoved on to the end of business because people did not want to keep English, Scottish and Welsh MPs from getting home to their beds.

That was the way in which Northern Ireland affairs were treated. Those Bills went through without any amendments or any opportunity for people to do more than have, perhaps, one Member of their party speak on the issue at hand. No amendments were permitted to Orders in Council. That is what we will go back to if we do not make a go of the Assembly.

7.30 pm

People may be a little bit unhappy about structural aspects, and there are many things that I want to see changed, but we must not start questioning devolution itself. It is very much in the interests of the people of Northern Ireland, and it is our responsibility to ensure that it delivers best for them.

The devolution of policing and justice powers will be initiated when the Assembly alone determines that the time is right. In that context, I have already mentioned that the Bill is preparatory in nature. Clause 3 makes it clear that its provisions will become operative only after the Assembly has agreed to proceed and when the deputy First Minister and I jointly make a formal commencement Order. The Bill is an enabling Bill. It deals with the structures associated with setting up a Department of justice and the mechanism for appointing a justice Minister.

Throughout the debate, I heard a number of Members say that if we expect them to vote for this kind of legislation, we should talk to them. That shows that they do not understand the legislation that they are dealing with. This legislation is not the result of some recent backroom deal or of some negotiations with the Government or between the deputy First Minister and me. The Bill is the direct result of an agreement by the Assembly after the Assembly and Executive Review Committee presented its first report to the House. That Committee considered all the relevant issues and heard evidence from the deputy First Minister and me when we discussed those matters with it. There was a full debate on the Committee's report in the Assembly, in which these issues were discussed.

Perhaps I will go off at a tangent here: I cannot understand the SDLP's position. Throughout the seven-odd hours of the debate, it has said that it will vote against the Bill. Why? It did not vote against the Assembly and Executive Review Committee's report to the Assembly, which contained those selfsame issues. If it did not vote against that report then, why is it saying that it will vote against the Bill's Second Stage, which is a principle Stage, today? There is no consistency in that position whatsoever. I cannot understand how the SDLP has got itself into that position.

I will go into more detail on the subject of the SDLP and the Ulster Unionists later. However, I listened to Mr Kennedy when he dispensed with the hat that he wears as Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister and firmly placed his party hat on his head. He seemed offended at the suggestion that the Member for East Belfast Mrs Long might think that the attitude and position that the Ulster Unionist Party had adopted was anything other than a natural and principled stand that was in the interests of the whole community. Well, we must say it as it is: the Ulster Unionist position is entirely synthetic, and there is no degree of truth and honesty in it. It is absurd, given that party's history on this matter.

It might be worthwhile to take a bit of time to look at the Ulster Unionist Party's position. UUP Members have indicated that they believe in the devolution of policing and justice. I knew that they did so, because I can recall during the stewardship of Mr Trimble, now Lord Trimble, and Séamus Mallon, and during the stewardship of the now Lord Trimble and Mr Durkan, that there were all sorts of difficulties for the Executive and that negotiations were held periodically.

During one set of negotiations, the Ulster Unionist Party reached an agreement. At no stage did it publish that agreement because it lost the election that followed and the party was not required to deliver on it. However, it is worth knowing what the Ulster Unionist Party had signed up to; the same Ulster Unionist Party that said today, for point-scoring purposes, that it wants to see the devolution of policing and justice but that this is just not the right time and that it is too soon. What was the Ulster Unionist Party's position? The document that they agreed stated, and I quote:

"Ulster Unionists want to see the devolution of policing and justice on a basis that is robust and workable and broadly supported by the parties. In the next Assembly, we will seek agreement on the practicalities of such devolution, including the necessary institutional arrangements and legislation, with the objective of achieving devolution towards the mid-point of the Assembly's lifetime."

Remember, that was in 2003. The document goes on to refer to the UUP's willingness to:

"support arrangements for consultation and co-operation in policing and justice matters with the relevant authorities in Ireland."

That is from a document that the Ulster Unionist Party signed up to.

My recollection, and I am sure that those who were more intimately involved will tell me if I am wrong, is that the guts of that were agreed at a meeting in Hillsborough; a meeting in which the then leader of the Ulster Unionist Party took himself off a few hours early, and I am not sure of the reason, leaving the present leader of the Ulster Unionist Party in charge. The document is not something that one can say was due to David Trimble and was in the past: the thumbprints of the present leader are on it, as are those of many of the people who are here in the Ulster Unionist ranks today.

In 2003, the Ulster Unionist Party believed that the devolution of policing and justice should take place at the mid-point of the following Assembly, probably around the end of the summer holidays in October 2005. Does anyone in the House remember what conditions were like in 2003? If Members will permit me, I will remind them. Killings were still taking place that were being attributed to the Provisional IRA; cover names such Direct Action Against Drugs, and so forth, were being used; racketeering, gangsterism and criminality were still going on; Sinn Féin had given no support to the police, the courts, or the rule of law; yet the Ulster Unionist Party was content, at that stage and in those circumstances, to have the powers of policing and justice devolved.

Mr Kennedy: What the First Minister has omitted from his historical detail of the events of 2003 is that the leading nationalist party at that time was the SDLP, and that the Ulster Unionists, as the largest unionist party, had a responsibility to create stability for the people of Northern Ireland, and was attempting to give leadership. That was not helped by the antics and the attitudes of the Democratic Unionist Party.

Nonetheless, an important consideration that he omitted was that, generally, the broader Unionist family always considered it somewhat easier, difficult though it was, to negotiate with the SDLP than have to deal with Sinn Féin in the way that the First Minister finds himself doing now.

The First Minister: Here we find out how the Ulster Unionist Party got itself into so much trouble. It negotiated for the day without recognising that there is a tomorrow. The negotiation was held, and the decision taken, before an election. Everyone knew what the outcome of that election would be. The trend at that time made it abundantly clear that the SDLP was no longer going to be the largest party. Even if the Ulster Unionist Party missed what everyone else knew to be the facts, would anyone really put into legislation an arrangement that would have allowed Sinn Féin to take the position if the electorate had changed its mind in future years?

It is not a case of it being easier because the negotiations were with the SDLP. The Ulster Unionist Party was negotiating with Sinn Féin as well. Let us be clear that this was not a deal or a stitch-up that was done with the SDLP. It was an arrangement that would have been set for as long as the Assembly's legislation lasted. It is entirely synthetic for the Ulster Unionist Party to object in the current circumstances. Sinn Féin has given its support to the police, the courts and the rule of law; there has been decommissioning, which had not taken place when the agreement was signed; and it is clear that its campaign is over, if the various bodies that the Government set up to look at weaponry and the role of terrorist organisations are to be believed.

Conditions have changed since 2003, and there is no one who will say that they have not changed for the better. If conditions have changed for the better and it was OK to devolve policing and justice in 2003, why is not OK to do it in 2009? The Ulster Unionist Party cannot answer that question.

Mr McFarland: Will the Member give way?

The First Minister: I recall sitting with the Member on a Committee. Indeed, it might be worth telling the House about the discussions in that Committee, but I will let the Member speak first.

Mr McFarland: I could take the discussion back to the negotiations that took place all the way through the process.

The First Minister talked about people not voting against this in the Committee. In the Committee, all parties agreed that the title of the Department would be the Department of justice. However, we voted against the second bit — the Ministers etc — and I think that it is correct to say that the SDLP voted against. When the report came to the House, we voted against it. The suggestion that we all voted for it is not correct.

Our objection now is that the head of the Government is totally dysfunctional. There is no agreement between the two main parties: they are fighting over education, the Maze stadium and everything else. Policing and justice cannot be devolved to the Executive, the First Minister and the deputy First Minister with any hope that there will be stability, particularly as long as issues such as parading and Eames/Bradley remain unresolved.

The First Minister: I will deal with the point about dysfunctionality first, and then the Committee issue. How dysfunctional was the Executive in 2003 when the Assembly was collapsing every other week? The Ulster Unionist Party wanted to have the powers devolved to a dysfunctional Executive in 2003. I will come to more detailed comparisons of dysfunctionality later.

The Member has built a straw man so that he can knock it down, but I think that there is a genuine misunderstanding on his part regarding the Committee issue. I was not referring to the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister. Rather, I was referring to the Assembly and Executive Review Committee, which we appeared before in relation to this matter. That Committee brought its report to the Assembly, and the Assembly passed that report after a vote. At that time, the SDLP did not vote against the report. The SDLP now wants to vote against the principle of something that it agrees with because of the details of something that it did not previously object to.

7.45 pm

Mr McFarland put his head above the parapet. I recall the Preparation for Government Committee during the good old days of the Assembly. The Member for North Down Mr McFarland and I were members of that Committee when the issue of policing and justice was discussed. Through its spokesman, Mr McFarland, the Ulster Unionist Party said that it acknowledged that confidence in the unionist community was not yet there, and that it was not possible to agree to the devolution of policing and justice at that time. However, he went on to say that if the barrier of Sinn Féin announcing support for the police were removed and devolution was restored — both of which have happened — that would provide the necessary confidence. Those were the conditions that he laid down. On that same occasion, he then had the audacity to attack the DUP for its reluctance to provide a time frame to assist Sinn Féin. He regarded that as a misguided position. Therefore, the party that claims that it could not touch the principle of the Bill is the same one that chided us for not giving a timetable for the devolution of policing and justice during meetings of the Preparation for Government Committee.

Mr B McCrea: I am grateful to the First Minister for giving way. I am the third person to put my head above the parapet. [Interruption.]

I hear a lot of yahooing and cavorting. However, having listened to the First Minister's explanation, I want to make a serious point. Does he agree that circumstances have changed since the time that he referred to? Does he agree that the Executive have faced difficulties? Does he agree that there has been some difficulty with dissident republican activity? Does he agree that there have been difficulties with education, with parades, with the Maze and other issues, all of which have served to undermine public confidence in these institutions?

I was not an MLA during the days that the First Minister referred to. Therefore, I know about the optimism that existed outside this place. People had can-do attitudes and were eager to see what could be achieved.

The First Minister spoke most eloquently, and I mean this most sincerely, because he has the privilege of rank and he can talk with a command of the detail. He agreed that some of the issues that were raised by my party deserve serious consideration. Our opposition at this stage is aimed at sending the message that we are concerned about the long-term future. We are quite happy to work with people to try to resolve the issues, but we feel that we are missing a trick. There is a danger of winning the battle but losing the war.

The First Minister: Again, I will address the dysfunctionality argument, because it has permeated the debate. It probably came to a crescendo when Dolores Kelly spoke. During her tirade, as she threw her arms in the air, she indicated that the Executive had agreed nothing and that they could not take decisions that will benefit the people of Northern Ireland. That argument was followed up by the Ulster Unionist Party. None of that is new; they have been pumping out those same arguments every day for a long time. As soon as there is a difficulty — and difficulties will always occur in government — they talk about a dysfunctional Executive that cannot agree and about the Assembly not working. They do, of course, have a ready audience in the form of the media, which looks for any issue on which they can cause controversy.

Let us have a more objective consideration of the exact nature of that dysfunctionality. Such consideration is within the context of the debate on the Bill because a dysfunctional Executive has been suggested as one reason for not proceeding with it.

Comparisons can be made with the SDLP and the Ulster Unionist Party, which are the two parties of the centre. The message that they seek to send out is that, if only they were in government, everything would be peace and light, the sun would shine every day, the children would be skipping in the streets, and life would be wonderful.

Let us, however, consider the facts. The SDLP and the Ulster Unionist Party jointly led the Government during 31 months of devolution, whereas the current period of devolution stands at 29 months. The Ulster Unionists and the SDLP, therefore, had more time as leaders of the Executive than the DUP and Sinn Féin. What was accomplished? How many agreements did the SDLP and the Ulster Unionists reach at the Executive during that period? I will tell them: when Seamus Mallon was the deputy First Minister, they reached 194 agreements, and, when Mark Durkan was the deputy First Minister, they reached 126 agreements. Over a period of 31 months, they reached a total of 320 agreements.

Surely the current lousy, dysfunctional Executive could not meet the standards set by the Ulster Unionist Party and the SDLP. Surely the 320 issues on which they reached agreement was such a benchmark that it could never be beaten. However, in less time than it took the SDLP and the Ulster Unionists to reach agreement on 320 issues, the current Executive have reached agreement on 451 issues. We have, therefore, significantly increased the standard.

Mr McFarland: Is the First Minister referring to the number of pages?

The First Minister: The Executive have reached agreement on 451 issues.

Mrs D Kelly: Will the First Minister give way?

The First Minister: I will do so in a moment.

Very few of those 451 issues went to a division. Those two parties, over a longer period, accomplished about two thirds of the number that we have achieved. Despite that, they sit there, sanctimoniously pointing the finger and saying that dysfunctional parties cannot run the Executive — we have done a better job than them.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mrs D Kelly: Mr Speaker, I note the latitude that you gave to the First Minister, given that he made little reference to the Bill.

It is a matter of record that the legislation that was approved, the agreements reached and work done amount to much more happening during the tenure and leadership of the SDLP and the Ulster Unionist Party.

Does the First Minister not agree that one of the most important problems in society is the cancer of sectarianism? That must be addressed, but what did the dysfunctional Executive do last week? Sinn Féin published its document, and the DUP subsequently published on its website the document on which it thought it had secured agreement with Sinn Féin.

The First Minister: In 31 months, the Ulster Unionists and the SDLP did not produce any document. [Laughter.]

Mr Kennedy: Will the First Minister give way?

The First Minister: I will, but it is better that I answer one intervention before taking another.

I find it slightly offensive that the Member attempts to chide the Speaker for giving me the flexibility to respond to remarks that she made earlier. The Member allows herself the flexibility to talk about a dysfunctional Executive but, if anyone dares to respond, she complains to the Speaker about his allowing similar flexibility.

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the First Minister for giving way. I accept that the landscape is different from what it was in 2003. I also accept that the DUP is now the leading party in unionism, although I hope that that will be temporary. However, let me bring matters up to date: based on the comments of the First Minister's senior colleagues here today, some of whom hold dual mandates in this House and in Westminster, and given the not insignificant warnings that were posted today from this House; assuming that the enabling power will pass through its various stages and will be granted to the First Minister; how optimistic is he of achieving the devolution of policing and justice soon?

Mr Speaker: Before the First Minister responds to that point and to the issue that was raised by Dolores Kelly, I make it absolutely clear that every Member has had an opportunity to speak during the Second Stage of this Bill. All Members on all sides need to be honest: they received quite a bit of latitude in going outside the Second Stage of the Bill. Let us have a wee bit of honesty: the First Minister is answering comments that were made in this House by a number of Members. Let us not have double standards; let us protect the integrity and the business of this House, because that is what this is about and what my job is about.

The First Minister: I make it clear to the Member who asked the question — to those in the Chamber and those outside it — that, from the earliest moment of the prospect of devolution to Northern Ireland, documents from the Democratic Unionist Party were submitted to Government that argued the importance of the devolution of policing and justice powers. It is not a new position for us: it has always been our position.

As was mentioned in the debate, it was of particular importance to Carson and Craigavon during the negotiations that saw our Stormont Parliament being set up that the critical functions of policing and justice would be part of the Government's responsibilities. Brian Faulkner did not think it worth having a Government without those responsibilities for the reasons that a number of Members set out. We want policing and justice powers to return to Northern Ireland.

However, our consistent position, which was laid down in manifestos and in policy documents, is that because of the life-and-death, vitally sensitive issues that touch on the lives of every citizen, which I set out at the beginning, it had to be done right. It had to be done in a way that inspired community confidence. Community confidence was put at the heart of our manifesto. It was put at the heart of all our policy documents not to obstruct the devolution of policing and justice but because it was regarded as the essential ingredient.

Think what would happen if we were to have policing and justice powers with a justice Minister, and a significant section of our community could not stomach the fact that that was the position. All sorts of scenarios could be played out. It is vital that we have community confidence. It is also vital, as soon as we have all the other ingredients in place, that we all go out and win that community confidence; we should not sit back and hope that it comes along.

We recognised that two elements were central to achieving community confidence: the institutional arrangements and the financial arrangements. They would be critical in convincing the public that devolving policing and justice powers was the right thing for us to do.

8.00 pm

If I had a blank piece of paper and I were left on my own to write the scheme, I would not come up with that which we have. It is not the best scheme out, any more than our devolution structures are perfect; indeed, they have their imperfections.

I feel no embarrassment or any disloyalty to either the deputy First Minister or the Assembly. If I see ways of improving how we do business in the Assembly to get better delivery for the people of Northern Ireland, I have a duty to speak out. That is not to degrade or denigrate the great deal that we have achieved already. I believe that we have secured agreements where nobody expected us to. I believe that we have been able to deliver for the people of Northern Ireland; however, we have perhaps not sold properly what we have delivered. I believe that changes that have benefited the people of Northern Ireland over the past two years would never have been seen under direct rule.

Coming back to policing and justice, it is essential that we deal with the issues of institutional arrangements and finance to ensure that we build the community confidence, which, in our view, is essential.

As far as the institutional arrangements are concerned, broadly speaking, I believe that the arrangements in the Bill are fair and workable. If I did not believe that, I would not have recommended them to the Assembly and Executive Review Committee or, perhaps more importantly, to my colleagues. Therefore, I believe that the institutional arrangements can get the support of the community.

The financial arrangements are not yet in place. Indeed, for months we have been talking to officials and to Ministers without much movement on the matter. Most of the work has been in identifying where the pressures were and the extent to which those pressures were inescapable. I think that we now have thorough engagement with Government about what they will do to be able to meet the financial pressures that, unquestionably the police and justice agencies, prisons probation boards and the other bodies will face.

However, we are not there yet. We are still interrogating those figures, and we are almost in a stand-off position, because we are leaving it to officials in the Department of Finance and Personnel to advise us on whether the proposals meet the necessary criteria. That is a responsible position for us to adopt. Rather than attempt to impose a political will to push on to get devolution quicker than the finances would allow us or to hide behind finances as a reason to hold back, we are allowing officials to look at the finances realistically and to tell us the position that we would put the Province in.

I point out to Members that finance is no small issue. Any member of the Assembly and Executive Review Committee who has looked at the details of the finances knows that they represent very considerable pressures. The Government identified those pressures in some way when they gave us £27 million or whatever it was in the past weeks, only to effectively take £17 million back again by tightening the screw on spending.

Issues that are related to hearing loss could cost hundreds of millions of pounds, and it would be madness for the Ministers who are responsible for making recommendations to ignore those. We must deal with big-ticket items such as legal aid and equal pay, and pensions are no small matter. We also have to deal with a long list of what might be considered in simple, one-line terms to be small items. However, their cumulative effect makes them bigger than any of the big-ticket items.

Finance is not an easy matter to manage, but in my view, the Prime Minister and his officials are now dealing with it seriously. I believe that we made real progress on a number of those issues not just last night, but in previous meetings. Therefore, we are making progress. We are not going to the United States to have a meeting about policing and justice, but if the Prime Minister is there, and we are there and time is available, we will want to try to make further progress, because we want to see what the Prime Minister is prepared to do on some of those issues. Therefore, I hope that we can make more progress than we have made so far on the financing of policing and justice.

But that still leaves us with the matter of community confidence. The Ulster Unionist Party seems to be feeling a little sensitive about being left out, but, as I have pointed out publicly — and I do not retract one word of it — when the Democratic Unionist Party put into its manifesto that it was essential to be satisfied that there is community confidence, it did not say that it wanted the confidence of the leader of the DUP, the DUP Assembly group or the party as a whole; it said that it wanted community confidence.

The Ulster Unionist Party is part of that community, and we will want to hear exactly what it has to say on these matters. However, it will not be able to duck the serious questions that we have to face. If the UUP wants to give me plenipotentiary powers and allow me to take decisions on its behalf, I will do so, but, in my view, the matter is such that the Ulster Unionist Party, the Alliance Party, the SDLP, Sinn Féin and anybody else in the Assembly should have their say about whether the time is right for devolving policing and justice. They will not be ignored during the process.

Mr B McCrea: I listened with interest to what the First Minister said. Throughout the debate, we have been signalling that we have concerns and opinions about which we would like to engage with him. However, we have been royally vilified, and some Members even laughed and called into question the points that we brought forward. It seems to me that if there is to be a way to build community confidence, it could be ably demonstrated in the Chamber by how people respond to heartfelt and genuine concerns; concerns that I happen to know are shared by many people, not just members of the UUP. Therefore, I say to the First Minister that I hear what you say, but actions speak louder than words.

The First Minister: First, I do not believe that anybody was laughing, scoffing or otherwise screaming at him about any concerns that he may have. I rather suspect that some of those concerns are shared on these Benches. The inconsistency in the Ulster Unionist Party's position is that having and expressing those concerns is a reason to vote against an enabling Bill, which does nothing to determine the date for the devolution of policing and justice. That is the gap between our positions.

Similarly, I cannot understand why the SDLP did not vote against the Assembly and Executive Review Committee's report, but claims that it will vote against the Bill tonight. Likewise, the Ulster Unionist party says that it believes in principle in the devolution of policing and justice, but, like the rest of us, has concerns, and therefore will vote against having the legislation in place that, at a later stage, will enable that to happen. Surely we have enough confidence in ourselves to know that the issue will come to the Assembly, which can then determine whether the moment is right. I have said publicly — now for the fifth or sixth time — that we will not reach that stage until we have had the very conversations that the Member suggests should take place.

This is a community issue. In fact, I will go further; it is not just a matter for the parties in the Assembly. If Members look at the process paper that the deputy First Minister and I handed over to the Assembly and Executive Review Committee, they will see that a consultation process with the community as a whole is one of the process points that must be followed. Would it not be wrong for us to ignore what the community has to say about such an important matter?

Again I go back to the issue: I do not object in any way to Members expressing concerns about timing or, indeed, the mechanisms that will be used, but that is not the subject of the Bill that is before us tonight.

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the First Minister for giving way again. We accept that the legislation is enabling legislation, and it is a fact that it contains no time or date. However, it is very important that the First Minister and all Members of the House understand that, crucially, it is also a fact that the Ulster Unionist Party and other parties have been excluded from the detailed negotiations that are ongoing in Downing Street and that will undoubtedly continue in Washington, New York or somewhere else in the United States of America this week. That raises the fundamental concern that we cannot and will not, as a political party, give a blank cheque to those negotiations.

The First Minister: I do not think that anybody would ask that of anyone in the House; I would not ask my own party colleagues to give me a blank cheque on those matters. Every one of them will want to see exactly what the financial arrangements are; they will want absolute open and transparent disclosure in the course of the further discussions that we have, as indeed they will for any other issues that are of concern to them.

Dr W McCrea: I ask my honourable friend to think back to the talks at Weston Park in which the Ulster Unionist Party took the lead. The only news that we were given was drip-fed to us from people who were in the talks. Certainly, the leader of the Ulster Unionist Party did not tell the people of Ulster what was agreed there.

The First Minister: That applies not just to what happened at Weston Park, it has to be said. The Ulster Unionist Party even attempted to stop me, as a Minister, from getting Executive papers. I had to go to court to get financial and other papers that were going to the Executive and that they withheld from me. Therefore, I will not take lectures about the lack of consultation and so forth.

I am being open. I have indicated publicly that I am willing to set up a mechanism, both for the SDLP and the Ulster Unionists, to talk about the issues that the Executive have to deal with and about any other matters that they want. I have asked my special advisers already to see whether arrangements can be made with the special advisers of the Ulster Unionist Party and the SDLP to ensure that we have a better relationship.

Let us be very clear: this is not a matter of Sinn Féin and the DUP keeping the Ulster Unionist Party and the SDLP out. Up to now, it has been a matter of the SDLP and the Ulster Unionist Party seeing themselves as being opposition in the Executive. I hope that we will see a change in that situation. Indeed, we have heard an example of that today. There has been talk about huckster shops and people getting Executive papers at the last moment. What happened when the papers were given out with plenty of time? On the same day that the Finance Minister sent a paper to other Ministers, it was leaked to the BBC. If we are to have an Executive in which there is a proper functioning partnership —

Mr A Maskey: Where did the leak come from?

The First Minister: The Member should not ask where the leak came from; he might get an answer.

The facts are that the SDLP and the Ulster Unionist Party have gloried in being opposition in the Executive. It did not really matter what the issue was; they wanted to be against it. If they thought that there was going to be the least bit of hardship over a decision that was to be made, they wanted to be against that general principle. That is OK for an opposition party; we expect such parties to do that. However, if we have parties in the Executive, particularly in circumstances where greater responsibilities are going to be handed over, we expect a team to be playing together. That is not simply a case of Sinn Féin and the DUP allowing greater disclosures to the SDLP and Ulster Unionists; it is a matter of those parties playing as part of a team.

Mr Kennedy: Will the Member give way?

The First Minister: I will give way in a moment. We had a second example in the Chamber today, with an Ulster Unionist Minister. Can anybody imagine a Minister in any Cabinet anywhere in the world coming to an Assembly about a financial matter in the way that that Ulster Unionist Minister did today? That Minister has 50% of the block grant, which is all the money that is available to us in Northern Ireland. He has a better settlement than any Health Minister has ever had. What is his reaction to the first difficulty that comes along, the first hard decision that he has to make? He said that it is the Finance Minister's fault.

That is not the way that Executive Ministers should be acting. The Health Minister signed up to the Budget; he agreed to it, and we expect people to work together in the Executive as a collective. That is even more important.

If we have not moved too far away from the point that Mr Kennedy was going to raise, I will give way to him.

8.15 pm

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the First Minister for giving way, yet again. Methinks the First Minister doth protest too much, particularly on the issue of the role of what are called "opposition" parties operating in the Executive. It seemed to me and to a large number of people, including Members of the House and people outside the House, that he and his party successfully deployed such tactics in the period when the DUP was not the leading party and when he did not have the full responsibilities that he has now. It is a bit rich of him to lecture us in those terms today.

The First Minister: The Member's memory is a little defective, because we held exactly that kind of role, and we made it clear that our objective in relation to the Belfast Agreement was to bring it down. That was our deployment, and since we made the changes that were required due to the unsuccessful negotiating of the Ulster Unionist Party and managed to get a better deal for the unionist community in Northern Ireland, we have succeeded. The electorate supported us because of the programme that we were developing. Is the Ulster Unionist Party saying that it is adopting the tactics of the DUP because it wants to bring the agreement down? That is where those tactics were bound to lead, and that is why we deployed them.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Molloy] in the Chair)

If the Member is against the structures that we have here and the form of devolution that we have, I recognise that he has a right to carry on with the wrecking tactics, if that is the idea. However, we have got a better deal now to stand over the kind of structures that we have. If the Member wants the system to work, I hope that he will join with the rest of us as full members of the team, working with his Executive colleagues as part of a collective, and not leaking information and trying to damage the Executive by handing out stories to journalists that might be of interest in order to undermine the Executive and their work. I am not suggesting that the Member leaked the information, because he was not there.

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the First Minister for giving way. Why would we want to wreck something that we created and worked hard to create? Let me reassure the First Minister and other Members, lest they may be in any doubt: the Ulster Unionist Party worked hard to create the conditions for devolution, and we will continue to work hard to create proper conditions for the devolution of policing and justice. We are not in the business of wrecking, and we never have been — unlike some parties in the House.

The First Minister: I get around the Province as much as, and perhaps more than, most Members. I meet people of every shade of opinion and at every level of our society. If the Member thinks that through his party's constant references to dysfunctionality, comments about the Executive not doing particular things and decisions not being taken, it is supporting and building up the credibility of the structures that we have here, he is mistaken. In the community, there is an unhealthy disrespect for the Assembly and for the work that it does. It is our responsibility to show that we can act responsibly and that we want to make the Assembly and Executive work. That is a job that every one of us has to do, and we will not do it if we try from the inside to act as saboteurs or fifth columnists and try to bring it down.

Mr Durkan: We, on these Benches, are not trying to wreck anything: we have never sought to wreck anything here. We have tried to make the Assembly and Executive work, and we have done that by proposing motions that suggest better ways of handling issues in relation to public finances and that suggest that all the parties work together in a new Committee to deal with a lot of the structural problems in the Budget. All of those motions contained positive proposals to deal with those issues, and we proposed them in order to play our part and not to wreck anything. However, each proposal that we made to deal with serious issues, and deal with them collectively, was voted down by Sinn Féin and the DUP.

The First Minister: I could tell an entirely different story, but I do not think that it would help to bind the wounds that exist.

Some Ministers sit at the Executive table, texting people outside to get details of confidential discussions to the press, and I do not believe that that is the best way forward for the Executive. Furthermore, some Ministers record their dissent in the minutes on every issue that is a little bit controversial or that might have a downside to it. Being in the Executive is about taking difficult decisions, and it is about being unpopular at times because of those decisions. One cannot be in a four-party mandatory coalition, and take all the benefits of being in that coalition, but, at the same time, use one's position to make out that the other members of the coalition are responsible when things go wrong. If an Executive are to function properly and take the responsibilities that we are talking about, there must be more collectivity within it, and a more responsible attitude must be taken.

I will not make any more of that point, but I want to make it clear that there is not a one-way process that the SDLP and the Ulster Unionist Party are being kept out of. Those parties' actions have created a gap between them and the two leading parties in the Executive. I hope that that gap can be closed, and I hope that there is a will on the part of the Ulster Unionist Party and the SDLP to do that. If there is a genuine desire to be a more collective Executive, and to move forward, I believe that that will be reciprocated by both Sinn Féin and the DUP.

I must move on now, because I have spoken for almost an hour, and I am not even halfway through my responses to comments. [Laughter.]

On four occasions, Members referred to the devolution of policing and justice powers not occurring in "a political lifetime". I have sourced the original reference to that and the context in which it was said. The references that were made in the House of Commons were made during a discussion of legislation that specifically designed a ministerial role for Sinn Féin in policing and justice. Nigel Dodds, and possibly others, made those comments in that context. Those remarks were clearly made in that context, and they were also set out in the DUP's policy document in the same context. However some people in the House, and other mischievous and malevolent people outside it, have chosen to use those comments without being honest enough to give the context in which they were made.

During an intervention, Mr Kennedy made some remarks about his concern about the financial package — Members will note that I am still dealing with the first person who spoke in the debate. Mr Kennedy's remarks related to the financial package, and, to paraphrase his case, he is looking forward to learning the outcomes of the current financial discussions while telling us to look at what happened the last time.

Well, let us be clear what has happened. No other part of the United Kingdom has had a better deal on financing than Northern Ireland. When we go to the Westminster Government to discuss issues on which we require financial assistance, they are not slow at pointing out that they will talk to us about those matters, but that repercussiveness is such that they have problems when they make such gestures to Northern Ireland, because other places in Scotland, Wales and elsewhere will ask for the same.

When the original settlement was made, we were granted a guaranteed flat real growth, plus an additional £100 million each year, over the comprehensive spending review (CSR) period. That was at a time when many Whitehall Departments were facing reductions in their budgets. Furthermore, we were given an additional £100 million in 2007-08 to manage the delay of introducing water charges, and to provide funding for innovation.

Moreover, we had access to additional spending under end-year flexibility of £320 million; a £400 million contribution from the Irish Government for a substantial new roads programme; and a breaking of the link between access to borrowing under the reinvestment and reform initiative, with a requirement to close the gap with other GB councils in tax rate. Indeed, had that latter point not been agreed, we would not have been able to freeze rates, as we have done, over the last three years of the Budget settlement.

As Finance Minister during the negotiations on the comprehensive spending review, I was able to secure additional funding over and above that which was previously agreed with the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

That included an additional £443 million over and above the CSR guarantee; access to additional end-year flexibility over and above the previous agreed figure of £295 million; and access to £106 million of reinvestment and reform initiative (RRI) borrowing. That was the nature of the package that was agreed when we entered into devolution — a very good package for Northern Ireland. If the figures are added up, we have had access to a figure of around £1 billion, which we have used.

However, that is not where the Executive stop. Even after we got into Government, we were prepared to go back to the Prime Minister when issues were at stake. I remember going to Downing Street with the Finance Minister and the deputy First Minister to argue the case, and we came back with agreements from the Government worth about £900 million, which allowed us to have money available for the equal pay issue and to have funds available for a further deferment of water charges. We negotiated very good financial packages from the Government in the past, and we will not settle for a financial package for policing and justice that is second best.

Mr Durkan: Will the First Minister tell us exactly how much of the £900 million was to go towards the equal pay issue and why the matter has not been resolved?

The First Minister: The Finance Minister was intending to talk about that today, but I do not know whether he has managed to do so yet. An offer has been made on equal pay, and we are waiting for — [Interruption.] The Member says no and the Finance Minister says yes. I suspect that the Finance Minister knows an awful lot more about it than the Member. The offer has been made. Obviously, it has to be considered by the unions on behalf of their members, and they will come back with a response.

Again, it was this Administration that recognised the inequality and sought to put it right. That inequality was there when the Ulster Unionist Party and the SDLP were the main parties in Government, but it was this Administration that decided that the issue had to be tackled, and I hope that it can be dealt with as speedily as possible. If the Member will forgive me, I do not want to get into the figures while the Department and the unions are in the middle of negotiations.

I come to the issue of the sunset clause, which will interest the Member for Foyle. The sunset clause is as much a challenge to the Executive and the Assembly as it is an attempt to ensure any particular outcome thereafter. We will be working until 2012 under the system that we have agreed. With the benefits that the Executive, the Assembly and its Committees will have of seeing any operation of policing of justice under those structures, they will be able to determine what the most appropriate future structure for policing and justice may be. They might decide that they want to change it, or they might decide that as it has worked so swimmingly they want to keep it, but whatever happens, they will decide from a position of experience.

I am not planning for failure. I want us to succeed, and not only with regard to the operation of the function. I want any negotiations to succeed in working out where we go in 2012, as far as a permanent resolution to the structures is concerned. It is not surprising, and it is not wrong, for any Member to say "OK, one can plan for success but failure may be the result whether one wants it or not". Therefore, what do we do in circumstances where, although we want an outcome in 2012, we cannot agree on one? It is absurd to suggest that if we were unable to agree in 2012, that the judges and the police will not be paid and that there will be no ministerial responsibility. We all know that the Government have a back-up plan in mind. I suspect that the Government would step in after a time, anyway. We do not intend to get to that stage. We do not plan for failure. We want those negotiations to reach a successful outcome.

The Member for Foyle has a particular view of what the legislation might mean.

I am aware of the section that he is referring to, and I am aware that it is possible to put on it the construction that he puts on it. However, neither he nor I knows what the courts would decide in those circumstances. I suspect that if he is using the same lawyers to advise him as advised the Minister for Social Development in the past, it might be as well if he does not place too much reliance on the advice that he has received thus far.

8.30 pm

Our advice thus far is not in line with the view being expressed by the Member for Foyle. Indeed, whether it was or was not would not concern me, because I want to see agreement reached on a way forward, and if it is not reached, I rather suspect that, before that legislation is used to map the way forward, the Government will have considered other possibilities rather than imposing a resolution on us. Although, in some legal sense, the Member may be able to construct an argument that that is what might happen, in a political sense, it is very unlikely that that route would be taken by a Secretary of State.

I will now turn to the other SDLP consideration. Alban Maginness, Mark Durkan, and, particularly, Alex Attwood dealt with the issue of the departure from d'Hondt. At times, I wonder whether anybody really thinks that the heart and soul of the Belfast Agreement is the d'Hondt mechanism; that somehow it is the indispensable part of the Belfast Agreement; that somehow it is of such import and such moment that nothing else can exist unless d'Hondt is in place. There are Members who treat d'Hondt as if it were the law of the Medes and Persians, which changeth not. It is a mechanism: that is all it is. It is a mechanism to achieve proportional representation.

I want to know what the great sin is. What is the draconian measure that the deputy First Minister and I were proposing to the Assembly and Executive Review Committee should be deployed in order to get a justice Minister appointed? Clearly, it must be dreadful. It must be some bigoted system that we have concocted. It must be partisan in the way that it is presented, because nothing can compare to d'Hondt. What is this system? It is that we want to ensure that both sections of our community are supportive of the new justice Minister, to the extent that we not only require a majority of Members of the Assembly to endorse it; we want to ensure that it is endorsed by a majority of the nationalist Members and a majority of the unionist Members. That will ensure that the person appointed will have support across the community and not simply the confidence of a nominating officer, which is all that such a Minister would have if he or she were appointed through d'Hondt.

The position is of such importance that we believed that the second mile was necessary to ensure that the person appointed has the confidence of the widespread community. I admit, from a party point of view, that I do not have the kind of adherence to the d'Hondt system that the Ulster Unionists have declared themselves to have, as has the SDLP. It is a system that can give a result through proportional representation, but I would rather be a justice Minister who is appointed by the cross-community vote of the Assembly than one who is simply appointed by the nominating officer of my party. That would give me a lot more force, strength and influence in the community.

Mr Durkan: The key principle of the Good Friday Agreement is democratic inclusion according to mandate. The d'Hondt system was one mechanism to achieve that, and there are others. However, the key principle is democratic inclusion according to mandate. This Bill bypasses that, because it creates a situation in which one party is able to deliberately discriminate against a party that is entitled to a further Ministry and pick another party that does not have the mandate for that entitlement. The principle is democratic inclusion according to mandate. That is the issue.

Upstairs, the First Minister told me that the DUP wants that option so that it can permanently veto Sinn Féin. It is intended as a permanent veto; he told me that directly and honestly in discussions. Let him not pretend that it is otherwise.

The First Minister: The issue of Sinn Féin's holding of the Ministry has already been dealt with. Sinn Féin already indicated that it would not put anyone forward for it. Sinn Féin and the DUP were in a structure in which we had the ability to put someone forward but, in spite of having that ability, we decided that this was the fairest possible system and one that was likely to bring the widest level of support for the person who is to hold the post.

The methodology that we are using is not unique. It is used for critical votes in the Assembly, the Speaker is elected according to it, and the deputy First Minister and I are required to have that level of support. There is nothing new in the fact that some positions are appointed by a system that is different from Mr Durkan's precious d'Hondt system. That system is not the only show in town, and I cannot think of any issue other than the matter of policing and justice for which it is more important to have cross-community support and to have a Minister who has support that is drawn from both sections of the community.

Mr Durkan: Will the First Minister give way?

The First Minister: I will give way again to the Member shortly; I have not denied anyone the right to an intervention.

In relation to Mr Durkan's mathematics, if we had decided to use the d'Hondt system, an additional Minister would not have been added; the Minister could have come from the existing 10. Therefore, it would have had no impact on the number of SDLP Ministers. We reckoned that because the final decision on the way that we would operate would not be made until 2012, that was a good step to take because we could see how it worked and could make judgements based on that.

Mr Durkan: The First Minister may recall that, in our discussions, the SDLP made it clear that if parties were to choose the option of keeping 10 Departments by creating one new Department and merging some others, we would have no problem with that on the basis that d'Hondt would be run. That is what the Good Friday Agreement requires and envisages; we never opposed that, and, in fact, we wanted that. He is the man who says that he wants to reduce the number of Departments, and he is the man who rejected that option. He did so because he did not want d'Hondt because it is based on democratic inclusion according to mandate. That was in the Good Friday Agreement, but it would not allow him to veto Sinn Féin or any other nationalists that he chose to.

The First Minister: The Member should not get excited. He is not going to hear me denying the fact that I have no attachment to d'Hondt; I hold my hands up to that. I do not believe that d'Hondt has any exceptional powers or provides any exceptional outcomes compared with any other proportional system. In many ways, d'Hondt distorts the outcome.

I return to my initial proposition. The current Executive have been able to agree much more often than their predecessor Executive, and reach more decisions and operate more smoothly than they did, without interruptions because of suspensions and collapse. The fact remains, however, that improvements can still be made.

I have still not dealt with the issue that affects the "cross-Benchers", whose votes effectively do not count on certain matters. Of course, I am ready, through the Assembly and Executive Review Committee and elsewhere, to look at all the issues, such as how appointments are made, including appointments to the positions of First Minister and deputy First Minister. All of that can be in the mix, and we can consider how we might go forward. Perhaps, some day, we will get change that is beneficial and that normalises the democratic rules in the Chamber.

Mrs Long: During the debate, some Members have talked about the agreement as though it were the end point of a process. Will the First Minister agree that the Good Friday Agreement was put in place so that we could facilitate further agreements and developments in this place that would be democratically challenged, just as is happening with today's debate, so that we can further democracy and progress, rather than simply enshrining everything according to what was agreed in 1998 and failing to see that any further progress can be made?

The First Minister: The Member is absolutely right. Some people treat politics and political ideology as though they were theology, in that they must not change and they are fixed. Politics moves, and circumstances change. Improvements can be made, and new systems can be recognised. New conditions apply, and changes are, therefore, necessary. Even if the agreement did not allow for change, politics would require it. Politics can never stay at one fixed point.

Even if the Assembly could improve on what has gone previously, it would be nonsense for it to say that what has gone previously is so special and important that not one word, jot or tittle of it can be changed. No sensible politician would ever take that position. If improvements can be made, they should be made, regardless of whether they offend the architects of the original structures. We must recognise that politics is about change, improvement and better delivery for all people. That requires the machinery of government to be modernised continually.

I want to discuss the remarks that Mr Farry, a Member for North Down, made. He talked about the removal of a justice Minister. He also made certain remarks that, effectively, asserted that an Alliance Party Minister, in those circumstances, would not be anybody's patsy. If the House felt that it was electing a justice Minister who would be a serf, or subservient, or any of those other terms that were being used by certain Members in a derogatory fashion, I do not believe that it would vote for such a person.

The justice Minister will have to perform a difficult role. That person will require my support and that of the deputy First Minister and, I suspect, that of every one of our Executive colleagues and the Assembly itself. Therefore, that Minister's role will not be one in which he or she is isolated.

Under the legislation, the justice Minister will play a full part in the workings of the Executive. He or she will be able, and be entitled, to ask for my support and that of the deputy First Minister on matters that he or she believes to be important. The Minister will be able to go to the Finance Minister if he or she believes that there are pressures that require him to go back to the Treasury, for example.

Therefore, no matter what the final result of the Assembly's vote might be, we do not consider that the person who is appointed will be some kind of hand puppet who will be manipulated by the deputy First Minister and me.

As regards Mr Farry's point about the Minister's removal, I do not believe that anybody would consider it right that, because we have some political disagreement with the Minister who is appointed, he or she will be turfed out. We are talking about the removal of a Minister for real reasons, regardless of whether they are to do with his or her behaviour outside the political arena, or with a matter of trust, for example.

Protocols can be worked out by the new Minister and his or her Executive colleagues. Therefore, we can look at protocols to deal with functioning, and not just for removal, incidentally. If I were justice Minister, I would want to know much more about the decision-making process to ensure that if action needed to be taken, I would have the necessary support to do that. Protocols will have to be put in place for that.

Dealing with policing and justice will require decisions to be made now, not in weeks' or months' time. Unquestionably, we will want to ensure that we give the Minister whatever support we can to ensure that he or she can do his or her job to its full potential.

8.45 pm

Dr Farry: I am grateful to the First Minister for giving way. I appreciate that the Assembly has yet to finalise and discuss the issue of timescales. However, will he comment on the importance of trying to reach as much consensus as possible on policy matters from all political parties in advance of devolution to assist in its smooth running? That way, we can prove to people that devolution can make a real difference to people's lives.

The First Minister: The Member has a valid point. We cannot have a Programme for Government to deal with the existing Departments, and not have an agreement on the programme for policing and justice. Obviously, a new justice Minister will have to operate within the status quo of the existing structures, unless there are agreements on how those can be changed. Just as there is a Programme for Government for other Departments, we will want a programme for policing and justice. We will want to start work on that as soon as practicable. Our only difficulties are that we are still outside the Department in that we do not know exactly which issues it will face. We know that some of the big issues will be set in the community; however, I think that we probably need a greater deal of knowledge about the internal issues of the Department.

The Member for North Down Alan McFarland, who has since disappeared from the Chamber, started off his contribution by making some very helpful comments about the level of devolution that has already taken place. Some people believe that we are moving into new territory with the devolution of policing and justice. However, as Mr McFarland pointed out, the Chief Constable and the judiciary are already independent, and they effectively take care of the operation of the police and the courts, respectively. The Policing Board, which has been functioning for some considerable time, is also independent. There has been a high level of agreement in its decisions. I believe that it is entitled to the respect of the community for the job that it is doing.

On behalf of the Assembly, I take this opportunity to wish the new Chief Constable every success in the job. I know that he will have the support of Assembly Members. He is undertaking a difficult task, but it is good to know that he was selected unanimously by the panel. That puts him in strong position as he takes up the post.

Mr McFarland was right to point out that a high level of devolution of policing and justice matters has already taken place in Northern Ireland. We are looking at taking over the last vestiges of that: the policy and legislative role that exists.

Mr Attwood: I thank the First Minister for giving way, and I apologise for missing his earlier comments. On the issue of the Executive taking over the vestiges of policing and justice policy, will the Minister reassure the Assembly that the posts of the permanent secretary and senior directors will be subject to public and open competition?

Is the First Minister in a position to confirm whether senior NIO officials, who work down the road from here, will move across en masse to become senior officials in a Department of justice? If that is the case, does he think that that is a good way of building confidence, given how the NIO has handled certain issues in the past?

The First Minister: The powers have not been devolved. Ipso facto, we have not taken any decisions on those issues, and the Executive have not considered any paper on those matters. However, NIO officials might have a view on that, and the NIO itself might well have a proposal.

The Northern Ireland Office and officials here might be making some working assumptions. Ultimately, if the powers come here, those are matters that we will have to consider in due course, and I am sure that the Executive will want to look at them. However, no paper on that matter has come to the Executive.

There was a slight change in tone from the Member who raised the issue; he started off by talking about staff in general terms before referring to heads of Departments and higher level staff. If there were to be a complete clearout, and present staff were to be replaced by some — I was going to say virgin figures, but I do not want to be misunderstood — fresh faces who have no experience of the issues that have been dealt with in recent weeks, months and years, there would be very real problems. Therefore, there has to be a transfer of staff, but the extent and level of that is something that we have yet to deal with.

Mr Attwood: Will the Member give way?

The First Minister: I am not sure what benefit there is in asking me further questions when I have not been able to answer in full the one that he just asked.

Mr Attwood: Should there be an open competition for the post of permanent secretary in the new Department of justice, or has someone already been identified for the post, who will drop into place at the relevant moment?

The First Minister: Now that the matter has been taken down to a particular individual, it would be entirely wrong for me to comment on it publicly. We are happy to discuss with the SDLP and others the processes that we can go through. I reiterate that we need people with experience and knowledge of the operation of policing and justice, particularly in circumstances in which we do not have experience of operating those systems.

Mr Kennedy: I thank the First Minister for giving way again. If the legislation completes all its stages, will that facilitate a situation in which persons could be appointed to a potential policing and justice Department in shadow form?

The First Minister: The passage of this piece of legislation will not make one bit of difference to what could happen as regards an existing Department. Until a commencement Order is signed, powers will not be devolved. If any Minister in the Northern Ireland Office wants to act before the Assembly makes a decision, he or she will be accountable to the Public Accounts Committee at Westminster for any expenditure that takes place. Having some knowledge of the Public Accounts Committee at Westminster, I would be loath to take that burden upon myself. There has to be a legal basis for the expenditure of money.

If movement were taking place, it would not be unnatural for preparations to be made. No doubt, there are people who are applying their minds to that at the moment. Whether that is the final outcome is something that time alone will tell.

The issue of parading was raised by a UUP Member. I agree with him; it would be the worst of circumstances if a new justice Minister had to go into a post and have to deal with controversial parading issues. If it is possible to make progress on that through the work of the Ashdown review group, it should be done. Parading is one of the issues that my colleagues and I have been pressing with the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State, and we will continue to do so.

It is essential that we get agreement on parading, because it exercises the minds of the people whom I meet more than the devolution of policing and justice. That is a fact. Parading is raised more often with me than the devolution of policing and justice powers. That does not take away from my desire to see policing and justice powers devolved, but if we are talking about issues that resonate with the community, parading is a problem in our community that has to be tackled. A review group has been looking at the issue and has brought in a considerable amount of expertise. That group has looked in depth at the options over a very long period, and it is close to achieving an outcome. I hope that that outcome will be supported and that we can get the necessary changes on parading.

The Eames/Bradley group is not separate from the Historical Enquiries Team (HET) or the general issue of inquiries, as regards the pressures that could be applied on the funding for policing and justice.

I have my own views on the Eames/Bradley proposals, as does my party, and we will publish them before too long. We are not altogether sympathetic to the general proposals. There are ways of dealing with the past, but if we are somehow expecting to reach an agreement on a common history of Northern Ireland, we will wait for a very long time, spend an awful lot of money, and still not have a result.

Mr McFarland: My understanding is that, in discussions that the First Minister and deputy First Minister no doubt have had, the Government have accepted that they will fund the inquiries that are ongoing. My understanding is that their proposal is that anything coming out of Eames/Bradley and the HET will come across with policing and justice. How does the First Minister see policing and justice, which will be complicated enough when it comes, being able to settle if, in the middle of it all, we are dealing with, and funding dealing with, the past?

The First Minister: Let me deal with the funding issue. We have identified all the pressures that we can at present conceive that the Department of justice would face in this comprehensive spending review period and beyond. That clearly takes into account the kind of issues that the Member raises.

Every Department will have pressures on it for more expenditure. However, as a former Finance Minister, I know that there is very often an easy answer, which is that Departments should fund those things themselves. Therefore, a number of bids that were made could be absorbed within the Departments. However, policing and the courts, for instance, do not have slack in their budgets. Therefore, if there is a long list of items that are additional pressures, and there is no likelihood of slippage, one needs to be very clear that there will be some way to fund those additional elements.

I do not want to go into the details of what the costs may be, but if there is no agreement on the outcome of Eames/Bradley, it is difficult to quantify its costs. As far as I am concerned, a lot of the stuff in Eames/Bradley would go into the waste-paper basket, and the cost for the kind of arrangement that I would envisage would not be great. Others in the Assembly might have a different view. Those are the sort of difficulties that we face, because we are facing pressures that we cannot at present quantify, but we recognise that we have budgets that do not have the degree of slack to deal with those issues if the Assembly or the Minister decided to proceed. Therefore, the Member has identified one of our difficulties in relation to financing. At the end of the day, it is not an exact science, and we simply have to make a best-faith effort.

I spoke earlier about dysfunction. Statistically and conclusively, I showed that there was greater dysfunction in the previous Executive than in this one. However, one issue that goes to the heart of people's belief that there is that level of dysfunction is the total exaggeration in some Members' remarks. For instance, Dolores Kelly said that there were 53 Executive papers stuck in the system. Well, there are not. There are only 28 draft Executive papers being considered in the system, four of which were received in the past fortnight alone. When we receive those papers, there is a process for approving them and putting them to the Executive. Ministers will have their say on those issues, and they will want to make comments and to see the extent to which those comments are taken on board by other Ministers. Therefore, the not 53, but 28 draft Executive papers that are there do not mean that we are stuck on 28 matters. There are 28 works in progress.

9.00 pm

Of course there are delays. It is inevitable that there will be some differences, not just between the DUP and Sinn Féin, but between Sinn Féin and other parties, or between the DUP and other parties. That is the nature of coalition government. Live with it, folks. In a coalition, issues will arise on which the coalition partners do not agree: that is a fact of life. Therefore, the extent to which a Minister is prepared to compromise to get his or her paper or Bill through will determine exactly how much progress is made in that Department.

There was double exaggeration concerning the papers in the system. There was exaggeration of the number of papers blocked in the system and exaggeration of the extent to which they are blocked. For the most part, those papers are working their way through the system. As one who believes that there are ways in which to improve the existing blockages in the system, I want to make it very clear that the extent to which there are blockages is nothing close to that claimed by the SDLP Member.

Mr Attwood: On 7 July, a letter, on the important matter of the Child Poverty Bill that is going through Westminster, was sent to the First Minister's office by the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister. Seventy-one days later, a response came back, and was received by the Committee 36 minutes before its meeting began at 2.00 pm last week. Does the First Minister think that that is an exaggeration, or does he concur that that is not a very efficient or effective way in which to do business?

The First Minister: I am happy to look at the individual case that the Member raises. However, I am pretty sure that there is a bit more behind it than what he simplistically outlined. There will be papers and issues on which considerable work has to be done by the time they are received in OFMDFM. However, that is not to say that OFMDFM is dysfunctional. We have shown that OFMDFM is less dysfunctional than it was during the time that the Ulster Unionists and the SDLP were in office; that it has managed to get more decisions through; and that it has had fewer suspensions and stoppages.

Instead of saying that there are problems here and there, people should recognise that we have improved our processes. However, there is more that we can do, and I am happy to respond to suggestions. I want delivery to be as fast and effective as possible. Clearly, if it was as simple as the Member outlined, that is an example of where greater expedition would have been more appropriate. However, I rather suspect that as soon as I look into the matter, I will find that there were other circumstances, of which the Member has neglected to tell the Assembly.

Mr Durkan: I remind the First Minister that the periods of suspension that affected a previous Assembly and Executive were not a result of any failure of any function at Executive level or inside OFMDFM. Those suspensions were entirely to do with issues, faults and failings elsewhere in the process, not faults in the institutions. The First Minister seems to be blaming the SDLP and the UUP for those suspensions. To nail that lie, they were no fault of ours at the time. The fault lay elsewhere.

The First Minister: I could stand at the Dispatch Box and, to justify the decisions that I make, say that all the issues delayed in the system are somebody else's fault. It is very easy to pass the buck. The Member knows that, on his watch, the system ground to a halt. He was not able to find ways forward, and that is what he is expecting us to do. Whether the problem was created in our Department or not, Mr Durkan says that we should resolve those problems. However, when he held the office of deputy First Minister, he and the then First Minister were unable to resolve problems. We have been able to resolve more problems in a shorter period, and we have not had any suspensions. One issue held back business; however, that did not stop any Ministers from doing their work in their Departments, and it did not stop for one day the Assembly from meeting.

Mr O'Dowd: It appears that Mr Durkan wants to rewrite the history books before he leaves this place and moves on to bluer pastures. He has given us a history lesson during today's debate. His former partner in government, David Trimble, insisted that the British Government brought down these institutions on numerous occasions. In the SDLP's workings with David Trimble, it failed miserably to ensure that we had a working Executive and that David Trimble lived up to his obligations under the terms of the Good Friday Agreement.

The First Minister: I will not step into the middle of this internecine battle in the nationalist community without wearing a coat of armour. I would get peppered if I did. I see that Mr Durkan wants to lobby further.

Mr Durkan: I want to correct Mr O'Dowd. Let us be clear: suspensions happened as a result of the failure of so-called agreements and breakthroughs that were negotiated by Sinn Féin, the Ulster Unionist Party and the British and Irish Governments, not the SDLP. Moreover, I remind Mr O'Dowd and the First Minister that, when suspension came in October 2002, I refused to agree to the exclusion of Sinn Féin, which Tony Blair sought. He gave us grounds, and he named names. I refused because we insist on standing by the principle of democratic inclusion according to mandate. We stood by it and never buckled. Sinn Féin has buckled and is buckling again in its attitude to the Bill.

The First Minister: As you can see, Mr Deputy Speaker, the election has started. I suspect that we will hear more about those issues as time goes on.

I want to mention some issues that Mr Basil McCrea raised. He believes that, if he smiles and speaks gently, he will come across as reasonable and give the impression that everything that he says has a real element of sincerity and importance. He said that the Bill was being presented as a fait accompli and that Members simply had to accept it. As I already said, far from its being a fait accompli, it is a proposal that came from an Assembly Committee after it had considered and taken evidence on the matter. Thereafter, the Committee brought the report to the Assembly, which voted to approve it. It is not a fait accompli presented by the deputy First Minister and me; it is a full-blown Assembly process that ensures everybody's involvement and further ensures that everybody knows the issues and has the opportunity to have a say on the matter. Can we rubbish completely the idea that it is a fait accompli?

Mr McCrea continued by saying that the matter is proceeding with undue haste. He knows how many months ago the Assembly and Executive Review Committee brought the proposal to the Assembly. That does not constitute undue haste when bringing a Bill to the Assembly. It did not come out of the blue, because it was in the process paper that we provided to the Assembly and Executive Review Committee. Moreover, we published it and made it available to everyone so that people knew the exact steps.

I want to point out to Mr McCrea that we arranged the 37 steps — it feels like 90 steps — into six groups. He must have known about that because, as an assiduous Member, I am sure that he ticked each box as we dealt with the matters and knew the outstanding issues that still had to be addressed. Therefore, the matter was not presented with undue haste, it did not take him by surprise, and it certainly was not presented as a fait accompli. The Ulster Unionist Party is hanging on to those excuses to justify opposing a principle that it has supported in the past. That party knows that it is a principle that has nothing to do with timing. Therefore, it should vote in favour of the Bill today. However, for party political purposes, it wants to go outside and tell the people that it did not approve the devolution of policing and justice.

That is what it comes down to. That is not a responsible position for any serious political party to adopt, and it requires the Ulster Unionist Party to rise above those issues. If that party agrees with the principle — the Member is smiling, and, no doubt, saying to himself that the DUP did not do that when the Ulster Unionists were the largest party —

Mr B McCrea: Absolutely. [Laughter.]

The First Minister: As the Member said, his party did the heavy lifting, but, unfortunately, he got ruptured in the process. [Laughter.] The DUP did not agree with that process. However, the Member tells us that he agrees with what we are doing, and he agrees with the devolution of policing and justice powers. Therefore, he is not in the same position as we were, and he should support the legislation, which has the clear purpose in principle, at its Second Stage, of agreeing to the devolution of policing and justice powers when, eventually, the proposition comes to the Assembly, and the time is right.

Mr B McCrea: I apologise if I have smiled too much and been too friendly in the debate, which was not in any way intended to minimise the seriousness of its content.

There has, perhaps, been a misunderstanding, and I may not have made myself clear. When I spoke about a fait accompli, it was not necessarily about the enabling legislation; it was about the whole debate on the devolution of policing and justice. The point that I wanted to make, whether in this gathering or elsewhere, is that it would not be possible for our party to be brought in at the final stages of a discussion only to be presented with a case that had been sorted out between the two larger parties, and to be asked our opinion about a proposal that had already been agreed by those parties.

I listened to the First Minister's comments about the need for consultation and involvement on the issues. For the purposes of clarity, we were not talking about a fait accompli in relation to those issues. When it comes to the use of the phrase "undue haste", I realise that matters have been talked about and that proposals have been discussed in various Committees. However, I said earlier that I thought that there is a window of opportunity, in certain circumstances, to deal with this matter sooner rather than later. If such a thing were to be contemplated, however, I believe — my party colleagues agree with me — that this legislation is being pursued with undue haste. It may be that there are other reasons of which we are unaware, but we are prepared to engage on those matters.

I have tried to articulate a general point. People level accusations about political opportunism: let us be honest, that has been done before in the House but not by me, I hasten to add. Despite that, I want the First Minister to consider, and reflect on, the critical issue of trust so that we can determine how to move forward. The reason why we object to the Bill at this time is because we do not trust that we will have another opportunity to influence this discussion. I am quite happy for the First Minister to disabuse us of that idea; the way forward is to have proper dialogue.

We are interested in hearing what the First Minister has to say. We are fully committed to devolution and to this place. We have done the heavy lifting, and, as my colleague Danny Kennedy said, we are not the wreckers. We are the people who made this place happen, and we will continue to work for the betterment of all the people of Northern Ireland.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I remind Members that, in general, interventions should be short, but, particularly at this time of the night, they should be even shorter.

The First Minister: I do not think that I have ever given way to a longer intervention, Mr Deputy Speaker. That shows my willingness and preparedness to hear what the Member has to say and to take his concerns on board.

The Member for Lagan Valley cannot blame us if the Prime Minister wants to meet the deputy First Minister and me but does not ask him to come along. However, I have no doubt that the Assembly and Executive Review Committee will want to talk to the deputy First Minister and me about the financial issues. I would be very surprised if the Government do not want to talk to other parties as well about those issues. However, I am sure that the Government want to make progress by talking to the deputy First Minister and me before they talk to other parties, because we have a particular legal responsibility in relation to policing and justice.

9.15 pm

I do not want to proceed with policing and justice and agree to the finances without having openness, as far as the Committee and the Assembly are concerned, about what the propositions are. In my view, if we are to have the kind of confidence that we want, it is essential that people are content that we have the funds necessary to do the job.

I will be honest with Members: nobody expects that all the items on the long list that we received from the Assembly and Executive Review Committee will be delivered or that the figures that the Committee has produced will be replicated. In some cases, the figures have turned out to be greater than the Assembly and Executive Review Committee expected but in many cases they are less.

As a former Finance Minister, I do not believe that I ever went into any monitoring round or, indeed, the Budget, without being in receipt of bids that were two or three times greater than the amount of money that was available. When we ask the agencies and divisions of the Departments where the pressures are, it is inevitable that any civil servant will think that it is their chance to get their pet issue dealt with and will throw that into the mix. Work must be done by the Assembly and Executive Review Committee, the Treasury and the deputy First Minister and me to ascertain the strength of every bid that is submitted. We have been doing that, and it is a process with which we are presently engaged.

As we get to the stage where we have something to report, I am happy to talk to the Ulster Unionist Party, the SDLP and the Alliance Party, as I am sure that the deputy First Minister is.

Mr Kennedy: Will the First Minister give way?

The First Minister: I will give way in a minute.

I want to make it clear to Mr Kennedy that he has no more information about what went on last night than any of my party colleagues have. The meeting only took place last night, and Department of Finance and Personnel officials are still examining the figures. Therefore, it would be wrong of us to indicate what we have been able to achieve unless we are absolutely certain that we are dealing with real figures and that the issues stand up.

I am happy to be as open as possible in these matters to ensure that when a decision has to be taken, people do so with the full knowledge of our financial preparedness to deal with the matter.

Mr Kennedy: I thank the First Minister for again giving way. He has clearly indicated that he expects that he and the deputy First Minister will attend the Assembly and Executive Review Committee, which is charged with examining some of those issues. Equally, as the Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister, I seek his commitment that he and the deputy First Minister will make themselves available to appear before the Committee at the relevant stage of the Bill.

The First Minister: I was not touting for an invitation to the Assembly and Executive Review Committee, but we have always been happy to go along if it wants to speak to us. It is always a pleasure to appear before the Member for Newry and Armagh's Committee and we can certainly do that, not only to discuss the issue of financing for policing and justice but to discuss the wider issue.

I am always happy to open up a debate on these issues. The debate will allow for some misconceptions among the public to be removed. There are people who are deliberately attempting to mislead the public. One person in particular, who is no longer an elected representative, has said that Sinn Féin would be in control of the police, the courts and the appointment of judges and that policing was going to be a North/South issue. The list went on; lie after lie was peddled. The more discussion that there is on the issues, the happier I am because I believe that we have adopted a perfectly defensible position.

Finally, the Member for Lagan Valley Basil McCrea remarked that the deputy First Minister indicated that this was all going to be settled on Wednesday. The Member may have a different interpretation of what the deputy First Minister was talking about, but, in my view, the deputy First Minister was saying that he hoped that the financial issues will be resolved on Wednesday. I do not think that he was referring to the wider issues of confidence, which are part of the process paper.

I would love to think that the financial issues will be resolved on Wednesday, but my advisers and the deputy First Minister's have been working on the figures with financial officials for most of the day. I expect that there is still more work to be done. If the Prime Minister makes us a very generous offer, which we think settles the financial issues, we will be happy to come back and tell colleagues about that and we will hope to gain their support.

Mr Kennedy: Is that a shared understanding of the current position? Perhaps, the deputy First Minister will indicate whether that is the case via the First Minister.

The First Minister: I am not even sure whether the deputy First Minister heard the remarks that we were discussing. However, I am sure that he will read the Hansard report and have a word in the Member's ear. The interview outside 10 Downing Street was conducted on the basis of the financial negotiations of which we had been a part, and which the deputy First Minister indicated will be carried forward in the US on Wednesday. I do not think that there was any doubt that he was talking about a resolution of the financial issues.

The Member for West Belfast Mr Attwood has left the Chamber, but I must say that I found the first 10 or 12 minutes of his speech particularly rich. He felt that it was appropriate to lecture the DUP about its apparent opposition to the devolution of policing and justice. With a straight face, he stood there and named one DUP Member after another and said that they were apparently against the devolution of policing and justice. He said that that was dreadful, given all the good things that would happen if policing and justice powers were devolved.

However, the people at which Mr Attwood was pointing the finger will go through the Lobbies and vote in favour of the Bill. He is pointing the finger, yet he will be voting against a Bill that provides enabling powers for the devolution of policing and justice. I was about to use unparliamentary terms about hypocrisy that you would not allow, Mr Deputy Speaker, so I will not use them, but it seems out of sorts for someone who is going to vote against the Bill to chide those who will be voting in favour of it about their commitment to the devolution of policing and justice.

I thank Members for their contributions to the debate, and I understand why so many of them wanted to take part. We have had a very considerable debate, and, as we approach 9.25 pm, it is almost like being at Westminster. The length of the debate indicates the sensitivity and importance of the issue to Assembly Members and to the wider community. I thank Members for the questions and points that they have raised.

The devolution of policing and justice will bring significant additional responsibilities but, more importantly, it will carry enormous potential for all of us here and for all our people. It will bring real local accountability and real local leadership and provide genuine synergies between policing and justice policies and the wider social and economic initiatives of the Executive and the Assembly.

We are determined to work faithfully through the steps that remain to be taken, which we identified last November, and to secure the community confidence that is necessary for the devolution of the policing and justice functions. It is vital, therefore, that we get the preparations right. The Bill will put us in a position to respond decisively once the Assembly resolves that the time is right to initiate the transfer process. With my speech having almost reached the two-hour mark, I commend the Bill to the Assembly.

Both parties that indicated that they will oppose the Bill accept and support its principles. Therefore, I hope that they change their minds, act according to the principles that they say are consistent with their positions and go through the Lobby in support of the Bill.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE BUSINESS

Rates (Amendment) Bill

Accelerated Passage

The Minister of Finance and Personnel (Mr S Wilson): I beg to move

That the Rates (Amendment) Bill proceed under the accelerated passage procedure

The First Minister set me a challenge to beat his record — I think that he spoke for one hour and 45 minutes. I will do my best to rise to that challenge. I hope that Members will understand why my speech will take so long.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister has the Floor. Members should leave the Chamber in an orderly fashion.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: I am grateful for the opportunity to address the Assembly on this motion. I will be as brief as possible. I am obliged to bring this Bill to the Assembly and seek accelerated passage. I repeat that that is not the best way to deal with legislation. It is not the way in which I, as Minister, prefer to deal with legislation. Having been the Chairman of a Committee and a Back-Bencher, I know the value of line-by-line scrutiny of legislation. When I bring legislation to this House, I endeavour to ensure that it is dealt with in the normal way. However, as I explained to the Committee for Finance and Personnel a couple of weeks ago, this is a piece of legislation for which there has been widespread support.

The provisions in the Bill were put forward by a number of groups as the kind of responses that they wanted to see from the Executive during the economic recession. If the provisions, particularly those relating to business rates allowances, are to be in place for the next financial year, and in time for the issue of the rates bill, it will be necessary for the Bill to proceed by accelerated passage. That will enable us to meet the deadline of passing the Bill by November, which will allow the necessary changes to take place in Land and Property Services (LPS) in time for the collection of rates in the new financial year.

For those reasons, I seek the Assembly's permission for the Bill's accelerated passage. I am pleased that after a long session with the Finance Committee two weeks ago, during which I explained the reasons for my request, there was unanimous agreement that the Bill should proceed in that manner. I now seek the Assembly's permission for that.

I know that the hour is late. I do not want to go through the measures contained in the Bill now; I will do so in detail during its Second Stage. The Bill contains measures that are important to businesses and domestic households at a time when they are under financial pressure. To get those measures on the statute book so that all of the necessary administrative changes can be made, it is essential that the Bill is dealt with using accelerated passage.

Although there will not be the opportunity for line-by-line scrutiny by the Committee, I have made provisions and commitments that I believe will, at least, help to alleviate some of the shortcomings of accelerated passage. First, officials have been made available to give the Committee detailed briefings on the detail of the Bill, which has started. That will allow the Committee to ask detailed questions. I have also said that proposed amendments that improve the Bill will be considered, provided that they do not change policy, which would require consultation.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr McClarty] in the Chair)

Some Members have asked whether the introduction of the Bill could be delayed because of the lateness of the hour. We have sought to time the Bill's passage through the Assembly to provide good time from Second Stage to Consideration Stage and Further Consideration Stage to allow any points raised to be properly considered.

In closing, I ask for the Assembly's permission for the Bill to proceed by accelerated passage. I have made it clear that I will not seek to introduce legislation in that way as a matter of course. Indeed, I will do all that I can in the future to ensure that legislation clears the Executive in time for proper scrutiny by the Committee. Therefore, I look forward to the Assembly showing the same all-party support for accelerated passage that was demonstrated in the Committee.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel (Ms J McCann): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. As the Minister said, he attended the Committee for Finance and Personnel meeting on 9 September. At that meeting, the Minister explained the reasons for the Rates (Amendment) Bill to proceed under the accelerated passage process. He outlined what the consequences would be if accelerated passage were not granted. The Minister also assured the Committee that he will do everything in his power to minimise the future use of the accelerated passage procedure. The Committee welcomed that assurance, and it was content with the Minister's explanation.

9.45 pm

For some time, the Committee has been engaged in scrutinising the rating policy. In November 2007, it produced a comprehensive response to the '2007 Executive Review of Rating Reform'. Since then, the Committee has continued to scrutinise closely domestic and non-domestic rating systems.

During the policy-development stages, the Committee received regular briefings from departmental officials, including briefings on the outcome of consultations that were undertaken by the Department on various policy aspects of the Bill. Previously, the Committee agreed to prioritise the Bill's Committee Stage in its work programme. Regrettably, however, the Bill was not introduced in the spring as anticipated, and Committee members expressed concerns about the delay in the process for bringing the Bill to the Assembly.

When considering the proposal for accelerated passage, the Committee was mindful that Committee Stage is a key element of the legislative process and that scrutiny of a Bill is a key Committee function. The Committee is aware that accelerated passage means that that in-depth scrutiny and consultation with stakeholders will be bypassed. On the other hand, the Committee is conscious of the need for many of the provisions in the Bill to be in place by April 2010 to ensure that much-needed help can be delivered to businesses and households in the current economic climate.

In addition to the Minister's explanation to the Committee, members were assured by Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP) officials that, although the Department did not publicly consult on the draft Bill, the high-level policy changes that are reflected in the Bill have been consulted on. Members also received a detailed written briefing on the delegated powers in the Bill, and they were assured that the Committee will have an opportunity to scrutinise the detailed subordinate legislation that will follow in coming months.

On behalf of the Committee, I support the motion that the Rates (Amendment) Bill be granted accelerated passage. I would add that that was not the Committee's preferred option. Obviously, we would have preferred a detailed scrutiny process, but, given the time constraints, we feel that accelerated passage is the only way forward. Go raibh maith agat.

Mr Weir: I had intended to speak for only a couple of minutes about what is essentially a procedural motion. However, having indicated that intention when I approached the Bench, I was advised to take my time, so perhaps I should consider taking up the gauntlet that the First Minister threw down by giving the longest speech since 1998. In the past few years, other speeches in the House may have seemed longer, but his speech tonight was the longest. However, mindful of the fact that I hope to get home alive, I will curtail my remarks.

Committee members share a degree of frustration and disappointment that accelerated passage has had to be used, and that has been mentioned. Indeed, the causes for the delay are a discussion for another day.

Nevertheless, the Committee had a mature and frank conversation with the Minister and displayed a mature and unified approach to the proposal.

We will discuss the merits of the Bill during its Second Stage, which will follow in a few minutes. Without going into details at this stage, I will mention the strong consensus in the Committee that aspects of the Bill are worthy of being pushed forward. In addition, we want to ensure that the measures in the Bill are processed in time, so that constituents in a range of guises and from across the board, in domestic and non-domestic sectors, will benefit in the next financial year. Consequently, the granting of accelerated passage is necessary, and the Committee unanimously agreed that position. I look forward to the debate, and I support the proposal to grant accelerated passage.

Mr McNarry: The Ulster Unionists also welcome the introduction of this legislation, even though we are disappointed that accelerated passage has been employed. The Chairperson of the Committee has detailed the extent of the views expressed by the Committee's members on that issue, and she has dealt with it particularly well. I accept the Minister's wish, as he has asked for accelerated passage today. He is clearly not dealing with figures; therefore, he is being very convincing. I have accepted his approach, and I hope that we can move as quickly as possible to the next stage this evening.

Mr O'Loan: It is entirely improper and out of order that this Bill is coming before us with a request for accelerated passage. I will quote the Minister when he came before the Committee. He said that:

"Standing Order 42(3) requires me"

— note that he said "requires me" —

"to explain the reasons for seeking accelerated passage, the consequences of it not being granted and the steps that are being taken to minimise the future use of accelerated passage."

In words similar to those he used this evening, he continued that:

"Having been a Committee Chairperson, it is my opinion that the best way of dealing with legislation is to have a full Committee procedure in which it can be scrutinised. It is the best way of bringing forward legislation and making sure that it contains no mistakes, that all of the issues are properly dealt with, that it can be properly amended and that there is intensive scrutiny of it."

He went on to say that:

"good legislation requires proper scrutiny; therefore, accelerate passage should be used only in the most extreme circumstances. I believe that this is an extreme circumstance."

Naturally, we waited with bated breath to be told exactly what the reasons and the extreme circumstances were. He went on to tell us that:

"The draft Bill went to the Executive in March, and I know from my predecessor that the details of the draft Bill were discussed with all of the parties. When I took over as Minister of Finance and Personnel, the draft Bill had not been approved. I approached the parties and it received approval and clearance at that stage. I am not aware of what the specific difficulties were that meant that it was not given quick approval by all the parties. All that I can say is that when I made those approaches and explained the situation, it was approved."

He also said:

"I am sorry that I cannot be more specific. Members may want to know whether there were specific parts of the draft Bill with which Executive members had issues; I do not know whether that was the case. All I know is that the Bill is unchanged from how it was presented in March."

We did indeed want to know whether there were specific parts of the draft Bill with which Executive members had issues. We were not given reasons beyond one of process. Evidently, this Bill went before the Executive in March; it was not approved until June. Some three months were lost; time that should have been used for the Committee Stage of the legislation. We were not told any reasons.

I am given to understand — correct me if I am wrong — that the Bill was held up by one party in the Executive. Our First Minister gave us a very complimentary report on the excellent relationships in the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister (OFMDFM) between his party and the other party that occupies OFMDFM, but I am told that it was that party that held up this piece of legislation. I do not know why it did that, because evidently nothing was changed. Perhaps it was a hostage that was taken, and, unlike some in the past, this hostage was given away without anything being achieved. We have known that to happen on a number of occasions, and it appears to be yet another of those. We cannot say that this Bill has been handled properly, and accelerated passage should not be required or sought.

I need to comment on the Bill itself to explain my ultimate position. I will comment on individual clauses, but, by and large, the Bill is sound. It is important that many of these measures are brought into operation in April 2010. In order to meet that timetable, it is necessary that the Bill now have accelerated passage. Therefore, I am not going to hold that up, but it is quite irregular and improper that we have reached that position, and there is culpability on the part of those who held it up. I will not oppose the motion, but this is not a good example of leadership parties behaving well.

Dr Farry: I should say at the outset that I will not detain the House too long at this late hour either. Similar to other Members, I am prepared to support accelerated passage, albeit with great reluctance. The Committee's conclusion on accelerated passage was reached unanimously, even though members shared the same degree of frustration. I share Declan O'Loan's analysis of what may have happened, but when the Minister came to the Committee, he was fairly clear about the reasons for requesting accelerated passage, although he did not spell them out in graphic terms. I think that all the Committee members were able to read between the lines of what he said. I respect the fact that the Minister came to the Committee to make a personal appeal for accelerated passage. Such a task is normally left to officials, so the Minister's attendance was recognition of the significance of our situation.

It goes without saying that the situation is not satisfactory. The Executive do the Assembly a disservice when they take their time over the consideration of a piece of business and then, subsequently, the Assembly and the Committee are asked to sacrifice the normal scrutiny opportunity to enable something such as this Bill to pass because of deadlines that have to be met.

We are faced with a dilemma. On the one hand, we are entitled to demand our rights and to have proper scrutiny. On the other hand, however, we must appreciate that tight commencement dates are planned for some aspects of the legislation. Do we compromise those tight commencement dates so that we have scrutiny in the Assembly or do we ask ourselves how much added value there will be from that process?

A pattern is developing whereby important legislation in particular progresses slowly through the Executive and is rushed through the Assembly. We should be conscious of that. I think that every aspect of the Rates (Amendment) Bill has been subject to consultation at some stage or another. Even the Bill's explanatory notes set out when those consultations occurred. Some of them occurred some time ago. The process has been lengthy, and it is a shame that the final Stages of the legislative process have to be rushed.

Although I am not endorsing every aspect of the Bill, I recognise its importance. I am frustrated that accelerated passage is being used, but I do not think that it is for me and for my party to hamper the Assembly's opportunity to do some good for people, particularly in these difficult economic times.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: I will be as brief as possible, because we want to get on to the main content of the Bill. I thank the Members who have taken part in the debate and for the endorsement of my request for accelerated passage. All the Members who spoke have expressed the view that I expressed to them, which is that I would have preferred to have seen the Bill dealt with differently. However, and despite what Mr O'Loan said, I believe that these are extreme circumstances. The Executive indicated to the business sector and to ratepayers that they would seek to bring forward a package that would help to deal with the current economic situation.

The Bill is a response to the necessary measures and to requests that were made. I believe that the Bill will provide necessary help, as we will see when we come to debate its Second Stage. The extreme circumstances are pertinent, because if we do not use accelerated passage, we will not be able to deliver the package for the next financial year. Therefore, we have a situation where it is necessary to move in this way.

Many of the measures have been well canvassed across the community already. They received a positive response both in the consultation exercise and from the Committee. Therefore, I do not believe that the detail of the Bill will be controversial in any way.

For that reason, and bearing in mind that there will be an opportunity for Members to raise the points that they want to raise during the Second Stage and the Consideration Stage of the Bill, I ask that the Bill proceed through accelerated passage, although I accept that it is not the best mechanism.

10.00 pm

In conclusion, I thank Members for their support, and I move that that the Rates (Amendment) Bill should proceed through accelerated passage.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Before we proceed to the Question, I remind Members that this motion requires cross-community support.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved (with cross-community support):

That the Rates (Amendment) Bill [NIA 2/09] proceed under the accelerated passage procedure, in accordance with Standing Order 40(4).

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE BUSINESS

Rates (Amendment) Bill

Second Stage

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: I beg to move

That the Second Stage of the Rates (Amendment) Bill [NIA 2/09] be agreed.

I want to say, by way of introduction, that there has been some criticism of the responses by the Assembly and the Executive to the current economic situation. Without rehearsing all the arguments and reviewing all the things that have been done, the Assembly and the Executive have already sought, whether at the level of businesses or domestic households, to address the very real concerns that people have. That has been achieved through various methods such as the freezing of the regional rate, which affects businesses and households; the capping of the rates to the manufacturing industry at 30%; the introduction of heating allowances; the farm nutrient scheme; and the £1.7 billion — an increase of about £1 million per day — that the Executive have spent this year, which has helped the construction industry. All of those things have been done, in spite of what all the whingers and the economists who are now crawling out of the woodwork are saying about the Executive not doing enough. This Bill is a further step in delivering for people in Northern Ireland in these difficult circumstances.

As Members will see as we go through the detail of the Bill, the following measures are contained in it: a reduction in rates for small businesses; a possibility for the elderly to defer their rates payments; a postponement of rates on vacant properties; a postponement of the revaluation of business properties; and the introduction of data-sharing functions to help people to claim for entitlements and allowances, which will help them to deal with their rates bills. All of those features represent a very positive reaction to the issues that have been brought to the Executive's attention and are further examples of how the so-called "dysfunctional" Executive have actually delivered for people in Northern Ireland.

I welcome the opportunity to open the debate on the Bill, which includes the range of measures that I have outlined. The rating system provides the Assembly with the means of raising additional revenue, over and above what it receives through the Barnett formula, and that extra revenue is used to fund essential services. However, through the provision of reliefs, it can also be used to fulfil wider policy objectives, and there are measures in the Bill that have been afforded even more importance as a result of the current economic downturn. Those concessions do not impose a greater burden on other ratepayers.

Many will say that the measures in the Bill do not go far enough. However, within the limits of what is affordable and within the terms of the Executive's public expenditure position, they represent real measures that will deal with some of the difficulties that people have drawn to the attention of the Executive.

There are limits to what is deliverable by Land and Property Services. It is a key public service agency and its performance has not been helped by the scale of recent reforms and the constant changes to the structure of rates in Northern Ireland.

The Bill represents the final outworking of the Executive's review of the domestic rating system and gives effect to a number of matters concerning business rates. The Executive agreed the reforms, which the Committee for Finance and Personnel endorsed. They aim to strike the right balance between protecting those most affected by the reforms introduced under direct rule and helping those most in need — for example, our pensioners — as well as attending to the wider policy objectives and concerns.

As a result of the Executive review, we have delivered a 20% rates discount for pensioners over 70 years of age and living alone, and that is worth around £3.4 million to date. There is a continuing emphasis on helping our most vulnerable, with the savings threshold for pensioners under the low income rate relief scheme's being increased from £16,000 to £50,000 last April. In April this year, there was a further review outcome that saw a reduction in the maximum capital value for domestic properties from £500,000 to £400,000, which reduced the highest domestic rate bills by £450.

Other measures that have been introduced since the return of devolution have also made a material change to the bills that local households have incurred, including the regional rate freeze and the further postponement of water charges. The current freeze in the non-domestic regional rate also provides vital support for businesses at this difficult time, while the reduced cap acts to curb the excess that would occur through unadulterated rates bills based on the full capital value of the property. Together, those measures have resulted in considerably lower rate bills for many, providing assistance of between £15 million and £20 million this year.

The measures contained in the Bill give effect to the remaining Executive reforms, and provide targeted help and assistance to a wide range of businesses and households. They include a number of new schemes, as well as amending powers that are already in place. Among those will be the small-business rates relief scheme, which provides help of between £8 million and £9 million for more than 16,000 small businesses; energy efficiency and zero- and low-carbon rate reliefs, which will target assistance of around £1.5 million a year; and new data-sharing powers, which are aimed at ensuring that more people get the help to which they are entitled and that they do not continue to miss out. That is of particular importance to our pensioners. There will also be the powers necessary to introduce a rates deferment scheme for home-owning pensioners and their partners.

The Bill will also ensure that last year's reduction in the maximum capital value will not create a difficulty for those councils with a high proportion of high-value properties by allowing transitional arrangements to be put in place before the final settlement, and that will be worth around £1.5 million to councils over this rating year and the next.

Before turning to the commercial sector, it is important that Members be made aware that I believe that the rating of empty homes should not be introduced in April 2010, and that was highlighted during the debate on the Bill's accelerated passage earlier. I have listened carefully to the views expressed by the Committee for Finance and Personnel and, although I am awaiting its final confirmation, I know that all the early indications from the discussions that I have had with officials suggest that there is a sympathetic view to postponing rating of empty homes until April 2011. By that time, I expect the property market to have stabilised and the conditions for introducing that measure to be much healthier.

It is important to stress that the Bill's provisions do not create any new substantive powers for the rating of empty homes; rather, they amend the existing legislative powers. More importantly, the Bill does not commit the Assembly to the April 2010 implementation.

On the non-domestic front, the Bill provides for the introduction of the small-business rates relief scheme, which was, and is, a key feature of the Executive's package that was announced in December 2008 in response to the economic downturn, as well as for technical changes relating to industrial derating and the non-domestic revaluation. The revaluation of non-domestic property was scheduled to take place in April 2010. However, I have decided that now is not the time to revalue the non-domestic sector, given the uncertainties that businesses already face, as does local government, which would, of course, also be affected by that revaluation. I have decided to postpone that exercise until April 2011. That decision had to be made quickly, given the late stage that we are at in the process, but it is my view that it is an unavoidable course of action in order to look after the interests of councils and many businesses. There are no significant revenue implications because the purpose of the revaluation was merely to redistribute the rating burden.

I now turn to the detail of the legislation. The Bill contains a range of provisions that have the effect of both amending and supplementing the current primary rating legislation. Clause 1 will enable a small-business rates relief scheme to be introduced. It is intended that that scheme will cover commercial properties that fall within certain net annual values. The percentage reduction, the years to which it applies, and the net annual value limits will not be set out in the Bill, but will instead be given effect through subordinate legislation. Provision is also made in clause 1 to allow the future extension of the scheme, with enhanced relief for specific sectors on the grounds of wider social need, subject to state-aid conditions. It is intended to limit the scheme for five years.

Clause 2 of the Bill also provides the power to enable the Department to make regulations introducing a scheme to give full rate relief to the first occupiers of new zero-carbon and low-carbon homes for up to five years and two years respectively. Although the life of the schemes will be limited to 31 March 2016 in respect of new zero-carbon homes, and 31 March 2013 in respect of new low-carbon homes, those dates can be amended. The remaining aspects of the clause allow regulations to define certain key terms, provide for how the relief will be claimed, and the circumstances in which it can be withdrawn. They also deal with eligibility, appeals, exclusions and retrospectivity.

Clause 3 will enable my Department to make recommendations providing a one-off reduction in rates for owner-occupiers who make certain energy efficiency improvements to their homes, such as the installation of loft or cavity wall insulation. The life of that scheme is limited to 31 March 2015; however that date can be altered to allow for a second phase, should it be decided, following a review in a year or two, to either broaden the scheme or include other measures, such as solar panels. The powers provided by the legislation also mean that it will be possible to extend the scheme to other sectors in the future through subordinate legislation, including the social rented sector, should circumstances change and that be required. I know that that was a matter of particular concern to some members of the Committee for Finance and Personnel.

The issue of industrial derating is dealt with at clause 4, which removes the reference to 1 April 2011 as the specified date for its ending. It also allows the percentage liability for industrial hereditaments to be set by the Assembly from 1 April 2011 by means of affirmative resolution.

Clause 5 makes provision for a rates deferment scheme, amending and substituting current legislative powers. The provision will allow my Department to make regulations to enter into a deferment agreement with an owner-occupier of pensionable age, that is, aged 60 and above, as well as the surviving partner of such a person. All must own and occupy the property on which the rates will be deferred. Owing to the risk of debt recovery, deferment will not be permitted where all owners are not eligible, or the property is rented. The deferred debt will take the form of a statutory charge on the property, with regulations setting out the terms of the deferment agreement, provisions for the recovering of the debt and the payment of interest, and termination. Interest will be charged at the Bank of England base rate, -1%, subject to a minimum 1% threshold. On trend data, that would broadly equate with the rate of inflation. Paragraphs (5) to (11) of proposed article 29A deal with the retrospective deferments to the start of the rating year, and subsequent legislative modifications for the purposes of the deferment scheme and the definition of a partner.

10.15 pm

Clause 6 makes provision for the scope of rating of unoccupied properties to be extended to the domestic sector through primary rather than subordinate legislation, with separate provision for any reduction in the level of liability in the domestic and non-domestic sector. Although the rating of empty property will not be introduced next year, when it is in place, the rates will be levied at 100%.

Clauses 7 and 14 also deal with the rating of empty homes, enabling the Department to deal with anti-avoidance measures through amending valuation assumptions and extending the current completion notice process to domestic properties when the rating of empty homes is introduced.

Clause 8 deals with the provisions of the principal Order, which relate to the former public utilities. Those will no longer be valued by methods set out in subordinate legislation but will be assessed in the same way as any other property. Subsections (1) and (2) deal with the reference date on which the valuations are based for a new valuation list. The current provision does not apply to former public utilities; the clause provides for the reference date to apply to them. Subsection (3) sets out the parts of the principal Order that will cease to have effect as a result of moving the utilities from prescribed to conventional assessments.

Clauses 9, 10 and 11 provide for improved data-sharing powers, allowing relevant Government agencies to share social security information for the purpose of better targeting of, likely recipients of, and verifying claims relating to, rate relief, the disabled person's allowance and the lone pensioner allowance. The provisions will also assist with assessing housing benefit claims for owner-occupiers and will form part of a wider package of measures that are aimed at improving the take-up of reliefs and ensuring that people receive the help to which they are entitled.

We are all, of course, conscious of the very valid concerns that people have about security and about the appropriate use of their personal details. For that reason, the Bill creates a new offence of unauthorised disclosure of shared information. That will be accompanied by a number of administrative actions relating to data security, audit trails and independent scrutiny.

The remaining clauses of the Bill deal with a range of miscellaneous provisions. As part of the council package of assistance, the impact of the cost of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive landlord allowance in councils was reduced for this and the last rating year. Clause 12 provides the power to change the level of allowance that is awarded to landlords when they enter into agreement to pay rates on their property. It also enables the level of allowance to be separately altered for certain classes of property. The level of allowance for Northern Ireland Housing Executive properties is being reviewed, and any change will apply from next year.

I also intend to reduce the general level of allowance for the private-rented sector on the introduction of the rating of empty homes, given that the allowance reflects the fact that vacancies are paid for that otherwise would not be. Any changes will, of course, be subject to affirmative resolution in the Assembly and could save in the region of between £2 million and £2.5 million.

I now move on to the more technical issues. Clause 13 provides that regulations made to amend the list of registered housing associations whose properties are subject to standardised rating liability will be subject to negative, rather than affirmative resolution of the Assembly. That simply involves an administrative change.

Clause 15 is a provision that I know that various members of the Committee for Finance and Personnel were keen to see introduced. It will enable compensating payments to be made to district councils that are affected by the reduction in the maximum capital value from £500,000 to £400,000. That will apply at 100% and 50% of the difference in the product of the rate respectively for the current year and the next rating year.

Finally, clauses 16 to 20 and the two schedules deal with minor and consequential amendments, repeals and the commencement of the Bill's provisions. Although the Bill is, necessarily, not being progressed in the normal manner, which all Members would prefer, I ask them to support its passage through the House so that assistance can be provided to households and ratepayers as soon as possible. The Bill's measures will ensure that direct financial assistance of some £10 million is provided to households and small businesses. Those steps will be greatly welcomed by households and businesses that are currently struggling.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I am grateful to the Minister for being so succinct.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel (Ms J McCann): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I intend to speak initially as the Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel and then to make a few comments from my party's position. I thank the Minister for explaining the Bill's general principles. I welcome the debate.

For some time, the Committee for Finance and Personnel has engaged closely with the Department on rating policy and the development of the Bill. As we heard, one of the Bill's main purposes is to give effect to a number of decisions that have arisen from the Executive's review of the domestic rating system in 2007.

As Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel, I am pleased to note that many of the recommendations in the report on the Committee's response to that Executive review have been taken into account in the Bill's development. I will deal with those recommendations later.

The Bill makes provision for a number of measures that relate to the non-domestic rating system, most notably a rate-relief scheme for small businesses. On 9 April 2008, the Committee received a briefing from departmental officials and representatives from the Economic Research Institute (ERINI) on the review of rate relief for small businesses. Although the Committee recognised that there are associated cost implications, it subsequently called on the Minister not to rule out such a scheme, given the importance of the small-business sector to the local economy.

Included in the Committee's suggestions was a proposal that consideration be given to a model that is similar to that of Wales, which includes enhanced relief for post offices. The policy intentions behind the enabling power that is included in clause 1 in respect of reliefs for small businesses are broadly in line with the Committee's recommendations.

In the non-domestic sector, the Committee has noted the provisions in clause 4, which relate to industrial derating. In 2007, the Committee examined the findings of the ERINI review of that policy. Members noted that scope exists to review the percentage liability in the future. In that regard, clause 4 will allow the percentage liability to be set from 1 April 2011 by means of affirmative resolution.

I want to turn to domestic rates. As I have already mentioned, in 2007, the Committee produced a comprehensive response to the Executive's review of the domestic rating system, which included 33 recommendations. Since then, the Committee has received a number of oral and written briefings from departmental officials, including briefing sessions on the outcome of several consultations that were undertaken by the Department of Finance and Personnel on the detail of a range of rating policy issues.

In its 2007 report, the Committee made recommendations about rate reliefs for pensioners, which included the introduction of a lone pensioner discount. It was introduced in April 2008 for ratepayers who are over 70 years of age and who live alone, together with an increase in the savings threshold for pensioners. A further Committee recommendation — the deferred payment scheme for pensioners — is provided for in the delegated power in clause 5.

In its report, the Committee also noted that there is a widespread problem with the uptake of rate reliefs. It recommended data sharing with other agencies as one way to address that issue. The Committee is pleased to note that the Bill includes provision to allow data sharing between relevant Government agencies to better target potential recipients of rate reliefs. During an evidence session on 9 September 2009, the Committee also received assurance from departmental officials that the associated data sets will be able to be used only for the purposes specified.

In 2007, the Committee also called on the Department to consider the option of rate credits for environmental measures, such as energy efficiency improvements in the home. Clause 3 makes enabling provisions for one-off reductions for measures that are taken to make homes more energy efficient. Furthermore, clause 2 will enable first-time occupiers of new zero- or low-carbon homes to benefit from rates relief for up to five years and two years respectively.

In 2007, the Committee recommended that the rating of empty properties be introduced to help address the shortage in housing supply and raise revenue at the same time. In that regard, on 9 September, Committee members considered the provisions in clause 6 and discussed the changed circumstances, including the Minister's indication that he was considering the timing of that measure with a view to postponing its introduction, given the current economic climate.

On 16 September, the Committee considered seeking a formal request from the Department of Finance and Personnel for its view on the issue and agreed to seek further information from the Department, particularly with regard to the cost implications of deferment. The Committee will consider the Department's response on the issue at its meeting tomorrow.

It has been noted that the Bill contains a range of enabling or delegated powers, under which subordinate legislation will be brought forward to introduce a number of rates relief and schemes. That subordinate legislation will provide the all-important detail of the various measures that have been outlined today. The Committee looks forward to scrutinising the forthcoming statutory rules and expects the Department to provide sufficient time for it to do so. I support the principles of the Bill.

I now wish to make some comments as a member of Sinn Féin. My party supports a number of aspects of the Bill, particularly the small-business rates-relief scheme, as that will help small businesses that are experiencing economic difficulties.

I fully understand that the economic crisis is the reason behind the proposal to defer the rating of empty properties until next year. However, Government must make it their priority to immediately house the thousands of homeless people here. If developers hold onto properties until prices go up, properties will remain vacant. People need quality, affordable homes now. I am concerned that the deferment of the rating empty properties will allow developers to hold onto those assets and that, as a result, people will remain homeless.

Several Committee members raised the issue of enabling powers for the future consideration of people who live in the social-rented sector and who choose to install energy efficiency measures. We felt that people in that sector were being discriminated against because they were not being given help to install energy efficiency measures to help reduce the cost of their fuel bills. I am glad that those enabling powers are now included.

I believe that rates relief for students normally benefit the landlord. Therefore, I welcome the fact that the Minister indicated that any savings from that scheme will be given to the Department for Employment and Learning to help students.

The Bill is good and contains a lot of provisions. I am just concerned about the proposal to defer the rating of vacant domestic properties.

Mr Weir: I declare an interest as a member of North Down Borough Council. Like others, I welcome the Bill. As the Minister indicated, it is important to realise that this is not simply a one-off piece of legislation; rather, it is part of a continuum of work that the Executive are doing to address rating issues and to try to ease the financial burden in these difficult times. Indeed, the Bill should sit alongside measures such as the Executive's decision to freeze the domestic and non-domestic regional rates.

The Bill sits comfortably with the decision to cap rates, which will ensure that no one in Northern Ireland pays more than anyone else in the United Kingdom. It sits alongside the action on industrial rating, which freezes manufacturing rates at 30% and prevents the increase that was intended under direct rule. The Bill also sits very comfortably with the 20% rates discount for pensioners over 70 who live alone. Therefore, the Bill is one piece of a large jigsaw in the help that it gives to both businesses and individuals in the rates process to ensure that an undue burden is not placed on them, particularly in these difficult times.

10.30 pm

As the Minister and the Committee Chairperson said, there is much to be welcomed in the proposals. I will address a number of those issues briefly. As has been indicated, some provisions are designed to increase energy efficiency and to target low-carbon and zero-carbon homes, particularly through one-off actions. In many ways, the embracing of that measure explodes the caricature of the Minister as an environmental sceptic. The legislation shows him to be a green champion — the “green giant” of the Assembly. While others talk about taking action to improve the environment, Minister Wilson actually delivers. Aspects of the Bill show that he is at the cutting edge of environmentalism. In addition to being environmentally friendly, the provisions that promote energy efficiency will benefit people in the long run, and in these times of difficult financial circumstances, they will ensure that energy bills are kept to a minimum. We should welcome that.

A number of the other measures are also welcome. The somewhat technical way in which clause 4 deals with industrial rates will ensure that we will have a lot more flexibility in the future in our ability to hold back potential increases in industrial rates. In a European context, there are particular reasons why we are not in a position to cut those rates. However, the opportunity to be flexible in holding back increases will be an important device in ensuring that manufacturing rates are kept to a minimum.

Mention was made of the postponement of the non-domestic revaluation, which is welcome, and the situation with empty homes. From a party-political perspective, the Committee Chairperson included a caveat about her concerns about the rating of empty homes. It would be concerning if the Bill proposed that empty homes remain derated in the long term. For a number of reasons, it is good that we will move to the rating of empty homes in the long run. We do not want to create a situation in which people buy up property simply to speculate. The problem is that in a situation where there is a high level of rates on occupied homes and less of a financial burden on empty homes, there is a disincentive for people to rent out houses that they own. That can have an impact. However, we should realise that the current financial circumstances more or less rule out the situation that occurred in recent years in which people were buying up property simply for investment purposes. It is right that the Minister has signalled that the rating of empty homes will be postponed for a year. Postponing the rating of such homes is being done for timing reasons; it sends out a signal that we should not be adding to people's burden at a time of severe economic pressure. Given that, I support the measure.

The deferments option for the elderly is somewhat complicated. It is likely that elderly people will be reluctant to take up that option because it is a deferment rather than a rate relief. There was quite a low level of take-up of that option when it was introduced in other jurisdictions. Therefore, it is something of a leap into the unknown. It is anticipated that about 2,000 people will take up the option. That might suggest that there is an element of swings and roundabouts in deferment. However, it is worth retaining the option and giving people the choice. Even if few people take it up, it can make a major financial difference to some who are put in very difficult financial circumstances. Deferment has a lot of merit, although it will need to be examined more closely as the scrutiny of the Bill continues.

A major concern that was raised with us as elected representatives is that take-up is always an issue, regardless of the help that is given. Whether that help is delivered through Government schemes, social security or even through organisations such as the citizens advice bureau, there is always a gap between what is available, people's rights and entitlements, and the level of take-up. Therefore, I welcome the data-sharing proposals, which, although limited in purpose, are designed to increase the level of take-up. It may affect a small number of people, but it will be welcomed across the Chamber if it means that more people get what they are entitled to.

The cap on rates meant that there was some transitional relief for councils. I am glad to see that the Department acted to ensure that councils were given transitional relief as early as possible; essentially, that action was a jump ahead of the legislation. I welcome the fact that the Bill is a tidying-up process that gives legislative effect to transitional relief, which provides additional support to councils. As a local councillor, I was glad to hear that when the Committee questioned the Minister and his officials on the matter, they gave assurances that the money that will be lost as a result of the relief will be borne by central government and that local government will not bear an additional financial burden. It is right that local government is not penalised as a result of the unforeseen consequences of decisions that central government make. That will be welcomed by local government.

Finally, the biggest element of the Bill, and that which has attracted most attention, is the relief for small businesses, which is expected to help about 16,000 small businesses. That has been welcomed universally, particularly by business organisations such as the Federation of Small Businesses and retailers' associations. At a time of economic pressure, it must be realised that small and medium-sized enterprises have traditionally been the backbone of the economy in Northern Ireland. Giving them that level of help and relief as part of an overall package is welcome.

Therefore, I welcome the Bill. The issues that it tackles will benefit constituents, particularly ratepayers in domestic and non-domestic properties. I support the Bill and commend it to the House.

Mr McNarry: I would like to offer the Minister some advice.

Mr Brolly: Brief advice.

Mr McNarry: The advice will be brief.

The Minister should know when he is winning, and he was winning from the start of the debate on the Bill's accelerated passage. Therefore, when he began the debate on Second Stage by mentioning colleagues who had referred to a dysfunctional Executive in a previous debate, he suddenly forgot that he is here only because he has introduced a dysfunctional accelerated passage. That is how the Bill got to the Chamber. The Minister came to the Committee and made a special request that it facilitate part of that dysfunctional action. I assume that he could not resist making the point; however, it was not one of his better points. The Minister is winning on the issue, and the Committee, and, I imagine, the House, will be with him during the process.

I am particularly happy that the Minister is introducing a measure providing rates relief for carbon-neutral homes. That is, perhaps, an intriguing introduction given the Minister's experience in his previous Department. However, we are publicly acknowledging that although we have limited powers to use tax incentives in this place, we are going to use them to encourage low-carbon and carbon-neutral technologies. That is an illustration of what we can do and of how we can be innovative. I am quite sure that that will go a long way towards moving Northern Ireland forward.

I am concentrating on the things that I want to say at this stage of the Bill's passage; I will have more to say at later stages. I especially welcome the special rates relief provided for businesses. Provision is made for industrial derating to continue after April 2011, and that is particularly welcome if we are to rebuild our manufacturing base, as we will need tools such as that well into the future. I am sure that the Minister's colleagues in other Departments will use that as an encouraging and enabling selling tool.

I welcome the provision for the small-business rates relief scheme. At Committee meetings, I asked the Minister to consider going further than what is being introduced, and that is because I see a need. However, let us bank what is coming forward and be grateful for that, particularly at a time when there is at least a challenge because public finances may be in trouble through what amounts to mismanagement — although the Minister may not agree. Nevertheless, that does not take away from the fact that it is incumbent on us to do all that we can to send out the right message and to help small businesses through the recession.

We have no idea how long the recession will last. People from small businesses in my constituency and other constituencies that come to see me are in the grips of the recession. From my own experience of having endured two recessions in business, I know that small businesses do not come out of a recession until many other building bricks are in place. The squeeze on credit and cash flow is essential to that. Where small businesses can see savings, they will, undoubtedly, welcome them. I will welcome that on their behalf, because the legislation will go a long way towards helping them.

10.45 pm

(Mr Speaker in the Chair)

In that category, sub-post offices will be provided with an enhanced rates relief scheme. Small post offices are at the heart of many rural and urban communities. It is clear from recent evidence that the National Federation of SubPostmasters has signalled an uphill struggle. It is fighting for its members' livelihoods and their contribution to small local communities. In particular, it seems that post offices have been losing much of their business over the past 10 or 20 years. In a sense, they will greet the legislation as a means to consider their business and to continue that service and provision. They will welcome the legislation, which will go a long way towards helping to keep small post offices open.

I appealed to the Minister at Committee, and I am sure that he knows what I will talk about now. I appealed to him, during the stages of the Bill, to at least consider — perhaps by way of an amendment that I have not yet produced — factoring carers into the rates relief arrangements. The Minister kindly offered me the opportunity to talk to his officials, and I will do so in the near future. I want to make a point about the elderly, and I welcome the potential to help that category of people. As the Minister has said, that is a wide category. However, some elderly pensioners are carers. Approximately 4,500 elderly people will lose their carer's allowance when they reach pension age. No one in the House will disagree that that is an injustice that we all want to turn around.

I appreciate the difficulties with that suggestion. However, there might, perhaps, be some space to help the elderly in that way in the knowledge, as the Minister said at the Committee, that many of those people are carers. I want to identify that group as a category within the overall elderly category, particularly the 4,500 people who will lose their carer's allowance when they reach pension age. That is not right, and I see an opportunity to right a wrong. The Department for Social Development cannot help with the issue, and the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety is unable to help. It would be an achievement if the Department of Finance and Personnel could assist without spending too much money. If the Minister can provide the figures, it would be interesting to know how many elderly people could benefit from that relief and what the uptake might be. How many of the 4,500 people whom I am talking about might benefit from such a relief?

I hope that the Bill will have a successful and reasonably easy passage to its enactment. I recognise the speed behind it, and it is now up to the Assembly to help the Minister to catch up. We are prepared to play our role in that.

Mr O'Loan: I support the Bill in general. Obviously, it will require closer consideration in the immediate future, and, therefore, I will reserve my ultimate position on all its clauses. On first reading, some clauses are opaque and will need closer examination. However, I will make some initial comments, which will, for the most part, be positive.

I welcome the introduction of a small-business rates relief scheme. I will not repeat what other Members have said, but I welcome what the scheme will do for small businesses, and, in particular, small post offices, again, particularly, in rural areas.

I want to correct remarks that were made either by the incumbent Minister or his predecessor in the Assembly to the effect that had the recommendations in the Economic Research Institute of Northern Ireland's report of March 2008 been heeded, the scheme would not have been introduced. That is not a correct reading of what ERINI said. It said that if the scheme were to be subjected to a strictly economic test, it would not have stood up to such a test. Revenue foregone is included in the measure, and ERINI said, essentially, that there would not be an economic payback from that investment if one were to treat such revenue as investment. ERINI said that if the measure were to be introduced, it would be for social reasons. It is precisely for those social reasons, particularly the preservation of businesses in rural areas, that the measure stands up, and that was made clear in ERINI's report.

I support what is being offered with respect to relief for new zero-carbon and low-carbon homes. Full rates relief to the first occupiers of new zero-carbon and low-carbon homes for up to five years and two years respectively is a good measure.

I will return briefly to the small-business rates relief scheme because I intended to mention that the intention is to limit the scheme to three to five years. I have some anxiety about that. Does that mean that primary legislation will be needed again after that short period has elapsed?

Clause 3 deals with reliefs on energy-efficiency measures, which I wholeheartedly support. My only query on that clause concerns reference to a one-off reduction. Of course, one can debate as to whether those should be necessary at all as incentives, because the payback on those measures is quite good, and one could say that enough incentive already exists. However, people do not always behave fully rationally, and it may be — and I hope that it will be the case — that the presentation of such measures as a rates relief may operate as a significant additional incentive. I wonder whether simple one-off reductions are an adequate incentive.

The scheme is quite tricky when it comes to the design of the details. Loft insulation is a relatively inexpensive measure, while cavity-wall insulation is obviously considerably more expensive. That is not in the enabling legislation but will be included in the rules that are made later.

I wonder why there is no reference to energy-efficient heating systems in the guidance. They would be considerably more expensive, and would justify there being rates relief more. Those points do not particularly concern the enabling legislation; they relate more to what happens after the legislation is enacted.

I am glad to see agreements for a deferred payment of rates on dwellings included at clause 5. I have argued for that measure, and I was pleasantly surprised when officials stated that their current estimate of take-up could total 2,000 cases. Considerable costs are involved in the operation of that scheme — we must be realistic about that — but I would call 2,000 cases a substantial demand. The actual demand will be tested when the scheme comes into operation.

I support the extension of rating of empty properties to the domestic sector. The Minister has sought opinion, and my thoughts were that the measure should not be introduced immediately. In principle, it is a good measure, in that it encourages the use of empty property and ensures that property is well maintained so that its condition does not cause disturbance to neighbours. However, this is not the time to introduce that measure. Moreover, I do not think that it should be introduced in 2010. As to its being adopted the year after that, we should adopt a waiting position and re-examine the situation a year from now.

I am concerned by correspondence that has come from the Department. The Committee for Finance and Personnel will deal with that correspondence tomorrow, which states that another reason for not introducing rating for empty properties is that Land and Property Services (LPS) would not be ready to do so.

I realise that very substantial work was done. A contract was entered into with local district councils to map vacant properties with much greater accuracy. That would appear to indicate that councils did that work, but LPS did not have the capacity to store that information on its system. That is a further worry about LPS's capacity. In some senses, however, that is academic, because the Committee's advice will be that we do not want rating of vacant properties to be introduced next year.

I want to raise a related point about rates payable on vacant non-domestic property, which was introduced in 2004. Just as the imposition of rates on domestic vacant property would be a burden that the sector could not currently cope with, considerable difficulty arises for people who have vacant non-domestic property and who pay rates on that property. Those people would be only too glad to be able to bring that property into active use but are unable to do so in the economic climate.

If he is so minded, perhaps the Minister will consider that matter, because I feel that it should be addressed. I do not know whether that would require legislation to be amended. The matter should be seriously considered, because many people are experiencing considerable pain.

We have spoken about data-sharing powers and about how relief systems can be made more automatic. The Committee probed officials closely on that issue to ensure that the sharing of information was for the benefit only of persons concerned, in order to enable them to obtain rates relief. We have been given strong assurances on that matter. I assume that that relates to clause 10 on penalties for the unauthorised disclosure of information. I welcome and support that provision.

I have no great sympathy for the plan to reimburse councils in the short term, but the cap is a done deal. It is a regressive measure, but, given that it has been included in the legislation, it is good that compensation be given to councils for a limited period.

I support the legislation in principle.

11.00 pm

Dr Farry: As the Minister said, this process goes back to the very early days of the Assembly, and it is worth reflecting on that. My colleague Brian Wilson and I tabled a motion calling for a comprehensive rates review. That was accepted by the Department, and we have seen it being worked through. The process has been extremely comprehensive, as can be seen in the sheer scope of the legislation and the whole range of issues concerning rates. My party prefers a local income tax to a rating system. Rates are regressive, whereas income tax is progressive and is linked to people's ability to pay. That is a wider debate that can be had on another occasion, because we are discussing the system as it is today.

I will be supporting the Second Stage of the Bill, but that does not mean that I do not have concerns about some of its clauses. I am prepared to support the small-business rates relief scheme; although I must confess that I am among the sceptical supporters of that measure. Like Mr O'Loan, I recognise that the scheme has an economic and social rationale. As things stand, the social element is probably the clincher.

It must be recognised that the economic arguments are disputed. I appreciate that the Minister and some of his colleagues are sceptical about the benefits of economists as a profession, but their arguments need to be given due consideration. There is some concern regarding the proposal and issues such as dead weight and value for money. However, the importance of small businesses to our economy must be recognised. They constitute a disproportionate element of our economy compared to most of our neighbouring regions and countries.

I want to make a point about the wider context. The Minister placed great emphasis on the Bill's fitting into the Executive's wider response to the economic downturn. He criticised the comments that have been made about whether that response has been effective, particularly the comments of Mike Smyth in this morning's newspapers. I am concerned that the Executive have essentially put all their eggs, or measures of a similar nature, in one basket. Every scheme that the Executive have produced to address the downturn has been directed at the cost issues facing individuals and businesses. They have talked about the deferment of water charges, freezing the regional rate and different aspects of this Bill. There is talk about industrial rating being held back, and now we are talking about the small-business rates relief scheme. There is also the scheme for business support, which is operated by the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment.

Those measures all recognise that businesses and individuals are having difficulty. During the recession, we must ensure that demand is kept up and that the economy is turning over. It is perfectly logical to do that. However, the Executive is not looking at how they use the resources at their disposal to modernise and rebalance the economy. As we moved into recession, it was perfectly clear that there were some major structural weaknesses in the Northern Ireland economy, such as the size of the public sector and a dependency on low cost businesses.

Hopefully, we will move out of recession in the near future, but those structural weaknesses will remain. We have simply tried to tide ourselves over in the difficult times. We have not taken advantage of the opportunity to access additional resources, which will be changing radically in the near future. We have missed the opportunity to make our economy more sustainable and to modernise and rebalance it so that we will be in a better position to take advantage of the recovery and stand on our own two feet in the future. In several years' time, with hindsight, we will regret things that have not been done on this occasion. I appreciate that that is a broad comment, and, in some cases, we have to judge things in their own right. I do respect what has been done for small businesses, and there was a demand for that. It is worth putting it in that context and posing that challenge to the Executive.

Like others, I welcome the measures in clauses 2 and 3, which are about zero-carbon or low-carbon homes and energy efficiency. I noted Peter Weir's comments lauding the environmental credentials of the Minister. I was almost tempted to suggest that we put the Minister on the plane to New York in the morning to see whether he can broker an agreement at the climate change talks that are taking place at the UN this week. However, the Minister is thinking of his carbon footprint, which is to his credit.

I do not want to open up the wider discussion about climate change and its causes, but the Minister will concur with the views of most Members that there are financial and economic incentives for taking a lot of these measures, irrespective of people's views on climate change. That is the rationale behind clauses 2 and 3. Declan O'Loan asked whether we need to go that far, because people may already have incentives to move in that direction. I have a different question: is this enough to move us in the direction of, and encourage, greater energy efficiency? We do not know. I would be interested to hear from the Minister whether any modelling has been done by his Department on the impact that the measures are going to have on our ability as a society to meet our climate change targets, to reduce our reliance on carbon, and to meet the different targets that we have to meet.

Through building control regulations, the Minister also has the power to make an impact. Financial incentives are one way in which greater environmentalism and energy efficiency in businesses and homes could be encouraged, but regulation is another way. However, I am not sure that we want to put all our emphasis on one approach. Perhaps a balance of approaches is required.

I note that the Minister has not yet brought forward new building regulations based on the legislation that was passed by the House. Discussions have taken place about Northern Ireland signing up to the 2016 target for building regulations under the code for sustainable zero-carbon homes, as has happened elsewhere in these islands. Hopefully the Minister can update us on that.

I am a sceptic about industrial derating. I have made comments before, and people can read them in Hansard if they so wish. In brief, industrial derating is not the most efficient way to assist businesses in Northern Ireland. Property costs are certainly a challenge for businesses, particularly in the manufacturing sector. However, the biggest competitive disadvantage that we face in comparison to other regions is not the cost of property; rather, it is energy prices. I appreciate that industrial derating is an option that is available to the Executive, and one that we can address, whereas energy is less within our control. I understand that it is a limited tool that we have at our disposal. It is worth making the point, though, that it is not the most efficient way to address the problems that are faced by the business sector. It tends to ossify our economic structure and does not encourage diversification, particularly moves towards a service-based economy, because incentives exist for the status quo, rather than for change. Some types of companies are not covered by industrial derating, whereas others are. Again, that maybe locks in a retrograde set of incentives or disincentives for particular sectors. Those are wider issues that we have to reflect upon.

What we are doing, essentially, is giving the Assembly the option to do whatever it wants about industrial derating in the years to come. There is no fundamental problem with this legislation. I appreciate that if we are to move away rapidly from the 30% rating, or even go up to 50%, we cannot go back down, because of European Union state aid rules. I ask the Minister to share his thoughts about the likely sustainability of that approach under the European Union and whether there is going to be an eventual day of reckoning for that type of project in the future. Does he see this as something that we can do indefinitely, or will the European Union force us to reconsider it some time in the future?

I support the rating of empty homes, but, equally, I support its deferral. Given the current economic climate, that makes sense.

As my party made clear during the relevant debates, it is opposed to capping rates. If people want more detail on our position, they can read the previous debates. Before making two points on the transitional relief proposal, I must declare my membership of North Down Borough Council.

First, the relief applies only to the £400,000 cap; it does not apply to the £500,000 cap that was, I accept, introduced under direct rule and not by the Executive. However, that cap remains part of the financial regime that councils face. It particularly affects my council in North Down, and those in Belfast, Lisburn and Ards are in a similar situation whereby it takes a large slice off the tax base. That must be made up by raising everyone else's rates or by making cuts in services.

When the cap was introduced, which was, to be blunt, during the final days of direct rule, no transitional relief was offered. However, it is in the gift of the Department to introduce that relief today, should it choose to do so. Although the original decision was not made by the Department, it made the move to a cap at £400,000. By implication, therefore, it supports the cap at £500,000. For transitional relief not to apply to that as well is an anomaly.

Secondly, I want to highlight the tapering of the relief, which is offered for only a two-year period, with 100% relief in the first year. Incidentally, councils have already applied relief to this year's finances on the assumption that the legislation will be passed. That is another reason for the Bill to be progressed as quickly as possible. The question is whether the tapering will be sufficient to assist councils, particularly in the context of the economic downturn and the uncertainty about property values and the rates base of councils. Perhaps we need to rethink and be slightly more generous with the wind-down, and extend the tapering period from only two years to three or four years.

Those are some questions to ponder and some food for thought as we move forward. That speech was 20 minutes shorter than my first one today, so we are making progress.

Mr Campbell: That man needs a calendar, not a watch.

Dr Farry: I appreciate that there is another debate to come. On that point, I will, therefore, sit down.

Mr Hamilton: Mr Speaker, I assure you that I will not be heckled into submission in the same weak manner as the previous Member; I intend to see my remarks through, no matter what utterances are made from behind me. The hour is fairly late; we have been here for so long that, earlier, I asked some Members whether it would be rude to start shaving when others were making their speeches. The breakfast buffet is due to be served any moment.

As I stand here at such a late hour, and after everyone else has made thorough speeches, Members will rightly ask what this boy can possibly add. The answer is, of course, nothing.

Mr Weir: Will the Member give way?

Mr Hamilton: I fear that this may be the beginning of something, but I will give way.

Mr Weir: The Member asked what he could add. May I suggest repetition?

Mr Hamilton: As you know, Mr Speaker, repeating what everyone else said has never prevented me from making a contribution in the House before, and it will not do so now. I want to contribute to the debate because it deals with an important subject. It has a long history that pre-dates the return of devolution. The Assembly inherited an exceptionally unpopular rating system.

As a result of the review that was initiated by Peter Robinson when he was Finance Minister, some of those initial, very quick, wins that he was able to put in place, and some of the commitments that have been made, which the Minister is now bringing forward in this Bill, we now find — not delight, because I do not think that anybody likes having to pay rates — a general acceptance that the system is moving towards being much better than it was before devolution.

This is very good legislation, taking us further along that path. In many ways, it deserves a better hearing than it is getting at this time because it is of such importance to so many people. I will talk about some of those people in a moment or two, but it is deserving of much better time in this House than it is currently getting. However, we are where we are in that regard.

I argue that this is a good piece of legislation that is not the product of a dysfunctional Executive. In fact, it is a product of a very responsive Executive who have taken on board a significant number of the criticisms that were made about the ratings system. The Executive have addressed how the rating system that was inherited from direct rule adversely impacted upon particular sectors and groups of people. They have made changes and sorted out a lot of those problems to the point at which we do not hear a lot of dissent about the system of rating that we have in Northern Ireland.

There are two broad areas that I want to talk about. One is assisting businesses, and the other is assisting the vulnerable. I view what are referred to as green rebates — for loft and cavity wall insulation, and for zero- and low-carbon homes — as being good for business in Northern Ireland. Obviously, they are an incentive; they help those individuals who take them up to insulate their lofts and walls, and they help builders and developers to develop houses that are low- or zero-carbon.

In some ways, I see them as a stimulus for our economy because all of that work will have to be carried out by local contractors who do that sort of work, so there is a stimulus for the companies, which are often small, that carry out that sort of work. It will stimulate that sector and will encourage better behaviour and greater energy efficiency. In response to what Dr Farry said, it is not an example of a cost-based measure taken by the Executive. It is something that will help to stimulate a sector of the economy. It is a small stimulus, but nonetheless it is one that will help the people who do that sort of work.

We should not overlook the fact that this Bill will ensure that the cap on industrial rating at 30% will remain and not, by default, slip to 100%. I particularly welcome, as have most sensible people in the business sector, the small-business rates relief scheme. I heard some criticism on the radio last week, which was given succour by the BBC, that it did not go far enough and was not coming in quickly enough. I was appalled by the sloppiness of the reporting, although some Members may say that that is nothing that we should be surprised about. [Interruption.]

I think that most of its reporters will be in their beds by now, while we work on.

A Member: They are part-timers.

Mr Paisley Jnr: They have cut you off.

Mr Hamilton: I have been censored at this hour, although I fear that I turned things off a long time ago.

There has been some criticism of that scheme, but most sensible people in the business sector have been lobbying for a measure of that very kind, so there is a broad welcome for it. There is a 25% relief — upwards of £9 million — for some 16,000 businesses. That works out at an average of over £560 for each business. That may not sound like a lot in itself, but the scheme is directed at small businesses. Small-shop owners could benefit from it, and that amount of money deducted from their rates bills could be a significant amount of money. In these very difficult times, it could be the difference between keeping somebody in employment and not. Indeed, even though it is a small amount, it may give them an incentive to keep trading for a bit longer and keep their business going.

That measure is to be very warmly welcomed, as is the focus on sub-post offices. We have all had experiences of closures in our areas, or foresee in the future the closures of small, rural post offices or ones in vulnerable communities in our constituencies. Anything aimed at sustaining Northern Ireland's post office network is to be warmly welcomed.

I also welcome the Minister's announcement that he intends to postpone the revaluation of non-domestic properties. That will be necessary in time, but its postponement is wise and prudent in the difficult circumstances in which we find ourselves.

I want to talk about how the Bill, once passed, will assist vulnerable people. I know from my constituency work and from chairing the Social Development Committee that one of the biggest problems that we face in helping vulnerable people through benefits and reliefs is targeting those people. It has proved difficult in the past to target and to deliver benefits and relief to people who deserve and need them. We often hear of people who defraud the system, and the debate can be dominated by that issue. However, for every person who defrauds the system, at least one other is failing to take up relief to which they are entitled.

I welcome the power in the Bill for data sharing, which is particularly aimed at rates relief, disabled persons allowance and lone pensioner allowance. Anything that allows data to be shared across the Government Departments and agencies in Northern Ireland to better target those people will be most beneficial to vulnerable people in our society. We must have a concerted effort, through the rating system and the social security system, to encourage take-up. The Department has worked closely with the group Access to Benefits, which does a lot of work in that area. Many of the measures that the Department and Access to Benefits worked on are being implemented, and that will make a big difference in this area.

I also note the rates deferment scheme. In the past, I have expressed personal unease in the Committee about the idea of adding a rates burden onto a legacy or onto somebody's estate, but I appreciate that some people may find it a useful device to have at their disposal. As Mr Weir said, a small rather than a massive number of people will probably avail themselves of that, perhaps because they have to. For that reason, I welcome the introduction of the rates deferment scheme.

Although the rating of empty homes is wise, and at the time there were good policy reasons for looking at that, the postponement of its implementation is very wise at present. Declan O'Loan mentioned the rating of non-domestic properties. I, like him, have heard people in my area express concern about incurring rates liabilities on non-domestic properties that have become vacant and simply cannot be let again. Given the expenditure already entailed by the Bill, I appreciate that doing something about that might be a push too far, but the concern being expressed in the community is worth noting.

In conclusion — [Interruption.]

That is the only bit that has received a cheer, Mr Speaker.

Dr Farry: We are too tired.

Mr Hamilton: Just wave your hand or something.

In conclusion, the Bill is a good piece of legislation for which I feel there is a consensus of support. It is a Bill of which we should be collectively proud, because the Minister and his Department are responding positively to community concerns about the rating system by targeting reliefs and targeting assistance to sectors and groups of people in Northern Ireland who need help. I very much welcome the Bill and hope that the Assembly joins Members on this side of the Chamber and the Minister in giving the Bill a safe passage through the House.

Mr Speaker: I call on the Minister of Finance and Personnel to conclude the debate.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: Mr Speaker, you said that with a tone of resignation. I know that you are hoping that I do not emulate my party leader in concluding the debate, or we will be here until about 2.00 am.

At this hour, I salute all the stalwarts in the Chamber for the Second Stage of the Rates (Amendment) Bill, and I thank everyone who made a contribution. It is late, but Members have made a number of points, so, given that the Bill is going through under accelerated passage, and although I will try to be as brief as possible, those points deserve a response.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel indicated her concerns about a number of matters. First, she welcomed the introduction of business relief for post offices. The good thing about the business relief scheme is that it enables us to target particular sectors. Last Monday, in the Long Gallery, I addressed the Northern Ireland branch of the National Federation of SubPostmasters, which saluted the Assembly and the Executive for the provisions in the Bill that will give considerable rates relief to sub-post offices. Indeed, the sub-postmasters said that the relief will help to sustain post offices in local communities and will bring us into line with similar schemes in Scotland and Wales. In particular, the scheme is welcomed in the current economic climate. Therefore, the industry already recognises the point that the Chairperson made.

The Chairperson, in her capacity as a public representative, raised concerns about the decision to postpone the rating of empty homes. Quite rightly, she pointed out that the rating system has an important role to play in trying to bring those homes into use to alleviate the homelessness problem. However, this is a balancing act, so, although the introduction of rates on empty homes was supported by my predecessor and by the Committee for the reasons that the Chairperson gave, we must, nevertheless, be mindful of current economic circumstances. Given the decline in the housing market and the difficulties that the downturn has presented for homeowners, we must be careful about introducing a policy that was devised in totally different economic circumstances. Such a policy might exacerbate problems that are being experienced, cause further price reductions in the property market, and hamper the market's stabilisation. That is why the introduction of the policy has been postponed; we are not turning our back on it, but it behoves us to bring it in when it is most likely to be effective.

The Chairperson also asked about extending green rebates to the social sector. The Committee expressed concerns to my predecessor, and there has been widespread consultation on the matter with the Housing Executive, the Northern Ireland Federation of Housing Associations, the Energy Saving Trust and others. My predecessor concluded, and I agree, that, for a number of reasons, it does not make sense to extend the scheme to the social-rented sector at this time. Indeed, I would point out that even the Department for Social Development's warm homes scheme does not extend to the social-rented sector. If one looks at that sector, one can see the reasons: only 0·4% of the Housing Executive's housing stock do not have loft insulation, and only 7·1% of Housing Executive stock and 6·4% of housing association properties do not have cavity-wall insulation; whereas, in the private sector, that figure rises to 23·9%.

11.30 pm

We seek to introduce this policy to try to promote energy saving while targeting the money that is available. If resources are limited and the problem exists mostly in the private sector, that is where those resources should go. For those reasons, we decided to exclude the social sector. However, there will be a review of the circumstances, and we have not ruled it out forever.

The last point that the Chairperson made was about data sharing. Again, we have given assurances that data sharing will be used to try to reach those people who are entitled to benefit and will ensure that we catch them more effectively in the net.

I will now turn to my colleague Peter Weir, who has described me as a "green giant". I am not sure that that is a compliment. In fact, it is perhaps risky to be called a green anything and to be a member of the DUP. However, he made an important point that, despite what people have said — I do not want to get into a debate about causes of climate change and everything else — it makes perfect sense to introduce policies that help to save energy.

Mr I McCrea: Does the Minister agree that organisations that are set up to give advice and inform people on how to save energy would spend their time better doing that, rather than wasting it arguing the pros and cons of climate change?

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: As far as I am concerned, I am introducing practical measures that will not only give people the incentive to save energy but will partly finance their ability to save energy in their homes. That makes good sense. We do not want to be wasteful, and, if we can reduce energy bills for individuals, we reduce the consumption of fuel in our economy. It makes good sense to reduce energy use. If by promoting that I become a "green giant", I am very happy to be a "green giant". It is an illustration of the pragmatic and sensible approach that we are using to deal with the issue.

Peter Weir raised the issue of deferment for elderly people in their own homes and the fact that there may be a low take-up of that. We estimate that, once the scheme is entrenched after, I think, four years, about 2,000 people will take it up. It will not be an easy choice for people. It will involve costs for them to get the information together for the scheme, and a determination of the scheme will require a claim on their property. It will not be entered into lightly by many. However, it will give those who wish to stay in large family homes, but who do not have the means to pay high rates bills, the opportunity to live out their lives in the homes that they have had for a long time. From that point of view, I believe that it is worth it.

Peter Weir mentioned the cost of administration. It is estimated that administration costs will be quite high. However, in discussion with Land and Property Services, even the figure that I gave to the Committee has been reduced significantly already. I have been trying to tease out from LPS where those administrative costs came from and how we can keep them down. We will, of course, review that particular aspect once we have seen the scheme in operation for some time.

Peter Weir and Stephen Farry raised the issue of councils and the impact of capping on councils, and they mentioned a rates implication for councils that have a large number of expensive properties. A case was made for that. We recognise that there is an impact on those councils, and, for that reason, we have introduced a transition allowance over the two years, which will amount to about £1·5 million available to those councils. Stephen Farry has indicated that he does not believe that that goes far enough and that it should be extended. However, we have got to balance that against the limited resources and the fact that there will be less income for central services if we forgo rate income, because the income from rates finances a lot of what Departments do at central level. The transition allowance will, at least, give councils the chance to adjust, and the £1·5 million of relief has been included in the Bill.

I see that Mr McNarry has left the Chamber. He said that, since I am ahead, I had no need to annoy him. I enjoy annoying Mr McNarry. It seems that my reference to the earlier comments that were made about the dysfunctional Executive have annoyed him. However, I have been able to show that what his party describes as a dysfunctional Executive have been able to produce this range of measures. If he gets annoyed as easily as that, I do not think that I will have too much difficulty in winding him up in future debates.

The mechanism that we have used here is not an example of the Assembly being dysfunctional. In fact, if anything, it is a good example of where we have put in place, within the Assembly, mechanisms for dealing with urgent issues that we need to get through quickly. That shows that the Assembly can function, even when things that we do not want to get slowed down, do get slowed down. There is still a way to catch up.

Mr McNarry mentioned the carbon-neutral homes scheme and said that it was an innovative policy. I think that other Members mentioned it as well. That policy is designed, primarily, to save energy. He also talked about the rates relief for businesses and asked why it was to be in place for only five years. A number of other Members mentioned that as well. No policy is going to continue indefinitely. These policies were introduced in particular circumstances. The Assembly and the Executive might decide to extend it after five years, but, in five years' time, it may well be that, with a reassessment of the policy, we will see that economic circumstances have changed. For instance, it may become apparent that the resources that are being used for the small-business rates relief scheme or, as Mr Farry mentioned, the rates on manufacturing businesses, could be used in a better way. For that reason, we have given a five-year life to the scheme, and it will be reassessed in five years' time. That is not to say that it will end in five years, but at least that will give us an opportunity to ask whether it is the way that we should be spending resources in whatever circumstances we might be facing in five years' time.

Mr McNarry also raised the issue of carers and asked whether the Bill could provide relief allowance for them. He accepted that I have asked officials to discuss that with him. The rates system is not the answer to all the kinds of problems that people in Northern Ireland face. There is a limit to what can be done through the rates system. The more complicated we make the system of collecting rates, the more expensive it will be.

Certain information is not readily at hand, and although departmental officials will explore the issue of carers with Mr McNarry, there must be an initial definition of a carer. Very often, the person who is the carer will change, and it is not easy to track those changes within the current rates system. What also must be defined is how many hours a particular carer is caring for, whether they are full-time or part-time carers, and what those terms actually mean. Therefore, a whole range of information and issues must be captured and made available to the administrators of the rates system before the Department could consider whether the introduction of rates relief for carers would be feasible. There are other ways of dealing with the carers issue, but that would involve the creation of a completely new policy, which would require consultation. I am fairly sure that rates relief for carers cannot be included in the Bill, but departmental officials will discuss that with Mr McNarry.

Mr McNarry also raised the issue of elderly carers, and provision has already been made for such carers through the benefits and rates relief scheme, with, for example, the lone pensioner allowance containing certain categories of carers that are treated as not occupying a property. It must be remembered that any additional changes to the system will increase complexities and the cost and operational pressures, and that there are limits to what the Department can do.

Mr O'Loan asked a number of questions, including why the scheme has been limited to a duration of between three and five years. As I have indicated, it is limited to that period, but that does not mean that it will end then. Indeed, following the end of that period, the Department will re-examine the scheme in light of the particular circumstances of the time. The total cost of the scheme is between £8 million and £9 million, and in three to five years, it could be felt that that money could be directed in a much more effective way. By limiting the time for the scheme, the Department is at least allowing for a re-examination of a policy that is right for today, but may not be right in the future.

The second issue that Mr O'Loan raised was the one-off allowance for energy efficiency, and whether that should be limited to loft or cavity-wall insulation. This is the first phase of the scheme, and it will be reassessed, but in the first phase it was felt that the quickest way of making energy savings was to limit it to those two types of insulation. Some of the other measures that Mr O'Loan talked about, such as energy-efficient boilers or solar panels, could be included in the allowance following the departmental examination of the first phase, and, after a year or two, the Department will examine how that measure has performed, and whether it should expand it to include those technologies. Members should note that the warm homes scheme has been extended to include renewable-energy schemes, and the Department will examine that in the future, when examining the green rebates.

Mr O'Loan and other Members also raised the question of reconsidering the rating of empty commercial premises to support businesses that are struggling as a result of the recession. The Department has carried out an evaluation of the impact and effectiveness of the policy of rating empty non-domestic properties, and it has always been the plan to do that at this time. However, that evaluation was given added importance because of the recession, and the impact that it is having on the commercial property market. Indeed, I know from speaking to my constituents that many people own commercial properties that had previously lain vacant only for a few months at most, but which have now been vacant for much longer because of the recession.

As part of the evaluation, we have taken soundings from a number of stakeholders to get their views on what the impact of the policy will be, and we will also be taking on board the views of the Committee for Finance and Personnel. I want to consider all those matters, as well as look at a detailed analysis of what is being done as part of the evaluation, before I make a decision on how best to proceed. We are not closing the door on that, but it is important that we obtain some facts. As with all such matters, we must remember that if the policy is changed, it will have implications for the revenue that we collect from rates.

Dr Farry presented me with something akin to an A-level paper on rates, which contained a number of questions, and I will try to answer him as briefly as possible. His first point was that he and his party were not happy with the rating system, and he asked why we were not looking to introduce a local income tax. All the studies that have been conducted on replacing the domestic rate with a local income tax have shown that the administrative costs would be quite high: around 7p from every pound collected would go on administration. Dr Farry, who has an economics background, will know that, when he wrote about taxation, Adam Smith listed what he called the “canons of taxation”. One of the canons of taxation was that any tax should be cheap to collect. If it is not efficient to collect, it is not a good tax. Moving towards the introduction of a tax that would take 7p in every pound to collect might not be the wisest option. Indeed, it is significant that, although the Scottish Government started off contemplating a local income tax, they have dropped that idea. Therefore, concerns have already been raised about the introduction of such a tax.

The second point that Dr Farry made was whether the small-business rates relief scheme and the cap on industrial rating was the wisest way in which to give help to industry. He asked whether it would cause businesses to become ossified, and so on. Dr Farry made the argument that the scheme deals only with the cost base of businesses. However, I have had representations from businesses, and they have told me, the Assembly and the Committee what they would like to see happen during the recession. Their fixed costs are crippling, especially when their customer base has been reduced. That is why the measure has not been set in concrete and why we have said that it will be reviewed. When we look at the matter in the future, in different economic circumstances, we may decide that the cost base is not what we should be going for and that, instead, we should be looking more at the structural changes or the supply side aspects to promote expanding industries. People who are operating in business are saying that that is the kind of help that they need.

Dr Farry asked a number of questions on energy-efficiency measures. He wanted to know whether we believed that the relief of £150 that will be given on expenditure of £300 would be enough — around 50% of the expenditure will be covered by the rates relief. The level has been set at the same level as is available through the Northern Ireland Electricity cashback scheme, which attracts around 2,000 applicants a year. The £150 incentive has clearly been sufficient enough to attract a number of applicants. Indeed, the scheme is oversubscribed. It is estimated that there could be around 3,000 to 4,000 applicants for the scheme, which is quite a large number. If it attracts people, gives them an incentive and gives them some help to insulate homes that are not insulated, that would appear to me to be a big step forward.

Dr Farry also asked whether any modelling had been done to assess the impact that the schemes may have. The answer is no, but the schemes will be reviewed when they have been up and running for a while. We will see how successful they have been in meeting their aims. If they are successful, there will be scope to extend the legislation. If not, of course, we will have to look at the legislation to see whether there are other ways of applying the rebates.

The Member also raised the issue of industrial derating, and whether that was likely to run contrary to EU rules. The answer is that if it were introduced today, it probably would run contrary to EU state-aid rules; however, it qualifies as pre-accession aid. If we were to revert to a lower level — for example, to 25% liability — the legal advice is that there would be a high risk that that policy reversal would not be allowed, but the current level is not likely to be challenged, or run contrary to state-aid rules.

I have already answered Dr Farry’s plea, from his perspective as a councillor, for the relief for councils because of capping. I hope that I have explained the thinking behind what we have done, namely that what is available is a temporary and transitional relief.

Finally, I will address the comments that were made by Simon Hamilton. I know that that word “finally” has caused great joy in my colleague Gregory Campbell. Simon Hamilton raised the issue of non-domestic properties and the small number of people who may apply for a deferment of rates. I think that I have covered both those points, and, therefore, I am now coming to the end of the questions that have been raised.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

Civil Service Equal Pay Claim

The following motion stood in the Order Paper:

That this Assembly notes with concern that the Civil Service Equal Pay claim remains unresolved despite the Assembly resolution of 1 June 2009 calling on the Minister of Finance and Personnel to ensure that the staff affected receive their back pay within three months; welcomes the assurance by the Minister that the financial implications of a resolution to this matter will have to be faced in a manner compatible with the Department's legal obligations; and calls on the Minister to state an early date by which a comprehensive settlement offer will be made to the Trade Union representing the staff concerned. — [Mr O'Loan.]

Motion not moved.

Mr Speaker: I thank the Member for his co-operation in not moving the motion at this late hour. I know that the motion will be on the Order Paper next week.

ADJOURNMENT

Sectarianism in Coleraine

Mr Speaker: Before we begin the debate, I remind Members of their general duty to behave responsibly. I strongly recommend that they exercise extreme caution to ensure that nothing that they say during the debate may prejudice any matter that is before, or may come before, the courts. The proposer of the topic will have 15 minutes in which to speak, and all other Members will have approximately seven minutes.

Mr Dallat: I am sure that Members will not thank me for insisting that the debate go ahead, but it is very important, because an event is due to take place at Stormont tomorrow, and there was a meeting of political leaders in Coleraine Borough Council last night. This debate is part of a sequence. I am sure that this is the type of debate that people wish were not necessary, but it is a reality of life, which has caused much heartache to those at the receiving end of the awful curse that still afflicts society in Coleraine.

The death of Kevin McDaid was, I believe, a defining moment in a long period of sectarianism, which many predicted would end in grief. Unfortunately, it did.

During the debate, I shall listen carefully to what other Members have to say, because it is only when we talk to one another that we are most likely to reach a resolution. Regrettably, the kind of engagement and dialogue that is necessary for a resolution is not taking place, certainly not at the pace that it should. So far, the victims have not been asked for their opinions, and those who are engaged in sectarianism still do not understand that, in such circumstances, everyone is a loser.

The 'Chambers Dictionary' defines sectarianism as:

"of or relating to a sect, or between sects; ... motivated solely by a hatred derived from religious bigotry".

In the days after the murder of Kevin McDaid, I met clergymen representing the main Churches, and they are in no way associated with, or contributing to, bigotry because they belong to a particular sect. Indeed, I salute the clergy for their courage and inspiration at a difficult time, when others in positions of political leadership were nowhere to be seen.

'Fowler's Modern English Usage' is more succinct. It describes sectarianism as:

"Now almost inevitably followed by the word 'violence' ... suggestive of killing or destruction, in Northern Ireland, the former Yugoslavia, or elsewhere in the world."

That is certainly not something that we want. That kind of definition should surely set alarm bells ringing, because this society has seen enough violence over the years, and no one wants to see another cycle of troubles, which solves nothing and fails everyone.

In the weeks and months since the death of Kevin McDaid, it was expected that engagement in dialogue would take place. That has not happened, certainly not at the pace that it needs to happen. Indeed, the problem has worsened, with children and young people cocooned in their homes during the school holidays, too afraid to go to the town centre, where sectarian elements gather regularly. People from those elements are equipped with their mobile phones to alert their cronies, should others appear whom they regard as the enemy. The Bann Bridge, which should unite people, has become a symbol of fear where sectarian groups gather regularly to chant bigoted slogans in the direction of the area of the town where Kevin McDaid lost his life. Those slogans are clearly heard, and they hurt. Sometimes, the slogans are in support of individuals who are on remand for alleged involvement in the attacks of 24 May. At other times, the chants are purely to hurt the feelings of those who are already hurt. That is sectarianism at its rawest, and it piles fear on fear. It must end.

When I visited the area last Friday, I found that the streets were very quiet and peaceful. There was not a sound, and the good weather gave the impression that it was heaven on earth. However, that silence had an eerie feeling about it. No children were playing in the streets, and the silence was broken only by the occasional bark of a dog. You could smell the fear. I did not know that, a few hours later, the police would deliver yet another death threat to a local family, which had 12 hours to get out. That is not civilisation, and it cannot continue.

Around the corner, a community art project depicts normal life in a normal society. It has brightened up the place, but even that has not pleased some people. A picture of a fisherman is somehow linked to the late Kevin McDaid, because he took young people from both communities fishing. The image has been the subject of complaint. That is how bad sectarianism can get, particularly if it is not addressed. All of that is adding fear on fear.

12.00 midnight

"Fear" is the single most common word that is used by people from both communities who live in the area. A man who was born and reared in the Killowen area told me that a police officer advised him to take a different route home. He does not understand why that should be. After all, he said, he had taken the same route home for more than 50 years. Now, it seems that it has become too dangerous. That is intolerable and unacceptable in a modern part of the European Union.

When people are looking for reasons for the unrest, it is often pointed out that alcoholism and drug abuse are the problem. The word "criminality" is used glibly to explain almost anything that happens. Questions should be asked as to why families feel the need to go to other towns to do their shopping because they are too afraid to do it locally. That is not a good situation, and it must end.

Has anyone gone to the area to find out what the problem is and to find out how people feel about being in the spotlight constantly because their homes are attacked and their friends are beaten up, as happened again last week? The people to whom I have spoken have not been approached for their views. They are more than willing to talk, if only those people who took exception to them, their culture and their way of life, would engage with them. However, to date, they have not.

People in that beleaguered community ask for nothing more than to feel secure and to have a regular community police service that will protect them. Somebody asked why it is OK to bedeck their streets with flags, including those that are sometimes associated with loyalist paramilitary groups, but lynch mobs attack them when they fly the flag of Ireland on a day when their beloved Celtic Football Club is playing. Those are the kind of challenging questions that are being asked. Although we may not feel comfortable with those kinds of questions, we must think about them.

At present, local people have the telephone number for a police liaison officer. He is contacted to ensure that police come to their aid when strange cars descend on the neighbourhood or dogs begin barking incessantly in the middle of the night or, indeed, when their homes are attacked. There is a lack of resources, and that must be addressed.

I must say that I am disappointed that the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister has not agreed a way forward for the strategy for a shared future. With that kind of failure at the top, it is, dare I say, much more likely that there will be failure at ground level.

On a positive note, I want to mention the Workers' Educational Association (WEA) and to thank it for putting together a challenging training course that will help public representatives to develop leadership skills. Indeed, enrolment levels on that course have been healthy, not just from people in the Coleraine Borough Council area, but from those in the Limavady Borough Council area, the Ballymoney Borough Council area and the Moyle District Council area. Last night, we met the chief executive of the Community Relations Council. It is hoped that progress will begin to be made locally.

On Wednesday 23 September 2009, there will be a meeting with the junior Ministers in the Long Gallery, which other representatives and I have been invited to attend. Again, I keep my fingers crossed that the seriousness of the problem will be acknowledged and acted on sooner rather than later.

Recently, the principals of two local primary schools wrote to the First Minister and the deputy First Minister to seek help for their children. They were extremely disappointed with the reply that they received. They have written again to OFMDFM in the following terms:

“We have deep concerns over the extremely high tensions which are currently running in our community and how every indication shows that the situation is likely to continue for some time.

Our children are under threat, suffering emotionally and physically due to what is happening so it was with great disappointment we received your letter. Who else can we appeal to for help before this state of affairs gets even worse and another generation is tainted with bitterness and regret?

People in our community have stepped back 20 years and no-one appears to be concerned enough to do anything to address this problem and the fate of the children attending our schools.”

Those are not my words; they are the words of the principals of two local primary schools. They also happen to be same sentiments that people in the area to whom I spoke last Friday expressed. A young mother sitting with her beautiful three-year-old daughter echoed the opinions of the teachers of the schools that were turned down for funding.

I pay tribute to those schools that are involved in the Seven Schools project, which has been in operation for several years and which provides an opportunity for young people at post-primary schools to engage regularly in dialogue. Schools have included politics on their curriculums, and all of us have been given an opportunity to engage with young people.

Later this month, there will be a reception to mark the cutting of the sod for a new community centre. I wish to pay tribute to a community organisation in West Bann that has been at the forefront of addressing problems. I hope sincerely that its project will mark the beginning of a new era and dawn that the Assembly and other statutory agencies will support fully. That project is funded by the Department for Social Development and by Coleraine Borough Council.

I repeat my appeal to the First Minister and deputy First Minister to listen to the principals of local primary schools. The prediction that others may die if the issue is not addressed and if the people who are responsible for acts of sectarianism and bigotry are not dealt with is one that they will ignore at their peril.

The hate laws are totally inadequate to deal with the kind of bigoted behaviour that has afflicted Coleraine for too long. Toleration of sectarianism, which manifests itself in all its evil forms, should be brought to an end. Above all, there should be a realisation that no section of the community should have to run the gauntlet of sectarianism, irrespective of who causes it.

It has been 50 years since the curfew bell last rang in Coleraine, and God grant that it does not begin to ring again, because that is the road to no town, and it will bring only shame on all of us. Let us learn from the past and collectively begin a new period of history in which Coleraine will be sought out not for media sensation, but for a wonderful story of how divisions have passed and are gone for ever.

People in all communities are crying out for that to happen, and I am sure that we will hear other Members say the same. Most people in Coleraine are good, decent people who need the support of various agencies to address a problem that has sadly scarred the town, particularly in the past few months. I again thank the Business Committee for giving me the opportunity to debate the issue.

Mr Campbell: First, I acknowledge Mr Dallat’s securing the debate. As he outlined, this topic is very important. I wish to be brief; however, given the importance of the issue, I am sure that Members will forgive me if I develop my contribution a little.

Sectarianism in Coleraine and elsewhere is an issue that demands our utmost attention and all our endeavours to resolve. As Mr Dallat said, Mr McDaid’s killing was not only reprehensible, but it was condemned across the spectrum. I not only condemned that at the time — as I have done for all the other murders in all the time that I have been involved in politics — but, more than that, I called on anyone who might have any information to bring it to the police so that those who were responsible can be brought before the courts. I have said that repeatedly, and I have never sought to excuse, defend, or in any way exonerate those who were involved.

I made that call because the greatest disincentive for breaking the law is the rigour of the courts. Having established a long track record of making such calls, including after Mr McDaid’s murder in Coleraine, it was deeply unfortunate that the deputy First Minister criticised me in the media just after that killing and also that John O’Dowd criticised me in a debate earlier in this sitting. I am at a loss to understand why I would be the subject of such criticism when I have been so trenchant and vehement in my opposition to attacks of any kind on anyone. The only conclusion that I can draw is that my criticism of the media was the reason.

Mr McDaid’s killing, which I repeat was reprehensible and totally unacceptable, resulted in considerable media attention being focused on Coleraine and a very unfair portrayal being painted of much of the town because of problems that were surfacing in one small area there. In recent days, I have been critical of some of the mainstream media's coverage of other issues in Northern Ireland, but I commend the Belfast 'News Letter' for an article of 5 June 2009 that was published after considerable pressure from me. I asked for that article to be written after being inundated by the demands of not just a few dozen, but of hundreds of people, who e-mailed, wrote to me or came to my office wanting to know what could be done to change the wrongful perception of their town. Without exception, every one of those people condemned Mr McDaid's killing and said that the perception of their town was completely wrong and that they were being presented as sectarian madmen and bigots who kill each other. That is not the reality.

The population of Coleraine is between 75% and 80% Protestant. My office is in the town, and I represent the area. I have often seen people wearing sports tops that identify them as being from the nationalist community. There is no difficulty with that because it is the way that it ought to be. I just hope that we can get to a situation in towns that are 75% to 80% nationalist in which people can wear sports tops that identify them as being from the unionist community.

Thankfully, the 'News Letter' covered that side of Coleraine on 5 June 2009 and published a two-page spread that indicated the extent of some of the problems that Mr Dallat alluded to. In no way do those problems defend or justify Mr McDaid's killing, but they were problems that existed long before his death. They include drug dealing, theft, antisocial behaviour, attacks on businesses and people being driven from their homes. Other examples include a woman who had lived in the Heights for 54 years having to leave her home; a young man getting his jaw broken; and a woman who was wearing a Rangers top being attacked as she left the Heights. I publicised those attacks, and I make no apology for doing so.

Regardless of whether I am criticised, whether by the deputy First Minister, the Sinn Féin Member for Upper Bann or anyone else, I make no apology for saying that those incidents cannot be left to one side just because of Mr McDaid's reprehensible and unacceptable killing. The context of what was happening in the Heights area of Coleraine had to be portrayed accurately, given the one-sided impression that was given in much of the media coverage after Mr McDaid's murder.

I will end my remarks with a quotation from a heart-rending letter from a young woman who wanted to leave the Heights area of Coleraine:

"My five-year-old daughter is suffering. She frequently wets the bed when she hears noise outside the home. She is usually too scared to go to sleep. She frequently asks "Mummy, why do we have to live here?" My heartbroken reply is, "I cannot afford to live anywhere else." I work 34 hours a week on the minimum wage, receive no housing benefit and struggle to provide for us as it is. I have no other options available to me other than to wait for a housing transfer. We are scared and unable to get proper sleep at night, so we will end up sick as well as exhausted."

That is a quote from a lady who suffered intimidation. There is a litany of that sort of attack, criticism and verbal and physical intimidation in the Heights area. It has to be brought to an end, just as any attacks on any side of the community must be brought to an end. If there is any part that I or others can play, we ought to and will play that part to bring those attacks to an end.

12.15 am

Mr Brolly: Go raibh míle maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. After the murder of Kevin McDaid, go ndéana Dia trócaire air, I spent considerable time in Somerset Drive with his family and the residents, and I attended Kevin's funeral. Following my first visit to what was, for me, a different and very unhappy world, I drove home feeling a mixture of sadness, depression and anger that people should have to live, as those people have done for years, in the shadow of fear. Even worse, they are expected to accept that equality is not for them, and that a good, decent Coleraine man, such as Kevin McDaid, was second class and expendable because he was a Catholic.

I was present at two subsequent band parades in the area — those were hardly nationalist bands — and, in general, the bands behaved properly. However, a couple of people were clearly intent on demonstrating their hatred for the residents of Somerset Drive, and some hangers-on were particularly offensive, simply because Catholics were not welcome, even in that modest housing estate on the edge of Coleraine town.

As I considered what I had seen and heard, I began to wonder whether the naked aggressive sectarianism of those young, Protestant, unionist, loyalist men in the bands, and of those who follow the bands, was merely the overt and ugly manifestation of a pandemic sectarian disease in that town. Are the young men who are prepared to attack, maim and kill Catholics just because they are Catholics worse than the respectable, clean-handed citizens who subtly and insidiously nurture sectarianism, but who wash their clean hands, like Pontius Pilate, when atrocities are committed, as they would say, in their names?

Where do we start to eliminate that disease? Do we start with the young, thoughtless, sectarian thugs, or with those outwardly respectable citizens, including some politicians, whose deeply injured, but thinly veiled, sectarianism is encouraged by the privilege and power that it helps them to win and maintain?

I do not need to be told that sectarianism is not confined to the Protestant community. However, in Coleraine, it is the Protestant population that must begin to come to terms with the existence of a considerable Catholic, nationalist community and its wars.

Mr Campbell: The Member is alluding to the issue in Coleraine, as that is the subject of the Adjournment debate. However, does he accept that the Catholic community in Coleraine is significantly larger than the Protestant community in Dungiven, the town that he represents and in which he lives?

Mr Brolly: Yes, I accept that. I made the point that there is a significant Catholic community in Coleraine and that that has to receive greater acknowledgement.

In contrast to the anecdotal evidence from the letter that the Member read, at the time of Kevin McDaid's murder, and in the days and weeks following it, the unionist version of the Ulster flag that was hanging from a house in Somerset Drive was not interfered with.

That is heartening. Sadly, I am not hopeful that Coleraine will be completely cured in a hurry. I am reminded of the old rhyme about Belfast, of which the final couplet reads:

"It's to hell with the future and live on the past:

May the Lord in His mercy be kind to Belfast."

We should add Coleraine to that.

Mr McClarty: I am happy to contribute to tonight's debate. Unlike any other contributor, I was born and grew up in Coleraine. Indeed, I still live there. As a public representative, I am proud of the good record of positive community relations in Coleraine. I am proud of how people from all backgrounds work together for the good of Coleraine as a whole.

I accept that there is a problem with sectarianism in Coleraine. However, I say to the Member who secured the debate, to all Members, and to everyone in Northern Ireland that Coleraine has a problem that it shares with all of Northern Ireland. Sectarianism is not the sole possession, as Mr Brolly would have us believe, of the unionist/loyalist community. Mr Campbell outlined some sectarian incidents that have occurred in the Killowen area in recent times. Sectarianism is a two-way street, and, unfortunately, it is alive and well in both communities, not only in Coleraine, but throughout Northern Ireland. That is hardly a surprise, given that we live in a country that segregates —

Mr F McCann: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. Francie Brolly said that he recognises that sectarianism affects both communities. The Member is wrong to say that Mr Brolly only pointed out sectarianism that exists in the unionist community; he spoke about sectarianism in both communities.

Mr McClarty: His examples were entirely those of the unionist community against the nationalist community.

Mr Speaker: Did Mr McCann want to make an intervention?

Mr F McCann: I wanted to raise, as a point of order, that Mr McClarty misquoted Francie Brolly.

Mr Speaker: I was trying to help the Member. That is not a point of order; it is more a point of information.

Mr McClarty: It is hardly a surprise that sectarianism exists in Northern Ireland, given that we segregate children at the age of four, solely on the basis of their parents' religious affiliation. That is hardly news, because divisions between Protestants and Catholics have been a feature of life here for 500 years since the reformation. Indeed, many republicans and nationalists speak about 800 years of oppression. Given the history of this part of the world, it is not news that there are sectarian divisions in our society, hence the need to work for a shared future and to reduce and remove the division and bitterness in our midst.

My aim as a public representative, and as an Ulster Unionist, is to achieve a position in which this Province can live without sectarianism. I want to see an end to sectarianism and everything that goes with it in Coleraine and everywhere else. Events in recent months have provided sobering evidence of sectarian attitudes in the whole Province: the death of Kevin McDaid, which I have unreservedly condemned on several occasions; the murder of Constable Stephen Carroll; the murder of the two soldiers, Sapper Mark Quinsey and Sapper Patrick Azimkar; attacks on police officers and their families; riots on our streets; and intimidation of people from all sections of our community out of their homes.

All of that has brought into sharp focus the problem that we have in Northern Ireland, and it should have underlined the supreme importance of getting to the core of sectarianism and tackling it.

That task is not helped by the continued delay, and, now, the public bickering, between the DUP and Sinn Féin on the cohesion, sharing and integration strategy. The lack of that strategy is hindering the Executive and those in the community who are making it their business to try to change attitudes and make Northern Ireland a better place. Public squabbles over who wants what document to be adopted are juvenile and deeply unhelpful. Our Executive should be better than that. Our First Minister and our deputy First Minister should be better than that.

There are a wide variety of cross-community groups and bodies in Coleraine, including sports clubs, cultural groups and amateur dramatics societies. Those groups are a testament to how united the town's community is compared with similar towns in Northern Ireland. My party and I condemn all criminal acts, whether sectarian or otherwise. I have worked all my political life to bring people together and to try to ease tensions where they have arisen.

People must be responsible for their actions. We all have a choice in what we say and do. I want a community that is at ease with itself, in which diversity is respected and, indeed, welcomed. The overwhelming majority of people in Coleraine are committed to mutual respect and tolerance, and, as a public representative, I am proud of that. However, all of us in Northern Ireland have to confront the reality of sectarianism. That means that we urgently need the cohesion, sharing and integration strategy.

Dr Farry: Good morning, Mr Speaker; we are in unprecedented territory.

I am honoured and privileged to be able to speak in this Adjournment debate as one who does not represent the East Londonderry constituency but who, nonetheless, recognises the critical importance of the issues that we are discussing at this late hour. I commend John Dallat for securing the debate.

I have pleasure in following on from Mr McClarty's comments and concur with the vast majority of what he has said. Although I am not from the Coleraine area, I have family in-laws in that part of the world, and I agree with what Mr McClarty said about the attractiveness of Coleraine, the qualities of the majority of the people there and the good cross-community work, formal and informal, that takes place in the area.

That said, we have an underlying problem with sectarianism across this society. A large and growing number of people are working across divides to try to build a shared future to move society forward, to build stability and to grow the economy. However, the persistence of divisions is still causing considerable problems in society, including deeply ingrained sectarian, racist and homophobic tendencies, which must be tackled.

I condemn, in the strongest possible terms, the events that took place in Coleraine over the summer and since then, including, in particular, the murder of Kevin McDaid. What happened in Coleraine has the potential to break out anywhere in Northern Ireland, which is why I am speaking in a general sense. We must learn lessons from that situation as fully as we possibly can. The people of Coleraine should not be singled out; but that is where the problems are most obvious at the moment.

12.30 am

Sectarianism is a cancer, and it has been fashioned and increased in our society over the past century. I disagree slightly with Mr McClarty in that I think it has waxed and waned over the past several hundred years. There have been times when there have been better relationships between people from different traditions in our society, but things have been worse in recent years.

I will highlight three points about the way forward. First, there is a clear need for a policy on good relations, whether it is a shared future policy or a cohesion, sharing and integration strategy. It is not enough for politicians to condemn sectarian acts and point to individual actions happening in local areas. Sectarianism is a Northern Ireland-wide problem, and we need leadership from the top as well as activity at community level.

We need a clear vision of the kind of society we are working towards; we need a strategy for achieving that, and we need a delivery plan. Those three elements need to be contained in documentation and policies coming from the Executive. I do not want to dwell any further on the particular disputes that we have seen over the past months and that have been particularly highlighted over the past week. That is a debate for another day.

Secondly, within the strategy, one particular issue needs to be considered, and it is not reflected in either version of the two documents that we have seen so far. There is a need for some form of early warning system, whereby public agencies, including the Executive, are alerted to potential flare ups in communities, particularly in areas that have not been traditional interface zones or flashpoints until the point at which trouble breaks out. If people pay very close attention, there can be signs that situations merit early intervention to try to calm tensions.

The third issue is how public displays of flags and emblems are dealt with, which tends to happen in an unregulated matter and is clearly the source of tensions. What happened in Coleraine bears this out, and it should be tackled by a future Executive policy. There is a time and place for the proper use of a flag as a sovereign indicator of a society. Flags are also used to intimidate and to mark territory. That inevitably creates tensions, with people sometimes objecting to flags being imposed on them. There needs to be a better system for dealing with flags. The current flags protocol needs to be reviewed urgently and well ahead of next summer.

Arising from that, there needs to be a clearer policy on encouraging shared space and protecting and defending shared space. Having stressed the importance of shared space, I am not saying that it needs to be neutral space in which any scope for cultural traditions is eliminated. People have the right to express themselves and their cultural identity. However, it must be done in a manner that does not create tensions or undermine other people's rights. That could lead to a very damaging situation, not just to community relations, but to the physical welfare of individuals, and ultimately, as we have seen in Coleraine, to the death of an innocent man. There are clear lessons to be learned, and I welcome the debate, albeit at a very late hour.

Mr G Robinson: I condemn sectarianism in all its forms, and from wherever it comes. I commit fully to the task of eliminating it. I want to portray a more balanced debate on what is really happening in Coleraine.

Coleraine has always been a town that has enjoyed good community relations. That was especially true of the Heights and Killowen areas over many years, in which both sections of the community worked and lived in harmony.

There has been extremely negative media coverage of Coleraine this year as a result of the brutal murder of Kevin McDaid. As any right-thinking person should do, I totally and unreservedly condemn that murder. Unfortunately, it has marked an historic low point in negative impressions of Coleraine. The media seem happy to overlook reality, and the truth must now be exposed. We also need to take consideration of the fact that there are antisocial behaviour and drugs problems among a small element in the Heights area that blight the everyday lives of both communities there.

On the same night as the McDaid murder, a young Protestant man was savagely beaten as he walked home alone. He sustained serious injuries, including a smashed cheekbone, and required hospitalisation. The wearing of a Rangers top is no justification for such a brutal and savage beating. Having met that young man and his family, I am in absolutely no doubt that the attack was purely sectarian.

Last week, yet another Protestant family were forced to flee their home in the Heights area as a result of persistent attacks, damage to property and subjection to verbal abuse. That is the latest example of some Protestants being targeted in what amounts to a hate campaign that is being carried out by a very small number of nationalists in the Heights area; I reiterate that it is a very small number. I condemn attacks on any homes, and I condemn the people who lead and carry out sectarian attacks.

I recently dealt with a Protestant-owned business in the Heights area that has been forced to relocate. That business's staff members were subjected to threats; property was destroyed at every available opportunity; and there was a threat to burn the property if the people did not leave. Some customers were spat upon, and some refrained from using the business through fear for their personal safety. Vehicles belonging to the business were stoned, and employees were verbally abused at every opportunity. Some employees were victims of false complaints that led to their arrest by police; all were released without charge.

I must point out that that firm employs both Roman Catholics and Protestants. Therefore, the small number of people who jeopardised employment, simply because the firm was Protestant-owned, can be described only as sectarian. The business did not receive one penny in compensation for a move to new premises that cost thousands of pounds. I totally condemn the behaviour of the bully boys. I hope that my contribution has given Members a balanced picture of events in Coleraine.

Sectarianism is wrong wherever it comes from, but the truth of the situation in Coleraine is vastly different from the picture that some Members wish to paint. I am sure that Mr Dallat, who introduced the Adjournment debate, is aware of the sectarianism in his home town of Kilrea, which is displayed in the flying of tricolours to antagonise the Protestant population. If some Members put more effort into stopping sectarianism in Coleraine and throughout Northern Ireland, all communities would be better served.

The junior Minister (Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister) (Mr G Kelly): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank John Dallat for securing the Adjournment debate, and I am glad of the opportunity to contribute to it. As other Members have expressed, I, too, am very deeply and publicly opposed to all forms of sectarianism and hate crime. The tragic murder of Mr Kevin McDaid was an abhorrent act of needless violence and wanton destruction of human life. Damien Fleming, who was attacked and badly injured on the same day in May on which Kevin McDaid was killed, was recently released from hospital only to be subjected to yet another brutal attack. I probably speak on behalf of everyone here in wholeheartedly condemning that further assault.

However, as a number of Members have said, words of condemnation are not enough. We must act and demonstrate, by word and deed, that the ideas that underpin sectarianism, racism and homophobic hate crime are not acceptable in our society. It is a matter of record that the context of the attack on that section of the Coleraine community was an Old Firm football match, when a number of Irish tricolours were erected.

As was pointed out, Coleraine is predominantly, but not exclusively, a unionist town. One of the most telling statements that I heard immediately after the attack was from a contributor to a radio programme who asked: "What did they expect would happen?" I am sure that that person gave little thought to their casual throwaway comment, but it was an articulation of how sectarianism is accepted or excused in our society. A group of Catholic residents was attacked and a man died, because flags had been erected. Such attacks are not acceptable and cannot be excused.

It is neither acceptable nor understandable that someone should be attacked because of their religion, political opinion or national allegiance. Neither is it acceptable nor understandable that a church or community hall is attacked. It is also not acceptable to attack someone who is from a different racial group or because of their sexuality. What is to be expected is that people should be treated with respect. Each of us is entitled to be held in equal value. The people who carried out the attack in Coleraine, and those who carry out similar attacks, do not accept that other identities are of equal value to theirs or that their victims have equal rights and entitlements. In the eyes of bigots, other people are reduced to stereotypes that can be dismissed and rejected.

The concept of equality, equal value and equal rights is central to tackling sectarianism and other forms of hate crime. It goes straight to the core of the beliefs that underpin such attacks. In the Programme for Government, the Executive gave a specific commitment to the promotion of equality and enforcement of rights as the framework for promoting cohesion, sharing and integration. We have sought to put that approach into practice in our work in Coleraine.

However, as several Members mentioned, everyone must acknowledge the scale of the problem and act to address it. At a recent meeting, the PSNI stated that there had been a 95·1% increase in hate crime in the Coleraine area. Ironically, at the same time, it recorded a 15% decrease in antisocial behaviour.

In a statement on 20 May 2009, the First Minister and deputy First Minister offered support to help to reduce tensions in the area. On 16 June 2009, Jeffrey Donaldson, who was the other junior Minister at the time, and I met elected members from all political parties in Coleraine and representatives from statutory bodies, including the PSNI, the NIO community safety unit, and the Department for Social Development neighbourhood renewal. Also present were youth providers, council officers, Housing Executive officials, and representatives from the Victims' Commission and a peace reconciliation group. The purpose of the meeting was to discuss the problems in Coleraine and how we could support any responses. It was an extremely useful meeting for everyone, and it was made clear that the intention was to explore the ways in which all public services could work together effectively to reduce tensions and improve matters in the area for the community most affected.

Tomorrow, junior Minister Newton and I will meet that group again. We asked Roger Wilson, the chief executive of Coleraine Borough Council, to submit a longer-term strategy to address the causes of tension in Coleraine and to provide details of additional resources to support youth diversionary activities. Those issues will be discussed tomorrow, and the group will continue to meet thereafter.

In addition to discussing and planning how to tackle sectarianism, we have moved to deliver resources in the area. This year, OFMDFM is providing approximately £86,000 to Coleraine Borough Council for its activities to promote good relations. Over and above that, we have provided £23,000 to the council for its summer diversionary work. Those moneys included funding for a cross-community children's camp at Corrymeela in July for residents in the Heights area; a diversionary event for young people that coincided with a loyalist band parade shortly after the death of Mr McDaid; and a dialogue and engagement programme that was aimed at community leaders and addressed issues of culture, identity and diversity.

Alongside that additional work, other work streams have been taken forward: the community safety partnerships have funded a street intervention programme to tackle antisocial behaviour; the local council funded two community festivals targeting both sections of the community in the Heights area; and the gap project, which is a collaborative programme operated by local churches, is a 26-week pilot scheme that offers a drop-in facility and engagement with the local communities. Through neighbourhood renewal, the sports and community centre in the Heights is being extended and refurbished in an ambitious capital programme.

However, we cannot afford to be complacent, nor will we be. Genuine issues remain to be addressed. Sectarian attacks on property and people have been carried out in the locality, reports have been received of widespread intimidation across communities, and loyalists have issued death threats to the McDaid family and witnesses to the attacks. Therefore, much remains to be done at all levels.

I acknowledge that the initiatives that I outlined are short term and reactive in nature. Neither OFMDFM nor those of us sitting in the Assembly can end sectarianism in Coleraine or elsewhere. Only the people can do that. However, we can support local people along the path of ending sectarianism. Moreover, we can lead by example through demonstrating respect for each other, sharing our history and developing a common agenda. That will happen when we recognise that we enter the Chamber from different backgrounds and with different experiences and aspirations. However, we enter as equals with equal rights and entitlements, and we share the common agenda of delivering a better society.

12.45 am

I am passionate about tackling sectarianism wherever it arises. As several Members said, the problem is not restricted to Coleraine. The biggest contribution that each of us can make is to challenge sectarianism and to promote equality and understanding in our constituencies, because that is where we can exercise maximum influence. I need go no further than my North Belfast constituency to find an example of an area that has witnessed the worst effects of sectarianism. It is important to state, however, that North Belfast has taken the best and biggest steps to tackle the generational scourge of sectarianism.

OFMDFM will continue to work with community and civic leaders in Coleraine to support and resource their work. I hope that the legacy of all our endeavours will be no more deaths or injuries as a result of sectarianism. Go raibh maith agat.

Adjourned at 12.46 am.

NORTHERN IRELAND ASSEMBLY

Monday 28 September 2009

The Assembly met at 12.00 noon (Mr Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

ASSEMBLY BUSINESS

Mr Campbell: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. Last Tuesday, 22 September, business in the Assembly was very protracted. I participated in an important Adjournment debate that, according to the Official Report, concluded at 12.46 am on Wednesday morning. I understand that elements of the speech by the Member who tabled the Adjournment topic appeared on a television station's news website in advance of the commencement of the debate. I know that attempts were made through the usual channels earlier in the evening, quite understandably, to reschedule Assembly business on that day because the Second Stage of the Department of Justice Bill had taken some time. Will you examine whether the sequence of events is as I have outlined, Mr Speaker, and, having done so, indicate to Members that, in future, any advance publication of speeches will not be allowed to have adverse implications for the scheduling of Assembly business?

Mr Speaker: I thank the Member for his point of order, and I hear what he is saying. He should allow me to reflect on what he has said and to read the Hansard report. I will either come back to the House or to the Member directly on the matter.

During last Monday's sitting, Mr Basil McCrea asked for guidance on remarks that the First Minister made about the relationship between the Assembly and Ministers. In my response, I stressed that it was a complex matter that is not easily dealt with under points of order. In fact, it is impossible to do so under points of order. Given its complexity, I continue to examine the issue. I will consider whether it may require any further action by me, or by any other body. In the meantime, what is certain is that the Assembly has never asserted that it has the power to direct Ministers. Even if it has such a power, its limits and extension have not been tested. Therefore, we shall continue to operate on that basis. Once again, I ask Members to raise such complex matters with me outside the Chamber rather than as points of order. Members on all sides of the House know that the issues that were raised by the First Minister are complex and neither will nor could be dealt with under points of order.

Suspension of Standing Orders

Lord Morrow: I beg to move

That Standing Orders 10(2) to 10(4) be suspended for 28 September 2009.

Mr Speaker: Before I put the Question, I remind Members that the motion requires cross-community support.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved (with cross-community support):

That Standing Orders 10(2) to 10(4) be suspended for 28 September 2009.

Mr Speaker: As there are Ayes from all sides of the House and there are no dissenting voices, I am satisfied that cross-community support has been demonstrated. Today's sitting may go beyond 7.00 pm, if required.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT

Winter Services around Rural Schools

Mr Speaker: I have received notice from the Minister for Regional Development that he wishes to make a statement on the outcome of the examination of winter services around rural schools.

The Minister for Regional Development (Mr Murphy): Following completion of the examination that I requested of the operational response by Roads Service in areas around rural schools that were affected by adverse weather conditions last winter, I wish to make a statement.

The purpose of my statement is to present the findings of the examination and to outline the improvements that I will make to Roads Service's winter policy as a result of those findings. I will first give a brief overview of the background leading up to the examination, the weather conditions experienced last winter and details of the difficulties faced by some rural schools. Secondly, I will outline the options that were considered and the changes that I have asked Roads Service to implement in time for this winter.

After severe wintry conditions were experienced across the North at the start of December 2008, the Regional Development Committee requested a review of Roads Service's winter service policy and criteria. The Committee expressed concern that schoolchildren in rural areas had to travel on icy roads to schools. Indeed, some schools had to close for a short time during that period.

Although I declined to initiate a full review of Roads Service's winter service policy and criteria, I asked Roads Service to examine the operational response to areas around schools and to report its findings to me. I did not request a full review because I believe that Roads Service's current policy of targeting limited resources on roads with relatively high traffic volumes where salt is most effective and benefits most road users is sound, particularly in the current economic climate.

The examination that I ordered was carried out by Roads Service's winter service working group, every member of which has substantial experience in the planning and delivery of winter services. Each of the group's divisional representatives serves as a winter service controller.

The main characteristic of the weather that caused the problems at the start of December 2008 was the occurrence of late-morning rain showers on a consecutive number of very cold days during which there was often no thaw. That resulted in widespread ice on the entire network, including major elements of the treated network. Most areas were affected for approximately a week, but it was recognised that the freeze varied from place to place and that the overlapping period across the North stretched from 1 December to 19 December 2008.

The likely return frequency of that sort of weather is difficult to determine, but is considered to be approximately once in 12 years. The same frequency would also apply to the extent to which the winter service experienced problems with the amount of salt needed and the number of treatments applied during the 2008-09 season. For example, in 2008-09, 82,500 tons of salt was used to treat the network; almost 60% more than in previous years. Overall, the operation cost £6.8 million; some £2.6 million more than in previous years.

The weather pattern resulted in periods of up to five consecutive days with prolonged ice problems, which had a greater than usual impact on the untreated network. It is recognised that some rural schools faced significant difficulties because of their locations off the salted network. The examination found that during the period of severe wintry weather, just over 90% of the 250 rural schools stayed open. Despite having received between one and five secondary treatments, 23 schools closed for between a half-day and three days. Almost 20% of rural schools — a total of 46 — had absenteeism levels of more than 20% on occasions during that period.

Of the 23 schools that had closures in the December study period, 10 did not have any other closures during the later periods of, primarily, snow problems in January and early February 2009. However, 21 other schools were affected by those later incidents. Notwithstanding all that information, most rural schools that were surveyed had grit piles or salt boxes along their frontages and along connecting roads to the salted network. Unscheduled secondary treatment was also carried out at 47 of the 162 schools that were surveyed.

The review group looked at a number of opportunities for improvement and narrowed those down to four options, which I was asked to consider. Option 1 was for priority secondary salting for the 23 schools most affected by the weather conditions in December 2008. It involved preparing lists of all the problem school sites for each section office area and, when implementing any secondary salting actions for ice conditions, ensuring that a connecting route to each school from the main salted network is given as high a priority as possible. That option would target rural schools that had to close due to ice conditions last December.

Option 2 was for enhanced communication and priority secondary salting for the 44 schools most affected by weather conditions throughout the winter of 2008-09. That involved preparing lists of schools with particular difficulties for each section area and providing their management with Roads Service contact names and telephone numbers to improve communication and to ensure that problem areas are identified at the earliest possible opportunity. Option 2 targeted rural schools that had to close due to ice or snow problems last winter.

Option 3 was for additional salt boxes and salt/grit piles for all rural schools. It involved amending the criteria and scoring mechanism in the winter service policy for the consideration of placing salt boxes and grit piles to ensure that grit piles are provided at the nearest connecting route to all rural schools and that a salt box is provided adjacent to each school entrance.

Option 4 was for formalised secondary salting for 23 schools. It involved formalising secondary salting routes to link affected rural schools to the salted network and would be included in winter service plans as an action to be initiated when frost or ice is expected in a relevant area.

Having considered the options, I have decided that option 2 presents the most cost-effective way to deal with the problem. It involves enhanced communications and priority secondary salting for the 44 schools most affected by weather conditions throughout the winter of 2008-09. The approach is likely to have a wider positive impact on affected schools. It should lead to more frequent reports and, thereby, to more secondary actions to rural schools that closed due to either the December 2008 ice problems or the later snow problems in January and February 2009.

I also propose to enhance that option, so that if Roads Service staff become aware of ice or snow in areas that are adjacent to the targeted schools, they should act immediately and not wait to be contacted by the schools. I appreciate that, over time, the list of sites that benefit from this action will change to include more schools and to deal with the random way that adverse weather can affect different schools at different times.

I also propose to implement a slight variation of option 3, which was to amend the criteria for the provision of grit/salt piles and salt bins, so that, if requested, they can be provided to affected schools. Implementing those additional measures will help schools to avoid closures and high absentee levels during future adverse weather conditions in a cost-effective manner. I am now pleased to take Members' questions. Go raibh míle maith agat.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Regional Development (Mr Cobain): I thank the Minister for his statement on the review. Is he content that the measures that he has announced will solve all the problems with respect to rural schools? How will the measures help children in rural areas to get to school? Is he content that there are adequate funds in his departmental budget to cover the cost of the measures that he has announced today?

The Minister for Regional Development: Last year, there was a particular focus on the conditions that pertained in December and in January and February.

The focus of Members and society in general was on rural schools, so I asked the Department to carry out a fairly intensive consultation, particularly with the affected schools, but also with rural schools generally to get some sense of the type of problems that people experienced.

The Member is quite right to point out that the budget to address all those issues is limited. It is clear that 80% of traffic is on roads that have been treated, and to increase that figure to 90% would double, approximately, the cost of treatment. In the current, or any, economic climate, that would be a difficult choice to make. Therefore, within limited resources, the option that I have chosen will provide a degree of flexibility and will ensure that schools that have suffered due to closure and disruption in the past are targeted through communication or, indeed, if there is an expectation of that type of weather, automatically. Moreover, there will be flexibility to allow other schools that suffer to benefit, because we cannot be certain, geographically, where adverse weather will impact. Therefore, if the need arises, other schools can be brought on board. To ensure that schools are treated, we will create a line of communication between rural schools and local Roads Service managers.

Providing schools with salting facilities will also help the situation. Not every road across the region can be salted, and the Member knows the costs associated with such a policy. However, this is an attempt to try to resolve the particular issue for rural schools. Should conditions this winter or next reveal that this type of approach is not achieving satisfactory results, I will, if I am still in office, initiate a further review, cost it and bring it forward during future discussions on the Budget.

Mr Speaker: I remind the whole House that the questions on a ministerial statement are intended to facilitate holding the Minister and the Executive to account. It is not the time for making statements or for asking questions with long introductions.

A large number of Members want to ask questions on the statement, so I ask Members to keep to the convention of asking one question on the statement and to ensure that it relates to the statement. If we adhere to those conventions, we will have time for all the questions.

Miss McIlveen: I welcome the Minister's statement. He selected option 2. Was his decision based purely on considerations of cost? The report identified the 44 schools most affected by weather conditions in the winter of 2008-09. Will the Minister tell us the areas in which those schools are located?

I beg the Speaker's indulgence. The Minister stated that the provision of grit piles and salt bins would be changed. Will he elaborate on that?

The Minister for Regional Development: Option 2 was more expensive than option 1. My decision was not, therefore, made strictly on the basis of cost. Rather, I was trying to find the most flexible and effective option. If we encounter similar weather conditions this winter, that will test whether this approach works.

I do not have the list to hand, but I will ensure that the Member is provided with a list of the 44 schools that suffered particular problems and expressed a desire for particular treatment.

Formerly, criteria had to be met for the provision of salt boxes. However, we have adopted a more flexible approach. If a school requests provision of salt boxes, the request will be met.

Mr Boylan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I welcome the Minister's statement. Obviously, he has been much lobbied, especially in the constituency that we both represent. He has been lobbied, in particular, by Clady Primary School, which faced adverse conditions last year.

During his review, did the Minister consider speaking with rural companies, farmers or the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development about the possibility of them providing additional support to Roads Service's gritting procedures?

The Minister for Regional Development: I discussed the matter with Michelle Gildernew, the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development.

The Member knows that farmers are already involved, through contracts, to clear snow from roads. We examined whether that work could be built on to include salting and gritting. However, the matter was not pursued for a number of reasons. First, it would significantly increase the amount of salting and, therefore, the cost of the operation. Salting done in a piecemeal way is less efficient and more expensive than using large-capacity gritters. Secondly, there are problems of command and control, of contacting all the farmers and telling them when to grit. There is also the likelihood of discontinuous treatment, with roads being salted for several miles but the treatment discontinued without any warning to the motorist. We would have to rely on people contracted to come out and to be available.

All those factors led us to conclude that the work is better done by Roads Service. Farmers will continue to be involved in snow-clearance operations wherever such conditions pertain. As I have said, we explored the option with the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development (DARD).

Mr Gallagher: I welcome the Minister's news. It is some help that the statement recognises that there are problems for some primary schools in rural and isolated areas.

My question is when those schools will know? Identifying schools with difficulties is one thing, but there are some problem areas. Does the Minister recognise the difficulties of Boa in County Fermanagh, where children from that area attend three or four different schools, yet it is the area in Fermanagh that is most affected by severe weather?

The Minister for Regional Development: Through contact and discussion with schools, the examination was targeted at schools that had had difficulty opening or had lost days last winter to ensure that they did not suffer the same problems this year. There is a communication system through which schools can make contact, and local Roads Service operators will know whether there is a problem in the vicinity of those schools that should be treated. It is two-way: schools can make contact to say that they have a problem, and they will then receive secondary treatment; or, under the general secondary treatment schedule, operators will know about the situation in certain areas.

The Member made a point about specific areas. If roads in his locality have a heavy volume of traffic, the local divisional office will be happy to carry out an assessment. Roads come onto the schedule every year as traffic volumes increase, which is why the cost of winter gritting is increasing. Traffic volume is increasing, which brings certain roads above the criteria and allows them to be included. If the Member feels that specific roads in Fermanagh merit consideration, I invite him to bring them to the attention of the local divisional office.

Mr McCarthy: I welcome the document. Will the Minister furnish me with a list of the 44 schools mentioned? I am sure that other Members want to know the locations of the 44 schools.

In the proposal to enhance option 2, for which the Minister has gone, Roads Service staff would become aware of ice that is adjacent to targeted schools. Is the Minister confident that, when local Roads Service personnel are informed of this fact, they will carry out their functions and will not say, with reluctance, that they can do so only by removing the service from elsewhere?

The Minister for Regional Development: The review was carried out with Roads Service and with people who are involved in the winter gritting service across every division. The options were discussed with them and with the schools. The 44 schools to which I referred — I will get the list for the Member — are those that reported having problems last year. That is how the list was drawn up: contact was made with all rural schools, and those 44 schools reported problems. Those schools will be added to the general list of secondary treatment for certain areas, either through schools contacting Roads Service to make it aware of a problem and asking it to come out, or, if the general area is being treated, Roads Service will know to do that, and that area will be added onto its schedules.

Mr Bresland: How much legal responsibility do school staff have for gritting the roads around the schools?

The Minister for Regional Development: It is not down to a question of legal responsibility. A number of schools will have salt boxes provided to them, or there will be grit piles on some of the rural routes, which people can use if they feel it necessary; I do not think that there is a legal obligation on them to do that.

The amendment to the policy is that, where previously schools were automatically given salt boxes only if they passed a certain threshold, it is now the case that, if schools request them, they will receive them. The schools must spread the salt, but I do not think that that brings a legal responsibility.

Mr McCartney: Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a ráiteas ar maidin. I welcome the Minister's statement and his answers to date.

Will the Minister outline how he intends to bring the new proposals to the attention of the schools and the local communities that they undoubtedly affect?

The Minister for Regional Development: Roads Service has been in contact with all rural schools, and those communications ought to continue. Although the policy will examine the 44 schools that were affected last year, flexibility is built in should other schools experience problems. Roads Service will want to maintain that level of direct communication with the schools.

As regards making the change in policy more widely known in general, the first intention was to deliver the statement to the Assembly. The Member will know that the report, including the options that we considered and the choice that we made, has been delivered to the Committee for Regional Development. Roads Service officials will brief the Committee and take questions this week. I will talk to the Department about making the change to the winter service operation more widely known.

Mr G Robinson: Although the provision of grit piles and salt boxes is welcome, does the Minister agree that, particularly on footpaths leading to schools, it is unfair to depend on the goodwill of a member of the public or school staff? Roads Service staff have the knowledge that is required, so they would be the most cost-effective way of deploying the resources in grit piles and salt boxes.

The Minister for Regional Development: From his time in the Regional Development Committee, the Member will know that there is a finite resource available for doing all this, and we are trying to find the most cost-effective way of achieving a good result for rural schools. People are relied on to use grit piles and salt boxes, and they usually request that the piles or boxes are situated on routes along the road or in and around schools for that express purpose.

The Member will be aware that Roads Service made an attempt to reach an agreement with local councils in respect of footpath gritting. Only one of the 26 councils expressed an interest in becoming involved in footpath-gritting arrangements with Roads Service. Roads Service's road-gritting schedule covers roads that are used by 80% of daily traffic, and to expand that to cover footpaths would involve substantial resources, which Roads Service does not have. The purpose of the chosen option is to try to make an improvement, having learned the lessons from last year. If this winter is as severe as last, the operation of the new policy will be tested and we will see whether more substantial resources are required to deal with it in the future. If that is the case, it will be a matter for discussion at Budget time.

Mr Kinahan: I thank the Minister for his statement. In particular, I welcome his choice of option 2 and the flexibility that it provides. However, what action will be taken to ensure that he will have flexibility and the chance to make an urgent response? Given that cold periods tend to happen everywhere on the same day and that more than 44 schools will be affected, what action will he take to ensure that the phone lines do not jam and that things are dealt with urgently?

The Minister for Regional Development: Even last year's cold weather, when there was a prolonged period of icy weather in December and a period of snow in January and into February, was localised. In discussions with the Met Office, we were told that it is expected that such conditions will occur once every 12 years. The scenario that the Member outlined, in which an entire region is beset with that type of severe weather, is rare. Under such circumstances, Roads Service would certainly struggle to get that type of response.

The purpose of the examination was to try to focus on some of the schools to which for a variety of reasons, such as their locality or surrounding terrain, approach was more difficult than other rural schools. Representatives from 250 rural schools were spoken to and 44 had had problems. That showed that the majority can continue to operate, even in severe winter weather. We have to focus in and around the schools that need assistance. The type of scenario suggested by the Member would overwhelm the entire network, probably, but we do not expect that to occur.

Flexibility is built into the option, as the Member acknowledges, and it will be tested over the next number of winters. If it is found not to be sufficient to do the job that we have set out to do, we will need more resources, and that will be discussed when the Budget is being agreed.

Mr O'Loan: I would also like to receive a list of the 44 schools, as, I am sure, would all Members. The wording of option 2 seems to place a lot of the initiative on the schools. In many cases, that might be too late in the day. Will the Minister ensure that Roads Service takes a proactive approach and that the primary responsibility to identify the necessary action, and take that action, rests with Roads Service?

As the Minister knows, extreme conditions on rural roads can occur on a random basis but can cause immense local difficulty. Will he write to Roads Service and say that he actively encourages it to use its discretion, within its resources, to take action to deal with local problems when they emerge, which cause, as he knows, immense local hardship?

12.30 pm

The Minister for Regional Development: With respect to the Member's question about communication, the Department added that to option 2 because the onus was on schools to make contact with Roads Service, and, depending on the circumstances, that may have been difficult for some schools to do.

The first salting run is usually completed by 7.00 am, meaning that the gritting lorries are generally back at the depot at that time and are ready to begin working on secondary routes. That allows time for those who arrive early at the schools, such as the principals or the people who open the schools, to contact Roads Service if there is a problem with the area around a school. However, built into the gritting schedule is the mechanism for Roads Service to treat the roads around any of the 44 identified schools if a general problem is discovered in an area.

With respect to the Member's question about localised problems; I live in a rural area and on a C-class road, and I am very aware that small, localised problems can occur. However, a certain volume of traffic is required to travel over the salt in order for the solution that treats the ice and frost to be activated. Salt is ineffective if it is put down on roads that are very lightly used. I have always encouraged, and will continue to encourage, Roads Service to be as flexible as it can, within its limited resources, to ensure that particular problems in local areas are dealt with.

Mr W Clarke: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I also thank the Minister for his statement and for his proposals. I raised the issue at a meeting of the Committee for Regional Development after receiving a considerable number of calls from constituents. I am, therefore, pleased that the Minister has taken action.

Another major issue, which is perhaps outside the scope of today's announcement, is that rural businesses are affected by adverse weather conditions. It is a particular problem in my constituency where a number of restaurants and hotels lost bookings in the run-up to Christmas last year, which severely impacted on their businesses. Will the Minister examine those issues too?

The Minister for Regional Development: The focus of the review I have announced today concerns the gritting of roads around rural schools. As I said, the issue not only raises concerns about children's safety as they travel to school, it has an impact on the economy, as parents are forced to take the day off work to look after their children when the schools close.

In an answer to a previous question, I made it clear that the gritting schedule has changed, over time, and that more roads have been added to the schedule each year because of increasing volumes of traffic. However, if the Member feels that there are businesses in his area that are attracting a substantial volume of traffic, he should ask his local Roads Service office to reassess the roads on which those businesses are situated and determine whether they meet the criteria to be included on the gritting schedule. Indeed, if any other Members feel that particular roads in their area have become more heavily used, because of a rural business or place of entertainment, they should bring that information to the attention of the local Roads Service office and ask for that road to be reassessed.

Mr I McCrea: I thank the Minister for his statement and for his commitment to tackle the problem of gritting roads around rural schools.

Will the Minister inform the House what action is taken against drivers of gritting lorries who have accidents while gritting roads? I am led to believe that formal warnings are issued when that occurs, yet members of staff are putting their lives on the line to tackle difficult roads.

The Minister for Regional Development: If the Member has a specific concern he should raise it directly with me outside the Chamber or with Roads Service. There is a very strong acknowledgement from Roads Service, and the community as a whole, that those who carry out the winter gritting service work in very adverse weather conditions. Society should be very grateful to the people who do that work, because they carry out a much needed service during unsociable hours, and on road conditions that can be quite treacherous.

As Roads Service employs its own drivers, there is an inbuilt understanding with respect to the conditions they face. However, if the Member has specific queries in relation to a specific incident, I will be happy to hear from him and to have Roads Service answer those queries.

Mr McElduff: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a ráiteas. I welcome the action being taken by the Minister. Where will the responsibility for the gritting of rural roads sit following the implementation of the review of public administration? How many of the 44 schools are in the Western Education and Library Board area? I hope that Recarson Primary School, Altamuskin Primary School, Tummery Primary School and the Derrybard Road feature prominently on that list.

The Minister for Regional Development: The gritting of roads is not a function that has been considered for transfer under the review of public administration. There are substantial arguments against doing that, as the gritting schedule changes substantially. Some councils, particularly those in the rural west, will have more resources devoted to gritting than other councils will have, and that might create an imbalance in the resources needed by councils for treating roads. The argument for retaining much of Road Service's functions was sound, and the gritting of roads will not be transferred.

I am happy to provide a list of the 44 schools. All rural schools were contacted, and the 44 schools on the list outlined particular problems that they had experienced last year. I am not sure whether they are in the west, east, north or south, but I am happy to provide the Member with the list.

Mr Shannon: I thank the Minister for his response to Members' concerns. We have been told that the options included 23 schools and 44 schools. On occasions last winter, the number of pupils attending schools was reduced because of icy road conditions. The road conditions may not have led to the closure of those schools but, clearly, they reduced the schools' service delivery. The magical list contains 44 schools, and if a school is on that list, it has made it. However, I am perturbed about the schools that are not on that list. I do not know the names of the schools on the list; I will not now list the schools in the Ards Peninsula that need to be on it. Will the Minister confirm that schools that are not on the list but feel that they should be can be included? What criteria will be used to ensure that such schools can be added?

The Minister for Regional Development: Roads Service questioned schools about absenteeism, and I referred to that in my statement. Some schools experience absenteeism of around 20%. We did not only examine whether schools had to close; we looked into their general experience during times of adverse weather conditions. I favoured option two because it has a degree of flexibility built into it. Those 44 schools told Roads Service about particular problems that they had experienced last year, but there is the flexibility that if some of those schools do not experience any problems this year for different reasons, other schools can be included.

I advocate that, before winter sets in, rural schools should get a direct line of communication with their local roads manager, or whoever he appoints to be the liaison between Roads Service and the school. Those schools should ensure that those lines of communication are open so that if they experience any difficulties, they can be brought to the attention of Roads Service as soon as possible.

Mr Beggs: I thank the Minister for his statement and his proposals, which may bring some improvements to 44 schools. Last winter, two 53-seater buses carrying post-primary schoolchildren from a rural area to the town of Larne crashed. The Minister is focused on rural schools. It is not clear whether instances such as the one that I referred to will be covered. Will he advise whether, even if they have not been considered so far, the bus routes to post-primary schools will be carefully assessed to address the risk factors involved with a large number of children travelling on an icy road in a large vehicle that is difficult to manoeuvre?

The Minister for Regional Development: As I said in response to an early question, this option does not cover all of the routes. It would not be possible to salt all bus routes without a significant increase in resources.

Information garnered from education and library boards tells us that if all school bus routes were to be salted, that would more than double the length of the current salted network. Apart from a capital investment of £15 million, to salt all school bus routes would cost between £4.5 million and £7 million extra each year. Within current resources, that level of expenditure is not feasible. An increased weighting factor for buses has been introduced in the past number of years, so a 40-seater bus is counted as 40 vehicles for the purpose of meeting the traffic-flow criteria on the salted network. That measure has gone some way towards ensuring that some of the school bus routes meet the criteria for salting.

Option 2 is focused particularly on those schools that faced difficulty in staying open last winter. If the weather conditions are such this winter, and perhaps next winter, a trial of option 2 will be targeted at those schools. If it is found not to be sufficient, we will have to examine longer-term options, which will have much more significant resource implications.

Mr Dallat: I also welcome the statement, at least until I discover that St Paul's College in Kilrea has not been included on the list of 44 schools. If it has not been, I will be skidding all over the place. Can the Minister assure us that areas where local people have gone to the ends of the earth to protect their children's safety — even to the extent of their going out on tractors and manure sowers to keep the roads clear — will not be disadvantaged? He stated that the focus will be on schools that had to close last winter. The school that I mentioned, St Paul's, did not close, but that it did not was only as a result of the goodness of people in the local community, who kept the school open in what is a very hilly area.

The Minister for Regional Development: As I said, Roads Service surveyed the schools that had particular problems, and options were brought to me on the basis of consultation with all rural schools. If the school that the Member refers to did not experience a severe problem that forced it to close, it will not have been targeted for the trial.

A lower criterion of 1,000 vehicles a day for roads on hilly terrain has already been set, and the increased weighting factor for buses in service will help such roads to meet it. Again, if there are particular problems, and if the Member feels that roads are experiencing heavier traffic because of an increase in traffic volumes, he should bring his concerns to the local Roads Service office's attention.

The Member will be aware of all the resource issues involved, because he was a member of the Committee for Regional Development until recently. As I have explained, if we were to salt every single road in the North, first, it would not work on certain roads, because a certain amount of traffic is needed in order to activate the salt. It would be a complete waste of resources to salt roads on which traffic is very light. Secondly, to increase from 80% to 90% the percentage of roads to be salted would double the cost incurred. If Roads Service were provided with money to salt 90% of roads, I am sure that it would be happy to send extra machinery out to do the salting. However, within the resources available, option 2 allows Roads Service to provide a focused response for schools and some rural areas that have experienced particular difficulty.

Mr Molloy: I thank the Minister for his initiative on this issue, and I also congratulate Roads Service, which has been flexible in assisting funerals, weddings and other events in rural areas. Does he consider that secondary salting will be adequate to deal with schools in rural areas? Will the service be available on time so that Roads Service can ensure a safe surface?

The Minister for Regional Development: The general experience is that, after completing primary salting, the vehicles are back in the depots by around 7.00 am. We then want the 44 schools that have been identified to be put at the top of the list for secondary salting. Few people will be going to school before 8.00 am, so the secondary salting schedules should provide an opportunity for roads approaching those schools to be salted. I expect option 2 to operate favourably for those schools for which a particular problem has been identified. It is a new option that will be trialled over the next year or two, and I certainly hope that it will provoke the sort of response that we would like it to.

Mr Lunn: I also welcome the Minister's constructive statement. In his reply to Mr Cobain, he mentioned the possibility of further reviews. On several occasions, he mentioned giving local Roads Service offices a level of flexibility. In my experience, that level of flexibility has been absent so far, but we hope for better times. If there is to be flexibility, as well as taking into account traffic volumes, which I appreciate must be the main criterion for deciding to salt any road, is there a possibility of considering a particular road's accident history? Members of the local community will know how many accidents there have been on particular roads — even those of which the police are not notified — so they could also have some input.

The Minister for Regional Development: The local offices have a degree of flexibility within the resources that are available to them. People who contacted their local office over the winter about a particular road and were told that it did not have the resources must understand that that may have been the case. Criteria are applied, and a particular focus is placed on the schools that had problems last year.

The Member may be interested to know that police statistics show that frost, ice and snow are factors in only 1·2% of all road injury accidents and that less than 1% of accidents occur on roads that are outside the normal salted network. Although I am sure that accident history is taken into account, a very small percentage of road accidents are attributed to frost, ice and snow.

COMMITTEE BUSINESS

Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill

Extension of Committee Stage

The Chairperson of the Committee for the Environment (Mrs D Kelly): I beg to move

That, in accordance with Standing Order 33(4), the period referred to in Standing Order 33(2) be extended to 26 October 2009, in relation to the Committee Stage of the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill [NIA Bill 10/08].

The Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill had its Second Stage on 30 June 2009 and was referred to the Committee for the Environment on 1 July 2009.

The Bill has 23 clauses, and it aims to clarify the powers of district councils to enter into long-term service contracts with the private sector, to enable councils to acquire land otherwise than by agreement for waste-management purposes, to make preliminary arrangements for the reorganisation of local government, to establish statutory transition committees for the purpose of preparing for and giving full effect to the reorganisation of local government, and to enable the Department to make regulations to provide for severance payments to be made to councillors who resign during a specified period.

The Committee has taken oral evidence from local councils, the Northern Ireland Local Government Association and Arc21, and it will soon begin its clause-by-clause consideration of the Bill. At its meeting on 17 September 2009, the Committee agreed that it would be prudent to seek this short extension as a contingency plan in the event of an emergency, such as an outbreak of swine flu.

The Committee is aware of the Bill's importance for local government reform, and it is aware of the tight timescale that is involved in order that the Bill may receive Royal Assent by the end of the year. It should be noted, however, that the Bill has been delayed significantly in coming to the Committee since members made a commitment to the Department over a year ago that they would agree to a shortened Committee Stage. The Department indicated recently that, as a result of discussions with the Committee, it is now liaising with the Office of the Legislative Counsel on the preparation of possible amendments to the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill that will require further Committee scrutiny.

I assure the House that the extension will not be used unless it is absolutely necessary. The Committee has assured the Department that it will work with it to ensure the smooth passage of a raft of legislation, particularly on local government, in the coming season. I ask Members for their support.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That, in accordance with Standing Order 33(4), the period referred to in Standing Order 33(2) be extended to 26 October 2009, in relation to the Committee Stage of the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill [NIA Bill 10/08].

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

National Asset Management Agency

Mr Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer will have 10 minutes in which to propose the motion and 10 minutes in which to make a winding-up speech. All other Members who wish to speak will have five minutes. One amendment has been selected and published on the Marshalled List. The proposer of the amendment will have 10 minutes in which to propose and five minutes in which to make a winding-up speech. All other Members who wish to speak will have five minutes.

Ms J McCann: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I beg to move

That this Assembly expresses deep concern at the possible negative economic consequences for the island of Ireland if the National Asset Management Agency legislation currently under consideration by Dáil Éireann is passed; and calls on the First Minister and deputy First Minister to raise the issue at the North/South Ministerial Council to agree a way forward regarding these assets which will ensure the economic stability of the island of Ireland and movement towards economic growth.

This motion highlights a number of concerns for both the North and the South that would be realised should the legislation for the national asset management agency (NAMA) be passed, and it calls for an all-island approach to be taken on the issue.

In legislative terms, the Irish Government's proposal is seriously flawed. It plans to pay the banks' long-term economic valuations for bad loans, as opposed to the current market value. That is a bad deal for taxpayers. The additional recapitalisation that would be needed subsequent to the establishment of NAMA means that taxpayers would pay twice for the bank crisis and would still have no real control over the sector.

Even when bad loans are taken off banks' books, there is no guarantee that banks will provide normal lending in an economy that is starved of credit. Historically, banks are quick to lend during a boom, but slow to lend during a recession. Therefore, it is irresponsible to take losses for banks without ensuring an element of control of banking practice.

The main reason to oppose NAMA is the fact that it is a plan to rescue banks and developers. It does not help ordinary homeowners and businesses who face repossession and economic hardship throughout the length and breadth of the island. They must continue to pay their debts, while developers' bad loans are put on ice indefinitely.

The legislation will also have an impact on the North. As I have said, it affects people throughout the island of Ireland. Although taxpayers in the South will be hit hardest as banks sell off their bad loans to the Government, €5 billion-worth of those assets are located in the North. When they are sold off, that will affect the value of property and land here.

The Irish Government will have to recoup their expenditure in some way. With no definite time frame for the sale of those assets being built into the proposals, the release of that property into the market at discount prices over a period will have an adverse effect on the recovery of the economy here. Minister Wilson has said that he has been given assurances by the South's Finance Minister; we in Sinn Féin want to know the details of those assurances. If the economy in the South goes further into free fall, nothing will stop the quick release of those assets into the market.

There is a strong argument for NAMA to be put before the people, and my party believes that that should be done by way of a referendum. The focus for many people has been the price that NAMA will pay for toxic loans that it will transfer from the banks onto the taxpayer's balance sheet. That long-term economic value benefits only the banks' shareholders, as the long-term viability of those loans is seriously in doubt due to the oversupply of property and the overinflated value of loans.

NAMA is incapable of meeting the twin objectives of achieving the best value for taxpayers and exposing them to the least possible risk. The debt to which NAMA will expose taxpayers could be in excess of €70 billion. As I have said, €5 billion-worth of that property and related assets are located in the North.

The legislation contains numerous problems, not least of which are the reliance on banks to act in good faith by giving all information on loans to NAMA and the reliance on the ability of NAMA to work with developers to finish projects, potentially lending them taxpayers' money to do so. There are also operational concerns that NAMA will not have the expertise to reclaim debt as it is not used to working in that sphere and the staff that it recruits may still be loyal to their former bank employers.

NAMA will have a huge government cost — the staffing requirement of 50 may well be an underestimate — at a time when other organisations of significant public importance are being amalgamated and rationalised. As regards the notion that a levy will be introduced on banks if NAMA makes a shortfall, we do not know how a shortfall will even be defined, much less what the levy would be.

The Government also says that cleaning out banks via NAMA will bring a return to normal bank practice and lending. However, that rests on the assumption that private banking practice is interested in restoring the economy through providing credit, rather than being concerned only with the interests of shareholders.

We must ask whether banks will lend when they have managed to get their hands on cash via NAMA-issued transfer bonds.

Banks do not tend to lend to businesses that they consider to be risky. We have also seen that problem here, with banks that sometimes do not lend to small and medium-sized businesses because doing so might create another set of dubious assets that would impair their loan books. That is what NAMA is trying to rectify. As I have said, historically, banks lend too much money, too easily, during booms, and too little money, too cautiously, during recessions.

The creation of NAMA will not provide any positives that could not be delivered through nationalisation. If it was used as a state property management company, NAMA would have potential. If it was used as a property management company, the state could utilise land seized on defaulted loans for vital infrastructure, social housing provision or tourism development. We now have a situation in which people throughout the country are sitting in their homes and business premises in negative equity, or, worse, are being evicted because their property is being repossessed.

The property managed by NAMA should be available to local authorities to house people who are evicted as a result of banks moving against them. However, the NAMA-owned property, paid for by taxpayers, is to be managed by private development companies, and tenders have already been put out to attract such companies. That measure is designed to keep party members on board rather than improve the legislation.

NAMA has nothing to do with improving Irish society. The ultimate point of it is to socialise debt and privatise profit. There needs to be an agreed way forward based on an all-island approach. If the NAMA legislation is passed in its current form, there will be serious implications for the economy of the island as a whole. The nationalisation of banks is a much more viable alternative, which would protect the interests of the taxpayer and create a working system of banking.

All of that illustrates the weakness of not having joined-up economic planning across the island. An all-Ireland economic summit is required to address the urgent need for a joined-up economic approach. Go raibh maith agat.

Dr Farry: I beg to move the following amendment: Leave out all after “consequences” and insert

“for Northern Ireland arising from the potential National Asset Management Agency legislation currently under consideration in the Oireachtas; and, while respecting the right of the Irish Government and Parliament to determine their own response to the banking crisis within their jurisdiction, calls on the First Minister and deputy First Minister, alongside the Ministers of Finance and Personnel and Enterprise, Trade and Investment, to use all opportunities, including the North South Ministerial Council, to ensure that the potential implications for the economy in Northern Ireland are fully taken into account within any legislation and subsequent action.”

I welcome the debate. The legislation in the Republic of Ireland is significant and comes at a very interesting time for politics as a whole in the Republic of Ireland. Given that there are implications for Northern Ireland, it is only right that the Assembly discusses it.

We tabled our amendment to focus the debate on the real interests of Northern Ireland and to avoid an inappropriate widening of the discussion. We have to respect the right of the Irish Government and the Oireachtas to determine their own internal economic policies. We may all have personal viewpoints on NAMA, but the primary response to the banking crisis in the Republic of Ireland is for Irish elected representatives to determine. That does not mean that the Assembly should look inward: on the contrary, it is important that we are outward-looking as far as possible and that we are prepared to comment on national, all-island, European and international affairs, particularly, but not exclusively, when they impact on Northern Ireland.

In doing that, it is important that we recognise and respect our own competencies as an Assembly and, more importantly, that we recognise the competencies and responsibilities of other Assemblies and Parliaments. That also applies to electorates. For example, I would love to be in a position to call for a “Yes” vote in Friday’s referendum on the Lisbon Treaty. However, as an elected representative in Northern Ireland who sits in a Northern Irish Assembly, I know that that would not be appropriate.

In particular, we need to be very careful that the Assembly does not become a surrogate for fighting battles that should really be taking place on the Floor of the Dáil Éireann. Therefore, our focus should be on trying to influence the legislation in a manner that addresses and contains any of the potential implications for Northern Ireland and our economy.

The NAMA approach, or something similar, may be the least worst of all the options facing the Irish Government. I respect the views of others, including those expressed by Sinn Féin today and those expressed within my own group that are different to my own, but that is not the issue for us today. We can all be populist and want to give the bankers a good kicking, which they richly deserve, no doubt. However, being responsible, we cannot escape acknowledging that a healthy and functioning banking system is fundamental to any economy. Like many other countries around the world, and perhaps particularly so given the scale of the problem, Ireland has to get its banking system moving again. We can point to examples of rescue schemes around the world, which have variable shapes and outcomes, such as the TARP scheme in the United States, our own national scheme and the one in Germany.

In order to address their banking and financial crisis, the Irish Government have to address the so-called toxic loans that are in the system. They are proposing to use €54 billion to prop up related loans that have a nominal book value of €77 billion. Those loans are currently valued at €47 billion. Is that the right balance of pain between shareholders and taxpayers? With the discount, will the assumption of a rise in value of those assets be sustainable? Have the right underlying calculations been made? Will the banks, as Jennifer McCann said, follow through and begin to lend again? Will the gamble work?

Those are interesting questions, but, again, our concern must be the impact of NAMA on Northern Ireland. We have to assume that that legislation will be introduced, and then ensure that we mitigate any effect that it might have on Northern Ireland.

1.00 pm

From our perspective, we have to recognise the cross-border effects of that legislation. We do not live in a world of closed economies. Rather, we live in an open, integrated and globalised economy, and what happens in one economy can have knock-on effects elsewhere. Decisions taken by national governments have much wider implications and effects. The Irish Government's act of economic nationalism in guaranteeing deposits in their own national banks last year had implications across Europe and a ripple effect on the security of deposits elsewhere.

This issue indicates the realities of a growing all-island economy. I would not overstate it to the same extent as Jennifer McCann, given that we are clearly very fiscally dependent on the UK Exchequer — and, indeed, more so today — but there is clear evidence of growing integration on the island of Ireland, and it is important that we discuss economic interests of mutual concern and avoid negative impacts on each other's economies.

Our big concern is about the impact of a fire sale of NAMA-backed assets in Northern Ireland, and the impact that that would have on our economy. It is estimated that 6% of the assets that would fall under NAMA are in Northern Ireland. Other NAMA assets are also internationalised, with about 21% in GB, 3% in the United States and about 4% in the rest of Europe. However, the impact if things went wrong would be much greater here given the relative size of our economy compared with those other, much bigger economies. The level of our exposure equates to a notional value of about £4.6 billion. However, we are still uncertain about what the impact on Northern Ireland will be. It is important that we do not over-react or panic at this stage. Although a fire sale would be extremely damaging to our property market and wider economy, there is no suggestion at this stage that that is what NAMA would seek to do.

We must do a number of things. First, we must remain vigilant to the risks, but not overplay them; secondly, we must seek to influence the legislation as best we can; and, thirdly, we must appreciate that there are individuals in Northern Ireland who will be mixed up in this, whether property owners or people who work in the related banks.

I note that our Finance Minister has already had discussions with Brian Lenihan, his counterpart in the Republic of Ireland. I also believe that the matter was discussed by the North/South Ministerial Council. It is right that those discussions continue. I would encourage a place being made available for a representative of Northern Ireland, or for someone who has an intimate knowledge of the Northern Ireland economy, on a NAMA advisory board. That would be a good way to protect our interests.

This debate is critical. We must recognise our role as an Assembly and make our points while respecting the rights of others to take decisions about their own economy. In turn, however, we must take this issue seriously but not over-react. There is a lot of work to be done in the coming months. I look forward to hearing the comments of our own Finance Minister, and I wish him and his Executive colleagues every success in trying to ensure that the effects of the legislation on Northern Ireland are minimised as far as possible.

Mr Weir: I welcome the debate. As a politician, it is, in part, always good to talk about bankers, because in recent days, they are, perhaps, the one group of professionals that tend to be held in lower esteem than politicians. Consequently, the opportunity to distract from our bad press is always welcome.

Although I disagree with the wording of the amendment, Dr Farry hit the nail on the head. We need to focus on what the Assembly can do and determine our appropriate role. In that respect, I fundamentally disagree with the motion's approach, because I do not believe that it is appropriate for the Assembly to interfere in what is essentially a turf war down South between Fianna Fáil and Sinn Féin and in legislation in another jurisdiction.

Some people would criticise the Assembly for not giving sufficient scrutiny to its own legislation. Therefore, it is a somewhat expansionist approach to suggest that we should interfere in legislation in the Irish Republic. To that end, some colleagues and I find ourselves in the unusual position of being defenders of Irish sovereignty today. We are a different jurisdiction, and it is not our role to interfere in the internal affairs of another country.

When I read the criticisms of NAMA in the motion, I wondered whether Sinn Féin had become nervous about the link-up between the Ulster Unionists and the Conservatives and had sought to reposition itself on the right of the Ulster Unionist Party by saying that the level of state interference in the banking sector is terrible and by proposing a free market solution. However, when I read the detail, I understood, less surprisingly, that Sinn Féin's position is to nationalise banks. Indeed, I suspect that it is keen to nationalise everything. At least one Member on the Sinn Féin Benches seems to be giving a level of tacit support to that assertion.

The nationalisation of banks is similar to the situation in Russia in the first part of the twentieth century, whereby lands were nationalised, and the kulak class was eventually eliminated. That shows the retrograde thinking of Sinn Féin on that issue. The evil corporatists have to be faced down.

Mr Cobain: Are banks, in effect, not nationalised?

Mr Weir: I will wait to see how that —

Mr Cobain: What percentage of the banking system do the Government own?

Mr Weir: There is a fundamental difference between nationalisation of banks and an asset management system. I appreciate that the Member would be keen to go further, and I expect that to be reflected in the Conservative and Ulster Unionist manifesto.

We should focus on the implications for Northern Ireland and what the Assembly should do about them. Not surprisingly, I take exception with the proposers of the motion, who consider an all-Ireland economy as the solution to all problems, particularly down South. If we can learn one lesson from the financial position down South, it is that we were wise to steer clear of the charm offensive that was thrust in our direction, from the public and from some nationalist parties, which consistently wanted Northern Ireland to have much closer economic ties with the Republic of Ireland. It is clear that the Celtic tiger that once pranced about this island with great pride and no degree of smugness has been shown to be drinking at the pool of toxic loans. Indeed, a closer alignment with the Republic of Ireland would have left us shouldering a large amount of the debt.

The proposer of the amendment reflected fairly accurately that there has been some wild speculation about the amount of money that is involved in assets in Northern Ireland. It totals just under €5 billion of NAMA's overall base of €77 billion. As has been mentioned, that must be put in perspective. It is clear that the scale could have huge implications for the Northern Ireland economy. However, we must also be sure that we do not overreact. We must take a co-operative approach and keep a close eye on the level of direct discussions about any implications for Northern Ireland. I would not go as far as the proposer of the amendment, who wants an economic expert for Northern Ireland to be part of the panel.

Mr McNarry's name was suggested in that regard; we had a brief discussion beforehand, and I think that he would be willing to sacrifice himself to serve such a purpose. Whether the Assembly can spare him is another matter, but his expertise should be shared with the Republic of Ireland.

In practical terms, however, we do not believe that this is best done through high-level summitry, or, indeed, the North/South Ministerial Council. It is better that the Finance Minister work on the detail of the implications of the situation with his opposite number and with officials on a bilateral basis. It is clear that a fire sale is in no one's interests; that is the main concern for many of us. That work has started and is ongoing; that is the route that we should be taking, rather than trying to set up structures.

Mr McNarry: I want to make it clear that I am not taking part in a job interview.

It is estimated that approximately 15% of the toxic assets held by Irish banks, which will come within the scope of NAMA, reside in Northern Ireland. There is no need for an all-Ireland summit, as was suggested by the proposer of the motion. However, that statistic alone is sufficient reason for the First Minister and the deputy First Minister —

Mr Weir: We can bandy figures about, but my understanding is that the figure is a lot less than 15%. Indeed, as the proposer of the amendment indicated, it is somewhere in the region of €5 billion out of the €70 billion, which makes it 6% or 7% rather than 15%.

Mr Speaker: The Member will have a minute added on to his time.

Mr McNarry: There are various figures; one can take them one way or another, and I will stick with the 15% that I suggest for the toxic assets held by Irish banks in Northern Ireland.

The debate is all about getting information, and the best way to get it is through what I hope the Finance Minister will be doing on this matter. That 15% is sufficient reason for the First Minister, the deputy First Minister, the Finance Minister and the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment to be proactively engaged with the Irish Government looking after Northern Ireland's interests in the context of any solution that the Irish Government might find for their banking loan and asset situation. That is quite simple.

The national assets management agency will obviously have an impact on the potential disposal of significant assets located in Northern Ireland — most notably, land and building development assets. That is where we come in. That point was made in the debate on the Second Stage of the National Asset Management Agency Bill 2009 by Brian Lenihan, the Republic's Finance Minister. He said:

"40% of these loans are cash flow producing."

They are not totally no-hope loans. Over the 10-year time frame envisaged, he continued:

"The cash flow produced will be sufficient to cover interest payments on the NAMA bonds and operating costs."

I am glad that our Finance Minister is here. He needs to establish how many Northern Ireland asset-backed bad loans are in that 40% cash-flow-producing category, and how many are in the 60% "no-hope loan" category. Establishing that would go a long way to determining how NAMA would handle those Northern Ireland asset-based loans. Indeed, I say to the Minister that that would be no bad thing. In fact, it would be beneficial for us to know the extent of the bad loans that are floating in Northern Ireland and held in toxic banks other than those covered by NAMA. Perhaps the Minister can tell us what he knows about that situation.

That information will be critical in formulating the approach that we should take to the Government of the Irish Republic over the disposal or management of those assets, and to banks operating here that are outside the scope of NAMA. There is a question mark over what happens outside NAMA. We do not have an inside track on that. Therefore, if NAMA were to find that a substantial proportion of Northern Ireland assets were in the cash-flow-producing category, its attitude would be very different, because that would relieve the situation substantially, and this would become an asset management issue rather than the fire sale that Mr Farry talked about.

1.15 pm

I would welcome comment from the Finance Minister as to the precise nature of the Northern Ireland assets that NAMA is likely to take into management. Will he confirm what proportion of Northern Ireland-based assets is cash-flow producing and what is not? I presume that he has done some homework on the matter before he enters into negotiations with the Republic, because information is everything in such a situation. Even if it only talks that he enters into, rather than negotiations, it is necessary to establish that information.

We in Northern Ireland also need to establish where our property assets are likely to be over the next two years. I would welcome informed comment from the Finance Minister on that matter, because it will have a direct impact on the cash-flow potential of property assets in Northern Ireland that are about to come into the ownership of NAMA. The other side of that coin is that NAMA-owned assets here will have a direct impact on the recovery potential of our property market, both domestic and commercial.

I appeal to the Minister to look again at, or at least to confirm the possibility of, unlocking the value of Government property assets, so that we can invest to protect and create jobs. I remind the Minister, who may say that it is not all his fault, that both he and his predecessor have presided over a doubling of unemployment on their watch, and we do not need any more.

Mr O'Loan: Like Stephen Farry, I welcome the debate on NAMA. We need to be better informed about it, and the debate is helping us to do that.

I am surprised that Sinn Féin has tabled a motion on the economy. Its reputation on economics is not good and has been soundly rejected at the polls in the South. Gerry Adams, the president of Sinn Féin, recently said that his party is not interested in managing the economy. It strikes me that, perhaps not for the first time, Sinn Féin has come to the point where the extreme left meets the extreme right and they share the same position.

The extreme left has moved to an anarchist position. Jennifer McCann is up for seizing property; a fairly Stalinist approach, I thought. The extreme right has a total belief in market forces and would let the banks collapse irrespective of the consequences. The message to the people is the same from either stance. The extreme right would say "let them eat cake"; the extreme left would simply say "let them not eat at all". That is where Sinn Féin finds itself; it is not engaging in serious debate on the issue.

Martin Ferris accused the Irish Government of the robbery of €12,000 from every man, woman and child. Martin Ferris is a man who would know about robbing from the banks, but I think on this —

Mr O'Dowd: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. How appropriate is it for the Member to make criminal accusations against another Member of a legislative body on this island, never mind an ordinary member of the public?

Mr O'Loan: I am happy to clarify: I make no suggestion whatsoever of any criminal imputation. One can know about a thing without any direct involvement.

Mr O'Dowd: Mr Speaker, I was of the view that you responded to points of order, not the person who is involved in the debate.

Mr Speaker: Order. I have heard the Member's point of order, and I say to all Members on all sides of the House that privilege is not absolute. Let us be very careful of what we say in this House. I know that sometimes, in the cut and thrust of debate, Members can easily get carried away. I remind Members to be of good temper when they speak in this House in any debate.

Mr O'Loan: There were others who were involved in robbery, and Mr Ferris showed considerable adulation towards them quite recently.

It is clear that the people have already moved beyond the Sinn Féin position. Sinn Féin was involved, with others, in organising a protest against NAMA in Dublin a week ago, and only 1,500 people showed up.

There is no national movement against NAMA any more, if there ever was.

Unfortunately, I am uncomfortable with the amendment proposed by the Alliance Party. Indeed, I was not terribly comfortable with some of Stephen Farry's remarks, which were, in parts, indicative of a unionist, partitionist mindset. Stephen Farry should think about the fact that politicians need to state the direction in which they want to travel rather than to simply comment on the situation.

It is regrettable that the amendment proposed by the SDLP was not accepted. It recognised possible implications for the future conduct of banking, the property market and the wider economy of the region that arise from the NAMA legislation. That would have been a better stance for the Assembly to take.

Lord Morrow: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. Is it in order for a Member to virtually read out an amendment that has been ruled out of order and that has not been accepted for inclusion on the Order Paper? What are we at?

Mr Speaker: No; that is not in order. I say to the Member, and to all sides of the House, that the decision not to accept an amendment should not be challenged on the Floor of the Assembly. I wish to make that absolutely clear, and I warn the Member on that issue.

Mr O'Loan: I am only saying that it would have been better for the Assembly to adopt the position that was outlined in the amendment proposed by the SDLP.

We all agree that there is a need for the banking system to be fixed and for credit to be available. The banks must be in a position to borrow in the international markets, but we know that that is not possible because of the high volume of high-risk property debts. That can be dealt with in three broad ways: recapitalisation, which could ultimately lead to nationalisation; asset guarantee schemes; and asset management schemes such as NAMA. All three methods have been used in different situations in different countries. However, NAMA was not chosen by chance. A sound evidence-based approach led to its selection, and it has been approved by the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the European Central Bank (ECB).

Although it is certainly not risk free, the NAMA scheme contains important protections. The banks take a considerable hit at the outset. They receive €54 billion against a book value of €77 billion and are, therefore, €23 billion down straight away. The current value of those assets is €47 billion, and the Government hope to make up the €7 billion gap as the assets increase in value. We should note that €2.7 billion is in the form of subordinated bonds, and those are payable only if the Government go into profit.

The legislation also contains provision for a further levy if the Government are still making a loss, so significant protections are available. The rise in value to make a profit is quite modest: 10% over a 10-year period. If the scheme works, the banks will be able to raise capital as private finance. If not, the Government will capitalise the banks and take an equity share.

Most advice says that it is in the best interests of the Irish economy to keep the banks in the private sector and to have at least three competing banks. There is understandable anger in the community against the banks and property developers. There has been regulatory failure and dubious practice. Developers will not profit from the NAMA scheme, and I welcome its commitment to include a windfall tax on rezoned land.

Mr Speaker: I ask the Member to draw his remarks to a close.

Mr O'Loan: The Irish Government have offered to consider that at its Committee Stage, and it is important that they consider other reasoned amendments.

Mr Hamilton: I am not really interested in getting into a debate on the merits, or otherwise, of legislation that is before the Irish Parliament. It is up to the Members of that elected institution to debate and discuss that legislation. However, I concur with some of the comments of a Member who spoke previously. A Sinn Féin spokesman described the NAMA legislation as "the crime of the century." It is a bit rich for anyone in the republican movement, given its history of major crimes against banks across Ireland, to describe NAMA as "the crime of the century."

Mr Weir: Given the republican movement's past, it would be in the best position to judge.

Mr Speaker: A minute will be added to the Member's speaking time.

Mr Hamilton: The Member is right, because €70-odd billion is much more than £25 million.

I do not want to get into the whys, wherefores or merits of NAMA. I accept the point that several Members made that a fire sale should be avoided, even though the €4.8 billion of assets in Northern Ireland is significantly less than the €20 billion that was mooted at one time.

There are still potential negative consequences for Northern Ireland in the deflation of an already depressed property market, and there may be an impact on the public sector in Northern Ireland as we try to realise best value for unused, unwanted assets in the public sector portfolio.

I support the line of action that the Minister has already engaged in through bilateral discussions with his counterpart in the Irish Republic. He intends to have more such talks in the future. As we move forward, any direct line of communication from any advisory panel or board to the Department of Finance and Personnel is to be welcomed in order to avoid some of the serious consequences that might result from NAMA not dealing appropriately with assets in Northern Ireland.

I wish to touch upon the more important conclusion that we in Northern Ireland can draw from the fact that the Irish Parliament has to pass that legislation, or, if not that legislation, something else, and it is the picture that it paints of the current Irish economy and the explosion of the economic argument for Irish unity. Today, that argument is as busted as the Irish banks themselves.

For years, we were told that the unionist argument against Irish unity that was based on economic reasons was disappearing and that the Irish economy was becoming the most vibrant, dynamic and innovative economy, not only in Europe, but in the world, and deserved to be called the Celtic tiger economy. That Celtic tiger has well and truly turned into a pussycat. We now have very clear evidence, as shown by the introduction of the legislation in the Irish Parliament, that that so-called strong economy was not built on solid foundations but on severely shifting sands, which have now collapsed under the Irish people.

Mr O'Loan: Will the Member give way?

Mr Hamilton: Hold on.

We have heard the International Monetary Fund say that the Irish economy's contraction will be the most severe of any advanced economy in the Western World. I will now give way to the Member.

Mr O'Loan: Does the Member not admire the position of the Irish Government? Yes, they have got into difficult circumstances, but they are finding their way out of it. I have seen economists' prognostications to the effect that, in a short time, the Irish growth rate is expected to rise again to 4%. I admire the Irish Government's independence of action. They have a problem; they are dealing with it, and they will get out of that situation. I wish that I could say the same about our economy and the solutions that have been offered.

Mr Hamilton: The days of 4% growth or, indeed, any percentage of growth in the Irish economy are a long way off. The heady days of near-double-digit growth in the Irish economy have long since passed, probably never to return. Again, that underscores the argument that such growth was temporary, and it is now going back to more appropriate levels.

One only has to look at all the evidence: the contraction of the economy by 13.5% between 2008 and 2010; the jobless figures have gone from being the second lowest to the second highest in Europe; the Budget deficit has grown to four times the limit allowed by the EU institutions; the Irish Republic's credit rating was, embarrassingly, lowered by Standard and Poor's, and that was a real slap in the face for the Irish economy; and so on and so forth to the collapse in the construction industry and the cuts worth billions of euro that the public sector faces as a result of the McCarthy report.

No matter what anyone says, Northern Ireland has been well cushioned by the UK economy. There are longer-term benefits in remaining part of the fourth largest economy in the world. This is a global problem; it is not one for independent action. It will be sorted out on a global basis.

While the Northern Ireland economy, small as it is, is represented in the room, at the table, at the G8 or G20 summits, or wherever big decisions on financial futures are being taken, who is outside with his face pressed to the window looking in? It is the Taoiseach of the Irish Republic. He has always been, and always will remain, on the outside. Whatever legislation is passed in the Irish Republic —

Mr Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr Hamilton: — the economic argument has well and truly gone.

1.30 pm

Mr Butler: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Tá mé sásta labhairt ar son na tairisceana seo, ach ní dóigh liom go mbeidh mé ábalta tacú leis an leasú..

I am grateful to be allowed to speak in the debate. I should point out that some of the debate, particularly the contributions from the DUP and the SDLP, focused on attacking Sinn Féin and negative politics, and Declan O'Loan attacked members who sit in Leinster House. The DUP said that the banks should not be nationalised, but it talked about that option as though it were the product of far-left loony thinking. However, one of the banks involved in the crisis, the Anglo Irish Bank, has already been nationalised, and the Irish Government heavily subsidise the Allied Irish Bank. Those who state that Sinn Féin's economic policy is illiterate and that the banks must not be nationalised should look at what is happening in other parts of the world: Sweden had to do exactly that to get out of the economic crisis.

NAMA has been described as one of the biggest gambles on the property market by any Government in western Europe. It has been likened to placing €60 billion of taxpayers' money on the roulette wheel in the local casino. The problem for the North is that the toxic assets of approximately €5 billion will affect the economy here.

I welcome the recent statement by the Minister of Finance and Personnel, Sammy Wilson, that he wanted to have a formal role in how NAMA affects the North, particularly its property prices. However, it is not good enough simply to have a formal role. Sinn Féin's motion advocates that the matter be dealt with through the institutions. I acknowledge that the Assembly is one of the North's institutions but what about the interlocking bodies, such as the North/South Ministerial Council? It is not enough to receive assurances from Brian Lenihan and the Taoiseach that they will sort out the problem. Fianna Fáil, the banks and the developers got us into this mess, and NAMA is being set up to deal with the toxic debt here and in the South of Ireland. We must have a more formalised role because, when NAMA is established by the legislation, its role will be subject to little public scrutiny. It will deal with toxic debts relating to land and developments here in the North, and the Assembly will have little or no say in that. We must, therefore, do more than seek assurances from Brian Cowen and Brian Lenihan about NAMA's impact on the North.

The long-term impact must also be considered. People have been talking as though establishing NAMA will deal quickly with the entire issue, but that will not be the case. The North could be lumbered with the effects on the economy here and on the island of Ireland for the next 10 to 15 years.

The amendment, which attempts to water down the Sinn Féin motion, is unnecessary and, in some ways, partitionist. We must address the issue on an all-Ireland basis because it will impact on the economies of both jurisdictions. I welcome the Minister's statement that he wants to play a formal role. However, through the North/South Ministerial Council, of which the Minister of Finance and Personnel is a member, we must take a direct hands-on approach as to how NAMA will affect the North's economy and ensure that we are kept up to speed. Go raibh maith agat.

Dr McDonnell: I am glad that the debate is taking place today, because it highlights that, whatever our political persuasion or party, a close working relationship exists between the financial structures, North and South. I am not wildly excited about NAMA; equally, I am not wildly excited about anything to do with the banking and liquidity crises.

To me, NAMA represents the least-worst option. Nationalisation would be the worst possible option: it would weigh us down, because the banks involved have assets not just in Northern Ireland but in the US and across Europe, thus creating very difficult circumstances for a nationalised bank to unravel.

As others have said, there are serious implications for the economy of the island as a whole. There are also serious implications for downstream financial jobs and for the construction industry. I think that the proposer of the motion, Jennifer McCann, said that we need a joined-up economic approach. I agree. However, the motion deals only with banks that are based in the Irish Republic. Effectively, we have no local banks. In addition to those that are based in the Irish Republic, at least 70% of Ulster Bank's parent company is nationalised and the Northern Bank is owned by Danske Bank.

Many aspects of regulatory failure come from a global and a local perspective. I apologise to Mr McNarry, but I will pick up on a point about which there was some debate and discussion. All my figures suggest that some 6% of the Irish banks — assets that are proposed for NAMA — which is a figure of some £5 billion, are based in Northern Ireland. The figure of 15% probably arises from the fact that considerably more of those banks' assets are based in the UK.

To be honest, I am somewhat confused, because the motion contains serious contradictions. I will not go into the details, but it is very worrying for those of us who have an interest in jobs and the economy. The president of Sinn Féin recently said that the party was:

“not interested in managing the economy.”

If I have got that quotation wrong, it needs to be corrected.

Mr O'Dowd: It is clear that the SDLP has hired a group of individuals to read through Sinn Féin's speeches and pick out half sentences, half quotations and half remarks, and then its Members come into the Chamber like excited children and read them out. If SDLP MLAs quote the president of Sinn Féin or any other politician, they should read out the entire content of the speech from which the quotation came.

Mr Speaker: The Member has an extra minute in which to speak.

Dr McDonnell: I have no difficulty with that if it is standard practice, but the problem is that Sinn Féin, from its president down, has misquoted and misunderstood everybody else for years. If that is a misquotation, I am glad for it to be corrected, because I am keen for Sinn Féin to take an interest in the economy.

I am bewildered by the thrust of the motion. It gives us the sense that Sinn Féin is out of touch and may not be up to speed on the economy, because it backed the bank guarantee system that was introduced in the Irish Republic some time ago. That scheme was the precursor to, and the necessary foundation for, NAMA. Those of us who try to observe these matters, and who read newspaper stories on what is going on, are confused, because we are shuffling from pillar to post. It is important that there be consistency, because we will get out of this financial crisis only if we are consistent and responsible.

NAMA is by no means perfect. It has many faults, and I have a degree of scepticism about much of it. However, as I said earlier, the Government's intervention is the least-worst option. Our banking system, North and South, cannot be unravelled or separated. It is completely interconnected. Many of the banks, such as the Bank of Ireland and the Allied Irish Bank, operate on an all-island basis.

If the Irish Government were not to step in now to reduce some of the risk and increase the flow of credit to those banks, we in the North — homeowners, business owners and everybody else — would suffer severely from the lack of liquidity. Ordinary, decent hard-working people have suffered enough.

I could stand here all day condemning the stupidity and mistakes of the banks, but I will not do that. They have made major mistakes; setting up NAMA is not bailing out the banks, it is an attempt to ensure that there is liquidity.

Mr Speaker: The Member must bring his remarks to a close.

Dr McDonnell: Mr Speaker, I am preparing a dossier which I intend to take not just to the Prime Minister, but to the Irish Minister for Finance to resolve some of those issues.

Mr Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Dr McDonnell: I am doing that because our people need help and support with the lack of liquidity.

Mr A Maginness: The issues raised by the motion highlight the interdependence between the North and the South, whether or not people like that from their different political points of view. However, I say that in a non-partisan way, because we must be sensible about the economic and financial crisis that we are in. It is important that the North and the South co-operate to achieve a beneficial end to that crisis for all our people.

There is no value in adopting a partisan political stance, and I think that the Minister of Finance has shown the way by adopting a sensible and pragmatic approach to the problem. I believe, Mr Speaker, that the Minister is blushing with embarrassment. However, his first important step was to meet the Minister for Finance, Brian Lenihan, in Dublin.

The Minister indicated on radio this morning, as I am sure he will tell the House, that he is prepared to engage with any Committee that is set up to liaise between North and South, to monitor what is going on and, quite sensibly, to address problems in our own economy. I warmly welcome that. It is important that all of us in the House endorse that point of view. We should continue to monitor the situation closely.

One thing on which we all agree is that there cannot be any fire sale, because that would simply worsen our economic and financial crisis. That must be avoided. However, there must be a measured, managed way of dealing with the assets in Northern Ireland that NAMA will take over from the banks. Those assets are apparently in the order of €4.6 billion, which is a very substantial amount of money. For the welfare of all our people, it is important that we get this right: no fire sale. Those assets must be properly managed.

Of course, as Mr McNarry pointed out, not all the loans involved are impaired. There are assets that can produce an income, and, helpfully for all of us, generate wealth in our society. We have to get those assets working. Given a common purpose and North/South solidarity, I am reasonably confident that we can work through the economic problem: we have to, otherwise we will all go down the tubes. Therefore, it is important that all of us in the House welcome whatever efforts are made.

I understand that there are different ways to approach the situation, of which NAMA is just one. Nationalisation is one way, and asset guarantee schemes are another. However, this is the way that the Irish Government have chosen to do it, so we must work with that system. Let us get on with the job, because there is no merit in raking over the ashes. We must be optimistic about the future, work through things and create a better situation for all of us.

1.45 pm

Mr Speaker: The Member should bring his remarks to a close.

Mr A Maginness: I ask Members to support all efforts to manage the system.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel (Mr S Wilson): The debate has been useful in showing the concerns that exist about the issue in Northern Ireland. It has also been useful because it demonstrates some Members' economic illiteracy, which we will have to do something to correct over the next number of months.

Taking up from where the previous Member finished, co-operation between Northern Ireland and the Irish Republic on this issue can be beneficial to both jurisdictions. Although I and my party are not happy with the political trappings of co-operation, which sometimes only occurs for political reasons, when there are good, solid reasons for the Government in Northern Ireland to work with the Government in the Republic, my party will play its part, and I, as the Minister of Finance and Personnel, will play my part individually.

Although some people, as they pointed out during the debate, recognise that the Celtic tiger, to use the term that Mr Hamilton used, has become a pussycat, it is in none of our interests for the economies of the Republic and here to be in a weak state, because an element of cross-fertilisation and cross-trade benefits both sides. The Member made an observation that, although correct, is not something that we wish to see happen.

I shall deal with a number of points made during the debate. I do not wish to get into a debate about the rights and wrongs of NAMA. The Irish Government have taken a decision about the way in which they will manage the difficulties that banks based in their jurisdiction got into as a result of sometimes lending unwisely on assets that should not have been lent on in the first place. That is a decision for the Irish Government. As far as I am concerned, the only input that I wish to have is that if they set up that system, I want to ensure that issues affecting Northern Ireland are protected through the Government-to-Government or Minister-to-Minister co-operation that we have.

I do not accept that NAMA should fall within the remit of the North/South Ministerial Council, and that is one of the reasons why I am not happy with the motion or the amendment. Indeed, that point was accepted by the Council. Given that a joint communiqué was issued, I assume that the deputy First Minister took the same view. The North/South Ministerial Council agreed that the two Finance Ministers will deal with the issue. We do not believe in widening the North/South Ministerial Council's remit, and I believe that if and when co-operation is needed, there are other ways to achieve it.

Sinn Féin has got its economic analysis of NAMA wrong; it is not the crime of the century, and it is not privatised profit and socialised debt. If the Member who had made the comment had looked at how NAMA is to work, she would know that the burden of risk falls on the banks, not on the Government.

Ms J McCann: Is it not the case that the burden of risk and the financial implications of NAMA fall on the taxpayer, rather than on the banks?

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: As I said, I do not want to get into the detail of NAMA. The assets have been discounted already by 30%. If there is a profit on the eventual sale of the assets, it goes to the taxpayer, not the banks. If there is a loss, a levy is imposed. I do not know where the Member sees any risk to the taxpayer.

However, I do not want to get into a debate about the rights or wrongs of NAMA. That is a decision that the Irish Government are taking and it is one that we will work with, doing our best to safeguard Northern Ireland's interests.

The second point that has come out of this debate is the extent of Northern Ireland's exposure to all those debts. When he gets a black picture, Mr McNarry's usual style is to try to paint it blacker. Even if he does not have the figures to paint it blacker, he will make an eejit of himself to produce a blacker picture. He was not happy at the figures that were given and that seemed to be available to every other Member, which stated that 6% of the debts that the banks hold are based here in Northern Ireland. He was even given the figures: €4.8 billion out of a total of €77 billion. So, if he did not believe the percentages, he could have worked it out for himself. If he does not know how to do it, it is done by putting one over the other and multiplying by 100. That is approximately one fifteenth. A common mistake made by very poor GCSE students is to think of a fraction as a percentage; perhaps that is where Mr McNarry got 15%. However, one fifteenth is 6%; it is reached by multiplying one fifteenth by 100.

Mr McNarry wanted to paint the picture blacker. He claims that it is 15%, but it is not; it is 6%. However, as Mr Farry has pointed out, that is still a significant figure for the Northern Ireland economy.

Mr McNarry then asked me whether I had done my homework and found out the nature of those debts, including how many of them could produce a cash flow and would, at the end of the day, be worth something. They are all assets, so they are always worth something. The mistake would be to try to get rid of them quickly because, in current circumstances, they will be worth less. The whole idea of having 15-year bonds is to allow for their release over a period of time, so that the assets could be sold when the best value could be obtained.

Mr McNarry shows his ignorance, not this time with figures, but with his understanding of the nature of assets. An asset is bound to have intrinsic value. Its intrinsic value will change over time. The Irish Government are trying to allow as long a period as possible during which those assets can be turned back into cash to safeguard against the diminution of their value in the way that some have suggested. I noticed that Mr Butler wanted them sold quickly. That would be an absolute disaster, given the current state of the market.

I asked about the division of the assets, but the Irish Government are not in a position to answer at present. However, we know that about 40% of them are in the form of development land and the rest are in the form of commercial loans or in property. I assume that commercial loans and property will produce some return.

The third question that was asked was: how can we avoid a fire sale? A number of Members asked that question. It was one of the concerns that we had when we went to see the Irish Minister. I put it to him bluntly that there was a cynical view in Northern Ireland that because the political implications of selling assets and their value falling would be less in Northern Ireland than in the Republic, the fear was that, if money had to be realised quickly, Northern Ireland would be the place where the assets would be sold. He talked straight to me and I talked straight to him on the issue. The point that he made — sensibly, if one thinks of it — was why would the Irish Government wish to sell off assets quickly, make a loss on them and not realise their full value.

Do not forget that — Mr O'Loan gave the figures very accurately — the rate of discount is 30%. The Irish Government have paid €54 billion for assets that are currently valued at €47 billion. An uplift of 10% over 10 years would still leave them about 45% below the 2006 peak level and with a fairly low value attached to them. Why would the Irish Government sell those assets off quickly because, once they get to the break-even point, the profit goes to the taxpayer? There is no incentive for them to sell the assets off quickly. The mechanism —

Mr O'Dowd: The Minister may be aware of the recent case in which the ACC brought a major Irish business developer, Liam Carroll, to court. When challenged about the value of his property, he admitted that it was worth not 70% but 25% of what was expected originally. If that is spread across the economy, the Irish Government may have no choice but to sell off even failed assets to recoup some money. They will not recoup all their money, but they may have to recoup some of it.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: The 30% discount rate that has been given is, of course, an average figure. The Irish Government have been quite upfront about the fact that it is an average figure, which means that some assets will have a discount of less than 30% and some more than 30%. The whole point of buying time by having 15-year bonds is to deal with the particular problem that the Member has raised. There will not be a tendency to go for a fire sale.

However, the third point that has been made is that we have assurances, but what guarantee do we have and what input do we in Northern Ireland have to the operation of NAMA? My preference would have been — again, I will be blunt — to have had someone on the board of NAMA. That was not possible. The Irish Minister and I then looked at what other mechanism might be available. He suggested that there could be direct input through the advisory committee.

Mr McNarry: I am sure that the Minister will indulge someone who he has referred to as an eejit and ignorant. If that is the way that he wants to contribute to debates in the Chamber, so be it; there will be another day.

The Minister talks about his preference to have someone on the board of NAMA, and presumably that is to gain information. Can he illustrate to the House whether such information is being sought from those banks outside NAMA in Northern Ireland that have toxic debts? What is he doing to secure that information? Is he looking to put someone onto the boards of the banks, the Treasury and any outfits that there are that are concerned about what we do not know? The Minister may, of course, know more than us, which is why we are having this debate.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: When I spoke about the Member's figures and his ability to manipulate or work them —

Mr McNarry: It is nothing to do with figures: just answer the question.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: Mr Speaker, I will decide how I respond to the points that the Member has made.

I indicated not that I thought that the Member was an idiot, but that, when he sought ways of painting as black a picture as possible, he was prepared to make himself an idiot by ignoring what the figures said. The Member knows full well that the Assembly, and I as Finance Minister, do not have the ability to put anyone on the board of a privately owned bank in Northern Ireland: he knows that.

2.00 pm

Mr McNarry: What about the information?

Mr Speaker: Order.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: The information about the assets, which NAMA will take over, will be known to the Irish Government once all those assets have been taken into NAMA, and I will seek the detail of that information.

Mr Speaker: The Minister's time is up.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: I thank Members for taking part in the debate. I hope that we have given an indication, at least, that we are trying to deal with the issue in a constructive manner. I will continue to work with the Minister for Finance in the Republic to make sure that Northern Ireland is not placed at a disadvantage.

Mr Speaker: I call Sean Neeson to make a winding-up speech on the amendment. He has five minutes in which to do so.

Mr Neeson: I welcome the debate, and it has shown that the issue is controversial. NAMA has caused deep divisions in the Republic of Ireland, even among academics. However, this debate is not about the pros and cons of NAMA. Although it will impact on Northern Ireland, the issue is one for the Government in the Republic of Ireland. However, our Ministers have an important role to play in safeguarding the interests of the people in Northern Ireland who will be affected by NAMA.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Molloy] in the Chair)

I know that the Minister of Finance and Personnel has met Brian Lenihan and has reported back to the Assembly, and I know that junior Minister Gerry Kelly has met representatives from the Republic's Government. If the legislation goes through, assets in the region of €5 billion in Northern Ireland will be affected, as other Members have said. It is worth remembering that there was considerable investment in Northern Ireland by Republic of Ireland developers when the boom in the Republic was forging ahead.

I was struck by a recent article by John Simpson in the 'Belfast Telegraph', and I agree with the comments that he made. He said:

"There are two governments, north and south; two monetary systems; two inter-dependent economies, there are more than two monetary authorities to supervise the banking system. Financial and business issues do not segregate."

He went on to say:

"setting up NAMA contrasts sharply with the methods developed by the UK Government to support the clearing banks. NAMA will take responsibility for non-performing bank loans. It will 'buy' the loans not at knock down prices, reflecting the present state of the property market, but at fair values."

We must address what is meant by "fair values", and I know that that is being considered in the Republic of Ireland.

It is also hoped, not least by me, that NAMA will encourage banks to resume lending. Members, including Jennifer McCann, who spoke in the debate, said that banks must be prepared to help small businesses. The Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment dealt with the issue, and I welcome that.

Stephen Farry said that the focus of the debate is on the real interests of Northern Ireland, and he went on to say that, fiscally, we are dependent on the UK Exchequer. He also said that a fire sale would be damaging to our economy.

Mr O'Loan: The Member said that we are not debating the principle of NAMA. However, if the amendment were agreed, the first part of the motion would read:

"That this Assembly expresses deep concern at the possible negative economic consequences for Northern Ireland arising from the potential National Asset Management Agency legislation currently under consideration in the Oireachtas".

Does the Member not agree that, if the amendment were carried and became the view of the Assembly, when TDs debate the NAMA legislation in the Dáil, they would think that the Northern Ireland Assembly was, in principle, opposed to that legislation?

Mr Neeson: I made it clear at the outset that the important issue is how we deal with NAMA itself, and the fact that that proposed legislation is being debated in the Dáil demonstrates that it has not yet been enacted. However, it is important that the Assembly and the Executive are prepared to address the interests of the people in Northern Ireland; essentially, that is what the debate is about.

I am disappointed that Declan O'Loan ruled out support for the amendment. The Alliance Party is trying to convey the fact that NAMA will have an impact on the people of Northern Ireland and on the Assembly. Therefore, I am disappointed that the Member will not support the amendment.

Paul Butler said that NAMA represents one of the biggest gambles taken by any Government. However, we must accept that we are in the midst of one of the worst financial situations for many years, and it is important that the Government in the Republic of Ireland make some plans to deal with that problem.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member should bring his remarks to a close.

Mr Neeson: I ask Members to support the amendment.

Mr O'Dowd: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Reflecting on the importance of today's debate, I think that it is clear that it is not divorced from conversations in the media and elsewhere last week on how the Executive will ensure that their Budget will deliver for the people on this part of the island. At heart, this is an economic debate, and, although last week's debate centred on how to divide up the block grant, it should instead have concentrated on how to stimulate our economy to ensure that we have the resources to deliver for the people on this part of the island. In Sinn Féin's view, that cannot be done separately from our neighbours in the Twenty-six Counties, and an all-Ireland approach to the economy is the only way forward.

I listened carefully to the Minister of Finance and Personnel's comments on Mr Hamilton's remark about the economic downturn across the border. I will paraphrase him: we should not look across the border and say ah well, up yours, your economy is in bad shape.

If the South's economy is in bad shape, the North's economy is also in bad shape. We cannot ignore that fact, and we must examine the issue with respect to all-Ireland economic growth.

DUP contributions to the debate, although predictable, were disappointing, even from its own electorate's perspective —

Mr K Robinson: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. I am not sure whether the acoustics in the Chamber are better than I thought they were, but will the Member clarify whether he used parliamentary language in his description of the state of the adjoining economy?

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Speaker will examine the Hansard report and make a decision on that.

Mr O'Dowd: I look forward to the Speaker's ruling.

In relation to DUP comments on the NAMA proposals, people cannot close their eyes and ears and hope that NAMA will go away, and people cannot adopt a unionist mindset. Even from a unionist perspective, the implications of NAMA must be understood with regard to what it will do to the economy here, with €4.8 billion to €5 billion worth of assets under the ownership of the National Asset Management Agency —

Mr A Maginness: Will the Member give way?

Mr O'Dowd: I will in just one second.

In his closing remarks, a DUP Member said that rather than set up structures around it, we should continue as we are. I am sorry, but if €5 billion worth of assets in this part of Ireland will fall under NAMA, we must set up structures around that and manage it.

Kind words from the Fianna Fáil Finance Minister will not reassure me. I am surprised that they reassure Sammy Wilson. We are looking at a Government that will, more than likely, go from power if a general election is called. As a republican, reassurances from a Fianna Fáil Minister do not go too far. We must ensure that we have structures around the NAMA proposals if they are passed by the Dáil, and there is no guarantee that they will be passed.

Contrary to what our SDLP friends tell us, Sinn Féin is not the only party opposed to NAMA. The Labour Party, the SDLP's colleagues or sister party, is opposed to it. Fine Gael, another sister party, is opposed to it. The only party that supports the legislation in the Dáil is Fianna Fáil. The Green Party is calling an all-party delegate conference to decide its final approach. I know that it is embarrassing for the SDLP, as Fianna Fáil may be the party that it is involved with after it takes on a new leader. Fianna Fáil is the party that brought the economy to its present position, lectured Sinn Féin on being economically illiterate, led us down this path and left the economy of the Twenty-six Counties in a mess.

The legislators on this island have the responsibility to ensure that we bring forward sensible legislation and find a sensible way forward to ensure that we bring ourselves out of the economic downturn. The contributions from the SDLP concentrated mainly on insulting Sinn Féin, and the reason for that was to hide their embarrassment that Fianna Fáil, its sister party, created and governed over the current mess and is now trying to ensure that the developers and the landlords, of which the SDLP has many, will continue to make money on the backs of the taxpayers across the island of Ireland, not just across the line on the map. All the people in Ireland will end up paying for NAMA for many years to come. The figures do not stack up. As I said to the Finance Minister, the Dublin Government may have assessed that they will give 70% for the loans, but they do not know how much the loans — the bad assets — are worth.

The Carroll case — the first tested case in relation to the financial viability of a major developer — has been back and forth before the Dublin courts for several weeks. When Carroll was challenged over the value of his assets, he said that they were probably worth 25% of what they were a year ago. Nevertheless, the Dublin Government are assuring our Finance Minister that they will pay 70% of what they were worth. If one looks at the Carroll case, the Dublin Government will be paying 50% more than the assets are worth.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: The figures are not based on assurances; they are based on the discount that the Irish Government are giving the banks for those loans. Do not put words into my mouth. I was not given an assurance; I was given the hard facts of the discounts. The Government are paying €54 billion for assets that are worth €77 billion.

Mr O'Dowd: With respect, my point proves that they may not be. The Carroll case proves that the Dublin Government do not know how much those assets are worth. They are paying €54 billion of taxpayers' money for assets that they do not know the value of.

That brings me to the point of the fire sale. World politics may dictate that the economy will get worse, with growing tensions between the Western World and Iran and the continued instability of the Middle East. All those factors lead into the economy. If those matters get worse and property prices fall again, where does that leave us? We will be left with even worse assets than we had in the first place, and that will force not only the Dublin Government, but the European Central Bank, to start recouping some of their moneys. Will they take a loss? They may well have to. They will be in such a dire situation with regard to their cash flow and credit that they may have to start a fire sale. What have we got to ensure that a fire sale does not start here? We have assurances from a Fianna Fáil Finance Minister to our Finance Minister.

Sinn Féin is saying that we should forget about the assurances and ensure that the matter is dealt with through the North/South Ministerial Council and that, as our Finance Minister has proposed, if the NAMA Bill does pass through the Dáil and becomes legislation, we have places by right on the board, not by request. We were informed today that when the request was made that we have places on NAMA, we were told that that cannot be done. Why can it not be done? If the NAMA Bill becomes legislation, why does this House not insist, through the North/South Ministerial Council, that we have places on NAMA and that our views are represented there?

2.15 pm

Mr O'Loan: Does the Member not realise that when he suggests that the Irish Government have simply snatched a figure out of thin air to offer to the banks for the loans, he is simply wrong? It has to be approved by the IMF and the European Central Bank and is subject to EU state-aid rules. The concept of the long-term economic value is the price that has to be paid under the rules, and the best estimates of that that can be made have been made. That is why the figure of €54 billion against the book value of €77 billion has been created.

Mr O'Dowd: The Member refers to several organisations that we should be reassured by. They are the wonderful people — the European Central Bank and the IMF, which have reigned over the collapse of the world economy — who have declared that the figures are correct. Those are hardly organisations to be reassured by. Even if those figures were based on reality, new information has come to light. One of the biggest developers in the Twenty-six Counties — indeed, he has developments across the world — stood in front of a court to say that his assets are worth only 25% of what they were worth last year. That is evidence. Surely there is an onus on the Fianna Fáil-led Government to reassess their current valuations of NAMA. The SDLP's blind support of Fianna Fáil is a disservice, not only to people here but in the Twenty-six Counties. That party needs to stand up to Fianna Fáil and say that it has got it wrong and that it is time to reassess.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: The Member has just written off the valuation carried out by the Irish Government, the IMF and the European Central Bank, but believes somehow that if the matter were to go to the North/South Ministerial Council, we would get all the assurance we need. That stretches his credibility a bit.

Mr O'Dowd: The Minister has challenged every environmentalist and expert on planet earth in his day, so it is not uncommon for politicians here to —

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: At least I had people backing me.

Mr O'Dowd: We have people backing us on this issue. Regardless of the valuations, the North/South Ministerial Council must be involved in the process.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. As I have some sense that there may be a Division on the issue, I will not put the Question now but will do so after Question Time. I, therefore, suggest that Members take their ease until Question Time begins at 2.30 pm.

The debate stood suspended.

Oral Answers to Questions

EDUCATION

Preschool Provision: South Belfast

1. Mr Spratt asked the Minister of Education how many children failed to obtain a preschool place in the South Belfast constituency in each of the past 3 years.
(AQO 90/10)

The Minister of Education (Ms Ruane): The Belfast Education and Library Board (BELB) is not able to tell me how many children have not obtained a preschool place in the South Belfast constituency after the relevant process has been completed.

In the initial phase of admissions, parents are asked to nominate up to four places, and the boards then seek to place children in the provision chosen by parents. It is inevitable that some provision is oversubscribed and, even with four choices, some children will not secure a place. In May, parents of children who have not secured a place are advised of alternative provision, which may be able to facilitate them. It is up to the parents to apply to those providers, and the BELB has informed me that it does not update its records on whether children are placed successfully.

The situation is complicated in that parents may subsequently find provision in other areas. Obviously, this is one of the issues that I will bring to the education and skills authority (ESA) when it comes on board. If education and library boards identify an overall shortage of provision in their areas, my Department seeks to provide additional resources. This year, the five boards requested additional finance for a shortfall of 88 places, which my Department provided. The Department attaches a very high priority to early-years provision and will continue to work with the education and library boards and ESA to ensure that as many children as possible are able to benefit from the preschool year.

Mr Spratt: I thank the Minister for her answer. There are many areas in which provision is lacking: Belvoir Park Nursery School and Fane Street Primary School require many more places, and provision at Blythefield Primary School has been closed. I am disturbed to hear that the BELB has not provided the Minister with details. I ask her to examine the serious lack of places in South Belfast. There are many children from ethnic backgrounds who have been unable to get preschool places. Will she give me an assurance that she will look into the matter and ask the Department to do the same?

The Minister of Education: I will look into that matter, because early years are very important in a child's life. The Member will know that we give priority to socially deprived children and those with birthdays in July and August. Some children from ethnic minorities will fall into those categories, but some will not. Once that requirement is satisfied, additional criteria for admission to particular preschool settings are the responsibility of each setting.

I will look into the issue, but the Member should note that the Department has funded the number of places that the five education and library boards requested.

Ms Lo: Botanic Primary School and Stranmillis Primary School are oversubscribed. Eighteen children are on the waiting list for Botanic Primary School, and Stranmillis Primary School has to divide into two part-time schools to provide two hours provision a day for each child.

Given that health visitors have contact with children and their families years before they enter preschool nurseries and primary schools, would it not be better for the Department and each of the education and library boards to hold discussions with health visitors so that we know roughly how many children will be going into preschool nursery schools and how many will need special help? Early intervention is crucial.

The Minister of Education: Go raibh maith agat as an cheist sin. It is very important that the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and the Department of Education work closely together, and my Department is working very closely with the Health Department. The education and library boards and ESA will also be working very closely together so we can have planned provision for all our young people.

We provide preschool places for 93% of our young people, and we need to increase that percentage. The Member will accept that there has been a significant increase in provision over the past few years. I welcome that increase, but there is no room for complacency, because preschool provision is very important for all children.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an méid eolais a thug sí dúinn go dtí seo. Tá ceist agam uirthi maidir le ról na Gaelscolaíochta ag an leibhéal réamhscolaíochta.

Will the Minister assure the House that the pre-school education expansion programme provides a level playing field for Irish-medium education?

The Minister of Education: Go raibh maith agat as an cheist sin. Ceapaim, agus tá a fhios agam go gceapann an Comhalta freisin, go bhfuil sé an-tábhachtach go bhfuil réamhscolaíocht ann do na páistí atá ag dul chuig na bunscoileanna.

It is essential that children who are going to an Irish-medium primary school have preschool education, particularly when they are learning bilingually — dhátheangach. I can assure the Member, therefore, that Irish-medium preschool education is on a level playing field.

Equality is about meeting the needs of the Irish-medium community rather than always comparing it with the English-medium community. The Member will know that in the Irish-medium review, preschool and the naiscoileanna in relation to Irish-medium education is at the top of my agenda. There has, in the past, been discrimination against the Irish-medium sector. Many of the sector's preschools were not on a statutory footing. Thankfully, we are now taking steps to redress that.

Educational Underachievement

2. Mr Simpson asked the Minister of Education what steps she has taken to end educational underachievement in working-class Protestant areas. (AQO 91/10)

The Minister of Education: D'fhág thart faoi 11,000 páiste an scoil anuraidh gan cúig GCSE mhaith, lena n-áirítear an litearthacht agus an mhatamaitic. Theip an córas oideachais anseo orthu. Tá fócas agamsa mar Aire Oideachais ar aghaidh a thabhairt ar an tearcghnóthachtáil do gach duine óg.

Last year, 11,000 children left school without five good GCSEs, including literacy and maths. They were failed in many ways by the system here. As Education Minister, my focus is on addressing underachievement for all young people. I welcome the Member's concern about the deeply unequal system that we have and the changes that we will bring about and are bringing about.

I introduced 'Every School a Good School: A Policy for School Improvement' — 'Gach Scoil Ina Scoil Mhaith' — to raise standards in all schools across the North of Ireland. I will soon bring forward a strategy to raise standards in literacy and numeracy. I commissioned the 'Achieving Belfast' and 'Achieving Derry' initiatives to address the particular problems of underachievement in those cities. I am working through the North/South Ministerial Council to tackle underachievement, and we have set up a taskforce on Traveller education. We have also brought forward the review of special educational needs and inclusion, and transfer 2010 will lay the foundations of a system based on social justice, equality and academic excellence. That will end the disadvantage in post-primary admissions suffered by all children from disadvantaged backgrounds.

How, for example, did the transfer test serve the Member's constituency of Upper Bann in 2008-09? There are four grammar schools and 12 non-selective schools in Upper Bann. In the grammar schools, 3% of children are entitled to free schools meals compared with 20% in the non-selective schools. The grammar schools have an average of three children per school who have special educational needs or have been statemented, compared with 37 children per school in the non-selective schools. The result of such inequality is that 44% of children living in Upper Bann — 700 children — left school without having achieved five good GCSEs, including literacy and maths. That is absolutely unacceptable to me, and I am sure that it is unacceptable to the Member.

Transfer 2010 will be supported by other key reforms aimed at raising standards, including revised curriculum entitlement framework for post-primary pupils, an early years strategy, support for newcomer pupils and the extended schools programme. My reforms focus on tackling underachievement and raising standards. I want to make sure that every young person has the same opportunity to succeed regardless of background, gender, sexual orientation or race, and regardless of how much their parents earn. It is really important that we deal with that legacy of disadvantage and discrimination.

Mr Simpson: I take it that the Minister agrees with her Department's document, which gives eight reasons why underachievement exists. Only one of those eight reasons deals with the transfer to post-primary schools; every other point is about social and economic issues.

The Minister of Education: Thankfully, there is now no transfer test. All educational experts understand clearly and have spoken out on the point that the transfer test divides young people socially. I outlined for the Member the statistics on free school meals and special educational needs. I hope that he is not suggesting that we continue with the two-tier system that disadvantages the 700 people whom our system is failing. I hope that his party understands the importance of ensuring equality for all people. The Member should, perhaps, meet the parents of those 700 people and explain how his party's education policy favours children who are advantaged already.

Mr McElduff: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. How has the transfer test previously served the working-class Protestant community, particularly that on the Shankill Road in Belfast? [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister has the Floor.

The Minister of Education: The transfer test has disadvantaged every working-class community. I welcome Barry McElduff's question. The transfer test has discriminated against children in the Shankill, 10 of whom got to a grammar school in 2008-09. It has discriminated against children in Sandy Row, in Upper Bann and in every constituency across the North. It has also discriminated against working-class Catholic children.

Earlier, I answered a question about minority ethnic communities. The current system discriminates against children from minority ethnic communities in particular. In many cases, English is their second language, yet they are expected to sit two one-hour tests. The curriculum has been distorted. Thankfully, we are now in a new era in which there is no 11-plus, no distortion of the curriculum, and no children sitting at the back of the class in primary schools while some are being taught and others are not.

Mr B McCrea: Does the Minister agree that the seeds of educational underachievement are sown in preschool and that most of the damage is done in primary school? The transfer test is largely irrelevant, because the damage has been done by the time children reach that stage. Will she explain why her party — and her party alone — refuses to sort the matter out, as is suggested in today's 'Belfast Telegraph'?

The Minister of Education: I am glad that the Member accepts that damage is done by the transfer test; I noticed that he used the words "the damage has been done." I am on record as speaking about the importance of preschool; I did so in response to an earlier question. Primary school is a key time in a child's life. In the past, the primary curriculum has been distorted. Primary 5, primary 6 and primary 7 are key years in a child's life. In the rest of Ireland, schools are teaching literacy, numeracy, science and various subjects so that when children enter second-level education, their literacy and numeracy skills are top class and enable them to tackle the wider range of second-level education subjects.

The departmental policy on transfer from primary school to post-primary school is transfer 2010. The Members opposite and their Executive Ministers had many opportunities to discuss that. I introduced proposals on three different occasions, and the Executive refused to discuss the matter.

Mr Storey: Not true.

The Minister of Education: That includes the Ministers from the party opposite, a Member of which has just said "not true". That party refused absolutely to discuss it. Time has moved on, and I introduced transfer 2010, which is the policy of the Department of Education. It will make equality the cornerstone of the education system.

2.45 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker: If the Member has a question I will let him in.

Mr Storey: I have been on my feet two or three times, so I thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker.

Let me correct what the Minister of Education said about bringing the matter to the Executive two or three times.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member must ask a question.

Mr Storey: The matter was brought to the Executive, and it was the Minister who would not discuss the paper. If she is so concerned about underachievement in the Protestant working class, when will she deal with the findings of her own report? My colleague referred to that report but she refused to answer his question. When will she deal with the findings of the NIAO and PAC reports, which clearly indicated that there is a problem with working-class Protestants? All she does when she comes to the House is to continually tell us that her priority is a language that represents fewer than 1% of the total population of children educated in Northern Ireland.

The Minister of Education: I was elected having clearly stated my party's position on inequality and academic selection. I am totally opposed to inequality and academic selection. I went to the electorate and I got elected on that basis, as did other members of my party. Perhaps, instead of blustering, the Chairperson of the Education Committee and his colleagues should go to the Shankill, the Waterside and Upper Bann, and all over the North, and explain why they support the retention of academic selection, when all the reports, including those that the Member mentioned, show that working-class Protestant and Catholic children are disadvantaged.

Education and Skills Authority: Community Representation

3. Mr Hamilton asked the Minister of Education how she intends to ensure that the proposed education and skills authority board will be representative of the Northern Ireland community. (AQO 92/10)

The Minister of Education: Fógraíodh an iomaíocht do bhallraíocht an údaráis oideachais agus scileanna go forleathan i mí Lúnasa. Tá gliondar orm leis an leibhéal suime a léiríodh: chuir 60 comhairleoir ceantair agus 161 ball den phobal i gcoitinne iarratas isteach le bheith ina mball den údarás.

The competition for membership of the board of the education and skills authority (ESA) was widely advertised in August. I am delighted with the level of interest that has been shown; 60 district councillors and 161 members of the general public submitted applications to be a member of ESA. ESA will play a key role in improving the delivery of education to our children and young people and in raising standards at all levels. It is vital, therefore, that the best people be appointed to drive ESA forward. Members will be appointed to ESA on the basis of merit, in terms of the skills and expertise that they can bring, in accordance with the rules of the Commissioner for Public Appointments.

ESA's role will be to manage and deliver services according to the policies of the Minister of the day. That should be reflected in a relatively small, skills-based membership. Members are not being appointed to represent any particular interest or sector. I have proposed in the Education Bill that there will be general members and district councillors, with the councillors being the majority. I would like to see different political backgrounds represented in a broadly based councillor membership of the education and skills authority.

Mr Hamilton: Notwithstanding the necessity of merit and that nobody should be in position who is not suitable for the post, does the Minister not agree that, given the diversity of the education sectors in Northern Ireland and the diversity of ethos in those sectors, it is essential that all sectors be represented on the board of ESA, not just a handful that suit her own agenda?

The Minister of Education: Members can be assured that I will follow the procedures of the Commissioner for Public Appointments to the letter.

Mr K Robinson: Given the enormity of the potential power that might be ascribed to the education and skills authority, will the Minister acknowledge that she must take steps to allay the fears across the education sector that the Education Bill will create an enormously over-centralised and bureaucratic super-quango?

The Minister of Education: Currently, we have many different organisations and a lot of bureaucracy. We have five education and library boards, the CCMS and the Youth Council, and the system is incoherent. Mr Spratt asked me about preschool places in South Belfast; it is difficult to monitor whether children were placed in their parents' second-choice school, because the Belfast Education and Library Board borders on other boards.

With ESA in place, we will have a much more cohesive, unified approach, more equality in provision across the board, and more coming together of different groups across the education sector. There has to be strict accountability, and I assure the Member that I will ensure that there will be strict accountability during my term as Minister. ESA and the Department are already working closely together to ensure a cohesive approach and equality for all communities across the Six Counties.

Mr P J Bradley: Does the Minister intend to ensure that the ESA board will fully represent all communities across the North?

The Minister of Education: I answered that question previously. I assure the Member that I will follow the code set out by the Commissioner for Public Appointments to the letter.

School Building Programme: South Antrim

4. Dr W McCrea asked the Minister of Education for an update on the current status of the building programme for Ballyclare Primary School, Straid Primary School and Thompson Primary School, in the South Antrim constituency. (AQO 93/10)

The Minister of Education: Le deireannas, bhuaile feidhmeannaigh Roinne le Bord Oideachais agus Leabharlainne an Oirthuaiscirt le cláir tógála a phlé, lena n-áirítear an clár do Bhunscoil Bhealach Cláir.

Departmental officials recently met with the North Eastern Education and Library Board to discuss building programmes, including that of Ballyclare Primary School. Major capital works for Ballyclare, Straid and Thompson primary schools are at revised economic appraisal stage. There is concern regarding the low enrolment at Straid Primary School, and my officials have requested an area-based planning statement from the board.

Dr W McCrea: Does the Minister accept that many children in my South Antrim constituency are being educated in intolerable conditions? When will she remove discrimination against the controlled sector and provide an appropriate, building programme to remove that disadvantage?

The Minister of Education: I accept that many schools across the North, in every sector, are not up to scratch, and that that is simply not good enough. I have brought forward a capital programme. In 2008-09, my Department spent 99% of its capital investment budget. Currently, there are a total of 93 major capital projects ongoing, 25 of which are on site, with the remaining 68 in various stages of planning.

I am sure that the Member is not saying that we should not be taking action where numbers are dropping, because we must ensure that we use our money very wisely. We have to fulfil all the criteria of economic appraisals.

I met the Minister of Finance last week, in his capacity as an MLA, in relation to one of the schools in his constituency. He was the first to agree that we must adhere to our processes, and that we should not be building schools that will be subject to questions from the Public Accounts Committee in three of four years' time, to explain why schools were being built in particular areas.

Dr W McCrea: Why are they not being built?

The Minister of Education: I have already answered that, but I will repeat it; departmental officials recently met with the North Eastern Education and Library Board to discuss a number of building programmes, including that of Ballyclare Primary School. As regards Straid Primary School, my officials have requested an area-based planning statement from the board.

Mr P Maskey: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Will the Minister tell us when the next capital fund announcement will be made?

The Minister of Education: The next capital funding announcement will be made in due course. My officials are working very hard and, as I said, we spent 99% of our capital investment budget last year. There are 93 major capital projects ongoing. To streamline the capital planning process further, projects will now proceed to design and development stage immediately after the economic appraisal has been approved. There are significant benefits to that revised process, including a significant reduction in the project development timescale. Projects will now proceed to procurement and will be on site very soon after the new starts announcement.

Mr Burns: What steps is the Minister taking to ensure that the procurement of capital programmes will be free from the long delays that they are currently subject to?

The Minister of Education: I have just answered that question, but I will do so again to avoid accusations that I have not answered your question. In order to streamline the capital-planning process further, projects will now proceed to project design and development immediately after the approval of the economic appraisal.

Fraud/Suspected Fraud: BELB

5. Mr O'Dowd asked the Minister of Education what action her Department is taking to tackle fraud and suspected fraud, as outlined in the Public Accounts Committee report into suspected contract fraud in the Belfast Education and Library Board. (AQO 94/10)

The Minister of Education: Cuirim fáilte roimh thuarascáil an Choiste, a tharraing aird ar cheisteanna maidir le cleachtais soláthair i mBord Oideachais agus Leabharlainne Bhéal Feirste. Bhí an-imní orm nuair a léigh mé cinneadh an Choiste ar nósanna imeachta an bhoird le déileáil le calaois amhrasta.

I welcome the Committee's report, which highlights a number of very serious issues relating to procurement practices in the Belfast Education and Library Board. I was very concerned to read the Committee's findings on the board's procedures for dealing with suspected fraud. The case was originally reported to my Department in 2003, and the issues that are raised in the report are totally unacceptable. I expect only the highest standards of equality and transparency in public procurement.

During the course of the investigation, we have worked to ensure that our education partners' procurement processes are open and transparent and have equality at their core. That has been vital in ensuring that contractors are granted equality when bidding for work. I have insisted that my Department takes all appropriate actions to ensure that this situation does not arise again, because I will not tolerate such activity. I am determined that we display a zero-tolerance approach to fraud across the education service.

As recognised by the Public Accounts Committee, I have overseen many improvements in the Department's anti-fraud framework during my time as Minister. Notable improvements include the introduction of a comprehensive fraud risk analysis that is supported by enhanced fraud management across the education sector and the extension of a comprehensive annual fraud-reporting mechanism to include the education sector. I will also ensure that the education and skills authority examines the PAC report and that the lessons learned from the investigation are taken forward in the ESA's procedures. I want procurement practices to represent best practice right across the sector and the public service.

Mr O'Dowd: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle agus a Aire. How will the Minister and the Department ensure that ESA does not make the same fundamental mistakes as the Belfast Board? Indeed, some of the behaviour was deliberate fraud rather than mistakes. How can we ensure that the ESA does not fall into the same traps as the Belfast Board?

The Minister of Education: I have answered part of that important question already. Under my watch, the Department takes a zero-tolerance approach to fraud. I put equality at the cornerstone of every single thing that my Department does, and the anti-fraud framework ensures that we minimise the risk of fraud. Key elements of that include adherence to our statutory duties on equality; the use of fraud risk analysis; an annual fraud report; and my staff's attendance at the Civil Service-wide fraud forum. We also continue to promote our whistle-blowing policy to ensure that any individual can raise concerns of potentially illegal or improper behaviour confidentially, and we regularly survey our staff on their attitudes to fraud-related issues.

Mr Kinahan: The Minister has broadly answered my question but not in detail. In light of the fiscal crisis, what lessons has the Minister learned from the case of the Belfast Board? What steps is she taking to ensure that full value for money is achieved in the proposed education and skills authority?

The Minister of Education: I must make it clear that the suspected fraud happened prior to my time as Minister of Education. From the day and hour that I came into the Department of Education, I have put equality and adherence to statutory duties at its core — that is equality in procurement, access to services and funding. Placing equality and adherence to statutory duties at the core of our work is the best way to ensure that it does not happen again.

The other measures that have been taken include the fraud risk analysis, the annual fraud report, and our participation in ensuring that we spread good practice right across the Civil Service. We also work very closely with the Equality Commission and the Human Rights Commission, both of which are very concerned about many of the procurement issues, and they encourage good practice across the public sector. We also regularly survey staff on attitudes to fraud-related issues.

EMPLOYMENT AND LEARNING

Apprenticeships: Programme-Led

1. Mr Lunn asked the Minister for Employment and Learning for an update on the new programme-led apprenticeships initiative. (AQO 105/10)

The Minister for Employment and Learning (Sir Reg Empey): Between its inception on Monday 7 September and Tuesday 22 September, 2,073 trainees in total have been enrolled on the programme-led apprenticeship programme. That figure comprises 393 females and 1,680 males, and it is likely to remain fluid as training suppliers continue to assess and add young people to the programme. As we are still within the assessment time frame, it is not yet possible to provide more detailed information on the programme, such as uptake by occupational area.

Mr Lunn: I thank the Minister for his answer. Will he assure the House that that programme is only a stopgap initiative during the economic downturn and that employer-led apprenticeships will eventually become the main thrust of the Department for Employment and Learning's initiatives when there is a subsequent upturn? What reaction has the Department had from employers so far? I realise that the programme is in its early days.

The Minister for Employment and Learning: The decision to reintroduce programme-led apprenticeships is my Department's response to the economic circumstances in which we find ourselves. I am personally committed to the employer-led scheme, because it delivers the best possible solution. However, Members must be aware that, had we left it simply as it was, given the number of employers that has ceased to take on apprentices this year, or has reduced its numbers dramatically, thousands of young people would have had no outlet. Many of them would have joined the ranks of those not in employment, education or training, of which there are already far too many.

I know that Members have concerns about the programme, but I have not changed my view. Young people have voted with their feet, and, in the first couple of weeks, more than 2,000 people signed up to the programme, for which they will be trained in a simulated work environment and receive a recognised qualification. It is not the best possible solution, but it is far better for young people to be in this programme-led scheme than for them simply to be on the dole. I hope that other Members take the same view.

Mr Shannon: I thank the Minister for his response and the encouraging statistic that more than 2,000 people have enrolled in the scheme. I take on board his remarks about that. In the programme-led apprenticeship scheme, does the Minister have anyone from industry to assist him in coming up with initiatives that will also help industry? We are all conscious that, in our communities and the boroughs that we represent, a great many apprentices want not only apprenticeships but jobs at the end of them. I am keen to know the answer to that.

The Minister for Employment and Learning: Under the previous arrangements, an apprentice had to have a contract of employment with an employer. There is no doubt that that is the ideal way in which to conduct apprenticeships, and that is how it used to be done. The way in which our industry, unfortunately, allowed apprenticeships to slip is one of the mistakes that was made in the past 20 years. Some of the larger employers have stopped taking on apprentices completely. Naturally, we have consulted them. I know that one or two representative bodies have written to Members to indicate their concern about that. However, at the end of the day, we must make a choice. If employers will not provide contracts of employment, we cannot get apprentices into employer-led apprenticeships.

We were faced with a dilemma, and we concluded that it was far better at least to have young people in a work environment in which they would have probably only one day a week in a work placement rather than four days, which we would much prefer. As the Member said, the numbers speak for themselves, and I hope that they will grow. We had a target in mind of 2,500, and we are very close to that now. It is not the most ideal solution, but we have been in touch with employers.

In fact, I have spoken to some of the organisations that submitted written responses. When I talked to them privately, they understood the situation and appreciated that the programme-led scheme is a response to an emergency that is not of the Department's making.

Mr McGlone: What specific action is the Minister's Department taking to ensure that apprentices are placed in longer-term training opportunities that give them some stability and ensure that, in the current downturn, they feel that some sort of future is being presented to them?

The Minister for Employment and Learning: That is our primary concern. The apprentices will attain a recognised qualification at the end of their period in the programme-led scheme. However, if an opportunity arises for an apprentice to become employed, the Department will take a flexible approach so that the apprentice does not lose any of the time spent working towards a qualification. Given the circumstances, we must be flexible, and I have said that I will review the scheme after 12 months to see how it has gone and determine whether the young people are receiving training of the highest quality. The existing quality control mechanisms, which are backed by the Education and Training Inspectorate, will apply to the scheme; it will be subject to the same scrutiny and quality control as every other scheme that the Department operates. I hope that my answer will give Members confidence that standards will be maintained.

WorldSkills

2. Mr Savage asked the Minister for Employment and Learning for his assessment of the achievement by the Northern Ireland participant who was successful at the recent WorldSkills event in Calgary. (AQO 106/10)

The Minister for Employment and Learning: The winning of a bronze medal at WorldSkills International in Calgary, where he competed against the most talented young people in the world, was a magnificent achievement for Trevor Woods from County Fermanagh, who was the Northern Ireland competitor on Team UK. Northern Ireland has again shown that its system of skills training is world class and that its talented workforce has the high level of skills required to compete in the global economy. Members will remember that Northern Ireland also won a gold medal in Helsinki four years ago and a bronze medal in Japan two years ago.

Mr Savage: I thank the Minister for his answer. How has participation in the event benefitted the Northern Ireland economy? What is being done to prepare Northern Ireland participants for the next WorldSkills International event, which will be held in London in 2011?

The Minister for Employment and Learning: I am one of four in a ministerial team that has, for the past two years, been preparing for the WorldSkills International event that will take place in London in 2011. The competition generates keen interest, as local heats and competitions are run in Northern Ireland and other parts of the UK. The Northern Ireland participant, Trevor, was chosen to be the only UK competitor in his particular field.

I attended the event in Calgary, at which more than 900 competitors represented over 50 countries in approximately 40 different trades and professional qualifications. The fact that Northern Ireland consistently wins medals and keeps competing is a great source of encouragement.

I must tell the House that some countries take the event extremely seriously. The South Koreans had a strong team at Calgary. Any member of that team who won a gold medal was given a house, and the reward for a silver medal was a car. In Northern Ireland, a medal winner is lucky to get a walk round the table. That puts in perspective how seriously some countries take the event. At no cost to employers, they are prepared to train their young people for two years and pay them a wage in the process. That is what Northern Ireland is up against.

Apprenticeships

3. Lord Browne asked the Minister for Employment and Learning how many people have enrolled in apprenticeships during the past two years, and of those, how many are continuing. (AQO 107/10)

The Minister for Employment and Learning: During the two-year period from September 2007 to August 2009, of the 14,235 people who started new apprenticeships, 8,676 are continuing their training.

For those who do not continue, the reasons are many. Some may have been made redundant, and some change for better opportunities. However, the majority will have acquired skills and qualifications, including national vocational qualifications, technical certificates and/or essential skills.

Lord Browne: It is important that young people can avail themselves of training schemes, especially in the economic climate with which we are faced. In light of the figures that the Minister quoted, does he intend to meet employers so that more schemes can be made available and so that those who commence will finish?

The Minister for Employment and Learning: My Department is working with the Learning and Skills Development Agency Northern Ireland to develop retention strategies, which will be rolled out as best practice early in the new year. I am conscious that many people do not finish training schemes, but there are a variety of reasons for that, some of which are positive. We are already working with the universities on retention strategies, so there is no reason why we should not also work on retention strategies for apprentices.

We commissioned the Learning and Skills Development Agency to help to develop the strategy and to identify good practice. As the Member suggested, that will involve discussions with employers. I hope that the combination of those events and that action will result in a more consistent approach to finishing courses.

Mrs McGill: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Will the Minister give his assessment of the number of people over the age of 25 who take up apprenticeships and how that scheme has been going recently? Go raibh maith agat.

The Minister for Employment and Learning: I was waiting for the Member to say “in Strabane” at the end of her question. The programme is going well. The Member will be aware that we recently held a jobs fair in her area. I assume that she wants to mention that today, so I have done it for her. It was a successful, well-supported event in Strabane.

All in all, working with young people, and trying to ensure that we get the uptake and a consistent approach, is one way in which we can all make a contribution to ensure that our young people receive the training and support that they need and are able to play an important role in our economy.

Mr P Ramsey: Will the Minister outline what actions his Department is taking to ensure that apprentices are treated fairly and that there is a consistent approach to the training of apprentices across Northern Ireland? The Committee received a report that expressed concerns because there is no model of good practice regarding the training.

The Minister for Employment and Learning: By and large, the reports that we have received from the Education and Training Inspectorate have been reasonably positive because it regards the vast majority of training as being good or better, but there will always be shortfalls. The Member will know that, when such a large number of people is involved, the inevitable result will be some good training and some not so good training. However, we monitor the quality control, and the Education and Training Inspectorate is very rigid.

In my previous answer, I should have stated that some 43% of the apprentices are over 24 years of age, which is a significant figure. We consistently monitor quality control. At this stage, nothing of concern has come to my attention. However, the inspectorate has an ongoing programme of reviews and inspections, which can throw up difficulties from time to time. Indeed, it may be that we will have to take action in the near future because of one or two of the reports.

3.15 pm

However, I assure the Member and the Committee that the inspectorate is rigorous. The Committee has already met the inspectorate and can call it in to talk to it at any time, so I am confident that our quality control is adequate. The Department took on board comments and criticisms made by the Public Accounts Committee (PAC) about a number of those schemes some years ago. I am sure that the Member is familiar with those comments and criticisms.

Exam Uptake

4. Mr O'Dowd asked the Minister for Employment and Learning how many students paid for, but did not take, exams over the last two years. (AQO 108/10)

The Minister for Employment and Learning: Under further education colleges' fees policies, full-time students under the age of 19 do not pay examination fees; that cost is met by colleges. There is also evidence that some students in full-time education in school also enrol in FE night classes to supplement their learning. Other students must pay the examination fees charged by awarding organisations. Most awarding organisations require their examination fees to be paid within a month of learners enrolling on courses leading to their qualifications. Further education colleges simply collect those fees and pass them on to the awarding body.

My Department does not hold information on the number of students from whom fees are collected but who not go on to sit their exams, nor is that information readily available from college records. Colleges advise that collecting that information would require significant manual checking of individual records, primarily because they do not record the sitting of examinations in a way that enables an automated comparison to be made between exam payments and enrolments.

To put that in perspective, checking the possible 150,000 records involved would take considerable time and could only be done at a disproportionate cost. In addition, it is likely that the information collected would be partial in nature. Unfortunately, I am not in a position to provide the information requested.

Mr O'Dowd: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for providing what information he has. However, his answer raises further questions. A significant number of people, some of whom are publicly funded, sit exams, yet we are not sure whether once that fee has been paid they sit exams. If I have correctly understood the Minister's answer, that causes me concern.

More importantly, and I know that some of this work has been done, are exit interviews conducted with students who drop out of further education courses? It is important to establish why students do not complete their courses: exams are part of those courses. If we can establish the reasons for people exiting courses, corrective remedies can be put in place.

The Minister for Employment and Learning: The point is that colleges act as a collecting agency for the awarding bodies. In other words, after a month it is normally the case that colleges have to collect the fees and pass them to an awarding body. There is no guarantee at that point that a candidate goes on to sit an examination. Something could happen in the meantime; for example, a job could come up.

As I said in my answer, the fees are paid by the college, and students under the age of 19 do not pay exam fees at all. Therefore, it is a cocktail of measures. I take the Member's point and I am happy to consider the situation further, but the substantial and labour-intensive nature of finding out whether each individual sits an exam is a problem. At the end of the day, people who get the qualifications have sat the examinations, so one can deduce a certain amount.

As I said in answer to the noble Lord Browne, the fact is that we are looking at retention issues in general, but with regard to apprentices in particular. We are looking at retention consistently in higher education and have policies in place. I am happy to take on board the point that the Member makes about retention in further education.

Dr McDonnell: I thank the Minister for his answers. Will he give Members any indication or has he any assessment of the drop off in the number of students who are applying to universities here as a result of the economic downturn? There is some impression among the public that fewer people are applying to go to university. Will he confirm or contradict that?

The Minister for Employment and Learning: At this stage in the year, I cannot stand up and give accurate information about that. The anecdotal evidence is that dropout rates in our universities have been falling. On average, the two universities are running at about 10%. Policies are in place, and we are actively working with the universities, which, in turn, are working with students. We get the feeling that the figures are going down, but that was the position before the downturn had really bitten. I cannot confirm to the Member what the position is now, because there is a time lag between events occurring and the information becoming available. Much of the information on which we rely is gathered by the Office for National Statistics.

However, this year, the number of applications to universities was significantly up, by about 7%. Shortly, we will get the acceptance figures, but the anecdotal evidence that I have been getting is that there has been a surge in applications for further education colleges. I suspect that there has also been a lot of pressure on young people to stay at school.

Recently, I was in the US, and I met folk from George Washington University. Incidentally, the fees for that university, including one's keep, are about $52,000 a year. Nevertheless, that university's applications are up, so it may be that in a recession there is a drive into further and higher education, from which we can at least take some hope that more people will emerge with qualifications when the recession is over. That might be a future silver lining. When statistics become available, I will write to the Member.

Further/Higher Education Assistance

5. Rev Dr Robert Coulter asked the Minister for Employment and Learning to describe how the Northern Ireland Bureau in Washington is developing its role to assist our Further and Higher Education sectors. (AQO 109/10)

The Minister for Employment and Learning: The Department, recognising the significance of the increased internationalisation of higher and further education, training, workforce development and research, has appointed a development officer, who will be based at the Northern Ireland Bureau in Washington. The appointment will build on and extend the Department's and the bureau's existing work to support the development of collaborative international partnerships and to foster co-operation across all levels in the higher and further education and research sectors in order to accomplish the Department's goals.

Rev Dr Robert Coulter: Will the Minister describe some of the links between higher education establishments here and those in the US? Does the Minister agree that our participation in the US/Ireland R&D partnership has been good for the sector?

The Minister for Employment and Learning: With respect to the Member's latter point, Science Foundation Ireland began as a result of an economic conference that was held in 2001, and it was ably assisted by the US Administration of that time. Towards the end of last year and at the beginning of this year, we announced a number of investments in research and development involving universities throughout the island.

I want the appointment to promote further links. Both of our universities, and some of our colleges, have links with institutions in North America and, indeed, other parts of the world. Queen's has links with Georgetown University in Washington, and, in the past few weeks, a professor from George Washington University came over to meet people from, and build links with, the University of Ulster.

I want to accelerate that process, because, in these difficult times, any kind of research is extremely expensive. We know that there are some quality research facilities in our universities, so, given the huge costs that are involved, there are opportunities for collaboration between various institutions across the world, not just confined to North America. As far as I can see, both of our universities, our university colleges and, indeed, some of our further education colleges have that in mind. The development officer's remit covers further as well as higher education.

Mr Burns: Has the downturn led to a fall in the number of overseas students, particularly from America, applying to universities here?

The Minister for Employment and Learning: I am unable to provide that information at this stage because, as I have said, there is a time lag. The last information I saw indicated that there had been a small growth in the numbers of people coming to Northern Ireland universities from countries outside the European Union. I am loath to conjecture that that has continued, but I know that both our universities and those throughout the UK and in the Republic are targeting students from jurisdictions outside the European Union. They are doing so for two reasons. The first is financial: they get very substantial fees. The second is breadth: in one research facility at Queen's, there are people from 35 different countries. Such diversity creates networks across the world. There are a whole lot of reasons why universities are targeting people outside the European Union. I cannot give the Member up-to-date information as yet, but once it becomes available I will be very happy to pass it on to him.

I support moves to bring people from diverse regions to Northern Ireland. As Members know, for many years there have been very strong links between Queen's University and Malaysia, and other universities are creating such links. This month, Queen's University is setting up a campus at the University of Malaya in Kuala Lumpur. Our universities are active in this matter, but I cannot give the Member the figures he is asking for.

QUB/Stranmillis: Proposed Merger

6. Mr Spratt asked the Minister for Employment and Learning for an update on the proposed merger of Queen's University and Stranmillis University College. (AQO 110/10)

The Minister for Employment and Learning: Following receipt of the business case for the proposed merger of Queen's University and Stranmillis University College, my officials have been engaged in ongoing dialogue with both institutions to test the robustness of the business case and ensure that it meets HM Treasury green book standards.

It is anticipated that the exercise will be completed shortly and that the business case will be given formal departmental approval, prior to being forwarded to the Department of Finance and Personnel for consideration. If the business case is approved by both Departments, I will then consider the policy elements of the proposed merger before deciding whether to progress to consultation stage.

Mr Spratt: The Minister is aware that one issue raised when the merger was first mooted was the religious education ethos of Stranmillis University College. Queen's University gave an undertaking that that would continue. Will the Minister assure the Assembly that he will press for that point to be made during any future merger, given that the religious ethos is continuing at St Mary's University College?

The Minister for Employment and Learning: I am very much aware of the issue that the Member raises. He will recall that, some years ago, a change was made to the status of Stranmillis College against the wishes of my party and his. I have to deal with the reality of the situation.

The Member is referring to undertakings made by the university; and I must look at those undertakings and see how they will fit into any legislation that might be brought before the House. In an area of such significance, undertakings and assurances are fine up to a point, but they need to have practical backing. I assure the Member that that will be part of my considerations. I am not giving the Member any indication, at this stage, as to where or how it might be done, if it is done. The next stage will be to send the business case to the Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP). If DFP is content, then the issue will come to my Department for a decision on the policy aspect. I assure the Member that, at that time, the issue will be on my agenda.

I have also indicated that I will then move to consultation. The Committee will also want to be involved. If we find that a consensus emerges, a Bill will go through the legislative process in this Chamber, and I have already indicated that I will not be seeking accelerated passage for that process.

Ms Lo: Given that Queen's University has proposed to cut 100 jobs in various departments; will the Minister be seeking, during his assessment of the business case, to protect jobs in Stranmillis College?

3.30 pm

The Minister for Employment and Learning: If the Member has been following events that are taking place in higher education in GB, she will be aware that there have been significant reductions in staff across universities. That is because the grants coming from central government to universities have been reduced significantly, which has not happened here.

However, the Member is getting at the point that, under the current academic plan, reductions in staff at Queen's University were based on the poor research ratings of some departments, and a number of people felt that that militated against the teaching element of the university. The university has given undertakings about the teaching staff at Stranmillis University College. I spoke informally to the vice chancellor about that at a recent event, and I was assured that the university was still standing over its undertaking.

However, that is one of the issues that we will have to discuss in the Chamber when, and if, we get to the point of a merger. I know that it is an issue in many people's minds. At the end of the day, universities throughout the country are going through a very difficult time, given that significant cuts are being made. However, I know that Members will want to assure themselves about the issue when the legislation is presented.

Mr Deputy Speaker: That concludes Question Time.

ASSEMBLY BUSINESS

Mr Ford: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. I wonder whether you would consider discussing with the Speaker again the guidance that is given for the conduct of Question Time. Specifically, the second question for oral answer to the Minister of Education this afternoon came from Mr David Simpson. That resulted in your calling a Member of Mr Simpson's party who was heckling from a sedentary position while at least two Members were on their feet in accordance with what I understood to be the guidance on how people should indicate their wish to ask supplementary questions. To the best of my knowledge, Trevor Lunn and Alasdair McDonnell were both on their feet at that point.

Further to that point of order, question 4 from Dr McCrea was very specifically a South Antrim constituency question, and it was phrased as such. Mr Paul Maskey, a Member from West Belfast, was called when Mr Thomas Burns and I were both on our feet, and he was, therefore, called in preference to Thomas Burns and to the exclusion of me. I wonder whether you would consider discussing the guidance with the Speaker; I suspect that I am possibly not the only person who is confused at this stage.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I am certainly happy to discuss the matter with the Speaker and with the Member outside the Chamber. However, the Member was not in the Chamber for the initial part of the question; that is why he was not called to ask a supplementary question.

Mr Ford: Further to that point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker, I am sorry, but I was in the Chamber for all the questions for oral answer to the Minister of Education.

Mr Deputy Speaker: We will look at the Hansard report to see exactly what the situation is. If I am wrong, I will correct the situation.

The DUP Member in question was called as the Chairperson of the Committee for Education. That issue has been raised several times. I think that if you were to look at all the questions and supplementary questions, you would see that there is quite a good balance in that Members of all the political parties get to ask both questions and supplementary questions. However, I am certainly happy to discuss it.

Mr Ford: Further to that point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker, the specific issue that I raised was that Mr Storey was heckling from a sedentary position when Trevor Lunn and Alasdair McDonnell were on their feet. I thought that the Speaker had made it quite clear how people would be called; however, it is obvious that I am confused.

Mr Deputy Speaker: As I say, we will discuss it, but the issue was that Mr Storey was called as the Chairperson of the Committee for Education. Whether he was heckling —

Mr Ford: He was sitting.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I ask the Member to respect the authority of the Chair.

National Asset Management Agency

Debate resumed on amendment to motion:

That this Assembly expresses deep concern at the possible negative economic consequences for the island of Ireland if the National Asset Management Agency legislation currently under consideration by Dáil Éireann is passed; and calls on the First Minister and deputy First Minister to raise the issue at the North/South Ministerial Council to agree a way forward regarding these assets which will ensure the economic stability of the island of Ireland and movement towards economic growth. — [Ms J McCann.]

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

Civil Service: Equal Pay Claim

Mr Deputy Speaker: I advise Members that a substantial number of individual equal pay cases has been lodged with the Office of the Industrial Tribunals and the Fair Employment Tribunal (OITFET). I, therefore, warn Members that they must not refer to specific cases and must confine their remarks to the general topic of the motion. Should any Member disregard what I have said, I will immediately intervene. If that is clear, we will now proceed.

The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer will have 10 minutes in which to move the motion and 10 minutes in which to make a winding-up speech. All other Members who are called to speak will have five minutes.

Mr O'Loan: I beg to move

That this Assembly notes with concern that the Civil Service equal pay claim remains unresolved despite the Assembly resolution of 1 June 2009 calling on the Minister of Finance and Personnel to ensure that the staff affected receive their back pay within three months; welcomes the assurance by the Minister that the financial implications of a resolution to this matter will have to be faced in a manner compatible with the Department's legal obligations; and calls on the Minister to state an early date by which a comprehensive settlement offer will be made to the trade union representing the staff concerned.

We were to debate the motion last week, and I thank all who were involved in rescheduling the debate, including the Minister, the Speaker, staff, and the party whips, who all agreed that the motion would be debated today. It is an important motion, which is being looked at closely by a large number of civil servants who are entitled to fairness in their pay settlement, having been underpaid for a considerable number of years.

It is now one year and four months since the previous Minister of Finance and Personnel, Mr Robinson, gave a commitment to settle the claim by negotiation. A year and four months is a long time, and we have still not got a settlement or a clear sign of a settlement.

The essence of the motion is that it asks the Minister to state an early date by which a comprehensive settlement offer will be made. The word "comprehensive" is important. We are not trying to fudge the issue or get some sort of ad hoc settlement that would not actually be agreed by the union on behalf of the staff. We want the matter to be properly settled. It is true, as the Minister has previously indicated, that his making an offer is not the end of the matter; the union has to decide on it, and each worker has to be individually negotiated with. However, the one thing over which the Minister has control is the date on which he can make a comprehensive settlement offer. That is what the motion asks him to do.

The Assembly resolution of 1 June 2009 is referred to in today's motion. It noted with concern that the Civil Service equal pay claim remained unresolved and called on the Minister to ensure that the staff affected received their back pay within three months.

I am interested in the fact that the Minister, when he spoke to the Committee on 9 September, said:

"I am conscious that an Assembly motion that was passed on Monday 1 June 2009 called for payments to be made within three months. That target has passed. Given that the review of technical grades was not due to finish until August 2009, it was never going to be achievable."

That seems to contrast with what Peter Robinson, now the First Minister, says about the Assembly's role. During Question Time on Monday 21 September, he said:

"However, under the Pledge of Office and the ministerial code, the existing rules, regulations and procedures require that every Minister complies with the decisions of the Assembly." — [Official Report, Vol 43, No 3, p142, col 2].

I would have thought that a decision that was unanimously carried by the Assembly was a decision of the Assembly.

The First Minister continued:

"If the Assembly takes a decision, it is the responsibility and obligation of Ministers to comply with that decision. That is the present legal position; it shows strength in the system and respect for the Assembly." — [Official Report, Vol 43, No 3, p142, col 2].

Indeed, respect for the Assembly is something that we could look for.

The stance of the current Minister of Finance and Personnel differs significantly from that of the First Minister. Even if the Minister of Finance and Personnel were to present some difficulties in meeting the claim, some recognition of that Assembly motion and some response to the Assembly on how he was handling the matter would have been very welcome. The Assembly did not receive such a response.

I did not see any impetus given to the review of the TG1 and TG2 grades, and we were told that that would take three months. The time that any such exercise requires is surely dependent on the resources and energy that are brought to it. I am disappointed that there is no sign of that review's being hurried onwards.

I am also disappointed to read NIPSA tell us at the end of August in one of its regular newsletters to its members of:

"Management Side's attempt to stall negotiations until the review was completed".

That does not indicate that the Department was hurrying the issue along.

I took a little bit of confidence, but only some, from a commitment that the Minister of Finance and Personnel gave to me in a letter dated 10 August 2009. He said:

"I agree that the financial implications of a resolution to this matter will have to be faced but it is my responsibility to ensure that this is done in a manner that is compatible with our legal obligations, fully informed by the facts".

I was very happy with those words, because I have argued strongly that there is a real problem with the fact that senior the Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP) staff and the Minister have said previously that they have to be mindful of the consequences of the equal pay claim. I was less pleased that the Minister continued in that letter:

"but also in a manner than minimises any impact on public services."

When the Minister appeared before the Committee for Finance and Personnel on 9 September, he said, regarding a settlement:

"it must be done in such a way as to minimise any adverse impact on the public services that might result from having to fund the settlement that proves possible following negotiations with the unions. We need to work towards securing a resolution that minimises the impact on public services, and I do not make any apology for that."

I raised the point at the Committee, and all parties on the Committee agreed, that those are separate issues. A fair settlement is needed. If staff demonstrate in negotiations that they are entitled to a particular settlement, it ought to be awarded. The consequences of the settlement would then have to be faced. As I have said before, if anything else were said in the negotiations, it would be moral blackmail.

A year and four months ago, we were told that it was possible that the settlement would cost more than £100 million. Since then, figures of £200 million and more have been quoted. One is entitled to ask how that money will be found. In a recent letter to all Departments, the Minister outlined that he has serious financial problems for next year because of a shortfall in the order of £370 million. I welcome the Minister's honesty and frankness about the situation, and I understand his point that he cannot quantify how much the settlement will cost, because that would become an instrument in the negotiations. He cannot fully declare his hand.

How will the Minister reassure staff that the money is there, and when is it likely to be paid?

It is now the end of September 2009. Is the Minister telling us that if the settlement happens quickly, there is a possibility that the money could be paid during the current financial year; or is he ruling that out? Directness is needed on that issue.

4.00 pm

One senior official told us that the money would be paid — it would be in people's pockets — three months after a settlement has been reached. I appreciate those words. At least, that is the beginnings of a timetable. People are looking for indications of a timetable.

The issue has hinged on female workers who claim to do equivalent work to that of certain male workers. If that is substantiated, it may turn out that there are male workers in the same grades as those female workers. In Britain, an Employment Appeal Tribunal ruling said that such male workers should receive equal treatment. I ask the Minister whether he will honour that.

I am told that a majority of NIO staff are seconded from the Northern Ireland Civil Service, and in the long run, many of them will be associated with justice and policing. Therefore, it is hoped that their future will be secured when those matters are devolved. Again, I welcome what the Minister has said in that regard; that he hopes and expects that that will happen shortly. His party has a great deal of say on that issue.

Can he confirm whether back pay will apply to Northern Ireland civil servants who have been seconded to the NIO from DFP?

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr McClarty] in the Chair)

Above all, I ask the Minister for urgency and absolute clarity. If he can do what the motion asks and give a clear, indicative date by which he expects a comprehensive settlement to be made, he will receive a warm welcome, not only from the Assembly and from me, but, above all, from the 9,000 staff who are affected.

Mr Weir: Although I am the Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel, I will not speak in that capacity in the debate; I will speak as a DUP member. I understand that, similarly, the Chairperson of the Committee will speak on behalf of Sinn Féin.

The Civil Service equal pay claim is an important topic that deserves to be treated with respect and realism. In doing so, the Assembly cannot allow the tone of the debate to become enmeshed in some of the myths surrounding the issue. Occasionally, the media have given the unfortunate impression that the 9,000 staff who are affected are all female and are all from the Catholic community.

It may well be that a majority of affected staff are female and Catholic. However, it is misleading and, indeed, discourteous, particularly to male and Protestant employees who are affected. It also gives an impression that, in some way, the matter has been delayed deliberately from a perverse sectarian motive. That is not the case.

Mr O'Loan: I thank the Member for raising that point. He is quite right. I believe that, by the nature of the issue, the vast majority of workers who are affected are female. By unhappy coincidence, some element of a majority of staff in the lower pay grades might be Catholic. Therefore, there might be that bias in the figures. However, that is not the central issue, and I have never made it so. Occasionally, some of the media have misrepresented what I have said in that regard.

Mr Weir: To be fair, I would not accuse the proposer of the motion of ever making such comments. Unfortunately, some of the media's presentation of the matter has been simplistic and misleading. That has created a degree of anger among some of the people who are affected.

Another myth is that the matter is focused purely on Northern Ireland. In fact, there have been issues with regard to equal pay and back pay in Departments across the water. Some Members are also involved in local government. Again, the matter is not exclusively that of central government; it exists, both in Northern Ireland and across the water, in a range of councils, where there have been single-status issues, for example.

To add to the complexity of the problem; in England, some of those local government issues have been tackled in tribunals. We have seen a situation in which a trade union reached a deal with the local council and then found itself being sued by its own members who felt that they had not got a good enough deal. Such situations add to the complexity of the matter.

The worst myth of all is that politicians, particularly the Minister and his predecessors, have been dragging their feet and deliberately do not want to solve the issue. Nothing could be further from the truth. Looking at the situation logically, if there were an opportunity to solve the problem as soon and as fairly as possible, why would any politician in his or her right mind not take it? A lot of work has been done, but we are not necessarily at the end of the process. When the previous motion on the issue was brought before the House in June, a number of us said that although we were happy to support the motion and wanted to see the issue resolved as soon as possible, the three-month time frame was not realistic.

Since June, there has been a reasonable amount of progress. The technical side of it, including the examination of the grades, has been completed. Rather than being a delaying tactic by management, that part of the process was agreed between management and the trade unions. Therefore, the accusation that that was a stalling tactic is misplaced.

There have been detailed discussions with the trade unions that are, by definition, private, and picking over the details of those would not be helpful to the process. As part of those discussions, I understand that a proposal was recently made to the trade union. As was indicated, because of individual rights and the fact that a large number of the employees has sought tribunal action, even when agreement is reached between management and the trade unions, a considerable amount of work will have to be done with individual employees. It is clear that there is a legal obligation. The Minister and the Executive are committed to meeting their obligations and ensuring that the process is fair.

Another reason why the process has taken so long, and why it is important to get the right solution, is that there is no point in reaching a settlement that cures the initial problem but stores up a new set of problems and a new set of claims that will have to be addressed in five, 10 or 15 years. We have to learn from the mistakes of the past and ensure that the frustrating and difficult position that staff have been placed in is never repeated and that the solution is sufficiently robust to survive future events.

Considerable work has been done, but there is more to do. It would be wrong of us to pretend that the matter will be sorted out overnight. We should ensure that the process is fair and that the dispute is resolved as soon as is practical.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I ask the Member to draw his remarks to a close.

Mr Weir: I commend the Minister and his predecessors for their efforts to resolve this very difficult situation so that all staff receive a fair deal.

Ms J McCann: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I am speaking as a Sinn Féin Member and not as the Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel.

I am grateful for the opportunity to speak on this important issue that needs to be resolved. As other Members have said, there are ongoing negotiations with the British Treasury on this and other monetary issues. Hopefully, the Minister will give us an update on those in his response.

Although some of the civil servants affected by the issue are male, it is agreed that most of them are women, so I want to speak about the gender pay gap that exists. Despite legislation on equal pay, including the Equal Pay Act 1970, the 1984 amended version and the Sex Discrimination Order 1976, women's average hourly earnings are only 83.4% of men's. Therefore, in many cases, women who do the same job as men still get paid less. That gender pay gap widens with age and qualifications.

There is an onus on employers to have fair and non-discriminatory systems in the workplace, as those are essential components that contribute to overall productivity in the employment arena.

We all have a responsibility to ensure that that gender pay gap starts to close, because women have the right to equal pay for equal work. All employers need to adopt equal pay policies in conformance with legislation, and the Government should be leading by example.

Mrs D Kelly: If the Government and Ministers are to be leading the way, why have the deputy First Minister and First Minister not pushed on and published the equality action plans to tackle gender inequality?

Ms J McCann: I thank the Member for that point. Going back to the issue that we are debating here, this dispute affected women who were not only routinely denied promotion opportunities because of their gender, but received less pay than male colleagues for the same work. Many of those female civil servants are now retired, and they should not have to wait until agreement is reached between the Minister of Finance and the British Treasury. However, I am conscious that negotiations are ongoing.

It is well over a year since the former Minister of Finance gave a commitment that the situation would be resolved and the pay inequalities dealt with. The people who are owed that back pay, and union officials working on their behalf, have been frustrated by the delay in reaching a negotiated settlement. I am led to believe that a review by the Department of technical grades 1 and 2 has been completed, and that NIPSA is studying and discussing its findings with its members. Sinn Féin is asking that the issue be resolved as soon as possible, and that those who are owed back pay be given it. We support the motion.

Mr McNarry: This is an issue about workers and their rights, and none are more concerning or compelling than a person's right to pay, or, in this case, to back pay. Although I appreciate the technical arguments, those workers have been caught up in — and I am being charitable — well-intentioned promises of action and delivery times which have so far failed to materialise.

The motion is a timely reminder of what the then Finance Minister Peter Robinson announced to the House in May 2008. He said that up to 9,000 junior civil servants had been underpaid. No question of prevarication on the issue: 9,000 people underpaid. Robinson estimated an individual cap of £20,000 at an estimated cost of £100 million. If the back pay could have been settled then, would DFP have got away with £100 million of borrowing?

It says a lot for DFP's financial management that there is now big pressure to borrow in order to settle, and still it does not know how much to borrow. This is borrowing, not scrambling around the Departments to divvy up on efficiencies; this is borrowing to fill the hole. It also says a lot that no one is denying that the figure of £100 million may have doubled or even trebled in the final settlement, and that the Treasury will be called in to bail out the Department irrespective of the figure. Borrowing to pay the settlement it will be. Where will the money then come from to meet in the region of £25 million for year-on-year consequences?

Will the Government pay up on the settlement and then dismiss the workforce because they cannot afford to employ them? If that will ever be the case, we will reject that as an outcome.

I heard Robinson — now the First Minister — referring to the Ulster Unionists and the SDLP as “economically illiterate”. The SDLP is able to speak for itself. For my part, however, that sounds as if the DUP is rattled and caught out again, as was illustrated by the Finance Minister's behaviour earlier today. We have been spelling out the challenges for six months, and I can assure the Minister that I can count and I can add up. So, too, can our leading economists.

The media have been carrying headlines such as “The Executive could do more for the recession” and “Executive under fire over Budget review”. Even the Minister has triple-somersaulted from his position only last week, when he finally admitted that there was a black hole, to telling the ‘Belfast Telegraph’ that the DUP will introduce big cuts in public spending and reintroduce water charges.

As for his remarks earlier about my figure of 15%, the source was Eamon Ryan, the Minister of Communications, Energy and Natural Resources in the Republic. I rest my case on that source.

4.15 pm

When cuts are contemplated, it is understandable that pressure will mount, and access to funds will become even more difficult. Junior staff in that workforce — not the high flyers — many of whom are constituents, will be nervous when their claims are held back longer. That is the situation that we will face. It would be helpful to hear assurances from the Minister today. The Ulster Unionist Party supports the SDLP motion.

Ms Lo: I am not a member of the Committee for Finance and Personnel, but I have received correspondence from my constituents, who are among the 9,000 current and former civil servants who are waiting for the issue to be resolved. Most of those civil servants are low-paid female clerical staff who earn around £12,000 or £13,000 a year, and many are staff on the front line who work in stressful jobs in social security offices. They are looking forward to receiving six years of back pay, which amounts to up to £20,000. Many people feel that there has been much talk and that the money should have been in their pockets by now.

It is no wonder that people are frustrated; a year after Peter Robinson's announcement of the settlement, the Department introduced a grading review of staff in TG1 and TG2 jobs. Understandably, people became suspicious that it was a ploy to stall the whole process. People are concerned and feel that those delays will make them lose out on their rightful entitlement eventually. They are concerned that they will lose thousands of pounds in back pay every year that the settlement is delayed and that the back pay could be paid from a later date.

Staff accept that it is a complex issue that must be worked through. A new, robust system should be put in place to prevent a similar situation in the future. However, people have been waiting for a long time. We have not only a legal obligation to settle those equal pay claims but a moral responsibility to achieve fairness and equality. Staff have made thousands of claims to the Office of the Industrial Tribunals and the Fair Employment Tribunal. If those cases proceed, they will be time-consuming and costly for everyone. A negotiated settlement should be offered to NIPSA urgently to resolve the issue within the next few months. I support the motion.

Mr Hamilton: As previous contributors have said, there is no doubt that this is an important issue that is causing real concern for the 9,000 civil servants who are directly affected by the equal pay claim. In their grades, 9,000 men and women who work at the coalface of the Civil Service have not been historically rewarded with equal pay for work of equal value.

I listened closely to the proposer — as I always do — and, although I do not doubt the sincerity of his concern one iota — as I do not doubt anybody else's concern for civil servants who are affected by the matter — it is somewhat rich for the SDLP to lecture successive DUP Ministers of Finance and Personnel about the issue.

Why is this issue being tackled now, and why are we discussing it today? It is because the then DUP Minister of Finance and Personnel Peter Robinson made a commitment to resolve it. If, or rather when, this matter is resolved, it will be due to the efforts of DUP Ministers of Finance and Personnel.

The same cannot be said of previous SDLP Ministers of Finance and Personnel. The inequalities of Civil Service pay existed when SDLP Finance Ministers were in post. At that time, even though those inequalities existed, and those Ministers knew it existed, no offers, no commitments and no efforts were made to resolve this important issue, and it was allowed to persist. The SDLP can criticise DUP Ministers of Finance and Personnel for not resolving the matter in the sort of artificial timescale that that party wants to construct, but at least there is an effort and a commitment, and there will be a resolution because of the efforts of DUP Ministers.

Mr McCarthy: Does the Member agree that the majority of those who are waiting and who are, in most cases, dependent on the resolution of this issue are not in the least interested whether it is resolved by a DUP Minister, an Alliance Party Minister or an SDLP Minister? All they want to see is the matter resolved and the money put in their hands before much longer.

Mr Hamilton: I do not disagree with the Member; I believe that those who are affected want the matter resolved and do not particularly care whose fault it is. However, it is difficult to take the criticism and the implication from the SDLP Benches that there is prevarication and delay on the part of DUP Ministers. This issue sat, at the early part of the decade, unresolved — untouched, in fact — by SDLP Ministers of Finance and Personnel. Criticism of the DUP is unwarranted; in fact, criticism of the SDLP is warranted, because that party did absolutely nothing to resolve the matter satisfactorily.

In the previous debate on the issue on 1 June 2009, as Mr Weir said, many of us warned that the artificial timescales that were being demanded of the Minister of Finance and Personnel were completely unrealistic, given the complexity of the issue. By their very nature, these issues can be difficult, protracted and complex. That is why it has taken time to get to this point. No one with any sense would want us to rush in and settle the matter at an incorrect figure and get it wrong, not just for the civil servants who are affected now but for future civil servants. We must not store up trouble for the long term.

The job evaluation that was carried out was completely necessary, and, as Mr Weir said, that was agreed to by the unions because they could see the need for it. When we judge what equal pay is, we must also know what represents work of equal value. That helped to solidify for negotiations those figures that we are looking to settle on, and also ensured that when the matter is dealt with, it is dealt with once and for all so that we do not have to come back to something similar in five years or ten years' time.

There are financial implications in resolving this issue. The SDLP says that it wants the Minister of Finance and Personnel to pay this claim now, but it reserves the right to criticise how he would pay for it. I await the day when the matter is settled, for there is no doubt that the SDLP will again complain about how the Minister of Finance and Personnel will propose to pay for the claim. There are implications for the Executive, not just in paying the claim now but on an ongoing basis. I am well aware of the effect that a settlement could have on paying higher rates of pay if people are moved into different pay bands, and on how some civil servants perform outsourced work for other parts of the Civil Service in the United Kingdom.

There is also a need to arrive at a proper figure, not just for the Minister of Finance and Personnel in dealing with his Executive colleagues but for potential further negotiations with the Treasury. Even if the issue were resolved this afternoon, there is a need to consult the unions so that they can assess the figures and ballot their members on whether to accept the settlement. Given that situation, delays are inevitable.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr Hamilton: I support the civil servants, but patience is required to resolve the matter correctly.

Mr F McCann: Tacaím leis an rún seo. I support the motion and commend the Members who have, once again, brought the matter to the Floor of the House.

I believe that everyone recognises the importance of finding a fair and genuine solution to this long-running saga. The only people who have suffered are the thousands of workers who were denied their rights to fair treatment and rates of pay. The Assembly has, by and large and across the political divide, supported the right of workers, not only to be treated fairly but to be treated equally. That has not always been the case.

Many thousands of workers were denied their proper rate of pay under direct rule. That was wrong. I hope that we, as an Assembly, have learned lessons from that. Many people think that there are still inequalities in workers' rates of pay. The Minister needs to go the extra mile in ensuring that those affected by the issue are recompensed as a matter of urgency.

On 9 September 2009, the Finance and Personnel Committee was advised that a review of technical grades 1 and 2 had been completed over the summer and that NIPSA had been given access to the report. I hope that that marks an end to the issue.

In the most recent debate on equal pay for civil servants on 1 June 2009, I asked the then Finance Minister to explain what would happen to the back pay of those workers who have passed away before the issue has been resolved. What happens to their rights? Do their families have a right to claim on their behalf? Those questions have not been properly answered. It is not good enough to say that those moneys can be pursued legally. Those people were discriminated against, and their families should have the right to receive the compensation that their deceased loved ones were entitled to. That point has been raised with me by a number of people.

Many of us have been lobbied by our constituents on the issue. Those people are not faceless; they may be our constituents, but they are also our neighbours, friends and relatives. We understand their need to challenge the injustice that they have faced.

In June this year, my colleague from Upper Bann John O'Dowd said that the Assembly expected the matter to be dealt with fairly and quickly. The Minister needs to be proactive to ensure that this long running injustice is settled to everyone's satisfaction. However, we must ensure that we do not go into another year without the matter being settled. That is the task that we must set ourselves.

It would be great if, 12 weeks before Christmas, those workers were given the news that the Assembly has responded to their justified claims and delivered on them. We all have a responsibility to ensure that the situation is brought quickly to an end, not just for the satisfaction of the workers but the Assembly as a whole.

Mr Bresland: On one hand, it is difficult to argue with the sentiments of the motion. Like most MLAs across the parties and across the country, I have received many letters, e-mails and phone calls from irate civil servants who are wondering why they have not received the back pay that they were promised. It is very important that the matter is resolved as soon as possible. However, it is not as simple as the proposer of the motion makes out.

When the motion calling on the Finance Minister to ensure that the affected staff receive their back pay within three months was passed on 1 June, colleagues on these Benches warned of the dangers of setting a definite date because of the complex nature of the outstanding issues. Members opposite were more interested in scoring a cheap point against a DUP Minister and would not listen.

The issue is very complicated and resolving it will cost a considerable amount of money. Remember, it was the DUP who fought for and got extra money from the Treasury last year — £100 million in total — to address a range of pressures, including equal pay. Today, we face ever increasing financial pressures, and there are signs that the issues will cost more than £100 million to put right. Where will the money come from? Can we rely on the Treasury to come to our aid?

However it is done, we must ensure that the settlement of the equal pay claim is not only fair and meets all legal obligations but that it ensures that we never have to face this kind of situation again. I commend the efforts of the Finance Minister and his predecessors to resolve the long-running dispute and urge him to continue his negotiations with interested parties so that the matter can be resolved once and for all.

4.30 pm

Mr A Maginness: Over several months, I, and colleagues from the SDLP and other parties, have met civil servants who feel aggrieved at not being treated fairly with respect to parity of pay. It is unfair that people whose work has been assessed as being of equal value are paid different amounts. Given that this has been the case, staff, rightly and naturally, expect a settlement that includes arrears and future pay entitlements.

The equal pay dispute has been ongoing for too long, and it must reach a conclusion. It is unfair to allow civil servants, many of whom are not well paid, to carry the burden indefinitely. People rightly expected that the dispute would have been resolved a long time ago. They do not understand the delay, especially given the fact that, some time ago, the Minister of Finance and Personnel's predecessor indicated that there would be a conclusion in the near future.

Around 5,000 individual cases are going through the legal tribunal process, and the Northern Ireland Public Service Alliance believes that it has a strong case for equal pay. However, a legal remedy on individual cases may not take account of the very complex financing issues that have to be faced when dealing with the collective pay claim, including back pay and pay going forward. The staff side is realistic about jobs and the economy. Does the Minister agree with the staff side that a collectively negotiated settlement would be much better for all concerned?

We understand that the Minister has inherited an historical dispute, and it is not the Minister's fault — at this point in time, I hasten to add. [Laughter.] The Minister and his predecessors have expressed a desire to reach a settlement, but there has been no settlement thus far. The Minister has to understand the very deep frustration that is felt in Civil Service ranks. I hope that his contribution to the debate will confirm that he will be closely involved in the negotiations on an ongoing basis. Perhaps he will also give us some indication of how he hopes to manage that process. I hope that he will confirm that a clear process is now in place to resolve the dispute sooner rather than later and that officials have the flexibility and authority to negotiate effectively.

Will the Minister outline whether consideration has been given to the cost of settling the dispute with respect to back pay and pay going forward? Will he say whether budgets contain allowances to meet the demands? Given that the dispute involves pay claims relating to a considerable period of direct rule, will the Minister inform the House about the position of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Treasury on their contributions to back pay? A lot of this took place during their watch.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I ask the Member to draw his remarks to a close.

Mr A Maginness: They have a moral duty to satisfy, at least partially, the workers' just demands.

Mr Shannon: This is undoubtedly an issue that has been much publicised of late and on which I have received much correspondence from my constituents in Strangford. Other Members have probably said the same. There is a grave concern that the pay dispute has been put on the back burner. That is certainly not the case.

I have been in contact with the Department on numerous occasions by letter, and I have asked parliamentary questions, and I have every confidence that the matter will be resolved and that it is being worked on at the moment. However, as with most aspects of the Civil Service, it will take time — probably longer than most of us like to wait. That is a key issue, too.

The move will affect 9,000 civil servants in the lowest grades, mostly in secretarial and administrative posts, and workers who have retired from the Civil Service in the past six years could also be entitled to back pay, which could amount to as much as £20,000 each.

A hae heered sim fowk alloo at DFP hes bectreacked oan commitments gien afore bae pas' Meenesters an' i particular bae mae pairtie colleague Mr Peter Robinson. A'hm sarious gled tae saie at es motion isnae maakin thon oot an' 'deed hit 'grees at the plen bes staired an bes onie caa'in fer a tim' line.

I have heard some people say that DFP has backtracked on commitments given by preceding Ministers, in particular my party colleague Mr Peter Robinson. I am glad to see that the motion is not suggesting that. Indeed, it agrees that the plan is in motion, and it is calling only for a timeline.

I have met women and men who have worked faithfully for the Civil Service for most of their working lives and who are waiting patiently for the outcome of the review. I must agree that the sooner they get their back pay the better. However, I am also aware that it is a complex issue that must be studied by the legal department with a view to ensure the fairest possible solution. That has to be good news.

Just last week, a lady who had worked in the Civil Service for some years came to my office. She misses the cut-off point for back pay by less than one year. Therefore, despite her years of underpaid service, she is not entitled to anything, as it stands; that does not seem fair. Because of such cases, I am glad that the legal department is working to see just how far back it can go and to what ends.

The issues involved are complex; the amounts of money involved are potentially very large and could have major implications for public services. Last year, in response to a question for oral answer, the Minister of Finance and Personnel estimated that a one-off payment of up to £100 million was possible. It is, therefore, vital that we get the settlement right, and we are very aware of how much it could cost.

It is not in the public interest to spend the sums that this matter demands without ensuring that it is a final solution and not one that will be challenged time and again. Therefore, it is essential that every "i" is dotted and every "t" crossed. The money that this party and the Minister has fought for to meet the challenge must be used for those who have a claim upon it.

Without doubt, the civil servants who have been underpaid have every right to their pay. I join other Members in asking that the Department carry out the review as soon as possible. However, I am sure that a forced deadline will bring the necessary and expected results.

I have every confidence that my colleague Sammy Wilson and the officials in his Department will bring the matter to an end as soon as possible. There is no doubt in my mind that the issue is being investigated as we debate it and that an end to the issue is on the horizon. I stand with those of my constituents who have contacted me in urging a speedy ending but one that is comprehensive, with every aspect looked at and every group catered for.

I support the civil servants who are entitled to back pay; I support the vital work that they do every day and their right to a fair wage. With that statement of support I add a plea: be patient and be assured that we will not stop dealing with this matter until we reach the correct method of ensuring that everyone receives what they are entitled to.

The DUP gave an assurance and we will keep our word to do what those in government before were perhaps afraid to do: put right that which is wrong and fight for equality in these matters. I support our civil servants and our Minister in his quest to deliver what is requested in the motion.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel (Mr S Wilson): I thank everyone who took part in the debate and for the measured way, by and large — although I might refer to a few individuals — in which the debate took place.

This is an important issue. I am sure that Members' speeches reflected the sort of postbag that I, too, as a Member get from people who want to see the issue resolved.

I also want the issue to be resolved, because of the reasons that Members have given today, including the fact that it affects many people who are not well paid. It has to be resolved anyhow, because, on reaching agreement, we are obliged to make payments, and the longer the process, the larger the bill will be. Therefore, Finance Ministers, the Department of Finance and trade unions have no reason to drag their feet.

However, certain realities have to be faced. I noted what Mr O'Loan said about the need to show respect to the Assembly and to the motions that it agrees. With due respect, the Assembly needs to show some respect for itself. There is no point in the Assembly passing motions that bear no resemblance to the complexity of the issues that my Department is trying to address. On 1 June, the Assembly set a deadline that the issue must be resolved within three months, but that did not happen, and it was never going to happen. Today, the Assembly can pass a motion saying that it has to be done in another three months, but the issue is complex.

The one assurance that I can give is that my Department has sought to move forward as fast as possible. Mr O'Loan did not understand why the review of the two grades took so long, but it was a complex process: 130 posts had to be evaluated, and resources were drawn in from other Departments. For a review of that scale, it was carried out much more quickly than one would normally expect because those additional resources were thrown at it.

Several Members, quite rightly, asked what the timescale is now and whether the issue would be settled and money given out before Christmas. I do not know, because there are a number of imponderables. NIPSA is now looking at the review to see whether it agrees with the findings. My officials and I have now made a proposal to the trade unions. Having looked at the proposal, their response was that they wish to discuss certain issues. My Department is not totally in control of that process of negotiation. It will take time, but I cannot specify how long to the Assembly today.

NIPSA may agree to the proposal tomorrow morning but, even were it to do so, that would not be the end of the story, because it would have to be put to NIPSA members for a vote. Even after that, my officials would have to speak to each individual, because everyone will be affected differently. However, to avoid delay, those stages of the process will not run concurrently. My Department is already taking action so that, if and when agreement is reached, the arrangements will be in place for meeting each of those individuals. Even should we get to that point, there are some people who have taken their cases to tribunal, and that is in their hands.

I am not making excuses; I am simply trying to explain to Members that those realities have to be faced. My only responsibility is to instruct my officials to make a proposal, and that has been done. I have told them to, if possible, do things in parallel, and that is being done. Mr Maginness asked what role I will take in the process. I have made it clear that, if it helps to get my message across and reach a settlement, I am happy to talk to the unions. I want to get this sorted, but I am not going to make promises on the basis that it would be nice to be able to give the timescale that Members demand. There is no point in my committing to a potentially impossible timescale over which I have no control.

A couple of Members referred to a comment that I made at a Committee meeting. I said that there are two issues: fairness and the impact on the public service.

Some Members have decided to interpret that as blackmail. It is not blackmail: it is simply stating the situation. There will be an impact, depending on what happens. I will give an example: there are 1,600 jobs in the Department for Social Development and the Department of the Environment that are outsourced from the Department for Work and Pensions and the vehicle licensing department in Swansea. If the settlement, when it is eventually reached, impacts on the wages costs in those outsourced areas, the DWP and the vehicle licensing department could decide to no longer bring that work to Northern Ireland because costs might be higher than they originally accepted. I am simply stating that cost implications of a settlement will impact on the public service.

4.45 pm

Mr O'Loan: I understand what the Minister is saying, but I do not understand how it becomes a factor in the negotiations. The process has to be based on comparisons: people must get what they are entitled to.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: If it were the case that a fixed sum of money was involved, there would be nothing to negotiate about. However, the word "negotiation" implies that there is an area that is open for negotiation because there are uncertainties and matters about which judgments have to be made. That is the point that I am making. One of those things —

Mr O'Loan: I thank the Minister for giving way again. It is terribly important to clarify that the negotiations are about comparability. We are describing this issue as a claim for equal pay so, surely, all the discussions are essentially about the equal pay issue; equal pay for, allegedly and arguably, equal work. That is the only point at issue; not that the implications for the Finance Minister, if he concedes the point on equality, will be so horrendous that he does not want to go there. That is not part of the negotiations at all.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: The Member is being a bit naïve because, in negotiations, there are a wide range of issues that have to be looked at. When I met the Committee, I made it quite clear that one of those issues was the impact that the settlement would have on the public service. That is something that negotiators have to take into account. As the Member said, it may well be the case that they will simply say that all those issues do not count. That is fine, and that will be their negotiating position. However, in my view, it has to be spelt out that there will be consequences of such a position.

Mr McNarry: When that issue was raised by officials from the Department of Finance and Personnel, it is suffice to say that Committee members were quite horrified at such thinking. Is the Minister saying that in the process of negotiations, it will be transmitted by his negotiators that, in giving and making headway for the settlement, the other side must take or share the responsibility for the consequences that there may be in jobs?

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: I already did that when I spoke to the Committee: I spelt out the position. How people decide to react is entirely for them. I was up front about the matter when I spoke to the Committee, and I welcome the opportunity in the Assembly to indicate the position that I took when I gave that briefing.

That brings me to the issue of cost, which was the central point, and the only relevant part, of Mr McNarry's speech. Most of it was self-justification that was totally unsubstantiated. He claimed that he could count, that he was not economically illiterate and that he was right about there being a black hole. There were more unsubstantiated statements of that kind.

I can understand that he will always want to come back, but he did make one relevant point in a speech that went on for three or four minutes, which was about how the cost of the settlement would be met.

I accept that most Members did not ask about the exact cost. Had they done so and pressed me, I would have given the same answer as I gave the Committee: I do not know what the exact cost will be, because we are still in negotiations and it would be daft of me even to suggest what we believe the global figure might be. That would not be good for negotiations.

At the end of the day, however, the settlement must be funded. There are three options open to us. First, we already have a facility to borrow from the Treasury. That borrowing was not attached specifically to the Civil Service equal pay settlement, but it is money that is available.

Secondly, once the final figure is known, and since part of the pay claim is a legacy issue, I can and am prepared to go to the Treasury. In response to questions from some Members, I have not had any contact with the Treasury. There has been no cause to make contact, because I do not know what the settlement figure is likely to be.

Thirdly, the Executive can consider how resources might be allocated to pay for the settlement. The one thing that I make clear is that, once a settlement has been concluded, we will have an obligation to find the money from some source.

Mr A Maginness: The equal pay claim is a legacy issue. What are the tax implications for recipients if they receive relatively large sums of money that could distort the level of tax that they normally pay? They would be penalised. If they were receiving the money over, say, 10 years, they would not be paying so much tax. That is an issue.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: That is an issue, and, as far as I am aware, payments would be taxable. That may be a matter for negotiations. There are other ways of paying tax that might help to avoid the issues raised by the Member. I think that those issues will form part of the talks with the trade unions.

Anna Lo asked whether people would lose out the longer it takes to reach a settlement. They will not. The longer it goes on, the greater the bill becomes, but the claim stands from the time that it was made. Therefore, negotiations are not a way by which to get people to drop off the list. The Member may have a cynical view of the Minister of Finance, but, in this case, her cynicism is not well founded.

Jennifer McCann said that female staff were being denied promotion opportunities. There is no evidence of that; indeed, all the evidence is that male staff are under-represented at administrative assistant and administrative officer levels. Fra McCann asked about the standing of applicants who have died. Claims by staff who left the Civil Service but who claimed within six months have legal standing; former staff who have not claimed have lost out. Those are the issues that I imagine the trade unions will talk about during the negotiations.

In conclusion, I reiterate that I want to see the equal pay issue resolved. I have sought to do so, and I know that my officials are working hard to get it resolved. However, there is a job of work to be done that is not totally in my Department's control. We seek to sort it out as quickly as possible, making it at least one issue that I can get off the list of things that I must do as Finance Minister.

Mrs D Kelly: I thank all Members for their contributions. I welcome that I have not heard any Member say that they will not support the motion, and I hope that the House will not divide on it.

I am sure that most Members know that today is payday and that many people had been looking forward to having extra money and back pay in their pay packets, but that is not the case. Even after this debate, we still do not have a time when they might expect to have that pay, and that is very disappointing. Although the Minister attempted to address some of the questions that were raised by some Members, we have not yet heard whether he will commit to putting in a bid for some of the money that the British Treasury offered to lend to the Northern Ireland Executive for a range of purposes.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: I thought that I had made it clear that when we reach a settlement with the trade unions that is agreed with the workers, we will be legally obliged to fund that settlement. I offered a range of ways in which that might be done, including taking the money from existing budgets, going and talking to the Treasury or using the facility that is available at present.

Mr McNarry: When Mr Bresland from the DUP was reading the speech that was written for him — certainly, there is no reason why the DUP would not prepare it for him — he congratulated the DUP's Finance Minister for “securing” the £100 million. How does the Member feel that that DUP opinion sits with the one that she has just heard from the Minister about the distribution of the offer?

Mrs D Kelly: There is a discrepancy, and I was going to come to that. The £25 million of ongoing costs for future payments have not been addressed. There seems to be some sort of communication breakdown in the DUP because although the Minister, in his new portfolio, said that he has not approached the Treasury, I understand that the First Minister and the deputy First Minister had this issue on the agenda when they met the British Prime Minister. Somebody is not telling things to somebody else.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: I think that I made it clear that I have not had talks with the Treasury about this matter because we do not know what the sum will be. However, the £100 million facility still stands — Mr McNarry must have difficulty hearing — and it could be used for this matter. Of course, if they so choose, the Executive might decide to finance it in some other way.

Mrs D Kelly: Therein lies the concerns of the people who are owed money. We have not heard whether, as Mr Bresland indicated, there is a clear commitment to use the £100 million for the equal pay claim or whether that will be needed for other purposes, particularly given that the Minister has at last come round to the SDLP's and Ulster Unionist Party's way of thinking, which is that there is a black hole in the Budget.

We have heard this afternoon that, regardless of the principle of equal pay, the Minister has introduced to the negotiations the potential impact of the claim on contracts that are provided through the Department for Work and Pensions and elsewhere. The implication is, therefore, that if we are forced to pay the equal pay claim, we might lose 1,200 jobs. That is the blackmail to which Members referred and that the Minister interpreted when he addressed the Committee.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: I answered in response to a question about what I meant by the impact on the public service. I would be being less than honest if I were not to say that we have contractual arrangements with other Departments in GB and that the equal pay settlement may well impact on the cost of running those contracts. All I was doing was explaining the connection. That is not blackmail; it is just explaining the connection.

Mr McNarry: I am grateful to the Member for giving way, because things are getting very interesting. Does the Member agree that we could not fault anyone who is waiting on the outcome of the settlement for thinking that his or her job has become part of the negotiating exercise? Is that really what has happened with the so-called settlement that is taking so long?

5.00 pm

Mrs D Kelly: Mr McNarry stated some of my concerns well. Regardless of how well intentioned the Minister is in being realistic about the settlement, his words might be interpreted in the way that I described. Equal pay is exactly that: it is a principle whereby people are entitled to their pay, regardless of whether contracts will be won or lost. Surely the British Government cannot say that they will put resources, work and contracts into Northern Ireland only because our workers are cheaper and of less value than their own. Surely some commitment should be made, and surely that should be part of the Minister's negotiations with the British Treasury on the other contracts. There should be no adverse impact as a result of the settlement.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: I thank the Member for giving way; she has been generous in that respect.

I am not clear where the Member is coming from. I was asked a question, and I answered it. I am now being criticised for answering it. Is the Member saying that she would rather that I had kept Members in the dark and not spelled out the implications? There might be no implications, but there could be. I thought that the whole idea of having a debate in the Assembly and of a Minister responding to it is to ensure utter transparency. It seems that when a Minister is transparent and gives an answer, he is criticised for being too honest. I do not think that that is a good way to proceed.

Mrs D Kelly: That was not my intent, but I am concerned about how the matter may be interpreted elsewhere. I was honest in what I said. Surely civil servants need to know that the Minister is fighting and that he is fighting hard for them.

Mr F McCann: Will the Member give way?

Mrs D Kelly: I am running out of time, but I will.

Mr F McCann: This is a point that I raised earlier. Will the Member tell us what the SDLP and Ulster Unionist Ministers did to settle this dispute when they had the levers of power?

Mrs D Kelly: I can give Mr McCann a history lesson if he wishes. As the deputy First Minister often says, we are moving forward, but if Mr McCann wants to talk about Stormontgate and about how unstable the previous political institutions became because of the actions of his party and the DUP, I am happy to do so. However, the motion is about securing the Civil Service claim for back pay.

I was interested to read the Hansard report of Mr Hamilton's contribution during the previous debate on the matter. The DUP tabled an amendment, which called on the civil servants who were affected to receive their back pay within three months or as soon as possible. That amendment was withdrawn well into the debate. During that debate, Mr Hamilton spoke of how the measure should not be used for political point scoring. However, he used the majority of his contribution, as Mr McCann is now doing, for that very purpose. That is interesting.

Mr Hamilton: Will the Member give way?

Mrs D Kelly: I am sorry, I cannot give way; I am almost out of time.

One of the issues that I wanted to raise — if I could find it in my notes — is the importance of taxation. My colleague Alban Maginness raised that matter. The tax on the additional money that is to be paid may be a matter for the negotiations, but I am sure that the burden on those civil servants who are owed back pay could be reduced. I am sure that a commitment to discuss that point would be welcomed widely. Indeed, the Minister took that point on board during his summing up. As some Members said, some individual civil servants are owed as much as £20,000. That is not a small sum by any stretch of the imagination, and it would have a severe impact on their taxation.

Mr Weir said that this is not a sectarian issue, and I do not think that Members want to portray it as such. However, it is a gender issue, as Ms McCann stated.

I welcome Members' contribution to the debate.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly notes with concern that the Civil Service equal pay claim remains unresolved despite the Assembly resolution of 1 June 2009 calling on the Minister of Finance and Personnel to ensure that the staff affected receive their back pay within three months; welcomes the assurance by the Minister that the financial implications of a resolution to this matter will have to be faced in a manner compatible with the Department's legal obligations; and calls on the Minister to state an early date by which a comprehensive settlement offer will be made to the trade union representing the staff concerned.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

McClellan Conacre Case

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes in which to propose and 10 minutes in which to make a winding-up speech. All other Members who are called to speak will have five minutes. One amendment has been selected and published on the Marshalled List. The proposer of the amendment will have 10 minutes in which to propose and five minutes in which to make a winding-up speech. All other Members who are called to speak will have five minutes.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I beg to move

That this Assembly notes with extreme concern the possible extension of the focus on the "McClellan conacre case" by HM Revenue and Customs and is deeply worried at the severe disruption which this could have on our family farming tradition in Northern Ireland.

I say at the outset of the debate that I am happy to accept the amendment standing in the names of Mr McGlone, Mr Burns and Mr Gallagher on behalf of my party because it adds to the substantive motion. I hope that that will help the flow of the debate.

I have no doubt that this issue affects every Member who represents a rural community. Its impact should not be understated: about one third of the land in Northern Ireland is rented out in conacre. It has been accepted historically by HM Revenue and Customs (HMRC) that agricultural land that is rented to other farmers in conacre is part of normal agricultural practice. That is the case with almost every farm in Northern Ireland either renting in, or renting out, land in conacre. However, that land, quite properly, was subject to a business tax relief. As has been identified in the motion, the McClellan case is a clear indication that the Government intend to move away — and, indeed, have moved away — from that justified tax relief.

I will dwell for a moment on the McClellan case because it sets a heavy shadow over the entire farming and rural community of Northern Ireland. The McClellan decision found that the business of letting land in conacre — or, indeed, letting it for livestock — was a business that consisted wholly or mainly of the making of investments and, therefore, that business property relief was not available on such land, and inheritance tax was payable on the excess development value of the land at the rate of 40%. The McClellan decision means that those inheriting agricultural land, which has development or hope potential, let in conacre at the time of the owner's death must pay inheritance tax at the rate of 40% on the development or hope value of the land. The impact of that should be obvious. I am sure that Members have been lobbied about the issue and have recognised its consequences.

There are a couple of case studies from my constituency that set the scene appropriately. Let us take the example of the estate of an elderly farmer on the north coast of Northern Ireland. The deceased was an elderly farmer who let his land in conacre on his retirement from full-time farming. On his death, his smallholding of 36 acres of farmland was found to have an agricultural value of approximately £450,000 and a development value of, potentially, £370,000. His farmhouse was also found to have a value of about £235,000. My constituent, Mr McIntyre, had always hoped that his land would pass on to his children, and, indeed, his grandchildren had expressed an interest in taking on the farm. However, HM Revenue and Customs has found that the family has to pay 40% inheritance tax on the value of the farmhouse and the potential development value of the 36 acres of farmland. The impact of that finding is that the family farm has to be sold to pay a tax bill; the land is not farmed and will not be farmed by the next generation; and the entire infrastructure and livelihood of that family has been changed desperately and decidedly for the worse of the community.

This is an obnoxious stealth tax, and I do not know why it was introduced. The revenue potential for the Government is slim, because, as Members heard in an earlier debate today, the liquidity in the Province for people to buy vast portions of land is so low that the Government will not get or maintain the tax value that they think there is in the hope value of that land. However, they are forcing people to sell their land in order to pay horrendous tax bills, which should not be the case.

The effect of the decision in the McClellan case means that those who inherit farmland that has a significant development potential will, inevitably, have to sell the land to pay the inheritance tax on the development opportunity, even if they have no desire to pursue that development opportunity. Furthermore, if the development opportunity is never pursued, they will have to pay a huge tax bill on the development value. That has thrown many farms across Northern Ireland into disarray, and it is especially pertinent since, as Members know, our farm owners are in the higher echelons of the age brackets. We know that those people have tried to involve themselves in good financial tax planning, and the inheritance tax throws into disarray all tax-planning arrangements and any desire that they may have in their old age of passing on their farm to their sons, grandsons or granddaughters and allowing them to pursue the livelihood that they have enjoyed. That is wrong.

It has been publicised widely that by taking a greater role in the management of agricultural land, such as sowing fertiliser, fixing fences and maintaining the land, the owner will avail him or herself of the application of the business property relief to the land, as it applied in the past. I warn the House that that is not a certainty.

I am aware of another case in my constituency of North Antrim, which I will refer to as case study 2. In that case, a lady farmer who inherited 70 acres of a farm upon her father's death, and having worked the land with her father from an early age, had, in her later years, let out the farm in conacre to a number of neighbouring farmers. The lady took an active interest in the animals, including sheep and speciality cattle, which were grazed on her land, and the speciality cattle were wintered in farm sheds close to the farmhouse. The lady played a significant role in caring for those animals. Upon her death, Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs has been unwilling to accept that agricultural property relief should be available for the value of the house, and the case is being brought before the special commissioner's appeal hearing. It is a running case.

The idea that there is a way round it and that so long as a farmer keeps some active interest in the farmland by maintaining the odd fence, for instance, he or she will be able to get past Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs is wrong. In fact, HM Revenue and Customs recently issued a new inheritance tax manual, which contains a new paragraph relating to agricultural property relief. It sounds the death knell for conacre rights in Northern Ireland. It states:

"The availability of Agricultural Relief is a question of fact and degree to be decided upon the particular facts of each case."

In other words, HM Revenue and Customs will take each set of circumstances case by case — through the courts and through special commissioners if necessary — to see how much money they can squeeze out of the farming community at a time when it is least able to pay.

It is right and proper that the House has an interest in the issue and that we lay down a marker to the Government, to HM Revenue and Customs and to the Prime Minister. I am delighted that the First Minister has made representations to the Prime Minister, and that the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development and the Minister of Finance and Personnel and others have made representations to the Treasury. However, we must speak with clarion certainty that the House will reject the tax, because it will devastate farming and tax planning for the farming community, and it will prevent future farming generations being able to inherit, plough, sow and farm the land in the way that their fathers and forefathers did. The House should take an active interest in the issue and ensure that HM Revenue and Customs hears its voice loud and clear.

5.15 pm

Mr McGlone: I beg to move the following amendment: At end insert

"; and calls on the Minister of Finance and Personnel and the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to engage with Revenue and Customs to find a suitable solution."

Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I listened very intently to what Mr Paisley proposed, and I heard what he had to say.

In its amendment, the SDLP asks that the Minister of Finance and Personnel and the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development engage with Revenue and Customs to find a suitable solution to the problem. Indeed, I note from responses to questions for written answer on 5 May and 19 May 2009 that both Departments were actively engaged with Revenue and Customs on the matter. Indeed, the then Minister of Finance and Personnel stated on 19 May 2009:

"I have written to the Chief Secretary to the Treasury strongly urging her to consider amending the tax treatment of land".

From the start, I must state that I have no particular expertise in matters either legal or accounting. However, I do know that decision in the case is wrong. I also know that it is causing difficulty, hurt and harm, as well as concern for the future of agriculture and farming here.

As Members will know, conacre is a specifically Irish tradition, with those living in rural areas letting small parcels of land for a single crop. In its original form, landowners allocated each conacre tenant a strip of land, to which the tenant was given access to plant and cultivate a crop. However, the tenant did not own the crop until he had paid for it in money, through labour or by a share of the crop. In its modern form, it has become part and parcel of a business, and the business of small farming in particular, and it is absolutely ridiculous that it should ever be regarded as separate "investment activity". Conacre, being temporary by its very nature, earns relatively low returns, and is essentially a way of maintaining land for a farming family that has no particular plans in any given season.

As Members will have read, the McClean case involved 33 acres of agricultural land, parts of which were zoned, and, therefore, the anticipated market realisable value for development purposes was deemed to be £5.8 million, yet the agricultural value was only £165,000. Mrs McClean had inherited the land from her husband in 1983 and, since that time, had let it out to local farmers whose cattle grazed the land from 1 April to 1 November. From 1995, the owner's son-in-law Mr Mitchell organised the letting of the land, as the owner did not have legal capacity to do so. The arrangements were agreed orally and confirmed in writing, and the price was agreed by acre, which is the basis of conacre.

However, as we now know, the special commissioners determined the difference between investment and business, and their conclusion, which the Court of Appeal upheld, was that the letting of those lands constituted a business that consisted wholly or mainly of the holding of investment, and, as such, under the Inheritance Tax Act 1984, it did not attract business property relief.

Agricultural property relief (APR) is available on lands that have been used in agriculture for two years by the person to whom the land was transferred. APR is limited to the agricultural values of those lands, and lands held in conacre were naturally enough entitled to APR, a fact that Revenue and Customs accepted. Furthermore, until recently, Revenue and Customs allowed business property relief on the additional development value, or "hope value", of such lands. Moreover, for income tax purposes, those who grant conacre licences will be allowed business property relief if they are deemed to be conducting a business.

Without delving too deeply into it, the issues in the McClean case were concerned with whether a business was being carried out, whether that business was being carried out by Mitchell or McClean, and whether that business consisted wholly or mainly of holding investments. The special commissioners decided at the time when Mrs McClean died, and in the two years preceding that time, that she was the owner of a business but, because it consisted wholly or mainly of holding investment, that it was not a relevant business property.

However, there are many instances, particularly when area planning has been used to create newly defined towns, villages or dispersed rural communities, in which people living outside zoned land may have a farm of which part lies outside the development zone and part lies inside.

I can think of many in my immediate council area. Those people do not intend to pass the land on for development purposes: they have a working farm and a viable business. This case will have major implications for those people, and it has caused a huge scare in rural areas.

The development issue in zones where the land is let in conacre, or agistment, rather than farmed directly will cause problems, specifically for land zoned in those development areas where the development value of the land, albeit reduced at present, would significantly outstrip the agricultural value.

Around 30%, or 300,000 hectares, of Northern Ireland's total farmland is let in conacre. There is no calculation as to how much of that could, potentially, fall within the development zones, but in those instances where only agricultural property relief applies, the inheritance tax of up to 40% would be applied on the development value of the land. It is incredible that the people who will inherit such property — people who are getting it tight in farming at the moment — will have to pay 40% inheritance tax on the value of land at its deemed zone valuation. It would put them out of business. They would inherit a huge debt rather than a workable farming business. They would be left to sort out that liability as a result of the lack of recognition of the special arrangements for farmers in Northern Ireland. It is a major issue and a source of grave concern.

The inheritance tax liability in the McClean case is estimated at £2.4 million. I was reared on a small farm of 22 acres; my father was a part-time farmer who also owned a garage. When I think of a few of those 22 acres and the liability that the rest of us would have been left with when my father, God rest him, passed on, I find it incredible. It is incredible for the small-farming community and the generations who may inherit and who may wish to farm — instead of being able to farm, they would be left with a huge tax liability round their necks. The situation is impossible.

The situation might seem reasonable to some civil servants and revenue commissioners — and even to some town planners, although not if they come from a farming background. Under the review of public administration, the situation could cause tensions between the new councils and the landowners whose land would be zoned under the area-plan process that we hear about at the moment, which involves the modernisation of planning and the plans afoot for good councils to deem and zone land to match local need. It would be a big problem in those circumstances. People would be contacting their solicitors immediately to ensure that their land was not being zoned. That would have a knock-on effect on affordable housing, housing development and the need to provide roofs over the heads of our younger generations.

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development is in the Chamber but the Minister of Finance and Personnel is not. I appreciate the fact that the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development is from a rural constituency. However, the situation requires a joint approach. The Ministers must take into account the social, economic and farming circumstances of the community, and the Minister of Finance and Personnel must deal with Revenue and Customs on the matter. The SDLP proposed its amendment to ensure that rural society, the legislation and the amendments that may be required are dealt with in a joined-up fashion to represent fully the people who are concerned about the situation.

Mr Paisley said that some people are saying that there may be a way round the situation, and that some farmers may throw in a bit extra for fertiliser or fencing and posts in their tax returns in the belief that they will manage all right. That is working on a presumption, and it may or may not work.

We need clarity on that. For that reason I propose the amendment, and trust that the Members opposite will accept it in the spirit in which it is meant. It is aimed at arriving at a successful outcome for the people we represent.

Mr W Clarke: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I will begin by stating that Sinn Féin supports the motion and the amendment. The amendment calls for the Ministers to engage with Revenue and Customs to find a suitable solution. Although I have no difficulty with that, surely it would be the British Treasury that we would need to get clarification from, and it should be the Treasury that provides a solution. Perhaps the proposer of the motion will address that issue in his winding-up speech.

In nineteenth-century Ireland, conacre was the name given to the system whereby land was let not for a number of years but for a single season, usually one year. Land was let for the purposes of taking up a single crop of potatoes or corn, or for grazing. It was a form of subletting used by landowners and farmers to rent to those who had insufficient or no land of their own to secure the basic food supply needed for their families to survive.

Conacre refers to short-term land lettings, and is an 11-month land rental agreement that is unique to Ireland, and an important feature of Ireland's farming scene. Landowners and farmers use conacre in various ways: farmers can increase the size of their farm by taking land as conacre, or increase their income by letting land as conacre.

In recent years the conacre rates have remained fairly stagnant, and the average income from grazing land is £100 per acre per annum, representing a fairly poor return. It is a rare commodity that landowners accept so little return on a valuable piece of ground, which demonstrates the important emotional and family ties that land holds for Irish owners.

I am very troubled about the potential impact the court ruling may have on the local farming community, with one third of land in the North of Ireland let as conacre. The court decision could result in a significant increase in the acreage of local farmland that is liable to 40% inheritance tax. Recently, the Minister of Finance and Personnel expressed his intention to continue to press the British Treasury for acknowledgement of the uniqueness of the issue for the North of Ireland, and the implications for our local agriculture industry. He also stressed that taxation is a reserved matter for the British Government to determine, and that he would be seeking substantive commitment on the issue.

As the Member who spoke previously already pointed out, the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development is here. Will she tell us whether she will be attending that meeting along with the Minister of Finance and Personnel? It is a cross-departmental issue, and has to be dealt with in such a way.

In my opinion, the main issue is quite clearly the fact that taxation and public expenditure policy are set in London. I remember that one of the first debates that took place in the Assembly during this mandate was on the issue of transferring fiscal powers. That issue was brought to the Chamber by Sinn Féin, but it was not supported by the House. We believe that the Assembly, as the elected body for this part of the island, should at least have the ability to review taxation. The issue currently under debate illustrates the case for having fiscal powers transferred. We need as many powers as possible transferred to the Members of the House: that is what the electorate wants and deserves.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Will the Member give way?

Mr W Clarke: I will.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I am pleased that the Member is agreeing with the thrust of the debate. Does he not recognise that we would find ourselves in a reckless position if we had tax-raising powers at this point? The inference would be that we would therefore have to continue with a tax levy, even on farmland. We would actually be the instrument imposing that tax on the people, whereas at the moment we have the leverage to perhaps oppose and prevent it from going any further.

Mr W Clarke: I thank the Member for his intervention, but I do not agree with him. If fiscal powers were transferred to this House, we would review taxation in the round, including VAT, inheritance tax, and all other taxes. We should at least have the opportunity to look at that. This is one particular case of people attempting to bring an English model to an Irish problem, where it does not sit well. Mr McGlone mentioned that, and asked how someone in a different jurisdiction could get an understanding of conacre and its emotional aspect with respect to the community.

The issue is not about political point-scoring; we must look at the real decisions that affect local people, including farmers in rural communities.

5.30 pm

As others said, Ireland has a distinctive historical conacre system that does not operate in any part of England, Scotland or Wales. We do not wish farms to be unduly affected by these developments. The effect of the ruling is that, on the death of the owner of the farmland, the development or hope value will become liable for inheritance tax at up to 40% and that empty property rate (EPR) relief will no longer apply to lands let in conacre.

The ruling shows no understanding of Irish rural life. The tradition of owning land passed from parents runs deep in the Irish psyche. If farms were lost to others outside the family, it would have major implications that could lead to the demise of rural communities. There are also emotional side effects, including mental-health issues and effects on the general well-being of people who lose land. The tradition of keeping land in one's family may be destroyed —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member must draw his remarks to a close.

Mr W Clarke: Small farmers will disappear to be replaced by large-scale farmers. Farming helps to shape our landscape, and that could be lost forever if the implications of the ruling are brought forward.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I remind Members to address all their remarks through the Chair.

Mr Kennedy: I welcome the motion, which was very well presented by Ian Paisley Jnr. The Ulster Unionist Party accepts the amendment. The motion is on a significant and important subject, and a number of months ago, my colleague Mr Elliott and I tabled a private Members' motion on the matter.

Conacre is a major feature of agricultural letting practice that is unique to Northern Ireland and to the Republic of Ireland. Therefore, it is a special situation, and any changes in the rules governing it will have widespread implications for profitability across the farming industry.

The changes to the rules under which letting zoned land under conacre can be considered to constitute a business are deeply misguided. The use of conacre is nothing more than managing an asset that is no different in principle from managing personal finances in a building society account or, perhaps, an investment trust.

To deem the letting of land under conacre as a business also has a negative effect on Northern Ireland, which is the only part of the United Kingdom tax jurisdiction that uses conacre on a widespread basis. Any change in the attitude of HM Revenue and Customs to taxing the use of conacre on development land should take that potent fact into account. At the very least, that should lead to a postponement of the new ruling.

Thousands of acres of land that are let in conacre, which would normally be inherited tax-free, are now subject to an inheritance tax of up to 40% when they pass to the next generation. That will prompt massive numbers of farm landowners to sell up before the deadline, producing a glut of agricultural land in the market, driving down prices and reducing the asset value of many farms. It will also have a severe effect on rural Northern Ireland and will erode our agricultural base at a time when we should be cherishing and supporting the agricultural sector, not least because of security issues and a reduction of dependence on imported foods.

It is no more than a smash-and-grab raid by HM Revenue and Customs on the pockets of decent, hard-working families and people while public money is being squandered on dubious banking and corporate policies. It will directly affect Protestant and Catholic and other landowners and farmers throughout Northern Ireland, in a country where land ownership is highly sensitive and highly emotional.

Therefore, land inheritance is an important aspect of keeping rural communities together. The latest blow from HM Revenue and Customs has the capacity to break up rural communities and will help to destabilise rural society.

The Assembly is right to oppose that. I welcome the presence of the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development in the Chamber. All parties should find common cause on the issue because it has drastic repercussions for the agricultural and landowning population of Northern Ireland. I support the amendment and the motion.

Mr Ford: My party colleagues and I will support the motion and the amendment. By way of introduction, I declare my interest — technically my wife's interest — in a shared family farm, which is recorded in the Register of Members' Interests.

Other Members have discussed the unique situation of conacre land in Ireland. According to aspects of HMRC guidance, a conacre arrangement is equivalent to a grazing licence in Great Britain. The HMRC website refers to land in such condition as being treated as eligible for agricultural property relief under inheritance tax. However, it does not spell out the full details and implications of that.

Mr Willie Clarke and Mr Kennedy, in particular, have discussed the nature in which land is held in this society. Nowhere in HMRC's guidance is there any reference to that. It is not true to suggest that people's ownership of family farms — which, in many cases, grandfathers and great-grandfathers sweated blood to purchase under land Acts of a century ago and to maintain as family holdings — is somehow equivalent to owning stocks and shares or investment property. Regardless of whether that satisfies section 105(3) of the Inheritance Tax Act 1984, it certainly does not fit the psyche of people in this society. That problem is simply not recognised in the way that HMRC treated that particular case and others, such as those highlighted by Mr Paisley Jnr when he proposed the motion.

On one hand, a problem exists that does not apply to every farm in Northern Ireland because it relates solely to business-property relief where there is development potential. On the other hand, as we heard from Mr Paisley Jnr, HMRC now decrees what size of a farmhouse is suitable for a particular size of farm. Apparently, if HMRC does not approve of the size of a house, it will regard it as being more than is appropriate for the farm, even though, in other cases, domestic dwellings are not liable to inheritance tax in certain circumstances. Therefore, there are real issues with the way in which the matter is being treated.

I remember going to a school open evening a few years ago with one of my children. The geography department's display showed documentation that related to a teacher's grandfather's purchase of the family farm from the estate, which he still held, although he was clearly only farming it part time.

I have seen the same situation occur among my family and in-laws. People's attachment to the land is such that, until now, they have not believed that HMRC could simply regard it as investment property. They cannot believe that they must face that realisation.

That means that the Assembly must learn two lessons. First, it must determine what can be done to draw that to HMRC's attention. I am, perhaps, almost as sceptical as Mr Willie Clarke about the Assembly's ability to get that changed soon. Secondly, the Assembly must make the implications clear to people. At present, those who have let land under conacre agreements for many years will have to consider a different way to manage it; perhaps by setting up some special kind of partnership or by passing it on to family. At present, many farms in Northern Ireland that are located in areas where there is development potential are at risk because of that ruling.

It is not credible to say that the Assembly will simply make representations to HMRC because that may well not be enough. The Court of Appeal's judgement, sadly, was given by three judges from Northern Ireland who seem to have been overborne upon by representations from HMRC special commissioners, although, clearly, they were under fairly tight constraints.

However, their decision recognises that a spectrum of different circumstances applies in such cases. The message for many people, which Ian Paisley Jnr expressed reservations about, is that they should shift themselves and their property from one end of the spectrum to the other if they wish to maintain their inheritance. The problem that we face is that people will get nowhere if they continue as they are.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I ask the Member to draw his remarks to a close.

Mr Ford: I hope the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development and the Department of Finance and Personnel will show us that they can work together. It is a pity that we only have one Minister in the Chamber this afternoon; I trust that she can report on behalf of both Departments when responding.

Mr Irwin: I declare an interest as a landowner.

The importance of the McClean ruling in Northern Ireland is serious, given that approximately one third of all the land in the Province is rented as conacre. In my constituency, I can think of scores of families who have farms with significant land let out as conacre. Many of those families have contacted me to express their concerns about the McClean case and what it could potentially mean to them.

Although the main thrust of the McClean case is directly related to land with development potential, such as farmland on the development boundaries of towns and villages, there is much to be concerned about across Northern Ireland because we have scores of towns and villages that all have development zones to permit controlled growth.

In the Armagh area alone, a total of 180 hectares of land across a range of settlements was identified as suitable for new housing, as stated in the 'Armagh Area Plan 2004'. Of that amount, around 85 hectares — approximately 210 acres — remain undeveloped. Although the current development value of land is much reduced compared with even a year ago, there remains a frightening potential for a huge tax bill for a family in a similar position to those in the McClean case.

The 'Armagh Area Plan 2004' identified in the region of 34 hectares of industrial zoned land in the local towns of Keady, Markethill and Tandragee. Only two hectares of that land has been used for industrial purposes and a further five hectares have been used for housing, which leaves 27 hectares. Therefore, I can clearly see why people with conacre land in industrial zones would be concerned by the ruling in the McClean case.

With such a large percentage of land here let as conacre, Northern Ireland should be treated as a unique entity and should be free from such unsympathetic treatment by HM Revenue and Customs. I recently heard of a case in which a constituent inherited from a family member a farm with a small portion of zoned land. The farm was valued for inheritance tax purposes at the height of the property boom about two-and-a-half years ago, which left the family with a bill of over £750,000. The family were forced to put the farm on the market as they were unable to raise the money to pay the tax bill. The highest offer on the farm at present is less than the tax bill, which has left the family with a millstone round their necks. That is an unfair situation that cannot be allowed to continue.

As I said, Northern Ireland is in a unique position due to the large amount of conacre land here. Any attempt to remove tax relief on that land will have far-reaching consequences for the future of the farming community of Northern Ireland.

I welcome the fact that the First Minister has raised the matter at the highest level at Westminster. It is vital that the Westminster Government realise the serious consequences of removing tax relief for conacre land in Northern Ireland. I support the motion.

Mr Elliott: I thank the Members who tabled the motion and apologise to Mr Paisley Jnr for not being in the Chamber when he proposed the motion. Much of what I have heard in the debate has been factual information. I want to deal with some of the realities that may occur from the outworkings of the McClean case.

5.45 pm

We have only to look at the changing farming practices in Northern Ireland over recent decades. More and more land is being leased by farmers, and there are fewer and fewer individual farm units, with other farmers leasing land from neighbouring farmers. As a result of this case, more and more landowners will start small farming practices in order to take that land out of conacre. That alone will have a significant effect by not leaving land available for the more extensive and intensive farmers who need it for their business.

On the other hand, some landowners do not have the facilities to farm that land feasibly. I am thinking about stocking, housing and handling facilities. In addition, they must have all the documentation that is required by the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development, the Department of the Environment and other Departments. That will be a huge challenge for those landowners. Therefore, it is vital that we make every effort to get the Government to realise the significance of this for farmers, beyond the costs to those individual farmers who will be caught up in it.

There is also the difficulty of "hope land" — land that may be on the edge of a development zone and which Revenue and Customs may say has hope value because it may come into a development zone in 10, 15 or 20 years' time. Revenue and Customs will put an additional value on that land. Under PPS 21, meanwhile, one dwelling is allowed per farm unit. Revenue and Customs could say, OK, you are allowed one dwelling on that farm, so we will take half an acre out of that and value it not at agricultural value but at development value. That immediately raises the stakes in that situation.

All those situations and cases must be identified and brought to the Treasury's attention, otherwise, as my colleague Danny Kennedy said, we in this Province will all suffer the same fate, and it does not matter whether you are a Protestant, Catholic or whatever religion. I heard of one case of a man leaving 10 or 12 acres in his will to a local church. The land is in a development zone, and was left with the condition that the church is not allowed to sell it. The church is now left with a huge inheritance tax bill; it cannot sell the land and cannot raise the money. The tax bill is around £2 million, and it will bankrupt the church. It would have been far safer not getting the land. This business is causing huge difficulties and problems not only farmers but for the wider community.

Mr Savage: I declare an interest as a farmer.

The Member was talking about the implications of this case. I noted the words of the Finance Minister in the previous debate about semblance and reality. If this goes through, the semblance and the reality will lie in putting small farms out of business. He also talked about fairness and impact — words that are very important in this context. There will be no small farming industry left here in Northern Ireland if this goes on.

There is an old saying in tax offices: if we do not get you when you are living, we will get your family when you are dead. Those are words that we thought we never would hear, but they are becoming a reality, and the Assembly has to take action.

Mr Elliott: I thank the Member for his intervention; I agree with his points. I, too, of course, should have declared an interest, being a landowner and farmer.

The ruling will affect traditions and assets that have been in families for generations; we cannot allow that to happen. Otherwise, as Mr Savage said, we will destroy —

Mr Deputy Speaker: I ask the Member to draw his remarks to a close.

Mr Elliott: We will destroy the farming community in the Province, not only for this generation but for generations to come.

Mr Shannon: I support the motion and congratulate the Members who proposed it. Moreover, I support the amendment, which keeps everything nice and neat.

In April 2008, a local special commissioners case was heard on the availability of business property relief on the development value of land set in conacre. That is where the problem began. It was decided that business property relief was not available because conacre letting was deemed an investment activity rather than a trading activity. The Court of Appeal recently decided to uphold that tax ruling. That could mean that all transfers of conacre land could be liable to the full rate of inheritance tax.

As other Members said, about one third of Northern Ireland farmland is let under the conacre system, which does not operate elsewhere in the UK. The ruling in the McClean conacre case is an attack on the rural community, and we cannot let it pass by today. The House of Lords refused to hear an appeal against the Northern Ireland Court of Appeal decision but supported the claim of Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs that certain agricultural land in conacre should now be subject to inheritance tax. That cannot be the end of the push.

The fact bes at hit means at femmelie fairmin, es we know hit theday, i the province bes aa an enn. The wee femmelie fairm wul bae a thing o' the pas' an' onie business fairmin wul bae fit tae pey hit's wie. Thon

In reality, family farming as we know it in the Province will come to an end if that continues. Small family farms will be a thing of the past and business farming only will be viable. The issue was brought to my attention by numerous farmers who are concerned — and they have every right to be — about their right to pass a viable inheritance on to their children. The ruling definitely puts that system under attack.

I have received correspondence from my colleagues in the Assembly who have expressed the same concern and reservations about the conacre ruling. Indeed, the previous Minister of Finance and Personnel, Nigel Dodds, discussed the implications of the legal judgement on the conacre tax issue with the then Chief Secretary to the Treasury, Yvette Cooper. He highlighted the significant effect that the recent court ruling will have on the agricultural community in Northern Ireland. I am assured that he took the opportunity to impress on Yvette Cooper the importance of the issue and to ask that she consider its repercussions fully.

Although taxation is a reserved matter, the Department of Finance and Personnel has been in touch with the Treasury in recent months to highlight the issue and its potential negative impact here. The work did not end with Nigel Dodds. I am aware that the current Minister of Finance and Personnel, Sammy Wilson, has continued to push the issue with the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, Liam Byrne, and has requested a meeting with him.

To put the scale of the problem in context, we must highlight the fact that Northern Ireland has a unique system in which one third of land is let out as conacre. That ensures that smaller farms can guarantee the longevity of their farm for generations to come. If we remove that ability, it is not an exaggeration to assume that most farmers, who already struggle to make a living due to EU restrictions, will certainly be unable to withstand full inheritance tax when passing the family business on to their children. Subsequently, family farming in Northern Ireland will be a thing of the past. That is our concern.

The Ulster Farmers' Union has 12,500 members — and I declare an interest as a member — and its main mission is to promote and support a vibrant, sustainable rural economy where agriculture is secure and pivotal to its future. For that reason, we must work closely with that body to ensure that farming can continue. That is why the Assembly must stand with our farmers tonight and ask for action that will avert this devastating effect. If the situation had affected Shorts, the Assembly would have, rightly, taken a big decision to make changes. However, this affects farming, and I expect the Assembly to endorse that message as strongly as it would if jobs were at stake in Shorts.

I have been a member of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development for a short time, but I am glad to be on it. This matter has been discussed and fought for at every level in the Province.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member must draw his remarks to a close.

Mr Shannon: I congratulate my colleagues for tabling the motion and I ask them to ensure that this issue does not signal the death knell for traditional farming in the Province.

Mr Gallagher: I remind Members that I have declared an interest in farming in the Register of Members' Interests.

I thank the DUP Members who tabled the motion. It is clear that the motion and the amendment have been accepted by all the parties, and that there is a strong united front on an approach to the issue that will lead to turning the Treasury's thinking around. At least one precedent for that comes to mind: when the quarry tax issue was raised in the previous Assembly, our Ministers got together to lobby the Treasury and got a result. For the sake of the farming community, we cannot afford to give up on this issue. I do not believe that we should give any hint to the Treasury that this is its problem and that we are just going to roll over.

This is a uniquely Irish problem; it is unique to the island of Ireland, and I hope that we can build a strong campaign to change the Treasury's mind. Other Members have covered the issue in detail and there is no point in going over that. With my experience, I am aware of the negative impact of this issue on land lettings, which are already down in number because people are worried about the problem.

We all know that the Irish land-letting system is not a money-making operation: it is used by elderly farmers in many of the cases of which I am aware. Nine times out of 10, the land is inherited from the previous generation, and because of age or health considerations, the owners have to retire from farming. They want to hand the farm over just as it was handed to them, and keep the land in the family. That is why the conacre system is used and why it has grown, and it is why land has been passed from generation to generation.

The message for the Department of Finance and Personnel and the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development is that they should work together and take the issue to the Treasury. Our message to the Treasury is that we are not going to give up on it.

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development (Ms Gildernew): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I welcome the opportunity to speak to the Assembly on this serious issue. It will come as no surprise to anyone that I share the grave concerns that have been expressed here today. The discussions that I have had with the rural community, and the volume of correspondence that I have received, have left me in no doubt about the high levels of anxiety and worry that the McClean ruling has created.

I have listened to what Members have said in the debate. There are very few issues that unite the House in the way that this motion has done, and it is obvious, across all political parties, that the Irish attachment to the land is evident here today. I welcome the support that all Members have given on this issue.

Apart from the issues that Members have raised, there are other implications for farmers. Land letting has environmental consequences where land has been grazed and is no longer let.

6.00 pm

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: There is unanimity in the House today. We all know the history of land Acts; we have read our history. In the House today, a solid body of people from all parties is saying the same thing and declaring that we cannot tolerate what is in mind. We are all saying that Ulster is not for sale; we are all saying that what we have we hold; and some of us are saying "No surrender".

Mr Shannon: Further to Dr Paisley's comment, is this a case where Ulster says no?

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development: I thank the Members for their interventions, and I thank all Members for their positive contributions.

I have written to the Treasury about the issue, and I discussed it with the Finance Minister in July, when the implications of the McClean ruling were becoming evident. I suggested that we went to the Treasury to discuss the issue and fight it jointly. Although the matter is primarily for the Minister of Finance and Personnel, I feel that I must assure the Treasury that this is a uniquely Irish situation and needs to be dealt with in that way.

Prior to the McClean case, agricultural land usually attracted two kinds of property relief that reduced inheritance tax to zero; those reliefs were generally available whether the land was farmed by the owner or let in conacre. In the McClean case, the land was let in conacre, and the decision was made to deny business property relief on the development value of the land. However, agricultural property relief was granted on the agricultural value of the land. That unhelpful change in how the law is to be interpreted will strike many as unfair, and I absolutely agree.

I have no particular sympathy with large property developments. Members will be aware of the people that I am talking about, who buy farmland for development purposes, develop sites on it and make use of tax reliefs meant for farmers to avoid inheritance tax. We all know, and it has been well articulated here today, that there will be farming families who rent out their land for myriad reasons, perhaps even with the intention of returning to farming themselves, who will be forced to sell their family farm as a result of the McClean ruling.

It is especially worrying that the ruling could affect land rented to close family members, such as between a mother and son or an uncle and nephew. I find that possibility particularly unjust, as it would drive farmers out of business.

The connection that farming families in Ireland have with their land have runs extremely deep. Members who have seen the film or play 'The Field' by John B Keane will know that the feeling for land is very strong in Ireland. As many Members pointed out, that has been with us for generations; it is unique to Ireland, as is the conacre system. It has its origins in past struggles between landlords and tenants, as was mentioned. We all know of cases where families are prepared to face poverty rather than face selling the family farm.

I have no doubt that the McClean ruling will be a great source of anguish for farming families. I believe that the McClean ruling is an attack on the conacre system and on farming families. The full and precise implications of the McClean ruling will become clear only when it is applied to the outstanding cases that have been held back by Revenue and Customs since the McClean ruling was first challenged.

Faced with the threat of huge tax bills, some non-farming landowners, who are in a position to do so, will have to recommence farming activities of some description with the aim of qualifying for business property relief. That is an entirely understandable reaction as they try to protect their family farms. However, that will disrupt existing farm businesses that rely on taking that land. Other families, especially in the outstanding cases, may have no choice but to sell land in order to meet inheritance tax liability. Not only does that seem grossly unfair, it could also disrupt the market for development land due to forced sales.

Therefore, we could end up with disruptions to normal farming activities; distortions to the development property market; and affected families losing their farms. I will be asking the Treasury how that could ever be seen as fair or acceptable.

I suppose, if we are to look for a plus side, the McClean ruling did not question agricultural property relief, as it was granted by Revenue and Customs. We can draw some comfort from that because that is the relief that is of most concern to the vast majority of farmers and landowners. However, that will not stop us from fighting the McClean ruling. I understand the concern that the eligibility of land let in conacre for agricultural property relief might be the next target for Revenue and Customs. We need urgent clarification from the tax authorities on that issue.

It normally falls to the Department of Finance and Personnel to make representations to the British Treasury on the subject of tax. However, given the potential impact on agriculture and farming families, Sammy Wilson and I have agreed to meet jointly with the Chief Secretary to the Treasury to press our concerns. I will push for clarification on agricultural property relief at that upcoming meeting. I will use the opportunity to outline the negative consequences of denying business property relief on land let in conacre. As an alternative, I will suggest that consideration be given to an exemption from inheritance tax for land that remains in agricultural use.

I also intend to raise the issue of the outstanding cases, because it seems extremely unfair that those people now face huge inheritance tax bills without having been given any prior warning or an opportunity to plan their tax affairs. However, I do not want to raise undue expectations that the British Treasury will respond sympathetically to any of the suggestions. As Members are aware, taxation is an excepted matter under devolution. The Assembly still has no fiscal autonomy and is unable to change tax law, but Members can be assured that this is a battle that I am prepared to fight.

The proposer of the motion, Ian Paisley Jnr, raised the issue of what definition of "farming" will satisfy Customs and Revenue. At this stage, I am not in a position to say precisely what type, or amount, of farming will qualify for business property relief. I suggest that individuals seek professional advice on those matters. In order to qualify for the relief, the business concerned must be deemed to not wholly or mainly comprise holding investments. Tax authorities' judgements on such matters are usually made in the round, taking account of all the activities of the business. However, I agree with the Chairperson of the Agriculture Committee that interpretation is key, and we will all be looking very carefully at that.

We will push for clarification on agricultural property relief. Hope value was mentioned, and what Mr McGlone said about development land is right. There will be farmers, living beside a settlement of whatever size, fighting to ensure that that land is not zoned for development purposes, which will have an impact on housing. The ongoing work on PPS 21, previously PPS 14, and the further restrictions on individual properties in the countryside raises a concerning question: if we cannot live on our land and we cannot live in towns and villages, where is the next generation going to live?

It is my understanding that, for inheritance tax purposes, land is valued at the market value at the date of transfer. Market value, therefore, is influenced by expectations of future developments and includes hope value. However, valuation of land in individual cases is a matter for qualified valuers who take account of a number of factors when arriving at what they consider to be the fair market value.

Today's debate highlights the widespread concern about the McClean ruling. There will be debates on the fairness or unfairness of any tax. However, we are all agreed that this ruling is particularly unfair. The McClean ruling must not result in a large amount of land being removed from the conacre market, to the detriment of the agriculture sector as a whole.

In fact, I have recently had discussions with my counterpart in Scotland about the food shortage issues that we face down the line. I do not think that it is in anyone's interest that land that is currently in agricultural use, and has been so for generations, is taken out of agricultural use and that farming skills cannot be passed down to future generations.

I do not wish to see land taken out of the agriculture sector, nor do I wish to see families forced to sell land that they would otherwise keep in agriculture. That point was mentioned by many Members today.

My officials and I will work very hard on this issue. We will continue to look at it to ensure that every avenue is explored and that everything that can be done will be done. However, I wish to clarify that by saying that, although the point was made about quarry tax being abandoned, in this time of recession, it will be difficult to persuade the Treasury not to tax conacre land. However, we will have to do everything that we can to protect farming families from that terrible ruling. Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Member for proposing the motion, and I support it.

Mr Burns: I am grateful for this opportunity to speak today on this very important subject. First, I wish to thank the DUP Member Mr Ian Paisley Jnr for tabling the motion and for accepting the SDLP's amendment. I am glad that there has been little difference across the House. This issue affects farmers in every constituency.

All farming families have experienced a certain amount of fear and dread, for they do not understand what the McClean ruling is all about. I am not a tax expert, and I cannot advise them on exactly what it means. All I know is that it is very bad news for small farms and for farmers who have land close to towns and settlements.

The McClean case is complex and is of great interest to me because it is a south Antrim case. I know neighbours of the McCleans who are devastated about the way in which this situation developed. However, for all Members who contributed to the debate this afternoon, the bottom line is that conacre letting has been deemed by the High Court and the Court of Appeal to be an investment activity, and the House of Lords has prevented any further appeals.

Every field that is let in conacre could be subject to 40% inheritance tax, especially those lands that have any potential for, or “hope” of, development. It is difficult to determine where such hope value exists, given that a new area plan is being developed and that, following the transfer of planning powers, local councils will be able to adapt their local area plans.

As we heard from Members, about one third of local farmland is let under conacre. That proves that conacre letting is a common agricultural practice and is not an investment activity among our farmers. In fact, it is a practice that lies at the heart of our farming community, so the ruling has the potential to totally undermine our whole agriculture sector and, indeed, the wider economy.

As we heard, each Member who spoke told a story from his or her constituency. Tom Elliott told us that his local church had been left 12 acres of land, but the tax bill was greater than the value of the land, and that church must deal with that situation.

There is no doubt that the decision must be reversed. The ruling is a grave injustice and an attack on local farming families. We must not end up in a situation whereby farming families are burdened with huge tax bills for simply keeping a farm in the family by passing it down from generation to generation, as has always been the tradition in Ireland, North and South. If the law remains as it is, it will lead to the forced sale of lands on the death of the senior farmer or landowner. Small farms will be broken up, the value of land will be driven down, and the historical conacre tradition will be devastated. The law must be fought at every level of government.

6.15 pm

Various Ministers have worked on the case, and I welcome the fact that the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development and the Minister of Finance and Personnel are prepared to take on the battle.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member draw his remarks to a close?

Mr Burns: I hope that the amendment will serve as a reminder to raise the matter with the British Treasury. That will be no easy task because taxation is a reserved matter, but the issue must be challenged at every opportunity.

I bring my remarks to a close by thanking Ian Paisley Jnr for proposing the motion. The House is united, and I support the motion and the amendment.

Dr W McCrea: I thank all Members who participated in the debate. Ian Paisley Jnr and I, as proposers of the motion, are happy to accept the amendment. We consider that it adds to, rather than detracts from, the motion. There is, therefore, oneness on the motion and the amendment.

The motion has been brought to the Floor of the Assembly because of the dismay and shockwaves that have been felt throughout the rural community as a result of the McClean conacre case. Moreover, Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs has focused on aspects of the case that will have serious repercussions for the family farming traditions in Northern Ireland. As we all know, Northern Ireland has a long tradition of handing down farms, most of which are small or medium. I declare an interest as the recipient of my father's small farm. Farmers hand down their farms from one generation to the next, entrusting that next generation do likewise after their little day on the farm.

Members are aware that farmers and farming have faced many challenges over recent years. Many farmers have been forced to seek alternative employment because the financial return from farming is not sufficient to meet their families' needs. Financial realities of farming have led others to let their land while retaining ownership so that they can pass it down to the next generation.

The significance of the recent McClean case cannot be understated. I agree with the honourable Member for South Antrim Mr Burns that the case has a particular resonance for us because the area concerned is in our constituency; and I know the family concerned. The case has major implications for many farming families as well as for the wider McClean family. I congratulate the representatives of the McClean family who took the case so far. I regret, however, that their desire to pursue the case still further, to the House of Lords, was denied.

Grave concern exists about the implications of the policy change on the application of business property relief and agricultural property relief on Northern Ireland farms let in conacre. Undoubtedly, the policy shift by Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs has implications for the future well-being of the industry.

Until recently, Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs facilitated the total exemption from inheritance tax of agricultural land that was let in conacre by accepting that that land was eligible for both agricultural property relief and business property relief, a policy that was reflected in the inheritance tax manual, which served as the guidance for Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs officials.

That exemption from inheritance tax was achieved, on the death of the farmer or the landowner, through the application of the agricultural property relief at 100% to the ordinary value of the farmland and, where the land had commercial development potential — hope value — in excess of its agricultural value. However, farming by letting in conacre attracted a second relief of business property relief, also at 100%, on the development value. That application by HMRC of exemptions of agricultural property relief and business property relief to land that is let in conacre ensured that more than half of the 27,000 family farms in Northern Ireland were free of inheritance tax on the death of a farmer, thus maintaining the integrity and the way of life that is experienced by the farming community throughout Northern Ireland.

However, April 2008 saw the special commissioners overturning that long-standing HMRC policy, and therein lies the dilemma that many face. That decision was taken to the Court of Appeal, where all three judges agreed with HMRC. To make matters worse, the family was denied the opportunity to appeal the judgement to the House of Lords.

It must be remembered that we believe that HMRC may be considering pursuing — the Minister mentioned this point — a number of other cases on the basis of that ruling and challenging the eligibility of business property relief to mitigate liability for inheritance tax. If that is so, the only manner by which those farmers could discharge their obligation under inheritance tax liabilities would either be to sell the land at hope value levels or to create what could be called “new commercial borrowing”. Banks are already placing an intolerable burden on the farming community and other businesses. Therefore, the likelihood of borrowing at any reasonable rate and facility is negligible, which holds a grave threat over the heads of the Northern Ireland farming families. As elected representatives, it is our duty to raise the issue at the highest possible level. We must have robust confidence that our cause is just, and we should hope and intend to come out with success at the end of the day.

It is also true that we cannot make promises that we do not have the power to keep. Therefore, we must be honest and honourable to the community, but we must fight the case. I am heartened by the fact that the Minister of Finance and Personnel wrote to the Chief Secretary to the Treasury to request a meeting. I am also heartened by the fact that the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development and the Minister of Finance and Personnel will together fight a case that is an important aspect of the Northern Ireland farming community.

The inheritance of land in families is an important aspect of our farming tradition in Northern Ireland, and we want to protect it. The Treasury must know that Northern Ireland has a unique historical conacre system that does not operate in the rest of the United Kingdom. We cannot sit idly by, wish this away and hope that somebody else will rescue the situation. We must ensure that the Treasury knows exactly the state of the matter and its relevance to Northern Ireland. I trust that we will take that opportunity to force the issue onto the agenda here and at Westminster, where I know that this can be debated.

Mr Elliott rightly pointed out a serious issue. It is even worse than was acknowledged by the honourable Member for South Antrim Mr Burns.

That is because the land was left to the church in such a manner that it could not sell it. It was not a matter of selling the land in the hope of getting enough to cover the tax bill; it was left on the overriding condition that the land could not and should not be sold. Therefore, all that the church was getting was the value of letting the land in conacre. That is a very serious issue.

My friend Mr Irwin rightly mentioned the serious matter of a farmer who had to sell his land and was offered less for it than the tax bill that he faced. That demonstrates how serious the issue is. We must ensure that there is clarity. Clarity is one demand that we must make, because none of us is a tax expert. However, one thing is certain: our constituents look to us for advice. Until there is clarity on the conacre tax-relief issue, it will be a serious matter for us, as elected representatives, on which to give advice.

That is why we must ensure that the issue is raised with the Treasury. We must fight the McClean conacre ruling at Westminster and put it firmly on the desks of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Prime Minister. I thank the First Minister for doing that already. I thank every Member, and I thank the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development and the Minister of Finance and Personnel for making representations. I assure Members that the debate has not only highlighted the seriousness of the issue but has shown the unanimity that exists across the Chamber to push the issue to its ultimate conclusion.

Question, That the amendment be made, put and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly notes with extreme concern the possible extension of the focus on the “McClean conacre case” by HM Revenue and Customs and is deeply worried at the severe disruption which this could have on our family farming tradition in Northern Ireland; and calls on the Minister of Finance and Personnel and the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to engage with Revenue and Customs to find a suitable solution.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENTS

Joint Ministerial Committee Plenary Meeting

Mr Deputy Speaker: I would like to inform Members that I have received notice from the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister that the First Minister wishes to make a statement regarding the Joint Ministerial Committee plenary meeting.

The First Minister (Mr P Robinson): I wish to make a statement on a meeting of the Joint Ministerial Committee (JMC) in plenary format, held in London on 16 September, which the deputy First Minister and I attended.

The meeting was chaired by the Rt Hon Jack Straw MP, Lord Chancellor and Secretary of State for Justice, on behalf of the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister joined us for the latter part of the meeting. The other participants were: the Rt Hon Alex Salmond MP MSP, the First Minister of Scotland; Michael Russell MSP, the Scottish Minister for Culture, External Affairs and the Constitution; the Rt Hon Rhodri Morgan AM, the First Minister for Wales; and Ieuan Wyn Jones AM, the deputy First Minister for Wales.

The Rt Hon Jim Murphy MP, the Rt Hon Peter Hain MP and the Rt Hon Shaun Woodward MP, the Secretaries of State for Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland respectively, also participated.

The Rt Hon Liam Byrne MP, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, attended for part of the meeting to lead a discussion on the economy, with Ian Pearson MP, the Economic Secretary, replacing him for the remainder of the meeting.

We discussed issues of common interest, most notably the economy and inter-Administration relations. We all committed ourselves to regular engagement between the Administrations and agreed the need to maintain and build on successful co-operation in tackling the challenges of economic recovery and pandemic flu. We will continue to work together in decision-making regarding contingency planning.

The discussion on the economy re-emphasised the need for continued co-operation and the sharing of economic information.

It was agreed that co-operation between Her Majesty's Government and the devolved Administrations in tackling the recession and preparing for the economic recovery through the JMC and the economic summits in Wales and Scotland had worked well and would continue.

A number of issues relating to finance were raised, including further public sector capital acceleration; difficulties over bank lending, particularly for small and medium-sized enterprises; and funding to deal with swine flu. Those will be discussed further over the coming weeks and at the next meeting of the Finance Ministers' quadrilateral, which is scheduled to take place in December 2009.

In the discussion on the state of relations, the positive developments since the last plenary session, particularly in the development of a new subcommittee, JMC(D), to deal with domestic matters, was noted. The subcommittee has held two successful meetings to date and plans to meet again in the coming months.

Recent recommendations on inter-Administration relations emanating from independent reports on the workings of devolution were raised, and it was agreed that a more detailed discussion to agree any improvements should be held at the forthcoming JMC (Domestic) meeting. It was also noted that the Secretary of State for Scotland stated that HM Government would publish a formal response to the Calman Commission report before the end of 2009.

Rounding off the meeting, the Prime Minister opened a discussion on preparations for the G20 summit in Pittsburgh. He spoke of progress since April in implementing the London G20 conclusions and of the continuing need to ensure sustained international co-operation as the world economy moved to the next phase. Each of the devolved Administrations took the opportunity to reinforce the message about the severe budgetary pressures being faced. We also underlined the importance of banks beginning to lend again and of the central Government tempering any easing of fiscal stimuli in recognition that businesses need working capital to avail themselves of an economic upturn.

Mr Moutray: I thank the First Minister for his statement. Can he outline how he sees the Joint Ministerial Committee developing in a devolved United Kingdom?

The First Minister: Over the past years, the JMC has extended its remit quite considerably. From having a JMC plenary, known as the JMC(P), we have developed a JMC(E), which deals with European matters. I think that the JMC plenary has met on two occasions; the JMC(E) has met on nine. We now have the JMC(D), which will look at domestic issues and is due to meet soon. The Calman Commission report recommends the establishment of a JMC(F) to deal with finance, and a JMC(O), in which officials would meet together. Mr Deputy Speaker, we still have another 21 or so letters in the alphabet to go through to add a few extra.

If we deal with the issues that we have, we have considerably extended inter-relations within the United Kingdom. It is a useful setting for us to consider matters of mutual interest. Each Administration will, of course, want to look at issues themselves; they will have their own take on events. However, there will be matters for which there can be mutual support and on which there can be agreement and a benefit in acting together; that is what the JMC in its various formats will do.

Mr McElduff: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Tá ceist agam don Chéad Aire. Can the First Minister speak a bit more clearly about the status, purpose and remit of the Joint Ministerial Committee? Where does it fit in the overall architecture of governance east-west and North/South? What is the specific role of the Joint Ministerial Committee? Who provides the secretariat and who is entitled to attend?

The First Minister: There are various formats. The Prime Minister, or someone deputed by the Prime Minister, will chair the plenary session of the JMC. On this occasion, it was chaired by Jack Straw, though the Prime Minister himself attended, which shows something of the status of the event.

The meetings are held in various places, but most of the meetings take place before a British-Irish meeting or at Westminster. The most recent meeting was held in London in the precincts of the Houses of Parliament. Each of the devolved Administrations sends a team along. In most cases, it will be the First Minister and deputy First Minister, but if there is business on the agenda which relates to a specific Department, it is possible and likely that the devolved Administration will bring the Minister who has that particular responsibility.

The JMC does not have a decision-making role; it cannot make decisions for the whole of the United Kingdom. However, if the three devolved Administrations put forward a powerful case, as we have done on a number of issues, it becomes difficult for the central Government to resist. In most of the issues that we raise, there is a considerable amount of common ground among the representatives from the devolved institutions, which gives us a platform from which to persuade and influence Her Majesty's Government on key issues, and it allows us to have an input on matters to which the devolved institutions might not normally have an input, such as the G20 summit.

Mr McCallister: I welcome the First Minister's statement. A lot of issues that are of importance to a great many people in Northern Ireland, such as increased bank lending, were discussed at the meeting. The First Minister spoke about the pressures and the budgetary positions of the devolved Administrations. Did he get any agreement or reassurance from Her Majesty's Government about increased funding to deal with the swine flu pandemic?

The First Minister: That is an issue that, separately and collectively, we have raised with the Treasury and with the Prime Minister. The short answer is that it is still under discussion. However, I think that we all recognise that if there is a reserve contingency fund, it would be hard to think of any issue that would have a greater call on it than the likes of a pandemic. Therefore we think that there is a strong case for a call to be made to the reserve for assistance. Some health-related matters can be planned for, and some cannot. The Health Minister could plan to have injection needles or masks and gloves available, but he cannot plan to have a specific vaccine in place. Therefore there was a strong call for the Government to take responsibility for the cost of the vaccine.

Mrs D Kelly: I thank the First Minister for his statement and for the focus that was put on the economy. He said that issues of joint concern were discussed. One such issue is the impact of climate change and the working together of Administrations in looking at best practice in meeting targets relating to gas emissions. Were there discussions on the green economy and the jobs that could arise as a consequence of that?

The First Minister: Climate change was not on the agenda for this meeting of the JMC, though it was on the agenda of the previous meeting at which our Administration confirmed that we would play our full part in assisting in the process of meeting UK targets, and that remains the position of the Executive.

References were made by various Administrations to the potential value in the green economy, but there was no specific discussion on it.

Mr Ford: I thank the First Minister for his statement. Following up on what Dolores Kelly has just said, and at the risk of creating JMC (C), may I ask the First Minister whether joint action is being taken in preparation for the UK's position at the Copenhagen summit later this year? Did he, along with his colleague, take the opportunity, on the margins of the conference, to have discussions with Rhodri

Morgan and Ieuan Wyn Jones about the specific interests of what I will not call JMC (B), but the difficulties that we and Wales experience from the Barnett formula — an interest that Scotland does not share with us?

The First Minister: The Copenhagen summit was not on the agenda. However, if there are issues that specifically relate to the devolved Administrations before such a summit is to take place, there will be contact with the Administration, and if the Executive have to take a position, we will bring the matter to the Executive before giving our view to the Government.

10.45 am

As regards the Barnett formula, I always urge colleagues who wish to open that particular can of worms to apply caution. If I were reviewing the Barnett formula, I am quite satisfied that I could present a very good case for an enhancement of Northern Ireland's share of the overall funding from the Treasury. Unfortunately, as soon as that can of worms is opened, arguments will be put to the United Kingdom Government that Northern Ireland already receives an inflated share, beyond that which is received per head of population in Scotland or Wales. There will always be pressures in both directions.

At the moment, the Barnett formula is based on population share. If the formula were to become needs-based, then Northern Ireland would have a strong case for improving its share of funding. However, whether that case would be sufficiently strong to occasion change is another matter entirely.

Mr Spratt: I also thank the First Minister for his statement. Will he indicate the extent to which the Northern Ireland Administration are involved in east-west institutions? Clearly, that aspect was neglected during the last mandate, and I am keen to know if the situation has been fully rectified.

The First Minister: The east-west relationship goes beyond the meetings of the Joint Ministerial Committee. There was a lack of balance between meetings of a North/South nature and those of an east-west axis during the last Administration, but that has now been addressed.

It is fair to say that co-operation in those forums is not simply a unionist thing. The other party to the JMC, the deputy First Minister, does not go to those meetings dragging his feet. Instead, he plays a full speaking role and contributes to debates, just as I enthusiastically attend meetings of the North/South Ministerial Council and play a full part in those meetings.

I am quite happy that there is a good North/South relationship, but structures did need to be built up on an east-west basis, and we now have the JMC in its various formats, and the British-Irish Council and the sectoral formats that fall under that. Furthermore, a more relaxed attitude is now taken with both east-west and North/South relations, and one is now able to lift the telephone, or have an individual conversation with an appropriate Minister if issues arise. That is the way that it should be, so that there is not always the need for a formality of structure: if things must be done, one can get them done.

Ms Anderson: Go raibh maith agat. I also thank the First Minister for his statement. Does he accept that on certain issues, in particular on European policy, which has been covered in the nine meetings of the JMC(Europe), that there are instances where the British interest is at variance with interests here? That is particularly the case in relation to agriculture and fisheries, and Jim Shannon, who sits on the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister (OFMDFM) with me, is very keen to highlight the differences that we experience in those areas in comparison to England, Scotland and Wales.

Will the First Minister assure the House that OFMDFM is seeking to develop a working practice in the meetings of the JMC, whether in European or plenary format, which will, when needed, allow the North to derogate from the British position? Will he assure the House that OFMDFM is presenting the case for farming, fisheries and other industries here directly to Europe?

The First Minister: I entirely accept the argument that there is a greater emphasis in Northern Ireland on agriculture issues than there is in the United Kingdom as a whole. That is why the JMC(Europe) is so important, because it affords not only Northern Ireland, but Scotland and Wales the opportunity to influence the role played by UK representatives in Europe.

The junior Ministers, who represent us at most of the meetings, have been able not only to deal with issues at that meeting, but to set up meetings outside the JMC so that our case can be properly represented. It is an important vehicle for that.

The derogation will be a United Kingdom derogation and, therefore, it is a matter of influencing Her Majesty's Government on those issues and, if the case is strong, I have confidence that my colleagues will be able to do that.

Mr Cree: I thank the First Minister for his statement. Did he have the opportunity to discuss the Presbyterian Mutual Society, either in the plenary sitting or in the margins of it?

The First Minister: Good try. The Member will not be surprised to learn that the Presbyterian Mutual Society was not on the agenda of the JMC. However, it is a key issue, and I take every opportunity to discuss the Presbyterian Mutual Society, either in the margins or in separate meetings. We have agreed a date at the beginning of October — although I will not say exactly when in case other Ministers have difficulty in achieving that date — to take the matter to ministerial level. That is a response to a previous meeting that we had with the Chief Secretary to the Treasury and others. Indeed, officials discussed the matter in London yesterday, so it is being dealt with actively. We are looking at possible proposals, and I hope that when we come to the ministerial meeting at the beginning of October, we will have a proposal that we can all support.

Mr Gallagher: Along with my colleague and other Members, I thank the Minister for his statement. I have a question about cross-border workers, which is within the ambit of North/South and east-west arrangements. I refer particularly to the double taxation issue and tax credits, which are the concern of the Treasury. The tax credits are very complicated since the tax credit offices located in Newcastle or elsewhere else across the water say that they have nothing to do with tax credits.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member please come to his question? This is time for a question, not a speech.

Mr Gallagher: Will the First Minister raise that matter? Does he agree that it is unfair to ask cross-border workers to fill in the euro:sterling exchange rate when they complete their forms?

The First Minister: I am happy to look at the issue to see how it might best be addressed. It is probably more of an issue for the British-Irish Council at one of its sectoral meetings, rather than one for the JMC. I know that there can be problems with cross-border working, both with double taxation and tax evasion. A wide range of issues can be looked at, and our office will see where those can best be addressed.

Mrs I Robinson: I welcome the First Minister's statement. I do not apologise for returning to the burning issue of the swine flu pandemic. Will the First Minister indicate the views that those representing the other devolved institutions expressed on seeking assistance from Treasury to cover the expensive costs of making the vaccine available?

The First Minister: Our Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and the Department of Finance and Personnel have done some work in estimating the likely cost; I think that they believe that it will be approximately £77 million. That £77 million will make quite a hole in the Budget, no matter what way we decide to handle the costs involved. The First Minister for Scotland and I had a conversation some months ago when the issue first arose of how the matter could be addressed. We both agreed that the three devolved institutions should work collectively to attempt to get Treasury to recognise its responsibility as far as the reserve is concerned.

The Finance Ministers have touched on the issue at a previous meeting. We raised it again at the meeting of the JMC. There was a united view from Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland that there had to be a contribution from contingency funding toward dealing with the issue. The belief of the Treasury that it can be absorbed within the devolved Administrations is, I believe, unsustainable.

The Treasury could argue that there are certain elements of the cost that can be absorbed and dealt with, but there is no good reason to believe that the vaccine, the need for which could not have been predicted or costed beforehand, should be a cost to the local Administrations. That would take some of the sting out of the cost element, but it still leaves us with a hefty bill, and the Executive will still have to decide how we deal with the costs that are coming our way. The Executive will start that decision-making process on Thursday.

Dr McDonnell: I thank the First Minister for his statement. I notice that he twice mentioned bank lending to small and medium-sized businesses and the importance of banks being able to lend again. Can he give us something of the tone of the meeting? Were we playing hardball or softball? Was it just happy talk, or was there any serious discussion about getting the banks moving? I am thinking in particular of Lloyds HBOS, which is now effectively 70% owned by the Government. That firm has a big interest here in that one of its main subsidiaries is located here. Will the First Minister tell us if there was any serious discussion, and can he give us any indication of where we go moving forward, and how we can get liquidity moving again? People are coming to my office day and daily screaming that there is no liquidity and that the banks are not providing money.

The First Minister: Whatever it was, it was not "happy talk". One does not have happy talk and talk about banks and lending in the same sentence. There was a united view — not just from the devolved Administrations but from the central Government — on the need for the banks to step up to the plate. The deputy First Minister and I have had a series of meetings with the four main banks, and, indeed, with the other banks in Northern Ireland, most recently with Barclays. The message that we get from the four main banks is that they have never lent more; they throw out statistics to that effect.

Then, when we go to a meeting with businessmen, we get exactly the same kind of message as the Member for South Belfast about the difficulty in getting access to lending, the high interest rates being charged in spite of the low interest rate that prevails, and the significant increase in arrangement fees. I get complaints from companies that overdrafts are being arbitrarily removed and reduced. I do not think that all of those difficulties are being pulled out of thin air. There are issues that the banks have to address.

At the meeting of the JMC, we asked the Prime Minister to use his special position, particularly in relation to RBS, of which the Ulster Bank is a subsidiary, to ensure that there is a flow of money. Unless we get lending moving again, the economy will still be held down. It is vital that the banks start to lend again. I am not suggesting that they go back to where they were — that is the very last thing that any of us want; we want to have responsible lending — but there seems to be an attempt on the part of the banks to hold back from lending to certain sectors, particularly in relation to development. If they continue to hold back, they stifle the construction industry, which has been the worst-hit part of our economy. The banks need to free up lending, particularly in relation to land and property.

Mr Hilditch: I thank the First Minister for his statement. On a theme similar to that of Mr McDonnell, will the First Minister indicate what the experiences of the other devolved Administrations are on the issue of banking?

11.00 am

The First Minister: It is precisely the same. As one would expect, because RBS is a big player in Scotland, in the same way that the Ulster Bank is one of our main banks, Scotland is faced with exactly the same circumstances. I can understand the caution that, in many cases, is shown by banks. In many ways, the banking industry was responsible for the credit crunch and the recession that we now face. Irresponsible lending practices were at the heart of those difficulties. Lending of up to 120% on property or land does not seem to be a sensible way forward. The banks need to start lending, and they need some form of regulation.

I was glad that there was a sense at the G20 summit that that matter should be taken forward on an international basis. It is no use for only the United Kingdom to have that regulation, because banking is of such an international flavour that, if one country were to regulate on its own, it would have no impact. Sensible regulation will take place internationally, but all Administrations have exactly the same difficulties. The banks are a problem, and they must start to lend in a realistic and sensible way.

North/South Ministerial Council

Trade and Business Development Sectoral Format

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Speaker has received notice from the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment that she wishes to make a statement on the North/South Ministerial Council (NSMC) trade and business development sectoral format meeting.

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (Mrs Foster): With your permission, I wish to make a statement in compliance with section 52 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 regarding the meeting of the North/South Ministerial Council in trade and business development sectoral format. The meeting was held in Dublin Castle on Wednesday 8 July 2009.

The Executive were represented by me, in my capacity as Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, and by Conor Murphy, Minister for Regional Development, in his capacity as accompanying Minister. The Irish Government were represented by Mary Coughlan TD, Deputy Prime Minister and Minister for Enterprise, Trade and Employment. This statement has been agreed with Minister Murphy, and I am making it on behalf of both of us. The Deputy Prime Minister, Mary Coughlan, chaired the meeting.

Ministers received a presentation from Mark O’Kane, managing director of Marlborough Engineering, Belfast, and from Martin McVicker of Combilift Ltd, Monaghan, who are both participants in InterTradeIreland’s Acumen programme. Marlborough Engineering employs 35 people, and Combilift employs 155 people and exports 96% of what it produces to 50 countries worldwide.

Ministers received a presentation from the chairperson of InterTradeIreland, Dr David Dobbin, on a strategic review of the body’s operations. The main themes for InterTradeIreland arising from the review are to increase economic outcomes to optimise the return on public expenditure through enhanced support in the public procurement market and facilitating new cross-border co-operation in sectors such as agrifood and renewables; to work in a more co-ordinated way with sponsor Departments and other economic development agencies; to focus on activities that offer the greatest economic benefit; and to increase focus on business and client needs, with greater clarity on InterTradeIreland’s work, marketing and communication.

InterTradeIreland’s chief executive, Liam Nellis, presented a progress report on the body’s work, including the fact that £65.45 million in business value was generated in 2008 through InterTradeIreland’s business networks and firms engaged in its projects.

He pointed out that, in 2008, 590 firms engaged in developing their competitiveness through InterTradeIreland's initiatives. The Council discussed progress on the body's business plan for 2009.

Ministers received a presentation from Aidan Gough, the strategy and policy director of InterTradeIreland, on the body's report on co-operation in the area of science, technology and innovation. The report also identified a number of areas of potential increased co-operation, such as policy co-ordination; research pooling; expansion of the US-Ireland Research and Development Partnership; business-to-business innovation vouchers; new market opportunities from technology convergence; a new market entry innovation programme; and the expansion of the Women in Technology and Science (WITS) re-enter programme.

The Council noted InterTradeIreland's annual review of activities and annual accounts of 2007.

The Council agreed that its next meeting in trade and business development sectoral format will take place in November or December 2009. I commend the statement to the Assembly.

Mr Campbell: I welcome the Minister's statement. Is the Minister going to look at the cost-effectiveness of InterTradeIreland and other bodies that operate between Northern Ireland and the Republic in order to ensure the greatest value for money for taxpayers?

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment: As the Member knows, the St Andrews Agreement review is ongoing. Obviously, if there is to be cost-effectiveness in Departments, both in Northern Ireland and in the Republic of Ireland, it is only right, as far as we are all concerned, that the same cost-effectiveness is required from North/South bodies. Certainly, InterTradeIreland is highly aware that value for money must be a key priority of its work. I keep a close eye on that.

We have not agreed the business plans for 2010 and 2011: it is hoped that we will be able to sign those off in the near future. In any event, the 2009 business plan will come before the next sectoral meeting in order to be signed off. It is hugely important that value for money is at the centre of the North/South Ministerial Council's work in this sector, as in others.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I call the Chairperson of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment, Mr Alban Maginness. I apologise, Mr Maginness, for not giving you your rightful place.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment (Mr A Maginness): Not at all, Mr Deputy Speaker.

I thank the Minister for her detailed statement. I welcome her home from India, where, undoubtedly, she did good work on behalf of all Members of the House.

The Minister stated that a main theme for InterTradeIreland is:

"to increase economic outcomes to optimise the return on public expenditure through enhanced support in the public procurement market and facilitating new cross-border co-operation in sectors such as agri-food and renewables."

Is the Minister aware of the anomaly that exists in the systems that operate for renewables in Northern Ireland and the South? To sell electricity from renewable sources in Northern Ireland, a renewables obligation certificate is required, whereas, in the South, the system is based on feed-in tariffs. That means that if I were to produce energy from wind in west Tyrone, it would be disadvantageous for me to export that energy to Donegal. Will the Minister comment on that issue and raise it with the North/South Ministerial Council in order to create a situation in which renewable energy can be exported from one jurisdiction to the other with ease?

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment: I thank the Member for his kind words. I made it back from India, probably much to some people's dismay.

The point that I made about renewables in my statement referred mainly to sharing information on renewable-energy technologies. However, the Member has made a fair point; therefore, I will deal with the difference between the system in Northern Ireland and that of the Republic of Ireland. The Member is correct: the Republic of Ireland has a feed-in tariff system. That is how people are incentivised to get involved in the renewable energy market there. However, throughout the United Kingdom, a system of renewables obligation certificates is in operation.

Recently, we looked at the entire area of the Northern Ireland renewables obligation (NIRO). Later, during Question Time, I will refer to that issue. Soon, we will have consultation on the differences between the two systems; whether we need to look at other ways to incentivise people to become involved in renewable energy, and how we can make it attractive for producers of small amounts of renewable energy to get involved in the market.

That consultation, during which we will raise the issue of feed-in tariffs as opposed to renewables obligation certificates, will take place in the near future. We are looking into that.

I am very alert to the issue. However, we are without legislative cover to have a feed-in tariff at the moment. If, after discussion and consultation, it is decided that we need to look at the issue of a feed-in tariff, we will have to legislate for that.

The reason that we are without legislative cover is quite simple: when the renewables obligation legislation was going through the Parliament at Westminster, the House of Lords put in a new clause that allowed GB to have feed-in tariffs for small-scale renewables. Unfortunately, we did not have the opportunity to be involved in that, because I would have had to bring a legislative consent motion to the House, and we simply did not have the time.

Therefore, we do not have the legislative cover to provide for feed-in tariffs in the way that GB has for small-scale renewables. We are alert to the issue, and we hope to consult on it in the near future.

Ms J McCann: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for her statement. She referred to the public procurement market. Other reports that are coming out today recognise the importance of the social economy sector in reducing deprivation and increasing labour participation. Was the issue of public procurement contracts being opened up to the social economy sector on a cross-border, all-island basis discussed at the meeting?

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment: Public procurement is an issue in which InterTradeIreland has been very much involved. The Member is probably aware that public procurement is a huge market that companies can get involved in across the Republic of Ireland and Northern Ireland. About £17 billion per annum is spent on public procurement in the two jurisdictions. That being the case, InterTradeIreland sees it as a very significant market opportunity for the companies with which it works. It has set up a scheme called Go-2-Tender that allows companies to access that market opportunity specifically.

I am talking about smaller companies in particular, because Members, including Ms McCann, have expressed concerns that some smaller companies — and let us face the fact that Northern Ireland has a small to medium-sized economy — cannot access public procurement. Go-2-Tender is an important programme that InterTradeIreland is working on to support people so that they have the opportunity to win those contracts. Given that £17 billion is spent on public procurement annually, it is vital that companies know how that works.

Some companies in Northern Ireland were able to avail themselves of Government contracts in the Republic of Ireland recently. However, some people in the Republic of Ireland were not too happy about that. During the summer, Members might have heard people on the radio condemning the fact that companies from Northern Ireland were able to get those Government contracts. However, I think that it is vital that we support those companies, because we want our companies to be able to export and to find opportunities and go for them. The Go-2-Tender programme is a very important part of InterTradeIreland's work, and I very much want to see it expanding and doing more.

Mr Cree: I, too, welcome the Minister's statement and welcome her back from India. I thought that I got the whiff of "eau de madras" as she passed by.

The Minister referred to the fact that the business plan for this year is being prepared by InterTradeIreland. Will she advise us as to whether any change of emphasis or direction is being considered, bearing in mind that we are still going through the worst recession in living memory?

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment: I am glad to tell the Member that I was not in Chennai, so I did not have any madras. However, I was in three other cities.

We found it regrettable that we did not have the 2009 business plan before us in July, because we would have liked to have been able to sign off on that. We know that the economic climate in Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland has become extremely difficult. I think, therefore, that it was right to look again at the business plan.

11.15 am

My Department and the corresponding Department in the Republic of Ireland published guidance on efficiency savings recently. We hope that that will mean that the revised 2009 business plan — and, indeed, the 2010 business plan — will come forward in the near future. Hopefully, that will be available at the next sectoral meeting, which is to be held in November or December. Those plans will be subject to ministerial approval by me and by the Deputy Prime Minister in the Republic of Ireland, Mary Coughlan. When we get those plans, we will look at how they deal with the current economic crisis.

However, we cannot be short term in what we do as regards InterTradeIreland or Invest Northern Ireland, a subject to which I am sure we will return later today. It is true that we need to plan for what is happening now. However, we also need to look to the medium term and the longer term, and I hope that the business plan will take that into account.

Mr Moutray: Will the Minister indicate what InterTradeIreland is doing to help Northern Ireland companies to secure new business in the Republic of Ireland, especially given the current advantageous sterling:euro exchange rate?

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment: I mentioned already public procurement and the Go-2-Tender programme. At present, the competitiveness of Northern Ireland firms is partly what makes them attractive, and the exchange rate gives us a competitive advantage. We are ensuring that InterTradeIreland is working with companies in Northern Ireland to allow them to take advantage of that.

There are a number of programmes through which companies do that. For example, I referred to the Acumen programme. We had presentations from a company in Belfast and another in Monaghan explaining how they used the Acumen programme to help identify new market opportunities in the two jurisdictions. Network+Getwork is another such programme, and it is a buyer-and-supplier programme. That is delivered in partnership with the Chamber of Commerce movement, and it helps companies to break into the supply chains of some of the largest organisations.

There is a recurring theme, in that we have small companies that need the knowledge that will empower them to break into the bigger markets. InterTradeIreland is working collaboratively with Invest Northern Ireland and with Enterprise Ireland in the Republic of Ireland so that it can give as much information as possible to our smaller firms.

Mr Butler: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I welcome the Minister home, and I hope that the trade mission to India was a success.

The Minister mentioned InterTradeIreland's report on innovation, science and technology. The report on the independent review of economic policy (IREP) shows that there needs to be a greater emphasis on innovation and research and development. Does the Minister agree that if those are to be increased, there must be greater co-operation with InterTradeIreland and more investment by her Department?

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment: The Member referred to the IREP report, which is published today. That report states that there is a need for greater emphasis on innovation and research and development, and InterTradeIreland recognises that.

I talked about looking to the short term, medium term and long term. If we examine only the difficulties that we are experiencing now, it is very easy for us to look for jobs, of any description, and get them into our economy. People are hurting and they need jobs, and I recognise that. However, if we are to make the step change that is required for Northern Ireland through Invest Northern Ireland, we need to look at innovation and research and development. I know that that is a difficult message at this particular time, dealing as we are with the economic crisis. However, if we invest in those areas, I believe that the economy will grow and become the open regional economy that we very much want it to be.

Invest Northern Ireland and InterTradeIreland work collaboratively on issues such as innovation and research and development. I do not want duplication, and I am sure that the Member would agree with that. However, if there are ways in which those organisations can work together and enhance each other's work, that is the sort of thing that I want to see happening.

Mrs I Robinson: I welcome the Minister back from her travels, and I welcome her statement.

Will the Minister indicate whether there was a ceiling on the number of women who qualified for participation in the pilot exercise for the WITS re-enter programme? Given that the success of that exercise in attracting women back into the workforce is there for all to see, are there any plans to roll out the programme across Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland?

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment: The expansion of the programme is something that we want to look at, and it is something that InterTradeIreland feels should be looked at. This is about encouraging more women to come back into the workplace, particularly in the areas of science and technology.

There were 20 recruits in the pilot exercise: five were from Northern Ireland and 15 were from the Republic of Ireland. Fifteen of them have already returned to careers in science and technology and a further four are actively seeking employment. Of the five Northern Ireland participants, four have returned to careers in science and technology, which is a good indicator that the programme has worked well. I want to see it developing and that there is no ceiling on the number of participants so that more women can become involved. We should be encouraging women to return to work after childbirth.

Dr McDonnell: I thank the Minister for her statement. She does herself an injustice: the charm, energy and gravitas that she brings to the Assembly and the Executive have been missing for the past week. A sense of lethargy and limpness had crept in, but I can feel that fading fast this morning.

In some of the questions that I have heard asked this morning —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. This is the time for questions, Dr McDonnell. You seem to have a great difficulty using five words instead of 20. I ask you get to your question.

Dr McDonnell: I was about to.

In some of the questions this morning, there has been an undercurrent of perceived underachievement with regard to InterTradeIreland. Has the Minister had any serious discussions with the chairperson of that body, David Dobbin, or the chief executive, Liam Nellis, on the achievement of its targets in the past year and what the aims are for next year? I sense that InterTradeIreland is achieving a lot, but I am worried about the undercurrents of perceived underachievement.

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment: First, I thank the Member for missing me: it is nice to be missed.

InterTradeIreland is doing a very good job, and so is Invest Northern Ireland. I spent a week in India with Invest Northern Ireland and saw the level of research that it carries out and the number of meetings that it arranges — 26 companies were at over 100 meetings in India. That does not take away from the fact that we need to look continuously at such organisations, which is what today is about for Invest Northern Ireland.

That is also what the strategic review did for InterTradeIreland, which is why David Dobbin briefed Ministers on the strategic review at that meeting. It was important for us to hear the issues that he mentioned, such as the need by the two Departments that sponsor InterTradeIreland to work in a more co-ordinated way; the need to work with other economic development agencies, such as Enterprise Ireland and Invest Northern Ireland; the need to focus on activities that offer the greatest economic benefit, which Members will agree is very important; and the need to have greater clarity on the work of InterTradeIreland, such as its marketing and communications.

The Member is correct, but he will agree that there is always a need to review organisations, which is why David Dobbin was very clear in his comments to me at that meeting.

Mr McElduff: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Will the Minister detail the main obstacles to cross-border mobility that remain in the areas of trade and business and outline how she and her Department plan to address them?

Will she also detail the main characteristics and benefits of the Acumen programme? The Minister said that the programme tries to identify new market opportunities. How successful has it been?

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment: The Acumen programme has been one of the success stories for InterTradeIreland. Perhaps the Member is aware of companies in his constituency that have taken advantage of the programme. A number of companies in Northern Ireland — some in my constituency — have benefited greatly from the Acumen programme. It is a sales and marketing programme that goes into small companies, gives them the expertise to sell their wares — that is, sadly, sometimes lacking in some smaller companies — and helps them to identify and scope out new market opportunities. That is just one of the programmes in which InterTradeIreland engages. It also works in co-operation with some of Invest Northern Ireland's programmes.

Aidan Gough, InterTradeIreland's strategy and policy director, suggested areas in which he felt that there was a need to expand or to look at new ways to work together, whether in policy co-ordination, research pooling, new market opportunities, the WITS re-enter programme, to which I referred, and new market-entry innovation programmes.

InterTradeIreland is working in a number of areas, and it is working better with Invest Northern Ireland. It helps that some InterTradeIreland board members are also on the board of Invest Northern Ireland. There is, therefore, a crossover and an understanding of what is going on in the two bodies.

Mr McCarthy: I, too, welcome the Minister's statement. My concern is about Invest Northern Ireland and InterTradeIreland working together, an issue that she has mentioned. I congratulate InterTradeIreland for the volume of business that it has brought across the whole island of Ireland. How can that best be taken forward by Invest Northern Ireland?

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment: InterTradeIreland and Invest Northern Ireland have different remits and roles. There has been a concern that there may have been some duplication in what they did. InterTradeIreland is meant to operate in areas of business competitiveness that are common to all economic development agencies, but it engages only in those initiatives that require funding in both jurisdictions; that is, the Republic of Ireland and Northern Ireland. In addition, when we do economic appraisals on InterTradeIreland, one marker that we use is that it must not duplicate what other agencies are doing.

In the past, InterTradeIreland was, perhaps, perceived as a body that worked only along the border, in areas such as Fermanagh, Tyrone and Armagh. I have recently seen InterTradeIreland going into places such as Ballymena, holding road shows and helping to deal with the credit crunch in those areas. I applaud InterTradeIreland for doing that and want to encourage it in that, because it has much to offer Northern Ireland.

Ms Anderson: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for her statement. I am aware that my point may be a repetition of points that have already been made. I appreciate that the Minister probably feels a need to defend or support Invest NI. However, given the review into Invest NI, and in the context of the Minister's statement that referred to the review into InterTradeIreland and a need for better co-operation and collaboration, there are genuine concerns in constituencies about Invest NI. There are concerns about it working with agencies such as Enterprise Ireland and how a more collaborative and co-operative approach will be achieved.

I am concerned that if the recommendations and findings are not embraced fully in order to make Invest NI a more effective, efficient and better economic development agency that will work with Enterprise Ireland, and then, together, work with InterTradeIreland, we might lose an opportunity. I ask the Minister to take into account — as I am sure she will — all those recommendations, but to do that in the context of improving the relationship between InterTradeIreland and Invest NI.

11.30 am

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment: In the past, there may have been some overlap between InterTradeIreland and Invest Northern Ireland, and relationships may not have been as strong as they should have been. Those relationships have improved, and I think that they will continue to improve. I do not feel the need to defend Invest NI. When Members receive the report, which is quite hefty, they should take the time to read it. It contains constructive criticism, and Members should bear that in mind.

There is little point in my asking for an independent report on Invest Northern Ireland and, indeed, my policies in the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment for it to recommend no changes. We need to examine the report in its totality, consider the constructive criticism and take on board any ways in which we might improve the Northern Ireland economy's overall performance. I hope that people will take the time to read the entire report. Thereafter, I intend to make it subject to a short consultation period — probably around six weeks — and proceed from there.

I assure the Member that, given that I commissioned the report, I will read it and consider its comments very carefully.

Mr Deputy Speaker: That concludes questions to the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment on her statement. The Minister of Finance and Personnel is not yet in his place, so I ask Members to take their ease until the Minister arrives.

North/South Ministerial Council

Special EU Programmes Sectoral Format

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Speaker has received notice from the Minister of Finance and Personnel that he wishes, albeit late, to make a statement on the meeting of the North/South Ministerial Council (NSMC) in special EU programmes sectoral format.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel (Mr S Wilson): I hope that the title “late Finance Minister” does not become attached to me. I apologise for my delay in arriving in the Chamber.

The North/South Ministerial Council met in special EU programmes sectoral format in Dublin on 8 September 2009. It was the first NSMC meeting in that format since November 2007. The Government of the Republic of Ireland were represented by the Minister for Finance, Brian Lenihan, who chaired the meeting. I represented the Northern Ireland Executive and was accompanied by junior Minister Gerry Kelly.

The meeting began with a presentation from Pat Colgan, chief executive of the Special EU Programmes Body (SEUPB), who updated the Council on developments since the meeting in November 2007. Mr Colgan noted a number of achievements over the two-year period, including the ongoing work to close the old Peace II and INTERREG IIIa programmes. SEUPB expects both programmes to earn all available EU receipts. Mr Colgan informed the Council that the SEUPB's annual report and accounts for 2007 and 2008 are fully up to date and have received clean audit reports from the Comptroller and Auditor General for Northern Ireland and his counterpart in the Republic.

Mr Colgan updated the Council on the current Peace III and INTERREG IVa programmes, both of which have been open to funding applications since the end of 2007. Several hundred project applications have been assessed. Of those, close to 150 have met the agreed project selection criteria and have been approved for funding. However, the very ambitious levels of Peace and INTERREG programme spending that the SEUPB had forecast for 2008 were not fully achieved. Nonetheless, SEUPB is confident that both programmes will achieve their respective first EU spending targets by December 2009.

Finally, Mr Colgan mentioned the SEUPB's ongoing work to develop local projects that might compete for funding under the EU's transnational and inter-regional programmes. The Council welcomed the progress that has been made in implementing the Peace III programme. More than 100 projects have been approved, representing €156 million of programme funds. That is close to half the available programme budget of €333 million, and includes the €13 million allocated to Ilex to take forward the construction of the Foyle footbridge and €55 million that has been made available to councils, North and South, to take forward their peace and reconciliation local action plans.

The Council welcomed progress on the Peace III theme 'Acknowledging and Dealing with the Past', which has a special focus on the needs of victims and survivors of the terrorist campaign. To date, 55 projects have been approved under that theme, on which €22 million of programme funds have been spent. Ministers noted that the SEUPB has been engaged proactively in outreach measures with groups that are under-represented among the programme beneficiaries, including the Protestant community. The purpose of that outreach work is to ensure that all communities participate fully in the programme. Ministers also noted the work that is under way to share the experiences of peace funding through the development of a peace network.

Ministers welcomed the progress that has been made on the INTERREG IVa cross-border programme, which has a budget of €256 million. To date, 34 projects have been approved, representing funding of €151 million — more than half the programme total. The continued participation of the five local authority partnership groups was noted and welcomed. Those groups were a particular success of the earlier INTERREG programme.

Ministers welcomed the participation of Scotland, which is newly eligible under the INTERREG IVa programme. To date, Scotland has been a very active newcomer; Scottish partners are involved in 13 of the projects thus far approved.

The Council noted that this year, and in all subsequent years, the significant challenge under Peace III and INTERREG IV is to translate commitments into actual expenditure. Both programmes will have to meet the challenging annual spending targets set by the European Commission.

Ministers were encouraged by the SEUPB's work to promote North/South participation in the EU's transnational and inter-regional programmes. The Council discussed the SEUPB business plan and budget for 2009, including the need for efficiencies. Finally, the Council noted the SEUPB's annual report and accounts for 2007 and 2008. The Council aims to meet again in special EU programmes sectoral format early in the new year.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel (Ms J McCann): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his statement. I want to ask him about match funding. I am sure that he is aware that many organisations that have already received special EU funding were unable to secure match funding, which made things difficult for them. Was there any discussion, or was any information provided, about following the example of other European Governments who have given full match funding to similar organisations in their countries?

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: The issue of match funding was not raised. Nevertheless, I understand the point that the Member has made. I will make a note of it and seek to raise the issue at the next meeting, which will take place early in the new year. It is something that we can examine before that meeting, as can the SEUPB.

I was not aware that there was flexibility to move away from match funding; my understanding was that it was an intrinsic part of funding that is made available through the programmes. If there are ways in which other countries have dealt with match funding, that is well and good.

If match funding was possible, and was to be done, it would simply mean that all funding would come from the same pot, and fewer projects would be able to secure funding. Therefore, there would also be a downside. The whole point of match funding is that EU money would lever in money from other sources, therefore adding value.

Mr Weir: I thank the Minister for his statement. He indicated that the INTERREG programme spending forecast for 2008 had not been met, but that the SEUPB was confident that both programmes would achieve their EU spending targets by December 2009. Can the Minister indicate what the level of shortfall was for the targets in 2008? What action is being taken to ensure that those can confidently be met by December 2009?

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: I hope that I have not given the wrong impression. The first target date is at the end of this year. In working to that target, it would be a wise precaution for any organisation to have a profile of how it expects to spend its money until that target date. I do not have the exact figure on the shortfall to date.

One reason why the profile might not be continuous is that a lot of the programmes and projects are now much larger than they were in the past. Previously, a lot of small programmes spent smaller amounts of money. In moving towards larger programmes, each with a larger spend, the profiles may be less even than they were in the past.

A number of projects are in the pipeline, some of which have tight deadlines. For example, Members from the Foyle constituency will be aware of the Ilex programme. Some large programmes will require planning permission, and so forth, which can cause delays and affect the profile of spend. I have been assured that local authorities have been working hard to ensure that they will do all that they can to facilitate those projects. Again, the Ilex project is a good example, in that planning was brought forward more quickly to enable the project to be on stream for the end of the year. In doing that, the targets should be met.

Mr McNarry: The Minister alluded to the fact that, in light of the further expansion of the EU, the ongoing recession and fiscal constraints, EU funding programmes are less likely to be prevalent in Northern Ireland in the forthcoming years. We are aware of that; however, large parts of Northern Ireland's social economy are reliant on EU funding. What steps are the Executive taking to prepare Northern Ireland's social economy for such changes? Have any discussions taken place at a North/South level about making our social economy more sustainable?

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: I did not say in my statement that we expect EU funding to fall in the future, although I suppose that one may surmise that to be the case. The social economy does rely heavily on EU funding, and that is an issue that individual Departments need to deal with. For example, DSD has a huge interface with the social economy and with a lot of community groups, and, through the kinds of projects that are now being granted permission, it is working hard on the infrastructure that will be attached to those community groups. Such infrastructure should, therefore, help to give them a sustainable income afterwards. That is the way forward.

There is always a conflict about whether to fund workers or to fund infrastructure. Funding infrastructure will give groups the ability to generate income and to be more sustainable in the future. We have all had a debate about that conflict. A lot of people are employed in the social economy on the basis of the grants that are coming forward. However, we are moving in the right direction in the long term. We are looking at improving infrastructure, which will hopefully enable groups to become more sustainable.

Mr O'Loan: I very much welcome the fact that, as part of the Peace III measure 'Acknowledging and dealing with the past', €22 million has been spent on the needs of victims and survivors. What is distinctive about the Peace III spend on victims and survivors? It is very important that what is done on the ground in relation to victims and survivors meets the Executive's top-down policies. Following the Eames/Bradley report, will the Minister give his commitment to a very robust method of finding the truth about the past? Pain and embarrassment will be caused to many people, but does the Minister accept that that is necessary if we are to deal with the past properly?

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: There was widespread concern about the way in which Peace II funding was used because of the emphasis that was placed on one side of our society. It is welcome that, for the first time, much more money is being spent on victims and survivors' groups than has been spent on ex-prisoner groups. People demanded, and will welcome, that shift.

I do not want to dictate the kind of projects that victims and survivors, groups should undertake. Some of the work may be about finding out what happened in the past. I am more disposed towards groups that work to help people who are still suffering from what happened in the past, whether physically, financially or through keeping some kind of contact to avoid isolation. However, whatever groups require should be the emphasis of the funding. The main theme is to acknowledge and deal with the past, but people have their own way of dealing with the past. I am not necessarily of the view that dealing with the past simply means digging up everything that happened in a search for explanations.

Dr Farry: I declare an interest as a member of the Community Relations Council.

What efforts are being made to ensure that the Peace III investment is co-ordinated with other good-relations projects? Efforts must be made to ensure that there is no duplication; that the two approaches complement each other; and that long-term funding programmes are not undermined by the impact of a short-term injection of Peace III money.

A number of bodies that were funded under Peace II are unlikely to qualify for funding under the Peace III criteria. What steps are being taken to manage expectations and to explain to groups why they are no longer in a position to receive funding because of changes in the rules?

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: Groups know well that Peace III was not a continuation of Peace II, and great lengths were gone to explain that. Some of the groups may not like that answer, but there has never been any attempt to hide the answer or an explanation of the new criteria from them.

The Member makes an important point about duplication. One of the ways in which we have attempted to get around duplication and the plethora of bodies that deal with funding is by rationalising the number of local strategy partnerships from 26 to 11 and reducing the number of implementing bodies. That, in itself, helped to remove some of the confusion and duplication. As a result, SEUPB took on more work. That is one reason why SEUPB's staffing levels have gone up considerably, although that issue must be dealt with in the future.

Mrs D Kelly: I declare an interest as a member of the East Border Region Committee (EBRC). I thank the Minister for his statement. Will he explain why that NSMC meeting was the first in that sectoral format?

I am sure that the Minister is well aware, from his experience as a local councillor, that organisations are always chasing deadlines, because there is a delay, either at programme body or European level, in their receiving information and application forms. Will he explain that?

Will the Minister tell the House how much money was returned to the EU last year and why? Will he conduct an analysis of that to ensure that it does not happen again? I also ask him to give us a flavour of the types of projects that cross-border bodies are funding and to tell us which ones are particularly welcome?

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: First, I hope that the Member does not blame me for the fact that there had been no NSMC meeting in special EU programmes sectoral format since November 2007. I arranged this month's meeting as quickly as I could. Delays occurred partly as a result of difficulties in the Irish Republic. A first meeting was delayed because Ministers in the Republic were diverted by the first referendum on the Lisbon Treaty. I suppose that if the vote does not go the way in which Europe wants it to on Friday, there will be a third referendum, because that is how Europe tends to work — it just wears people down. I would have thought that it would have been sufficient for Europe for the people of the Irish Republic to speak once, but apparently not. Europe never takes no for an answer.

A second meeting, which was to be held in November 2008, was cancelled because our Executive were not meeting.

Mrs D Kelly: I wonder why that was.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: I think that we know the reason. The irony is, of course, that the Executive were not meeting because Sinn Féin had some difficulty, and I am afraid that it was the fault not of unionists but of republicans that cross-border meetings did not happen. That is one of the ironies of our situation.

The meeting that was scheduled for April 2009 was cancelled, at the request of the Dublin Minister, who was tied up with emergency Budget business.

I hope that the Member can see that unionists were not to blame for any of the delays. They were caused by a combination of Ministers and events in the Republic and the difficulties that existed with the Executive and Sinn Féin. I hope that the Member is assured that we are not dragging our heels on the matter.

Secondly, the delays should not have impacted on funding applications, because the North/South Ministerial Council does not deal with the detail of applications.

As far as the shortfall and the amount of money given back is concerned, no money was returned and, therefore, no analysis is required.

I know that Members are allowed to ask only one question. However, Mr Deputy Speaker, you indulged the Member, but I cannot remember her third question. If she wants to repeat it, I will try to give her an answer.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I call Mr John Dallat.

Mr Dallat: I also welcome the Minister's statement. He referred to the wonderful Ilex project in Derry that includes the provision of a footbridge across the Foyle. Is he aware that another means of crossing the river a bit further downstream, the Foyle ferry service, may no longer be available from tomorrow? Will he tell the House whether any efforts have been made to obtain funding for that service?

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: I picked up on that in the news yesterday. I understand that the Foyle ferry had been jointly funded by councils in the Republic and Northern Ireland, but that both have decided not to continue providing that support. I am not aware that any application has been made for funding through any of the EU programmes. I will ask whether that is the case and write to the Member.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE BUSINESS

Water and Sewerage Services (Amendment) Bill

Second Stage

The Minister for Regional Development (Mr Murphy): I beg to move

That the Second Stage of the Water and Sewerage Services (Amendment) Bill [NIA 3/09] be agreed.

The Bill amends the Water and Sewerage Services (Northern Ireland) Order 2006 to extend by three years the period during which my Department is prepared to subsidise NI Water (NIW) in lieu of customer payments. If the change were not made, the existing provision for the payment of a subsidy would expire on 31 March 2010.

In wider terms, the effect of the Bill is to provide for the continuance of a sound legal basis on which the Executive can pay domestic customers' bills on their behalf. It gives financial stability to NIW and ensures that the funding to allow the delivery of services is provided.

I appreciate that much wider questions exist about how the Assembly should deal with the future funding of water, but the Bill does not address those: that is a matter on which the Executive must decide. The three-year extension of the subsidy simply provides for the continuance of current funding arrangements.

I have set out the principle that underlies the legislation and what will be achieved by its introduction, the necessity for which is self-evident. I commend the Bill to the Assembly.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Regional Development (Mr Cobain): As Chairperson, I welcome the opportunity to contribute to the debate on the Second Stage of this important Bill. The issue today is whether the Assembly is content to endorse the principles of the Water and Sewerage Services (Amendment) Bill 2009. In the absence of funding through payment by customers, the Bill aims to ensure the continued provision of a subsidy to Northern Ireland Water.

Under article 213(3) of the Water and Sewerage Services (Northern Ireland) Order 2006, the Department for Regional Development (DRD) is required to make grants to Northern Ireland Water equal to the amount of discounts provided to customers in the initial period. The 2006 Order defines the initial period as three years from the coming into operation of the Order. During that three-year period, the direct rule Administration had intended to phase in charges for water and sewerage services. That initial period expires on 31 March 2010, and the Department has stated its willingness to make grants to Northern Ireland Water after that date.

As the Minister said, the Executive have yet to make a decision on the future funding of water and sewerage services. Even if a decision were to be taken next week, the indications are that Northern Ireland Water would not be in a position to issue bills and collect revenue by April 2010 as there would not be sufficient time.

The Committee for Regional Development is mindful of the need to progress business in an efficient and effective manner while discharging its responsibility for scrutiny to the entire Assembly thoroughly and conscientiously. The Committee will take that approach with the Bill.

12.00 noon

The Committee does not intend to oppose the principles of the Bill. It is important that Northern Ireland Water operates within a stable financial environment to ensure that the much-needed sewerage infrastructure investment programmes make progress and that the planned efficiencies and service improvements are delivered.

However, significant financial implications for Northern Ireland arise from the deferral of charging for water and sewerage services. This Bill creates the mechanism to put into action a decision by the Executive to continue to defer water and sewerage charges. Recently, there have been some discussions in the media about the impact on the Northern Ireland block grant of deferring water and sewerage charges. The Committee explored some of those issues with DRD officials during pre-introduction briefings and over the course of the previous session as the issues emerged.

At Committee Stage, we will seek clarity of the costs of continued deferral, including the costs that are associated with the reclassification of Northern Ireland Water for public expenditure purposes, the basis for valuing Northern Ireland Water assets and the ongoing ability of Northern Ireland Water to reclaim its input VAT. The Committee will also seek clarity of the financial impact that ongoing deferrals may have on the Northern Ireland block grant as a whole, the DRD budget and the budgets of other Departments. The Committee looks forward to receiving this Bill at Committee Stage. I assure the House and the Minister that this Bill will be treated by the Committee as a matter of priority.

Miss McIlveen: As the Chairman of the Committee for Regional Development indicated, the Committee discussed the principles of the Water and Sewerage Services (Amendment) Bill and has agreed to support them.

It is a very short Bill that appears to be mainly technical in nature, the purpose of it being to continue the customer subsidy to Northern Ireland Water (NIW). As was indicated, the power that was given to the Department under the Water and Sewerage Service (Northern Ireland) Order 2006 to pay the grant equal to the amount of discounts to customers comes to an end on 31 March. Obviously, the direct rule Administration had anticipated that the phasing in of charges for water and sewerage services would have been complete at that stage. Members are clearly aware that that is not the case and that water charges have been deferred, hence the requirement for this legislation.

It is my understanding that if the payment does not continue from 1 April 2010, Northern Ireland Water will be unable to pay for the delivery of what we very much take for granted; that is, water and sewerage services. Due to a legacy of many years of under-investment in our infrastructure, Northern Ireland has lagged behind the rest of the United Kingdom. Only in recent years have we started to see the benefits of investment. I know that in my constituency, a substantial number of infrastructure programmes are being carried out and are planned for. Future investment in water is critical from an environmental and a health perspective.

The issue of water and how it is paid for is hugely emotive. The Chairman highlighted the issues around the continued deferral of water charges. However, it would probably be mischievous and unwise for us to deviate from the principles of the Bill that is before us today. At this stage, I am content to accept the principles of the Bill. I look forward to the Committee Stage.

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Ar dtús, ba mhaith liom a rá go mbeidh Sinn Féin ag tacú leis an Bhille, agus táimid ar son leanúint ar aghaidh leis an obair seo.

Sinn Féin will support the taking forward of this Bill. The Water and Sewerage Services (Amendment) Bill is designed to ensure the continued provision of a subsidy to NIW by the Department. Therefore, as has been stated, it is very much a technical Bill.

The current situation is that the Department's ability and legal competence to pay a subsidy to NIW expires on 31 March 2010. That was a condition that was laid out in the Water and Sewerage Services Order 2006, which, in essence, established the company on 1 April 2007. If that Order expires, there will be no provision for the Department to provide grants or subsidies to NIW. Therefore, the company's ability to exist and its ability to continue with the provision and management of our water and sewerage system will come to an end. This Bill will provide the basis to move forward and allow NIW to continue with its investment programmes and related works.

I welcome the decision, as outlined by the Chairperson, that the Committee for Regional Development supports the principles of the Bill. We look forward to working with it. Irrespective of decisions that were made in the past by previous Administrations — all of us have our own views of those decisions — as the Chairperson pointed out, it is incumbent on all of us to ensure that NIW operates within a financially stable environment and to allow the continuation of its work. The Bill allows that to happen.

We also support the Bill because it creates a mechanism by which the Executive can continue to defer water and sewerage charges. I agree with the Chairperson that it will be important to seek clarification at Committee Stage of the direct and indirect costs of deferral. Those issues have been discussed on many occasions at the Committee and will, undoubtedly, be revisited at Committee Stage.

I welcome the commitment of the Chairperson, the Deputy Chairperson and the Committee to prioritise the Bill. I assure the Minister of the full co-operation of Members on this side of the House as he takes the Bill forward. Go raibh maith agat.

Mr Gallagher: I apologise to the House, and to the Minister in particular, for being a few minutes late for the debate; I was delayed at a meeting of the all-party Assembly group on learning disability.

The SDLP has serious concerns about the Bill. For one thing, the full financial implications have yet to be debated fully and openly. We are being asked to support a Bill that, we are led to believe, will give the Executive the option to continue to fund Northern Ireland Water through the payment of a customer subsidy. However, neither the Department for Regional Development nor the Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP) will state convincingly that they will use that option if the Bill is approved by the Assembly.

Members should remind themselves that, at present, the public are worried, mainly about their jobs, mortgages and impossible increases on rates bills. The shadow of potential water charges now hangs over that. Only last week, the Minister for Regional Development said that he was unable to rule out the introduction of water charges during this Assembly's lifetime. Around the same time, the Minister of Finance and Personnel said that he may be forced to introduce water charges because of pressures on the block grant. Indeed, his Department's costings for previous years included allowances for payments through water charges.

Those comments and documents from the heart of Government, some of them leaked, tell us that, despite the absence of debate, the public are completely bewildered about water charges, particularly in relation to the positions of Sinn Féin and the DUP. Prior to elections, those parties told the public that they would stop the introduction of water charges. That is not what happened.

Mr Hamilton: My party's position is perfectly clear; the position of the Member's party, on the other hand, is a little more confused. If he is so opposed to the introduction of water charges at any stage and under any circumstances, will he explain why his colleague the Minister for Social Development, Margaret Ritchie, voted in the Executive for a Budget predicated on the introduction of water charges by now?

Mr Gallagher: We all understand very well that we have a strange democracy here, in which, under a ministerial code, Ministers are required to support Executive decisions. [Interruption.]

I am outlining the party's position, and I referred to the position of Mr Hamilton's party because it is so well known.

Despite all the promises to which I referred, what happened in 2008? Water charges for businesses were introduced at a 50% rate, and, in April 2009, they were increased to full charges. How do we explain that to the public? The best way is to have a full and open debate in the Assembly, and that has not happened. We have never been afforded that opportunity.

Yet serious problems in relation to Northern Ireland Water emerge almost every week. Recently, the Utility Regulator published 'Water and Sewerage Service Price Control 2010-2013: Draft Determination Summary Report'. It rightly raised the infrastructural problems which we have inherited and which have to be tackled. It also showed that Northern Ireland Water had bid for £136 million more than the Utility Regulator deemed necessary. In July, Northern Ireland Water admitted that it had been overcharging some business customers. There is a great deal that is not right within the system, and in the way that we are taking forward the Bill, we are not facing up to that. Let us see what happens when the Bill gets to Committee Stage. We all know that there has been no public consultation prior to the introduction of the Bill, so there is a great deal of work to be done as it progresses through the Committee. There is a very short time frame, and we are all being put under pressure to pass the Bill.

I have referred to the infrastructural problems. There is no doubt that the public wants to see a water service that works efficiently and provides for the utilities as it is supposed to. Behind all of this lies the question: has the Treasury put the Executive on notice that it will not allow us to continue subsidising Northern Ireland Water? That question needs to be answered. When it is answered, there will be a wider debate on how the issue is going to be handled. At the Committee Stage, the SDLP will continue to express very grave concerns about that. At least, we will try to open up a debate about it.

Mr B Wilson: I reluctantly support the Bill. It is disappointing that, after two years, we have not yet resolved the issue of how to pay for our water, and it is now necessary to rush this Bill through the Assembly to ensure that Northern Ireland Water can have funding in the new financial year. However, I recognise that we must keep that option open and we have to pass the Bill. If we fail to pass it, Northern Ireland Water could be left in April without funding. However, even if we pass the Bill, we should not assume that Northern Ireland Water will be funded automatically from the block grant in the next financial year.

I am opposed to water charges based on property values, which is the obvious alternative. They are grossly unfair and they fall heavily on the elderly and those on fixed incomes. However, I recognise that we must find an alternative means of funding the water and sewerage services. It cannot continue to be met from the block grant, as that would be at the expense of other services. Under the Barnett formula, there is no provision for water in the block grant. In the rest of the UK, consumers pay the charges directly to water companies and there is no call on public finance. Therefore, we get no money for the funding of Northern Ireland Water.

Northern Ireland Water must be funded from existing sources. The alternatives are to fund it from the regional rate or from the block grant. If the Executive decide to continue funding it from the block grant, it must inevitably mean a reduction in the resources available for other services such as housing, health and education. I highlighted that issue in my Budget speech in November 2007, when I pointed out that, because there was no alternative funding for water, the budget for the Health Service would have to be reduced — and that that would inevitably lead to cuts in service and significant redundancies. I pointed out at the time that the increase in the health budget was only 2.6%, which was the lowest for 10 years, and that, in practice, because of demographic trends and because NHS inflation is significantly higher than basic inflation, the 2.6% increase for the Health Service represented at best a freeze in overall expenditure, compared to a 4% increase in real terms for the Health Service in England. Funding our water means that there is less funding available for the Health Service.

12.15 pm

The Budget also referred to new demands that we had to meet, such as those of the Bamford review. I was just at the learning disability —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. Mr Wilson, the debate is about the Water and Sewerage Services (Amendment) Bill; please stick to the issue at hand.

Mr B Wilson: Yes; I am sorry, Mr Deputy Speaker. The Bill proposes that water and sewerage services be funded from the block grant. If that is done, there will be an impact on all other services. I feel that that is a perfectly legitimate argument to use.

The Independent Water Review Panel, which was chaired by Professor Paddy Hillyard, examined in detail the question of the funding of Northern Ireland Water. The Green Party welcomed that report. We had always argued that water services should be funded from general taxation, and, therefore, we supported the recommendation that there be no separate water charges. In accepting the report's main recommendation, which is that the regional rate be frozen for two years, the Executive gave the impression that the problem of paying for water and sewerage services had been resolved. In fact, nothing had changed. Any public celebrations were premature. The issue has not gone away, and, as we now see, the money is not available for next year because we did not take any action on the Hillyard report.

Mrs Long: Does the Member agree that an opportunity to study in more depth ways to levy separate water charges fairly and affordably has also been missed? The assumption was that, because the charges were being deferred, they would not be implemented. We could now be facing a situation in which they are implemented in what is not a fair, affordable and transparent way, despite the fact that there has been a deferral.

Mr B Wilson: I thank the Member for that intervention. She raised one of the major points that I was going to discuss. We had the situation whereby we were going to introduce the charges based on property values. That would have been grossly unfair, because it would have hit the poor, the elderly, and those who are on fixed incomes. We should have been looking at alternative forms of funding at that stage. The fact is that the opportunity to find fair and alternative forms of funding has been overlooked. We are now left, in the few months that remain before the funding runs out, with having to rush this legislation through the Assembly. We should have been looking at other forms of taxation that are based on the ability to pay.

We should be looking at the Lyons and Burt reviews from Scotland and England on other forms of local government finance, for example. We should be considering options such as a local sales tax, a service tax, and green taxes that would help the environment as well as raise revenue and that would be based on the principle that the polluter pays. We should also be looking at something such as a land value tax. For the past two years, we have not taken the opportunity to consider the alternatives, and we are now being pushed into accepting that the charges will come out of the block grant. If that happens, it must inevitably be at the expense of other services. Therefore, we will see a reduction in those other services.

Therefore, although I support the Bill, I feel that we should not be rushing it through the Assembly. I hope that the —

Mr Weir: I am curious about the Member's assertion that the Bill is being rushed through the Assembly. There is no accelerated passage, and the Bill will have a full Committee Stage. How is it being rushed through the Assembly?

Mr B Wilson: As far as the business of the Committee for Regional Development is concerned, everything else has been set aside for the next month. I assure the Member that the parliamentary timetable is extremely tight.

In conclusion, I support the Bill, but I hope that we will find alternative ways of funding the services in question, because the present method of funding from the block grant or from property taxes is unacceptable.

Mr Bresland: Although the issue of water charges is one that gives rise to strong views and often heated debates, it is important to remember that the Water and Sewerage Services (Amendment) Bill is technical in nature and that we are debating its Second Stage. We are considering the principles behind the Bill. Those principles are concise and clear. We need the Bill if Northern Ireland Water is to be able to continue to provide a water and sewerage service and maintain its networks beyond next April.

If the Bill is not passed, we will have a real crisis, and water charges will have to be introduced from next April. There will be many more opportunities for a full and frank discussion on the future funding of water and sewerage services, but, this morning, we must control ourselves and limit our debate to the Bill that is before the House.

I support the Second Stage of the Bill, and I hope that the rest of the Assembly will do likewise.

Dr Farry: I am happy to support the Second Stage of the Bill. However, I want to follow up on some of the comments that were made by Mr Cobain, the Chairperson of the Committee for Regional Development, and by my friend Brian Wilson about the context in which the Bill is being progressed. There is a financial crisis facing Northern Ireland, and the Executive need to find major efficiency savings. Furthermore, it is clear that the Exchequer will call for further cuts at some stage in the future.

A lot of parties are engaging in cheap populism over the issue; they are taking stands and saying that there will be water charges in Northern Ireland over their dead bodies. I am not sure whether that approach is realistic and whether they are being frank with the people of Northern Ireland. In fact, one can foresee a situation in which we will be forced, under European Union directives, to introduce separate water charges. Leaving that aside, our current financial context may well mean that it is something that the Executive have to consider.

The Alliance Party has been consistent and straight with people on the issue. We have not ruled out a situation in which water charges may have to be introduced, and we were clear on that in our 2007 manifesto for the Assembly elections. The Executive have a duty to find efficiencies in what they are doing now, before they go down the path of water charges.

The Alliance Party stresses the importance of addressing the cost of division, and other parties have their hobby horses with regard to efficiencies. Therefore all those issues are in the mix, but one must be realistic and recognise that that may not be enough. The Executive will be faced with a choice. Put simply, and as Brian Wilson outlined, the Executive will have to consider whether to go for deeper cuts in public services or look towards the introduction of a form of water charging.

A lot of people talk about water charges affecting people who are in need or who are on the margins of society. That brings us to the whole issue of affordability and ability to pay: a water charge that is based upon the value of property will not properly reflect that. Neither would such a system reflect the relative usage of households. For instance, a situation could arise in which a single pensioner is living next door to a family of four adults who all earn a wage and who use a lot more water. It would be unfair to base the water charges for both households on the value of property. However, if we can find a fairer way of imposing water charges, it will be a progressive way of raising revenue.

On the other hand are people who are in difficulty because of their need for access to public services. They are often the most needy and disadvantaged people in our society, and they would not be eligible to pay water charges, if they were introduced. If steep cuts are imposed on the Health Service, those are the people who will suffer the most. When people talk about suffering and the disadvantaged in society, let us not focus entirely on the charges that the Assembly may or may not pass on to individuals; let us look at the nature and quality of the public services that we are funding and bear in mind that people are dependent on those and on a high quality of service.

If water charges are introduced, there is the issue of people paying twice for water, as part of the regional rate already covers water. If water charges are introduced, these Benches expect a proportionate reduction in the regional rate to account for the element that is currently being paid into the regional rate being transferred into any future water charges.

In broader terms, the deferral of water charges could be costing the Executive approximately £200 million a year, which is a considerable sum. It is the democratic choice of a devolved Executive to defer water charges, because, as Brian Wilson said, it does not form part of the Barnett formula. Therefore, the Executive are essentially taking money from the block grant to fund that deferral and are forgoing the opportunity of spending resources elsewhere.

The Assembly passed a Budget that was based on the initial deferral of water charges, but water charges have continued to be deferred without that Budget being modified to take into account the cost of that deferment. Therefore, decisions and announcements on water charges are now being made in advance of the budgetary and financial framework having caught up, and the Executive are having to find money in different areas to plug the gaps. That is not an appropriate or mature approach to the financial management of Northern Ireland's scarce resources.

I appreciate that the Bill is designed to give options. I am happy for everything to remain on the table, but we must be realistic about where we are heading as a society. If the introduction of water charges is being considered, we must be straight with people; we must not lead them up the garden path by telling them that those charges will be withheld at all costs. Furthermore, if water charges are introduced, we must ensure that the system of charging used reflects people's ability to pay and is based on their usage rather than on the value of their property. That system is a very blunt and, frankly, regressive form of taxation, which I hope all Members would reject; although I have my doubts.

Mrs Long: I concur with everything that my colleague said, and I will not repeat the points that he made.

The Water and Sewerage Services (Amendment) Bill, if passed, will allow the Department for Regional Development to continue to fund water and sewerage services, and the Alliance Party has no objection to that. What is now termed "water and sewerage services" was for a long time called public health engineering, and that was for good reason. The biggest improvement that we, as a nation, have witnessed in public health came as a result of the introduction of proper water and sewerage services. Indeed, the introduction of those services probably made the biggest contribution to increased length and quality of life. Therefore, it is absolutely critical that we continue to fund that service appropriately for the future and to ensure that there is no regression.

Water charges, particularly separate water charges, are required under the EU water framework directive.

That directive not only requires that separate charges be introduced, but the ethos behind the directive is that those charges should encourage water conservation. One of the problems with the previously envisaged structures to levying water charges here was that they were based on the price of a property, which has no reflection on the amount of water used. Therefore, water charging in that form does not fulfil the requirements of the directive. From the perspective of the Alliance Party, the question is not whether we pay for water but how we pay for water: charging must be fair, transparent, affordable, and also preferably and, importantly, it must be linked to usage.

The continuing deferral of water charges has created a sense among the public that the introduction of charges is not on the agenda. Therefore, I am glad that the Bill has come to the House, because it demonstrates that the Executive are not in a position to make the decision to defer water charges indefinitely at this time and in the current financial circumstances. I hope that it raises public awareness of the fact that the debate is ongoing.

12.30 pm

The deferral has not, as I had hoped, bought time so that alternative approaches to levying fair charges could have been considered. Instead, it has simply put the issue on the back burner to be dealt with at a later stage, with no particular improvement to the kind of charges that are envisaged. That is an unfortunate wasted opportunity. As we agree the Second Stage of the Bill, I hope that work is ongoing in NI Water and in the Department for Regional Development to look at how charging — if it has to be introduced — is made fair, affordable and transparent and linked to usage. No one wants to pay taxes, but when we have to pay taxes — and we all recognise that we have to fund our public services — we want to know that those moneys are being dealt with affordably and accountably.

I want to raise one other issue, which relates to today's Adjournment debate: the need for continued investment in water and sewerage services. We will be discussing the flooding that took place in my constituency and the investment required to deal with that. No doubt the Minister will be harangued by many Members at a constituency level for what are seen as the failings of the Department to deal with those issues. We have to be realistic and say that, without significant investment in the next five to 10 years, it is conceivable that the problems that we are experiencing locally will be more widespread and continue to cause problems.

There are difficult financial decisions ahead. However, we need to prioritise the issue of water and sewerage. Although it may not be one of the more glamorous aspects of our work, it is absolutely fundamental to public health, and it is important to focus investment in that area. As my colleague has stolen most of my thunder, I am happy to concur with what he has said and not repeat anything.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to meet immediately upon the lunchtime suspension. I therefore propose, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the sitting until 2.00 pm, when the Minister will conclude and wind up the debate.

The sitting was suspended at 12.32 pm.

On resuming (Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr McClarty] in the Chair) —

2.00 pm

The Minister for Regional Development: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank all the Members who commented on the Bill. I welcome the support for the Bill from the Chairperson and the Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Regional Development and from other Members.

Mr K Robinson: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. I am sorry to interrupt the Minister in full flight, but do we have a quorum in the Chamber?

Mr Deputy Speaker: It is obvious from looking around the Chamber that there is not a quorum.

Notice taken that 10 Members were not present.

House counted, and there being fewer than 10 Members present, the Deputy Speaker ordered the Division Bells to be rung.

Upon 10 Members being present —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Minister may continue.

The Minister for Regional Development: Go raibh maith agat arís, a LeasCheann Comhairle. It appears that when Members are speaking to the media, these are important issues, but when it comes to debating them in the Chamber, they are not so important as to warrant significant attendance. Nonetheless, as I was saying, I welcome the support for the Bill from the Chairperson, the Deputy Chairperson and the members of the Committee for Regional Development and from most, if not all, parties.

The exception appears to be Mr Gallagher, although I am not sure whether he indicated that he would be voting against the Bill or whether his opposition to it means that his party proposes the immediate introduction of payments for water, because that is the only circumstance in which we would not need to extend the legislation. The main point of extending the subsidy provision is to maintain our water and sewerage services on a sound financial basis, and any other, wider decisions in relation to water and sewerage services will be taken separately.

Most Members who spoke understood and supported the purpose of and necessity for the legislation. I look forward to working with the Committee, along with my officials, during Committee Stage. It was interesting that some Members referred to the “rushed nature” and “compressed time frame” of the Bill. The Bill is following normal process, so I am not sure where those concerns arise. The Executive could have sought accelerated passage for the Bill, but they have brought it forward to allow the Committee to have its full say in the debate, as is rightly the case. The Committee will arrange its own timetable and programme of work to accommodate that, and I am grateful to the Committee for that.

I wish to respond to some of the issues that were raised. Mr Gallagher raised what he termed “serious concerns”. He alleged that there had been no debate on the issue, that I was unable to rule out charging for water, and he asserted that the public were bewildered. If there is bewilderment among the public, he should examine his own attitude, statements and record — and those of his party — on the issue over the past decade. I could go into the history and implications of the reform and reinvestment initiative, which was launched and lauded by his current party leader, Mr Durkan, and by the former First Minister, David Trimble.

I refer Mr Gallagher to a few points. If he is worried that a lack of consistency has bewildered the public, I suggest that he look to himself in the first instance to correct that. He berates me for not ruling anything out, but the last Finance Minister from his party said in 2002, around the time that he launched the review of rating and water policy:

“nothing has been ruled in and nothing ruled out... But we must be under no illusions, as private citizens we pay considerably less in local taxes than people do in England and, while it may be unpalatable, we may also have to accept that if we want better public services here we will have to pay more for them.”

When the Member is looking for consistency when debating these issues, he should look to himself.

Strangely, when his own party made a submission to that review, despite what its Finance Minister had said — it was during a period of suspension — the SDLP said:

“water supply is a basic service... that we believe should be guaranteed to all and free at the point of use.”

However, in response to the panel that I established when I took up office, that party expressed its position as:

“no privatisation, no water-metering, no separate water charges or double taxation, but water revenue as a clear component of rates.”

In my experience, most of the parties have been quite consistent. If the public are bewildered because of any lack of consistency on the issue, the Member may wish to look to his own party to firm up the consistency. In the past few years, the SDLP seems to have advocated at least three different positions on the issue [Interruption]. I notice that the Member is trying to make comments from a sedentary position. I am happy to give way if he feels that he has something intelligent to contribute to the debate. Obviously, he does not.

Mr Gallagher alleged that no debate has taken place on the issue, and he bemoaned that. He is free, at any stage, to bring a motion to the House for debate. I have not noticed that he has tabled such a motion. He is now a member of the Committee for Regional Development, and he is free to raise the matter through that Committee.

He must be clear in his facts. Some of his statements were factually incorrect, which for any Member would be worthy of criticism, but it is hard to understand how a member of the Regional Development Committee could be incorrect with their facts. He stated that the Executive had introduced business charges and that they had implemented them at 100%. Neither part of that is true. Most non-domestic customers have had water charges for years. They were not introduced by the present Executive, which unanimously decided to keep those charges at 50%.

If Mr Gallagher wishes to assist with what he believes to be some degree of public confusion, perhaps he should table a debate on the matter, but he should be sure of his facts and be consistent on his position if he does so. The Executive, on which his party is represented, unanimously decided on the issues.

In response to Mr Hamilton, he said that “we have a strange democracy” where a party is obliged to take a position in one forum but can take a different position in another forum. Indeed, it is a strange form of democracy when the SDLP’s representative on the Executive can vote for a certain position and the party feels free to adopt a completely different position in the Chamber and in front of the general public. If Mr Gallagher feels that the public are bewildered, I suggest that he might look to address that.

Mr Gallagher raised a few other points in relation to billing errors. NIW has taken steps, in consultation with the Consumer Council, to address that. Improvements to data and to systems are being made in conjunction with the regulator, and I certainly welcome those. Mr Gallagher also raised the issue of the draft determination from the regulator that NIW had asked for too much money. The regulator’s document is only a proposal, which is subject to consultation, and my aim is to ensure proper engagement between the regulator and Northern Ireland Water to get the right level of resources so that adequate water and sewerage services can be provided and to make up for the historic underinvestment in those services.

Brian Wilson said that the legislation was being rushed through. Given that the normal processes for putting legislation through are being followed, I am at a loss to see how he can describe the legislation as being rushed. He spoke for some time about the unfairness that he felt about different ideas that have perhaps been suggested by him and other parties. I have certainly not suggested those ideas. He said that alternative means had to be found, and I waited patiently to hear those. He quickly rattled off a couple of suggestions to do with using land taxes and green taxes. I have never heard the sole representative of the Green Party put those ideas forward for debate on the Floor of the Assembly, and he has never brought those ideas to my attention. If the Member has ideas on how water and sewerage services should be funded, I am sure that the Assembly and the Executive will be pleased to hear them. Two and a half years into the process, the Member has made a few offhand remarks.

Mr B Wilson: I made all of those points during the debate on the Budget in November 2007. At that time, I called for a review of how local finance should be funded, and I went into the details of each of those proposals. My concern is that nothing has been done since then. We have to look at alternative sources of funding.

The Minister for Regional Development: The Member’s suggestion that nothing has been done is incorrect. We are doing something now: we are extending the legislation to allow the Executive to continue to cover the additional costs of water and sewerage services. That is the third decision that we have taken in relation to this. When I took office, Sinn Féin had the position — similar to those of many parties, although some of them have wavered back and forth — of being opposed to the direct rule propositions on water charging.

My party opposed privatisation of the Water Service. It wanted a full inquiry so that the costs that are required for water and sewerage services can be ascertained and so that a degree of transparency can be brought to the matter.

Every one of those pledges has been delivered. The Executive have stopped the direct rule proposition for water charges. They gave the independent panel a remit that would rule out the privatisation of water services. They brought forward the panel’s report, which continues to be the subject of debate on all matters that are connected to the requirements for water and sewerage services.

Therefore, if the Member has alternative propositions, I would certainly be glad to hear from him. If, as he says, the Executive have done nothing on the matter since the Budget debate in November 2007, I would not be in the Assembly debating a piece of legislation that would allow us to continue to do what we have been doing.

Dr Farry and Mrs Long raised a number of wider issues about water payments, and they pointed out that the Executive have never advocated double payments for households. The Independent Water Review Panel’s proposals addressed that. The Executive have yet to decide on any methodology for household payments. As is the case with any other Executive decision, we have made the commitment to consult publicly on anything that we do.

Therefore, a LeasCheann Comhairle, I trust that I have dealt with a number of points that were raised in the debate. As I said, I am somewhat at a loss when Members say that the issues have not been debated; I have discussed them on many occasions in the Assembly. Of course, Members are free to table any motion on those matters that they so wish, and I am sure that the Business Committee would consider the merits of any of those motions for debate.

Certainly, as I said at the outset, the Bill proposes to allow the Executive to continue the current funding arrangements. Since they came into office, the Executive have made two decisions: first, to continue those arrangements; and secondly, to extend that ability to ensure that the necessary investment — which, in many ways, is catch-up investment — in water and sewerage services that was not made under direct rule continues to be made.

Of course, the Executive will continue to struggle with all the financial issues that face us. However, the Bill allows us to continue to make that subvention to Northern Ireland Water.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That the Second Stage of the Water and Sewerage Services (Amendment) Bill [NIA 3/09] be agreed.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE BUSINESS

Rates (Amendment) Bill

Consideration Stage

Mr Deputy Speaker: Members will have a copy of the Marshalled List of amendments detailing the order for consideration. The amendments have been grouped for debate in the Speaker's provisional grouping of amendments selected list.

There are two groups of amendments, and we will debate the amendments in each group in turn. The first debate will be on amendment Nos 1 and 2, which extend information-gathering powers to the domestic sector. The second debate will be on amendment No 3, which provides a minor technical amendment that is consequential to clause 7 of the Bill.

I remind Members who are intending to speak that, during the debates on the two groups of amendments, they should address all the amendments in each particular group on which they wish to comment. Once the initial debate on each group has been completed, any subsequent amendments in the group will be moved formally as we go through the Bill, and the Question on each will be put without further debate. The Questions on stand part will be taken at the appropriate points in the Bill. If that is clear, we shall proceed.

Clauses 1 to 5 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 6 (Extension of liability for unoccupied hereditaments to dwelling-houses, etc.)

Mr Deputy Speaker: We now come to the first group of amendments for debate. With amendment No 1, it will be convenient to debate amendment No 2.

These amendments extend information gathering powers to the domestic sector.

2.15 pm

The Minister of Finance and Personnel (Mr S Wilson): I beg to move amendment No 1: In page 8, line 10, at end insert

“(5) Until such day as the Department may by order appoint, the power conferred by Article 26(2A) of the principal Order (power of Department to require information in respect of unoccupied hereditaments to which Schedule 8A to that Order applies if name and address of person entitled to possession unknown) shall by virtue of this subsection be exercisable as if any hereditament which is included in a capital value list were a hereditament to which Schedule 8A to the principal Order applies.

(6) In subsection (5) ‘hereditament’ and ‘capital value list’ have the same meaning as in the principal Order.”

The following amendment stood on the Marshalled List:

No 2: In clause 19, page 13, line 24, at end insert “section 6(5) and (6);”. — [The Minister of Finance and Personnel (Mr S Wilson).]

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: I will speak to amendment Nos 1 and 2 because both deal with the information-gathering powers related to the rating of empty homes.

Amendment No 1 is minor in nature but is necessary to ensure that Land and Property Services (LPS) has the powers to verify and obtain information on the people who will be liable to pay rates when the rating of empty homes is introduced. I stress that this amendment simply extends a power enabling the details of liable persons to be obtained that is already available in the current rating legislation but is restricted to commercial properties, to which unoccupied rating already applies.

Although in the course of its duties Land and Property Services can request information on the persons entitled to possession, in the absence of amendment No 1 there will be no statutory recourse if the information is not provided. The amendment provides a statutory backing for LPS to request the necessary information and will ensure that the LPS database on empty homes is as robust as possible. The power needs to apply prior to the rating of empty homes in order that it can be effectively introduced. That should make billing and recovery more robust. The absence of the information gathering power prior to the rating of empty homes being introduced may reduce the revenue — estimated at between £6 million and £8 million — by 50%.

As I have already indicated, this is not a substantive policy change; rather, it is a minor and technical amendment to extend an existing power relating to unoccupied property for the purpose of effectively introducing the rating of empty homes. Amendment No 2 provides that amendment No 1 will come into operation once Royal Assent is obtained.

Mr O’Loan: I have some little concern about amendment Nos 1 and 2, but the Minister may be able to allay those. The Bill was granted accelerated passage because of the considerable delay in the prior process. Given that delay, one would have thought that the Department would have fully considered its position on all matters relating to the Bill. I am, therefore, disappointed that amendments have been put forward only now, after the initial presentation was made to the Committee and after the Bill had its First Stage and Second Stage readings in the Assembly.

I am also disappointed that, when the amendments came forward, Members were not simultaneously provided with explanations for them. We had to do some research to find out the nature of the amendments, because the language used in them is extremely technical. However, I am not so sure that the effects of them are only technical, as has been described. I thank the Minister’s departmental officials for providing information on the amendments to Committee members; however, that was done only yesterday.

As the Minister said, amendment No 1 relates to the powers of the Department to obtain further information on the ownership of vacant property and the persons to whom it might serve a bill. I am concerned about the strength of those powers. When the Committee received evidence from the Minister and his officials, we were given strong assurances that the sharing of information will benefit the persons about whom the information is obtained by enabling them to obtain reliefs. However, the amendment is quite different; it gives the Department strong powers to gather information for billing purposes.

It enables it to serve a notice to the owner of the property and to a considerable number of bodies, such as district councils, NIE, BT and other communication and telecommunication providers. I presume that the serving of a notice puts those bodies under a legal duty to provide any information that the Department asks for. We are told that that is an extension of powers that are used in other cases. That may well be so; however, it is a significant addition to the Bill. Therefore, I am concerned that that amendment was proposed at a late stage. It is a significant addition to the Bill, and there ought to have been time for it to have been fully explained to the Committee so that any concerns that I, or others, may have, could have been allayed.

I had considered proposing a further amendment about the rating of vacant non-domestic property, which is an issue that I raised with the Minister. If there is an issue about not bringing in the power to rate vacant domestic property at this time, the same issue applies to the rating of vacant non-domestic property. The evidence shows that ratepayers with a business property that they cannot use because of the economic downturn are carrying a significant burden as they have to pay rates on that property. That is something that was introduced only fairly recently. However, no amendment was necessary, because the power to deal with that is already in the hands of the Minister. After I spoke during the Second Stage of the Rates (Amendment) Bill, the Minister said that his Department was conducting an evaluation of the impact and effectiveness of the policy of rating empty non-domestic properties. It would be good for the outcome of that evaluation to be made known quickly. Perhaps the Minister will consider that.

Mr F McCann: Thank you, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Unlike Declan, I did not see the amendments until a few minutes ago. I share some of his concerns. In Committee, Declan asked questions about the precise nature of the legislation, the gathering of information, and the sharing of information that would allow people who are in need of rate relief to better tap into what is available. I have just become aware of the additions, and, as I said, I share Declan's concerns. Later, I want to speak about the issue of empty homes.

In common with many other political parties, including the DUP, Sinn Féin has raised concerns about the use of accelerated passage. However, in this case, we were informed that accelerated passage was not only a necessity but that it was essential to ensure that people, especially those with small businesses, could get relief. Therefore, we supported it.

In the past, other Committees raised concerns about the use of accelerated passage. When we supported its use, we found that when we came to the Assembly, we were berated for daring to take part in a debate when accelerated passage had already been agreed. That is not a criticism of the Minister; it is a criticism of the widespread use of accelerated passage. The Committee agreed to the use of accelerated passage; however, it is difficult to make a decision when amendments are proposed at such a late stage. Declan said that he saw the amendments yesterday. I have not been clued in because, as I said, I saw the amendments only minutes ago.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: I think that there is a bit of confusion. The data-sharing aspect of the Bill, which was designed to benefit pensioners and those who are eligible for rate relief, and which both Members referred to, is not in that part of the Bill.

To that extent, Mr Deputy Speaker, Members have wandered beyond their remit, dipped under your radar and spoken on matters about which they should not have spoken. However, I am happy to deal with that confusion. Although the date for introducing the rating of empty homes has not been decided, the point of the amendment is to ensure that there will be a level playing field when it is introduced and that all legal owners of empty homes will be uniformly subject to the regulations.

Information is available about the owners of non-occupied commercial premises, and they can be fined if they do not supply the relevant information. The amendment is technical and will ensure that the same powers are available in the domestic sector. No Member wants a system in which those who are wily or who are able to hide property ownership are exempt from a charge that is being imposed on other people. The point of the amendment is to ensure that there is equity in the application of the regulation if and when it comes into force. Once again, I emphasise that we have not decided when the rating of empty homes will be introduced.

Mr F McCann: That is one of the issues that most people have been concerned about. Due to the Bill's accelerated passage, which we all agreed to, people were concerned about the non-rating of empty homes. They took into consideration the economic downturn and the additional pressure that introducing the rating of empty homes could bring.

Parties have different points of view on the rating of empty homes. My party raised the issue during a debate a couple of years ago, which may have started the process. We are concerned that the rating of empty homes may be an added burden at present, and it is difficult to determine when the process should start. Thousands of people are being added to the waiting list for houses every year, and it is possible that some empty homes could be used to ease that pressure.

If the rating of empty homes is postponed this year, will we be in a position to introduce the measure next year or the year after? That is something that has caught everyone's imagination over the past couple of years.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: The Member's intervention has made me even more puzzled. I thought that his original concern was that we were introducing a power that would enable us to find out who owned empty homes so that we could impose rates on them.

Mr F McCann: Will the Minister give way?

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: I will take the intervention in a minute.

From the Member's latest intervention, and I am quite happy for him to make himself clear in a moment or two, it seems that he is concerned that we are not introducing the rating of empty homes quickly enough, and that the measure is needed because so many people are on the waiting list for houses. If he wants the rating of empty homes to be introduced quickly, he can make that point when we review the situation and the Committee expresses its view.

I want to make it clear to the Member that the power that the Department is seeking, through the amendment, is to ensure that when the rating of empty homes is introduced, the very point he has made can be facilitated. There will be a financial obligation on the owners of empty houses to pay rates on their properties, which will, hopefully, encourage them to put such properties on the market. I thought that the Member would have welcomed that change instead of being critical of it.

2.30 pm

Mr F McCann: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. We would welcome that. We pointed out at the Committee that we reluctantly agreed to the empty homes amendment because of the economic downturn. I just had a glance at the additional amendments that came through this morning. The amendments that I was speaking about were additional legislation that would allow people to move away from tapping into their rates relief and allow them to expand that into other pieces of information. I was talking about two completely different things.

With regard to rating empty homes, Sinn Féin has argued for a considerable period that the sooner it is introduced the better.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: I hope that you understood that, Mr Deputy Speaker. I assure the Member that the amendment — and it is a technical amendment — is to ensure that if and when the rating of empty homes is introduced, LPS has the same powers as it has for commercial properties; that it can trace the owner and know to whom to send the bill. That creates a level playing field, and Members should welcome that.

Mr F McCann: Declan O’Loan said that it would have been better if we had had this information earlier. I received information about the amendments on my computer about half an hour ago. It is difficult to prepare for a debate when one is fed amendments only at the last minute.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: I made it clear that I would rather not see Bills introduced by accelerated passage. I will endeavour to ensure that that does not happen, although this was beyond my control. Indeed, the Member might be more easily able than I to upbraid those who were responsible.

I made officials available to brief the Committee. This was not a last-minute panic measure. The amendment was identified earlier in the process, but it could not be introduced earlier due to the fact that the Bill had been approved by the Executive. Therefore, this was the only stage at which the amendment could have been introduced without again going through the process of getting an amended Bill approved by the Executive.

Mr O’Loan raised the issue of rates on empty commercial properties and the fact that the Department said that it would evaluate the impact and effectiveness of the policy of rating empty non-domestic properties. That evaluation was always planned, and it has, as Mr O’Loan pointed out, been given added importance due to the effect of the recession on the commercial market. As part of that evaluation, the Department is taking soundings from stakeholders to get their views on the effect of the policy. I will take on board those views, as well as the views of the Committee for Finance and Personnel. I want to consider all factors in order to have a detailed analysis before the Department decides how best to proceed.

Mr O’Loan: The Minister did not come back to me with an explanation of why the amendments were brought forward so late. They were entered no later than last Thursday. My party staff made enquiries on Friday and got good verbal explanations from departmental officials. The Committee, through its secretariat, was informed only yesterday, when members were given a full written explanation of the amendments. When one gets complex amendments like this, it causes the Committee concern if we do not simultaneously have a clear explanation in language that we can understand of what the amendments are about.

Given the long delay in bringing the Bill forward, I find it surprising that all the issues were not covered, that those amendments were not in the Bill when it was presented to the Assembly at its First Stage, and were not then explained in full to the Committee when it was briefed by departmental officials and the Minister himself.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: I thought that I had provided an explanation. The Bill had already been approved by the Executive and could not be amended. Amendments cannot be made and published until after the Bill’s Second Stage. As the Member knows, the Second Stage took place late on Tuesday evening or early on Wednesday morning; I cannot remember exactly when it was passed. Therefore, the amendments were tabled as soon as possible thereafter. We did move quickly.

The Member makes a good point. The amendments are technical rather than complex, and I hope that I have at least explained the rationale behind them. The powers that are already available for commercial properties will now be available for domestic properties. Information must be provided to show who owns a property. If that information is not provided, sanctions can be imposed, including a fine of up to £1,000. That is the explanation of the amendment. I hope that I have explained the reason behind it, which is one of fairness and equality.

Although there would have been a longer discussion had the Bill undergone a Committee Stage, I am, nevertheless, happy to explain the thinking behind it in this format. I hope that I have explained why the tabling of the amendments was delayed until last Thursday. That is part of the arrangements in the House for tabling amendments. Therefore, they could not have been tabled any sooner.

Mr McNarry: In case the Minister is worrying, which I am sure he is, I will explain the reasons why the Ulster Unionist Party will make no interventions during the Consideration Stage. Although we sympathise with Members’ points, we are content, as we have said since the start, to allow the Bill to proceed.

I wonder whether I could have the Minister’s attention. I raised the issue of carers with him. I want to take the opportunity to thank him and his officials for the manner in which they have dealt with the issue of carers in relation to the introduction that I had to this Bill, particularly with regard to rates relief for carers. I met his officials, and I am satisfied that, as a result of my requests in the House and at the Committee, we may be — I will put it no stronger than that — able to find a way to determine whether there is a way to address that issue. I want to put on record that I am grateful for all the assistance that I have received.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: I thank the Member for his gracious intervention. I am sure that he will not make a habit of it. I thought that he perhaps wanted to intervene again to ensure that I did not get the wrong end of the stick.

Mr McNarry: He wants me to repeat it again and again; do not get carried away.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: I will not get carried away. I will take such a gracious intervention when it is available, because I know that it will always be tempered with other kinds of intervention and speeches on other occasions. I had made a promise — I know that we are wandering off the subject — that officials would meet the Member, and I am glad that it was a useful and productive meeting.

Moreover, I am also glad to receive assurance from the Member about the Ulster Unionist Party's support for this important measure, which many people outside the Assembly want to be introduced. That is one reason why Members from all parties agreed to accelerated passage.

Amendment No 1 agreed to.

Clause 6, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 7 to 18 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 19 (Commencement)

Mr Deputy Speaker: Amendment No 2 has already been debated and is consequential to amendment No 1's having been made.

Amendment No 2 made: In page 13, line 24, at end insert "section 6(5) and (6);". — [The Minister of Finance and Personnel (Mr S Wilson).]

Clause 19, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 20 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedule 1 (Minor and consequential amendments)

Mr Deputy Speaker: We now come to the second group of amendments for debate. There is only one amendment, amendment No 3, which provides a minor technical amendment that is consequential to clause 7.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: I beg to move amendment No 3: In page 14, line 20, at end insert

"4A. In Article 52 (procedure on appeal to Commissioner), in paragraph (4A)(b), for the words from '12(1)' to the end substitute '15 of Part 1 of Schedule 12 (subject to paragraphs 7(3) and 12)'."

Members may wish to note that the amendment is minor and technical in nature and is consequential on the new anti-avoidance powers that are set out in clause 7.

It will help if I first provide an overview of clause 7, which is intended to address measures that ratepayers may take to avoid liability through deliberately damaging property or by disregarding any changes that have an effect on its valuation for a certain period.

Clause 7 will enable my Department, by regulations, to amend the valuation assumptions that apply to domestic property. It also contains a power to include additional matters in regulations, including assumptions that changes have been made to the state of the property in comparison with an earlier time.

Article 52(4)(a) and (b) of the Rates (Northern Ireland) Order 1977 provides that, where the Commissioner of Valuation for Northern Ireland makes an alteration in the valuation list, he may alter the valuation of any comparable property, having regard to the valuation assumptions. It will therefore be necessary, in respect of that, to take account of any changes to the valuation assumptions provided for in clause 7 where the property is an empty home. Amendment No 3 gives effect to that.

Amendment No 3 agreed to.

Schedule 1, as amended, agreed to.

Schedule 2 agreed to.

Long title agreed to.

Mr Deputy Speaker: That concludes the Consideration Stage of the Rates (Amendment) Bill. The Bill stands referred to the Speaker.

Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. The motion will give Members some indication of the remit and range of the work of the Public Accounts Committee. I will not go into detail on every item listed in the motion, but I will remind Members of the scope of the Committee's work.

The Public Accounts Committee is a Standing Committee that considers reports on accounts laid before the Assembly. The accounts of all Departments and of most public sector bodies are prepared and laid before the Assembly by the Comptroller and Auditor General, the head of the Audit Office. The Comptroller and Auditor General may also make value-for-money reports, as well as reports of investigations that his office carries out as a result of audit findings.

The Audit Office's role is to examine public expenditure closely from the position of the independence of government. As such, it performs a natural partnership function with the Assembly, assisting in its scrutiny role and complementing its systems of checks and balances, which are fundamental to a healthy democracy. Audit Office reports are an invaluable tool in enabling the Public Accounts Committee to improve accountability and good governance in the public sector.

I commend the Audit Office for the excellent support that it provides to the Committee. I also thank the Committee Clerk and her staff, who work very hard every week to make members' deliberations easier. There have been some changes in the Clerk's team, but the secretariat staff have worked very hard to ensure that those changes were seamless. The Committee thanks all the clerical staff and the secretariat.

The Committee has welcomed a new Comptroller and Auditor General this year in Kieran Donnelly — Comhghairdeas le Kieran. Congratulations to Kieran on his successful application for the role. He has already established a good working relationship with the Committee, which is to his credit. The Committee also thanks John Dowdall, the previous Comptroller and Auditor General, for his mentoring. He gave us many good years.

The Committee has worked again this year to improve standards in public life, stewardship of the public purse, financial governance systems, and processes and controls to maintain accountability and value for the taxpayer. In each of its inquiries, the Committee endeavours to identify key shortcomings and to recommend improvements for future practice, continually promoting learning in public spending. Those lessons are particularly relevant in the current climate of recession.

As in the past year, the Committee addressed some of its business into composite reports, which examined by correspondence certain issues of concern. Those have been circulated to Members, who will be familiar with the contents. The Committee also selected Audit Office reports to deal with as a priority, using the order of expenditure, impact on the taxpayer, and the extent to which lessons could be learned as selection criteria. The Committee studied those reports in detail, and heard evidence from the accounting officers of the relevant spending bodies, and probed and dissected all the evidence in order to come to its conclusions.

I will particularly focus on two reports: the Committee's 'Report on Statement of Rate Levy and Collection 2006-07', and the 'Report on Brangam, Bagnall & Co: Legal Practitioner Fraud Perpetrated Against the Health and Personal Social Services'.

George Brangam, solicitor and owner of the legal practice Brangam Bagnall and Co, was found to have fraudulently extracted at least £278,000, over a period of seven years, from six of the 11 health bodies to which his practice provided legal services. Public sector fraud is always a headline issue for the Committee. The Committee was relieved that the Department recovered money and legal costs of £123,000 in full. Nevertheless, on behalf of the Committee, I reiterate the gravity of the case.

Fraud is an abuse of position and trust, and no level of fraud is acceptable. Systems and controls, no matter how simple, must be in place to prevent anyone from deceiving the taxpayer in such a way. The Brangam case was particularly frustrating because the fraud could have been prevented and detected easily through basic payment checks. Unfortunately, the checks and supervisions were dispensed with because the health bodies were working with a professional person: a lawyer who had previously been a colleague.

Information sharing is another area in which lessons should be learned from the case. The Committee repeatedly recommends that Government must create a culture of openness in which employees are encouraged to flag up non-compliance with controls and to identify problems early on. Allegations about the solicitor's conduct, behaviour and probity were not shared with the Health Service. The Committee was not satisfied with the Department's handling of the solicitor's departure from the Health Service, particularly with regard to the conflict of interest arising from his involvement in the procurement of legal services. That was a factor in the Committee's conclusion that it had never before seen an example of such poor procurement practices.

The Committee also challenged the adequacy of the Department's investigation into the fraud, and it made a number of recommendations for the scope and terms of reference of future forensic investigations. The Committee gained a broad understanding of the implications of the case by seeking the additional perspective of the Law Society in its capacity as a regulatory body of legal practitioners. In December 2008, the Committee heard evidence from the Law Society and the accounting officer of the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety before making its recommendations.

The Committee agrees that the Department has reduced risk to the Health Service by transferring most legal advice to an internal health and social care directorate. The Department has also introduced new procedures that do not permit cheques in settlement of legal cases to be channelled through solicitors where there is no sensible business case to do so. Those procedures would have prevented the majority of frauds perpetrated by George Brangam if they had been in place. The Committee remains of the view that the Department must learn lessons from the case for future forensic investigations and ensure that there are no conflicts of interest among the personnel who are responsible for the procurement of services.

The Health Service is, arguably, the priority for taxpayers. For good reason, it receives the bulk of the local Budget. As a constituency politician from the vibrant but deprived area of West Belfast, I deem this report to be the most significant of the year because it deals with prolonged and systematic malpractice in the most crucial and cherished front line public services that are offered here. As Chairperson, I have no doubt that the Committee's inquiry has strengthened public service for the benefit of taxpayers in every constituency.

I now turn briefly to another inquiry that has significant implications for every taxpayer. In the 'Report on Statement of Rate Levy and Collection 2006-07', the Comptroller and Auditor General was unable to give the Assembly any assurance on Land and Property Services' assessment and collection of rates in that year. That was due to significant system control problems that arose following the introduction of a new IT system.

The Committee decided to prioritise the topic because of the considerable impact of rates revenue, which is assessed at £1 billion a year, on local and central government. The Committee reported on rate collection activity during a time of considerable change in policy, systems and management structures. We considered that the Department of Finance and Personnel and the agency were trying to do too much in too little time.

On 1 April 2007, domestic rates bills were issued under a completely new regime. For the first time, annual rates bills were based on a home's estimated selling price rather than on rental values that were determined some 30 years previously, as had been the case for many years. A new computer system was installed in October 2006 to process bills based on the new policy. However, as new policy and new computer systems were being introduced, senior management and staff were handling the additional challenge of setting up a new agency.

Land and Property Services was created by merging four existing agencies — the Rate Collection Agency, the Valuation and Lands Agency, Ordnance Survey and Land Registers — over a two-year period. The Committee's overall conclusion was that the implementation of the new IT system was poorly managed and resulted in significant additional costs being incurred to resolve basic failings in the system that had not been discovered before it went live. Members found it hard to believe that short cuts were being taken to implement a complex and large IT system and that staff were transferred from operational duties to ensure that the system went live on time.

The Committee considered that the decision to proceed with the implementation of the new system was based on a fundamentally flawed risk assessment. The Department did not take sufficient account of the huge risk of inadequate system testing, the impact of transferring front line staff to work on the introduction of rates reforms and the enormous financial consequences of postponing the collection of arrears.

On the subject of arrears, the Committee noted that ratepayer debt rose from £48 million in 2006 to £124 million in 2008 as a result of the decision to delay the recovery of arrears. That financial impact had been significantly underestimated in the Department's plan. Although the Department achieved its objective of successfully calculating and issuing bills based on capital values by April 2007, that did not provide either central government or local government with any additional revenue.

New reforms may have led to a fairer allocation of rates, with some ratepayers paying less and others paying more, and various reliefs and allowances, such as the lone pensioner allowance, were introduced for those in great need. Nevertheless, the Committee's view was that a properly considered risk assessment would have avoided many of the problems that were encountered, by postponing the reforms by one year.

The Committee made a number of important recommendations for the Department and Land and Property Services to ensure that what went wrong will be fixed and that the resulting adverse consequences to ratepayers, councils and staff can be quickly resolved. The Committee also noted wider lessons on implementing complex new IT systems. Many of the lessons are already incorporated in best practice, but the mistakes seem to be repeated time and again by civil servants. In the Department's memorandum of response issued in January 2009, the Department accepted the Committee's recommendations and advised that a financial review was being carried out by Land and Property Services to ensure that all outstanding system problems would be addressed.

The Committee continues to monitor progress, and I believe that the Deputy Chairperson, Roy Beggs, may discuss recent updates regarding some of the reports. I am glad of the opportunity to present to the Assembly the work of the busy and dedicated Public Accounts Committee. I appreciate that we have little time before Question Time, but I know that the debate will continue after that. Go raibh mile maith agat.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Members will be aware that questions to the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment will start at 3.00 pm. Members can take their ease until that time. The debate will resume at 3.30 pm, when the first Member to be called to speak will be Mr Jonathan Craig.

The debate stood suspended.

Oral Answers to Questions

ENTERPRISE, TRADE AND INVESTMENT

Mr Deputy Speaker: Question 1 has been withdrawn.

Unemployment: Economic Strategy

2. Mr O’Loan asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, given that the latest labour market figures released by her Department show an increase in unemployment of 1,600 people last month, for her assessment of the need to reassess the economic strategy in order “to grow a dynamic, innovative economy”. (AQO 121/10)

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (Mrs Foster): I acknowledge the impact of the increase in unemployment on many families in Northern Ireland. As with other parts of the United Kingdom, Northern Ireland continues to feel the effects of the global recession.

However, it is important to stress that the pace of the downturn appears to be lessening. The 1,600 increase in the number of claimants, for example, to which the Member’s question refers, is among the lowest in the past year. Furthermore, the Executive and my Department have taken specific steps in an effort to limit the short-term impact of the downturn on people and businesses: last year, the Executive announced a £44.5 million package; Invest Northern Ireland hosted credit crunch seminars; a £5 million accelerated support fund aimed at providing fast-track support to client companies was set up; and a £15 million short-term aid scheme is available to Invest Northern Ireland client companies and the wider business community.

It is also important for the medium to long term that we remain focused on the economic goals outlined in the Programme for Government. We must grow a more dynamic and innovative private sector; otherwise the short-term increases in unemployment could become more structural and long term. I will give careful consideration to the findings of the independent review of economic policy. I commissioned the review in December 2008, and it was published earlier today. In particular, I note that the review panel endorsed the economic goals that the Executive have identified in the Programme for Government.

Mr O’Loan: Even if, as I hope, we emerge from the recession, all indications are that unemployment will continue to rise. The Minister’s colleague the Minister of Finance and Personnel has made it clear that his Budget for next year is in serious trouble. In the past few days, details have been emerging of the Barnett report on Invest Northern Ireland. It suggests that Invest Northern Ireland does not deliver jobs in the way that we expect it and need it to do. In light of those facts, will the Minister support my call for a full revision of the Budget? Will she use SDLP documents as the basis for that revision?

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment: What the Member presents as facts are, of course, not facts. To take account of changing circumstances and ensure that we are focused on addressing the key challenges, the Executive are committed to an ongoing review and the necessary revision of the Programme for Government. I set up a panel to carry out an independent review of Invest Northern Ireland and the Government’s wider economic policy. I ask the Member to accept that the Barnett review pointed out that the Executive were right to make the economy their number one priority.

After much media spin on the review from certain quarters, it is important to set the record straight. The report is balanced; it contains some criticism, but that criticism is constructive. Page 6 of the Barnett report states:

“Invest Northern Ireland has contributed significantly to NI’s economic performance in terms of employment growth. Offers of assistance through SFA were associated with 28,000 new jobs, 15,000 safeguarded jobs and £2.4 bn of investment over the period 2002/03-2007/08”.

It is simply wrong, therefore, for commentators and Members to say that £1 billion was wasted in that period. Are they saying that they did not want those 28,000 jobs? I do not think so, because Members consistently ask me what I am doing to safeguard jobs in their constituency or to bring new jobs there.

Very rarely in this House do I hear talk of closing the productivity gap. The report rightly looks at the issue of closing the productivity gap, which I am committed to doing. However, if that is what this House wants us to do, there are choices that have to be made. There is no point in Members coming to this House and saying that they want Invest Northern Ireland to bring low-paid jobs to their constituencies if, when they next come to the Assembly, they criticise Invest Northern Ireland for doing exactly what they asked it to do.

There is a job of work to be done in relation to the report. I am content to look at the report and to take it forward, and I hope that Members will do it the justice of reading it in its entirety.

Mr McFarland: In light of the economic downturn, the Department recently introduced a short-term aid scheme for businesses. Will the Minister advise us of the actual take-up by businesses, rather than the number of applications? In other words, how successful has the scheme been so far?

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment:

The short-term aid scheme has been successful. I am quite happy to write to the Member with the specific details. To date, I think that somewhere in the region of 18 companies have taken up the scheme. Yesterday, when I met employees of Stream International from the city of Londonderry, I told them that one of the ideas that we are considering to help that company is the short-term aid scheme, so that the company can retain the skills and the management that are required to keep it going in the short term. The short-term aid scheme has been an incredibly useful tool to have in the armoury of Invest Northern Ireland, and I will follow up with the specific details for the Member.

Mr Neeson: I am glad that the Barnett review has been published. I very much regret that it was not seen by the members of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment before it went to the press, but I know that the Minister had no control over that.

How does the Minister intend to respond to the Barnett review? How does she respond to the suggestion that the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment and the Department for Employment and Learning should merge?

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment:

In respect of the first part of the question, I intend to have a very focused period of consultation — probably in the region of six weeks — so that I can hear what the community and interested parties have to say about the content of the review. It is important to do that. It is more than likely that I will then make a statement to this House and take the matter to the Executive, because a large number of issues in the review are cross-cutting. The Member mentioned one of them: the recommendation that we should have a Department of the economy instead of having the Department for Employment and Learning and the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment.

From a political point of view, it should come as no surprise to Members that I very strongly support that recommendation. We believe that there is a need to cut the number of Government Departments. We believe that that would be efficiency in government, which is what people want to see us doing in this place. We should cut the number of MLAs and the number of Government Departments, so, from a political point of view, I wholeheartedly support that recommendation.

However, I will of course listen to the views of others in relation to the consultation, and I will take it to the Executive in the near future for discussion.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member who was due to ask question 3 is not in her place, and question 4 has been withdrawn.

10-day Payment Rule

5. Mr P J Bradley asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment what discussions her Department has had with the Department of Finance and Personnel to ensure that a greater percentage of small sub-contractors, employed to service large Government contracts, benefit from the ten-day payment rule adopted by Departments. (AQO 124/10)

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment:

The Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (DETI) has not been in discussion with the Department of Finance and Personnel about the matter. However, I have raised concerns with the Minister of Finance and Personnel. At the request of the Finance Minister, contracting authorities are encouraged to pay suppliers within 10 days of the receipt of a valid invoice. However, that is not a contractual requirement. The Minister of Finance and Personnel advised that in the case of construction-related works and services contracts that are procured throughout his Department, the contracting authority is required to pay main contractors within a maximum of 24 days from the receipt of a valid invoice. Subcontracts include terms that complement the main contract.

For non-construction related contracts for supplies and services, the payment of all sums that are due to be paid by the main contractor to subcontractors is required within a specified period that does not exceed 30 days from the receipt of a valid invoice. I am advised that the Department of Finance and Personnel will keep payment terms in contracts under review.

Mr P J Bradley: Will the Minister undertake to give more help to local businesses to enable them to compete for large tenders? I give the recent Invest Northern Ireland advertising contract as an example.

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment:

After an open procurement exercise, that contract was awarded to the person that complied with the contract tender. I regret that the Member was not in his seat to hear me when I talked about public procurement this morning. However, public procurement is one of those areas in which Government can help a lot. We have seen InterTradeIreland introduce the Go-2-Tender programme, which has been successful in helping a number of companies in Northern Ireland secure Republic of Ireland Government contracts. We should welcome very much the work that InterTradeIreland is doing in that regard.

Small companies that I visit raise the issue of public procurement with me. The fact that sometimes there is a ceiling on the amount of money in turnover that those companies must have before they can apply for Government procurement contracts is an issue about which I wrote to the Finance Minister last week, because it was mentioned when I visited a company.

I know that the Committee for Finance and Personnel is conducting an inquiry into public procurement, but it is an area on which we must keep a close eye so that our small businesses get access to it. We know that 82% of Northern Ireland businesses are small or medium in size. We need to tell them that there is a route into Government procurement. On that, I agree with the Member wholeheartedly.

Mr Ross: Will the Minister tell us how her Department's performance compares with that of others in meeting that 10-day payment target? Will she tell us whether that performance has been improving or worsening over recent months?

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment: I am glad to say that DETI is one of the better payers in Government. Around 88% of its invoices are paid within 10 working days each month. One may say that that is all very good for DETI, but it is important that my Department shows a lead. I am pleased to say that it is doing so. Our non-departmental public bodies pay 73% of invoices within the 10-day target. The performance of those public bodies is improving monthly, and it is something that we are watching.

Ms J McCann: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Given that she emphasised the need for small and medium-sized businesses and the social economy sector to have equal access to public procurement contracts, what input has the Minister's Department had into the Committee for Finance and Personnel's inquiry?

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment: I do not have that information to hand, but I want to contribute to the Committee's investigation. As I said in answer to an earlier question, public procurement is a recurring theme in my visits to companies, particularly those in the construction sector, which often question why they cannot get access to Northern Ireland Water or other contracts.

My Department and Invest Northern Ireland organised a successful event at the new South West Acute Hospital in Enniskillen, during which we introduced a number of small suppliers to the principal contractor on the site. That worked well, and we will consider repeating that in other large scale contracts.

Rev Dr Robert Coulter: Are all Departments co-operating actively in applying the 10-day payment rule?

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment: As far as I am aware, all the Departments are being monitored against the 10-day payment target. I recall seeing a table that listed all the Departments and the percentage of payments that they make within 10 days. I am sure that table will be made available to the Member if he asks for it.

Renewable Energy: Feed-in Tariff

6. Mr B Wilson asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment if she has any plans to introduce the feed-in tariff for renewable energy to encourage the development of the renewable sector. (AQO 125/10)

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment: There are no immediate plans to change the Northern Ireland renewables obligation (NIRO) from being the main support mechanism for encouraging renewables development. However, DETI is about to publish a consultation on changes to the NIRO to ensure its consistency with the GB obligations. That consultation will seek initial views on the feed-in tariff as an alternative mechanism. However, any proposal to introduce a feed-in tariff needs more detailed assessment and consultation and, if agreed, would require changes to both primary and subordinate legislation.

3.15 pm

Mr B Wilson: I thank the Minister for her response, although I find it disappointing. Feed-in tariffs have been very successful in Europe, and, in many European countries, they have led to a big increase in the number of renewable systems. Next year, the UK will introduce feed-in tariffs, so we should follow suit. Will the Minister look at what the UK Government are doing and consider implementing those measures here?

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment: That is another subject that we discussed in the House this morning, and I explained why we are different from the rest of the United Kingdom in that respect. Feed-in tariffs for small-scale renewables were not in the Westminster legislation, although the House of Lords tabled an amendment to include such tariffs in legislation. Unfortunately, because there was not enough time to bring a legislative consent motion to this House, we were unable to be included in that legislation. That is why there is a disparity between us and the rest of the United Kingdom.

This Friday, I will launch a consultation process on how we should incentivise small-scale and other renewables, and as part of that process we will discuss feed-in tariffs. However, the Member must be aware that if, after consultation and discussion, we intend to go down that road, primary and secondary legislation will be required. In the meantime, there are other ways of incentivising the renewables sector. As I said, the consultation process will be launched on Friday.

Mr Hamilton: I am sure that the Minister will join me in welcoming the success of SeaGen's marine current turbine project in Strangford Lough. Given the additional boost to our economy that can come through developing renewable technologies, such as the SeaGen project, what support is the Minister's Department giving to the development of offshore renewable energy generating technology for wind and wave power?

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment: That is a matter of awarding various bands of Northern Ireland renewables obligation (NIRO) certificates; the higher the band, the more valuable it is. Therefore, we have been looking at ways of incentivising newer energies, such as those to which the Member referred.

This is an exciting time for energy policy in Northern Ireland. The strategic energy framework is out for consultation, which will close soon. We also have the bioenergy consultation process. That is going on at a time of flux for energy policy. In addition, we are carrying out a strategic environmental assessment of tidal energy off the north Antrim coast. A great deal is going on with respect to energy policy, but we must do all of that if we want to be a key player in the area. I am confident that Members will play their part in developing the policy.

Mr P Maskey: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. What progress have we made on the renewable energy targets in the draft strategic energy framework, and are they still achievable?

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment: The consultation on the strategic energy framework has not yet closed. Nevertheless, the Member is right: the 40% target in the framework is challenging; however, in order to meet our renewable energy commitments, I felt that it needed to be included.

I welcome the fact that the Minister of the Environment delayed the publication of the supplementary planning guidance on Planning Policy Statement 18 until we were able to assess whether that should be the target and until we had a detailed assessment of its potential effect on wind-turbine development. That is an example of joined-up government. After we have looked at the 40% target, it is important that we consider its implications on electricity prices, which, as the Member will know, is an important issue, and on our medium to long-term energy mix, security of supply and competitiveness. Those matters are also of keen importance. I want to look at the consultation responses, and we will do so in the near future.

Renewable Energy: Targets

7. Mr Easton asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment what assistance is available to help businesses meet the renewable energy targets set out in the draft strategic energy framework. (AQO 126/10)

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment: As I said, the most significant target in the strategic energy framework is to increase the amount of electricity from renewable sources to 40% by 2020. The primary source of financial assistance to developers whose renewable energy businesses will contribute to this challenging target is the Northern Ireland renewables obligation.

The Assembly voted for increased assistance under the NIRO for newer renewable technologies in the banding of the NIRO, which was brought in on 1 April 2009. I have also ensured that the Northern Ireland landfill gas developments are maintained at one renewables obligation certificate per megawatt hour, unlike elsewhere in the United Kingdom. That is a clear case of devolution delivering for Northern Ireland. The draft strategic energy framework highlights the significant potential to generate increased economic opportunities from sustainable energy activities in Northern Ireland.

As an example of how the Government are helping businesses to make the most of those economic opportunities, Invest NI is hosting a Northern Ireland energy and environment conference in the Waterfront Hall on 14 October. The event will cover real business opportunities in wind, marine, bioenergy and other low-carbon technologies, giving businesses access to the Crown Estate, and the European Union water and United Nations procurement programmes. Invest Northern Ireland's strategy for the renewables sector also includes a range of initiatives that is aimed at increasing the deployment of sustainable technologies and improving energy efficiency, including direct business support provided by the Carbon Trust.

Mr Easton: What is Invest Northern Ireland doing directly to help local businesses that are interested in the development of sustainable energy?

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment: Invest NI has taken on board the views of the green new deal group, which, as Members know, issued a report some months ago. The group wants to take up the opportunities provided by the green new deal, grasp them and take them forward. It has chaired the economic opportunities subgroup of the interdepartmental working group on sustainable energy. That working group specifically examines the opportunities to create green jobs and skilled development in Northern Ireland, with the aim of developing and agreeing an action plan among the relevant Departments by the end of December.

2009. That section of Invest NI is examining renewable energy. It is important that that is done because there are great opportunities in that area.

Mr McNarry: Will the Minister inform the House what discussions are ongoing with regard to developing the Northern Ireland Civil Service estate as a major renewable energy user? If there are no such discussions, will she encourage them to take place?

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment: Discussions are ongoing on that issue. In an earlier answer on the 10-day payment rule, I said that it is important that the Government lead, and the interdepartmental working group on sustainable energy includes representatives from across Government, who feed back into their own Departments. It is important that we hear from the government estate, especially from the Departments that own a lot of property, such as the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, the Department of Education and the Department for Regional Development. We need to know what they believe to be the best way forward. In the Department for Employment and Learning, much work has been done in some colleges of further education. The Omagh campus of the South West College has carried out much work on renewable energy, and that work was done in an exemplary way.

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for her responses so far on the assistance that is available to businesses, which I want her to broaden. I know that she has been active and vigorous in local areas. I met her in my constituency because she was involved in a job creation project.

Has the Minister discussed the possibility of reducing rates on non-domestic vacant properties with the Minister of Finance and Personnel? That would help smaller businesses to reduce their current excruciating overheads.

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment: We have not discussed that issue. However, to increase the energy efficiency of small companies and to decrease their energy bills, the Department puts a large amount of funding into the Carbon Trust, which visits companies and advises them what to do. In some instances, the change has been dramatic. Some large companies have saved about 17% on their energy bills because of the intervention of the Carbon Trust.

I urge small companies that are having difficulties with their energy bills, and I am sure that there are many, to consult the Carbon Trust. The organisation is willing to talk.

Signature Projects

8. Mr Doherty asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment for an update on the five signature projects and if all five will be delivered on target. (AQO 127/10)

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment:

In the Walled City signature project, which is now in phase 2, the culture and animation programme is complete. The Playhouse project is complete, and the theatre is due to be officially opened in autumn 2009. Contractors will be appointed at the end of October 2009 for St Columb's Cathedral and the First Derry Presbyterian Church projects.

In the Apprentice Boys of Derry Memorial Hall project, the needs and costs involved to appoint a project manager have been assessed and evaluated and a detailed business case has been completed. That is currently being considered and the outcome will be communicated to all concerned in due course. The Northern Ireland Tourist Board remains supportive of this project and is keen to see it proceed.

An economic appraisal of the Guildhall project is under way, and the lighting strategy and Aras Colmcille projects have been economically appraised. The latter is completing the interpretative plan to meet the Heritage Lottery Fund's requirements for funding.

The Giants Causeway visitor centre economic appraisal has been completed. A number of minor queries are being addressed by the Tourist Board. Subject to necessary approvals, it is hoped that a letter of offer will be issued in December 2009 and the project is expected to be delivered by spring 2012.

For the Mourne signature project, St Patrick's signature project, and the Causeway signature project, excluding the visitor centre, 74 successful applications are going through the economic appraisal process. The Tourist Board has been working on those with the Northern Ireland Environment Agency, the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development and the Planning Service.

On 27 November 2008, the Executive confirmed support of up to £43.5 million for the Titanic signature project, subject to satisfaction of certain conditions. The project is at an advanced stage of consideration. Harcourt Construction continues to work on site at risk, with the secant piling complete for the basement walls, the excavation complete for the signature building, and the piling for the signature foundations having commenced.

Mr Doherty: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for her detailed and lengthy answer. Given the potential of the Sperrins region for activities such as hillwalking, does the Minister have any plans to invest in that area with a view to making it a signature project?

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment:

It will not surprise the Member to know that I would have preferred it had a certain area in Fermanagh been considered for a signature project as well. The signature projects were awarded before I came into this office, so I am playing the hand I was dealt. However, the new tourism strategy for Northern Ireland will be issued at the end of this month or the beginning of next month, and I am very hopeful that we will see the way forward for Northern Ireland tourism in that, as well as the importance of the five signature projects.

The tourism development scheme has attracted two applications from the Omagh District Council area in West Tyrone. One relates to An Creagán team-building facility: the project cost is in the region of £65,000 and the grant sought is half of that at £32,500. The other project in the Member's constituency is the Tennessee Plantation House, which is also being half funded: the total project costs £300,000 and it is being funded to the tune of £150,000. Both applications have been approved in principle for financial support, subject to economic appraisal.

Therefore, although I understand why the Member is asking me the question in relation to West Tyrone, I want to assure him that we have not forgotten about other areas throughout Northern Ireland — perish the thought — and we will continue to support those other areas. I hope that he understands that those two projects are being supported.

Mr Craig: Will the Minister outline what she proposes to do with regard to the production of a new tourism strategy for Northern Ireland?

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment: As I indicated, the new strategy is being developed. The steering group that I set up has been meeting tourism leaders and business and public sector representatives. I very much hope to have that tourism strategy in the near future. It will give me a clear and inspiring vision for an action plan for the development of Northern Ireland as a tourism destination.

When I was in India last week, I took the opportunity to promote Northern Ireland as a place for people from India to visit. It gave me great pleasure to do that, because I believe that we have a tourism product that is increasing in value, and we need to continue to promote it as much as we can.

3.30 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker: That concludes Question Time. I ask Members to take their ease until the Speaker takes the Chair.

Report on the PFI Contract for Northern Ireland's New Vehicle Testing Facilities (NIA 168/08-09) — [The Chairperson, of the Public Accounts Committee (Mr P Maskey).]

Mr Craig: For my sins, I have been asked to speak about private finance initiatives (PFI). The Public Accounts Committee has looked at a number of PFIs in the past year. One of the first PFI contracts that the Committee looked at was the upgrade of MOT centres to the tune of £57 million. The contract was to provide installation and maintenance of new MOT testing equipment. For whatever reason, this was state-of-the-art equipment, and it has been in operation since 2003. However, given the time that the equipment has been in operation, the full test is not being carried out in line with EU requirements, and the targets for test times included in the PFI contract are not being achieved.

It was interesting to note in that investigation that the Driver and Vehicle Agency (DVA) has not claimed or received compensation from the private contractor. One thing that the Committee outlined and underlined in the course of its work was that any future contracts need to be clearly and properly structured and have built-in enforceable penalty clauses to cover circumstances in which the private sector does not deliver on the targets set out in the PFI contract. In the case of the MOT centres, it looks as though the private contractor found a get-out clause and managed to walk away.

However, the Committee welcomed the fact that DVA's performance against the 18-minute test time in the MOT contract has improved drastically in recent times. Anybody who has had to MOT their car in the past year will fully recognise that the waiting lists are well down. However, that improvement has come with a huge price tag to the public sector. It took £6 million in extra staffing costs to bring about that reduction in waiting lists.

The DVA is considering that it is no longer realistic to conduct an MOT in 18 minutes, and it is looking at a 27-minute period as a more accurate time for each test. All those issues will have a knock-on effect with regard to throughput in all centres.

For example, if MOT centres were to take 27 minutes rather than 18 minutes to complete a test, it would not be possible to inspect the same number of vehicles, and there would be huge cost implications. Huge additional resources would be required, and those resources would no doubt be sought from the public purse.

The Committee considered the Driver and Vehicle Agency to have done too little to resolve its difficulties, and it urged it to complete quickly a full performance review of the entire contract. On my speaking notes, I have underlined the phrase "complete quickly" because that recommendation was made in the then Comptroller and Auditor General's report three years earlier, and yet that review has never been carried out. That is very telling.

There is wide recognition that, when it comes to MOTs, the standard in Northern Ireland is probably a great deal higher than it is anywhere else. I am very tempted to say that it is higher than anywhere else in Europe — anywhere else in the world, come to that — yet whether we need it to be of such a high standard is another matter. However, the Committee did receive reasonably positive feedback that the situation had improved under the PFI contract.

Another PFI contract that the Committee examined was the contract to build the laboratory and pharmacy services centre at Altnagelvin, a key component of the £250 million redevelopment of the Altnagelvin Area Hospital complex. The project involved the construction of a highly complex newbuild at the site, but, despite its complexity and cost, the Committee was still genuinely surprised to learn that the whole project would not be completed until 2015-16 — more than 20 years after the redevelopment programme was launched. The centre took over six years to be developed and there were inbuilt delays, which caused an increase in the initial cost of approximately £4 million. Those costs were reflected in an increase in the unitary charges over the 25 years of the contract.

However, all the Committee members were genuinely impressed that, despite the complexity of the project and the inbuilt delays of the process, the costs were kept under control. That was the result of the use of exemplar design in the management of the project, and it was quite clear from the Committee's investigation that the use of that process had enabled the contractors to keep the costs under control, and one of its recommendations was that future PFI projects should make use of that process. The project at Altnagelvin did not meet its projected timescale, but its costs were kept under control, and those costs ultimately would have had to have been met from the public purse.

Mr Beggs: I also pay tribute to the staff of the Public Accounts Committee, and to the staff of the Northern Ireland Audit Office, without whose assistance we would not be able to function appropriately. Given the recent retirement of Comptroller and Auditor General John Dowdall, who had served for many years, it is also appropriate that Committee members should record our appreciation for his advice and guidance.

Accountability is the key to good management and to the deliverance of good performance. The Northern Ireland Audit Office, and the subsequent scrutiny of its reports by the Public Accounts Committee, holds permanent secretaries and other senior civil servants to account for expenditure. The Committee's recommendations endeavour to prevent the repetition of bad practice so that better use is made of public funds.

During the 2007-08 and 2008-09 sessions, the Committee examined a wide range of reports. Although it normally highlights the need for improvements to be made, the Committee also highlighted some of the good practices that it has come across.

The PFI laboratory and pharmacy centre project at Altnagelvin was mentioned earlier. During the Committee's investigation it found that, although not subject to a full gateway review, it was subject to a health check to ensure a final appropriate contract specification. It also made use of exemplar design. The views of stakeholders were incorporated so that the final design met the needs of those who would use the service.

The Committee covered a wide range of Departments in its investigation. I have chosen to concentrate on some specific reports where Departments must do more work.

From the perspective of a local councillor — and I declare an interest as a local councillor — I encountered some of the difficulties that arose from the miscalculation of the penny product. Indeed, I, along with other councillors, experienced huge variations in the amounts of money that we could expect to raise during the estimation of our rates calculations for the subsequent years. At one stage, we were told that additional moneys would have to be raised locally, and we were then told that extra money would be coming to us. We found it very difficult to have a stable base from which to plan and work the rates process. Indeed, several councils wrote to the Committee to draw attention to that issue. The Committee addressed those issues in the course of its inquiry, which it followed up recently. Councils have had difficulty in setting an accurate rate, given such variations in the penny product.

The Public Accounts Committee also exposed the scale of the failure of Land and Property Services to inspect vacant property. Surely, that is one of the most basic functions of a rates collection agency. Fortunately, local council staff worked subsequently with Land and Property Services to assist in invoicing an additional £21 million. That money will be available to the Northern Ireland Executive and councils to pay for public services, and it will help to keep down the cost for ratepayers who have been paying their rates. It is important that that aspect of the work is carried out.

During the evidence session, I related to civil servants the difficulty that I had in requesting a rates bill. I had to chase Land and Property Services repeatedly for a bill to pay. That is a very strange phenomenon for an organisation whose job it is to collect money. I assure Members that no business would have such difficulty. That, and other issues exposed by the Public Accounts Committee, contributed to the decision to have the performance and efficiency delivery unit (PEDU) examine Land and Property Services's operations and the subsequent action plan.

I had a brief look at the action plan, which lists some basic issues: the need for integration between the valuation and revenue functions; the need to focus on its business priorities; a clear sense of purpose for the organisation; strengthening the understanding of and focus on the agency's key customers; and maximising revenue collection against accurate and timely assessments. Those points are not rocket science. However, the need to have them listed illustrates that Land and Property Services must have lost its way if those basics were not central to what it was doing. I welcome the fact that those issues have been highlighted as key points.

It is hoped that additional moneys will be raised and available for public use. A more timely intervention should reduce rates arrears and bad debt. Regrettably, however, poor past performance will, undoubtedly, result in increased levels of bad debt being declared and less money being available for public use. I hope that there will be significant improvements in that area.

I turn now to the report on managing sickness absences in the Civil Service. It is estimated that the private sector has an average of six days' absence for each employee each year; the Civil Service in Great Britain has an average of 9.3 days' absence for each employee; the Northern Ireland Civil Service had an average of 13.7 days' absence for each employee for 2006-07. Although there are increasing strains on public finance, it is even more critical today to get more value for the money that we spend. Paying for absentee staff is not good value.

The vast majority of civil servants have a good attendance record and others have certified illnesses, but some are abusing sickness entitlement and putting additional pressure on their colleagues.

3.45 pm

The Committee's second recommendation was that the Department should keep a firm spotlight on that and that the reports should be significantly disaggregated to identify absentee hot spots in Departments and agencies. I hope that that will occur. It is important that all managers recognise their accountability and manage the absenteeism of their staff. Equally, there is a role for Committees in that area. During the evidence session we also advised that —

Mr Speaker: The Member should bring his remarks to a close.

Mr Beggs: There is no reason why there should be lower levels of attendance in the Civil Service than in the private sector.

It has been a busy year for the Committee, which has covered a wide range of subjects, and regrettably we have had to return to some subjects, but —

Mr Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr Dallat: I wish to focus on the PAC report on financial management in the colleges of further education prior to the reorganisation into six regional colleges in 2007. I will try to explain why I believe that that was a very important report. It outlines a classic example of hands-off bodies stashing money that they do not need and which could be spent on providing educational services that are in great demand and under pressure.

A total of £44 million was in the vaults of six colleges, doing nothing for the people for whom it was intended. It fails me to understand why those colleges could not find a use for that money to improve the educational prospects of people who look to the colleges of further education for a second chance to learn skills that would improve their prospects of getting a job, or, indeed, developing their skills to get a better-paid and more secure job. If those colleges were so well heeled, they could have handed the money back so that it could be used to fund front line services, such as the Health Service, which was starved of money.

The report found that senior management teams in the pre-regional colleges were not equipped with the skills and experience necessary for financial governance responsibilities. That was a damning indictment of the Department, which should have ensured that recipients of public money had the basic skills in how to manage it. If there is any good news from the report, it is an undertaking from the Department — given only last week — that in future, no more than 10% cash balances will be retained. The Public Accounts Committee welcomes that.

In trying to understand how so much money could lie idle in bank accounts, the PAC discovered that the Department was negligent in several ways. Monitoring reports were frequently submitted late with no penalty, and no action was taken when the reports flagged up serious financial practices. The Department, I am glad to say, has given an assurance that improved governance arrangements have been put in place for the six new colleges; however, I have to question that because problems have arisen in the new Belfast Metropolitan College, and the Department has not been able to explain why.

Speaking personally, it is a great source of frustration that, after the PAC devoted a great deal of time and energy to scrutinising reports produced by the Comptroller and Auditor General, we find that our recommendations are frequently ignored. That suggests that greater penalties are needed to ensure that the PAC is fully effective in the job that it does — and does with great commitment.

It would be remiss of me not to spell out how serious the incompetence of the colleges of further education has been and how their lack of financial management skills has affected the people who should benefit from the services that they are supposed to deliver. One quarter of the total population between the ages of 16 and 64 lack basic skills — skills that may just make them employable at a time when unemployment has doubled in the past 12 months. Those who are in employment could have upgraded their skills and gone on to obtain more highly skilled jobs that would be less at risk in the present economic downturn.

I have often said in the Chamber that education is the greatest weapon for resolving inequality and offering political stability. I declare an interest in that I owe my further education to the technical college in Coleraine, and I have nothing but admiration for the people who have delivered vocational education there to many students for more than 70 years.

The case of Fermanagh College of Further and Higher Education, which was covered by the Committee's report, was particularly worrying. Fundamental breaches of public accountability and basic financial mismanagement resulted in the college having to repay more than £1 million of improperly claimed funding. That money had been claimed before class numbers had been finalised. Clearly, there was no clear leadership or sense of strategic direction at the college.

It is gratifying that the Department for Employment and Learning has responded to the Committee's concerns with a review of governance arrangements. The Department has also undertaken to effectively communicate lessons to all the colleges through a programme of health checks, which are to commence before March 2010, with a workshop for all college senior managers to take place this autumn. Further training programmes are to take place in the future.

I wish to put on record my personal thanks to the former Comptroller and Auditor General Mr John Dowdall for his outstanding contribution to tackling financial irregularities, poor service and, indeed, fraud in public bodies. He was extremely concerned about the rights of the people whom I mentioned at the beginning of my speech, the 25% of people who lack basic skills and who could have their lives transformed if colleges of further education were to make best use of the resources that they are given.

Stashing the money in the vaults was a serious injustice. Let us hope that the publication of the report will mean that never again will that kind of embarrassment hang over the Assembly. In future, let us hope that FE colleges will be known for their students' successes and that the great history that they have had will be restored. That can happen only if the people who work in those institutions have the financial support and expertise in the future that they clearly did not have during the time that I have just spoken about.

Mr Lunn: I have been asked to talk about the general subject of fraud in the public sector, rather than about a specific report.

Fraud is a serious problem, and it is estimated that it costs the public sector in Northern Ireland around £500 million every year. Given today's economic climate, in which we are in the teeth of a recession, the public sector must be even more vigilant in guarding against fraudulent activity.

The cliché that fraud is not a victimless crime is worth repeating because every pound that is stolen by a fraudster is one pound less for the improvement of public services. I notice that the Minister of Finance and Personnel is in the Chamber; if he were able to get his hands on some of that £500 million, he would be more than pleased. It might make a difference to the figure of £370 million that is being bandied about in the other direction.

The Comptroller and Auditor General has been given powers to deal with the problem. Under statutory provisions that were inserted in the Audit and Accountability (Northern Ireland) Order 2003 by the Serious Crime Act 2007, the Comptroller and Auditor General has the power to conduct data-matching exercises for the purposes of assisting in the prevention and detection of fraud.

That legislation provides a significant opportunity to tackle and reduce the scale of fraud in Northern Ireland and beyond, and it should provide a strong deterrent against future fraudulent acts. Data matching is a powerful tool in combating fraud, as is demonstrated by the national fraud initiative, which was established by the Audit Commission in 1996. The Audit Commission has so far helped participating bodies to identify around £400 million of fraud and overpayments.

In consultation with the Information Commissioner and other stakeholders, the Audit Office has prepared a code of practice for data matching. On 25 July 2008, that code was laid before the Assembly. It promotes good practice and data matching. It helps to ensure compliance with the law, especially the provisions of the Data Protection Act 1998.

The first exercise was undertaken by the Comptroller and Auditor General as part of the national fraud initiative exercise for 2008-09. The Audit Commission, on behalf of the Comptroller and Auditor General, carried out key aspects of the exercise, including the collection and processing of data.

A total of 70 public sector bodies provided data for the first round of the exercise. They included Departments and their executive agencies; larger non-departmental public bodies; Health Service bodies; and district councils. A small number of other bodies provided data voluntarily.

The types of data sets included information on payroll; pensions; trade creditors; housing benefits; housing tenants; blue badge holders; rates; and the electoral register. Those data sets were gathered in October 2008. The matching exercise took place shortly after that. In February 2009, bodies started to receive their results, which they are now in the process of examining. It is hoped that by the end of 2009, the process will be substantially completed. The Audit Office then proposes to compile a report on the national fraud initiative. We look forward to that report.

The Chairman outlined the Brangam Bagnall and Co inquiry in some detail; therefore, I will not. That inquiry has given me a perspective on public sector fraud, which, certainly, informs my work as a PAC member. In 2007, we looked at a relatively minor case of fraud that involved the Ordnance Survey of Northern Ireland. In 2008, we produced our report on social security benefit fraud and error. In 2009, we have dealt with the inquiry into suspected fraud in the education and library boards.

The Committee has also dealt with certain aspects of a report on Valence Technology, which is due to be published soon. We could not get to the bottom of certain matters. As a result, the Committee has repeated recommendations on counter-fraud policies and the importance of basic checks and supervisory arrangements. Those simple steps can identify and prevent fraud at an early stage.

As is evidenced in the report on Brangam Bagnall and Co, and in other cases to which I have referred, fraud is often simple. It relies on the incompetence of supervisory staff; on basic checks and procedures being lax; and, in the case of Brangam Bagnall and Co, on friendship and trust replacing a businesslike approach and general vigilance. The late Mr Brangam exploited the old boys' network shamelessly. No one came out of that case with any credit; not even the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety or the Law Society, which were supposed to supervise his activities.

The data-matching exercise reinforces the Committee's recommendations in its inquiries. Departments must allow information sharing in order to prevent fraudsters from repeating offences. An environment of open communication is encouraged. It contributes to early detection of non-compliance with controls and can help to identify problems early.

It is also a key part of the culture that is required for a robust, whistle-blowing policy to be maintained and fully implemented. During the course of its work on various reports, the Committee has found that, often, whistle-blowers' allegations, which should be properly investigated, are not.

Many times, as a constituency politician, I have heard misgivings that have been voiced by members of the public, which, when investigated, have led to significant findings of malpractice and conflict of interest, in particular. Therefore, I fully endorse all efforts by Departments to promote a whistle-blowing culture. I commend the national fraud initiative as an example of good practice and robust efficiency. The role of the Public Accounts Committee, as the guardian of taxpayers' money, is to ensure that no fraud is deemed acceptable.

Earlier, I mentioned Valence Technologies. The report on that case is due to be published on 1 October 2009. Therefore, I cannot discuss it. Let me just say that some reports have been known to highlight matters other than fraud; perhaps, the need to maintain good practice, even under pressure, and to learn lessons from previous experiences and, indeed, previous PAC reports, such as that which was produced on the DeLorean inquiry.

Mr Speaker: Will the Member bring his remarks to a close?

Mr Lunn: I will finish there, Mr Speaker.

4.00 pm

Mr Wells: The other day, someone asked me to describe the role of a Back-Bencher in controlling the Executive, and I said that trying to control the Executive is like standing jeering at a passing steamroller. To a large extent, that is how one feels about one's role as an obscure Back-Bencher in this House.

However, the Public Accounts Committee (PAC) is the one Committee that really seems to have teeth. That is because Departments fear the arrival of the Comptroller and Auditor General in their offices, and they fear the PAC's reports.

I spent a very happy 15 or 16 months on the Public Accounts Committee; it was interesting to watch it in action. I pay tribute to the staff, particularly the outgoing Comptroller and Auditor General, Mr John Dowdall, who is a remarkable individual. At his farewell meeting with the Committee, I said to him that he has the intellect of an accountant and the voice of an archbishop. He has that resounding air of authority that makes people respect him. I knew that his staff were in very good hands. He has since retired, and on behalf of the people of the Province, I pay tribute to his controlling investigations into the misuse of expenditure. My colleague Mr Craig also congratulates Mr Dowdall on his hard work. I wish Mr Dowdall all the best for a long and happy retirement.

When I was on the Committee, I saw two extremes in its reports. During the Committee's investigation of the pathology laboratory at Altnagelvin Area Hospital in Londonderry, I kept asking myself what we were doing and why we were there, because the only scandal that I saw was that there was not a pathology laboratory such as that in Altnagelvin in either Newry or Downpatrick. It is an outstanding facility with wonderful staff who do tremendous work. The only crimes that the trust was perhaps guilty of were excelling in patient care and trying to do too much for patients. The laboratory might have run over budget, but the motivation behind that was getting a gold-plated facility for the people of the north-west. I congratulate the trust for that.

I know that the Committee felt obliged to look at that issue. However, I felt that the trust came out of that process with shining colours. I ask that there be similar facilities in Daisy Hill Hospital and Downe Hospital so that the Committee can investigate those as well. My constituents would love to have such wonderful facilities.

That is one extreme of the type of work that the Committee does. I suppose that we must look at the good guys as well as the bad guys to give a sense of balance. The Committee also looked at the issue of absenteeism. I worked for the National Trust for 10 years during the late 1980s and early 1990s. That was a wonderful time; however, not everyone understood my role. I once asked someone to join the National Trust, and he said that his money was with Bradford and Bingley already. Therefore, not everyone understood the role of the National Trust in Northern Ireland.

During my time with the National Trust, I noticed a fact about absenteeism that came out in the Committee's 'Report on Managing Sickness Absence in the Northern Ireland Civil Service'. I had hourly paid staff who did not get paid if they did not turn up and monthly paid staff who got paid no matter what happened. It was, therefore, no surprise that absenteeism was 14 times higher among the monthly paid staff than it was among the hourly paid staff. Both were doing identical work and hours, but if the hourly paid staff did not turn in, they did not get paid. Will someone explain to me why monthly paid staff can catch a range of plagues, diseases and illnesses when hourly paid staff are as fit as Olympic runners? There must be some reason for that.

Will someone also explain to me why pestilence swept through my office on Friday afternoons and Monday mornings but did not seem to affect the office on Tuesdays and Wednesdays? I never understood that. That report found that discrepancy: in certain workplaces staff got very ill, while in others, staff were very healthy.

I do not know what was going on in DRD or DARD, but staff in both those Departments seemed to be very happy; everyone came in, and nobody got ill. However, Members cannot say that that was because of the Ministers — [Laughter.] The Committee's report dealt with the pre-devolution situation, so those Ministers, who remain utterly unmentionable, cannot claim that staff were happy because they worked for them.

Why is it that in DARD the absenteeism rate was considerably lower than in DSD, DOE, or other Departments? It may be that the DARD staff were happier in their work, or there may be other reasons.

However, there can be no excuse for the fact that absenteeism in some Departments within the Northern Ireland Civil Service is almost double that in certain parts of private industry.

Quite simply, there are some civil servants who, unfortunately, consider that there are a number of days a year that they can take off as what are known as “sickies”. For example, they feel that it is allowable to take a few days off to go Christmas shopping. That is simply not allowable. It is not allowable for MLAs, it is not allowable for our staff, and, therefore, it should not be allowable for civil servants.

We may all laugh about that and it may seem very amusing. However, when you add up the total cost to the Exchequer of absenteeism in Northern Ireland, it equates to several new hospitals or several thousand new nurses. It is important that we get to grips with absenteeism, and, therefore, I think that it was important that the PAC did a report and exposed the difficulties that we face. We must drive down absenteeism to the average of private enterprise. That simply has to be the case. We cannot tolerate the laissez-faire, easy-going attitude that there is.

That said, being a member of the PAC was an enjoyable experience. It is hard to judge, but I think that I have moved on to perhaps slightly higher things. However, I know that the Committee is in good hands, and I welcome the fact that a letter from the PAC calling witnesses to give evidence is still seen as a fearful, torturous process that no permanent secretary wants to experience. The PAC must keep up the good work, keep causing fear within the Departments, and, hopefully, someday, we will do ourselves out of a job. I doubt that that is going to happen in my lifetime. However, Mr Dowdall can enjoy reading and playing golf, safe in the understanding that he has done a very good job for the people of Northern Ireland.

Mr McGlone: I was not anticipating being called to speak in this debate, but no matter. I am relatively new to the Public Accounts Committee, although it was visited upon me once upon a time before. The notes from which I am reading say “arcane”, but, sometimes, I am not sure whether the PAC is arcane or archaic.

Nevertheless, since becoming a member of the Public Accounts Committee, I have attended one briefing and one evidence session. Issues have cropped up in my capacity as an MLA, and I have referred those to the Comptroller and Auditor General’s office. I have to say that when I was previously at the PAC, Mr Dowdall always came across as extremely competent, very approachable, knowledgeable in his brief, and knowledgeable in the method by which one should approach that brief with the backup of his staff.

During the period to which the motion relates, the Committee undertook a report on the financial governance arrangements of North/South bodies. In researching that report, the PAC conferred with the Committee of Public Accounts in the Oireachtas in Dublin. This working year, the two Committees will meet again to cross-reference their findings on North/South bodies and, perhaps, even go so far as to synchronise the launch of their respective reports on those matters. In common with other Members, we look forward with bated breath to that approach.

This year, the Committee produced two composite reports, its second and third, and the subjects dealt with are too many and varied for me to deal with today. For me to even recall them at such short notice would be quite a task. However, I note that that mechanism enabled the Committee to make important contributions to the development of the reinvestment and reform initiative. It is hoped that that will be of particular interest in this time of economic concern.

I note from previous reports that an issue which has been brought to my attention — the involvement of private consultancy firms, and their cost to the public exchequer — has come before the Comptroller and Auditor General and the Public Accounts Committee. Inevitably, given the more recent revelations, that will come back under the scrutiny of the Committee.

I have looked into the reports that Members will be most aware of; namely, those dealt with by evidence session. In particular, I will discuss the recommendations that the Committee made in its progress report on shared services, which is part of the Civil Service reform agenda to make public services more efficient. Turning to the shared services report, I will give a brief overview of the projects, and comment on the lessons that the Committee drew from its evidence sessions.

The report on shared services was a snapshot of the reform project and incorporated seven initiatives, including Workplace 2010, Account NI, HR Connect and Network NI. The Committee was aware that the reform programme represented a major commitment of resource; it was estimated to have a total value of £3 billion.

As all the reform projects were central to the future organisation and delivery of public services, it was the Committee’s view that projects should be subject to the Gateway Review process at the prescribed stages of their procurement, implementation or service operation. The Committee recommended the approval of DFP Supply before committing resources, which was also a key safeguard in providing assurance to the Assembly that decisions had been subject to independent scrutiny.

The Committee also found that the projects presented an enormous management challenge for the Department and that, although it had taken steps to build capacity and skills among staff through its new Centre for Applied Learning, 2006 research showed that the Northern Ireland Civil Service was ill-equipped to deliver such a varied range of projects. Apparently, the Committee was aghast that one individual was given a key role and responsibility for delivering four of the major shared-services projects.

Overall, it appears that the Department took on a challenging workload and ambitiously initiated the reform agenda only to find that the timetabling for the projects and the resource requirement allocated to them were unrealistic. The Committee was also concerned at delays in implementation and at the suspension of the Workplace 2010 project at the time.

In addition, the procurement of the Workplace 2010 project, which was subsequently terminated, identified a key lesson that has wider applicability across the public sector. The procurement process was the subject of a legal challenge by an unsuccessful bidder. Although DFP was convinced that it could win the case, after advice from counsel, it settled the case at a cost to the taxpayer of £225,000. However, the full cost to the Department was £1.2 million.

In the Committee's view, concluding a settlement in cases where Departments are convinced that they will resist legal challenge sends the completely wrong signal to other unsuccessful bidders about the Government's determination to stand over their tender processes where there is a robust case to do so.

This was a very useful case study by the Committee. By the time of next year's debate, it says in my speech that I will be a "fully fledged veteran" of the Committee.

Ms S Wilson: The Member will be ancient. [Laughter.]

Mr McGlone: I am already encouraged by the role that I see the Committee fulfilling in impartially scrutinising Government expenditure and rolling out recommendations for improved financial governance across the public sector.

From one veteran to another, Mr Speaker, thank you.

Mr Shannon: I am not sure whether I am a veteran, but I have been a member of the Public Accounts Committee for almost a year.

The Public Accounts Committee has had a varied and busy year of business. I will focus on two reports; one on bovine TB and the other on the sea fisheries scheme for the modernisation and tie-up of vessels. Both of those issues have significant public-expenditure impacts; they impact aggressively on farming and fishing communities in Northern Ireland.

I will initially make my remarks as a member of the PAC. However, I will also speak in my capacity as an elected representative, because, coming from a farming and fishing constituency, I can bring my knowledge of that to the debate.

A quarter ir mair o' aa the herds o' kine I Norlin Airlan hae bovine TB an' the Committee richtly allooted at thon hannlin shud bae leuked intae. Thair wus a bag ris' i caases this las' wheen o' years peakin' i 1997 aa 13% at bes the heighest level i Europe. At least a quarter of all cattle herds in Northern Ireland have had bovine TB, and the Committee correctly concluded that that grave problem merited investigation. Just today, at a meeting of the Agriculture Committee, that matter was raised with departmental officials. There has been a significant increase in cases of bovine TB in recent years; in 1997, it peaked at 13%, which was the highest level in Europe. Over the past 10 years, the Department has spent some £200 million on its bovine TB control programme. The area with the highest incidence in the whole of Northern Ireland is Strangford and mid-Down.

Despite the Department's investment in controlling the disease, bovine TB can cause considerable economic losses through livestock deaths, chronic disease and trade restrictions.

It is certainly in the taxpayers' interest to eradicate it, and it has been eradicated in many countries. The Committee was, therefore, staggered to hear the Department concede that its current bovine TB strategy will not lead to eradication. That the Department should spend so much to achieve mere containment is unacceptable.

4.15 pm

I am not sure whether anyone from the Department is in the Public Gallery. I encouraged them this morning to come along to the debate, but perhaps the thought of being lambasted by the Public Accounts Committee has made them stay away. However, if they are here somewhere, I congratulate them.

The Department formally reviewed its bovine TB eradication policy between 1999 and 2002. However, we are still no further along. Progress has been slow, and not all the recommendations of that review have been implemented. Similarly, in a review of testing arrangements, a range of improvements were recommended by consultants in 2006, and those have still not been acted upon. The officials told us that they will have a wee talk about it for five years. However, the Public Accounts Committee wants action. Such delays are indefensible.

The Committee was also surprised that the Department was not fully compliant with the EU directive on combating bovine TB, and had not, therefore, availed itself of EU funding that is aimed at eradicating the disease. Again, there seems to be a delay in the Department. At long last, the Department has accepted the Committee's recommendation to bring itself into line with the directive, which is a welcome step. However, we will wait to see whether the words are turned into actions.

The Committee further recommended that the Department introduces the pre-movement testing of animals to address the risk of purchasing infected animals; that it reaches an objective, evidence-based conclusion and strategy on the impact of wildlife, particularly badgers, on bovine TB; and that herd owners on infected farms are given biosecurity training. Let us see action following the words.

We cannot be complacent about the continuing grip of bovine TB, nor about expenditure of, on average, £20 million a year to contain it. The Department of Agriculture and Rural Development must move urgently, focus on concrete measures, and use good practice from successful eradication policies to end bovine TB in Northern Ireland.

I have often asked questions about the undoubted link between badgers and bovine TB, yet the Department refuses to take the views of farmers and vets seriously. I advocate the eradication of badgers, and I ask the Department to do likewise. I know that the green Member to my right —

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr Shannon: I will gladly give way to the Member. I am sure that he will have words of wisdom.

Mr Wells: I cannot allow those scurrilous accusations against the badger community to go unanswered. The jury is still out on a link between badgers and bovine TB. Some scientists believe that there is a direct link, and others believe that they have proved that there is no link. There is also a view that attempted eradication simply causes badger communities to disperse, thereby spreading disease among cattle. Although the Member is entitled to his opinion, I ask that he does not quote it as fact. It is heresy.

Mr S Wilson: Stop badgering him. [Laughter.]

Mr Shannon: It is not heresy; it is fact. The Member has his opinion, and I have mine. I can back my opinion up with scientists' views. The Member will, of course, have his environmental, green-tinted view, which we also have to accept.

Sea fisheries grant schemes have amounted to £18 million since 1993 to fund three vessel decommissioning schemes and three vessel modernisation schemes. I have often stood up in the Chamber to represent the fishermen of my constituency, and I have helped them to make a living despite EU restrictions and regulations. I know that my colleague who just spoke has done likewise. Europe is so concerned with the so-called scientific reports that say that there are no fish reserves that it will curb fishing completely, which will undoubtedly kill off any chance of fishermen in the Province being able to make a living.

The EU wants to cut fleet sizes and the time that fishermen spend at sea. I was late arriving in the Chamber because I was at a meeting with fishermen of white fish at which that very issue was raised. Many issues need to be taken on board. The Public Accounts Committee examined the issue of help and grant aid to fishing boats. I was hopeful that the outcome would be one of support for fishermen, because there is something wrong when fishermen can see schools and schools of fish but are not allowed to touch them.

The Committee also found that, despite spending £3 million on modernisation schemes, the Department had failed to survey the fleet and identify and prioritise specific modernisation needs. Nor did it observe good practice in allocating only the minimum amount needed for the project to proceed. The Committee has now received undertakings that the Department will address both those points. Again, the Public Accounts Committee has made sure that that will happen.

The Committee addressed other issues —

Mr Speaker: I ask the Member to bring his remarks to a close.

Mr Shannon: Do I not get a wee bit of extra time because of the intervention?

Mr Speaker: No.

Mr Shannon: Oh, for goodness' sake.

I accept that. Speaking with my constituency hat on, the Department must step up and handle the issue with greater skill and interest. I hope that the Minister will make that pledge today. As a new member of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development, I assure the House that I will remind officials of their obligations on bovine TB and on decommissioning.

Mr Speaker: The Member's time is definitely up.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel (Mr S Wilson): This is my first Public Accounts Committee debate, and I am pleased to respond to the valuable, varied, interesting and amusing comments of Committee members and others who have been thrown off the Committee and have, as Mr Wells said, been elevated to higher things.

I have listened intently to Members' contributions. I will make a few general remarks, after which I will try to deal with as many as possible of the issues that Members raised. I acknowledge the work of the Committee, which has held 12 evidence sessions and made a significant number of valuable recommendations to strengthen financial management and corporate governance across the public sector. Furthermore, I acknowledge the role of the Chairman, Mr Maskey, and the Deputy Chairman, Mr Beggs, who have created a Committee that, as Mr Wells said, engenders fear and trembling in the public servants who are called before it.

I want to add my comments about John Dowdall, who recently retired as Comptroller and Auditor General. I echo other Members' comments; we owe him a deep gratitude for his work as an accountant who preyed on Departments or as an archbishop who prayed for Departments. I am not too sure which of the two roles he played. I congratulate his successor, Kieran Donnelly, on his appointment to the post of Comptroller and Auditor General. That role is challenging in the current economic climate, when public services are under pressure and when all public servants need to deliver more with limited resources.

I want to outline what I believe should be the role of the PAC and the Audit Office reports. I do not need to remind Members of the financial pressures on us, and Ministers have already taken several measures to alleviate the problems created by the local economic downturn. That downturn has reduced capital receipts through its impact on the property market. The Executive need to address that issue. The Executive must also address the issue of providing support to local households and business through, for example, the deferral of domestic water charges and the new policy on the prompt payment of invoices, which helps small business and gets money out much more quickly. On top of that, we have had to address other pressures such as the cost of swine flu and the efficiency savings from Her Majesty's Treasury. The list goes on.

In light of those pressures, it is important that public servants work more smartly, more efficiently and more effectively to deliver the best possible services. In doing so, we must not sacrifice proper accountability for public expenditure and transparency for our actions. That is what the debate has been about. However, I want to emphasise that we must be careful not to criticise people for taking reasonable risks and initiatives to deliver on public services. We need to open new ways of working, and staff need freedom to innovate. I know that the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment answered questions on the independent review of economic policy earlier today.

One of the points made in that review was that Invest Northern Ireland should be allowed more freedom to be innovative. That freedom means not having to go through box-ticking exercises. I want to say something about that, because I fear that, sometimes, we do not get the balance right. There is much that we have to do to find new and better ways of doing things.

'Managing Public Money', which is the Treasury's guide to the use of resources in the public sector, makes an important point. It states:

"It is also important to be aware that excessive caution can be as damaging as unnecessary risk taking."

That appears to me to strike the right note. Although I believe that the Audit Office and the Public Accounts Committee have important roles to play in achieving that balance and in helping public sector organisations to get value for money from the resources that they use, it is right and proper that those who have the responsibility of spending taxpayers' money are held accountable to the Northern Ireland Assembly for the use of the resources that are under their control.

Scrutiny of public spending is in all our interests; not only does it instil confidence in our system, but it allows us to promote good practice in the management of public funds and to expose examples of poor use of resources, and, even worse, as Mr Lunn pointed out, instances of fraud, which can take place in any organisation.

Over the past two or three years, there has been considerable focus on compliance and governance issues. A number of Audit Office reports have dealt with those issues and have led to a significant strengthening of governance in the period. Despite that, however, has the process become more important than the product? I worry that finance directors in Departments and public bodies are spending more time giving the Audit Office what it wants, as regards box-ticking exercises, than concentrating on the better use and best use of resources. We have all had experience of that in our constituency roles.

Mr Dallat: I hope that the Minister agrees that it is important to put on record that neither the Audit Office nor the Public Accounts Committee have ever criticised or condemned any Department that had in its criteria the risks that he referred to and that managed those risks properly. The only Departments that have been criticised are those that did not do so.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: Perhaps the Member has missed the point. The importance that the Audit Office has sometimes placed on process has led to the introduction of caution in decision-making, which is not always the best way of using resources effectively.

I am going to develop that point. When the Assembly examines the use of public resources, we use the three "Es" — efficiency, effectiveness and economy. Those should form the central premise that we employ when we consider how resources are used. The process is, of course, important, and the proper procedures must be adhered to. However, I sometimes fear that reports which, by their very nature, concentrate on process and governance either put less emphasis on, or ignore, the principles of efficiency, effectiveness and economy. Perhaps we should ask whether all the scrutiny by the Audit Office and the Public Accounts Committee, and, indeed, my Department, improves performance and ensures that public money is well spent.

I will throw out a challenge to the PAC. Since devolution, that Committee has been very active and has produced a large number of reports. However, does the Committee recognise that it has made over 450 recommendations? I am happy to take interventions from its members about this matter.

4.30 pm

Has the Committee thought about the systems and bureaucracy that have sprung up to monitor recommendations and to ensure that they have been followed up? Sometimes, the Assembly takes decisions for the best of reasons, but implementation requires the use of departmental resources, whether through manpower, time or capital. We must bear that in mind.

In preparing for the debate, another issue struck me, which was how long ago some of the events addressed in the reports occurred. Some Members referred to that. For example, Mr Dallat mentioned the review of financial management in FE colleges, which goes back to 1998. I do not want to get into the semantics of whether it is in our remit to examine issues that occurred before the Assembly was set up, but the report deals with issues that arose in the early years of this decade. Mr Beggs referred to a PFI contract that was signed in March 2001. The report on the New Deal 25+ that the Committee will consider next month goes back to 1998. The system has learned lessons and has moved on.

The Chairperson of the Public Accounts Committee (Mr P Maskey): The Minister has said that the system has moved on. However, in examining the reports, the PAC is seeing that aspects of the system have not moved on. Personnel may have changed, but I assure the Minister that when the Committee asks questions about mistakes that have been made in the past, we want Departments to learn from those mistakes and to ensure that staff in all Departments will not make the same mistakes again.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: That is a laudable aim. No one will disagree with that objective. My point is that some issues go back well over a decade. We are looking at the effectiveness, efficiency and economy of the spending that is being undertaken now; not processes that have been used in the past. We all have a responsibility to ensure that taxpayers' money is used economically, efficiently and effectively.

Mr Beggs: The report into the funding of FE colleges that the Minister mentioned covered a period when there was considerable change and reorganisation of the colleges. Does he agree that, given that the FE colleges have gone through an additional review and reorganisation recently, there are lessons from the previous reorganisation that had to be learned and should be applied to minimise losses and poor use of public funds today?

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: I agree absolutely. That is not contrary to the point that I am making.

In targeting a subject to investigate, the three "Es" should be considered. The example that the Member has given refers to the effective use of public money. Reports should be seeking to draw that out, but, sometimes, they focus on the processes. The way in which the investigations and reports are structured leads people towards making sure that they have ticked the right boxes in order to show that they have dealt with the process as laid down, rather than make effective use of resources. If the latter is the direction that the Committee is taking, and the objective that it has, it should continue to undertake that role.

I will deal quickly with the points that Members have made. First, Mr Wells and Mr Beggs referred to the report on managing sickness absence. Mr Wells made his point in a humorous, but very telling, way. Why are workers in certain Departments and certain parts of the public sector most prone to illnesses on Friday afternoons and Mondays? Why are there higher rates of absence in the public sector than in the private sector? Why are there huge differences in absences rates between people who receive monthly salaries and those who are paid on the basis of turning up for work?

We need to address the matter for two reasons. First, we want to make more efficient use of our resources. Secondly, it is bad for the morale of people who do not take time off to regularly have to cover for those who do. I am pleased that the average level of absence, which was 12.9 days in 2007-08, reduced to 10.9 days in 2008-09. That is still below our target of 9.7 days, but some progress has been made.

Mr Wells: That progress is commendable, but can the Minister explain why there should be any inherent difference between absenteeism in the public sector and the private sector? Absence levels in the public sector are still 50% above what would be tolerated in a private company in Northern Ireland, yet the work is largely similar. The overall target has to be to reduce the public sector's average rate of absence to the same level as that of Northern Ireland Electricity, for example, or, indeed, any shop or business in the Province.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: I absolutely agree with the Member. It will not be a case of resting once we have reached our target. We will continue our efforts to push absence rates down, and more work needs to be done in all Departments. I note what Mr Wells said about DRD and DARD. I do not know whether workers in those Departments are scared of their respective Ministers, or whether those Ministers give a better lead, as was suggested by Members on the Benches opposite. However, it is good to see, whatever the reason. The variety in absence rates across Departments perhaps indicates that it is a question of management. We need to keep pushing the targets to improve on our current record, and we are committed to addressing the issue on a continual basis.

Mr Beggs and the Chairperson of the Public Accounts Committee, Mr Paul Maskey, both raised the issue of rates collection. One of the aims of PEDU's review of LPS was to deal with some of the very issues that are highlighted in the PAC report. I believe, and, indeed, the PEDU report has made it quite clear, that the core business of LPS should be the efficient collection of local property taxes. Resources ought to be dedicated to that.

I do not want to make excuses, but the process of amalgamating four organisations into one, and implementing regular changes to the rating system — indeed, earlier today, we passed more changes in the Rates (Amendment) Bill — is bound to have an impact on the work of LPS. Nevertheless, it is important, from the local councils' point of view and as regards the Executive's available revenue, that we have a proper database; that we know where rates should be collected; that those rates are collected; and that we do not find that some people pay rates while others are exempt from doing so. We are working towards addressing that issue.

I will not be able to deal with all the comments that were made by Members. Mr McGlone is not here, so, rather than dealing with the issue that he raised, I will jump to shared services and Mr Shannon's point about fisheries and the PAC's 'Report on Sea Fisheries: Vessel Modernisation and Decommissioning Schemes'.

DARD has already acted on the recommendations of that report prior to the introduction of any new grant schemes through the European Fisheries Fund. It has completed a revision of the fleet futures analysis and carried out a survey of the modernisation needs of the fleet. DARD also carried out a comprehensive review of the economic appraisal and the project evaluation requirements. Based on the PAC's recommendations, there have been further improvements to the application and assessment and monitoring processes.

Mr Shannon: Sometimes, the PAC's decisions are not about allocating money back to the people; they can also be about returning money to the Department. For example, when the Committee discussed sea fisheries, money went both ways.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: I take the Member's point —

Mr Speaker: Unfortunately, the Minister's time is up. However, I will allow him to respond.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: I have not responded to some Members' points, and I will seek to respond to them in writing. I am sorry that we have run out of time.

The Chairperson of the Public Accounts

Committee: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I suppose that one feature that maximises the effectiveness of the Public Accounts Committee is that it is not within its remit to criticise Ministers or their decisions. That is the role of the Statutory Committees. Instead, the Public Accounts Committee focuses on regularity, propriety and getting best value for money for public expenditure, and it calls for accounting officers to justify spend on those counts and to defend the systems and controls that they have put in place to safeguard taxpayers' money. That makes for a Committee that can focus on the common purpose of financial accountability, and rarely, if ever, do party political concerns distract members from the business at hand. Today's debate demonstrated just that, and I thank and commend my Committee colleagues for their rigour and determination to speak out against waste, fraud and inefficiency.

If I may follow on from where the Minister left off, he is correct to say that the Committee has made some 450 recommendations. That shows the determination of the Committee to strive to ensure that public services here are accountable. I remind the Minister that Members are elected by the people of the North of Ireland to ensure that accountability is enshrined in all Departments. We will tackle the issues.

The Public Accounts Committee allows the public and taxpayers to have faith in the system and, if things go wrong, to have faith that the Committee and the Audit Office will provide scrutiny. We have made 450 recommendations, and I am sure that, over the next while, we will make probably another 450 recommendations. That is the poor thing about it, because as the Minister's colleague Jim Wells stated, the Public Accounts Committee will be in the business of making recommendations until it is no longer needed to do so. The Minister is part of the Executive, and I suppose that it is up to Departments to ensure that the mistakes that have been made in the past are no longer made.

I wish to add a point about risk. I have said on record that the Committee, and I, as its Chairperson, welcome risk taking as long as it is well calculated. For far too long we have seen Audit Office reports that show the absolutely disgraceful expenditure that some Departments were able to get away with for many years. The Minister is right to point out that some of the reports go back a long time. However, for far too long we were, for want of a better phrase, governed by direct rule, and there was very little scrutiny of Departments at that stage. If mistakes were made then, it is wrong to continue making the same mistakes. It is the Committee's job to drive home the message that risk can be taken as long as it is well calculated.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: I appreciate the Chairperson's point, but does he recognise that risk taking sometimes means that processes may be cut short and, for example, if a quick decision is required, there may not be an opportunity to tick all the consultation boxes? The emphasis on process sometimes reduces people's willingness to take risks, because, if the risk does not work out and they are found guilty of cutting the process short, they are subject to criticism in Audit Office reports.

The Chairperson of the Public Accounts

Committee: Again, it is about what Departments do with the Committee's recommendations. Even before the current Public Accounts Committee, when we look at the failings that Trevor Lunn mentioned — which will be in the report that will be published this Thursday — we can see that the IDB did not adhere to some of the recommendations that were made on DeLorean.

4.45 pm

In times gone by, Public Accounts Committees made recommendations that Departments failed to implement. That failure is an indictment of Departments, and it means that the same mistakes have been made twice, which is wrong.

I am thankful that the PAC is up and running and challenging Departments. We will monitor the 450 recommendations that we have made so far to determine which of them have been implemented. I must, however, inform the Minister of Finance and Personnel that Departments agreed to most of the 450 recommendations.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel: I would be surprised if Departments did not agree the recommendations. My point was that when recommendations are made and accepted, their implementation and monitoring by Departments has an implication for resources. Sometimes, those recommendations, because of something that happened in the past, may introduce a note of caution into a Department that militates against the taking of risks to get processes moving, which is what the Chairperson of the Committee wants to encourage Departments to do.

The Chairperson of the Public Accounts

Committee: The Committee is on record as saying that well-calculated risks should be taken. However, how did people benefit from the risks that banks took over the years? We are in the midst of a global financial crisis. I hope that the banks will learn from their mistakes and ensure that we move out of the global financial crisis.

I hope that Departments in the North will learn from the PAC's recommendations. No one should be afraid of the recommendations that we ask Departments to implement, as they have agreed to most of them. The PAC's purpose is not to make recommendations for the sake of it but to ensure that Departments learn from the past and that we can move on together.

I hope that the day will come when the PAC is no longer needed, because Departments are working so well. I doubt, however, that that day will ever come, because people will always make mistakes. The PAC aims to minimise those mistakes and to ensure that they happen rarely. That will give everyone, including taxpayers, confidence in the Executive. As the Chairperson of the PAC, my heart is set on instilling confidence in society to have faith in us. We must strive to create that confidence.

I will move on to some of the points that Members raised, but I will not go into every detail. Several interesting points were raised. Jonathan Craig and Jim Wells mentioned the PAC's visit to Altnagelvin, where we saw facilities that were second to none. The visit to that amazing project in Derry was the first time that the PAC had been outside Belfast.

It is easy to go through reports and to ask questions of Departments and the Audit Office. However, it is only on visiting the projects that it becomes clear that the reports could have been worse. The PAC took an important initiative in travelling to see the first-class facilities at Altnagelvin. I echo the earlier point that the staff in the trust must be highly commended for their hard work.

The Deputy Chairperson, Roy Beggs, talked about public funds and, in particular, the penny product. I am no longer a councillor, although some Members still are. The miscalculation of the penny product had a drastic effect on councils throughout the North of Ireland because staff had been budgeting to progress certain projects. The miscalculation that affected Belfast City Council, for example, was in the region of £4 million.

It set councils back, because they had planned for the future and had ensured that they had put all the checks and balances in place regarding front line services, and yet there was a miscalculation of more than £4 million. That is wrong, and if it is wrong for Belfast City Council, it is wrong for all others. A number of councils were caught out in that regard.

John Dallat referred to arm's-length bodies as being "hands-off bodies": that phrase is well known among Committee members. He also said, in relation to further education colleges, that £44 million was, in his terms, lying in the vaults. Some of the reports that have been published concern ensuring that people learn and are educated. If that £44 million had been spent on education, it would have enabled a much greater number of people to be educated and to gain employment opportunities or go back into further education and perhaps on to university.

Trevor Lunn mentioned the national fraud initiative, and he said that fraud is costing in the region of £500 million a year. He informed the Finance Minister that if that money were not being lost, then with respect to the documents that were leaked last week, we would not need to have a conversation about a shortfall of £370 million. Fraud has a detrimental effect on everything.

Jim Wells was a very valued member of the Public Accounts Committee. I think that he said that he served on the Committee for 15 or 16 months. I actually thought that it was longer than that, but it may have just seemed that way. However, he was a very influential person on the Committee and always brought a bit of life to it. On that note, Jim Shannon raised an issue regarding badgers, and I wondered how long it would take Mr Wells to get to his feet and respond. Jim came to the defence of the badgers. From some of the Committee's conversations, I know that John Dallat used to have a pet badger, so he may have also been offended by that issue.

Patsy McGlone, who is not in the Chamber, is a new member of the Committee. He mentioned the challenges for the Department of Finance and Personnel. As well as those challenges that DFP must address, he highlighted what the Committee could say to the Department about the recommendations that are made.

Everyone who spoke in the debate mentioned the hard work of John Dowdall during his stewardship of the Audit Office. As I said in my opening remarks, we very much appreciate the hard work that was done, and the dedication that was shown, by him and the entire staff of the Audit Office, as well as our clerical team. When we were looking at some reports recently, we noticed that it was a trainee in the Audit Office who highlighted the issue regarding the Nomadic, which is a good sign for the Audit Office going forward. The Minister may not agree with that because he could be challenged by the very trainee who raised that issue.

Mr O'Dowd: I thank the Member for giving way. As a former Chairperson of the Public Accounts Committee, I put on record my appreciation of the work of John Dowdall during my tenure. I found his assistance and advice invaluable, and the work that he contributed to the Public Accounts Committee allows us, as a local Assembly, to be more efficient in the delivery of our services.

The Chairperson of the Public Accounts

Committee: I thank the Member for that intervention. I also thank the Minister of Finance and Personnel for responding to the Committee's work and to Members' comments today about the concerns that drive them. I agree entirely that the current economic period is the ideal time for the PAC to work along with the Government to develop a constructive path forward for efficiency in public services. That is a very important note.

People have told me and other Committee members that our Committee is the one that they want to stay clear of. I hope that that represents their desire to work effectively, creatively and efficiently with taxpayers' money rather than being afraid of the individuals. As the previous Chairperson of the Committee said, this is not a blood sport: it is about ensuring delivery and value for money.

I also thank the civil servants who helped the Minister to prepare for this debate. They are the same officials who assist the Treasury Officer of Accounts in rolling out the PAC's recommendations and in representing the Department's views on financial guidance. The Committee and I are grateful for their professionalism and support. Go raibh míle maith agat.

Mr Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. Ms J McCann: I beg to move

That this Assembly calls on the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment and the Department for Social Development to bring forward a proposal to the Utility Regulator, NIE Energy and Phoenix Gas to introduce a Social Tariff System to help people who are most vulnerable to fuel poverty.

I welcome the opportunity to debate the motion. Fuel poverty has been widely discussed inside and outside the Chamber for some time. We have listened to the debates and have heard all the parties' perspectives on the issue, yet fuel poverty still exists. We must seek innovative new initiatives to alleviate fuel poverty. That is why I tabled the motion.

At the outset, I am not indicating that any one Minister or Department has full responsibility for tackling fuel poverty. The two Departments that are named in the motion are those responsible for energy and for social policy. I call on the Assembly to send out a united message that its Members are really trying to find innovative ways in which to tackle the problem and to help the most vulnerable people in society before we enter another winter. We all remember the hardship that low-income families and the elderly went through last year as a result of fuel poverty.

In the North of Ireland, the Government are responsible for payments that help those vulnerable people to pay their energy bills. Customers here do not have access to any form of social tariff, or affordable tariff, or whatever people want to call it. We do not receive that luxury from either of the two main suppliers of energy to households, which are NIE Energy and Phoenix Natural Gas. Let me make it clear that I am not asking for other domestic customers to pay for that social tariff; we want the energy companies to pay most of it, with some costs being met by larger commercial businesses.

That there is no competition here means that we are in a unique situation. NIE Energy and Phoenix Natural Gas have market monopolies. An independent review commissioned last year following huge electricity price hikes recommended changes in how the system is regulated. The Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment's draft strategic energy framework 2009 consultation provides an opportunity to ensure that the system is changed to become more transparent and fairer to customers, particularly NIE Energy customers.

Members know that Douglas McIlldoon's report sets out a number of recommendations, including extending the two-month purchasing period for electricity and reviewing whether to continue payments to backup power stations. That raises generation costs, which are passed on to the customer. The report also identifies other issues, such as the guaranteed profit margin of NIE Energy and the impact of using dual currency for the single electricity market, both of which contribute to the customer's paying more. More public debate is needed on those issues.

We have heard in debates that three factors cause fuel poverty: a home's energy efficiency; the cost of heating fuel; and family income. I am also conscious that most households here — I think that the figure is 70% — use oil for heating. However, we must also take a particular look at electricity, which almost every household uses.

5.00 pm

Mr Hamilton: Does the Member agree that omitting oil from the motion is detrimental to the energy strategy, because closing the competitive gap between gas and oil will not encourage people to move away from oil? Any social tariff that puts up the price of gas, which, as everybody knows, is much more energy-efficient and environmentally beneficial, will dissuade people from moving from oil to gas and could harm our energy strategy.

Ms J McCann: I did not mention oil in the motion because the regulator is not responsible for it. As I said in my opening remarks, I am not asking for household customers to pay for social tariffs; it should be the energy companies, which make huge profits here.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Molloy] in the Chair)

At present, 34% of households here with children live in fuel poverty, compared to 16% in the South of Ireland and only 7% in England — although even 7% is too many. In addition, up to 40% of people who live in fuel poverty are elderly.

Mr Brady: Although the introduction of social tariffs for all vulnerable groups would be most welcome and is, indeed, necessary, does the Member accept that the elderly are most at risk from fuel poverty? Between 2001 and 2007, 1,997 older people in the North died from cold-related illnesses.

Ms J McCann: I accept the Member's point. In addition, the money to alleviate fuel poverty would be saved in other areas, such as services that deal with people's health and well-being.

The sectors that are most vulnerable to fuel poverty are the elderly and low-income families, particularly lone parents, many of whom have to work part-time due to their need for flexible working hours. Furthermore, the recent rise in unemployment will result in more families becoming vulnerable to fuel poverty.

In the North, the Government are responsible for payments to assist vulnerable customers with their energy bills, mainly in the form of one-off winter fuel payments to the elderly. Customers do not have access to social or affordable tariffs from either of the two main local energy suppliers, NIE Energy and Phoenix Natural Gas. In addition, customers cannot switch suppliers, so they do not have the choice that customers have elsewhere.

In the South, the Government operate a system of free gas and electricity units as part of a household benefits package, which is available to low-income and elderly households, all people over the age of 70, carers and people with disabilities. Recently, the amount of gas and electricity that is provided free of charge there increased. As part of the welfare system in the South, the Government fund a national fuel scheme, which is a means-tested benefit that provides a weekly fuel allowance to low-income households that are in receipt of certain qualifying payments. The allowance is payable for 29 weeks, from the end of September until the middle of April.
