Volume 21

24 November 2006 to 7 May 2007

The Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006 made provision for Members of the Northern Ireland Assembly to meet in a Transitional Assembly, the purpose of which was to take part in preparations for the restoration of devolved government in Northern Ireland in accordance with the St Andrews Agreement.

Under the provisions of the Act, the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland directed that a Committee on the Programme for Government be established to agree priorities for a restored Executive and to make preparations for restoration.

The Committee on the Programme for Government established the following six subgroups to assist with its work, namely:

- The Subgroup on Economic Issues.
- The Subgroup on Comprehensive Spending Review, Programme for Government, Rates Charges and Water Reform.
- The Subgroup on Workplace 2010 and Public Sector Job Location.
- The Subgroup on Schools Admission Policy.
- The Subgroup on Policing and Justice.
- The Subgroup on Review of Public Administration and Rural Planning.

This Bound Volume contains the Official Reports of all the plenary meetings of the Transitional Assembly and the evidence-taking meetings of the subgroups during the period 24 November 2006 to 7 May 2007. Readers should note that the Northern Ireland Assembly, and thus the Transitional Assembly, was dissolved on 30 January 2007 to allow for an election, held on 7 March 2007, to the Northern Ireland Assembly.

THE TRANSITIONAL ASSEMBLY

Friday 24 November 2006

The Assembly met at 10.30 am (Madam Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

ASSEMBLY BUSINESS

Madam Speaker: Members, it is a requirement of the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006 that a meeting of the Transitional Assembly be held on Friday 24 November 2006. The Secretary of State has, in accordance with the Act, directed that the Assembly meet at 10.30 am to consider business as it appears on the Order Paper.

Proceedings of the Assembly shall be conducted in accordance with Standing Orders and any directions made by the Secretary of State.

Standing Orders have been determined initially by the Secretary of State and notified to me. Members have been issued with a copy of Standing Orders, and further copies are available in the Rotunda or from the Business Office.

I wish to confirm that, in accordance with paragraph 10 of schedule 1 to the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006, each person who was a Member of the Assembly established under paragraph 1 of schedule 1 to the Northern Ireland Act 2006 shall be deemed to have signed the Roll of Membership and to have taken his or her seat in accordance with Standing Orders.

A Member's designation of identity in the 2006 Assembly, immediately before schedule 1 to the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006 came into force, shall be deemed to be that Member's designation of identity for the purposes of this Assembly, except where a Member changes his or her designation in accordance with Standing Order 5.

Before proceeding with today's business, I remind Members that the role of the Transitional Assembly is to take part in preparations for the restoration of devolved government in Northern Ireland in accordance with the St Andrews Agreement.

Mr Burnside: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. As this is a new legal and constitutional Assembly, and it is the first day of its meeting, can you give me a ruling on whether I can raise a point about representation of religious chaplains to this Assembly? In the spirit of an inclusive Assembly, and as the Free Presbyterian Church has recently met the leadership of the DUP, opposing the Sinn Féin/DUP St Andrews Agreement, would it not be better before — [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. I am standing. Thank you, Mr Burnside. I have listened to what you have said, and I would be pleased if you will speak to me later. Your point is not part of today's business, but it is certainly one worth noting. Thank you for making it.

Are we all sitting comfortably? I will continue.
[Interruption.]

Order.

Before I proceed, I will repeat what I have said, in case Members have forgotten. Before proceeding with today's business, I remind Members that the role of the Transitional Assembly is to take part in preparations for the restoration of devolved government in Northern Ireland in accordance with the St Andrews Agreement. I expect Members of the House to carry out that role with respect for one another and for the dignity of the House.

For my part, I intend to do my utmost to maintain respect for the dignity of the House, and I trust that I can rely on Members' co-operation in maintaining good order in the Chamber.

INDICATION OF INTENTION TO NOMINATE FIRST MINISTER BY THE LARGEST POLITICAL PARTY OF THE LARGEST POLITICAL DESIGNATION AND DEPUTY FIRST MINISTER BY THE
LARGEST POLITICAL PARTY OF THE SECOND LARGEST POLITICAL DESIGNATION

Madam Speaker: Before we begin the statements, I wish to explain how I propose to conduct proceedings. Members will note that, since the Business Committee met this morning, I have received a further direction from the Secretary of State, and I am proceeding in accordance with that direction.

The Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006 provides for the nomination of a First Minister designate and a Deputy First Minister designate, who will become First Minister and Deputy First Minister on restoration. It is envisaged that this process will take place after the election to the Northern Ireland Assembly scheduled for 7 March 2007.

In advance of that election, I invite the nominating officer from the largest party of the largest designation to indicate his intention to honour his duty under the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006 in relation to the nomination of a First Minister designate after the Assembly election, subject to the outcome of that election and other necessary conditions being satisfied.

I call Dr Paisley.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: This statement is one of the most important that I have made in this Chamber since I was first elected to the old Northern Ireland Parliament. It will be solemn, short, simple and straight.

Our Province is facing a most important crisis, and I pray God that it will make the right choice in this hour of crisis. There is never anything easy in decision-making, and today we stand in need of divine strength. May almighty God defend the right.

Before us is a plan that has two main pillars. One is power sharing, and the other is total recognition of, and support for, the Police Service of Northern Ireland (PSNI). Everyone in a position of political power must decide whether he or she will support both those principles. My party, and all the other main political parties, have stated likewise, but until now Sinn Féin has failed to do so. It has, rather, equivocated, hesitated and by various means obstructed progress and continues to blame my party for the delay. My party has been straightforward and faithful in its stand.

When Sinn Féin has fulfilled its obligations with regard to the police, the courts, the rule of law and other commitments, then — and only then — can progress be made. Delivery is in the hands of Sinn Féin: there can and will be no movement until it faces up to, and signs up to, its obligations. As I said in the House of Commons this week:

“I am a man of plain speech. People know that I try to keep my word as my bond. I am not interested in any word games tonight. I am interested in peace in the country that I love — peace for its families and its children. When I spoke at St. Andrews I said:

“The DUP has been consistent in our demand that there must be delivery from the republican movement before devolution can be restored in Northern Ireland. The days of gunmen in government are over.”

I have no interest — neither in relation to my members nor in relation to the people I represent: the majority of the Unionist population in Northern Ireland — in deviating from the course of action that I have taken. I believe that my policy can and will lead to a better Northern Ireland, where peace and justice take the place of terror and strife, when true democracy reigns. For that to happen — for me as the leader of Unionism to enter a Government under the arrangements identified at St. Andrews — there must be full and unequivocal support for the rule of law, the Police Service,”

— that is, the PSNI —

“and the courts by all Members.”

On this matter, my party executive made the following resolution:

“The DUP in keeping with the outcome of its consultation process wants to build on the areas of progress made at St Andrews whilst recognising that other aspects of the proposals require further work. The Party will continue with the work in progress to ensure up front delivery by Government and republicans ...

The DUP reiterates the need for the Government to deliver on the outstanding issues presented to it by the Party.

The DUP holds to its long standing position that there can only be an agreement involving Sinn Féin when there has been delivery by the republican movement, tested and proved over a credible period, in terms of support for the PSNI, the Courts and the rule of law, a complete end to paramilitary and criminal activity and the removal of terrorist structures ...

The Government stressed, before, during and after the St Andrews talks that the twin pillars for agreement are DUP support for power sharing and Sinn Féin support for policing. Clearly as Sinn Féin is not yet ready to take the decisive step forward on policing, the DUP is not required to commit to any aspect of power sharing in advance of such certainty.”

The circumstances have not been reached in which there can be a nomination or a designation this day. I have made clear my aim, hope and desire for the future. Throughout the DUP’s consultations, we stated that if and when commitments are delivered, the DUP would enter government. At that time, there will fall to me a judgement consistent with delivery on the ground, as a basis for moving forward. Here I stand.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

10.45 am

Madam Speaker: I shall not take points of order at this time. I invite the nominating officer from the largest party of the second-largest designation to indicate his intention to honour his duty under the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006 in relation to the nomination of a Deputy First Minister designate after the Assembly election, subject to the outcome of that election and other necessary conditions being satisfied. I call Mr Adams.

Mr Robert McCartney: Madam Speaker —

Madam Speaker: Order. Mr McCartney, I am standing. Please sit down.

Mr Robert McCartney: You must —

Madam Speaker: Please sit down. I will take no points of order until this process is completed.

Mr Nesbitt: May I ask a question?

Madam Speaker: I wish to proceed. I have already called Mr Adams, and he is waiting to speak.

Mr Adams: Go mbeannaí Dia daoibh. Tá áthas mór orm ár gcara Máirtín Mac Aonghusa a cheapadh do phost an LeasChéad-Aire.

I am very pleased, a Cheann Comhairle, to nominate my friend Martin McGuinness for the position of Deputy First Minister. I agree with Ian Paisley that today is an important day. This is the beginning of a Transitional Assembly, and, by our presence today, all of us have agreed to that.

Of course, like Ian Paisley, I too believe that we face great challenges in the months ahead. However, I believe that all of the parties that are represented in this Chamber, and the two Governments, can overcome those challenges. We have a lot in common. We all want peace and justice for all of our families and all of our children. We are all here as equals, and we have a duty to govern for the sake of all of our people.

We also, despite protestations, share a common view that British direct rule is bad rule. Our people deserve better on social and economic matters such as health, education, poverty, water charges and rates. Those are the big issues for which people want their locally accountable politicians to take responsibility. We have the opportunity to bring back sensible, sensitive government, including the all-Ireland institutions.

The DUP says that it has difficulties in sharing power with republicans. Let me tell Members that very many nationalists and republicans are very concerned at the prospect of Sinn Féin sharing power with the DUP. However, that is also a challenge to which we must rise and face together. That is what leadership is about.

I am very conscious of the hurt felt by Protestant and unionist people. I am equally conscious of the hurt felt by nationalists and republicans, and by people caught in the middle of what we have all come through. No one has a monopoly on suffering. No one on any of these Benches can have any part in building a hierarchy of victims. Neither can anyone — especially those in this Chamber — absolve us from the responsibility to build a new and shared future for all of our people. We all must accept our share of responsibility for what has occurred.

As Irish republicans, in many ways, we look back to that great Irish Protestant leader and patriot, Theobald Wolfe Tone, who sought the unity of Catholics, Protestants and dissenters. With goodwill, we can create a space in which all of the issues of difference — whether policing, power sharing, poverty, or any other matter — can be dealt with satisfactorily. Today is another day in the inch-by-inch process of putting the political institutions back in place.

I am very confident that Martin McGuinness will be a champion for equality, fairness and justice — [Laughter.] I believe that none of the difficult issues facing us is insurmountable, but it is crucial that everyone present understands that today is not a stand-alone event and that progress is required in the short time ahead.

Go raibh míle maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

Mr Nesbitt: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Mr Robert McCartney: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I have made it clear to both gentlemen that I shall hear points of order after this process is complete. Moreover, Mr McCartney will have five minutes in which to speak. No points of order or points of information will be heard at the moment.

Mr Nesbitt: The process has been completed.

Madam Speaker: That may be your opinion; it is not mine. I will carry out fully the direction that was given by the Secretary of State this morning.

Mr Nesbitt: When may we make points of order?

Madam Speaker: I have already said that points of order may be heard after I consider that the process has been completed.

Mr Nesbitt: Therefore, you will allow points of order?

Madam Speaker: I have not, at any stage, said that I would not. I call for order so that we can complete this process.

Mr M McGuinness: Go raibh míle maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Tá áthas mór orm an post seo a ghlacadh.

I am pleased to accept the nomination, and, if it is the will of the people and of Sinn Féin, I will represent the people as Deputy First Minister. I will carry out my responsibilities and duties conscientiously, and I will respect and promote the common good of all our people at all times.

Go raibh míle maith agat.

Madam Speaker: In accordance with the direction that I received this morning, it is duly noted that Dr Paisley and Mr McGuinness have indicated, subject to the outcome of the election and other necessary conditions being satisfied —

Some Members: No!

Madam Speaker: Order. I remind Members that, as Speaker, I make the decisions as to our proceedings. Order, order.

I am following the direction given by the Secretary of State — [Laughter.] If Dr Paisley wishes to query that, we can discuss it later.

As I said, it is duly noted that Dr Paisley and Mr McGuinness have indicated, subject to the outcome of the election and other necessary conditions being satisfied, their intention to be nominated as First Minister designate and Deputy First Minister designate, after the Assembly elections.

STATEMENTS FROM LEADERS OF OTHER POLITICAL PARTIES IN THE ASSEMBLY

Madam Speaker: We shall now move to statements from the leaders of the other political parties.

Sir Reg Empey: Madam Speaker —

Mr Ervine: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Mr Robert McCartney: She is not going to take any points of order.

Mr Ervine: Well —

Madam Speaker: Mr Ervine, I cannot treat you any differently to other Members. I decide when and whether to hear points of order.

Mr Ervine: We have moved to another item on the Order Paper.

Madam Speaker: I am on my feet. Sit down, Mr Ervine.

Mr Ervine: We have moved to another item on the Order Paper. Surely, it is —

Madam Speaker: Order. I have called Sir Reg Empey.

Sir Reg Empey: Madam Speaker, this Assembly and this process is nothing if not consistent in its inconsistency.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Sir Reg Empey: The question on everyone's lips is whether Dr Paisley has made a nomination — [Laughter.] If sufficient bottle does not exist for Members to own up to whether they have nominated, that is a matter for the people to judge — [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. I remind Members that, distasteful as it is, the issue of what today's speeches contained is a matter for the Secretary of State, not the Speaker. [Interruption.]

Order. I apologise, Sir Reg, for the interruption to your speech.

Sir Reg Empey: Madam Speaker, it is not unusual for my speeches to be interrupted, so I shall manage. At the meeting of the Business Committee this morning, I asked my party's representatives to ensure that, at the earliest possible opportunity, this Assembly has the chance to fully debate, openly and in front of the public, the operation that we have witnessed. Clarification is required as to whether we have witnessed a marriage or an engagement today, because it is not entirely clear which it is.

However, the one thing that is clear is the trajectory of where we are going, which is towards power-sharing between the DUP and Sinn Féin. That is absolutely clear. The precise details and nuances remain to be determined. The Secretary of State has moved from rock-solid determinations to fixed dates, to lines in the sand, to vapours in the wind, and we do not know what he intends to do. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Sir Reg Empey: The protests today are more an expression of embarrassment than anything else, because people have been telling us for years about the things that they would not do, the things that they would never do, and that only over their dead bodies would various things happen. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. Please let the Member speak.

Sir Reg Empey: Inexorably, there is a process taking place, and everyone knows that.

On a more serious note, I believe that the hunger in the country is to make progress. We must have the power to deal with education, water rates and such matters. We must also remember that we have sat here for four years, unable to discharge our duties, because the matter that brought about the collapse of the last Executive — namely the spy scandal — was an example of the fact that the republican movement had not committed itself to totally and exclusively peaceful means.

In the interim period — [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Sir Reg Empey: In the interim period, a series of decisions has been imposed upon us by the Secretary of State. Some of those have been the natural outflow of developments; others have been a deliberate attempt to force people into certain political positions.

At the earliest possible moment, we must clarify what the precise time line will be. We also need clarity on the meaning of today's developments. The sound system does not seem to be working in this part of the Chamber, and it was not possible to hear the early part of Dr Paisley's address. However, if the early part was as interesting as the latter part, I have little doubt that we will look forward with great anticipation to reading the record.

As we contemplate the current situation, the one thing that stands out most strongly is the waste —

Madam Speaker: Your time is up, Sir Reg.

Sir Reg Empey: I shall have another opportunity to speak, Madam Speaker.

11.00 am

Mr Durkan: There is as much hollow farce as historic significance in what we have witnessed this morning.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Durkan: Parties were set a simple test for today, and the manner in which these proceedings are being conducted means that we are failing that test. Under the Secretary of State's remote direction, language and logic are being turned inside out and on to their head. However, that is not the fault of just the Secretary of State. We need to recognise that the slippage, for which we all criticised the Government for allowing, stems from the slippiness of the two political parties that claim to lead this process but that are deadlocking it yet again. The public are getting fed up with this tired and boring soap opera in which we teeter on the brink and repeatedly go through the same plot lines. In that soap opera, people find ways in which to give each other excuses and vetoes so that they can then get away with blaming each other for failure.

The SDLP endorsed the St Andrews deal not as the best or most perfect way forward but as a path that could get us back into the institutions for which the people, North and South, voted when they endorsed the Good Friday Agreement. However, despite all the declarations and affirmations that the Government made at the time, slippage has occurred since the meetings at St Andrews. The Programme for Government Committee was meant to meet on 17 October, but it did not meet until 20 November. In the week of 10 November, Sinn Féin's ardchomhairle was to meet to make a clear statement on a path that would take us forward on policing — that never happened. On 10 November, the St Andrews deal was to be endorsed and parties were to commit definitively to power sharing before legislation was passed this week — no such commitment was made. Instead, we had the Vicky Pollard-type excuses of "Yes but, no but, not our fault, see — blame them."

The Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006 was passed this week, and that legislation saw more vetoes being piled into the DUP shopping trolley. Sinn Féin was happy for that to happen, because it negotiates only for itself and its own in those situations. It does not negotiate for the wider public, for the wider national interest or even for the wider nationalist interest. Therefore difficulties remain.

Nominations were meant to have been made today. The St Andrews deal was clear that nominations should be made on 24 November, and it was clear about what would happen if nominations were not made on that day. Of course, those nominations have not been made.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Durkan: We were told that the legislation would give the DUP what it wanted only if nominations were made, but that has not happened. That situation is wrong. It is not just bad governance and bad management on the part of two Governments, it is bad negotiating on the part of Sinn Féin. Therefore Sinn Féin has helped to set up this position for the DUP.

As the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Bill was passing through Westminster this week, we heard from the DUP that there would be no devolution of justice and policing in our various lifetimes. I thought that many DUP members were Free Presbyterians; however, it seems that many of them are Buddhists who will be reincarnated many times in order for them to say no to the devolution of justice and policing many times. [Laughter.] Who put the DUP into that position? Sinn Féin, the party that gave the DUP the triple-lock veto over the devolution of justice and policing, put the DUP into that position. Sinn Féin gave the DUP that veto in the comprehensive agreement, and Sinn Féin was happy for that veto to be gilt-edged for the DUP when the Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 2006 was passed in the spring. Sinn Féin welcomed that legislation as sealing the devolution of justice and policing, and Sinn Féin pretended to the nationalist community that it was sealing the devolution of justice and policing. However, it merely sealed a veto for the DUP.

Of course, the DUP has given Sinn Féin a veto. The DUP says that until Sinn Féin moves on policing, the rest of us will not get back to democracy, we will not get the institutions for which we voted, and people will not see politicians doing the job for which they were mandated. The DUP is happy to give Sinn Féin that veto — those parties rely on each other. That in turn proves that none of us can rely on them.

When it comes to voting next March — if we get that far — people will need to know that they have a choice. That choice is between a mandate for stability and a mandate for stalemate. The two parties that between them have given us the worst of our past will not give us the best of our future.

Madam Speaker: I call Mr Ford. Order.

Mr Ford: We started off this morning with what sounded like the longest “maybe” in history — the great pretenders are continuing the great pretence. Yet another line in the sand drawn by the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister has been washed away by a tide of mistrust and bitterness. There is no way in which any rational person could interpret the statement that the leader of the DUP made as being an intention to nominate. [Interruption.]

Those on the one side of the Chamber who are catcalling should look outside it and see what the people of Northern Ireland think about what is going on inside it. The people of Northern Ireland are fed up with the delays, the nonsense, and the complete inability of those who were given responsibility in the last election to take that responsibility and live up to it. The Alliance Party is utterly fed up with those parties’ inabilities — despite the leadership that they claim and despite the roles that they have been given — to do what they have been instructed to do and live up even to the promises that they made in the comprehensive agreement and in the St Andrews Agreement.

It is clear that Sinn Féin has done nothing that could be interpreted constructively as moving towards accepting the rule of law. It has failed to do what it should have done, and all the pious noises that it makes in blaming the DUP do not outweigh that fact. Similarly, the DUP has done nothing to demonstrate a willingness to share power genuinely, engage with other parties, and accept its responsibilities.

If the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State had any integrity, they would close this place down — [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr Ford: It is time that we stopped the pretence of what is going on. When the St — [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. We will know whether we have to evacuate. Please continue, Mr Ford.

Mr Ford: When the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Bill was going through Westminster in an unseemly and almost unconstitutional rush this week, Lord Smith, the former vice-chancellor of the University of Ulster, described it in the House of Lords as “a fig leaf”. He added:

“Whether it will provide a foundation for an operating, representative and democratic system of devolved government ... is extremely doubtful.”

Having now seen the utter farce that has taken place in the Chamber this morning, anybody who had doubts will know exactly what is happening and how little opportunity there is for anything.

The significant differences between the DUP and Sinn Féin have not been addressed, despite all the rhetoric of the past year and a half and despite their fingerprints being all over the St Andrews Agreement. They have merely pushed the blockage further down the pipe. They have done nothing to engage, and they have left the people of Northern Ireland in the limbo of not knowing what is happening and of watching the farce this morning compound that which the Government has created in recent months.

The Alliance Party did not support the St Andrews Agreement, and we have no responsibility for it. What we have seen today is a weakening of even the limited amount of genuine power sharing that was left within that agreement. It was an opportunity to divide power further, and it had nothing to do with power sharing. The people of Northern Ireland deserve better than that, and they will have to see something better than that. The people are not being conned by what is going on, and it is time that those in the Chamber and in the Government stop deceiving people.

Today was supposed to be the simple part of the process. All that was required was the nomination of a First Minister and a Deputy First Minister, and we could not even get that simple procedure right. If we cannot manage a simple nomination process, what chance do we have of dealing with the difficult issues that confront this Assembly? Those difficult issues —
[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: I have received instructions that we will have to evacuate using the exit that is behind the Speaker's Chair. [Interruption.] Order. That is, unless you want to sit here and be bombed or something. Thank you for your co-operation. I remind Members that the sitting is only suspended.

The debate stood suspended.

The sitting was suspended at 11.09 am.

THE TRANSITIONAL ASSEMBLY

Monday 27 November 2006

The sitting begun and suspended on Friday 24 November 2006 was resumed at 10.30 am (Madam Speaker in the Chair).

ASSEMBLY BUSINESS

Madam Speaker: The sitting is resumed. On Friday, as a result of a serious security situation about which my staff notified me, I was required to suspend the sitting under Standing Order 26(e). Before we proceed, I wish to make a statement regarding the events of that day, and I trust that I will be able to do so without interruption.

I will comment on the proceedings of the sitting in a moment, but first I will refer to the security incident that led to that sitting's suspension.

Members will be aware that, following the incident that occurred at the front entrance to Parliament Buildings on Friday morning, an individual has been charged. The matter is, therefore, sub judice, so Members will understand that I am constrained in what I can say about the incident at this stage.

Having been briefed on that investigation by the Chief Constable and an assistant chief constable, I can say that no one should underestimate the very real danger that everyone in the Building faced on Friday morning. The devices that were defused may have been crude in nature, but they were no less life-threatening for that. Moreover, we should not underestimate the extraordinary courage that was shown by our doorkeepers in confronting that danger.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Madam Speaker: Our unarmed civilian doorkeepers confronted an assailant whom they believed to be armed with a gun and explosives. They disarmed and detained him. By doing so, they undoubtedly prevented serious injury and possible loss of life. They selflessly endangered their own lives in order to protect ours, and we are indebted to them for that. We must not underestimate their bravery, nor understate our appreciation. Two of the doorkeepers involved had to be taken to hospital, but I am very pleased to report that neither suffered serious physical injury.

This morning, I met with all those who were involved to express my own appreciation of, and admiration for, their actions and their bravery. There will be a further opportunity, Members, for the House to recognise that bravery at a later date. Over the weekend, I spoke with party leaders and many Members, and I know that I speak for the whole House — its Members, the secretariat and Members' staff — and for the many members of the public who were present in the Building for the sitting when I express our sincere gratitude and admiration for the professionalism and courage that the doorkeepers displayed.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Madam Speaker: In the light of Friday's events, questions have, quite reasonably, been asked about the level of security in and around Parliament Buildings. We must be mindful of Members' own desire that Parliament Buildings be a public building that is accessible and open to all our citizens and visitors. Nevertheless, the Building must also be a place of safety where democracy can be exercised without fear.

On Friday evening, I met the Secretary of State and the Chief Constable and spoke with the chairman of the Policing Board. They have all assured me of their support for, and pledged co-operation in, a full security review at Parliament Buildings. Senior officials met PSNI representatives on Saturday, and immediate measures have been agreed to ensure the security of the Building in the short term. Later this week, I will call a meeting of the Transitional Assembly Commission and will brief party representatives on how officials intend to conduct the broader security review. That review will include a full and detailed report on last Friday's incident, consideration of future police presence, additional security measures and evacuation arrangements. I intend also to consult with the Business Committee tomorrow on whether parties wish to establish a Committee to take forward that review.

Friday's attack on Parliament Buildings was an attack on democracy. In protecting the Building and its users, we are also protecting the right of all our citizens to participate fully and freely in the democratic life of our community. This morning's resumption is primarily to allow for the completion of Friday's Assembly business, but I hope that it will also serve as a strong and clear statement of the shared view of all represented here that democracy is the only way in which the needs of our community can be met, and of our shared resolve that, by our words and deeds in this place, democracy will be seen to prevail. We can all do so in this Chamber by maintaining good order; by exercising our responsibilities in a proper manner; and by conducting ourselves in a manner that upholds common standards of decency, honesty and mutual respect.

I now wish to turn briefly to the proceedings that the incident caused me to suspend. Friday's sitting was a requirement of the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006. That Act provides for me, as Speaker, to call meetings of the Transitional Assembly and to determine the business to be conducted. It also allows the Secretary of State to direct the proceedings of the Transitional Assembly at any time. In that sense, the Transitional Assembly has not been given the level of autonomy and independence that would be enjoyed by a fully restored Northern Ireland Assembly. Nor am I, as Speaker, able to exercise the unfettered discretion that a Speaker of a fully restored Northern Ireland Assembly would have.

At a meeting of the Business Committee preceding Friday's sitting, it was agreed that we should proceed in a particular way. Following that meeting, I received a further direction from the Secretary of State under which the Transitional Assembly was bound to proceed differently. The terms of that direction were fulfilled on Friday.

This morning I chaired a meeting of the Business Committee at which I explained to Members that, unfortunately, there was insufficient time to inform them of the detail of the direction in advance of the commencement of Friday's sitting. I have arranged for copies of the direction to be placed in the Library. I know that some Members were disappointed by that development, but I trust that they will understand the limitations within which we currently operate.

We will now return to the Order Paper for Friday 24 November. We were interrupted during Mr Ford's statement. I now call on him to continue his remarks. I have allowed him three minutes to do so.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. The DUP supports all that you have said about those who protected us on the occasion that you mentioned. My party would heartily welcome a Committee of this House to deal with the other matters, as you have suggested.

Madam Speaker: Thank you, Dr Paisley. Strictly speaking, that was not a point of order. I shall not take any further points of order. Mr Adams, were you on your feet?

Mr Adams: Yes, Madam Speaker. I want to concur absolutely with what you said about the security staff.

Mr Nesbitt: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. On Friday, you said that you would not take points of order until the proceedings were complete. I am still waiting to make my point of order, although I presume that it will be taken.

Madam Speaker: Absolutely, Mr Nesbitt.

Debate [suspended on 24 November 2006] resumed:

Mr Ford: Madam Speaker, I know that you have spoken for everyone in the Chamber — indeed, for all those who work in the Building — in your reference to the events of last Friday and in the tribute that you paid to the staff. However, I could not continue my speech without adding my tribute, and that of my colleagues, to all the staff, whether doorkeepers or other secretariat staff, who were responsible for evacuating the Building at some risk to themselves. Particular tribute must go to a small group of doorkeepers who, at the front door, put their lives on the line to protect our lives. I trust that when the inquiry into the events of last Friday is conducted, it will deal with rumours that suggest that, by their failure to respond to the directions that they were given, some Members added to the danger to staff.

Hansard records that when my speech was interrupted on Friday, I had just said:

“If the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State had any integrity, they would close this place down”. — [Official Report, Bound Volume 21, p6, col 2].

It was absolutely clear that the leader of the DUP had, at that stage, totally failed to give the assurances and commitments to take office that he was required to give, despite the unbreakable deadline of 24 November that was set by Ministers. Similarly, although the Sinn Féin leader said the right words in the Chamber, it is absolutely clear that that party has so far failed to take any constructive action towards full recognition of the Police Service and co-operation with the rule of law. Regardless of the Ard-Fheis, when will the ardchomhairle on policing, which was supposed to be an essential prerequisite of the St Andrews Agreement, be held?

Subsequently, the DUP leader changed what I had earlier described as: to a slightly more specific “maybe”. However, even before he did that, the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State were falling over themselves to say that he had given the necessary commitment, when it was perfectly clear to those who were in the Chamber that he had not given any such commitment.

This morning, the Secretary of State added to that by treating us to a plea via the media that Sinn Féin confirms that the Ard-Fheis on policing will be held before 7 March 2007. What kind of election could possibly be held on 7 March 2007 if Sinn Féin was not fully committed to what it signed up to at St Andrews? Two parties are playing games with the Assembly and the people of Northern Ireland. Is it any wonder that people are fed up with them? Despite that, the Governments continue on their merry, sweet way. The Governments have given the DUP and Sinn Féin the election that they want and the opportunity to weaken the other parties. The DUP and Sinn Féin are failing to move in any direction. If they cannot live up to their obligations, they ought to go now.

Madam Speaker: The Question is — sorry, that was just wishful thinking on my part. [Laughter.] I had intended to call Mr Ervine to give him an opportunity to speak. However, he is elsewhere. Therefore, I call Mr Robert McCartney.

Mr Robert McCartney: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I am not the enemy of the DUP. At the last general election, along with thousands of other unionists, I voted for the first time for the DUP. Like them, I gave not just my vote to the DUP, but my trust. It is in sorrow, rather than in anger, that I speak, for I am acutely aware that my feelings of impending betrayal are shared by many other unionists in other parties.

The choreographed puppet show of last Friday, with a distortion of language and meaning of which Humpty Dumpty would have been proud, nevertheless produced a moment of truth for Ian Paisley. Madam Speaker, when, on Peter Hain's instructions, you deemed Ian Paisley's response an acceptance, he could there and then have denied that it was. He did not. I understand that his response omitted the express acceptance that was in the text that had been agreed with Tony Blair. Subsequently, he publicly accepted the nomination outside this Chamber, albeit conditionally. Madam Speaker, I submit that such an acceptance is invalid and requires to be repeated as a matter of record in the Chamber if it is to be taken as you deemed it.

Only the DUP pragmatists pretend that the St Andrews document is anything but a sugared version of the Belfast Agreement, which makes DUP participation totally dependent on an enforced coalition with Sinn Féin. The DUP's acceptance of such terms makes the party a born-again pro-agreement party, with policies essentially indistinguishable from those of the Ulster Unionist Party — policies that brought electoral disaster upon the UUP.

The core of Trimble's policies was power sharing with Sinn Féin, a party inextricably linked with the men of blood who had murdered, maimed, robbed and destroyed for three decades. The attempts by the DUP pragmatists to disguise the extent of that U-turn from the party's grass roots have failed. The U-turn is a clear breach of the party's present manifesto of only last year, which declared — in express terms — that an inclusive coalition with Sinn Féin under d'Hondt was out of the question.

Tony Blair and Peter Hain want devolution at any price before Blair retires and Hain moves on. They are indifferent to the unstable, unworkable and undemocratic mess that they will leave behind. Devolution for Sinn Féin is a mere cog in its all-Ireland strategy. Acceptance by the DUP of Sinn Féin as coalition partners will legitimise its claim to a place in the Government of the Republic.

Apart from an ego trip and ministerial office, St Andrews-style devolution offers little to unionists. The timetable affords no credible opportunity for testing whether Sinn Féin genuinely supports the police and the rule of law. At best, Sinn Féin will offer the minimum words necessary, with fingers crossed in reservation. The DUP will be inviting upon itself the plague of internal dissent that Jeffrey Donaldson, in a previous life, once inflicted upon the UUP. [Laughter.]

It is an illusion that the DUP is in control of the process and can pull out at any time. The further it moves, inch by inch, towards the Government's objective, the further it recedes the possibility of withdrawal. It is equally foolish to assume that Sinn Féin will never deliver on the Pledge of Office. A suitable form of words may be crafted for them, just as it has been for the DUP.

Was it for enforced coalition with Sinn Féin that the men and women of the security forces and the unionist community suffered and died? Will we honour their memories by agreeing to share power with those who approved the murders of Patsy Gillespie and Mr Hegarty, and who organised Bloody Friday, Teebane, La Mon, the Droppin' Well, the Shankill fish shop bombing and countless other atrocities? That is the real question for those in the DUP who want to move on by selling their unionist principles for a mess of ministerial pottage. The DUP leadership may be prepared to yield to threats to dissolve the Assembly, but there are those who will never submit to such threats or be bought with salaries, office, honours or patronage.

There is an historical precedent: Marshal Pétain became the First Minister of Vichy France at the cost of his reputation and the people's trust. There is still time for Ian Paisley to avoid a similar fate.

Madam Speaker: Mr McCartney, your time is up. Thank you.

Before I call Mr Nesbitt to make his point of order, I remind Members that a point of order is not an opportunity for debate. It would assist the House if Members would refer to the relevant Standing Order when they raise a point of order. I shall not accept spurious points of order.

Mr Nesbitt: Thank you, Madam Speaker. As a result of Friday's meeting, I wish to make two points of order.

You referred this morning to Friday's meeting, which you said was required under the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006. You also added that you, as Speaker, were not "unfettered". I wish to address that point.

On Friday you made it clear that, in the Standing Orders, this Assembly's purpose was to bring about devolved government:

"in accordance with the St Andrews Agreement."

You quoted from the law. However, to be in accordance with the St Andrews Agreement means to act under the direction of the St Andrews Agreement.

The St Andrews Agreement made it clear that this Assembly would meet on 24 November 2006.

Madam Speaker: Mr Nesbitt, that sounds suspiciously like a debate. Will you refer the House to the relevant Standing Order?

Mr Nesbitt: Yes. I am asking about the direction that you gave to meet on 24 November 2006 to nominate a First Minister. You then moved straight on to a direction that the Secretary of State gave that overturned that direction.

I ask that you give a ruling on the rationale that the Secretary of State used to give that new direction. If, or when, he gives an answer he states that his decision was made for the greater good of Northern Ireland, I ask what credibility he has left.

Madam Speaker: That is not a point of order, Mr Nesbitt. I will answer that question. I am on my feet; can you take your seat. Thank you.

Mr Nesbitt, thank you for your, in some ways, spurious points of order.

Mr Nesbitt: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. May I ask — [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. As I am on my feet, I will now answer your question.

I explained my position in my opening statement this morning and on Friday, and I do not want to add to that. I remind Mr Nesbitt and other Members that it is for the Secretary of State, not the Speaker, to draw any further conclusions from what has already been said. That may not be acceptable to Members, and they may have been disappointed, but that is how we are working at this point.

Adjourned at 10.53 am.

THE TRANSITIONAL ASSEMBLY

Monday 4 December 2006

The Assembly met at 10.30 am (Madam Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

Secretary of State for Northern Ireland

Madam Speaker: Item 2 on the Order Paper is the motion relating to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. One amendment has been selected and published on the Marshalled List. Before the debate begins, I wish to remind Members that I will, as usual, expect them to address their remarks to the motion and the amendment as they appear on the Order Paper and the Marshalled List.

It was agreed by the Business Committee that the House may sit until 6.00 pm. I want to draw the attention of Members to the provisions of Standing Order 11, which relate to “irrelevance or tedious repetition” in speeches. I trust that I will not have to call the attention of the Assembly to anything of this nature.

I also remind the House of my ruling regarding comments of a personal nature and the importance of the dignity of the Chamber, which I made during the Assembly created by the Northern Ireland Act 2006. For your information, on 26 September 2006 I said that:

“it would seem that the proper role of Members of this Chamber would be to comment on, and challenge, the policies of the Government and its Ministers — whether by name or office — in the interests of the electorate. As Speaker, I can think of many occasions since 15 May 2006 on which this has been the case, and I consider that it is perfectly in order for Members to do so.” — [Official Report, Bound Volume 20, p134, col 2].

“However, what I would not consider to be in order, in relation to remarks about members of other legislatures, is where comments stray into the arena of personal insults, vitriol or invective.

I would have no hesitation in asking a Member to temper his or her comments where, in my view, a line has been crossed.” — [Official Report, Bound Volume 20, p134, col 2].

I hope that Members will have the dignity of the House in mind in the remarks that they make today.

[Interruption.]

Order. When the debate has concluded, I shall put the question on the amendment. If the amendment is made, I shall put the question on the motion as amended. If the amendment is not made, I shall put the question on the substantive motion. If that is clear, I shall proceed.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I understand that there is another amendment, tabled by members of my party, which has been rejected. Will you give us the reasons why it was rejected? It is a sad commentary on our discussions, because such an amendment would have been received in the Mother of Parliaments without any opposition from the Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I received your amendment and considered it with my officials. Standing Order 15(c) gives the Speaker the power to select amendments. I did not select that amendment.

Mr P Robinson: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. Are you saying that the amendment was in order but was not chosen?

Madam Speaker: I do not need to give a reason. Members should examine pages 63 and 64 of the ‘Northern Ireland Assembly Companion: Rulings, Convention and Practice’, where it states that:

“it is not appropriate for the Chair to give reasons for accepting or rejecting any amendment.”

I do not intend to breach precedent here, or in other places, by doing so. My door is always open if Dr Paisley wishes to discuss this issue for future sittings.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. Will you advise the House whether the Secretary of State advised you not to take that amendment?

Madam Speaker: I have absolutely no comment to make on that. I remind Dr Paisley and other Members that this is the Transitional Assembly.

Mr Robert McCartney: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. You say that this is the Transitional Assembly. Under the terms of the Transitional Assembly, all matters here are under the control of the Secretary of State — the motions to be chosen, the Standing Orders and the instructions to you, Madam Speaker. Is this a democratic Assembly, or is it a puppet show where the Secretary of State is pulling all the strings?

Madam Speaker: I am not going to comment on the bulk of what the Member has said, other than to ask him to read once again the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006. This is the Transitional Assembly. The Secretary of State does not conduct the business here. The Business Committee agrees what is to be discussed. That is the difference between the Transitional Assembly and the Hain Assembly. Again, my door is open if the Member wants to discuss the issue.

Sir Reg Empey: I beg to move

That this Assembly deplores the interference of the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland in the proceedings of the Assembly on Friday 24 November 2006.

The exchanges that Members have just heard demonstrate why this issue should be ventilated. I will refer specifically to the meeting of the Business Committee on 24 November 2006 regarding the conduct of the debate on that day, and I will consider the Secretary of State's involvement in the so-called designation — or declaration — process on that date.

The first phase of the Hain Assembly — Hain mark I — began on 15 May 2006. At that time, although the Secretary of State had the power to intervene, he repeatedly said that he would allow the Assembly opportunities to decide its own business; that never happened. The Secretary of State has subsequently said that as far as the Transitional Assembly is concerned — and as you, Madam Speaker, repeated a moment ago — he would allow much more freedom for Members to decide their own business. However, on the first day, and subsequent to the first meeting of the Business Committee, the Secretary of State personally intervened and overrode a decision of the Business Committee on a relatively trivial matter.

During the six months of the Hain Assembly, beginning on 15 May, it was clear that the Secretary of State had the power to intervene. Many Members spoke to him on a number of occasions, asking him to allow the Assembly — through you, Madam Speaker, and the Business Committee — to determine business. Time after time, motions were proposed by political parties.

One subject was proposed for debate at virtually every meeting of the Business Committee from 15 May onwards: a motion to debate the review of public administration (RPA). The review is vital to the future of the Province. It concerns many of our constituents, yet for six consecutive months the Secretary of State vetoed debate and refused to allow any motion on the subject. The review is a key point, and an issue of concern and relevance to the future governance of the Province. Organisations that spend vast swathes of the Budget are up for discussion, yet the Secretary of State would not allow Members to debate the RPA. Why would he not allow debate? Perhaps it was because Members might have views that differed from his views. That might be embarrassing for him. Mr Gallagher has now tabled a motion for tomorrow's debate, and Members may then have an opportunity to discuss the subject. It will be interesting to see whether the Secretary of State will intervene or interfere.

I turn now to the Business Committee meeting on the morning of 24 November. The Committee met at 9.15 am to discuss arrangements for the business that was to be dealt with by the Assembly later that morning. The issue of speeches arose. The Committee decided that the two nominating officers and the leaders of the other political parties would each address the Assembly for five minutes. Sinn Féin proposed that its nominee should be allowed to speak, but the Committee decided against that. The position that the two nominating officers and the remaining party leaders would speak was maintained.

The meeting broke up at approximately 9.50 am. Immediately afterwards, one assumes that Sinn Féin Members went to the Secretary of State and complained that their man would not be allowed to speak. The Secretary of State — one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State — then issued a ministerial direction to you, Madam Speaker, to the effect that Mr McGuinness should be allowed to speak. Mr McGuinness spoke a few words of pidgin Irish, followed by an address lasting 37 seconds. It took a Cabinet Minister to intervene to allow that to occur. Yet, Madam Speaker, the Secretary of State had said to us that the Transitional Assembly would be different from the previous Assembly. This situation is scarcely evidence of that. At the first hurdle, the Secretary of State has failed, having intervened — presumably after a representation from Sinn Féin — and issued a ministerial direction to you, Madam Speaker. Yet we are to believe that the Transitional Assembly has a freedom that the Assembly of the previous six months did not have.

10.45 am

On that basis, it is evident that the Secretary of State is still intervening, and the control freaks in the Northern Ireland Office are still saying that they will decide what business is conducted here. If that is the case, Members need to know, and the sooner we know, the better. Nevertheless, the Secretary of State has started to run the Transitional Assembly in exactly the same fashion as he conducted the previous Assembly over the six months from May.

Mr Robert McCartney: Does the Member appreciate that the Speaker's reply to my point of order referred to a very different approach, in that she maintained that the Business Committee, not the Secretary of State, made the necessary decisions? As I understand it, the hon Member is making the case that the Speaker's reply is just not correct.

Sir Reg Empey: That is precisely the case, because I am simply recounting the events of the morning of 24 November, which were that, between 9.50 am and approximately 10.20 am, the Secretary of State received a representation and issued a direction. Madam Speaker, that seems to be inconsistent with the view that he expressed, and the view that you put forward a moment ago, which was that the approach of the Transitional Assembly would be qualitatively different to that of the previous Assembly in that the Business Committee of the Transitional Assembly would have the freedom to decide what business is conducted.

I wish that that were the case, but, at the very first test, it was not the case. In fact, Madam Speaker, on the trivial matter of Members speaking for a few seconds, when their interventions could have had no impact on any decisions that the Assembly would take, the Secretary of State decided to issue a direction. If I am wrong, Sinn Féin Members have the opportunity to get up now to say that that party did not make any representations to the Secretary of State, but I think that that is exactly what it did.

I turn briefly to Sinn Féin's proposed amendment, which would remove the date from the motion, leaving it to read:

"That this Assembly deplores the interference of the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland in the proceedings of the Assembly."

It was Sinn Féin Members who went to the Secretary of State precisely to get him to intervene in the affairs of the Assembly. How can they on the one hand say that they deplore the involvement of the Secretary of State in the proceedings of the Northern Ireland Assembly, yet on the other be the first party to go to him, cap in hand, to ask him to intervene in its proceedings in order that Mr McGuinness can speak for a few seconds?

At the outset of this debate, we must make it clear where we stand with the Secretary of State's involvement. Sinn Féin's amendment has no credibility for the obvious reason that that party was the first to seek the Secretary of State's involvement. The first action that it took was to go to the Secretary of State to bail it out in order that Martin McGuinness could speak after he was nominated. To argue that Sinn Féin's amendment has any credibility is nonsense, and I want to make it clear that the Ulster Unionist Party rejects the amendment and will vote against it.

With regard to some of the other matters, my colleagues —

By the way, Madam Speaker, as the clocks are not functioning, I do not know how much time remains for my contribution. [Laughter.]

Madam Speaker: Order. I have two points to make: last week, the Business Committee decided that there would be no limitation on time for any Member who wishes to speak and that Members would have as long as possible in which to make their contributions. However, I hope that Members realise that we are listening to them, which is why I made the comment about there being no tedious repetition. Of course, Sir Reg would not be guilty of that. Secondly, the difference between the Transitional Assembly and the previous Assembly is shown in today's debate, which was agreed last week, and tomorrow's debate. Every Member, including myself, knows that the Secretary of State governs the Assembly.

That is clear. Everyone knows that that is what the St Andrews Agreement meant — that this is now, in a way, the Hain Assembly mark II. I want people to be clear about that. The Business Committee can decide the order of business, and it has done so for today and tomorrow.

Lord Morrow: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. You have just clarified that the Business Committee decided that speaking time today would be unlimited. That was not clear. The matter was so unclear that your staff had to ring Members in order to ascertain their views. I gave my view; I understood that speeches would be limited to 15 minutes and 10 minutes. The Business Committee never made the matter clear.

Madam Speaker: The Business Committee will deal with that issue. My understanding was that we were to have an open debate.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. Will you tell the House when you propose that the debate will end?

Madam Speaker: I have already told the House that the debate will end at 6.00 pm.

Sir Reg Empey: Madam Speaker, you are making some of my points for me. You said that the Business Committee would determine which debates would take place. However, my contention is that that has already proved not to be the case. The Secretary of State has already intervened — at the first meeting of the Business Committee — on a trivial matter. Ostensibly, there is an alleged freedom to decide, but your response to the Member for North Down Mr Robert McCartney confirms that the Secretary of State can do anything at the drop of a hat. I was going to make an appeal to him to get the clocks right, but you have now decided that there will be no limit on contributions to the debate.

My colleague Mr McFarland will address in detail some other matters pertaining to 24 November, but it would be remiss of us not to put that day into context. The Secretary of State's involvement in that, and in other matters, was far-reaching and well known in advance. The date of 24 November was built up as a huge issue. For months, the Secretary of State had been saying that he was setting a deadline, and that if certain events did not take place on that day, this place would fold. For nine months, he berated us on the money that we received as Members and for the cost of this place, yet spending £0.5 million on the St Andrews talks did not seem to bother him or his colleagues. Nevertheless, he said that unless we were doing our jobs by 24 November, he would close this place, and we would be finished.

That went on for months, and the general public were concerned that we were unable to carry out our functions fully. That is not the fault of most people in the Chamber who want to carry out their full functions but have been prevented from doing so since 2002. We will go into that issue on another day. The Secretary of State berated us for the cost of this place and then told us that he would close it down on 24 November if certain events did not take place. He wanted the First Minister designate and the Deputy First Minister designate to be clearly identified on 24 November. That was inserted into the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006, which states:

"The proceedings to be conducted by the Transitional Assembly shall include the making of nominations from among its members of persons to hold office as First Minister and deputy First Minister".

As we got closer to 24 November, a different language entered the debate. We were not to have designation or shadow Ministers; declarations of intent came into the picture. That would be the line drawn in the sand. Subsequently, declarations of intent became qualified declarations of an intention to do something at some future point — perhaps — and so it went on and on.

Even at a casual glance, it would seem that schedule 1 to the 2006 Act has already been breached. Later, Members will examine the anatomy of that day more closely. However, I must recall the comments of the noble Member Lord Morrow, who addressed the Chamber on 26 September 2006. He said:

"Members have been told that 24 November is destiny day." — [Official Report, Bound Volume 20, p168, col 1].

Let us remember the words "destiny day", Madam Speaker.

"That day will come and go, the rain will fall as often as ever, and the sun will shine as infrequently as ever, but anyone who is holding their breath for 24 November can forget about it. I state clearly: those people can forget about 24 November because nothing will happen." — [Official Report, Bound Volume 20, p168, col 1].

It is not pantomime time yet.

Some Members: Oh yes it is.

Madam Speaker: Order. It is not pantomime time yet.

Sir Reg Empey: I fear, Madam Speaker — and Mystic Meg will rest easy in her bed — that Lord Morrow's psychic powers of anticipation are perhaps not as accurate as he would normally expect. On a number of occasions, I looked at his comments that the sun would shine and the rain would fall, and I wondered what was his political message to Members in September. I came to the conclusion that he was not sending us a political message but giving us the weather forecast. [Laughter.]

On a more serious note, Members need to climb an enormous mountain if we are to gain any credibility with the public. If Members are not able to decide on the simple matter of what we debate and how we debate it, what credibility do we have? According to the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006 and to another deadline that the Secretary of State has set, within a few months the Chamber is supposed to be responsible for a £12 billion Budget, for legislation and administration. However, we are not sufficiently responsible to conduct our own business. Madam Speaker, that is my fundamental point.

Members must indicate clearly that they should be permitted to decide and conduct their business without let or hindrance from the Secretary of State, provided they are operating within the law — and I think that there is already a question mark over that, after the events of 24 November. That is the thrust of what Members should be doing. Without any disrespect — this is not a personal issue — but if the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland is to give any credibility to this Assembly, he must make it clear that if people go running to him asking for his help to do this or that, saying that the nasty people in the Assembly would not let them speak, that sort of argument is no good to anyone. Members must take responsibility for themselves. I urge Members to support the motion.

Mr Adams: I beg to move the following amendment: Leave out all after the second "Assembly".

Tairgim an leasú, a Cheann Comhairle.

I listened with great interest to what our Friend had to say. He predicated his whole case on what he described as a "trivial matter".

11.00 am

I was thinking to myself that some people looking in on today's debate are victims of the crisis in the health services, are worried about water rates being imposed or are witnesses to the decline of our rural communities. As we face Christmas, some people are badly affected by poverty. I moved the amendment because I wondered what all those people would think of the little tête-à-tête between the UUP and the DUP. Members may have noted the report into collusion from the Oireachtas, which is the Dublin Parliament. I wonder what people who are part of that dreadful part of our history will think of the motion.

The motion is not about the British Secretary of State but about the battle within unionism. The paranoia that Sinn Féin causes both main unionist parties to suffer, and some of the very small parties echo that paranoia, advantages no one. It has not been to the advantage of any of the Members who have spoken today. Nationalists, republicans and democrats will naturally take some pleasure from any motion that is critical of a British Secretary of State, especially if it comes from unionists. However, Sinn Féin's view is that the motion does not go far enough. It is not good enough to say that Members want a British Secretary of State not to interfere on only one day. Sinn Féin does not want him to interfere at all.

Whatever we think of British Secretaries of State on a personal level, they are a breed of politician whose task is to promote and defend Britain's self-interest in Ireland. I am sure that all Members agree that they do that above all other interests — above the interests of the DUP, the UUP, Sinn Féin, the SDLP, the Alliance Party or anyone else. They do so above and beyond the interests of the people of the North, or, indeed, of this island.

Peter Hain has deservedly attracted a reputation for having bad judgement. He has made a series of bad judgements: the appointment of the Interim Commissioner for Victims; appointments to the Parades Commission; his opposition to an Irish language Act; and his creation of the Hain Assembly and now the Transitional Assembly. All have been about pandering to unionism. Despite that, do unionist Members here feel any greater affection for Peter Hain or British Secretaries of State? No.

Níl grá ar bith ann — there is no love at all in it. It is all about expediency, which is nothing new. Whether it was British Lord Lieutenants in Dublin Castle or British Secretaries of State in Stormont Castle, all Britain's colonial viceroys have used the usual techniques of divide and conquer — bribery, threat and corruption — to promote their own interests. When those interests coincide with the interests of unionism, a Cheann Comhairle, unionists and the British are partners. However, when those interests do not coincide, the truth is that the British Government's interests, not Irish unionists' interests, take priority.

It is often said — and unionists are better judges of this than I am — that unionists have no real loyalty to the British Government. Be that as it may, one thing is certain: the British Government have no real loyalty to the unionists. If all Members were sufficiently moved to give voice, we could all agree on that. Members on the Benches on this side of the House labour on in the hope that colleagues on the Benches opposite will one day liberate themselves and realise that none of us needs British interference in our affairs.

The UUP, DUP and others currently consider their self-interest to be served through the connection with Britain, irrespective of their distrust and disdain for British Governments. I commend to our unionist colleagues another motion, which was passed at the first formal meeting of the Society of the United Irishmen in Belfast more than 200 years ago. I understand that Willie McCrea was not there on that day. [Laughter.]

That resolution — éistigí liom — is very pertinent to today's motion, as it has a really interesting historical echo —

Madam Speaker: It would need to be, Mr Adams.

Mr Adams: It is, absolutely:

“That the weight of the English influence in the government of this country is so great as to require a cordial union among the people of Ireland to maintain that balance which is essential to the preservation of our liberties and the extension of our commerce.”

Reg Empey spoke of the need to have the freedom to decide what we want to do. That resolution spoke of “the preservation of our liberties”. Most of those who were involved in that great enterprise were Presbyterians: people such as Samuel Neilson from Ballroney; Mary Ann McCracken and her brother Henry Joy McCracken, who was hanged in High Street in Belfast; Rev Sinclair Kelburn; Rev William Steele Dickson; Jemmy Hope, who was a Templepatrick man; Henry Monro from Lisburn; and John Robb from Ballynahinch. Last Friday, a Cheann Comhairle — [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr Adams: Last Friday, the DUP met at Templepatrick, and I heard Ian Óg, on the way in, appealing to his party to remember that republicans are the real enemy. Templepatrick has a proud Presbyterian republican history. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr Adams: The Presbyterians, led by Henry Joy McCracken, left from there and from Mallusk to take Antrim and begin —

Madam Speaker: Order. That is all very interesting, Mr Adams, but please keep to the motion.

Mr Adams: I am speaking to the amendment.

They began a process to create a new society that was based on the principles of equality, fraternity and liberty.

Dr McCrea: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Was the Secretary of State involved 200 years ago as well? [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. I am on my feet, and I am speaking. Thank you. Mr Adams is speaking to the amendment. I do not know how old the Secretary of State is.

Mr Weir: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Do you have any power to reconsider the time limit on speeches? The Member opposite has reached only 1798; how long will it take him to get to 24 November 2006? [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. I take the Member's point on board; it is very relevant. I have already asked Mr Adams to keep to the amendment, and I do have the authority, as Members know, to curtail Members' speeches or to speed them up. Mr Adams, please continue.

Mr Adams: My points are entirely pertinent. We have a motion that calls merely for an end to interference on one given day and an amendment that seeks an end to all interference. Given that the DUP met in Templepatrick, and given that its members are Presbyterians, I thought that it was important to cite that historical example of which the DUP may not be aware. I think that the House would be pleased if everyone here were conscious of those facts.

The British Secretary of State is treated with great scorn by Members on the Benches opposite. Why is that? Why do they not send him packing? Why do they not take upon themselves the power to be part of the political institutions? Rather than propose motions that are based on trivial matters — and I use their own words — Members should get down to the real business of conflict resolution, start to build some confidence and trust, not just in these institutions, but in each other, and deal with the social and economic issues that people face.

The motion has nothing to do with Peter Hain or the British Government. It is about antagonism and competition between the UUP and the DUP. Our amendment is wide because, as I have said, Sinn Féin is against any British Government interference in Irish affairs. Like the republican Presbyterians who gathered at Templepatrick, Sinn Féin supports a cordial union among all the people of Ireland that will maintain that balance, which is essential for the preservation of our liberties and the extension of our commerce.

Sin é; go raibh maith agat.

Madam Speaker: Before I call Dr Paisley, I want to make one comment. Lord Morrow made reference to the Business Committee meeting. It was said at that meeting that Members wanted to speak at length to today's and tomorrow's motions, and that is why there are no time restrictions on the debates. However, Members should use their judgement.

Lord Morrow: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Do you accept that there was confusion? Had there not been confusion, your staff would not have been ringing Members to ascertain —

Madam Speaker: I have accepted the Member's point, and, as I have said, we will discuss it at the Business Committee meeting tomorrow.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Members have listened to an interesting extract from republican propaganda history. However, I inform the Member who has spoken that he does not discern between Presbyterians and Unitarians. The Presbyterian Synod — the Synod of Ulster — was totally opposed to the rebellion. Those who were named as Presbyterians were Arians or Unitarians.

Mr Adams: On a point of order. Does the Member accept that all the people whose names I read out were Presbyterians?

Madam Speaker: That is not a point of order.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: I do not want to give the Member a lecture on Hodge's theology, but I recommend that he reads it in his spare time: even better, he should read the Bible and get it at first hand.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: It is absolute nonsense and a perversion of history to be told that the Presbyterians of Northern Ireland were all lined up in an act to undermine proper democratic government and break the British link. I am glad that the Member mentioned Templepatrick, which was first evangelised by a grandson of John Knox — and my theology is very close to that of John Knox. There was such a split in the Presbyterian Church in Templepatrick at that time that no one would give the Trinitarian Presbyterians any ground, and they had to build their church outside Templepatrick. The Unitarian church is inside Templepatrick, behind its walls, and the Presbyterian church is outside, about two miles away. There was a distinct difference, and the Member needs to remember that difference.

However, we are not fighting to be British: we are British. The Member eulogises those who are republican, and if he wants to do that, that is his business. However, I have as much right to stand by my faith, my patriotism and my nationality. I am a British subject in an Assembly that is part of the United Kingdom, and I am entitled to refute the propaganda that Members have been forced to listen to today. The DUP's amendment, which was refused, did not cover only one matter.

It covered matters such as water charging, the review of public administration, the review of rating, post-primary education, rural planning, and an economic package for Northern Ireland. It did not cover one particular matter and forget about the rest; my party believes that all those matters are important to the people of Northern Ireland and that they should all be discussed. I said to the leader of IRA/Sinn Féin that he had better listen to the majority of the unionist population, which is getting restless, because, seemingly, he does not intend to keep to the —

Mr Adams: On a point of order.

Madam Speaker: Before you make your point of order, Mr Adams, I remind Dr Paisley — although I am sure that he does not need to be reminded — that he must address his remarks through the Chair.

Mr Adams: A Cheann Comhairle, Dr Paisley made the point that he is a British subject and that he has his views, which he is entitled to put to the House. I assent to that fully. He mentioned the leader of IRA/Sinn Féin. There is no party in the Assembly called IRA/Sinn Féin. The party that he refers to is called Sinn Féin.

Madam Speaker: Thank you, Mr Adams. I am sure that everyone knows that.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Evidently, members of the British Government and the Tory Party do not know it, for that is how they refer to that party. One of those members, who was Prime Minister at the time, referred to that party as "IRA/Sinn Féin". Some people have accused me of softness, because sometimes I use all sorts of terms against the IRA. I deliberately use that term today to show that my enemies, who claim that I have gone soft, are not telling the truth. The leader of that party will surely call it whatever he wants. However, in the House, I will retain the right to say what I believe is absolutely proper.

Mr Adams: On a point of order.

Madam Speaker: I remind Members that we have all signed the Roll of Membership. No Member's name is on the roll with the term "IRA/Sinn Féin" next to it.

Mr Adams: I ask you to make a ruling on the matter, which I would like to speak about for a moment, if I may.

Madam Speaker: It would be inappropriate to do so at this stage. However, you may speak to me after the debate.

Mr O'Dowd: On a point of order, a Cheann Comhairle. Will you make a ruling on the position that has been taken by Members from the Benches opposite?

Madam Speaker: I will make the ruling at my discretion. I have already made a comment that every Member should listen to.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Perhaps it is a good omen that the party opposite is ashamed at being called IRA men. I hope that that will continue and that there will be an epidemic in that party of repudiating that which it has eulogised for many a long day.

I was surprised at the Member's comment that Members should unite for their own preservation. It is some preservation when one thinks about the murders that have been committed in our Province. It is some preservation when one thinks about the young and the old who have been murdered. It is some preservation when one thinks of those from every religious body — Roman Catholic, Protestant and others — who have been murdered by IRA/Sinn Féin. Those matters concern us all, and we must underline them in this debate.

I would like the Secretary of State, as a result of this debate, to move away from his past and be regenerate to the fact that he lives in a part of Ireland — the Province of Ulster, as we call it — that is part of the United Kingdom. I hope that he will remember his past pronouncements and past criticisms of Northern Ireland and that those will cease and that he will be converted to getting the best for the people of Northern Ireland. Certainly, the way in which he has acted in past days, as far as this Assembly is concerned — and the first Assembly as well — shows exactly the manner of man that he is. However, he too could know regeneration. I hope that he will know it and realise that the people of this Province — unionist, Roman Catholic and nationalist — all have a right to express their particular convictions within the law. They should see to it that they do so within the law.

I want to make a plea to the leader of the party opposite: we are all waiting to hear him say that he will support the police and that he will abide by the conditions that are laid down in the St Andrews Agreement. The sooner that we hear that, the better for us all.

Mr A Maginness: Having listened to the exchange between Dr Paisley and Mr Adams and to their various views of history, my conclusion is that they should perhaps combine those views and produce another short history of Ireland that might be acceptable to the people here. We have heard many history lessons this morning. However, I did not come to this Assembly to listen to a history lesson, and I certainly did not come to hear the rather condescending view of history that has been expressed by Gerry Adams. That view would do credit to a GCSE Irish history class.

This Assembly's time would be better spent, not in exchanging views on Irish history and seeking solutions to the present in the past, but in looking at the present and trying to address some of the problems of the present. We should examine seriously the problems that exist in our political system and try to resolve them.

Mr Adams's view is that the Secretary of State panders to unionists. The Secretary of State has pandered to more than unionism. He has indeed pandered to the DUP, and, at times, to other elements within unionism; however, he is not above pandering to Sinn Féin, and, in particular, to Mr Adams. He pandered to Sinn Féin in relation to on-the-runs, and it was pressure that the SDLP brought that got that despicable piece of legislation on that matter reversed. Nonetheless, that was an example of the Secretary of State pandering to Sinn Féin, as he has done on many occasions. In fact, Sinn Féin has spent more time at 10 Downing Street than any other party in this House. Sinn Féin's strategy has been to ingratiate itself with the British Government to get them to do things on its behalf. That is the reality of the situation.

Mr Robert McCartney: The Member will remember, in connection with the very point that he makes about pandering to Sinn Féin, a British Prime Minister's remark when the SDLP complained at Weston Park that its views were not being listened to, yet those of the panderers beside him were. The response to the SDLP was: "You have no guns." Perhaps that is the cause of the pandering to Sinn Féin.

Mr A Maginness: The whole issue of political violence, as exercised by the republican movement, certainly had an important effect on the British Government's policy.

Mr O'Dowd: Will the Member take a point of information?

Madam Speaker: There is no such thing as a point of information.

Mr O'Dowd: In that case, will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: Unlike Mr Adams, I will.

Mr O'Dowd: Thank you. The Member seems to forget that the British Government listen to us because of our massive mandate.

Mr A Maginness: I remind the Member that, in the 1970s, the 1980s and the early 1990s, the SDLP had an overwhelming mandate from the nationalist community. Mr Adams and his colleagues ignored that mandate. Sinn Féin ignored it, and the republican movement continued to carry out acts of violence — political violence — to achieve political ends. It had no mandate from the nationalist community, either North or South, to do that. However, Mr Adams would today criticise people in his constituency who use political violence, because, he says, they are microgroups that have no political mandate. Remember, however, that the IRA was a microgroup that never had an electoral mandate to impose misery, violence, death and destruction on the Irish people.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr A Maginness: Let me remind Sinn Féin of that historical fact.

Friday 24 November was not this Assembly's best day. In fact, it was a grave disappointment, and it caused universal dismay and disgust on the part of the people. It was said earlier that Lord Morrow had previously described 24 November as a day on which "nothing will happen." — [Official Report, Bound Volume 20, p168, col 1].

I ask Lord Morrow this question: if nothing happened on that day, as he had predicted, why did he and 11 of his colleagues, now infamously dubbed the "dirty dozen", issue a statement? [Laughter.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr A Maginness: Why, if nothing happened —

Mr Campbell: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I understood that the term was the 12 apostles.

Mr A Maginness: I suppose that that is theologically more sound. [Laughter.]

Mr McMenamin: Look out for Judas. [Laughter.]

Mr A Maginness: Which one?

11.30 am

Madam Speaker, if nothing happened on that day, why did those 12 Members go to the trouble of issuing that epistle, to use the biblical language of Mr Campbell? The reason was that the tensions in the DUP are so grave, and so intense, that it is divided and frightened. The party is frightened of a future in which the people in this society can work together in partnership in order to solve the problems that I mentioned at the beginning of my address.

They are frightened that the old certainties of sectarian politics will be demolished and will melt or be eroded by people working together in partnership. That point should be made by all in the House who are committed to a non-sectarian, democratic future. We have to work together to form the Administration.

I took heart from what Dr Paisley said to Gerry Adams this morning. He said that if Gerry Adams gets his act together on law and order and shows commitment to the rule of law, the police and the legal process, Dr Paisley will join him in a power-sharing Administration. That is the challenge for Sinn Féin in the Assembly.

There is an equal challenge for Lord Morrow and the rest of the doubters in Dr Paisley's party: to recognise that they can no longer live in a sectarian block and hope that society can make progress. We have to work together, and we have to create a partnership. That is the challenge for Dr Paisley, although some members of his party may not be up to it. The disappointment felt by people on 24 November was occasioned by the fact that there was no clear statement from Dr Paisley and his colleagues giving the certainty that was necessary to people outside the Chamber.

The people of Northern Ireland want certainty in politics. They want the certainty that they are going forward and that they will not have to live in a sectarian morass any longer — they want to be lifted out of it. They want the certainty of a future in which people can live together in sustained peace. That is what people wanted on 24 November, and that is what they did not get. It was not the intervention of a third party that caused the fiasco on 24 November; it was the failure of the DUP to assert that it was going forward in the joint office of First Minister and Deputy First Minister. That is what caused the disappointment and dismay in people's minds.

That disappointment further devalued politics in the House and in our society. Our reputation is very low, and it has been diminished individually and collectively. This is not about people losing faith in the DUP, the SDLP, Sinn Féin or the Ulster Unionists: it is about people losing faith in politics itself. Politicians must give leadership. They cannot hide — like Sinn Féin and the DUP — behind Secretaries of State. They have to be brave and show people that they are ready to face the challenges of office.

We can blame the Secretary of State, and I share the criticisms that have been made of him this morning. However, in this situation, the Secretary of State is more sinned against than sinning. We politicians are guilty collectively of the greater sin of not taking the opportunity to come together, create a power-sharing Executive and restore the other institutions of the Good Friday Agreement.

Public confidence is diminishing, and it will diminish further unless we get our act together. We have an opportunity to do that, and we should do it now.

Mr Ford: The motion and the reaction to it in the Chamber show how easy it is to take cheap shots at the Secretary of State. It is great fun, and we all enjoy it. However, I do not see the Galleries filled with his officials staring down at us. A man who does not seem to take much notice of what the courts say is unlikely to take much notice of an Assembly that is bound to him.

We are not here just because of the failures of the Secretary of State, although it would be pleasant to enumerate them all, and we could spend hours doing so. We are here because of the failures of the parties that have responsibility in the Chamber — failures that span many years — and in particular the failure of the two largest parties to live up to their obligations under the St Andrews Agreement. They negotiated those obligations with the two Governments over a period of weeks, not just the three days in St Andrews, but have completely failed to do what they were supposed to do within the prescribed timescales, and all this has arisen from that. Of course, the first four years of the Assembly were not exactly a success for the two parties that led that Administration.

Sir Reg Empey talked about the meeting of the Business Committee that set up the arrangements for the plenary sitting on 24 November, about what was supposed to happen, who was or was not supposed to speak and who did or did not run to the Secretary of State to demand an opportunity. I must confess that I lost the thread slightly; I am not clear whether Sir Reg's principal objection is that Martin McGuinness's Irish is not very good or that he took only 37 seconds to say what he said. That was about the level of Sir Reg's complaint.

So what? The real issue of the interference in the Assembly's processes that day is not about whether Martin McGuinness did or did not speak. It is about the Secretary of State's demand that words be said in that Chamber that imply that people had lived up to their commitments when they patently had not — and everyone in the Chamber knew that they had not. My complaint is that the Secretary of State forced the Speaker of this Assembly, who should be bound to this Assembly, to make an utterly false statement. We should care about that type of issue if we want to move forward.

Mr Hussey: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I am referring to the Standing Orders under which we are currently operating. In support of Mr Ford, and pursuant to Standing Order 2(a), I ask for your determination on the implementation of Standing Order 20.

Madam Speaker: I shall come back to you. Thank you for that point.

Mr Ford: I am sure that we all look forward to hearing your ruling on that point of order once you have consulted the necessary paperwork.

The real issue is not whether Martin McGuinness did or did not speak, or in which language. The issue is the continual interference of the Secretary of State in misinterpreting the comments made by parties and by party spokesmen, both within and without the Chamber, in order to maintain the pretence that there has been progress when there has been none.

Adding to the mistrust, disappointment and annoyance that the people of Northern Ireland feel when they see this charade in the Chamber, attempts are made to show that things are being done. However, it seems that the interests of the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister demand that that pretence be maintained, and the interests of the DUP and Sinn Féin demand that that pretence be made, even though nothing at all is happening.

In winding up his speech, Sir Reg Empey said that the fundamental point was that our credibility depends on our ability to arrange business in the Chamber. It is not. The fundamental point is that the credibility of Members of this Assembly depends on their ability to face up to the difficult agenda that is ahead of them, take the difficult decisions, get on with forming an Administration and do the work that needs to be done. There is no sign whatsoever that the parties that aspire to sit in the Executive are living up to that.

The St Andrews Agreement was a deal between the British and Irish Governments, the DUP and Sinn Féin; the Ulster Unionist Party and the SDLP have said that they support the agreement. Those four parties have taken seats on the Programme for Government Committee and are clearly and publicly stating their intention to get on with the formation of a Government. However, the kind of debates held in the Chamber, the kind of exchanges that occur in the press, the failure of anything constructive to come from the discussions over the summer in the Preparation for Government Committee and its subgroup on economic challenges show just how much those parties still have to do. Why do they not get on with it? Instead of having pointless debates in the Chamber, why do those parties not show that the work will be done and that they will move forward?

The experience of the previous Executive, which operated for three years, showed that there was real difficulty in tackling the issues that matter to the people of Northern Ireland. Where was the collective action to improve health and social services or education? Why was nothing done to clean up the environment, deal with the mess that is public transport or improve the finances of Northern Ireland? That would have obviated the meaningless statement from the Chancellor and the Secretary of State a month ago. Most fundamentally, why did the Executive do nothing to take forward the 'Shared Future' agenda, and why are they still doing nothing to show a commitment to it?

Madam Speaker: Mr Ford, the motion relates to the events of 24 November.

Mr Ford: If we are looking at what went wrong on 24 November, we need to examine the historical context. After all, the Sinn Féin leader managed to go back as far as 1798. I was hoping not to go back that far, although, as a Presbyterian from the presbytery of Templepatrick, I find it a fairly interesting subject.

I was disappointed that, in his pantheon of Presbyterian heroes, Mr Adams failed to mention William Orr, who is a distant relation of my wife. Perhaps he will manage to mention him the next time that we get around to that debate. William Orr is buried only 200 yards or so from where the DUP met last week. He would have been a relevant example to that party.

Gerry Adams's comments about the history of 1798 are fundamentally irrelevant to where this Assembly stands today, just as the DUP leader's theological discourse is fundamentally irrelevant, because where we stand today concerns the obligations of those Members' parties. Ian Paisley was quite right when he faced across the Chamber and said that he wanted to hear Sinn Féin's commitment to the rule of law, but when did we hear the commitment from the DUP?

The failure of the DUP to engage with other parties and to stand up to its obligations under the St Andrews Agreement simply lets Sinn Féin off the hook completely on the issues of justice and the rule of law. It is easy for the DUP to make points about those issues, but that party's utter failure to engage in what it should have been doing feeds the position whereby the Secretary of State continues to interfere in the Chamber, and nobody else does anything to move issues forward.

Alban Maginness was correct when he spoke about the problems in Sinn Féin and the DUP. However, he rather ignored the time between 1999 and 2002, when the British Government spent most of their time, and virtually all their effort, pandering to the Ulster Unionist Party and the SDLP. In seeking to make the then Executive work rather better than it did, the British Government failed again. I disagree with Alban Maginness when he says that something happened on 24 November in the Chamber, because nothing happened. Nobody could suggest with any grain of truth that the necessary obligation was forthcoming from the DUP.

My complaint is not that the Secretary of State interfered at that point but that he interfered at that point to pretend that black was white and that there was progress, when patently there was none.

It seems that Sir Reg Empey's motion arises out of the confusion of 24 November, but there is also much confusion in his party. Its members are confused over whether to attack the DUP for having done a deal or for not having done a deal. When DUP members themselves cannot decide whether they did or did not do a deal, it is difficult and confusing for Ulster Unionists to know how to attack them.

It really is time for Ulster Unionists to try to act in a constructive and meaningful way as they pretended to act in the first few years of the first Northern Ireland Assembly. They should stop adding to the confusion and difficulty. If politics is to be seen to work in this place, there are obligations on Members from all parties. It is time for people to stop picking fights and pointing fingers. It is time for all parties to live up to their obligations.

Lord Morrow: As one of the Members who has been most used and abused here this morning, I find it interesting that no one has been able to refute what I have said. I listened intently to my colleague Sir Reg Empey when he addressed the House. He felt compelled to name me. It is interesting that he agrees that I got it right on two counts: I got the weather right, and I got the fact that nothing was going to happen on 24 November right. I like an honest man. I like a man who acknowledges the fact that a person gets something right, a man who is prepared to stand up and say that a person has got something right. I want to place on record my thanks to Sir Reg for being so honest. I suspect that he had other motives, but we will not go into them.

This morning we listened to Sinn Féin/IRA boldly declaiming an elegy on history that has been warped, to say the least. However, is not all of its thinking warped? Its members have tried to put out the hand to unionism, and I simply wonder if it is the same hand that they have been holding out for the past 35 years. Is this their idea of a way forward? Is this their idea of covering up?

The leader of my party and I had a very sobering experience last week. We met an elderly woman who is over 80 years of age, a mother who pines for a son who was abducted and was never seen again. The people sitting opposite me could help that lady if they wanted to, but they point-blank refuse to do so.

The challenge to Sinn Féin/IRA today is this: if you are changing, let those changes be seen and be noticeable, because anything less will not do. If you think for one single, solitary second that you are going to get away with some bland statement about supporting the police in order to be fast-tracked into the Government — and I hope that Sir Reg is listening intently because I am going to make another prophesy — the answer here and now is: forget it. If there is any part of that that you do not understand, I will give way to you on this occasion, and it is not often that I give way to Sinn Féin/IRA.

Madam Speaker: Lord Morrow, I ask you to keep to the motion.

Lord Morrow: Yes, I will.

Mr McElduff: Can I ask that the contributor from the DUP speak through the Chair? I would appreciate that.

Madam Speaker: Order. Lord Morrow knows that he must speak through the Chair. I have asked him to keep to the motion, and he has agreed to do so.

Lord Morrow: You had brought that matter to my attention before the Member stood up, Madam Speaker. You know that I tend to do that all the time, anyway.

Why does Sinn Féin not support the police today? Why not last week, why not next week? I will tell Members why — Sinn Féin has been promised something more. Let the message go to the Secretary of State, the Prime Minister and anyone else who wants to listen: the more one concedes to those people, the more resolute unionism will become. Pushover unionism is gone. Its Members are sitting quietly in a corner of the Chamber today, with nothing to say any more; they are in the history books, and that is where they will stay. People caught them on.

Mr Nesbitt: Having been accused of being silenced, I must ask a question of Lord Morrow. At the weekend, Mr Hay said that Sinn Féin had to deliver on policing before the DUP would commit in any way to power sharing. However, the DUP executive committee statement on 9 November said that it was not required to commit. A non-requirement does not mean that the party will never commit. I contend that the DUP did indeed commit. Perhaps Lord Morrow will tell me which side of the DUP he is on; is he on the side of Mr Hay's statement or on that of the executive committee statement of 9 November? They are not the same.

Lord Morrow: Madam Speaker, I can only suggest that when the hon Member has something to say, he should stand up and say it. [Laughter.]

Madam Speaker: Order. Thank you, Mr Nesbitt. Lord Morrow, please continue.

Lord Morrow: I listened intently to what Mr Maginness had to say — Mr Maginness of the SDLP, that is.

Mr A Maginness: The real one.

Lord Morrow: The Member said that, not I.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: He has Protestant blood in his veins. Do not be too hard on him.

Lord Morrow: He is the real one, then.

He was quite vociferous in naming others and me as the "dirty dozen". Sitting right behind him were two of his colleagues who have suffered considerably at the hands of thugs and republicans for being courageous enough to take a stand on the side of law and order. Perhaps my commendation will not enhance the situation for them.

However, Mr Maginness would have been better to turn his arrows on those who have tried to drive the likes of Mr Ramsey and Mr McMenamin from their homes, burned their vehicles, smashed their windows and otherwise intimidated them. It is they whom Mr Maginness should deal with today. He should ask them why they are so reluctant to support law and order when his party has had the courage to take a positive stand. He should have defended his colleagues on those issues.

Mr A Maginness: It is obvious that Lord Morrow did not listen to my speech. I made it very plain that it was Sinn Féin's duty, obligation and challenge to accept policing and the rule of law.

Lord Morrow: I have heard what the Member has said. However, let the message go out loud and clear from the House: if we are to return to a normal society, there must be unequivocal support for policing, justice, and law and order. If that is painful for some, too bad: if they want to be democrats, they must act like democrats. They cannot simply talk like democrats; they must act like democrats.

Mr O'Dowd: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. You ruled the DUP amendment out of order, but it appears that the Member is speaking to his amendment. Sinn Féin is more than happy to set time aside in which to debate it at length, but it appears —

Madam Speaker: Mr O'Dowd, once again I remind you that I am the Speaker, and I make the rules here. I also ask you, Lord Morrow, once again to keep to the motion, or to the amendment if you wish to support that.

Lord Morrow: I thought that I was doing that, because I was responding to what has been said. If it is in order for others to say something, it must be in order for me to respond to them. However, I am almost finished.

There has been a missed opportunity in the House today concerning the motion. Every MLA whom I hear on the radio, read in the press or see on the television says that we need an Assembly to tackle the bread-and-butter issues. How true that is. DUP Members made an honest attempt to do that. We wanted to talk about an economic package, the review of public administration — and I welcome the fact that it will be discussed and debated tomorrow — support for the police, and water rates and charges. The Assembly should be discussing those issues today, but alas, the opportunity has not been afforded to us, and it is being missed.

Madam Speaker: Thank you, Lord Morrow. That issue will be discussed at tomorrow's Business Committee meeting.

Ms Gildernew: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

I support what the Sinn Féin president, Gerry Adams, said this morning about the motion, our amendment and the interference of Peter Hain in our business. In order to examine that, we must look at the historical implications of the British Government's involvement in our country. As they did in every country that they colonised, they caused trouble and strife, created disharmony, pillaged the natural resources and murdered those who stood up to the might of the British Empire.

When the Irish potato harvest failed in the nineteenth century, the rest of the crops and livestock were shipped out to England by the ton.

Mr McMenamin: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I cannot hear the Member from where I am sitting.

Madam Speaker: You are correct, Mr McMenamin; it is difficult to hear even from here. Perhaps, Ms Gildernew, Members would be able to hear what you are saying if you slowed down.

Lord Morrow: Talk a wee bit slower.

Madam Speaker: That is what I just said, Lord Morrow.

Ms Gildernew: When the potato harvest failed in the nineteenth century — [Interruption.]

You can hear me now, Maurice, can you?

The rest of the crops were shipped out of our country by the ton. Absentee landlords squeezed every penny out of their tenants, and millions of people starved or were forced to emigrate.

Madam Speaker: I know that we have had many history lessons this morning. Please move on to the amendment, if that is what you are speaking to. I am not sure of the relevance of your comments. If you can make them relevant, I will listen.

Ms Gildernew: I am making them relevant, Madam Speaker. I have listened to some of the other contributions today, and my comments are no less relevant than some others that I have heard.

Madam Speaker: That is your opinion; it is not mine.

Ms Gildernew: The effect of the pogrom on the Irish people is still felt in parts of our country, and when the Irish people have demanded their independence over the generations — whether in 1798, which Gerry Adams has already mentioned, or in the 1916 rising, when the men and women called for a new Ireland where all the children of the nation would be treated equally — they have been met by the might of the British Empire. The brutality of the resistance to the rising was disgraceful, even by British standards. James Connolly was murdered by a firing squad while propped up on a chair.

The democratic will of the Irish people was also ignored when the election results in 1921, which showed overwhelming support for a 32-county republic, were overruled. The Irish people have been treated with absolute contempt throughout the generations, and that has not changed in 800 years.

This British Secretary of State is only one —

Mr K Robinson: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Does the Member accept that, in the historical period to which she refers, the population of unionists in what is now the Republic of Ireland dropped dramatically? Does she class them as Irish people and part of the Irish nation?

Madam Speaker: Mr Robinson, that is not a point of order; you are merely referring to the speech.

Ms Gildernew: That is not a point of order. I am also worried about the hundreds of young people — unionist and nationalist — who leave here to be educated in other parts of the world and do not return.

What we are doing here is important, and we should encourage all those people to stay to build that new Ireland.

12.00 noon

For generations, the Irish people have been treated with contempt. This British Secretary of State is only one of a list who have acted with impunity. Peter Hain's actions demonstrate that he is no different to those who have treated the will of the Irish people with disdain. Sinn Féin wants Ireland's relationship with its nearest neighbour to be one in which people are treated fairly and with equality. The British Empire no longer rules the waves, and we will not be treated as second-class citizens.

I listened to Maurice Morrow's comments, and if he were to listen to the victims of state violence, he would better understand where Sinn Féin is coming from.

Over generations, many families have been bereaved by the British state.

The people of this island should have the right to govern without interference. We in this Chamber — unionist, republican and nationalist — would be better able to conduct our affairs without interference from Peter Hain, John Reid or any of the interchangeable British Secretaries of State who came before them.

The DUP has allowed a small number of fundamentalists to dictate terms and conditions to us all. The sooner that Members get on with the jobs that they were elected to do, the better. Members have already referred to water charges, education cuts and rates rises; we must be here making decisions for ourselves. As long as Peter Hain holds his position we will not be able to do that, and I ask all Members to work together to ensure that we rule our own future, making decisions that are accountable to the people who elect us.

Mr McFarland: Friday 24 November was a much-heralded D-day. After what we understand was a fractious morning, the unusually hushed Benches of the DUP sat unsure about exactly what their leader would say. Mr McGuinness sat opposite, barely able to contain his eager anticipation at his nomination to be Deputy Prime Minister of this “six-county failed political entity”.

Dr Paisley stood to speak, and we all sat with bated breath awaiting his indication to nominate. The speech finished and, it is fair to say, there was a confused look around the Chamber that said it all. Dr Paisley had missed out the punchline. Mr Adams made his contribution, and Madam Speaker read a speech suggesting that Dr Paisley and Mr Adams had indicated an intention to nominate. The DUP mumbled, but there was no rebuttal.

As the day evolved, the 12 apostles issued a statement making it clear that Dr Paisley had not indicated an intention to nominate. As my colleagues said earlier: “Oh no he hadn’t.” At that stage the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State became apoplectic. We understand that the Secretary of State intervened to instruct Dr Paisley to clarify his position, and Dr Paisley duly followed with a statement that said:

“Everyone already knows that in those circumstances ... I would accept the First Minister’s nomination”.

We have heard “Oh yes I did” and “Oh no he didn’t”. It is clear that Ian Paisley and Martin McGuinness are the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister designate and that the shadow Executive are meeting weekly. The DUP should stop pretending otherwise.

There are serious questions to be posed. The night before Friday 24 November, did the NIO, the DUP and Sinn Féin agree what would be said the next day? Did the Secretary of State give Madam Speaker the text of what she should say? Did the Secretary of State tell Dr

Paisley to issue a statement clarifying his position? I leave those questions to be answered by those who are involved.

My party leader has pointed out that there was interference with how long Mr McGuinness would be given to speak, and it looks as though the Secretary of State also intervened with the Speaker’s statement and with Dr Paisley’s clarification.

Members need answers to those questions. The Secretary of State should now leave Members to conduct the business in the Assembly. I support the motion.

Mr Attwood: As my colleague Alban Maginness has said, the SDLP does not support the motion, as it misses the much bigger points that have already been referred to. The Secretary of State’s intervention — or not — in the affairs of the Assembly merely reflects a deeper culture and approach that he has adopted towards much of public life in the North.

The present Secretary of State, as a tool of government, has interfered with due process, with upholding proper standards and with the standing authority of public bodies. That has been his policy and practice on too many occasions. Evidence that is already in the public domain is a damning indictment of that approach.

There is evidence that the Secretary of State tried to influence nominations to the Parades Commission under the false notion that he could appease elements in the Orange Order. As regards the court case concerning the appointment of the Interim Commissioner for Victims and Survivors — and there is no issue about the individual — there is evidence that the Secretary of State used a concession to the DUP in a misplaced effort to soften its heart. With respect to water charges, he is pursuing the Chancellor of the Exchequer’s policy under the false notion that he might one day become the Chancellor’s deputy when the Chancellor becomes Prime Minister.

The problem is that the Secretary of State — across a wide range of issues, and on too many occasions, in order to obtain quick fixes and for reasons of political expediency — employed a policy of interference to bring about his desired outcome. As Members know, from experience in the Chamber and from all those cases, the Secretary of State has been seen to be flawed and foolish in pursuing that policy.

Gerry Adams said that much of that was “pandering to unionism”. However, Sinn Féin has learned well from bad practice. Not only have the British Government pandered to unionism on occasions, they have — as a matter of policy on too many issues — pandered to republicanism.

My colleague Alban Maginness cited an example that I will explore more deeply. With respect to on-the-runs and state killings, the British Government and Sinn Féin, in a mutual effort to obscure the past involvement of state agencies and the IRA, colluded in signing off on a cover-up policy. Not only did they sign off on that, but when the legislation was proposed, Sinn Féin welcomed it. Later that same week, Martin McGuinness justified it.

There is no more telling indictment of British interference in Irish affairs — especially given what Michelle Gildernew has just said about the history of British involvement in Ireland — than when, at the very moment that the British Government decided to cover up their involvement in various activities, criminal and otherwise, Sinn Féin assisted them in that cover-up and interference because of the on-the-runs issue.

How can Sinn Féin criticise British interference in Irish affairs when it is hand in glove with them in covering up the truth about years of human rights abuse in this part of Ireland? It does not add up: it is contradictory, confused and is an insult to the Irish nationalist people, never mind to other people on this island.

However, I am worried that the policy of interference in Irish affairs, which people in the Chamber have quite rightly berated, continues to be an element of British policy in this part of Ireland. As we speak, people in the Chamber continue to run to the British Government to get them to interfere in what is the right approach to our political problems.

Alban Maginness made a valid point, which is worthy of emphasis. The more that people interfere with due process, seek quick fixes, do deals behind closed doors and impose wrong standards when proper and right standards are necessary, the more that the integrity of politics will be damaged. Furthermore, the more that those things happen, the more that young people, in particular, will run from political life and the more that low standards in high places will become part of our political culture in a way that will ultimately damage the nature of our society.

The real issue is not British interference in the Chamber or in any other aspect of Irish life: it is why the British still have an opportunity, through the Secretary of State, to interfere in our business. The reason for that is that the parties in the Chamber have failed — and in my view, one or two parties more than others — to create stable political institutions.

The Secretary of State can get away with whatever he wants because of the failure to create and stabilise political institutions. The reason why the British Government can do what they want on water rates, public health, the Budget, the bill of rights, and all the other aspects of public policy in this part of Ireland is because of the failure to have Ministers in this place doing business for the people of this place.

My fear is that that will continue because there are still doubts about whether the DUP is real about inclusive government, although it is edging that way, and because there are doubts about Sinn Féin's signing up to a lawful society, even though it is edging that way.

Given all that doubt and the nature of British interference in aspects of public policy in this part of Ireland, the SDLP's ultimate concern is that the election that we face will not be a passport out of all that, but will rather build those difficulties into the politics of this part of Ireland for the next number of years, perhaps decades. There is only one choice in those circumstances: it must be recognised that those parties and organisations that have been part of the worst of our past cannot be guaranteed to bring about the best of our future.

Mr Robert McCartney: Thank you, Madam Speaker. One suspects that the debate has fallen into two parts: first, the interference of the Secretary of State in the business of Friday 24 November; and secondly, a general indictment of British interference, whether through viceroys in Ireland or Secretaries of State in Northern Ireland.

Madam Speaker, last week you stated that the activities of an arthritic lunatic armed with a toy pistol and some sort of firecracker was an assault on democracy. It is open to question as to whether he should be sectioned under mental health legislation or sent to jail.

However, the real assault on democracy occurred in the House on the morning of Friday 24 November when you, Madam Speaker, were given instructions from the Secretary of State. I excuse you from discharging your duties, given the limitations that have been placed on you. The Secretary of State has reduced you to the status of a speaking tool — to an object, which is how Cicero described a slave. In other words, he was describing someone in human form who simply had to follow the instructions of a superior person. I have made it quite clear, Madam Speaker, that I absolve you from all liability in that case.

I read with interest the Secretary of State's direction, which you were good enough to place in the Assembly Library. It is clear that not only did the Secretary of State give you specific instructions that afforded you no discretion whatever, but he obviously treated you as some sort of partially sighted person, given that it was typed out in a font that was so large that it could have been seen almost at the far end of the Chamber.

When I read through those instructions, it became apparent that they could have been followed only if they were based on some prior agreement. As one political commentator has said, if Dr Paisley had made a peroration that combined the Lord's Prayer and a Hail Mary, in the circumstances, you might have deemed that an acceptance. [Laughter.]

However, there is a serious aspect to this matter. The question arises as to whether some form of words was agreed in advance by the Secretary of State and by those parties that were required to respond to the nomination. Certainly, when a similar proposition was put to Dr Paisley last May, his response did not require a five-minute sotto voce response. He simply said: "Certainly not, Madam Speaker." He said that on 22 May, when it was suggested that he had been nominated as First Minister. Therefore when we look at this specific issue, we must conclude — if one subjects it to forensic examination — that there was a form of words that the Secretary of State was confident would be sufficient in his opinion for you to read out what you did when you said that you accepted that positive responses to the nominations had been made.

Madam Speaker, you may be able to tell us whether at any stage the Secretary of State offered you a form of words that would have enabled you to read out what he had prepared for you in that very large print, deeming what had been said a positive acceptance. Perhaps you would care to leave in the Assembly Library, as you kindly did with the previous document, a copy of the document that was made available to you and that, if repeated by the parties, you could have deemed a positive response. That, however, is another matter.

I want to deal briefly with some of the absurd historical references about interference that have been made here. The suggestion that all those Presbyterians whom Mr Adams named supported a united Ireland was quite erroneous. As every reputable historical work points out, all those Presbyterians were perhaps in favour of a united Ireland that followed the principles of the American War of Independence and, of course, the French Revolution. They were men seeking liberty, but all reputable historians point out that what happened in that area of Ireland now known as the Republic was described as a "piked crusade against Protestants". Those are two very different things.

Let us not have any more of those twisted or distorted historical allusions. As a matter of fact, since we are talking about Templepatrick, we must ask: who put down those Ulstermen who fought for liberty at Templepatrick? It was Catholic yeomanry from Monaghan. The Member should get his facts right before he starts giving history lessons in this Chamber.

Moving on to some of Mr Ford's remarks, the Alliance Party, in the form of Mr Ford, although I give others a certain — [Laughter.]

Mr McCarthy: Thank you very much.

Mr Kennedy: Go easy.

Mr Robert McCartney: I have heard all of Mr Ford's clichés, including the phrase "in terms of working together". One could write a letter that is made up entirely of Alliance Party clichés and send it to the 'Belfast Telegraph'. It might even be published. The Alliance Party is forever "breaking logjams", "empowering the people", "moving forward", "jumping through windows of opportunity" and "taking risks for peace". Lest the SDLP become too excited about this criticism, I should say that to some extent it also has played a part. [Laughter.]

Madam Speaker, people constantly talk about the necessity of working together, moving forward, and jumping through the aforementioned windows, without actually looking at the specifics of what that means. As Lord Morrow very eloquently said, when we are talking about working together, we must determine who we are going to work with, and we must ask what is the disposition and record of those whom the Alliance Party and the SDLP would exhort to work together.

Mr Adams talks about working together, offering the hand of friendship or even, in the words of the proclamation of 1916, "cherishing all her children equally". The problem is that Sinn Féin and its inextricable partners, the IRA, have for over 30 years murdered, maimed, robbed and destroyed in a campaign that was directed against the unionist community. The people who were burnt alive in the La Mon Hotel were not representatives of the British Government. They were dog handlers — they were members of a kennel club. That charge could be repeated endlessly. Those simple fundamentalist country folk worshipping in Darkley were machine-gunned indiscriminately by members — if not of the IRA — of the republican tradition. Was that organisation reaching out to the Protestant unionist people to be involved?

When some Members talk about history, the famine and the alleged wickedness that was perpetrated against the Irish people, we should remind ourselves of the Protestants who were driven out of Cork and other places from 1920 to 1922. We should remind ourselves of a state that, in its anxiety to put itself beyond its stronger neighbour, excluded Protestant unionists in the Republic from all sorts of office. It abolished rights that those people had enjoyed for centuries, and it created a Roman Catholic constitution for a Catholic people. That is part of the history on both sides. Do not presume, in this Chamber or anywhere else, to say that in the weeks or months running up to 26 March 2007, Sinn Féin can restore in the unionist people a confidence that would enable them to trust that party in any way.

The unionist people will not give their trust either to Sinn Féin or to any other party within their own ranks that would attempt to persuade them that the conditions exist for that trust. I do not rule out a time in the future when Sinn Féin, unlike the leopard, will be shown to have changed its spots.

Madam Speaker: Mr McCartney, please keep to the motion.

Mr Robert McCartney: The Assembly can do without interference from many aspects of Government. Until then, Members must realise that the Transitional Assembly is a joke. We are here at the behest of the Secretary of State, and we are under his control in so far as he designates Standing Orders and can refuse to follow the Business Committee's directions on what business will be conducted here. Having regard to the extent of that interference, we must ask ourselves why we are here. All parties must address that question. Why are the parties taking part in a democratic charade?

There has been talk about post-26 March 2007, when there will be an absence of that kind of interference and the beginning of a golden age when an Assembly is up and running. What will Members do then? If we continue to suggest that water charges will disappear, that a rating system that is based on capital value will be a thing of the past and that the problems in the educational system will suddenly dissolve, we are fooling the people of Northern Ireland in both communities. If a future Assembly abolishes water charges, without the interference of the Secretary of State, the £300 million that those charges would produce will have to be found by that Assembly at the cost of withdrawing that money from health, education, roads or something else. If the Assembly decides to cap rates and introduce a banding system, the money to pay for it will have to be found somewhere else.

The truth is that a devolved Assembly is always subject to interference either from a Secretary of State or the Treasury, who will always determine what must be done. Remember that it was an Assembly, without interference from the Secretary of State, that decided that it was necessary to revise the rating system to something similar, if not identical, to that which is now being proposed. It was an Assembly, without the interference of the Secretary of State, that decided to charge for water and other services, on the basis of a new rating system.

There is no point in the Assembly deluding itself and the electorate that a form of devolved Government under d'Hondt will be an answer not only to a maiden's prayer, but to a prayer from the entire electorate. Under d'Hondt there will be no Opposition, because 100 of the 108 Members in the Chamber will belong to parties that form the Government. There will be no collective responsibility because those parties that nominate Members to that Executive will have total control of them. The system that has been foisted on parties is a recipe for instability and disaster, and all parties appear to condone and endorse it.

Peter Hain — or the Secretary of State, to give him his full title — was asked during the last debate on the issue in the House of Commons who was against the St Andrews Agreement. He replied, "Only Robert McCartney". If Robert McCartney has to be like the small boy who pointed out that the emperor was entirely naked, that, Madam Speaker, is a function that I am happy to perform.

Mr McElduff: The Speaker asked Members to avoid making tedious or repetitious speeches. After Mr McCartney's contribution, can you make a ruling on what constitutes tedium and repetition?

Madam Speaker: There has been historical relevance in each speech, to which I have given leeway. Members have also repeated issues, which is normal. As I said before, Mr McElduff, I leave it to Members' judgement to make their speeches relevant and to curtail their length, both of which most Members have done this morning. I am sure that Dr McCrea, the last Member to speak this morning, will do that as well.

Dr McCrea: I deeply appreciate many of the contributions, especially those from Sinn Féin and the SDLP. They have certainly added to the confusion, rather than the enlightenment, of the House.

For example, I am confused about why the Sinn Féin/IRA Benches are filled this morning. During the Hain Assembly mark I, Sinn Féin would not come to any of the debates. I do not know what has happened since then that has caused Sinn Féin Members to change their minds, make some abysmal excuse and crawl back into the Assembly. Mr Hain probably told them that they would not get any Christmas presents. Sinn Féin has moved an amendment regarding the Secretary of State's interference. He interfered well in telling Sinn Féin to get back into the Chamber or else it would be out on its ear. Therefore Sinn Féin had to crawl back.

Sinn Féin's amendment deplores the interference of the Secretary of State. No party visits the Secretary of State or Downing Street more than Sinn Féin. It has been suggested that Sinn Féin has to keep in touch with its handlers, and that is why it is in Downing Street so often. That would make sense, particularly with regard to some Members and their connections.

Sinn Féin has the audacity to move an amendment condemning the Secretary of State's interference. How would he interfere in much of Sinn Féin's philosophy? Did Sinn Féin not go along with the Secretary of State in objecting to the capping of rates? Sinn Féin would not agree to the capping of rates; it concurred with the Secretary of State. Is this not also the party that supports the Secretary of State in the reorganisation of local government and in the setting up of seven councils? Sinn Féin Members have the audacity to talk about the Secretary of State's interference — he and they are buddies. They are Siamese twins. Sinn Féin are the new Irish Brits, because they are lapping from the Secretary of State's bowl. When he tells them to move, they are very happy to do so.

Sinn Féin seems to have a new interest in water rates, hospitals and schools. At least, it had an interest in the past in blowing up water pipes and schools, and in attacking people who were visiting their loved ones in hospital. A young man was murdered outside Magherafelt after visiting the hospital where his wife had just given birth.

However, it now has a new conscience, and I find it rather interesting. Members of the Business Committee will remember that, during the first Hain Assembly, they tried to get all those subjects onto the agenda. Which party blocked them? It was the party that now tells Members that it is concerned about water rates. It could have been talking about water rates for the past couple of years.

Sinn Féin is now concerned about hospitals. Of course it must be careful about hospitals, or interfering with hospitals, because it was its Minister who closed hospitals. The hospitals in Omagh, Magherafelt and Dungannon were all under threat from the proposal made by Sinn Féin. It then had the audacity to attend rallies and go on platforms and say that it was against the closure of Tyrone County Hospital, when it was its Minister who recommended the closure. It said that it was against the closure of the Mid-Ulster Hospital and taking away its maternity services. It now has the audacity and cheek to talk about interference when its Minister recommended it.

That shows Sinn Féin's hypocrisy. It is not concerned about water rates, hospitals and schools. The Assembly could have been debating those issues for months before the decisions were taken on water rates, the sewerage system and schools. Who stopped the debates? It was not the SDLP, the Ulster Unionists, the Alliance Party or any other parties represented — and it was not the Democratic Unionist Party; it was the one party that now says that those matters must be discussed, because they are so near to the heart of the community. That is political hypocrisy of the highest order.

To add to my confusion, the Member for West Belfast Gerry Adams stood up in the Chamber and said that he wanted to talk about a "cordial union". Would he tell that to Mrs McVeigh and to the many relatives of the disappeared? Would he tell that to the relatives of the innocent people who have been murdered?

It takes cheek or audacity for a Member to stand up and say that he is concerned about the young people who leave Northern Ireland. That is the party that is associated with the people who have driven those young people out of Northern Ireland and will still not let them come back. Let us not have pious words when — [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. Please keep to the motion.

Dr McCrea: Madam Speaker, I am keeping to the motion very carefully. I am referring to points that have been raised. Talking about the disappeared and those driven out of Northern Ireland might be a joke to certain Sinn Féin Members — and I see laughing and sneering on some of their faces — but I can assure you —

Mr O'Dowd: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. No one on these Benches is sneering, and I can assure the Member that no one thinks that it is a joke.

Dr McCrea: Madam Speaker, I accept your ruling as to whether that was a point of order. However, the Member who rose to his feet was sneering and laughing at the time.

Madam Speaker: Order. That was not a point of order. However, I gave Mr O'Dowd some leeway.

Dr McCrea, you may continue.

Dr McCrea: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Those issues have added to the confusion.

Mr O'Dowd: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. A serious accusation has been made against me, and I am sure that I should have the right to reply.

Madam Speaker: Yes. I will give you that right after the debate.

Dr McCrea: I understand that those who have no knowledge of democracy would not know about the rulings of the House. A Member has no right of reply in the midst of another Member's speech. I know that that will come —

Madam Speaker: Dr McCrea, I have already given that information.

Dr McCrea: Madam Speaker, I am pointing out that there are those who know little about democracy and, therefore, have to be trained, just as others have to be trained.

This is a major debate. A motion was tabled and an amendment proposed on the interference of the Secretary of State. Other matters confuse me as well. On the one hand, the leader of the Ulster Unionist Party told us that Dr Paisley did not nominate. Then the hon Member for North Down Mr McFarland said that, clearly, Dr Paisley did nominate. I know that there is confusion in that party and mighty divisions among its members. There are many parties in that party. Two Members stood up today and challenged each other. If they want to challenge each other, they can do so outside the Chamber. They should not do so in a public forum such as this; it makes them look stupid.

Mr Nesbitt: Will the Member give way?

Dr McCrea: I am not talking about Mr Nesbitt, so he can just sit down. The hon Member is another story. However, I certainly do not want to bring him into this. I was referring to two of his colleagues. When the hon Member is not being talked about, he would do much better to sit there and listen.

I am confused by Mr Empey's concern for the DUP at the weekend. He pleaded for there not to be divisions in the DUP. He is the first Ulster Unionist Party leader who has ever said that he wants the Democratic Unionist Party to be so warmly united. What we are really hearing from the Ulster Unionists is that the St Andrews Agreement is terrible, but they want to know where they can sign up. They are dying to —

Mr Kennedy: The Member's party is already dying.

Dr McCrea: The hon Member for Newry and Armagh should not talk too much; he is quite often confused in his mind about which side of the political fence he is on. One day he is on one side; the next day, he is on the other side. However, I will not be led down that road — I want to stick to speaking to the motion.

Let me make something clear: as regards the interference of the Secretary of State, it is true that on 24 November, the Business Committee was told certain things by you, Madam Speaker. What happened in the Chamber was different to what the Business Committee had been told. I believe that you received a further communication from the Secretary of State, and that, therefore, you abided by that instruction. That proves the interference of the Secretary of State.

It is also true that, in the Business Committee, it was proposed that the party leaders would speak during the debate. Each party leader was given a portion of time to address the Chamber. Sinn Féin/IRA requested that the person whom it would nominate to become Deputy First Minister should have the opportunity to speak. The Business Committee turned down that request; however, when I came into the Chamber, I found that the Business Committee's decision had been overturned. By whom had it been overturned? Once again, it was through the interference of the Secretary of State.

Dr Paisley made his statement in the Chamber. For the benefit of the Ulster Unionists — I know that enlightenment is good for them — who said that the DUP was waiting with bated breath to hear what Dr Paisley was going to say, Dr Paisley had already read his statement to all the DUP Members, and they unanimously supported it. I know that certain Members do not always welcome facts. However, facts are always stubborn things that stand on their own ground.

Let me make something clear: Dr Paisley did not indicate an intention to nominate and did not accept the office of First Minister.

Mr Nesbitt: Oh yes.

Dr McCrea: Was that a yawn?

There we find the Secretary of State's interference once again. He decided to interpret the words of Dr Paisley's statement in the way that he wanted by turning the dictionary and the English language on its head. I believe that the hon Member for North Down said that it would not have mattered whether it was the Lord's Prayer, the Hail Mary, or both together; there was going to be an intention or an acceptance. The Secretary of State must also be in a confused state. He does not understand the meaning of words.

There has been deliberate interference by the Secretary of State. That is totally unacceptable. There are matters that must be attended to, and the DUP will see to them — no matter whether the Secretary of State interferes a thousand times.

My hon Friend Lord Morrow clearly mentioned the need to support the PSNI, the rule of law and the courts. Whether or not Sinn Féin/IRA wants to give that support, or whether it has to do so kicking and screaming, the spotlight is on that organisation. It will have to give that support whether it likes it or not. It is not a matter of words or pious platitudes; the proof will be in its actions.

As the leader of Her Majesty's Opposition in another place stated, one proof — one of many — would be for that organisation to hand over those who murdered Robert McCartney. It knows exactly who was responsible for that murder.

That organisation can tell its voters or its restless members that policing and justice powers will be devolved to this House, and they can hold their breath waiting for it — but not only will they be blue in the face, they will have gone completely. That matter is not on the agenda. It will not matter whether the Secretary of State says that it is, because he has no power in the matter. The lock has been given to this House and to this party.

I can assure the House that Sinn Féin/IRA need not think that it will walk with the murderers and gangsters of this country and be in control of the police in Northern Ireland at any date in the foreseeable future. Political lifetimes have been spoken about, but I believe that those time frames are too short to describe it.

Mr Dawson: Does the hon Member agree that there is an absolute contradiction in Sinn Féin's position on policing? On the one hand, it says that it supports civic policing, while, on the other, it is scrabbling to get political control of policing.

Dr McCrea: I thank my hon Friend for his intervention; he is absolutely correct. Of course, confusion is nothing new for Sinn Féin.

Madam Speaker: I remind Dr McCrea and Mr Dawson to please confine their remarks to the motion. As interesting and relevant as they may think that their comments are, that matter will be debated at another time.

Dr McCrea: The amendment is about interference by the Secretary of State not only in the past but in the future. That is the amendment that you accepted, Madam Speaker.

No matter how much the Secretary of State thinks that he can badger people into submitting to what he believes, the DUP will make its own decisions. The Secretary of State has tried to interfere in the DUP's affairs. He tried to tell me, my hon Friend for East Belfast and my hon Friend for North Belfast that we should not say that policing and justice would not be devolved to this House. He will not tell the DUP what to believe or what its policies are. The DUP makes its policy, and it will stand before the people. I can assure the House that Sinn Féin will not be getting policing and justice powers; it can tell its people or its restless troops whatever it likes, but it will certainly not be able to do so on the basis of fact. Those powers are not coming. Sinn Féin can look for a date, but the DUP is not tied to any date that the Secretary of State sets — 26 March, 26 May or June.

A Member: That is weather forecasting.

Dr McCrea: That is another weather forecast.

The structures of the IRA will have to be dismantled and its ill-gotten gains handed over. There must be a proper mechanism through which to throw out terrorist supporters, if there is support for terrorism. There must be an end to criminality. The DUP will make that judgement on behalf of its people, but there must be a credible testing period, and the matter will have to be tested to the satisfaction of the people whom the DUP represents.

Mr McNarry: Will the hon Member give way?

Dr McCrea: The hon Member will have the opportunity to speak. I am led to believe that it is coming close to lunch hour.

I must make it abundantly clear that I resent the Secretary of State's interference. He will not tell us what we have said or what we are to say. There may be puppets of the Secretary of State sitting on the Benches opposite; there may be those who are the Secretary of State's toys. He will handle them whenever it suits him, and they must keep in touch with their handler. One thing, however, is certain: nobody will be pulling the Democratic Unionist Party's strings, because it has never been the Secretary of State's toy. DUP Members will be answerable to the people, and they will honestly, firmly and resolutely stand by that which they promised the electorate.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Hussey: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Before we break for lunch, I seek clarification on my earlier question. Dr McCrea has quite clearly indicated the Rev Dr Ian Paisley's position. I refer you specifically to Standing Order 20(c), and I expect a judgement on that when we resume.

Madam Speaker: That is fine. I have already said that I shall provide that. I shall try to keep to my word, as I usually do.

Given the time, and given that a sufficient number of Members' names remain on the speaking list, I propose, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the sitting until 2.00 pm, so that Members can have lunch.

The sitting was suspended at 12.51 pm.

On resuming (Madam Speaker in the Chair) —
2.00 pm

Madam Speaker: During the debate this morning, Mr Hussey raised a point of order referring to Standing Order 2(a), which provides that the Speaker's ruling shall be final on all questions of procedure and order. If I picked him up correctly, Mr Hussey then urged me to make a ruling on how Standing Order 20 was applied during the sitting on 24 November.

My answer is clear. Standing Order 20 did not cover the item of business directed by the Secretary of State for the Order Paper of that date.

Mr Nesbitt: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Does that mean that the direction given by the Secretary of State had no Standing Order applied to it?

Madam Speaker: The direction was in accordance with the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006 for the business of the day.

Mr Nesbitt: Can you please clarify whether the direction was without the application of Standing Orders?

Madam Speaker: The Act supersedes Standing Orders, and the business of 24 November was within the remit of the Act. Standing Order 20 was not relevant for that sitting.

Mr Nesbitt: Was any Standing Order relevant?

Madam Speaker: The Standing Orders are always relevant to the order of business in the Chamber, but Standing Order 20 was not relevant to the order of business on 24 November.

I call Mr Murphy.

Mr Hussey: Madam Speaker, I refer to your own opening remarks on 24 November:

"Proceedings of the Assembly shall be conducted in accordance with Standing Orders and any directions made by the Secretary of State." — [Official Report, Bound Volume 21, p1, col 1].

I stress that you said "and" not "or". Your remarks did not serve to override the Standing Orders. Any direction from the Secretary of State would be additional; it would not override the Standing Orders we were given to operate with.

Madam Speaker: We were not dealing with the issue of nomination on 24 November, therefore the Standing Order was not relevant.

Mr Murphy: Go rabh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Today could be a good day for the Assembly if the outcome of the debate is that we resolve to prevent any future interference by the Secretary of State in our affairs. However, that is unlikely, because all parties here have engaged with the Secretary of State at times on various issues.

The rationale of the UUP motion is not that its members are concerned about the Secretary of State's interference in the Assembly; they were not concerned about it in the past. Nor does the motion seek to prevent any future interference by the Secretary of State in the Assembly. Rather, it takes issue with his interference on a specific day over a specific issue. That is the weakness in the motion. Either we wish to conduct our business, in charge of our own affairs and without the interference of the Secretary of State, or we are content for the Secretary of State to interfere as and when he deems it necessary. If there was a genuine attempt to prevent or to restrict in some way the British Secretary of State from interference in the Assembly, the motion would not be time related and specific; rather it would be open-ended. That is the strength of the amendment.

Ulster Unionist Party members were very clearly exercised by any toing and froing between the Secretary of State and the other political parties on 24 November. It is ironic that the motion should come from them, because that party is one of the greatest users of the Secretary of State's interference in our arrangements. Members will perhaps cast their minds back to a time when the Assembly was not in shadow, virtual, or transitional format — let alone Hain one or Hain two — but was fully functioning.

As part of the Executive's programme it was decided, as required under the terms of the Good Friday Agreement, to deal with the very vexed issue of flags and emblems. The Executive decided to set up a subcommittee to deal with that matter and gave it the task of drafting an agreed proposition, in accordance with the Good Friday Agreement, for dealing with flags and emblems on public buildings. I think that Michael McGimpsey was on that subcommittee, as were Bríd Rodgers from the SDLP and our own Deputy First Minister designate, Martin McGuinness.

While the subcommittee was carrying out its business, the Ulster Unionist Party opened up negotiations with the then Secretary of State, Peter Mandelson, who guaranteed to legislate for that party's proposals if the subcommittee could not reach agreement. Therefore, while a fully functioning Executive here were trying genuinely to carry out their business, the Ulster Unionist Party had persuaded the Secretary of State to overrule that business. It ill behoves that party to come here today and complain about the Secretary of State's interference in a Transitional, Hain one or Hain two Assembly.

Of course, it was at the Ulster Unionist Party's prompting that the Secretary of State introduced the suspension legislation that has us in the state we are in today — and Members quite often bemoan the idea of a Transitional or virtual Assembly. Suspension legislation was introduced at the request of the Ulster Unionist Party to enable it to walk in and out of the previous Assembly as the whim took it. It was introduced by Peter Mandelson and effected on a number of occasions by Secretary of State Reid, again at the request of the Ulster Unionist Party — interfering with the workings of a democratic institution, which had full powers allowed to it under the Good Friday Agreement.

Mr Kennedy: That is not our fault.

Mr Murphy: Well, if Members on the Benches opposite still believe in stories about spy rings, they will soon be writing their letters to Santa Claus. I hope that they have all been very good boys. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr Murphy: Of course, there is another matter that the Secretary of State dealt with. Again it was Peter Mandelson, and again it was at the request of the parties. It was not necessarily a matter within the competence of the Assembly at that time, but one certainly hopes that it will be within the competence of this Assembly in the near future. I am referring to the Police (Northern Ireland) Act 2000. What was proposed in the Good Friday Agreement as a new beginning to policing was completely undermined by the representations made by some parties to the Secretary of State. They were not alone in doing that. All parties here have gone to the Secretary of State on various issues, and all parties have sought his intervention.

The weakness of the Ulster Unionist Party's motion and, I suppose, the hypocrisy of the motion is that its only complaint with the Secretary of State's intervention is when the intervention is not to its liking. That party is not ruling out future requests for the Secretary of State to intervene in the workings of the Assembly.

I suggest, and our amendment suggests, that either we get to the stage at which we have no intervention from a British Secretary of State or the British Government in our democratic institutions, or we keep the situation in which parties can go traipsing off to the Secretary of State with their demands. The Ulster Unionist Party led the way in this at a time when we had a fully functioning Executive here.

The answer to all of this is for us to assume responsibility for our own affairs. While under the — what are termed — “transitional arrangements” for the Assembly, parties can decide what business they will do, it is also the case that the Secretary of State can interfere quite readily in that business. He has taken that power as part of the St Andrews legislation. People have expressed frustration with the various interferences from the British Secretary of State and have acknowledged that the British Government intervene in our business with their own agenda and not with that of any particular interest group here in Ireland. If we want to prevent that, we must assume those powers ourselves.

We must take responsibility for our own affairs. Ultimately, we must take power from the hands of British Government Ministers and British Government officials in Ireland. Let us act in the interests of those who have elected us. No one in this part of Ireland has elected the Secretary of State or any of his Ministers. No one here has given endorsement to any of his officials, yet they have power to interfere in any of the matters that we attempt to deal with.

Ultimately, it is our responsibility to take back that power into the hands of accountable and democratically elected representatives here, to exercise it on behalf of the people who elected us, to be responsive to their needs and not to respond to the demands or current strategies of the Northern Ireland Office.

This morning, I listened with interest to the leader of the Democratic Unionist Party's plea to my party in relation to policing matters. I was heartened by his plea, because it shows that there is a pressing concern within the DUP for the matter of policing to be dealt with. [Interruption.]

Policing is also a pressing concern for my party, and I assure the leader of the Democratic Unionist Party — irrespective of the cackling of other Members on the Front Bench opposite — that our party is very much ready to deal with the issue of policing. We are very much up for dealing with that issue and we want to resolve the issue of policing.

My plea in return to the leader of the DUP, and his party, is for him to work with us in dealing with policing. There are issues outstanding. We have been working with all the various people involved to try to progress those issues. There is work that his party and my party must do in order to progress some of those outstanding issues. My plea to the DUP is this: let us take these necessary steps together and let us liberate the future for all the rest of our people. There is work to be done on policing; let us get down to it.

Interestingly, in his contribution before lunch, Rev McCrea said very clearly that the issue of the transfer of powers relating to policing and justice is not on the agenda. It is, however, on the agenda for a meeting that his fellow Members are attending at the moment. One of the issues for the subgroup on policing and justice matters is the timing of the transfer of those powers and the model that will be adopted.

Rather than trying to dig ourselves into deeper holes, wise counsel should prevail. Let us give each other a bit of space to work on these issues; let us make sure that we contribute to each other's ability to deal with those issues, rather than trying to push each other into corners. Members of the DUP should not push themselves into corners over this issue. We will give others space to genuinely deal with outstanding matters; we wish for others to work with us as we try to deal with those issues ourselves. The plea from Dr Paisley is well heard, but he, and his party, needs to work with us to resolve these outstanding issues. Go raibh míle maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

Madam Speaker: I call Mr Tom Elliott.

Mr McNarry: He has been called away on urgent business.

Madam Speaker: I call Mr Nelson McCausland, who is in the House.

Mr McCausland: This morning, Gerry Adams spoke at some length on the subject of the United Irishmen. I do not want the proceedings to become a history lesson, but it is important to set the record straight on one aspect of that era, not least because Irish republicans today are keen to see themselves as the successors of the United Irishmen.

Gerry Adams mentioned Samuel Neilson, but he omitted to say that, within a few years of the 1798 rebellion, Neilson acknowledged that everything that the United Irishmen had fought for in 1798 had been secured for them through the Act of Union. In other words, Neilson had become a unionist. [Laughter.]

That is a lovely prospect; it is an appealing prospect. [Laughter.]

Mr Kennedy: Steady on.

Mr McCausland: It is an appealing prospect: republicans seeing the error of their ways, undergoing a political transformation and becoming unionists.

Mr Kennedy: Go easy. [Laughter.]

Mr McCausland: It is perhaps a wee bit much to hope for.

Even William Drennan, the real founder of the United Irishmen, eventually became reconciled to the Union, and a Belfast newspaper quoted him as commending the term "British". Within a few years, most of the radicals in the ranks of the United Irishmen had become supporters of the Union. William Drennan was the poet of the United Irishmen. In Clifton Street graveyard in my constituency of North Belfast, lies the grave of his son, John Swanwick Drennan, who was the poet of the Ulster unionist movement in the late nineteenth century.

Those men were not Irish nationalists; rather, they were internationalists. What they opposed was this: a corrupt, rotten Parliament in Dublin. Looking at the Dublin Parliament of more recent times, I must say that, 200 years on, little has changed.

2.15 pm

Several Members spoke this morning of the Secretary of State's pandering to Sinn Féin. That is an important issue, because it is a long-established practice. Such pandering to Sinn Féin by Secretaries of State has not only poisoned the political process by rewarding the wrong doer, but it has created numerous inequalities in Northern Ireland, and it has increased and reinforced other existing inequalities.

That is why the DUP amendment, which was rejected, referred to the need for delivery of equality measures for the unionist community. It is also why the DUP is, for example, calling for an Irish language audit. We have a right to know how many concessions on the Irish language have been given to Sinn Féin over the past 20 years and, particularly, how much money has been lavished on Irish language concessions under the old direct rule and under the devolved Administration through the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure.

Dr McCrea: From Michael McGimpsey?

Mr McCausland: Yes. McGimpsey is the name of the man who was in charge of that Department; that is right. I would also like to know how much money is being spent on Irish-language concessions under the current direct rule. There is no need to be too detailed about it; a figure to the nearest £10 million will probably suffice. Such is the scale of the money that has been lavished on the Irish language that we have a right to know how much has been spent by the various Departments and by non-departmental public bodies (NDPBs).

I had read into the minutes of the Committee on the Preparation for Government the text of an internal Government memo — a briefing paper for a previous Secretary of State — from the period before the Belfast Agreement. The instruction contained in that memo was to make concessions regarding the Irish language to please Sinn Féin. That is what the briefing paper was about. That is only one example of politically inspired discrimination and interference by a Secretary of State, but it serves to make the point.

I could equally refer to the interference of the present Secretary of State over the summer when Gerry Adams and Gerry Kelly went hand in hand to the door demanding more money for republican festivals in Belfast, for the West Belfast Festival, for Ardoyne and for the New Lodge. Money had already been allocated to them, fairly and impartially, by the Northern Ireland Events Company. They had received their share, but they were not satisfied. Sinn Féin cannot cope with equality; it prefers preferential treatment. It prefers to see others discriminated against and discrimination in favour of republicanism; its members do not like equality and fairness. The Secretary of State overruled the democratic decision of the Northern Ireland Events Company and the fair and equitable allocation of money to republican groups by giving them more money at the behest of Messrs Adams and Kelly.

Those are two examples of interference by the Secretary of State, and examples of the long-standing tradition of the Secretary of State pandering to the republican movement. A resolution of such inequalities is an essential step to be taken before we can move forward on devolution, and it will take some time for that to happen. That is why the DUP has made it a central issue.

Unfortunately, the pandering of the Secretary of State to Sinn Féin has increased the scale of the problem, and his failure to tackle it — something which cannot be done in a matter of weeks and months — remains a major obstacle to devolution.

Considerable reference was made this morning to the importance of policing. The problem is that Sinn Féin sees policing as something that it might consider signing up to — probably with about 100 caveats and qualifications and with its fingers crossed behind its back — if it gets something in return. One of my colleagues made that point this morning.

The plain truth is that there should be no reward or recompense for signing up to policing and supporting law and order. Sinn Féin should do it because it is the right and decent thing to do; it is the democratic thing to do. I hope that we will see some movement on that in the near future. It remains a hope, but perhaps a hope that will not be realised.

Nevertheless, those are the sorts of issues that need to be dealt with — policing; support for law and order; equality. Unfortunately, so far the task has been made more difficult by the interference of the Secretary of State in rewarding the wrongdoers, and in not rewarding people for simply doing the right thing.

Madam Speaker: This is the first occasion that the Assembly will hear from Ms Caitríona Ruane. She will be making her maiden speech. As Members will know, it is the convention that a maiden speech be heard without interruption.

Ms Ruane: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

When Gandhi was asked what he thought of British democracy, he said that he thought it would be a good idea. I have no doubt that many people in Ireland share Gandhi's view. I suspect that if Members were to go around the world to Britain's former and current colonies, in Asia, Africa, Latin America or the Middle East, they would find a similar view.

What has British colonialism, or interference, meant for human rights and equality across the world? It has meant devastation, famine, war, destruction and genocide, the attempted destruction of native languages, disease and imprisonment. The list is endless. There is a pattern where the colonisers give privilege and power to groups, and marginalise others who dare to stand up against human rights abuses. Day and daily, we are faced with horrific pictures from across the world of rights abuses, torture, tragedy and poverty.

Anseo in Éirinn, is Éire aontaithe an aisling atá againn, áit ina mbeidh cosaint ann do chearta gach duine.

Ireland is divided by an artificial border that creates and perpetuates poverty, and by the failure of the Irish and British Governments to promote and to protect the rights of everyone on an equal basis. The gap between the have and the have-nots is growing. The wealth that should enrich the nation, and create equal opportunities, is being squandered. Entire sections of society live in poverty; they are marginalised and live on the edge. Daily, there is systematic, endemic violence against women and children. Apart from isolated cases, it goes unchallenged.

The British Government, certain sections of civic society and the political establishment have perpetuated the myth that the Six Counties is at the cutting edge of fair employment legislation, and that the British Government have been innovative in the field of equality. The reality is different. Every piece of equality and human rights legislation has been fought for. Anyone who sought to reform or to change the system faced not only indifference, intransigence and foot dragging, but also institutionalised obstruction. The fair employment debate has been characterised by disagreement over the nature and extent of discrimination. Some refused to acknowledge that structural discrimination ever existed, while others are prepared to grudgingly concede that isolated incidents of discrimination may have occurred in the past.

Mr Weir: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I appreciate that in this debate you have taken a reasonably liberal interpretation on the nature of speeches — some have wandered tangentially away from the motion. Is it in order, however, for a speech to make no reference whatsoever to the motion? Surely there must be some degree of relevancy?

Madam Speaker: All speeches, Mr Weir, should be relevant. This morning, every Member has in some way been guilty of not always speaking to the motion. This is a maiden speech; therefore I allow more leeway. However, I am sure that Ms Ruane will remind us that she is speaking to the amendment.

Ms Ruane: What I am saying is relevant. I will continue.

The next step in this argument is that the past is the past; that things are different, so let us move on.

Unionism and other elements of the establishment, including Peter Hain, try to blunt the tools that are key to ensuring a fair and just society. They attempt to undermine the equality and human rights legislation that is essential in order to combat discrimination and inequality.

In so doing, they damage tools that can assist all of us in challenging discrimination and inequality wherever it exists. Many unionists argue, without a hint of irony, that the injustice and the inequality that sparked off the civil rights movement were not real problems in the first place but a figment of Catholic nationalist imagination that was mired in victimhood, encouraged by republican conspiracy and designed to undermine the state by fuelling nationalist anger. That argument supports the view that public finances should not be wasted on equality. That agenda and philosophy contribute to a recurring theme in the public debate within unionism in the North of Ireland.

One of the key obstacles to developing a society based on equality is the absence of debate about the causes and nature of sectarianism. Sectarianism, like racism and sexism, has at its heart issues of power relationships. Over the coming weeks and months, the human rights and equality agenda will become even more important. It needs to be at the heart of social and political change in Ireland, North and South. That is why Sinn Féin has placed human rights and equality at the heart of the negotiations. That is why it argues for an effective anti-poverty strategy, a round-table forum on a bill of rights, effective anti-discrimination legislation and powers and resources for the human rights commissions. Equality threatens no one and benefits everyone, whether you live in the Shankill or the Falls, Downpatrick or Newry, Fermanagh or Derry, Mayo or Cork.

Ní bhagraíonn an comhionannas ar aon duine — muise, tá sé chun leasa gach duine, bíodh siad ar Bhóthar na Seanchille, ar Bhóthar na bhFál, i nDún Phádraig, i Rinn Mhic Giolla Rua, i bhFear Manach, i nDoire, i Maigh Eo nó i gCorcaigh.

We have had a painful and disruptive past. We need to learn to live with each other without compromising our fundamental beliefs. The Good Friday Agreement provides me, as an Irish republican, with a context within which I can pursue my political aspirations. For me it is logical that there will be a united Ireland. The logic of unity is compelling. Unionists have a valuable role to play in all of that, and we are enthusiastic advocates of rights — everyone's rights. I do not say that to provoke or insult. We have to learn to respect each others' rights, to respect beliefs without necessarily agreeing with them. We have unique opportunities in Ireland at the moment: to build a very different island to the one that we have currently; for the neighbouring island to be a neighbour, rather than a coloniser; and to bring peace to "the Planter and the Gael", to use Peter Robinson's terminology.

When we look back, years from now, we will remark upon how much has been achieved. Are things improving? Of course they are. Can they improve more quickly? They can. Can the DUP and Sinn Féin be the parties that work together in the Executive to bring about human rights and equality for everyone?

They can. If there is political will, it can be done. The marginalised people who vote for the DUP and for Sinn Féin will be glad to see it.

The DUP's excuses for not talking to Sinn Féin do not stand up to scrutiny. We need a mature debate on the issue of political violence and victims, not the reaction of a playground bully. Every actor in the conflict inflicted violence: the state, with its police, Army and agents; the loyalist paramilitaries who worked hand in glove with the state; and recent reports on collusion show only the tip of the iceberg. RUC men put on berets in the middle of the night, carried out shootings and, putting on a RUC uniform the next day, pretended to investigate the shootings they had carried out the night before. Look at the revelations coming out daily about Loughinisland, to mention but one case. People from all communities —

Mr Kennedy: On a point of order, Madam Speaker, I am loathe to rise to my feet on the occasion of a maiden speech. However, it is the convention of a maiden speech that it steer clear of issues that are deemed controversial. Clearly the Member has failed to do that and is indulging in a blatant act of Sinn Féin party political broadcasting and propaganda. Her speech does not fulfil proper expectations of a maiden speech.

Madam Speaker: You have pre-empted me, Mr Kennedy. I was about to remind the Member that it is not the convention to make such contentious remarks in a maiden speech.

2.30 pm

Ms Ruane: I am speaking about something very important — getting the peace process up and running and getting the DUP speaking with Sinn Féin. I am speaking about British interference in Ireland, and the motion is about interference.

The DUP says that it will not talk to republicans because they use violence, yet that party was happy to run up and down mountains wearing berets and waving gun licences or invading parts of the South. The DUP acted as cheerleaders for the RUC, even when it operated outside the rule of law. The DUP's position of not talking to republicans is unacceptable.

Does any Member think that it is better to have direct rule, double-jobbing, here-today-gone-tomorrow Ministers from another island running the state, who do not understand us, much less care about us or how we think? Do my and Jim Wells's constituents in South Down want water charges? Of course not. We need local, accountable Ministers running this part of Ireland.

Where do we go from here? I hope that we can go forward together. Sinn Féin wants to engage with others to progress the situation, get the institutions up and running and move forward on all the human rights and equality elements of the agreement.

Let us be able to look back in 20 years' time and say that the end of 2006 and beginning of 2007 was the time when we took a qualitative step forward and made real change for the Planter and the Gael. Let us create a situation in which everyone can feel confident about the future for our children, because they deserve it. To paraphrase that brave trade unionist from County Cork, Mother Jones: let us all commemorate our dead, but fight like hell for our living. Go raibh maith agat.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Whoever said that Northern Ireland's politicians were stuck in their past obviously got it right, when one considers what has been discussed in today's debate. One Member began in 1798; another in 1921; one Member mentioned Gandhi; and another spoke of links to the United Irishmen. I am tempted to start in 1641 and mention the Battle of the Boyne to bring the debate up to date slightly.

The debate was supposed to be about what happened in this House, not in 1798 but last Friday. We have moved completely away from that, and I am sure that, for the rest of my remarks, Madam Speaker will cut me the same slack as she has done for everyone else.

Something has emerged from the debate from which the Secretary of State can take succour — namely, that he is universally detested by Members from across the House. The picture that has emerged is that he is not the most adored character, because of his interference in certain ways in Northern Ireland. No matter on what side of the House Members sit, they do not like the Secretary of State's interference.

It has been easy for some Members to blame the Secretary of State. Indeed, the intention of the motion is to put the Secretary of State into the firing line, and rightly so — he should take the blame where he is responsible. However, it is important to remember that the guilty parties sit on the Benches opposite. We should keep our focus on those guilty parties for one obvious reason: direct rule operates at present because the Assembly collapsed in the autumn of 2002 due to the activities of Members sitting opposite. That is why there is a Secretary of State and why he is exercising the power in the way that he wishes.

When Sir Reg Empey introduced today's debate, I imagine that he got a great sigh of relief and a great deal of satisfaction from Sinn Féin because he tried to take the spotlight away from Sinn Féin's responsibility for the mess that Northern Ireland finds itself in. We must maintain the focus on the fact that Sinn Féin has responsibilities to live up to, that it is deliberately failing in those responsibilities and that the sooner that it lives up to those responsibilities, the better for everyone.

We can all accept that we do not want a Secretary of State to unduly interfere in any matter. It is obvious that he interfered because Sinn Féin has allowed him to. Sinn Féin wrecked the previous Assembly, and it intends to continue wrecking democracy in Northern Ireland, because that party is not signed up to the democratic process in the way that it should be.

Sinn Féin is not signed up to the rule of law. It is not signed up to support for the Police Service. It is not signed up to support for the rule of our courts. That is why there is a Secretary of State in office today.

When the leader of Sinn Féin, Gerry Adams, made his speech this morning, I was reminded of the saying that the victors always write history. It was pretty clear to me that he had read the loser's version of history, because his contribution about what republicanism and nationalism have been trying to achieve was, factually, completely askew.

Let us be absolutely clear: this is, as some people have described it, a partitionist Assembly. This is going to continue to be a partitionist country. That is because republicanism has failed, and failed miserably. It has failed on several counts. It cannot get into Government without delivery. It has tried to run away from delivering on all of the crucial matters, and in particular on the rule of law, on support for the police and on support for the courts. Its failure to deliver on those issues now counts against it as the reason why it cannot get into Government.

Some Members said today that they wanted to hear something from Sinn Féin about policing. It is pretty clear from the speech that we have just heard that Sinn Féin really is stuck in a time warp and has very warped ideas about the police. A callous slur was issued against the Royal Ulster Constabulary and its members, who lay in ditches, took bullets and bombs, and were unjustly targeted while protecting every member of this society, whether Catholic, Protestant or other. Those people were smeared in the most vicious and awful way by the previous contributor. All I can conclude from her comments and her attitude to this debate is that she is really not getting ready at all to support the police and the rule of law.

Imagine coming here and saying that people on all sides should take responsibility and that the violence in Northern Ireland was caused by the Royal Ulster Constabulary, the Crown services, or loyalist paramilitaries, when it is patently obvious that, for over 35 years, we had rampant republicanism bombing and murdering people from its own community and from every community to achieve its ends. Most people would be horrified at the comments made by the previous contributor.

Some people think that if Sinn Féin were to just utter a few words or a pledge to support policing, that would be enough to get them over the bar of support for the police. However, we should lay out clearly what support for the Police Service of Northern Ireland, for the rule of law and for the Royal Courts of Justice actually means. It will not be lip service, or simply uttering some words in the pretence that that is the acceptance of policing. It has to be real, qualitative support for the police on the ground.

In other words, we want to see the people who, in a ghastly way, murdered Robert McCartney in the Short Strand brought to justice. We want to see republicans in that area coming forward and giving witness evidence, not to some third party, but to the Police Service of Northern Ireland. We want to see them coming forward and making sure that that evidence can be used in open court, and that those witnesses feel free, and not under duress, to give that evidence.

We want to see real, active support for the police in a practical way, so that the police know that they have the support of the community when they go in to make arrests or carry out investigations; so that they are not attacked, brutalised or made to feel that they are not wanted, but are actually sought in those areas.

We want to see the demise of paramilitary-driven crime. We do not want to see it just boiling down for a few months; we want to see the end of it. It has to be over. Paramilitary-driven crime by republicans has to cease permanently. The reason Sinn Féin has failed to face up to that issue is because it is doing so well out of paramilitary crime. The most recent statistics on paramilitarism and extortion in Northern Ireland demonstrate that republicans are doing extremely well as a result of crime in Northern Ireland and, indeed, across the border.

We want to see that the exploitation of that ill-gotten gain is over with as well. Support for law and order — for British law — means that there has to be respect for the people who administer that law on the ground on a daily basis for the entire community.

Given the comments of the last Member who spoke, respect from Sinn Féin is totally absent.

The DUP wants to see support for the courts and for law and order. Members have been told that a pledge and some witnesses might go some way towards assisting people to support the services. However, it will take time to measure that and see how it actually occurs. I hope that Members see that sooner rather than later. At St Andrews, the DUP made it clear that the clock would start ticking at that time on Sinn Féin's support for the police. However, since St Andrews it has shown no support for the police. Members should recall that awful crime in south Armagh when a Protestant woman and a Catholic man were burnt to death in their home. Why did Members not hear leaders from that community calling for the police to be brought in to carry out that investigation? Sinn Féin was silent on that point. When there was a disturbance in Ballymurphy, when a gun was found and a gang of men beat up another man, why did Members not hear republican leaders in that community calling for the police to come in and, in turn, supporting the investigation? Sinn Féin has a considerable distance to travel in all of this.

Sinn Féin knows that its ideology is in serious trouble as a result of its having to support the rule of law, the police and the Royal Courts of Justice if it wants to get into the Government. There is not going to be a united Ireland. That pipe dream is over, and it should have dawned on Sinn Féin by now. It can sign up to whatever aspiration it wants to, but there is not going to be a republican united Ireland. The Union, according to recent polls, is not only stronger, but unionist confidence is stronger in the Union than it has been for several decades.

If Sinn Féin wants to get into a Government in Northern Ireland, it must sign up to the same principles as every other political party and accept the rule of law, the courts here and the police. If it wants into the Government it must support the rule of British law. What republican can say that he wants to support the rule of British law? Republicanism will only be honoured as an academic proposition at that time. It cannot be honoured as a real aspiration if it is signed up to British law. Perhaps the penny is starting to drop with republicans that with this project and strategy that they keep talking about — if pursued to its logical end, and they accept democracy, the rule of law, the courts and the police — they are the accepting the rule of the Crown in Ireland. That is what it means to Sinn Féin. The sooner Sinn Féin swallows its pride and accepts that, the easier it will be for us all. Sinn Féin lost the debate; it lost the big vote and the argument; and republicanism is therefore finished. The sooner that republicans face up to that, the better.

Alban Maginness made some telling comments in his earlier contribution. He said that today's time would be better spent dealing with the issues of the present as opposed to hashing over the issues of the past. Most people today are astounded that we are not discussing water rates, the review of public administration (RPA) — we will discuss that tomorrow — or Sir George Bain's recently published report on the future of our education services. Those are the issues that affect us on a daily basis, and there is a demand from the public for their politicians to actively engage in those matters that prevent job losses, to see our country flourish, to have the economic package delivered and to have their problems addressed. It is a scandal that Members are dealing with an issue that has become a farce today. The Secretary of State was wrong to interfere in the way that he did, and my party supports the calls on that. That is an issue that we need to get to grips with, and the sooner the better.

I understand that Sinn Féin is upset and concerned that people still call it IRA/Sinn Féin or Sinn Féin/IRA. If Sinn Féin is going to move and put the IRA behind it, making it a thing of the past, then of course the DUP understands that it is embarrassing for it to be linked with that organisation.

How many of those present in the Chamber today also sit on another secret organisation — the army council of the IRA? Those who do not like the Secretary of State's interference in the Chamber should think about how everyone on this side of the House feels when the secret hand of the IRA army council extends into the Chamber and directs the activities, actions and statements of certain Members. Sinn Féin can cry all it wants about the Secretary of State being about. People must wake up to the fact that he is here because Sinn Féin has failed all the people of Northern Ireland by ensuring that democracy cannot run its course, and by standing in the way of democracy for decades.

Mr Nesbitt: I support the motion. I will be as precise as I can in talking to the motion that Members deplore the action of the Secretary of State on 24 November. One has to go back to a day or two before that to discover the genesis of the problem that arose on 24 November. In the House of Commons on 21 November, the leader of the Democratic Unionist Party asked where the date of 24 November for nominations had come from. I recall that the leader of the SDLP replied that it came:

The leader of the Democratic Unionist Party responded that he would not bow his neck to any “wee bit of white paper” drawn up by the United Kingdom and Irish Governments. The Secretary of State then supported the leader of the SDLP when he confirmed that the rationale behind nominations on 24 November came from paragraph 10 of the St Andrews Agreement, which stated that:

The Secretary of State added that paragraph 10 referred not only to nominations on 24 November 2006 but to devolution on 26 March 2007. Therefore, he clearly set out the rationale behind the debate on Friday 24 November. He omitted to mention something to which you, Madam Speaker, referred when the Assembly met on Friday morning. You reminded Members, and that is why I raised the point of order, that the Assembly was to act:

That means that the Transitional Assembly must comply with the directions of that agreement.

Therefore, regardless of whether the leader of the DUP considers that agreement to be a “wee bit of white paper”, the law contained in the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006 clearly states in section 1 that it was to act in accordance with the St Andrews Agreement. Had the Assembly acted according to the Act, without interference, there would have been nominations, because the Act also states that the Assembly must “meet on 24 November”. Anyone who was making a judgment on that Act would be clear about what was meant to happen. However, the Secretary of State did interfere, as he had the legal right to do so. Under schedule 1, the Secretary of State could direct the Assembly in any way he “thinks fit”. Indeed, it states that the Assembly must act:

The deplorable aspect of what has happened is that the Secretary of State, in giving his direction, was not acting in accord with the St Andrews Agreement, but in discord with it. He turned it around, and that is what caused the farcical situation to which Members have referred, and the public are aware of that too. It is abundantly clear what caused the problem.

What is the outcome of this farcical position? The party to my left is unusually shy at the moment. It does not like the words “indicate”, “nominate” or “designate”, and it is reticent about using certain words. I am not concerned so much about the words that were used — it is substance rather than the form of words that is important. Mr McCrea is absent now but he was present earlier, when he was trying to chide the Ulster Unionist Party by saying that our leader said one thing and our chief negotiator, Alan McFarland, said another. That was not the case. Each was complementing what the other was saying.

The Secretary of State said that 24 November was the day for decision. That morning we did not have the leader of the Democratic Unionist Party indicating to nominate, designate, or do anything — and I hear agreement from one of the 12 apostles, or whatever description anyone wishes to give those who issued that statement. That afternoon, the leader of the Democratic Unionist Party issued a statement, and he made it very clear that, in the event of certain conditions being fulfilled, he would accept the position of First Minister. There was a “commitment” — I will use that word — from the leader of the Democratic Unionist Party that afternoon, and that is what Mr McFarland was referring to.

The Secretary of State allowed that shambles to unfold. It is clear that we now have a person who will become First Minister for Northern Ireland in due course, subject to the conditions of the Pledge of Office being adhered to. That afternoon, he added that it was also subject to the wishes of the electorate. The Northern Ireland Act 2006 makes it clear that it is the largest party that will nominate the First Minister, not the largest party within the largest designation. At this moment the DUP is the largest party — it may or may not remain so.

Let us be in no doubt about why the Secretary of State intervened. The leader of the Democratic Unionist Party has been clearly identified as being set apart from his peers — he has a different standing. In any definition of the word “designation” he has been designated. To use the word as a verb, he has been designated. Indeed, the fact that he will not take up the position until March 2007 at the earliest means the word could also be used as an adjective.

The law says that the title “First Minister designate” does not come into being until immediately before designation to the actual office on 26 March 2007. Whether or not one is given a title, in substance we have a designated First Minister, a First Minister-in-waiting. The position of the Ulster Unionist Party is not one of contradiction, and it is a pity that Mr McCrea is not here. My party leader and Mr McFarland complemented one another in what they said.

Another little aspect of the Secretary of State’s deplorable intervention in the workings of the Assembly is that he has allowed people to use weasel words over what happened last Friday. The Democratic Unionist Party rightly refers to its executive motion of 9 November, which it says it will adhere to. The motion stated very clearly that the party was not required to commit to any aspect of power sharing.

Those words were chosen carefully. It was not required to commit to any aspect of power sharing in advance of devolution or in advance of the policing issue being dealt with. However, “not required” does not mean that it will not happen, because the DUP did commit. It was not required to, but it did. A few days ago, I noted in ‘An Phoblacht’ that the president of Sinn Féin congratulated Mr Paisley on his commitment — there is that word again — to become First Minister, and he welcomed that commitment.

What I find most deplorable is that politics throughout the United Kingdom and further afield is held in low repute. Men and women, and perhaps even Members of the Assembly, feel that politics in Northern Ireland is in lower repute. For many months, the Secretary of State stated that the law would be upheld, that it was devolution or dissolution, and that we must make up our minds. He also said that he could not vary from the law and that nominations would have to happen. They did not.

The Secretary of State should not make the situation even more embarrassing and even more farcical by repeating those statements. He should not do it because he is wrong. The Secretary of State showed by what he did on 24 November that no date in law is sacrosanct, because he has the power, under schedule 1, to give any direction to the Assembly — even a direction to overturn a date. We also know that case law and judicial review would support his position.

I deplore the Secretary of State’s actions on Friday 24 November 2006, and he should cease forthwith from saying that the law will be upheld and that there must be devolution or dissolution, because he is wrong. He proved that last week; he proved the farce. Therefore, please, Secretary of State, do not continue with the farce.

Dr Farren: I suppose that it could have been predicted that, at a time when our thoughts and plans should have been focused on our future, today’s debate — the first full debate in our transitional format — would find us once again back in the blame game. That is what the motion, and its amendment, has invited us to engage in, with unionists attempting to out-unionist unionists, and Sinn Féin feeling that it has to assert its so-called republican credentials.

Remarks from Members only underline why interventions by successive Secretaries of State in the proceedings of this, and former, Assemblies have been inevitable — even to the point of suspension. However, the main responsibility for our suspension lies not with Secretaries of State but with ourselves, and we are fools to ignore that reality.

I have always regretted that any Secretary of State over the past eight years has had to make such interventions. Indeed, some time ago, the SDLP put forward coherent proposals that would have obviated the need for suspension to have persisted for so long. Nonetheless, Madam Speaker, we are where we are.

If we are to move forward, and if this Assembly is to be the locus for the hopes and aspirations of those whom we claim to represent, we must end the blame game.

3.00 pm

We must take responsibility for our own affairs, and by our taking that responsibility, render impossible further interventions, let alone suspensions, by Secretaries of State. Madam Speaker, if we persist in not doing so — if we do not act responsibly and begin to address urgently the critical and practical matters that face our society — the Assembly is in greater danger than ever of becoming an irrelevance. Indeed, the events of 24 November in the Chamber were saved from becoming a major tragicomedy only by the real tragicomedy that transpired outside its doors.

What message does that give our society about the critical matters of economic development, reform of public services, education, and so on? A major report was published today on the future structure of education. We have had no opportunity to express our views on that report, when people would expect us to do so, because of the motion and amendment that are before us for debate. What message does that send about concerns over health, infrastructure and all the other practical matters that people sent us to the Assembly to deal with, if all that we engage in is a blame game, in which the object is to quote and misquote one another, as though the Assembly were a university debating room rather than a place where matters of serious concern to the electorate should be debated? What message is sent out if we try collectively to blame the Secretary of State for the mess that we are in, and, for good measure, every other Secretary of State, Governor General, Lord Lieutenant and King's Deputy back to Henry II?

We have been treated to historical treatise. One, from the leader of Sinn Féin, was about 1798, the proclamation of 1916, and all that was promised therein. The establishment of the Society of United Irishmen was based on the vision of uniting Catholic, Protestant and Dissenter under the common name of Irishman. The 1916 proclamation promised to treat:

It is a bit rich, however, to hear that vision repeated without any apology from the leader of a party that has supported the murder and maiming of the very people whom the United Irishmen set out to unite. I can hardly imagine that those men who gathered on Cave Hill would have condoned in any way the IRA's campaign of violence, which was perpetrated in the name of the very vision that the United Irishmen had fashioned in Belfast 200 years previously.

Indeed, it is of little value to quote noble and high-minded vision statements such as those of 1798, 1916, and other eras, if those statements are to be belied by such campaigns. Madam Speaker, I wonder how the many representatives of the groups in the business, trades union and community sectors, which all devoted many hours and considerable effort to preparing detailed memoranda on how we might plan our economic future, and which attended meetings of the Committee on the Preparation for Government, will react when they hear of today's proceedings. Many among them must be questioning the time and effort that they gave us during all those months.

I also wonder what the reaction of many of the electorate will be. I have recently been canvassing for a local by-election. On the doorsteps, people are saying that is not that they do not want devolution to return — most of them do, however much they may be sceptical about the prospects of its return. More than anything, however, they want to know whether parties will provide themselves with the opportunity to work openly and honestly with one another, for the greater good of all and will do so on the basis of equality, respect and adherence to the rule of law.

It is stating the obvious to say that we have to work together to overcome our divisions. Most people accept that reality. They recognise that we cannot forget the past, nor can we overlook the hurt caused by all sides in that past. They recognise that we must begin working together to start the healing process as best we possibly can and to commit ourselves to working for the social and economic betterment of all our people.

The people on the doorsteps are ahead of the politicians, but the future that they want will be built only on an honest acceptance of the commitments set out in the Good Friday Agreement, and, more recently, in the St Andrews Agreement. Those commitments must be honestly accepted as essential conditions for the return of devolution; full acceptance of the responsibilities under the new policing arrangements; and a full and open acceptance of responsibility to work the partnership arrangements that are set out in the Good Friday Agreement.

Simply indulging in a blame game, whether blaming the Secretary of State or one another, will not help us to advance towards that prospect or to realise those commitments. I trust that after today's debate we will begin to address more seriously the practical issues that people here want us to address effectively, with vision and creativity, on their behalf.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Molloy] in the Chair)

Mr Weir: I rise at this late hour of the debate with mixed emotions. It is right that we should have the opportunity to debate the interference of the Secretary of State, but, as a previous Member mentioned, there is a range of more pressing issues to be addressed. It was therefore disappointing that my party's amendment did not get chosen, because it would have provided an opportunity to debate issues such as water charges, the rating system, academic selection and the review of public administration. I am glad to say, however, that we will have a debate on the review of public administration.

I note, with a slight degree of disappointment, that Dr Farren is due to retire at the end of this session. I have also heard rumours that the hon Member for South Down Mr Nesbitt will not be standing for election in the Assembly again. I do not know whether those rumours are true. If they are, I urge him to reconsider, because this House obviously wants to hear more of the exciting analysis that he often gives us. The House would be a lot poorer if he were not here to give that analysis. I do not know whether there is any truth in that rumour, but I hope that Mr Nesbitt will at least seek election to this Chamber, even if he is not necessarily returned to it.

Dr Farren: Is the Member pleased to see me go?

Mr Weir: I have seen the sterling work that the Member has done. The difference that I make is that the Member has publicly announced that he will not be standing in the next Assembly election, whereas, at this stage, the suggestion that the hon Member for South Down will not stand again appears to be only a rumour, and perhaps a completely false one. Perhaps it is news to him — I have obviously been talking to some of his colleagues in South Down.

I also had mixed emotions when I saw Sir Reg Empey's motion on the Order Paper complaining about the Secretary of State's interference in the workings of the Assembly. My first thought was that he was having a laugh. It may be very noble of the hon Member to criticise the Secretary of State for his interference, but he has developed selective amnesia about his role, and his party's role, in the work of the previous Assembly and about the interference of previous Secretaries of State.

Am I alone in remembering Séamus Mallon announcing his resignation as Deputy First Minister in this Chamber in 1999? Indeed, it was so clear a resignation that I understand that he had to make his own way home that day — his ministerial car had been withdrawn. Use of his fax machine was withdrawn as well, and he no longer had access to his office. A few months later, however, there was interference from the then Secretary of State, and a resignation that had been as plain as the nose on anyone's face suddenly became an "unresignation". I did not hear a great deal of complaint about that from the party that tabled today's motion.

We then had a situation —

Mr Kennedy: Was the Member still in that party then?

Mr Weir: I made my position on the matter very clear at the time.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Unlike Mr Kennedy.

Mr Weir: Yes.

In 2001, the Assembly's integrity, which appears now to be sacrosanct to the Ulster Unionist Party, was interfered with again when we went through the pantomime farce of Members from the Alliance Party and the Women's Coalition becoming Unionists for the day simply to overcome the obstacle of a majority of the unionist community not being prepared to elect a First Minister. On that occasion, the Ulster Unionist Party seemed to care little about the integrity of the Assembly. Indeed, the party's then leader was perfectly happy to benefit from the Assembly's lack of integrity.

There was supposed to be an Assembly election in the summer of 2003, but the then Secretary of State interfered to try to put off that election, in what was called the "save Dave" campaign. Unfortunately for the Ulster Unionist Party, that was simply putting off the inevitable. The Secretary of State and the Government have now passed the stage at which it was pointless to try to rescue the Ulster Unionist Party. A "rescue Reggie" plan is no longer on the agenda.

Although it is perfectly valid to criticise the Secretary of State for his interference on 24 November, it rankles when that criticism comes from UUP members who have been perfectly happy to accept interference in the political process by previous Secretaries of State. If Members wish to take the high moral ground, they should at least try to ensure that they are not serial offenders before doing so.

It must be said, however —

Mr Kennedy: That is rich coming from you.
[Laughter.]

Mr Weir: I would like more crimes to be taken into consideration.

Whatever criticism I may have —

Dr Birnie: Does the Member concede that the interference that undoubtedly occurred on 24 November benefited his party? He appears to be arguing that past interference benefited my party, so, logically, is he saying that the same is true in his case?

Mr Weir: I am making the point — not for the first time — that the Member's party has shown a degree of hypocrisy. I have not argued that interference has been to the benefit of my party. The Member has difficulty with either listening or logical thought. Given his support for the Belfast Agreement down the years, perhaps logical thought is not one of the Member's fortes.

Whatever criticism I make of the UUP's level of hypocrisy, its hands are pristine compared with those of Sinn Féin. On behalf of the rest of the Democratic Unionist Party, I echo the Member for North Antrim Mr Paisley Jnr by utterly repudiating the disgraceful attack on the integrity of the RUC that took place in the Chamber earlier. Those men and women who served in the Royal Ulster Constabulary provided us with peace for many years. Many of us were able to sleep safely in our beds because of them, and for the RUC's name to be dragged through the dirt by the Member who spoke earlier is utterly reprehensible.

In looking at the current situation, I am slightly bemused that a Sinn Féin Member has suddenly started quoting Gandhi as a great reference. Yes, his remarks about British democracy are well known, but the central tenet of Gandhi's life was non-violence. If Sinn Féin had truly followed Gandhi's teachings over the past 35 years, many people who are unfortunately lying in their graves would be alive today. I will not listen to Sinn Féin's hypocrisy on that issue.

I will not listen to that party's whiter-than-white complaining about the Secretary of State because, time and time again, it has gone running to the Secretary of State to alter the process to benefit itself.

3.15 pm

Complaints were made earlier about the fact that we are four years into suspension, something that I am sure many of us regret. However, only one party has been to blame for that suspension: the party opposite. Its failure to support policing and the rule of law, its connection with terrorist structures and its continued paramilitarism and criminality have been the blocks that have prevented us from moving from debating the Secretary of State's interference to tackling issues of real meat and substance. The party opposite brought down the Assembly in 2002, and it is that party that prevents its restoration today.

The change that must take place in the party opposite is not simply a matter of words; it is about key tests on the rule of law, democracy and policing. For example, will the party opposite urge people to give information to the police about the recent dreadful incident in south Armagh? That is one of the key tests. Will that party encourage young nationalists and republicans to join the police? Will its members give evidence and inform the police when incidents happen in their areas?

There is a range of tests; it is not simply a question of supporting structures or making a statement. What that party does in practice is the relevant test for this party. Until that is resolved, the Secretary of State will have the opportunity to intervene, and that is something that we should all deplore. However, the solution lies in the hands of the party opposite. If that party wants to move this process forward, it knows precisely what it must do.

It is right that we should send a clear signal today, albeit one that is limited by the terms of the motion, which does not go far enough in considering the wider issues. We are happy to say that the Secretary of State should not intervene; we should have some degree of control over our own destiny. The Assembly should set its own agenda, but we should, at least, do so on the basis of a consistent position and not lapse into the hypocrisy of either the proposer of the motion or the party opposite.

Mr O'Dowd: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I speak as much to have a right of reply, a Cheann Comhairle, as to endorse our party's amendment to the motion.

The Member for Mid Ulster who sits on the opposite Benches said earlier that I was smirking at his comments about victims and the disappeared. I wish to place on record that nothing could be further from the truth. I have relatives who are victims. My constituency includes the towns of Lurgan, Portadown and Banbridge, which know only too well what violence can do to a community. Indeed, that Member, who is not present in the Chamber, associated with the mass murderer Billy Wright, who caused many deaths in my constituency.

In relation to the allegations of smirking, I wish to put it on record that nothing could be further from the truth. The most parliamentary language that I can use to describe the Member's comments is that they were inappropriate and far from the truth.

Mr Hussey: Considering the historical issues that have been mentioned today and the fact that my father was a Welshman, perhaps I should complain about the Roman invasion of Britain. We are the ancient Britons; we were driven westwards. Similarly, the fact that my mother's family is from Ballybay perhaps means that the invasion of the neighbouring area of Clontibret should also be on my lips. However, I digress, Mr Deputy Speaker, and I apologise for doing so.

Dr Farren and Peter Weir mentioned many of the issues that we could, and should, debate. Those Members who sat in the previous Assembly will be aware of the issue that I had in relation to Sinn Féin representation in the Chamber and that party's claim that its Members were democrats because of their electoral mandate. I could not accept it then, and I do not accept it now.

I accept that the party has an electoral mandate, but I maintain that the democratic mandate has to be attained by Sinn Féin. Its Members can, by their actions, attain that democratic mandate, and I hope that eventually they do so. That would allow them to move forward and deal with the democratic issues that the other parties in this Chamber are trying to deal with.

I support the motion. The Secretary of State, through his actions to date in the political process, has displayed a total lack of credibility. The process is a shambles, and it is little wonder that the general public has lost faith in politics. Here we have a Transitional Assembly that will last until the end of January. It is not really an Assembly at all, but something created by the Secretary of State essentially as a sop, perhaps to hobble Members and prevent us from making proper decisions. I have some sympathy with Mr McCartney's view that the entire situation is a puppet show, although those might not be the words that I would have used. However, it is certainly a shambles and a fiasco.

I wonder about the Secretary of State's motivation for his actions. Iraq has become something of a quagmire, the sharks are circling over cash for honours, and the Prime Minister is trying desperately to have one positive chapter in the account of his soon-to-be-over premiership. In anticipation of life after the current Prime Minister, several candidates, including our own Secretary of State, have thrown their hats into the ring for the job of second in command of the Labour Party. In this more crowded race, it will be tough going.

Others are already out of the blocks, grabbing headlines with comments on many issues, including, for example, the wearing of veils. Therefore there is great expectation that Northern Ireland will cross the line for the sake of the Prime Minister's legacy and the Secretary of State's ambitions.

I will choose my words carefully in what I say next: I firmly believe that we have witnessed the prostitution of our political process at the behest of the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State has overstepped the mark in his efforts to move the process on. I too want devolved Government for our people, and I want to be allowed to get on with the job that I was elected to do three years ago. However, the manner in which the Secretary of State behaved on Friday 24 November was an insult to the Speaker of this House. It was also an insult to the Members of this Assembly, and, more importantly, it was an insult to the electorate of Northern Ireland. There is nothing wrong with wanting to trade Hillsborough for Dorneywood, but the Secretary of State's recent intervention displayed equal measures of arrogance and desperation, damaging his own credibility and that of the political process with one pre-prepared response.

There is no doubt that this gung-ho attitude would not be tolerated in Wales. His calculated guess that, as a means to an end, this riding roughshod over the political process here would go unnoticed in Westminster might have paid off had it not been for the continuing disastrous saga in this Province. I suppose that we owe the Secretary of State a debt of gratitude for re-igniting interest in Northern Ireland within the corridors of power, where, after years of an exasperatingly slow process, debate had moved on to the war on terror, climate change and John Prescott.

It is little wonder that there has been a huge drop in the number of people on our electoral register. As apathy increases and the more moderate voters stay at home, the fate of us all is being decided by an increasingly polarised group. The will and momentum to finally get devolved institutions up and running is fast evaporating and could soon be out of our grasp.

(Madam Speaker in the Chair)

If there is not a proper Assembly, should we not at least have a Speaker and a Business Committee who can make decisions without the intervention of the Secretary of State? One would think so, but the Speaker was appointed by the Secretary of State to do his bidding. It was embarrassing to sit in the Chamber on Friday 24 November when a prepared response supplied by the Northern Ireland Office was read out. It was so out of sync with what was said that proceedings became farcical.

Those examples point up the lack of credibility of the Secretary of State and his political master, the Prime Minister. They are so desperate to save the downward spiral of their political careers that they will stop at nothing to keep the process train on track: they will even reduce the integrity of the institutions that they helped to create.

Deadline after deadline — each apparently immovable — has passed and been fudged. Each fudge is worse than the one before. That does nothing but add more and more concessions in the vacuum before issues can be resolved.

That blatantly opportunistic and farcical approach to politics turns the public off and taints the entire political class in Northern Ireland. It should stop immediately. If the public are to have any faith in politics, the bare minimum that they should expect from the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister is a modicum of integrity and consistency. Sadly, that currently seems too much to ask for.

I do not wish to diminish the seriousness of the event that occurred in the Great Hall on 24 November, but it is hard to know who caused the bigger disruption that day. Was it Michael Stone with his improvised devices, or the Secretary of State with an improvised Assembly? The farcical scenes — in the Chamber, not in the foyer — on 24 November were, I suppose, appropriate as we move into the panto season. I ask the Secretary of State where his political career is. Is it behind him?

Ms Ritchie: Today we have been subjected to a debate consisting of a diet of historical references going back centuries and, of course, many theological references. Sinn Féin and the DUP have been trying to justify their own positions. There have been contributions dealing with historical, competitive grievances, but none of them moves us forward politically or benefits the community in the North of Ireland. Those speeches do not provide for economic growth, put bread on the table, or speed up waiting lists for the elderly ladies in our constituencies who require hip operations.

However, lest any of us be in any doubt, Members have been set a challenge to achieve political accommodation. We should set about doing that rather than indulging in our grievances and our past. Members must move forward if we are to bring about change and a better way of life for the people whom we represent.

To achieve a political accommodation, there must be full subscription to power sharing by the DUP, and Sinn Féin must totally and absolutely sign up to all policing structures, encourage young people to join the PSNI and encourage people to give information to the police on issues of criminality, so that those responsible can be apprehended.

The urgent restoration of the political institutions is required so that we have political and economic stability, growth, investment in our infrastructure, and to engender hope in our community. My colleague Seán Farren, the Member for North Antrim, said that when canvassing in the past few days, he found that people are looking for that hope and crying with desperation. We have the opportunity to give them that hope.

There is no doubt that the Secretary of State and the British Government have deliberately engineered this process to show themselves in a good light. They have set up the deadlines, threatened parties if such deadlines are not met, and defaulted on and violated their own deadlines when the answers provided were not adequate, or when two parties did not live up to their commitments.

3.30 pm

The process has been characterised by the boy who cried wolf too often, namely the Secretary of State, and by the procrastination and obduracy of two parties that have failed to provide us with political hope, progress and stability and with that political accommodation which they could make. The communities are crying out for hope, stability, justice, equality and, above all, for a better future for their children and generations to come.

Earlier, Members referred to victims. There is no doubt that the needs of victims must be addressed, but it must be done in the hope of a promising future and in the knowledge that victims' aspirations can be fully recognised. The public sees political parties anxious to negotiate for themselves, parties that are selfish and refusing to think of the requirements of the wider community. It sees parties more interested in their standing in the opinion polls or in how they can outwit each other. What happened to the principles, enunciated in the Good Friday Agreement, of partnership, of working together and of trying to resolve the problems for the betterment of the people the parties represent?

What is the position of Members on water charges, rates, the Review of Public Administration (RPA), tourism, infrastructure and the need to address waiting lists? I have statistics on what is required for reinvestment in the tourism infrastructure. Over the next five years, tourism will require £150 million to be spent on capital infrastructure; £25 million on marketing, servicing and events; and a further £25 million on the acquisition of skills and competitiveness. That can be achieved only if Members are serious about providing that political hope, if they can demonstrate that they can go that extra mile, instead of indulging in the past.

Members must not forget that they live on a small island and that perhaps the world has grown tired of us. If we want to be taken seriously, the final bold steps must be taken. Sinn Féin must sign up to policing and the DUP to power sharing. Members must provide certainty for the people; they must provide hope. That is what is now required.

Madam Speaker: Would the Member please keep to the motion?

Ms Ritchie: I will, Madam Speaker, though I have heard many speeches today that outline all the various principles to which I have referred.

Madam Speaker: I have reminded all those Members of the necessity of speaking to the motion.

Ms Ritchie: I am about to finish. Of the motions before us, neither the principal motion nor the amendment affords people hope or stability. Members must move forward. The real question for the Assembly is whether we are ready to create that new political dispensation, to move from the past to the future, and whether the two parties that are causing the present difficulties are ready to trigger the mechanisms to provide the new future that the people require.

Mr McElduff: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Ba mhaith liom tacaíocht a thabhairt don leasú atá curtha síos ag uachtarán Shinn Féin, Gearóid Adams.

I speak in support of the amendment proposed by my party leader, Gerry Adams, which deplores the interference of the British Secretary of State in the proceedings of the Assembly. It is interesting that the word "intervention" is used by the DUP while the word "interference" is used by the UUP. It is as though the DUP is keener to hold the hand of the British Secretary of State than the UUP. The DUP perceives gentle "interventions" from Peter Hain; whereas, in Reg Empey's analysis, his actions amount to "interference".

The British Government have interfered not just in the Assembly itself, but throughout the structures and processes established by the Good Friday Agreement. My colleague Caitríona Ruane dealt adequately with the constant undermining of equality commitments and how the appointment of the Interim Commissioner for Victims and Survivors was mishandled.

The history of British interference and its negative impact on our country is already well detailed and chronicled in history books and has been here today. The outcome of the 1918 elections did not suit the British Government, so they partitioned the country. More recently, when Bobby Sands MP was elected in 1981, the rules on who could or could not contest elections had to be changed — moving the goalposts. More recently, this Assembly and the political institutions have been suspended consistently against the will of the Irish people.

When it comes to Ireland, British Secretaries of State really have not got a clue. They do not understand Ireland. Which one of them was recorded in the House of Commons Hansard as saying there would be a meeting in a "tea shop" in Dublin, when it should have been a meeting with the "Taoiseach" in Dublin?

Dr Birnie: I thank the hon Member for giving way. He mentioned the 1918 election. Is he aware that in terms of the number of votes cast, his party, Sinn Féin, did not get more than 50% of the votes in that election. It certainly got a majority of the seats on the island; that was to do with the voting system, but the party had less than 50% of the vote.

Mr McElduff: I thank the Member for the information. It is rich coming from a party in electoral decline, but we will not go into that.

There is a great phrase used in Civil Service circles, which is “duty Minister for the weekend”. Did you ever hear anything like it? British direct rule Ministers take it in sequence to be the duty Minister for the weekend. The first time that I heard that phrase was under the stewardship of Malcolm Moss. Everybody knows that when Patrick Mayhew was first dispatched to the North of Ireland, the NIO civil servants showed him a map. He was very perceptive and intelligent, because he looked at the map and said: “I presume these areas marked green are where the nationalist tradition tends to live?” The civil servants replied: “That’s right, Minister.” “And these areas marked orange, I presume, are where the unionist tradition tends to live?” Again, the civil servants told him that he was correct. “What’s this blue bit in the middle?” said Mayhew. “That’s Lough Neagh”, replied the civil servants. That was Patrick Mayhew’s introduction to the North of Ireland.

Of course, Peter Hain is not elected to any institution in Ireland, and it is regrettable to see that the DUP in particular wants to hold on to Peter Hain’s hand in the time ahead, instead of exhibiting confidence and taking the reins of power itself. There is no doubt that people are counting the cost of British direct rule and have cited the issues: lack of inward investment; poor quality of water and roads infrastructure; education and health cuts; the prospect of water charges and rates increases; and planning policy statement (PPS) 14, spelling the death knell of many rural communities where there is a real housing crisis.

The DUP is not willing to seize the reins of power. I call on all locally elected representatives to seize control of our destiny, to let go of Peter Hain and walk for ourselves, to map out our own future and to remove the umbilical cord. It is obvious to me that the DUP is far happier with unaccountable civil servants running the show rather than seizing the reins of power itself.

The bona fides of the DUP with regard to power sharing generally has to be questioned. Its track record in local government west of the Bann, and not least in Castlereagh and Ballymena, make it clear that the DUP has no interest in sharing power with anybody. Contrast that with the d’Hondt mechanism and principles, which are applied universally west of the Bann, where nationalists tend to have the more significant electoral clout.

There is value in North/South co-operation, all-Ireland harmonisation and all-Ireland integration in the time ahead. In respect of health planning, for example, let us avoid back-to-back planning along the border, duplication and waste of spending. Let us maximise scarce resources.

Those are matters for the Programme for Government Committee.

Madam Speaker: Draw your remarks to a close; you are not keeping to the subject of the motion.

Mr McElduff: Are my remarks time-limited? I will move to a conclusion now, Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle, and I thank you for your guidance.

Ian Óg appears fixated about a united Ireland — he doth protest too much when he talks non-stop about a united Ireland. Sinn Féin will continue to campaign peacefully, politically and democratically for a united Ireland and is determined and confident that it will be achieved.

On 24 November, Martin McGuinness clearly stated that he was happy to carry out his “responsibilities and duties conscientiously” — [Official Report, Bound Volume 21, p3, col 2].

The DUP was considerably less clear, but I hope that in the weeks ahead the DUP will engage wholeheartedly in the Programme for Government Committee and in the subgroups, which are doing very important work.

Mr Kennedy: It has been an interesting, historic and sometimes hysterical day. I say “historic” for several reasons. This morning, there was drama when Dr Paisley made a direct appeal to the leader of Sinn Féin, Gerry Adams, to join the Policing Board — that was negotiation, I suppose, by insult. Nevertheless, many in the media will see that as progress. Be careful what you ask for, because sometimes you might get it.

The most historic aspect of this afternoon’s part of the debate was the silent and seamless handover of the Speaker’s Chair by Madam Speaker to the Deputy Speaker Mr Molloy. To the best of my knowledge — and I stand to be corrected — that was the first time that a Sinn Féin Member has presided over a debate in the Chamber. That was an interesting moment, and Mr Molloy took the Chair without any objection from the DUP or anyone else in the Chamber. Today, out of small beginnings, limited progress has been made.

The UUP wanted to have today’s debate in order to highlight the deficient manner in which the Assembly is forced to do business. A range of political matters has been mentioned today: 1798 was probably the earliest date mentioned, although another Member attempted to go back as far as Henry II. Irrespective of those, however, it is important to recognise that the Assembly lacks the credibility that comes with being in charge of its own affairs. It appears to be very much subject to the whim of the Secretary of State, Peter Hain. Members will do well to remember that Peter Hain dined out on speeches that threatened ill against Assembly Members and their staff. He said that they would all be thrown out of work and become unemployed. He worried my wife and alarmed my children.

Such was the venom from the Secretary of State that people began to wonder if I would have to get a proper job. Yet, on 24 November, for reasons of political expediency, the Secretary of State produced a fudge.

Sinn Féin's leader, Gerry Adams, lectured the Assembly on Templepatrick. It is an interesting place and in recent days has become important. It will be no less so tonight when, as I confess to the House, I am due to address the Ulster Unionist Party there.

A Member: In a telephone box?

3.45 pm

Mr Kennedy: No, the telephone kiosk was busy — I will not have jokes like that. My suspicion is that none of the people who will attend the meeting tonight will be interested in the historical interpretation placed on events there by Gerry Adams. Mr Adams reminded me of what the American poet Ralph Waldo Emerson said around 1840 about someone of whom he was presumably very suspicious:

"The louder he talked of his honour, the faster we counted our spoons."

Therefore, we will count our spoons when we listen to Mr Adams.

We then had Dr Paisley's contribution and the plea to Sinn Féin to do something on policing. It remains to be seen if that is the continuation of what might be described as a courtship dance. However, only time will tell.

Alban Maginness gave us a different form of history, although, to be fair, he did place on record timely reminders to Sinn Féin of its immediate past history. One point that he raised with due regard was that people have lost faith in politics and in the political process.

We then had the inevitable lecture from David Ford, the leader of the Alliance Party. He is no longer in his place. The Ulster Unionist Party did not formally support the St Andrews Agreement. It is not our document. The political fingerprints on it have nothing whatever to do with the Ulster Unionist Party. However, other parties, such as the DUP and Sinn Féin, appear to be very interested in its outcome and in its practical outworking.

Lord Morrow engaged, to an extent, directly with Sinn Féin across the Chamber. As a weather predictor, he is the champion of the Assembly, and we will be looking out for more weather predictions. We will see if Mr Morrow can be as accurate in the future as he apparently has been in the past.

Michelle Gildernew retreated through 800 years of misery. She mentioned the potato famine, 1916, and said that everybody was to blame — particularly Peter Hain — and that we are all very ungrateful. That is basically a precis of her contribution.

However, Alan McFarland asked important questions. [Laughter.]

It is all written down. I know what all the Members said because I wrote it down. Alan McFarland asked significant questions about the behaviour of individuals, political parties and Government, none of which have been addressed in the debate. One hopes, for the long-suffering taxpayer at least — if not for other Members of the House — that honest answers will be provided.

Alex Attwood heavily criticised the Secretary of State, but then indicated that he would not follow through on those criticisms by voting for the motion. I do not know if Members understood that logic. Frankly, I did not — so I will leave it there. [Laughter.]

Mr Robert McCartney drew attention to the fact that the Speaker had had to read from a large-print document that was either "Janet and John" or "Dick and Dora", but, nevertheless, it happened. He again posed questions about the choreography, and sequence, of events. I must reiterate that those are questions that deserve answers.

We then heard an impassioned speech, as usual, from Dr McCrea — I am not sure whether he is in his place — but we certainly did not get much clarity from him. Instead, many allegations were made against various people. It appears that Dr McCrea is pessimistic about early progress being made. [Laughter.] I was able to decipher that in the middle of his contribution. We then quickly suspended and tried to digest his words over lunch.

We returned to the Chamber to hear a contribution from Conor Murphy. We received a more up-to-date history lesson but, again, it was not a happy affair: it was all about wrongs that had been done on Conor and his community. It was rather tired and very predictable. However, he was quite responsive to the earlier pleas of Dr Paisley. It reminded me of the last few words of an old hymn:

"We know one gate is open, one ear will hear our prayer."

It will be interesting to see whose prayer will be heard. To an extent, the courtship dance continued. However, it appears to be more of a minuet than a waltz.

Mr Nelson McCausland then complained bitterly. Members will know what a sad life I have led, and what a particularly sad morning I have spent listening to you lot and writing it all down. [Laughter.] Copies of my speech will be available for Hansard later. Mr McCausland berated the Irish language in particular and called for what he described as “an Irish language audit”. He wanted to know how much money would be required, et cetera. It would have been all very well for him to do so, had it not been for the fact that his party, during the negotiations at St Andrews, made provisions for an Irish language Act, which will undoubtedly provide for measures of the Irish language which, quite frankly — [Interruption.]

Mr P Robinson: Will the Member give way?

Mr Kennedy: No, I am sorry. The Member had his chance. If a Member's name is not written down on my list, he or she does not qualify. The Member's name was not on my list.

The St Andrews Agreement clearly outlines plans for an Irish language Act that will have a considerable impact — not least a cost impact on the provision for the Irish language.

We then heard from Caitríona Ruane, who, in her maiden speech, was very unmaidenly and was quite aggressive. She started her speech by quoting Gandhi; I was not sure whether it was Goosey Goosey or Mahatma. However, it was stirring stuff. She talked about the artificial border, discrimination, famine, poverty, inequality and injustice — this from a person who lives in Carlingford, but drags herself up to Northern Ireland to indulge in all those things. [Laughter.] She wants to come to Northern Ireland so that she can be discriminated against, enjoy poverty and endure injustice and inequality. Welcome to Northern Ireland. [Laughter.]

Ms Ruane also said that, deep in her heart, burned a desire for a united Ireland. It reminded me of the dead parrot sketch from Monty Python: the parrot is dead; it is lifeless; it is completely dead; it is not pining for the fjords. Those who support a united Ireland have no prospect of success. The principle of consent enshrined in the 1998 Belfast Agreement — about which Ms Ruane's party is apparently enthusiastic — confirms that. She had better smell the coffee.

Ian Óg, as he has now been popularly described, brought us back to Templepatrick with the Templepatrick declaration. It was the longest suicide note in history — or perhaps not; we shall see. The Templepatrick declaration clearly arose as a result of the DUP meeting last Friday. How significant Templepatrick is in all of this; its historical position will be absolutely crucial. Many years from now, historians will say, “Ah, was that Templepatrick? Is that where that happened?”

Dr Farren: Was the Member there?

Mr Kennedy: I was not there, but many of those who were have signed up to the Templepatrick declaration, and we shall see the practical outworking of that.

I pay tribute to Dermot Nesbitt's very thoughtful and careful analysis, which was not always terribly well received, particularly by an ungrateful Peter Weir — [Interruption.]

Oh yes, he is always sticking with his own lot.

Dr Farren reminded us that this Assembly should, and must, take responsibility. I hope, therefore, that he will join the UUP in the Lobbies to ensure that we stand up for this Assembly's independence.

It is rather a pity that Mr Weir chose to indulge again in his lone crusade to express vitriol about the Ulster Unionist Party. I suppose that it is done in the vain hope that it will endear him to his new party, but we shall see.

Mr O'Dowd rebutted something that I did not quite understand and have long since forgotten. Derek Hussey made a very good contribution and accurately described the current Assembly as a shambles, which I believe reflects public opinion.

We heard Margaret Ritchie's contribution, and I hope to see her voting in the Lobbies with the UUP as well.

Mr McElduff made another negative contribution. He referred to back-to-back cross-border health considerations. It is a pity that his party colleague Ms de Brún did not take that into account in the case of Tyrone County Hospital — which is in his constituency of West Tyrone — when she was the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Kennedy: No prompting from the back.

Madam Speaker, in spite of what everyone else has said, I shall be brief. When everything in the pot is boiled down, it is clear that the Secretary of State has undermined the basis of this Assembly, and in so doing he has seriously compromised your independence and authority, and that of your office. At the same time, he has not enhanced his own political reputation, either in Belfast or in London.

Question, That the amendment be made, put and negated.

Main Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly deplores the interference of the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland in the proceedings of the Assembly on Friday 24 November 2006.

Adjourned at 4.00 pm.

THE TRANSITIONAL ASSEMBLY

Tuesday 5 December 2006

The Assembly met at 10.30 am (Madam Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

Review of Public Administration

Madam Speaker: The Business Committee agreed that the House may sit until 6.00 pm to debate the motion on the review of public administration (RPA). I have further consulted with the party Whips, who have agreed that the first round of Members' speeches should be limited to 15 minutes, with subsequent speeches being limited to 10 minutes.

Before the debate begins, I wish to remind the House that, although Members will have made declarations in the Register of Members' Interests, given the subject of today's debate, they should also be aware of the requirement of Standing Order 29(f), which relates to the need:

"Before taking part in any debate or proceeding of the Assembly," for a Member to:

"declare any interest, financial or otherwise, which is relevant to that debate".

Mr Weir: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Why was the amendment that Mr Maskey and Mr O'Dowd tabled, which is effectively a direct negative of the motion, selected when the DUP's proposed amendment to yesterday's motion, which added to the motion, was rejected?

Madam Speaker: As I said yesterday, I will not discuss my reasons for rejecting any amendments. That is not convention. The amendment is not a direct negative. That is my decision. The amendment expands on the motion.

Mr Hay: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I want to raise an issue that occurred in the House yesterday. It is important that it be raised. I am content for you, Madam Speaker, to deal with it today or in the future. There is nothing wrong with Members having a bit of banter during debates. Sometimes, it can add to the debate. However, for a Member to mislead the House and to tell an untruth is totally different. I refer to the words of the deputy leader of the Ulster Unionist Party, Danny Kennedy, when he was making his winding-up speech after yesterday's debate. I shall quote briefly from yesterday's Hansard for your information, Madam Speaker. Referring to my colleague Nelson McCausland, he said:

"It would have been all very well for him to do so, had it not been for the fact that his party, during the negotiations at St Andrews, made provisions for an Irish language Act". — [Official Report, Bound Volume 21, p48, col 1].

Madam Speaker: I have heard what you said, Mr Hay. Obviously, I have not had a chance to read Hansard this morning. I will check the report and get back to you on the matter.

Mr Hay: Madam Speaker, it was an untruth and was misleading to the House.

Madam Speaker: Order. I am on my feet, Mr Hay. I will consider the matter and I will make a ruling on it. I cannot do either until I have read Hansard. Thank you very much.

Mr Gallagher: I beg to move

That this Assembly expresses serious concern about the potential of a seven council model to centralise services, remove jobs and resources from many areas and to underpin sectarianism and community division; and further calls on the Secretary of State to shelve present plans for super councils and allow the decision on future council arrangements to be taken by a restored Northern Ireland Assembly.

It is entirely ironic that, on the matter of the number of councils, the only party to stand by the British Government with regard to super-councils is Sinn Féin. It is particularly ironic, given that the leader of Sinn Féin reminded everybody in the Assembly that it was the role of the Northern Ireland Secretary of State and his predecessors to promote British interests in Northern Ireland.

Ms Stanton: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Sinn Féin is not the only supporter of super-councils. Many other groups also support them.

Madam Speaker: Thank you very much, Ms Stanton, for that information. However, I am afraid that that was not a point of order.

Ms Stanton: The Member misrepresents many people.

Madam Speaker: Ms Stanton, I am on my feet. That was not a point of order. Thank you.

Mr Gallagher: Ordinary people will be less concerned with the irony of that than with its implications for them. Those who stand to lose their jobs are obvious potential victims. Those who live in rural areas and will suffer as a consequence of centralisation are also obvious potential victims. The great majority of people, who will bear the brunt of an unequal distribution of the rates burden under a seven-council model, are also potential victims.

There is no argument about the need for the reform of local government. Ratepayers want less bureaucracy, greater efficiency and better delivery of public services. They expect a better system. However, they are entitled to one that is fair to all, regardless of where they live, and one that preserves local identity and some sense of place. However, the architects of the plan arrogantly ignore such a laudable aim and instead want to push their plan for super-councils through. Of course, the plan is not in the interests of the ordinary people who pay rates: it is a plan that will lead to centralisation, Balkanisation and confusion, and to an unfair and unequal distribution of the rates burden.

This is a plan to centralise public services on an unprecedented scale, and it will be at the expense of rural areas and the people who live there.

It is a plan that will move jobs, offices and resources away from our county towns, and it will leave rural areas, especially in the west, even further disadvantaged than they are at present. Sinn Féin is the only party here that wants the plan to go ahead, and if that happens, it will be a serious mistake that will leave most ratepayers disadvantaged and disempowered.

The plan is based on an English model for local government, and it is totally inappropriate for Northern Ireland. It will lead to the closure of offices, especially west of the Bann, and it will move the jobs and resources into a small number of our larger towns. We are also being asked to accept a model with three unionist-dominated councils and three nationalist-dominated councils. That will underpin the community division and polarisation that has served the people of Northern Ireland so badly.

The Government tell us about a strategic framework plan for a shared future in Northern Ireland, yet they are completely undermining it with a seven super-council model for local government with its inevitable consequence of trapped minorities. Those trapped minorities will be under the control of dominant and domineering oppressive majorities.

Instead of seizing the opportunity to deliver equality and promote good relations for future generations, the architects of that model will separate and segregate people on a crude sectarian basis. It should be clear to anyone who understands the depth of the division in our community and the importance of working towards a shared future that this is indeed a retrograde step.

Even now there are some councils in which some parties continue to keep political power and exclude other parties from top council posts. Despite this, and despite the danger of such practices being repeated in the new councils, Sinn Féin continues to take the word of the British Government on something as fundamental as the protection and safeguards for what will become permanently trapped minorities. The fact is that while other aspects such as the boundaries of these new councils and the number of councillors have received attention, no safeguards have been produced to ensure equality.

We all know from experience and history that there are no effective checks and balances in the democratic world that can deter an elite group that chooses to abuse its powers. That is why the SDLP rejects the seven-council model. There are better models, and we want to have in place a model that guarantees equality and is able to deliver services efficiently to people everywhere in Northern Ireland.

The very first claim in the Government's own document, from those who designed the seven-council model, is that it would allow service operators to operate to common boundaries. In other words, all citizens within the new council boundaries would share the same health trusts and the same common boundaries for all key services. The health trusts, which take effect from 1 April 2007, will have completely different boundaries from those of the super-councils.

Take the example of people in Magherafelt, who will go to Derry for their council services yet will not be able to go to Derry for their health and hospital services. They will have to go to Antrim or perhaps Belfast. People living in the new council area in the west will find that some of them will go to Derry for their health services, some will go to Craigavon and some will go to Antrim.

The result will be that the delivery of public services will be every bit as messy, confusing and chaotic as before. Serious questions must be asked about a Government that still want to steamroll ahead with a plan that is so badly in breach of their own standards of efficiency and equity.

Most Members will agree that the very least that the ratepayer is entitled to under any new configuration is a fair and equal distribution of the rates burden. As elected representatives, we already know how many people are worried about their rates bills and the threatened water charges. In addition to that, they now have the implications of the seven-council arrangement, and that is a cause for serious alarm.

Let me give Members the example of the new West Local Government District — to use the Government's terminology — which includes the existing Fermanagh, Omagh, Dungannon and Cookstown council areas. Cookstown ratepayers are currently paying for a council loan of £1.55 million, Dungannon has a loan of £1.95 million, and Fermanagh ratepayers have a burden because there is a loan of £1.9 million, while Omagh has a £9 million loan.

In the proposed new council area, ratepayers will face a loan of £14.6 million. Given that the new councils will take over the liabilities of all existing councils, the rates bills in the old Cookstown, Dungannon and Fermanagh council areas will noticeably increase, while bills will decrease for the ratepayers in the old Omagh District Council area, because, as Members know, that is the way it will work. In any new council grouping where there is an exceptionally high burden of debt in one of the old council areas, that will become a debt burden on all of the ratepayers in the new council area.

If Members want a really shocking example, they should look at Magherafelt District Council. It currently has borrowings of £35,000 — very small indeed in comparison with the other councils — and as a result the rates there are among the lowest in Northern Ireland, at 120.67p. However, it will be in a new council area with Derry, which has a rate of 176.74p; Limavady, which has a rate of 152p; and Strabane, which has a rate of 149p. In the new council arrangement, the ratepayers of Magherafelt will face repayment on total borrowings of £31 million. Based on the estimates for the financial year 2004-05, that will mean a rates rise of 33%. To make that clear, a householder paying £1,000 a year will, because of this wonderful new model, be immediately faced with a rates bill of £1,330.

Those are examples of the serious flaws in the Government's proposals, and they all add up to compelling reasons for those responsible for the plan to go back to the drawing board.

The sense of place and local identity that is important for communities everywhere in Northern Ireland is in danger of being stripped away. Fermanagh is well known as the one council area that has retained its townland names: all that is in jeopardy. Members from other constituencies and other district council areas will point to aspects of their own heritage that the local ratepayers do not want placed in jeopardy. All of our identities are shaped by local identity and a sense of place, and those are very important to all of us. In the new model, local identity and a sense of place are being vandalised — in the interests of what?

I have outlined the serious implications for ratepayers across Northern Ireland. I am interested to hear what the Sinn Féin representatives in my constituency have to say about ratepayers inheriting a debt from another council.

People have a shared pride in their area, and, in our divided community, that has empowered locally elected representatives to work for the common good. Many Members will know from their experiences that such shared pride has enabled those representatives to work for the common good in the interests of the wider community. Now, a direct rule Government and Sinn Féin are preparing to cast all that aside and expecting people to accept a model of local government that is neither local nor legitimate.

I fail to understand how elected representatives of local communities with any sense of responsibility — especially in the west — can possibly lend their support to the plan.

Mr Maskey: I beg to move the following amendment: Leave out all after the first "Assembly" and insert:

"affirms its support for the Review of Public Administration and the new arrangements for strong and effective local government, within a seven council model, underpinned by power sharing, equality and social inclusion."

Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

For the record, Members are aware that I am a member of Belfast City Council. As I listened to Tommy Gallagher, it was patently obvious that he has not spoken or listened carefully to some of his party colleagues. Two of them, Cllrs John O'Kane and Dermot Curran, sit on the political panel, which, as Members know, is at one end of the process of the Local Government Taskforce. Tommy Gallagher says that he wants a 15-council model. However, neither he nor any other Member has publicly or privately proffered a credible explanation for a larger number of councils making sense.

I simply ask Tommy Gallagher, or any other Member who talks about reducing the number of councils from 26 to 15, for example, to tell me and the general public which councils they want to retain or abolish. Do they want to retain Carrickfergus Borough Council? Tommy Gallagher should talk to his colleague, who is deputy mayor of Castlereagh Borough Council. On what I call a council league of shame, it has the worst under-representation of Catholics in the workforce, at only 6.8%. A similar disparity, both religious and gender-based, exists in other council areas in the Six Counties. I want anyone who argues for any particular configuration to provide a rationale for doing so.

Mr Gallagher also mentioned the argument surrounding the rates burden.

Mr Nesbitt: Mr Maskey referred to percentages of under-representation in the workforce. Can he give evidence from the Equality Commission statistics to show where there is not equality of opportunity?

Mr Maskey: I am not here as a witness, and I do not have to give evidence. However, Members will find that the recent Committee on the Administration of Justice report provides a good indicator. My point is that there is religious disparity in the workforce. Not only is there Catholic under-representation, but the reverse is also the case in areas where there is under-representation of the Protestant population in the workforce. Sinn Féin wants a system of local government that ensures that such under-representation does not happen in any district council area. From day one, as Tommy Gallagher's colleagues on the Local Government Taskforce will know, Sinn Féin has never been wedded to having a particular number of councils.

In fact, Sinn Féin resisted it from the very early stages. We were not prepared to plump for a figure of seven, six, 15, 12, or 11 councils; we were not prepared to throw a dart and choose a particular number because it sounded OK or because it might guarantee a certain number of councillors. Much of the political debate has been driven not by the number of councils but by the number of councillors. There are parties that are afraid of having a serious reduction in their number of councillors in the next election.

In 1999 or 2000 the previous Assembly endorsed the RPA. If this motion succeeds, politically the work of the RPA will be given back to the Assembly. That will mean that it will have taken 10 years for the review to be completed, and many would argue that it will be out of date. I see no reason why Members should defer this matter. Sean Begley and I worked at task force level and on the political panel throughout the process. Based on that personal experience, I do not have confidence that the other parties will get to grips with the fundamental and serious issues that face us. We need to move full speed ahead on the RPA to get a result soon. We need a fairer rates burden and to have equality at the heart of local government, and when people are elected they must not be treated as second-class citizens in the chambers and the systems of local government.

Members need to bring on board the concept of community planning, which would ensure social inclusion. Of the nine options, the seven-council model is the one that guarantees that any minority community will be at least 20%. In any of the three versions of the 15-council model, there would be minority communities of such a small size and scale that they would not be able to return an elected representative to look after their interests. Sinn Féin is not prepared to accept a system of local government in which people cannot get elected or be represented in a council chamber. The option 7C model guarantees that minority communities will be of sufficient size to have people elected and be involved in the governance arrangements of the new councils. That is why option 7C is the only one, out of the nine options on the table —

Dr Birnie: The Member is arguing that under, say, the 15-council model, there would be cases in which one section of the electoral community would not be represented. The 15 proposed council areas are based on the 14 parliamentary constituencies outside Belfast, plus Belfast. Can the Member name any of the 14 constituencies outside Belfast that does not have a mix of nationalist, republican, unionist and other representatives in this House? Would that not be repeated at the council level?

Mr Maskey: Look at North Down Borough Council, for example. It is a small area; look at the community balance there. The key issue here is that the minority community would be so small that it could not be involved in the governance arrangements, the community planning process or even the elected representation. I ask Members to present the evidence. Sinn Féin has looked at every one of the nine models and asked people to bring forward further options. No options were brought forward.

Mrs Long: Is the Member suggesting that council boundaries should be gerrymandered in order to achieve certain electoral outcomes, rather than being divided in terms of good administration?

Mr Maskey: Certainly not. I hear people talking about Balkanisation — currently there are 26 district councils. How many of those are unionist-dominated, and how many are nationalist-dominated?

Can Members give me an answer?

11.00 am

The Members opposite have not even done their homework. There are more unionist-controlled district councils than nationalist-controlled ones. That should not be the case. If we have 15 councils, perhaps nine of them will be unionist-controlled and six or seven nationalist-controlled. Is that kind of Balkanisation any better? Is it the level of Balkanisation that suits Members here or is it the degree of Balkanisation?

We argue that the option 7C model allows minority communities in all council areas to have sufficient representation to allow them to be involved in the governance arrangements, in respect of both the community planning process and the ability to attain elected representative status.

Mr Storey: Will the Member give way?

Mr Maskey: No, I am sorry. I cannot give way again.

The system of local government that we advocate is the one that we have argued for from day one. We have never accepted anyone's proposals. It is great to hear Tommy Gallagher talking about Sinn Féin's supporting British policies. As someone said a while ago, patriotism is the last refuge of the scoundrel. I have not heard him be so anti-British in a long time; he seems only to be so when the number of councillors comes into question, as it will in the next round of discussions on local government. Notwithstanding that, we have argued from day one that our preferred system of local government had to be strong in order to get more power, but that it could not, under any circumstances, get Sinn Féin's support unless it was underpinned by the most rigorous checks, balances and safeguards for the benefit of citizens and their elected representatives.

Tommy Gallagher talked about the RPA proposals as if they were a done deal. He should ask his colleagues John O'Kane and Dermot Curran how many of the current proposals have already been signed off by his party. The community planning subgroup — [Interruption.]

I sit on the political panel, and I can tell the Member that his colleagues on it have never resisted the proposals or reacted negatively to them. Mr Gallagher talked about governance arrangements, but those are not tied down by any stretch of the imagination — because the unionist parties in particular do not want to concede the principal of power sharing in local government.

We want a system of local government that is strong and effective, which provides value for money for citizens, and which has a fair rates distribution across all the council areas. Councils must run on the principles of power sharing. Equality must be at the heart of governance arrangements, and, above anything else, the people, through the community planning process, must be involved. We have argued, both publicly and privately, with the direct-rule Ministers and on the political panel that equality should be put on a statutory basis. Citizens must be involved in the community planning process so that they can have a real say in how local government delivers their services.

I invite anyone to tell me how those principles can be underpinned by deferring this matter. The parties that want to defer the matter are not prepared to sign up to the kind of power-sharing arrangements that are required to prevent Balkanisation and further polarisation and to ensure that there is full inclusion.

Tommy Gallagher and members of other parties say that Sinn Féin is the only party to support the seven-council model. We may be the only political party in the Assembly to take this stand, but we are pleased to do so, and we are prepared to work through to the last moment to ensure that local government is based on all the principles that I have mentioned. There is a great deal of work yet to do.

INTERREG, the Equality Commission, the Rural Community Network and many other major organisations all say that they would prefer a smaller number of councils, and many of them have opted for the seven-council model in particular. It may not reach the totality that we would prefer — we are still working for that — but it does provide for a more coterminous approach between service providers.

Most reputable organisations, such as the Ulster Farmers' Union, are in favour of the seven-council model and against having a larger number of councils, because the former provides a more coterminous approach and increases cohesion in local government.

The larger the number of councils, the more political parties and some communities can continue to work in isolation.

The smaller the number of councils, the more parties are forced to work together. At present councillors work side by side, yet they never meet, discuss or plan jointly. Under the new arrangements, councillors will have to work together. Those arrangements are counter-Balkanisation and show how we are trying to redress the polarisation that clearly exists. For too long, too many people have been in their comfort zones.

Tommy Gallagher raised the issue of local identity. Who is suggesting that any townland will be abolished under the new council configuration? Of the present 26 district councils, some will go and others will be subsumed into other, as yet unnamed, councils. Who mentioned any townland, village or hamlet that will disappear? I have not heard of one. Will Larne disappear? Some people might want it to, but it will not. [Laughter.] Will Camlough —

Mr Storey: It is far too cold for you.

Mr Maskey: Mr Storey, you should talk to your colleagues on the political panel.

Madam Speaker: Mr Maskey, please speak through the Chair.

Mr Maskey: If Mr Storey would care to speak to his colleagues, he would know that in my last contribution to the political panel I highlighted Larne as an example of how people in smaller council areas may feel that they are not part of the new, bigger council. Therefore the bigger council would be obligated to have a structure to make sure —

Mr Storey: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Mr Maskey: Talk to your colleagues, Mr Storey.

Mr Storey: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. That is not what the Member said. The Member made a direct derogatory comment about Larne, but now he does not have the honesty to say what it was.

Madam Speaker: Mr Storey, you have said your piece, but it was not a point of order.

Mr Maskey: Everybody knows that many places have a particular reputation. Many people do not want the political entity of Larne to exist. Certainly, nationalists do not.

As I have already said, and as my colleagues will outline throughout the day, we support a model that we believe affords the fairest system of local government. We have not heard a single proposition from another Member or party that rationally advocates another configuration.

Madam Speaker: Before we proceed, I remind Members that it is unparliamentary to challenge the honesty of another Member.

Mr Weir: I serve on North Down Borough Council, and I am also a vice-president of the Northern Ireland Local Government Association (NILGA).

I want to deal with a couple of the points raised by the Member who spoke previously. He concluded his speech by talking about polarisation and reputation. Many Members will take that with a pinch of salt, at best. There is a high level of hypocrisy in Members from the party opposite talking about polarisation when, for the past 35 years, that party conducted a sectarian murder campaign that, more than anything else, polarised the community.

The Member also referred to the political panel. Representatives of various political parties have worked on the political panel because their aim is to modernise local government. Indeed, most of the panel's work is number-neutral. The Member mentioned SDLP members John O'Kane and Dermot Curran, both of whom I know. Those members of the political panel, and members from parties other than Sinn Féin, have consistently opposed the option 7C model. Time and time again, they have made their opposition to the option 7C model absolutely clear, and to imply anything else is a gross slur on them. Mr Maskey may be happy to continually highlight Sinn Féin's isolation, but let us at least put it in context.

He also expressed concern at the number of councillors. Let us nail that issue. Under the proposals there will be 420 councillors. Most parties would be prepared to accept a similar figure. If Sinn Féin is prepared to accept that number, why not have those 420 councillors sitting on 15 councils? The number of councillors is not the issue that concerns Mr Maskey. Furthermore, if he is concerned about slowness of delivery, let Sinn Féin come out from its isolation.

Mr Maskey: Will the Member take a point of information?

Mr Weir: No, the Member has already had his chance; I do not want to give him any more rope.

Sinn Féin has the opportunity to vary the speed at which the RPA will be implemented. If Sinn Féin is concerned about delays, let it abandon its isolated stance and agree with every other political party in Northern Ireland that there should be 15 councils. There will then be unanimity on the issue and rapid progress can be made. It is in Sinn Féin's hands.

I am delighted to debate this issue for two reasons. First, the DUP supports the motion and opposes the amendment because it believes this to be an important subject. Secondly, the Government have tried for the past six months to stop this debate taking place. Time and time again in the Business Committee, various parties have pushed this subject onto the agenda, but the Secretary of State's veto has repeatedly prevented debate.

Sir Reg Empey: Does the Member accept that the motion was proposed and vetoed at every meeting of the Business Committee from 15 May to 23 November? Is that not correct?

Mr Weir: I cannot confirm that since I am not a member of the Business Committee. However, I believe it to be the case.

The Government have constantly blocked debate on the issue because the decision to support a seven-council model is one of the least justifiable of their many bad recent decisions. It has the least merit, is the most politically driven and has been produced for the wrong reasons. It is particularly appalling that the Government have used the issues of reform of public administration and the number of councils as devices in their wider schemes for political progress in Northern Ireland. At times in the past 35 years, councillors of various parties have been the principal voice of democracy in the country. They have stood at democracy's front line, providing services to ratepayers and constituents. Many have paid with their lives — the ultimate sacrifice. It is utterly shameful for the Government to use local government as a bargaining chip in the wider political process.

Mention has been made of the arguments advanced for the seven-council model. It is important that we examine each of them to show how spurious they are. The first is coterminosity, which Mr Gallagher has already dealt with to a large extent. The idea was that local government boundaries would be coterminous with those of health and education boards. The RPA proposes five health trusts, the boundaries of which bear no relation whatsoever to the proposed council boundaries. The five education boards will be replaced by a super-board that will oversee the whole of Northern Ireland. When asked about the subject at a recent meeting of the Northern Ireland Policing Board, the Chief Constable said that his new district command units could fit in with whatever model was produced; perhaps two councils would be coterminous with one district command unit. It appears that there is no coterminosity anywhere, yet it was said to be one of the main drivers behind the seven-council model.

We are also told that the responses to the consultation showed that the seven-council model is what people want. However, 90% of responses did not deal with the number of councils; rather, they concentrated principally on education issues such as libraries, youth services and issues involving the Council for Catholic Maintained Schools. There is no overwhelming desire in the community for a seven-council model.

Not only do all the parties represented in the Assembly — with the exception of Sinn Féin — believe that the seven-council model is wrong, but smaller parties such as the Green Party also oppose it. At a meeting of NILGA some months before the RPA reported, every Sinn Féin councillor present voted in favour of the 15-council model, although this was before the release of the Sinn Féin statement.

I understand that in the press at the weekend Sinn Féin accused the SDLP of being in an unholy alliance, presumably because the SDLP agreed with all the other parties. I am sure that politically Sinn Féin would love to be in an unholy alliance, but it cannot get other parties to back it.

Sinn Féin also mentioned the rates base, and Tommy Gallagher has covered that point. If various councils are bolted together they will be burdened with different rates, rates bases and debts. Given the Government's proposed review of rating, there will be regional disparities throughout Northern Ireland. Under the seven-council model there will be no similarity in the rates base.

There will be great savings, we have been told, yet those of us who have been involved with the RPA will know that simply putting in the mechanisms to implement the proposals will cost, conservatively, between £15 million and £25 million — that is purely for the mechanisms to bring forward the modernisation task force and capacity building. The cost of redundancies may be between £25 million and £30 million. However, both those figures will be dwarfed by the money that will have to be paid into pension schemes — perhaps £60 million or £70 million. Where are the great savings that have been promised?

We are told that there will be efficiencies. However, there is little evidence to suggest that that will be the case. Under a 15-council model there could be some economies of scale because one service could be produced for all the constituents in an area. However, under a seven-council model councils will have to cover such wide areas and incorporate such remote regions that pressure will be put on them to provide not simply a headquarters but also a range of regional offices, thus duplicating services again and again.

At a recent meeting with the DUP, the Minister raised the idea of civic councils subordinate to the new super-councils — in effect a form of parish council. The seven councils could create an additional layer of government. Where is the efficiency in that?

As everyone is aware, the real reasons that the Government plumped for seven councils were, first, to pander to Sinn Féin, and secondly to apply political pressure to the other parties, which opposed it. In other words, the Government are telling the political parties that if they do not like the new arrangements, they should get into an Assembly and sort them out. Those reasons are entirely spurious and utterly impure.

As Mr Gallagher said, we are going to Balkanise Northern Ireland, producing three councils that are nationalist-controlled, three that are unionist-controlled, and Belfast, which will be reasonably evenly divided. The justification offered by Sinn Féin is that there will be large minorities in the seven new councils. We will have large, permanently trapped minorities in council areas. Is it preferable to have large groups of disgruntled people rather than small groups? I fail to see the logic in that. It will inevitably lead to poor governance. Either an elite majority will enforce its will on a minority, which the SDLP is concerned about, or there will be so many checks and balances in the system that there cannot be effective government. Either way, it will not lead to good governance for the people of Northern Ireland; it will lead to remoteness and a lack of identity.

No one is suggesting that council areas should be based on townlands, but no one in Northern Ireland, outside Belfast, will identify with the new boundaries. The Boundary Commissioner's initial report, which listed them as Inner East, East, or whatever, showed the absurdity of these boundaries. No one says, "I'm from east Northern Ireland", "I'm from the south-east" or "I'm from the south-west". People will mention the areas that they come from, but there is no community identification whatsoever in the RPA proposals. That will lead to a sense of dislocation, of people feeling isolated from their local council, and to lower turnouts in elections. It will lead to disaffection with the political process and to councils that are less responsive to the people of Northern Ireland.

Reforming the present model to a 15-council one will provide people with a system that they will feel is directly accountable to them because local councillors will still represent their area. People will see that the needs of their area are met rather than being subsumed into vast council areas that stretch across Northern Ireland.

The 15-council model will produce economies of scale; no one is arguing for the retention of the 26-council model. All parties, with the exception of Sinn Féin, have said that the 15-council model is more suitable for making economies of scale.

With respect to my colleagues from various parties in Belfast, rates in Belfast — for a range of reasons that I accept — have tended to be higher than in other parts of Northern Ireland. That is partly because Belfast is a capital city. However, the evidence suggests that moving to an economy of scale of 250,000 people does not produce any additional economies of scale beyond what would be achieved with, perhaps, 100,000 people.

Indeed, it could be argued that, due to the vast scale of Belfast — which would be replicated in other councils under the option 7C model — there is not the opportunity for the high level of budget scrutiny that many smaller councils achieve. Belfast's status as a capital city is not the main reason for its higher rates, but it is a factor. There is no evidence to suggest that very large councils produce lower rates; in fact, the opposite is the case.

A 15-council model would provide local government that is close and accountable to the people, and which is local in the true sense of the word. The option 7C model will be bad for accountability and for the local identity of the people of Northern Ireland. All Members are in favour of greater efficiencies and greater modernisation in local councils so that they will be able to provide a better service for the people of Northern Ireland. However, a seven-council model will not provide that.

The option 7C model will be weak, unrepresentative and unaccountable. That is why the Assembly should reject it. A clear message should be sent to the Government: listen to the people of Northern Ireland and to their directly elected representatives who believe that the option 7C model will be bad, and that a 15-council model would be much better for their future.

Mr J Wilson: All parties — including Sinn Féin — should support the motion because it is the right thing to do. It should also be supported for another reason. The Ulster Unionist Party tabled a motion on an earlier no-day-named list along the same lines as the SDLP motion. However, that is by the by.

The option 7C model proposed for Northern Ireland is plainly and simply wrong. It is so wrong that it must be halted in its tracks this very day. The motion proposes that the Assembly call on the Secretary of State to “shelve” plans for seven councils and to allow a future Assembly to take the process forward.

In response to the RPA further consultation exercise, my party proposed a 15-council model, and its reasons for so doing were well publicised at the time. In any new consideration of the number of councils required to deliver local services — and there must be one — the Ulster Unionist Party will forcefully make the case for 15 councils.

We were told that support for the option 7C model had been identified through reading all the reports produced by the experts and panel members. However, it was difficult to identify precisely who supported that model. Mr Maskey mentioned a group of people today who, he states, supported the option 7C model. Time has moved on since those people supported that model, and if they were asked whether they still supported it, I think that, with reality having set in, much of that support would have gone.

Mr Maskey: In the past couple of weeks, INTERREG III has stated that the option 7C model would optimise the money available — through European funds, for example — to deal with the entire border corridor area. That was said only two or three weeks ago — not years ago.

Mr Hussey: I am sure that my colleague will admit that much of the INTERREG money is fed through the cross-border groups rather than directly through the councils.

Mr J Wilson: Alex Maskey has made my case for me: he could mention only one group that may still be holding on to the seven-council principle. Sinn Féin is the only party in the House that lends its support to that model, which caused more than a little disquiet in that party. My knowledge of how some Sinn Féin supporters across the Province think confirms what we have heard elsewhere: there is a growing number of party members in Sinn Féin who are not in line with Alex Maskey. That is yet to come out.

One could say that the voice of politicians across Northern Ireland has been ignored, and not for the first time. More importantly, the voice of those who elected them is being ignored. Of course, since the Local Government Boundaries Commissioner published his provisional recommendations, which regrouped 26 councils into seven, any support that there was for the seven-council model has been evaporating. Members need not take my word for it. If they talk to people in Antrim, Lisburn, Carrick and the surrounding region, they will not find much support for this new place — and “place” is all that I can call it at present — of Inner East Local Government District. At this festive season, one starts to think of Bethlehem and places such as that. [Interruption.] Someone suggested that the proposed new council looks like a big muffler around Belfast. I would not like the area that I represent to be called such.

When the commissioner published his provisional recommendations, he admitted, openly and freely, that he had consulted academics and local historians about possible names for the new configuration. They could not come up with any. Therefore we are left with North, South, East, West, Inner this and Outer that. The idea is absolutely crazy. Some of us advised the RPA team that it was ignoring totally the question of local identity. The UUP did, and I know that other parties did as well.

I had the good fortune to attend, as a Deputy Speaker of the Northern Ireland Assembly, the opening of the National Assembly for Wales. When I was there, Paul Murphy spoke to me privately. I shall not share what he said about the seven-council model; indeed, I would not be able to use the exact words, so I shall not repeat them. However, in an interview with 'Fortnight' magazine in February he said:

"I made it clear that I wasn't happy with a small number of local authorities. I would have personally preferred something around the fourteen or fifteen mark..."

And this is the important part of what he said:

"I am a bit troubled that they [the seven councils] are too big and whether in fact you'll see an east and west of the Bann divide which will increasingly become more polarised."

Those words are worth thinking about; in fact, they are worth repeating. Mr Murphy said that the seven councils would be too big and he wondered about the east-west divide and polarisation. The UUP agrees with that opinion.

That brings me back to the motion:

"this Assembly expresses serious concern about the potential of a seven council model to ... underpin sectarianism and community division".

Paul Murphy agrees with the political parties in Northern Ireland.

Many of us, in our political careers, have invested heavily in bringing together communities. I can speak only for myself, but I am satisfied that I have done my best. That was not always the easy option, and it has cost some of us dearly. Let us not destroy what we have achieved, because success was achieved, as seen in our communities.

11.30 am

A seven-council model is a nonsense. It is a recipe for division, polarisation and the total destruction of communities. It is, most certainly, a sectarian carve-up, and the Ulster Unionist Party warned against it. The proposals amount to repartition and will destroy decades of cross-community work and partnerships at a stroke. Let me make this clear to the Government: they are ignoring the democratically expressed will of the people of Northern Ireland. A seven-council model will not constitute the right approach. Sinn Féin may say that it does, but three quarters of the voting population of Northern Ireland say that it does not.

My party contends that the motion should receive support, and I hope that it does. It will send a loud and clear message that the representatives of the people of Northern Ireland believe that their communities deserve better than second best. The Ulster Unionist Party supports the goal of reform through the review of public administration but will not back a Government proposal that is so contaminated and falls so far short of its intended aims.

It is interesting to look back to the beginning of the process. When Ian Pearson launched the consultation process, he said tellingly:

"We must ensure that the new arrangements are fair and equitable, and that they command confidence among the political parties and their constituents."

Have the Government delivered on this goal? No, they have not.

In responding to the Assembly debate on draft Planning Policy Statement 14 (PPS 14) earlier this year, the Secretary of State said:

"I will naturally want to reflect carefully on the Assembly debate."

He went on to say that he would take account of the views expressed. I invite the Secretary of State to listen and reflect on what is being said in the Chamber today. Would Peter Hain have introduced such a proposal in Wales if all but one of the political parties there were against it? I very much doubt it.

The Secretary of State has said that the people of Northern Ireland expect MLAs to do the jobs that they were elected to do. How many times have we heard that from the Secretary of State? Well, today we are doing just that. We are making it clear that the current Government proposals to create seven super-councils do not command widespread support, particularly among politicians here.

I support the motion.

Mr Neeson: I declare an interest in that I have been a member of Carrickfergus Borough Council since 1977 and have a great deal of experience of local government. We all agree that 26 district councils are too many for Northern Ireland. There is a need for radical reform to create efficient and effective councils that are responsive to the local needs of the people of Northern Ireland.

The consultation on the new boundaries was basically a myth. I remember the number of meetings that my party had with Lord Rooker, and I am sure that other parties also met him. That particular individual showed great arrogance to the elected people of Northern Ireland, and I can assure Members that very few tears were shed on his departure.

To all intents and purposes, the proposed seven councils constitute a sectarian carve-up, with three nationalist councils to the west and three unionist councils to the east. However, I am pleased that the Alliance Party will continue to hold the balance of power in Belfast to ensure that power sharing continues in that council.

To all intents and purposes —

Mr Maskey: Obviously, Mr Neeson is a member of the political panel and has heard all the reports from the various subgroups, including the one on governance. Does he not agree that, although the final details of the power-sharing arrangements have not yet been agreed, his party has supported a plethora of proposals on such matters as proportionality, weighted majorities, call-in, petitions of concern, a code of conduct, internal standards committees, the structure of council committee systems, and decision-making? All of those measures have been instituted.

Mr Neeson and I had an engagement in a hotel in Templepatrick a while ago at which I reminded him that Sinn Féin would not be — [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr Maskey: Templepatrick has been a busy hub this last while.

Mr Neeson will recall — [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr Maskey: It is a serious point. Mr Neeson will recall that, during that meeting of the political panel, I reminded him that Sinn Féin would not be countenancing a governance arrangement that allows any party to usurp the will of the vast majority of the people and their elected representatives. Governance arrangements have been set down.

Madam Speaker: Mr Maskey, interventions must always be brief.

Mr Neeson: The only thing to emerge from what Alex Maskey has said is that Templepatrick seems to have become the centre of the universe.

To all intents and purposes, and apart from being a sectarian carve-up, this is in many ways a re-partition of Northern Ireland. I believe that that is why Sinn Féin has supported it — with the exception of Francie Molloy, who is conspicuous by his absence today.

We know that there is to be a radical shake-up of the health and education boards. One of the main objectives that the Government have been hoping to achieve is coterminosity between the various boards and trusts. That will not happen under the seven council areas that are proposed. On a personal basis, I also have serious reservations about NILGA's proposal for 15 district councils. Serious consideration should be given to the 11-council model. That is why it is important that this Assembly be given the opportunity to look at the original proposals.

As Alex Maskey has already pointed out, I have been a member of the political panel — as has Sam Gardiner of the Ulster Unionist Party. A great deal of work has already gone into the proposals that have been made. Some very worthwhile work has been carried out, particularly by the nine task forces. However, there is still a great deal of work to be done. The Assembly should be given the opportunity to scrutinise the changes and proposals that are coming forward, particularly in relation to council powers over public transport and the whole question of responsibility for local roads and planning.

I am pleased to say that in many ways Lord Rooker's successor, David Cairns, is much more responsive to the views of Northern Ireland politicians than Lord Rooker was. In the interim before the restoration of devolution there are opportunities to bring about various changes to the proposals. The restoration of devolution is the real challenge facing, in particular, the DUP and Sinn Féin. Yesterday, both parties gave us history lessons. As a former history teacher, I can tell those parties that, if no progress is made by 26 March next year, history will judge them very poorly indeed.

The issue of what will happen to current council staff must also be addressed. Morale among council staff is very low; they do not know what the future holds, which is why there is a need to consider their needs and develop certainty for them.

I believe that the Chief Constable is moving very prematurely in restructuring local policing services. Furthermore, it calls into question the future role of district policing partnerships under that restructuring. That issue also requires serious consideration.

Dick Mackenzie recently published his proposals for the new council boundaries, and I understand the difficulties he encountered in trying to find names for the proposed seven councils. Under the proposals, my own council will become part of Inner East Local Government District, which will comprise Carrickfergus, Antrim, Newtownabbey and Lisburn —

Mr Ford: And Templepatrick.

Mr Neeson: And Templepatrick, of course.

In relation to the question of association, with regard to that particular proposed council, I ask Members what the people of Carrickfergus have in common with, for example, the people of Dromara — very little indeed. The current proposals do not respect local interests at all.

On the issue of the transfer of powers to local government, may I make an appeal about the supporting people programme? The proposal is to transfer responsibility for that programme from the Northern Ireland Housing Executive to local councils. Over the years, the Housing Executive has been a major success story as regards the development of housing in Northern Ireland. Responsibility for the supporting people programme should remain with the Housing Executive. Members of the Housing Executive and the Northern Ireland Housing Council recently outlined their arguments to my local council. That responsibility should remain where it is at the present time.

The Government continually talk about a shared future, and we are told that a shared future is very much at the forefront of the current proposals. However, the truth of the matter is that, as far as the Government are concerned, a shared future is simply talk, and cheap talk at that.

There has also been talk, as Alex Maskey knows, about the possibility of councillor designations in the new councils — something to which my party is totally opposed. We realise that that is an entire sham, as demonstrated on a number of occasions in the Northern Ireland Assembly.

As a member of the Subgroup on the Economic Challenges facing Northern Ireland, I noticed that one issue that came up time and time again was the inefficiency of Government Departments in Northern Ireland. Such inefficiencies are the result of the artificial creation of 10 Departments. We know why 10 Departments were created — to create jobs for the boys and girls in the parties that formed the Executive. If we are to achieve joined-up government, there must be a reform of central government.

If Northern Ireland is to really move forward, the current proposals for the new councils should be binned immediately.

Madam Speaker: That concludes the first round of Members to speak. The time limit for Members yet to speak in the debate will be 10 minutes. There is a long list of Members who wish to speak, so I remind Members that I shall be keeping them to their allotted time.

Mr Campbell: I am delighted to start the second round of speeches, Madam Speaker. I hope that we go the full 15 rounds, although it remains to be seen who will be left standing at the end.

I wish to declare that I am a member of a local authority; I am a member of the city council in Londonderry.

Several Members have referred to the importance and seriousness of the RPA, and it is appropriate, therefore, that we are discussing the matter in the Assembly today. Very little disagreement remains on the need for reform of our public administration. It was blatantly obvious that, with three MEPs, 18 MPs, 108 MLAs, 582 councillors, and however many trusts and boards for a population of 1.7 million, we were the most over-governed part of the United Kingdom. Therefore it is well past time that we had reform. The matter for discussion, however, is not reform itself but the nature of that reform.

I agree with those Members who spoke about the importance of the cost-effectiveness of any reform of public administration, particularly for those councils that appear to be the focus of both the motion and the amendment.

I draw Members' attention to the two areas with which I am most familiar. How can it be cost-effective to have a council in the west/north-west of Northern Ireland that stretches from Castlederg in the south-west to Magilligan on the north coast? I cannot think of a more difficult task than delivering cohesive local services that will attempt to bring together people with a common interest in order to get them to work for the greater good of all the people of that area, given the distance of 60 miles and the different terrain and demographics between those who live at either end of that range, not to mention those who live in the middle.

The north-east, which stretches for about 60 miles from Coleraine on the north coast to the shores of Belfast Lough, also contains huge diversity. It is difficult to imagine how a local council can serve communities in that diverse area cost-effectively. That will be the legacy of the seven-council model. A 15-council model — or thereabouts — would reduce an area of that size, enabling it to deliver local services much more effectively and more cost-effectively. For that reason, all the political parties, with the exception of Sinn Féin/IRA, prefer the 15-council model.

I also wish to deal with the issue of political representation. My colleagues and others who have served on the political panel have mentioned, quite rightly, the importance of governance, however many councils there are to be in Northern Ireland. Various political representatives have raised the issue of the feelings, concerns, fears and apprehensions that a minority would have in each of the council areas, and their views must be taken into account. However, those whom I have heard outline such concerns are usually people who trot out criticism of unionist-controlled councils for their treatment of their nationalist minority. We have heard such criticism today.

Rather than listen to a politician's political views or fears, we should look at practical examples of what has actually happened in places such as south Armagh, Strabane and on the west bank of Londonderry. When Sinn Féin — or, unfortunately, the SDLP in some cases — has espoused a political view, not only have some unionists felt that they are not being treated well, they have moved out of the area en masse. We must face that reality.

It is not simply a case of people who come from the 15% minority community in council areas such as Castlereagh, Larne or Lisburn not being elected deputy mayor or chairman of a technical services committee. Unionists who live in nationalist areas fear that a jackboot will be put to their necks and that they will have to leave. Over the years, that fear has been borne out. We must try to ensure that people from a minority community can live in any future council areas, whether they are set up under the 15-council model — that is my preference — or the seven-council model, even if those councils are governed by councillors whose political outlook is fundamentally different from theirs. Unfortunately, that has not been the case in the past.

Mrs D Kelly: Does the Member concur that the reason that many people moved out of areas across the North — not only out of unionist-controlled or Protestant areas — was due to the conflict and sectarian violence of the past 30 years?

Mr Campbell: The short answer is yes; that is the case. However, why is it that the unionist community in the three council areas that I mentioned as examples is the prime target in the firing line? I am not aware of large numbers of nationalists moving out of Craigavon because of paramilitary activity or the activities of Craigavon Borough Council. However, I can point to numerous instances of tens of thousands of unionists moving out as a result of paramilitary activity —

Mrs D Kelly: Madam Speaker, if the Member wants me to —

Mr Campbell: I have not yet given way, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr Campbell: I accede to, and fully accept, the fact that paramilitary violence was the primary cause of division and population movement. However, politicians, by their actions, cannot wash their hands of those population movements and simply say that that was a terrible situation. In various areas, populations have moved because of the activities of the Provisional IRA and others. People who take political decisions that impact on those communities must realise that there are consequences to those decisions.

Over the past few years, I assumed that we were trying to move on from the days of population movements. However, the seven-council model does not offer that prospect. The 15-council model — or a similar model — with sufficient safeguards and governance procedures, would ensure that people in certain council areas did not feel that their culture, outlook and political aspirations were being ridden roughshod over. That has happened to both communities. All too often I hear nationalists and republicans referring to what happened in unionist areas, but we all know what happened in republican areas. In Dungiven, in my constituency, parasites drove out hundreds of members of my community. That has happened across Northern Ireland.

Mr Hyland: Will the Member give way?

Mr Campbell: No, I do not give way to Sinn Féin/IRA.

Those are the realities — [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr Campbell: Those facts and figures cannot be denied. When I hit the bullseye, some people become annoyed and angry.

That is just too bad: if they cannot take the heat, they should not be in the kitchen.

Ms Gildernew: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. First, I refute the myth that Sinn Féin is the only group that supports the seven-council model; many diverse groups also agree that that model is the best. Those groups include: the Northern Ireland Council for Voluntary Action; the Institute of Directors; the Northern Ireland Tourist Board; the Ulster Farmers' Union; the Irish National Teachers' Organisation; the Confederation of British Industry; and Friends of the Earth. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Ms Gildernew: Those on the opposite Benches, particularly Gregory Campbell, gave many spurious reasons for why people have moved out of their homes. Plenty of people have been bombed out of their homes in places such as Ahoghill. We have argued that legislation should be put in place and financial sanctions imposed to deal with those councils that do not try to eradicate bigotry in their areas. We should consider creating good-relations policies.

Mr Storey: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Again, in the interests of accuracy, Ballymena Borough Council had nothing whatsoever to do with any of those activities in the village of Ahoghill.

Madam Speaker: That is not a point of order, Mr Storey.

Ms Gildernew: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Yes — [Interruption.]

Mr Maskey: It is more to the shame of that Member's party that it did nothing about it.

Ms Gildernew: Yes; it is more important that the Member's party did nothing about it.

However, in every engagement —

Mr Hussey: Will the Member give way?

Ms Gildernew: No, I will not. I do not have much time.

In every engagement, Sinn Féin has argued that the number of councils is not the key issue. We want strong and effective local government and an end to the quango culture. We want increased value for money in order to bring about democratic accountability for local government. Crucially, we want all of that underpinned by rigorous checks, balances and safeguards. One reason that local government is in its current position, and has been for three decades, is because of unionist councillors' systematic practices of discrimination. That behaviour continues.

I shall focus my remarks mainly on EU issues, particularly those that are connected to funding and rural matters. For 15 years, the European Union has had a LEADER programme that aims to bring local people together to create an agreed strategy for their area, using EU money, and to intervene to create jobs and assist rural communities. That has been successful across Europe, but it has been particularly successful in Ireland. The current LEADER+ programme in the North deals with 13 groups, it has a budget of €22 million for 2001-08, and it will create in excess of 1,000 jobs in rural communities and will safeguard many more. For example, compared to the EU programmes with budgets that are two or three times that amount that the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development is delivering, LEADER+ will prove to be extremely good value for money.

To date, additional resources that are above current levels of subvention that come into the Six Counties and the border corridor have not come from the British Government, or, indeed, from the old National Development Plan of the Dublin Government. However, through Peace III money, which totals €266 million, and the new territorial co-operation programmes, the EU will invest a combined total of €532 million between 2007 and 2013 in the COMET (Councils of the Metropolitan Region) and core partnerships and the border corridor. The border corridor is the most deprived area on the island of Ireland, and, in the past, EU funds have provided a major source of employment, and they will continue to provide that and other services.

Mr Weir: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I am sure that we are all fascinated by the investment in the border corridor and the EU programmes. However, is any of that relevant to the motion, to which the Member should surely be speaking?

Madam Speaker: Order. That was not a point of order. I am sure that Ms Gildernew will review the relevance of her speech.

Mr Hussey: Will the Member give way to a genuine question?

Ms Gildernew: No, I will not.

As I have pointed out, in a recent submission to the Special European Union Programmes Body on the new territorial co-operation fund, INTERREG IIIA partnerships stated:

"The RPA will have a number of implications, which are substantially favourable to the prospects of effective cross border territorial co-operation. These include a redefinition of council boundaries into the proposed 7 super councils. While some adjustments of boundaries will be needed, the proposed map of new councils broadly fits the current INTERREG IIIA partnerships ... This should greatly facilitate the partnerships taking a strategic approach."

Therefore, the seven-council model is the optimum configuration if a coterminous approach through the strategic use of those additional resources in the border corridor is to be facilitated.

12.00 noon

Indeed, the seven-council governance model — larger councils working in concert with community planning structures — is similar, in terms of scale, process and structures, to the county council and county development board model in the Twenty-Six Counties.

In relation to potential for strategic parity between councils in the border corridor area, the INTERREG IIIA partnership report also concluded that:

"The impact of the RPA, [the 7 super councils], is to bring the scale and the processes of local government much more into line between Northern Ireland and the Border Region of Ireland"

To promote balanced regional development in the border corridor area for the mutual benefit of all the communities that live there, the seven-council model provides a geographical area and institutional space to make best strategic use of EU development moneys.

It should also be noted that INTERREG IIIA partnerships are made up of social partners, staff and political representatives from Sinn Féin, Fianna Fáil, Fine Gael, the DUP, the UUP and the SDLP.

It is interesting to hear what the UFU has to say about the review of public administration. It has endorsed the approach of making high-quality services accessible to all by significantly streamlining the present administrative structures and redirecting the resultant savings to improve front-line services in the North of Ireland.

The UFU states:

"It is absolutely imperative that a satisfactory balance is achieved between administrative rationalisation and local representation, consultation, responsiveness and accountability."

Specifically, the union has supported plans to move to a seven-council structure but says that rural representation must be protected.

However, in the midst of all this, the other political parties are having a field day; they are refusing to engage and are actively working to wreck any prospect of agreement on the way forward.

If the Member who tabled today's motion took a look at the pathetic delivery of assistance to rural communities, particularly building sustainable prosperity moneys and the Peace II programme, in which his former colleague, Brid Rodgers, presided over a delivery mechanism that successfully delayed the beginning of many parts of the rural development programme for more than two years and kept the greater part of delivery in the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development —

Mr Hussey: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I trust that the Member will also mention the decision of Minister Cairns that the rural Protestant community needed extra money.

Madam Speaker: That was not a point of order. At the beginning of this afternoon's sitting, I will again read out what I have said before about points of order. Quote the relevant Standing Order, Mr Hussey, and you may be allowed to make a point of order.

Ms Gildernew: Of a budget of more than £80 million, only £22 million went to the LEADER programme, but that will create more than 1,600 jobs. Will the Member be confident that the other £58 million — almost two thirds of the budget — will create anywhere near the equivalent, which would be about 4,500 jobs? I do not think so.

The majority of the jobs created by the Member's party in the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development were jobs for the boys. The SDLP is concerned about its own political skin. It is not concerned about local people being able to make decisions about local communities. It wants to keep control and join together with unionism, as it does throughout councils in the North, to maintain the status quo.

Mr Gallagher: Will the Member give way?

Ms Gildernew: No, Tommy, I do not have time.

The SDLP is putting forward false arguments that are more about being anti-Sinn Féin than being pro-rural communities. When the SDLP had the opportunity to support rural communities, it failed. It allowed the Civil Service to dictate the terms, and rural communities are now suffering as a result.

Mr Gallagher: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. In relation to support for rural communities and —

Madam Speaker: That is not a point of order, Mr Gallagher.

Mr Gallagher: And mention was made —

Madam Speaker: That is not a point of order. I am on my feet. I will take this opportunity to read out what I have already read out at least twice before. I remind Members that a point of order is not an opportunity for debate. It would assist the House if Members referred to the relevant Standing Order when they raise a point of order. I shall not accept spurious points of order, attractive though they may be to Members.

Mr Hussey: Under Standing Order 2A —

[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Do you wish to make a point of order, Mr Hussey?

Mr Hussey: Yesterday, it seemed that certain Standing Orders on the papers that we were given were not relevant. Will the Speaker determine which Standing Orders are relevant?

Madam Speaker: Mr Hussey, yesterday you referred to Standing Order 20, and I said that it was not relevant to the business of the day. That is correct. The point that I am making about points of order is correct every day: Members must relate their point to the relevant Standing Order. I will then comment on it. It appears to me that most of the points of order are raised in order to add to the debate and to make spurious points. Attractive though that may be for Members, it is not in order.

I apologise, Ms Gildernew. Extra time will be allowed.

Ms Gildernew: Go raibh míle maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

As I was saying, when the SDLP had the opportunity to support rural communities, it failed. It did such a poor job that it completely failed to put in any measure of rural proofing, and that has allowed draconian anti-farmer and anti-rural policies, such as Planning Policy Statement 14, to be introduced. Savings made through the reduction of governance here must be recycled into front-line services, and rural dwellers must be properly represented. Farmers and farming families are at the heart of rural communities. The option 7C model is the best way to enhance and protect them. I urge Members to support the amendment. Go raibh míle maith agat.

Rev Dr Robert Coulter: I am glad of the opportunity to speak on this issue, because one hears many questions about it in the community. It is interesting to note that when the public are questioned, more than 70% of their concerns are about health. That is one of the major issues that I have come up against. However, although the debate so far has been wide-ranging, the health aspect of the RPA has largely been left to one side.

Public administration reform is not simply about the efficiency or effectiveness of delivery. Efficiency and effectiveness are important in themselves, but they are not the core activity of the public services. The clue lies in the word "service": service is the core activity. Health and social services are arguably the most sensitive activities in which Government engage. That is why the Ulster Unionist Party has always emphasised that patients are at the heart of the Health Service. We must put the patient first.

There are aspects of the RPA package as regards health and social services with which I have no problems. For example, the creation of a single strategic health and social services authority to replace the four health boards and oversee the implementation of policy across Northern Ireland is welcome. The reduction of duplication has been consistently advocated by the UUP and reflects the role of strategic health authorities in Great Britain. However, that successful move has been marred and compromised by a failure to ensure that democratically elected representatives have a place on the strategic health and social services authority. That is unquestionably a serious flaw in the new arrangements.

That raises an important issue that is characteristic of much of the RPA process and its outcome: the system is driven and controlled by bureaucratic considerations, without sufficient regard for democratic input. That is not altogether surprising, given the Civil Service's direct-rule culture. For years, it has operated in a direct-rule vacuum, insulated from the rough winds of democratic accountability and, in particular, public disapproval.

However, we cannot fault efforts by the Civil Service to improve service delivery. That is one of the better aspects of the Civil Service's efforts to improve itself in recent years. I want to put on record my strong support for the current leadership of the Civil Service in its efforts to improve service delivery.

However, we can find fault with the insufficient regard for democratic input. I am sure that the Civil Service will argue that much consultation has taken place. However, consultation is not the same as locally elected representatives making decisions. It runs like a vein through the whole RPA process. That will be one of the biggest issues that the Assembly will have to sort out if it is properly restored. We will have to effect a major change of culture and mindset in the Civil Service in order to clear away the cobwebs of unaccountable direct rule.

Another disturbing aspect of the RPA is its drift away from the principle of coterminosity, which was mentioned several times this morning. That drift is one outcome of the lack of regard for democratic input, to which I have already referred. The proposed five new integrated trusts — the Western Area Trust, the Northern Area Trust, the Southern Area Trust, the Belfast Area Trust and the South Eastern Area Trust — are a step away from the principle of coterminosity. As will be the case with the local commissioning groups, the boundaries of local health units should coincide with those of local government. If the planners of the RPA had sufficient regard for democracy, they would see that weakness in their proposals. However, reducing the number of the current 18 trusts is a welcome step.

The failure to create a single Northern Ireland hospitals' authority is one of many glaring missed opportunities in the RPA model. It has been historically proven that hospitals have haemorrhaged and drained a great deal of primary and community care funding. The separation of primary and community care from acute services would have created a proper basis for health funding and ensured that funds for primary and community care were not drained to support acute care. That is important, given that medical focus is shifting towards preventative medicine. However, it is difficult to see how preventative medicine can succeed if it must compete with acute services for funding — acute services inevitably win. One weakness of the old process is being replicated in the new system.

The seven local commissioning groups that deal with primary care may restore some of the balance that will be lost in the RPA health proposals. By recognising the centrality of primary care and the need for primary-care-led commissioning, there is at least an effort to underline its importance. If that is to be more than lip-service, however, it is vital that the local commissioning groups are properly resourced and that funding for that care is ring-fenced.

The lack of elected representatives on the new Patient and Client Council, which will replace the Health and Social Services Councils, is another incidence of the democratic deficit that is implicit in these proposals. That is a serious flaw, as it is only through elected representatives that genuine accountability and representation can be achieved. The seven-council model reduces the options that are available for coterminosity in health service delivery, and it creates inflexibility in the delivery of services. Critical mass and efficiency considerations may be important, but not at the expense of democratic input. Democracy must always hold the higher ground in any new arrangements. The twin pillars of democratic accountability and improved service delivery will keep the RPA house standing. At present, the democratic-input pillar is largely missing, and this Assembly must address that deficit. The sooner locally elected representatives in the Chamber make decisions, the better for everyone. I support the motion.

Ms Ritchie: I declare an interest as a member of Down District Council and as a member of NILGA. Before speaking to the motion, I shall address some misrepresentations.

Contrary to assertions that were made by the Sinn Féin representative for Fermanagh and South Tyrone, Michelle Gildernew, the former Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development addressed the needs of the rural community.

She addressed the needs of those involved with foot-and-mouth disease, introduced rural proofing and also overruled civil servants by introducing milk quotas for small producers. The SDLP led the charge against PPS 14, although I am led to believe that some Members from Sinn Féin were initially in favour of it. The SDLP led the charge in the Chamber when Sinn Féin was absent.

The proposals for the seven councils under the arrangements for the review of public administration undermine the principle of local identity and a sense of place and dismantle the political homogeneity that has characterised many district councils throughout Northern Ireland for many years. They will sever natural power-sharing arrangements that have worked well in Down, Derry and Newry and Mourne councils, contrary to some of the assertions made by the DUP in the past, because it has benefited from those power-sharing arrangements in Down District Council.

The seven-council model has not engendered cross-community support, and it will simply heighten the east-west divide, cause greater division —

Mr Weir: Will the Member give way?

Ms Ritchie: No, I have only 10 minutes.

It will cause greater division, polarisation and sectarianism. The seven-council model will place minorities in certain areas at greater disadvantage and place current and future proposals for investment and infrastructure in jeopardy. Unionists and nationalists will experience similar problems with the proposed configuration of seven councils. Take, for example, the proposed East Local Government District council — a name that makes people's blood run cold — of which Down District Council will be a part. I have a point of information for the DUP: Down District Council has had power-sharing arrangements on an incremental basis since 1973, and my colleagues ensured that the DUP was represented on statutory committees over many years when its colleagues in the UUP would not afford it that opportunity.

Mr Campbell: Will the Member give way?

Ms Ritchie: No, I have only 10 minutes, and I wish to continue.

The proposed East Local Government District council will be overwhelmingly unionist in its representation. Coming from the south-east, where partnership, equality and working together have been common coinage since 1973, I fear that the new political demography will simply marginalise nationalists and could ensure that partnership and equality are consigned to the past, irrespective of the safeguards in legislation. Is that what Sinn Féin wants and supports? Does it want the existing arrangements eradicated in favour of a model that puts the future of Down District Council, which has worked well as a partnership, in jeopardy? Is that what its sense of a new political dispensation really means?

Furthermore, some of the councils that will form part of the suggested East Local Government District council have already had the audacity to object to the auditor about Down District Council's plans for a new administration centre in Downpatrick. Why is there interference? Down District Council has not interfered with their business agenda. Undoubtedly those councils want to ensure, at this stage, that the suggested East Local Government District council headquarters will be in north Down, Newtownards or Castlereagh, thereby immediately colouring the future investment prospects for that area. Such developments cast unhappy shadows over future political arrangements for the people that the SDLP represents.

The seven-council model puts politics, political arrangements and the future of partnership arrangements on the back burner. With the Balkanisation of Northern Ireland — a term that was used by the Sinn Féin Member for Mid Ulster Francie Molloy, who seems out of step with his own party but in agreement with the broader body politic — the principles won by the civil rights movement of respect for political difference, equality and justice for all have been severed. Is that what Sinn Féin supports and campaigns for? Has it rejected people? It has simply pandered to the British and negotiated for itself in order to gain political control of certain parts of Northern Ireland. Is that part of the side deal — [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Ms Ritchie: Is that part of the side deal for those on the run? That cropped up last November and December — the same time as the new arrangements for local government. I wonder why.

We have been told that the new arrangements under the review of public administration will create savings. What savings? Mr Weir has already referred to savings. The SDLP doubts that any savings will be made, because they have not been quantified. Consider, for example, the proposals for the management of roads and the delivery of new road infrastructure in Northern Ireland: the unitary Roads Service is to be demolished and replaced with nine roads authorities — for a place the size of Northern Ireland.

Seven of the nine roads authorities will be formed from the new councils, with different budgets, priorities and resources, and different abilities to undertake different projects. There will also be a motorway and trunk roads authority and a body to deal with standards and performance. Will different standards for roads maintenance apply in the same council area? Could the maintenance standards for motorways be different from those for country B-roads? What significant research has been carried out in that area?

Returning to the issue of the rates base, will some councils expend higher levels of funding than others? Will councils and the motorway and trunk roads authority give similar priorities to roads? How will proposals for the future management of roads deliver balanced regional development, equality and justice for Northern Ireland, yet simultaneously provide an upgraded roads infrastructure that will contribute to economic growth? Those are some of the issues that the economic challenges subgroup discussed.

The recent publication by the Local Government Boundaries Commissioner simply copper-fastens the proposals for the option 7C model, because he was circumscribed by the legislation to deal only with those issues. That publication demonstrates no cognisance of local identities. Some Sinn Féin representatives applauded him and the process that will eradicate their own roles. Electoral wards have been severed, natural ties of communication have been torn asunder and the new configuration bears no relationship to transportation or education ties or where people avail themselves of services or go shopping.

The Boundaries Commissioner's driving force appears to be to undertake a mathematical exercise for each electoral ward. A cursory study of the figures demonstrates a difference in eligibility figures for electoral wards between the east and west of Northern Ireland. For example, the eligibility figures may be greater in the west than in the east or vice versa. The Boundary Commissioner's proposals for electoral wards clearly demonstrate a need to meet the requirements of larger councils rather than an understanding or empathy for communities and their requirements.

Mr Kennedy: Will the Member give way?

Ms Ritchie: No. I have less than two minutes left.

In order for real political progress to happen, for people to continue working together and for respect for difference to be honoured, the option 7C model must be removed from the agenda.

The Programme for Government Committee — on which Members from the four main parties sit — must make more realistic proposals that reflect political homogeneity, the necessity for partnership, natural geographical patterns, community ties, transportation networks and economic growth. I wonder why Sinn Féin idolises the option 7C model; perhaps it has more to do with deals that that party has done in Downing Street.

[Interruption.]

The proposed model will not enhance political progress. It could act as an encumbrance to future political developments and hamper the people whom we all seek to represent. Remember: politics is about people and their requirements and demands. The proposed model must be withdrawn.

By snapping at me from the sidelines, Sinn Féin Members are simply thinking of themselves, their council seats and their level of political representation. That is their main agenda in today's debate.

Madam Speaker: Members will know that the Business Committee has arranged to meet at lunchtime. I propose, therefore, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the sitting until 2.00 pm.

The sitting was suspended at 12.24 pm.

On resuming (Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Wells] in the Chair) —

2.00 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker: Before the debate resumes, I wish to remind the House of the requirement of Standing Order 29, which relates to the need for Members, before taking part in any debate or proceeding of the Assembly, to declare any interest, financial or otherwise, that may be relevant to that debate.

Mr Hussey: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. In Standing Order 34(d)(ii), there is terminology that might confuse the House; it refers to the “Army Council”. I ask the Speaker’s Office to investigate and report back to the Chamber.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I thank the Member for his intervention. I will refer that to the Speaker, and no doubt she will give a ruling at a later date.

Mr Storey: I think that that comment from Mr Hussey would be better referred to the members of the party opposite; they might be able to give more clarity than the Speaker’s Office.

I wish to declare an interest as a member of Ballymoney Borough Council, the second smallest of the 26 district councils. We heard a lot this morning about identity, and in the very rural council area that I come from it is vital that the issue of identity is not lost; it is important. I have often said that, and I say it again. Take for example Lisnagunogue — and if anyone wants to try and spell that, they will do a better job than me — in my constituency of North Antrim. How relevant will a new super-council be to that townland and hamlet? That is an issue that we cannot easily dismiss.

The current Government plan to reduce the number of local councils from 26 to just seven would not only weaken local government, but also make it more remote and unrepresentative of the needs of local communities. It has another serious potential problem in that it could become the greatest organisational blunder of the twenty-first century.

The DUP has consistently called for improvements that would streamline the decision-making process and reduce bureaucracy, but I fear that the current proposals regarding local government will be detrimental rather than advantageous. The DUP has long pressed for real and serious savings in public administration. While others wasted their time in trying to house-train Sinn Féin/IRA in 2003, the DUP set about producing real and serious proposals to address financial waste and over-governance. We said that the 11 Government Departments created under the Belfast Agreement were too many; that was the Belfast Agreement’s Millennium Dome and the pro-agreement parties’ version of jobs for the boys.

The DUP pushed for real and meaningful savings. At last the Secretary of State has decided — and it is not often that we give him credit for anything he says or does — that the 11 Departments should be considered and looked at, and I hope that they will be reformed in a way that is more reflective of the needs of any future Assembly.

Dealing with Northern Ireland’s numerous unaccountable quangos is key to the success of the reorganisation of our Province’s public administration. Those who deliver services ought to be accountable to the people of Northern Ireland through elected representatives; the boards and bodies that we have created down through the years have too many placemen who are not answerable to any electorate in any part of Northern Ireland.

However, Mr Deputy Speaker, I want to make it clear that opting for seven councils is the wrong decision for Northern Ireland. Not many people would seriously argue that we need 26 councils to perform the functions of local government. However, the reduction to seven is several steps too far, for many reasons.

This morning, one of the Sinn Féin/IRA representatives accused us of not being able to give any reasons for our opposition to the seven-council model. There is one glaringly obvious reason for seven councils’ being a bridge too far: there is no evidence of any political support in Northern Ireland for the reduction from 26 councils to seven.

Other Members have said that the seven-council model will lead to a carve-up in parts of the south and west of our Province, handing them over to republican control. If it is wrong at this time to put into the Government of Northern Ireland those who cannot commit themselves to the rule of law and who cannot support the Police Service of Northern Ireland or the courts system, it is equally wrong to give those same individuals, and that same party, power over the seven-council model.

It was interesting to listen to this morning’s tirade from the Sinn Féin/IRA representative on the importance of European funding. The Member would like to corral us into the view that if we accept the European model as the delivery mechanism that we should all pursue, it could equally give us the same control in a council west of the Bann. We must ensure that local authorities are controlled in a way that is not detrimental to any section of our community.

These proposals for a seven-council model are shoddy and have only served to unite democratic political parties in this Assembly. On that basis, we exclude Sinn Féin, for whom democracy is but one option, one possibility, one string to its bow. For it, democracy is only a hobby, a tactic, a means to an end. Having got wind of the fact that the Government were going to opt for the seven-council model, Sinn Féin chose to back what it saw as the winner. In a classic piece of political scavenging, it changed course in order to be seen to be clever and ahead of the game. However, it must have forgotten to inform the Sinn Féin Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone and left him not knowing exactly what day of the week it was. How could he have got it so wrong? Did he believe that Gerry and Martin were talking about RPGs (rocket propelled grenades)?

Mr Hyland: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. The Sinn Féin Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone is a female, not a male.

Mrs Foster: He is talking about the other Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone.

Mr Storey: Yet again Sinn Féin has got it absolutely wrong. Francie Molloy thought that Gerry and Martin were talking about RPGs and not the RPA. Naturally enough, he concluded that he would need more of them.

Mr Hyland: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. If the Member is referring to Francie Molloy, he is a Member for Mid Ulster. The Member opposite should get it right for a change.

Mr Storey: Naturally enough Francie Molloy concluded that he would need a pitiful seven, just in case they had to go back to what they do best.

However, we need to be absolutely clear about where this seven-council proposal came from. Why are we considering the reduction of 26 district councils to seven? Let me remind Members of a former Member of this House, a Mr Foster. It is not Ivan on this occasion, or my hon Friend Arlene either. [Interruption.] I would have been happy if it had been he.

Let me remind Members what Sam Foster said at the Ulster Unionist conference in 2000:

"In England, the average county council unitary authority serves almost 700,000 people and the average district council close to 100,000."

Function, form, size and location are all aspects that we need to examine afresh to increase the effectiveness of our councils. Had Mr Foster had his way, the Government would not have suggested seven, six, five, four or possibly three councils in Northern Ireland, and that proposal would have fitted the analysis of the situation.

We must always remind the House that there is a consequence for the actions that we take. There are many Members running through the country saying that water charges are terrible and industrial rating is an awful thing, but remember: it was the decisions that were taken by this Assembly in a previous life that brought about those recommendations and that situation. The same is said of RPA — this was the place where it started. [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. Your time is up, Mr Storey.

The next speaker is Mr Philip McGuigan, and this is the first occasion on which the Assembly has heard from Mr McGuigan. He will be making his maiden speech. As Members know, it is convention that such a speech is heard without interruption.

Mr McGuigan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

I declare an interest in that I am a member of Ballymoney Borough Council. I have had the honour of listening to Mr Storey use any given subject for debate to launch a tirade against Sinn Féin and those who vote for and support us.

I listened with great interest to all that was said this morning and cannot help but draw the same conclusions that my party colleagues have drawn: the arguments put forward by those on the opposite side of the Chamber against the current RPA arrangements just do not stack up.

While I do not want to touch on all that has gone before us this morning, I want to tackle a few points, particularly the point that was laboured by Tommy Gallagher and Peter Weir with regard to the economies of scale and the rates distribution — in their terms, the fair rates distribution.

People should remember that the proposals for the seven-council model came about as a result of an independent investigation into the matter. If the House does not want to take our word for it, listen to the words of the Equality Commission, which has said:

"Fewer councils could assist in better distribution of resources between council areas. More councils are likely to have a greater unevenness in the rating basis with a greater mismatch between demand for services and local government income generated through rates."

The Northern Ireland Council for Voluntary Action has said that seven councils will create the most equal property wealth base.

I also want to refer to the point that Peter Weir made when he talked about the inequalities and the differential between rate bases which currently exist within councils. He then went on to propose a 12-council model, but he failed to explain how the 26 councils could be reduced to 12 without tackling the differential rate base.

I also want to take up the point that was made this morning about Sinn Féin being on its own, or, in some cases, a lackey to the British Government. I do not think that Sinn Féin could ever be accused of being a lackey to the British Government, and we are not, as has been said this morning, on our own in supporting these proposals. My colleague Alex Maskey referred to a number of groups who support the seven-council model. Those groups include the Ulster Farmers' Union, the Rural Community Network, the Confederation of British Industry, NICVA, the Irish National Teachers Organisation, Friends of the Earth, the Institute of Directors, the North West Public Sector Group, the Tourist Board in the North, the Institute of Public Health in Ireland, Help the Aged and Derry Chamber of Commerce to name a few. It is obvious that these proposals, which currently exist in the review of public administration, have widespread support throughout the community.

While I realise that the review of public administration covers a wide group of subjects, I want to focus particularly on Tommy Gallagher's notion that the seven-council model will underpin sectarianism and community division.

When people use that argument, I ask myself where they have been for the last 30 years. If they want to see a model that underpins sectarianism and community division, they should open their eyes and look at the current model. Are Castlereagh, Lisburn, Ballymena, Coleraine, Newtownabbey or Ballymoney — my own council — beacons of pluralism and good practice in promoting equality and power sharing? In unionist-controlled councils, a LeasCheann Comhairle, the practice of widespread and systematic discrimination is the norm. In any new arrangement, that needs to be addressed. As Mr Maskey said earlier, Sinn Féin's support for any new arrangement is predicated on the need for appropriate safeguards to protect both elected representatives and the ratepayers whom they serve.

Much has been made by the SDLP, in the media and in public, of the term "Balkanisation". I remind the SDLP that that term means "the proliferation of ethnically-defined areas". It stands to reason that the greater the number of councils, the more Balkanised local government will become. The SDLP fails to explain what will be different in an 11- or 15-council model. How would the boundaries be drawn? The seven-council model does not create the sectarian bipolarity that defines the geography of the Six Counties; the same sectarian line can be drawn on the map of any other proposal.

More than any other model, 7C appears to ensure that each council area will have a minority community of sufficient size to ensure its inclusion in the arrangements for the governance of the proposed council. As a councillor who lives in the north-east of Ireland, dare I say that that is a very welcome prospect. That is not simply my opinion, nor that of Sinn Féin; it is the opinion of the Equality Commission that the best option, on equality grounds, is to have the smallest number of councils that will secure effective service provision.

Sinn Féin is serious about equality and about political emancipation. The importance of the opportunity offered by the seven-council model should not be lost on unionists, particularly those who live in border areas and who fear assimilation and erosion of their political identity and culture. As has been said on many occasions, a LeasCheann Comhairle, when we in Sinn Féin talk about equality, we mean equality for all. When examples of good and bad practice are compared, that becomes clear.

I want to see local government in the North move forward in an effective manner; the shackles that hinder local councillors from making more effective changes removed; councillors from all political parties and perspectives working together to enhance the lives of their communities and of all who live in the Six Counties; and stronger councils driving local communities forward. Provided appropriate equality measures and power sharing are implemented, those objectives are best served by the proposals of the review of public administration. I have heard nothing in the arguments of others today to deflect me from that view. Go raibh maith agat.

Mr Gardiner: I declare at the outset that I am a member of Craigavon Borough Council in the Upper Bann constituency.

The seven-council model is a system designed by bureaucrats for bureaucrats. A new system of local government should, instead, be modelled around democracy and local participation, giving life to local communities and pushing meaningful decision-making down as far as possible within the system. Even by its own standards, the seven-council model fails miserably. The effective abandonment of the principle of coterminosity of services means that there is no standardisation of governance between health, education and local government. The failure to achieve coterminosity wipes away any gains that may be made in economies of scale and critical mass.

It would be no exaggeration to say that coterminosity was the central organising principle behind public administration reform in the first place. The whole idea was to have democracy accountable at every level across a broad range of public services. That vision has been lost — instead we are facing a repeat performance of the confused pattern of demarcation lines of the public services under the existing system.

Why has the objective of coterminosity — and its underlying principles of local democracy and accountability — been quietly abandoned? Why did it cease to matter? Lack of coterminosity has led to ludicrous situations. Consider the example of the so-called banana republic council area, a proposed merger of Lisburn, Newtownabbey, Carrickfergus and Antrim.

In the further education sector, however, Lisburn Institute of Further and Higher Education is to be merged with the North Down and Ards Institute, which is in a totally different council area. The East Antrim Institute of Further and Higher Education in Newtownabbey is to be merged with the North East Institute of Further and Higher Education in Ballymena in yet a third council area — so much for rationalisation. If that is the best that the RPA planners can come up with, it is time that this Assembly sorted them out.

We are embarking on a seven-council model, creating units with an average population of 250,000, when average council sizes elsewhere are much smaller. Even those Members who favour greater integration with the Irish Republic must have difficulty understanding why council areas will cover a population of 250,000 when the average size in the Irish Republic is only 100,000. Unionist-minded people wonder why an average council area in Scotland or Wales has 100,000 inhabitants, while we must make do with remote super-councils.

Likewise, everyone wonders why decision-making in Northern Ireland is to be taken away from local areas to remote super-councils, when the English model that is currently being constructed is designed to push the decision-making process as far down the system as possible — in some cases even into local neighbourhoods.

Northern Ireland is a small place, suited to small council areas that reflect historical patterns of local identity. People cannot possibly be expected to identify with remote super-councils that often sit some distance from many of the areas that they govern. That is bound to lead to yet more people failing to engage with local democracy. Voter turnout at council elections will, I predict, fall further.

At a time when we in Northern Ireland should be bolstering democracy and the democratic process, the option 7C model will effectively kill democracy and further reduce public participation in the democratic process. The political vacuum created by direct rule and the lack of accountable local Ministers has already undermined that. Instead, we should take measures designed to boost democracy, and give people the sense that they can make a difference and that they can change things.

It is strange that one aspect of the option 7C model that retains some balance of level involvement — the creation of civic councils involving elected representatives and business interests in local towns within the new super-council areas — has been quietly forgotten and abandoned. That is why I have called for the civic council proposals to be revisited. No matter what model or number of councils we eventually opt for, we must nurture the democratic process, not cosh it.

The process of public administration reform has been as flawed as its conclusions. Discussion about the regeneration of the education boards is meaningless without the inclusion of the Department of Education. Public administration must include the entire system of public administration for the reform to be meaningful. Leaving the functions of Stormont Departments out of the equation actually influences the outcome of that reform. How can a realistic restructuring of local administration be undertaken without reference to this Assembly?

Now that the Assembly seems to be back on track, the process of arriving at a seven-council model must surely be revisited and revised. The way that local councils relate to this Assembly is the single most important consideration for the smooth operation of Government in Northern Ireland in the future.

It is also intolerable that public money should continue to be spent developing the seven-council model, when four of the five major parties in the Assembly are opposed to it, and the likelihood of a seven-council model being agreed by this Assembly is almost zero. There should be no more public money spent on pursuing the seven-council model until the Assembly pronounces on the subject. The whole process and outcome of the reform of public administration is so flawed, incomplete and erratic that it will have to be examined again, root and branch, by the Assembly.

As a member of the political panel, I have drawn the Ulster Unionist Party's concerns on the seven-council model to the Minister's attention time and again, but thus far he has not made a final decision. I hope that the powers necessary for Northern Ireland to go forward will be back with this Assembly.

Mr Hay: This is a lively debate. There is no doubt about the importance of trying to get the future of local government right. I listened today to the Members opposite talk about equality and fairness. However, let me relate to the House a story that, I think, is important to the debate.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Mr Hay, have you anything to declare?

Mr Hay: Yes, Mr Deputy Speaker, I have quite a lot to declare. I am a member of a particular council in Londonderry, and I have been for many years.

Mr McElduff: On a point of order, a LeasCheann Comhairle. To clear up any confusion, will the Member declare the name of the council?

Mr Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order.

Mr Hay: The party opposite talks about fairness and equality, but I can remember — not that long ago — when a member of Sinn Féin came into the Guildhall, where the council was meeting, and decided to set a bomb there. That happened on two occasions — not just one. Do Members know how Sinn Féin rewarded that party member? It selected him as a candidate for the next local government elections, at which he was successful. That was the work of Sinn Féin and the entire republican movement. Therefore that political party endorsed that candidate for what he had done. Not only did he blow up the Guildhall where the council sits, but he put lives at risk, and he had the audacity to fail to apologise for his actions. That happened in the early 1980s. The Members opposite talk about equality and fairness; however, I give that example of their associates' actions — I hope that the organisation has moved on from that.

Members will agree that local government in Northern Ireland has worked reasonably well over the years, even with the limited powers that it has had. I will go even further and say that over 30-odd years — the difficult years in Northern Ireland — it was the only political and democratic voice that ordinary people had. The public could go to their individual council areas and express their views on issues. That was a useful tool; there was no other political forum in which ordinary people could participate.

Over the years, local government has also been hugely successful in many aspects of driving forward economic development, inward investment and job creation in the individual areas. On occasions, even with limited powers, they were able to give a lead on many issues. It is important that the House should recognise that and recognise the work of local government over the difficult years in Northern Ireland.

There are 26 district councils, four health boards, 19 health trusts, five education boards and about 100 quangos serving a population of 1.7 million. Members will agree that that cannot be defended. For the future of Northern Ireland, there must be strong local government that is fit for purpose in the twenty-first century. That is what everyone in the House is trying to achieve. The new councils should be at the heart of front-line service delivery as well as civic life. They should represent the needs of communities and ensure that local services are delivered efficiently and effectively. However, the seven-council model cannot deliver that; the councils will be very remote from their communities.

We need to change and modernise local government in Northern Ireland. At the moment, it is going through change from within and without. It is also important to remember that the Northern Ireland Office is pushing ahead in order to ensure that most of the work will be done and that any future Assembly, when it is up and running, will find it difficult to reverse those decisions. Civil servants and Ministers are not listening. They intend to drive through these policies in the knowledge that a local Assembly could change some aspects of the RPA. I have no quarrel with civil servants; however, they appear to be driving the RPA through as quickly as possible in the interests of the Secretary of State and the direct rule Ministers, so that when the House is up and running, there will be very little that anyone can do about it. That is the great worry. There is no doubt that the Secretary of State is not listening to the majority of the political parties in Northern Ireland. I hope that he is listening today and will take on board some of the genuine concerns expressed by Members for the future of local government here.

There is a great debate about additional powers for the councils. If that is to be the case, I have no problem, but there must be serious checks and balances. As councillors, we all deal with planning issues. At present, planning is a mess in Northern Ireland. The resources required to deal with planning are not available. Responsibility for planning will now pass to local government, but without extra resources.

Mr Weir: Does the Member agree that if local government is to get additional powers for planning and roads — which we all welcome — that is worthwhile only if it is properly funded, and that what is proposed at present would leave a black hole in funding? Planning and roads, for instance, are currently underfunded, and there is a real danger that that would have to be passed on to the ratepayer.

Mr Hay: I support the Member's comments. That is a fear that is shared by most of the political parties. Where do we stand on the issue of more powers? Will it simply be a mess when it comes to roads and planning? Will we get more resources? I doubt very much whether we shall get any more resources.

We do not have a sympathetic ear in the Northern Ireland Office when we raise such issues. There seems to be a notion that the NIO will divide Northern Ireland up and lump it with more powers and responsibilities, but not give it more resources. That is of deep concern, especially to people who live in rural areas. Rural dwellers feel the pinch first when any cutbacks are made, be those in roads or in housing. We all know how they are suffering now when it comes to rural planning. However, the RPA will cause great concern to the whole population.

Many issues concerning the reorganisation of local government have not been properly thought out for the simple reason that we have civil servants here who are continually pushing an agenda. I would prefer them to slow down on the reform of local government and the rest of the RPA in order to allow this House eventually to deal with issues such as planning, roads, health and education that come to us daily from the public. The public are pushing forward all those matters, and if we are not very careful when the new local authorities are set up, everything will be in an absolute mess. The finger will not be pointed at civil servants; it will be pointed at this House.

Ms Lewsley: I wish to declare that I am a member of Lisburn City Council.

The outcome of the RPA must be proven to be consistent with Government commitments on equality, new targeting social need, human rights and rural proofing. Although it is clear that many issues were raised through the nine task forces — and that will continue when a further structure is set up to replace them — it is important for there to be equality proofing of any future process and proposals. The importance of that cannot be overstated. Equality proofing was designed to inform and influence policy as it is being developed and not, as previous documents suggest, to be used at the end of a process when it becomes very difficult to influence that policy.

I am also concerned about the potential negative impact of the RPA on the participation rates of women in public life. Those rates are already disproportionately low. I commend the ongoing initiatives of the Local Government Staff Commission for Northern Ireland, NILGA and the National Association of Councillors to deal with that problem, but, as part of any implementation plan that is produced, we must ensure that public bodies become more representative of the people whom they serve.

We heard earlier that changes in the health sector are to be made before developments in education services and local government. The fear in the health sector is that many of the job losses there will be women's jobs. Of course, the opportunity for them to move among the other sectors will not arise, because that sector is moving first. The Secretary of State has already announced that many of those jobs that will be lost will be those of administrators and back-office workers, and we know that the private sector has not grown sufficiently to take in that number of employees.

Good-quality, well-managed public services are essential to equality of opportunity and the creation of a healthy participative democracy. It is important that services are provided consistently and that there is no postcode lottery, which we have now. We must ensure a levelling-up of services, not a levelling-down. Equality issues must, therefore, remain central to this debate until the end.

The community and voluntary sector has been mentioned. That sector is worried about how its voice will be heard in the super-councils. At present, many community and voluntary organisations have lines of communication and good working relationships or partnerships with their local councils. They believe that the word "local" has been taken out of local government. They want to know how they will have a voice on the new community planning groups, given that many of those groups will be representative of perhaps four or more current councils at any one time. The scrapping of the local health and social care groups has left their users with no voice until the new structures are set up in 2008. Where will they have a voice in the interim? Those are just some of the issues that concern people in the community and voluntary sector.

Some community and voluntary groups say that they have been told by the Northern Ireland Council for Voluntary Action and others that if we have these super-councils there will be a better chance of their getting mainstream funding, which would make them more sustainable in the long term. However, Lord Rooker told my colleagues and me that there is no way in which any money saved from the RPA is going to go to the pork barrel in Northern Ireland. That is what he thinks of the community and voluntary sector.

Mr Maskey: Patricia's colleague Michael Carr is a member of the community planning subgroup. Like the rest of its members, he more or less signed off on its proposal that communities must be involved in the community plan process. I suggest that political leadership is required here from people like Ms Lewsley and her colleagues, who are involved in these deliberations but obviously are not telling people out there. People are asking why the SDLP is not in a position to tell them what its members are agreeing to.

Ms Lewsley: I am sorry, but I am voicing the opinion of the community and voluntary groups that are coming to me in my constituency. At the end of the day, I need to make this quite clear: any members of the SDLP who were on any subgroups said from the outset that they were not signing off on any decisions that were made there.

Mrs D Kelly: Does my colleague not agree that there are huge concerns in the broader community that some political parties and their representatives will muscle in on many of the residents' associations and other community and voluntary groups and take over the community planning process?

Ms Lewsley: I am very grateful for both of those interventions.

I note the research on the profiles of the social need indicators for the seven-council models, but I do not accept that a mixed social profile is the only or best guarantor of equality. Given the other factors that I have just mentioned in relation to local government, we can best promote equality in the context of a more accessible, responsive and flexible arrangement with more than seven councils.

Today, we have talked about the Secretary of State and the — I believe misleading — information that he has given to the public about the vast savings that we are going to get from the RPA. We have not yet heard from any of the direct rule Ministers about the amount of money that is going to be set aside or the cost of implementing the review. In fact, many of us believe that it will cost more to implement than it will save.

It has also been mentioned that we need to ensure that budgets are not downsized by Departments in the months before the transfer to the new council structures, because, as Tommy Gallagher said, the cost will be given to the public to pay through the services that need to be delivered.

Alex Maskey's speech took 15 minutes, and he spent most of that time having a go at the rest of us about why we would not support the seven-council model. I did not hear anything in his speech that encouraged me to support that model. He talked about the different subgroups, in particular the political subgroup, and he mentioned that John O'Kane and Dermot Curran from my party were both on it. When they were talking about checks and balances, Sinn Féin was not proposing the 20:80 threshold. When John O'Kane asked a member of his party —

Mr Maskey: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. That is factually incorrect. My colleague Cllr Sean Begley and I rejected the figures presented —

Madam Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order.

Ms Lewsley: They said that there would be no minorities of less than 25%. In fact, we have heard here today about the banana republic, and we believe that Sinn Féin has sold out its own colleagues east of the Bann. In the new Inner East Local Government District there will be 13%. In fact, when Twinbrook, Poleglass and Lagmore go into Belfast, it could go as low as 10%. Is that a price that Sinn Féin is prepared to pay to ensure that it gets its power base west of the Bann? I do not know.

Mr Maskey talked about other parties and self-preservation, yet it was he who stood in the Long Gallery some months ago when Lord Rooker was launching the RPA and said that Sinn Féin had only supported the seven-council model because there would be 70 councillors on each one. Is that not evidence of jobs for the boys?

2.45 pm

It is funny how Mr Maskey was selective in the parts of Tommy Gallagher's speech that he mentioned. He did not rebut the issue that Tommy Gallagher raised about the rates increase — was that because Sinn Féin has not thought about the rates burden that will fall on the public? Indeed, it was an afterthought when Mr Maskey mentioned coterminosity and local identity. Does that mean that Sinn Féin has backed the wrong horse, as many of its members across Northern Ireland are saying? The fact that Francie Molloy is absent from the debate has already been mentioned.

The SDLP has been upfront and honest with the public — [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Ms Lewsley: The SDLP has been upfront and honest with the public in outlining the real impact of the review of public administration.

Mr McElduff: Will the Member give way?

Ms Lewsley: I am sorry; my time is nearly up.

I support, along with Michelle Gildernew — [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Ms Lewsley: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker.

I am delighted to support the motion, along with Michelle Gildernew, rather than the amendment to it.

Madam Speaker: Members should show courtesy when other Members are speaking.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Madam Speaker: This is the first occasion that this Assembly will hear from Ms Pat O'Rawe, when she will make what can be described as her maiden speech. As Members know, it is the convention that such a speech is made without interruption.

Mrs O'Rawe: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Before I begin, I state that I am a member of Armagh City and District Council. In supporting the amendment, I shall concentrate on the issue of equality in respect of women and the review of public administration. It has been rather disappointing that the debate has mainly focused on the number of councils, rather than on some of the other issues.

The review of public administration places many challenges before us all, and none more so than ensuring that women are not excluded from political life and participation in decision-making processes. There are many constraints that prevent women's equal and meaningful representation and participation in decision-making. That is the reality that we face, whether it be in political parties, the women's sector or as women working in the public sector.

A Cheann Comhairle, of the 144 posts in the top two tiers of local government officers, 20 are held by women. Furthermore, 54% of councils — that is 14 of the current 26 councils — have no female representation at all at those levels. Currently, there are only 125 women among a total of 582 councillors, although I hope that some of the issues relating to the number of women councillors and women council officers will be remedied in the future through the work of the women in local councils initiative.

Even in the Chamber, when all Members are present, we can all see that there are very few women in the Assembly. Figures relating to appointments to public bodies released on 31 March this year showed that 2,070 appointments were made to 107 public bodies. Women accounted for 32% of those appointments — a figure unchanged from the previous year.

Strategically, political parties, the women's sector and the women's movement need to ensure that the issue of women's representation is placed firmly on the agenda. In other words, we must insist that compulsory, affirmative actions are integral to any structures that emerge from the review of public administration. From the current structure of local government, a scattergun approach is evidently being taken in adhering to equality mainstreaming and applying new targeting social need on the basis of objective need to deliver services that uplift the lives of those most marginalised in society.

A Cheann Comhairle, that cannot be allowed to be carried through into the review of public administration, no more than it should be the approach that is taken to the draft Priorities and Budget, to infrastructure investment, to job creation or to plans to introduce water charges. The fact is that female representation in local government is consistently low, despite attempts by political parties across the board to encourage women candidates to come forward.

Some parties, such as our own, take the issue more seriously than others, but there is still much work to be done. If we are serious about democratic equality for women, we must insist that it be an underpinning requirement of whatever RPA structures emerge. Representation without equal representation is neither desirable for a society that is emerging out of conflict nor acceptable from a democratic-rights-based approach to representation in its fullest sense. Much work is therefore required in the period ahead in order to form the effective civic and political partnerships that will shape, monitor and hold to account the changes that are coming in local governance and in other political and policy-related areas. I ask this Assembly to support the amendment in order to ensure that we have strong and effective local government that is underpinned by power sharing, equality and inclusion.

Mr K Robinson: I begin by declaring my membership of Newtownabbey Borough Council, which is, incidentally, a most forward-looking council. It introduced wheelie bins to Northern Ireland, has led on economic-development issues, and, in 1999, was the first council here to instigate a major European conference.

Mr Kennedy: Does it cover Templepatrick?

Mr K Robinson: It does indeed; we have our eyes on Templepatrick, and on Donegore.

We were also one of the first councils to twin with an emerging eastern European country: we are twinned with the city of Rybnik in southern Poland. For the benefit of the Member who gave the previous speech, I point out that my party group on Newtownabbey council has 50% female representation, the leader of my group is female, as is the Whip, and I feel quite marginalised. [Laughter.]

Any major changes in business or in government require a central organising logic. They must not simply amount to a numbers game. It seems to me that that logic is sadly missing from the proposed pattern of seven super-councils that is currently being imposed on Northern Ireland against the wishes of four of the five major political parties. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr K Robinson: I welcome the Member for Mid Ulster Mr Molloy to the Chamber. I look forward to his contribution to this debate. [Laughter.]

Four of the five political parties, which between them represent three quarters of the people of Northern Ireland, have been pushed aside by this move by central Government.

The ludicrous nature of some of the combinations that are proposed was evidenced by the failure of the authorities to find even suitable or meaningful names for the proposed super-councils. "Inner East" means nothing to anyone in the population centres of Newtownabbey, Carrickfergus, Antrim and the recently created city of Lisburn.

That banana-shaped monstrosity, which has been referred to before, does not even have an A-class road running through it to link it together. For most practical purposes, it is impossible to travel from one end to the other without going through the increasingly traffic-polluted city of Belfast. If there is ever to be a chance to create any sort of civic identity in any of the new council areas, those areas must make some sort of sense to the population that lives there. A consequence of the failure to engage with the inhabitants of an area will be a further drop in electoral engagement, which will result in the democratic legitimacy and credibility of the new structures being lost.

Northern Ireland is a small place, and, as we heard throughout yesterday's debate, people have a deep attachment to, and connection with, their history on both sides of the main religious-political divide. If a seven-council model were being pursued, one has to wonder why historical county boundaries were not an option, which would have meant something to the people on the ground.

The whole pattern of reorganisation bears the stamp of bureaucracy and, one might add, "Hainery". Of course the public were to be consulted, but be assured that we, the Government, will go for the Civil Service-driven seven-council model, anyway. It is reminiscent of Henry Ford, who said that people could have a Ford car in any colour as long as it was black. In this scenario, we can have any combination as long as it is seven. The process has the same stamp as the Secretary of State's treatment of the Assembly, which is to ride roughshod over the wishes of three quarters of the people of the Province.

The seven-super-council model is deeply inappropriate for Northern Ireland, which is a Province of small communities. Beyond the conurbations of Belfast, Lisburn and Londonderry, it is largely a Province of small towns with strong local identities that have grown and developed over centuries. We should nurture those identities, not sweep them away. The pathetic proposal for civic councils, which was a belated attempt to keep local communities engaged, is simply window dressing.

The process of public consultation was deeply flawed. The format may have been adhered to, but unattributable leaks from the Government meant that there were going to be seven councils anyway. That made most people feel that a response to the proposals was a complete waste of time. It is another example of how the format of public consultation is adhered to, but not the spirit. We have seen several examples of that.

The whole point of reorganisation, in the first place, was to rationalise the plethora of boards, quangos, councils and bodies with borders that did not coincide and to create in their place a democratically accountable structure, where different services had the same boundaries and the same lines of democratic accountability. That has not happened. Instead, the principle of coterminosity, which was one of the better ideas in the reorganisation, has been abandoned. What is the point of reorganisation if there are no organisational gains?

Madam Speaker, the position of the Assembly in relation to the new super-councils also concerns me. The new councils must be dovetailed into the Assembly system — to the Committees and the Executive. When the Assembly is operational, the proposed super-council structures will have to be reviewed. It is not prudent to press on with the council reorganisation when the Assembly — the democratic voice of the people of Northern Ireland — has not considered the issue in detail. The Assembly will have to live with the system.

The current departmental structure was referred to earlier, and it has, up to now, escaped scrutiny and the axe. The Departments have major spending powers, and have we not seen an ongoing saga of departmental failures and a waste of huge sums of public money? I see that Mr Dallat has joined us in the Chamber; he has highlighted that issue on many occasions. Surely now is the time to examine the Government and departmental structures, which have been exposed, thanks to the efforts of the Northern Ireland Audit Office and other related inquiries.

More than any tinkering with local government, departmental trimming would enhance the efficiency of government and save huge sums of public money rather than the minuscule amounts for which local government currently accounts.

To press on with seven super-councils before the Assembly is up and running fully is a deeply undemocratic way to proceed. That will pre-empt democratic decision-making on issues such as rates increases and water charges. There is a drive in some sections of the Government to turn those issues into a fait accompli before the democratically elected Assembly can debate and decide on them.

I support the motion.

Madam Speaker: Mr Thomas O'Reilly will now make his maiden speech. As Members know, it is the convention that such a speech be made without interruption.

3.00 pm

Mr O'Reilly: I declare that I am a member of Fermanagh District Council, which is in the unique position of sharing its council and county boundaries. Fermanagh has always rightly been described as the jewel in the Six Counties. Whether there are seven or 15 council configurations, and regardless of their size, like many areas, Fermanagh has an identity that will not be lost.

Tommy Gallagher, who also represents my county, talked about job losses. Those job losses will not wait for the new councils to be established; they are happening daily. The area of Fermanagh that I represent has experienced many job losses. We need to work diligently to ensure that those losses do not continue, either now or when a new council model is established.

We must protect people who work in places such as Fermanagh. If jobs were moved from that county to Belfast, for example, the people doing those jobs would have to travel tremendous distances. We must consider how they would survive if they had to travel such distances. A council model that would allow jobs to be retained in those areas would help many workers, particularly the low paid, who cannot afford to travel. The infrastructure west of the Bann is poor, and Rosslea, a small village in Fermanagh, is serviced by one bus a week. There is not much hope of people being able to use that service to travel to Belfast for work. Therefore jobs in that area need to stay local, and that means having a council model that is big enough to deliver services and stop their daily pull into centres such as Belfast.

Advancements in technology have given us the opportunity to move away from relying on travelling to centres such as Belfast. We have all heard the term “distance learning”, and given that information technology is used to acquire an education, the principle behind that could be applied to distance working. For example, that principle could apply to the hundreds of civil servants who travel daily to Belfast, negotiating the perils of traffic jams to do so. On arrival at their respective places of work in Government Departments, the majority of those people spend their entire working day sitting in front of computers, week in and week out.

Why should they have to make round trips from places such as Fermanagh? Those trips cover distances of over 150 miles and can add anything up to four or five hours to a working day. With facilities such as the Internet, broadband, webcams and teleconferencing, there is no logical reason why those people could not perform their duties as efficiently as they do in Belfast from workstations in Fermanagh or other places.

That would not mean the decentralisation of the entire Civil Service; it would simply require that it find local accommodation for its staff. It could even save money by sharing offices and by not paying travel allowances.

I have no doubt that other areas could house people from their localities who have to commute. Not only could that be more efficient but it would greatly reduce absenteeism by removing the stress of having to battle through traffic jams and congestion every working day.

As a direct result of civil servants being predominantly based in Belfast, the vast bulk of economic activity and wealth in the Six Counties is also centred around Belfast. That encourages those who make economic decisions on investment and infrastructure to give priority to projects that will impact on the political centres, which works to the detriment of other areas, particularly areas west of the Bann, such as Fermanagh and South Tyrone.

However, if some of those who influence those decisions were detached from the centre, they might be better motivated to make a greater impact on decisions affecting regions outside the main conurbation.

Locating large numbers of Civil Service jobs to regional areas through distance working could help stimulate economic activity and would, in turn, attract further investment and create opportunities for local industries. It is well documented that investors and developers are attracted to locations that have a concentration of Government Departments and agencies. It is obvious that the principle is well enough understood at senior policy-making level, yet the fixation with investing in Belfast and consolidating Government in the Belfast metropolitan area continues unabated.

It is time for Fermanagh and South Tyrone to challenge that; it is time for a change. It is time to invest in teleworking technologies, challenges and opportunities. An over-concentration of Government-related work in Belfast has had a negative impact on investment in other urban and rural areas.

When viewed over decades, it is clear that this policy has contributed to rural depopulation, poverty and deprivation in many areas. In the North, the old unionist regime's discriminatory practices contributed to the urban decline west of the Bann. More than 80% of all investment in the North over the past five years has been in Belfast.

The policy has therefore not changed or ended despite the equality legislation introduced after the Good Friday Agreement. That is why Sinn Féin demanded at the St Andrews discussions that the British Government accept the requirement that every policy and departmental decision be subject to an equality impact assessment. That is one of the most far-reaching aspects of those negotiations, and Sinn Féin will hold those Departments and agencies to account to ensure that regional disparities are detected and progressively eliminated.

I have heard nothing today that has dissuaded me from the idea that the seven-council model is the best model through which to not only deliver services, but to give those services the size and budget that will really make a difference. Assembly Members who are also councillors will certainly understand how little power councillors have. For example, planning is one area over which councillors have very little power. If we have a job to do at council level, we must have the ability to do it effectively. We need a budget that can make a difference and not a budget that is tied up in so much red tape that it is practically spent before we get it. So many major problems face us: the implementation of water charges; the cuts in education; and so on. We must be able to deal with those issues at a local level.

I have heard much talk about who is missing from the Chamber. I see that Seán Farren, the former Minister of Finance and Personnel, has not appeared in the Chamber today. He was one of those who was pushing through the legislation for the introduction of water charges. It is certainly interesting to see who is not here.

Mrs Foster: I also am a member of Fermanagh District Council. [Interruption.]

I note that you are not a member of any council, Ian. [Laughter.] You asked for that.

There are some issues that I want to address before I move to the substantive part of my speech. Members of Sinn Féin raised two of those issues. First, there is the matter of the participation of more females in local government. The simple fact is that fewer councillors will mean fewer women councillors. That was completely missed in the Member for Newry and Armagh Mrs O'Rawe's submission to the House. Secondly, the Sinn Féin Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone Ms Gildernew said that the area would not be able to lobby effectively for anything if there were not seven super-councils. If Fermanagh and South Tyrone is subsumed with Omagh and Cookstown, we will find it considerably more difficult to lobby for jobs — or anything else for that matter.

I welcome today's debate. As other Members have said, it is long overdue. We have, however, heard no sound reason for there being seven councils. That is not a proposition: it is a fact. We have heard plenty of attacks from Sinn Féin on other parties, but it has given no sound reason for having only seven councils. The idea may sound good in theory. However, in practice, as many councillors have pointed out in the Chamber today, it would be ill-conceived. Councillors are the people who know how the system works, not the long list of bodies that has been read out by Sinn Féin, which have not received a single vote between them.

Sinn Féin has tried in vain to cover its blushes from its electorate. As previous contributors on this side of the House and, indeed, from the SDLP have pointed out, the seven-council model will lead to a sectarian carve-up of Northern Ireland and, therefore, polarisation. Fermanagh District Council is a county council. I would prefer it to remain so. However, even if there had been a move towards coterminosity with the Westminster boundaries, that would have been a more effective way of dealing with, and lobbying on, many issues of concern in Fermanagh and South Tyrone.

My colleague Mr Peter Weir, the former president of NILGA, has dealt effectively with many of the spurious claims that we have heard from the party on the Benches opposite. I want to outline what the seven-council model would mean for my constituency of Fermanagh and South Tyrone. The House has heard an elected Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone try to justify the seven-council model as being good for rural dwellers. What patent nonsense that is. How could it be better for rural dwellers to be further cut off from the east of the Province? That is what will happen. I have long complained about my constituency's being forgotten about by the east. If it were sidelined in the past with regard to investment, there is no doubt that that will be worse under the super-council model.

The West Local Government District, which would run from Belcoo to the shores of Lough Neagh, would be left to get on with business and would be forgotten about totally by the east of the Province. There would be no community identification, which would lead to alienation from the local political process. Let me tell the House that if people switch off from local politics, they will switch off from all politics, including the Assembly, if they have not done so already.

The Fermanagh District Council area is known for its natural beauty and tourism. After agriculture, tourism is its biggest industry. The council has, through necessity, carved an effective corporate image for itself, not least in relation to tourism. As my colleague Mr Hay mentioned, councils throughout Northern Ireland have had to take the lead on many occasions with regard to the economy. I say "through necessity" in relation to tourism, because central Government and, indeed, the body that is charged with tourism promotion, the Northern Ireland Tourist Board, have done little to promote the jewel in Northern Ireland's crown, namely the Fermanagh Lakelands.

It has been left to Fermanagh District Council to promote the tourism potential of the area, which it does very well, but what will happen under the option 7C model? Who will promote the Fermanagh lakeland when it must compete with Omagh, Cookstown and Dungannon? That issue does not seem to bother the MP for Fermanagh and South Tyrone, but I wish to inform the House that I do care, as do the many people whose livelihoods depend on tourism in Fermanagh.

3.15 pm

Safeguards will be vital in any new system. We have heard much from the party opposite about sectarianism, as if it only happens to its members. Sinn Féin is the largest party on my council, and it has tried to stop the flying of the Union flag at the royal pipe band competition — an event that brings significant revenue to Enniskillen, where I am a councillor. At a council meeting just last night, Sinn Féin made a song and dance about a grant of £100 for capacity building to a group of innocent victims in south-east Fermanagh — so much for equality and respect.

Sinn Féin may continue to pursue intimidation by other means, but there are those of us in purely democratic parties who will continue to hold the line, no matter how difficult that may be. It is time for Sinn Féin to walk the walk and not just talk the talk. That is not the case in relation to the review of public administration alone, but in relation to policing and support for the courts and the rule of law.

Mr Hussey: In making my speech, I will try to stick to the Standing Orders under which we operate.

I support the motion. However, I must address several issues that other Members have raised. I do so now because comments were made in maiden speeches, which, as the Speaker pointed out, cannot be interrupted.

Mr O'Reilly mentioned depopulation caused by unionism. How dare a Sinn Féin representative from County Fermanagh tell us about depopulation in an area where Protestants faced ethnic cleansing, as has also happened in my constituency of West Tyrone? How dare you, Thomas. I am sorry; I had to say that.

What about people on the west bank of the Foyle?

Madam Speaker: Mr Hussey, you said at the beginning of your contribution that you would abide by Standing Orders. As I said, Members should be very careful about naming other Members, and their speeches should keep to the motion.

Mr Hussey: I declare an interest as a member of Strabane District Council and, as the motion relates to the RPA, I declare my membership of the Western Education and Library Board, which is also part of the review.

In relation to your advice to me, Madam Speaker, I referred to remarks that I could not address at the time they were made because of the rule concerning maiden speeches. I feel very strongly about that.

Mr McGuigan spoke of equality for all. Perhaps he could convey that message to his party colleagues in my neck of the woods, who are regularly orchestrating opposition to expressions of local cultural identity. Is that equality?

The motion concerns the rationalisation of local government. I support a 15-council model, which would not change the colour of the particular council that I wish to be part of — a west Tyrone council. The model adopted will make no difference to me, as my council will still be a republican/nationalist-dominated council. However, I support the motion on the basis of its logic.

Mrs O'Rawe was concerned that the debate centred on the number of councils, and quite rightly so. The RPA is about much more than local councils. However, local councils should be the building blocks that can be utilised in the wider review of public administration.

The issue of coterminosity has been lost in the present proposals. There is a coterminosity that is inbuilt within the parliamentary constituency boundaries, and that should have been recognised. A natural electoral pyramid system is available within those boundaries. There are councillors, MLAs and an MP — a natural progression that could be utilised for dovetailing other services, including education, health, the Roads Service, the Water Service, and the Housing Executive. Such a situation already exists in building control, for example, where we have the grouping system. That could quite easily have been utilised to bring us all together in group systems to deal with the bigger issues of health, education, etc, and would have an extremely effective coterminosity. That has been lost. Late in the day, the Government agreed, or accepted, that local identity had to be maintained within local government. They accepted the principle, but they did not enact that principle in the hames — the Hain's hames — that they have produced and offered to us all.

In my area — I am looking around, but most of my "Team West Tyrone" colleagues have disappeared — there are those who are worried that minorities will be left out. However, in my area, which I hope will become one of the councils — a west Tyrone council — councillors have proved that they can work together on bread-and-butter issues. There are constitutional differences, but surely this is the sort of thing that should be developed in local government: locally elected representatives working together for the local good. Where is the local identity in what has been proposed? Madam Speaker and Members of the Assembly, I just do not see it. As has been rightly said already, I do not know what somebody on the shores of Lough Neagh will have in common with somebody on the other side of the lough in Fermanagh. There is no commonality.

Reference has been made to INTERREG III. Again, there is a grouping system that operates along the border corridor — Sinn Féin has referred to it — with the three cross-border groups, now joined by the internal group in Northern Ireland. I sit on an INTERREG IIIA partnership and am a past chairperson of the North West Region Cross Border Group, and I am quite content with that. Within it, INTERREG IIIA is feeding in. It has been claimed that INTERREG IIIA partnerships would be happier with the seven-council system. I cannot see how that would work logically.

Another means of INTERREG IIIA funding is through the local strategy partnerships. Where are they going? Would there be a local strategy partnership covering the entire south-west, or covering the entire north-west? No, thank you.

Mr Maskey talked about community development. What better example has there been of community development than that witnessed in my area? I am sure that Members will have seen community development strategies developed through local strategy partnerships in other areas. Those are the good things that we need to maintain. Local identity must be maintained and coterminosity can be attained in an extremely logical way by the use of a 15-council model — a model that does work and will work.

Sinn Féin expressed concern that minorities would be left out. Mr Weir said that the intention was that the same number of councillors would be retained, and that, therefore, the electoral threshold for each elected representative would remain the same. How does one lose out on representation? I cannot see the logic of it. As the motion says:

Let this debate develop in here — unless Sinn Féin is aware that it will not live up to its pillar of the twin pillars that are required and does not expect a proper Northern Ireland Assembly to come into being. If that is the case, Sinn Féin should say so or houl yer whisht.

Wait until the parties can make their own decisions. I ask the Minister to allow the parties to make our own decisions, have the sort of debate that we are having now and allow a democratic decision, a majority democratic decision to come forth from the Assembly.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr P J Bradley: First, I apologise that I have a cold today. Yesterday, Members debated at length the events of 24 November 2006. I remember only that I got wet and cold, and I still have the cold.

While canvassing during my first election campaign, I called at the home of the retiring councillor for the area, John McAteer. I have never forgotten his words of assurance to me. John, who has since sadly passed away, told me that the people knew me, that I knew the people and that I would do OK.

I was duly elected, and during my term on the council I learned the importance of my predecessor's words. I represented the rural areas of Burren, Ballyholland and Derrylecka and, as a local councillor, it was important to me that I knew the people whom I represented. I realised that it was equally important to the local ratepayers to know their representative.

No one in the Assembly, from whatever constituency, who claims to have the interests of his rural constituents at heart should remotely consider supporting the direct rulers' proposals to carve up our cherished rural identities.

Under the present structures, it is fair to assume that every voter in Northern Ireland knows at least one councillor and that most councillors personally know 75% to 80% of the families in their electoral areas. If the new structures are forced upon us, all that will change and the majority of rural electors will not know a councillor, and councillors will have little or no knowledge of the majority of people from their electoral areas. If the direct rule Ministers have their way and Sinn Féin continues to support the British on the RPA proposals, the word “local” will be taken out of local government.

In May, speaking at the Balmoral Show breakfast event, Lord Rooker clearly outlined his desire to see the Assembly controlled by Northern Ireland politicians sooner rather than later. The departing Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development qualified his comments by stating that local input and decision-making is best when carried out by local people. The Minister was referring to the Assembly, but it is even easier to apply the same sentiments when speaking about rural residents and rural government structures.

Today, several Members referred to rural communities and the farming community. Reference was also made to the support of the Ulster Farmers' Union for the seven-council model. I have no argument with its taking that line — and I must declare that I am a member of the Ulster Farmers' Union and greatly admire its work. However, everyone would agree that the Ulster Farmers' Union, in the main, represents those with larger farms in Northern Ireland.

Members in this corner of the House are concerned with all farmers, whether they own five, 10 or 50 acres of land. Those with small farms and smaller rural communities lose out. It is interesting to note that the Northern Ireland Agricultural Producers Association, which represents those with smaller farms, has not yet taken a line on the proposals. It has not rushed into supporting the proposals, and perhaps that sends a message.

The RPA proposals will greatly diminish the voter/councillor relationship. In the South Down area, the amalgamation of Newry and Mourne District Council, Banbridge District Council, Armagh City and District Council and Craigavon Borough Council will result in an approximate ratio of 4,400 electors per councillor.

Regrettably, such a high ratio will mean that representatives will not know their constituents personally. It is even more disturbing that many rural ratepayers and residents will not know their local councillor. It is fair to assume that, unlike the present structures, officials with little or no knowledge of the areas to be covered by the super-councils will administer the proposed amalgamations.

I looked at the ratios in nearby jurisdictions. Although governing systems differ from country to country, the figures were interesting. After the restructuring of local government in Wales, the ratio of local government electors is 1,761 per councillor. In the Republic of Ireland, the ratio is 1,654 electors per councillor, and in Scotland the ratio of 3,200 electors per councillor is considerably higher.

3.30 pm

To make further comparisons and to highlight the concerns of many, I shall list the differentials of the numbers of people for each elected representative in six other European countries. The systems in those countries may be different, but they demonstrate the importance that is attached to local politics and to the need to have contactable representatives in all areas. In Spain the population differential for each elected representative is 610, in Finland it is 410, in Germany it is 350, in Sweden it is 256, in Austria it is 209, and in France it is 118. In Northern Ireland the average differential for each of the current 26 council structures is approximately 2,500 people for each elected representative. Many people, including some of the political parties, consider that differential to be slightly low, and it is accepted that changes to that could be tolerated. However, as I stated in my opening remarks, rural representatives in Northern Ireland cannot accept the ill-conceived changes that are being foisted upon us by English and Scottish direct-rule Ministers.

Members should remember that we are not discussing European electoral areas, parliamentary or even Assembly constituencies; we are discussing local government areas and the important role that councils play in local communities.

There are additional reasons to challenge direct-rule Ministers' treatment of Northern Ireland. Members need only look at previous reviews in other jurisdictions to find that in Scotland, the number of local authorities was reduced by 51%, and in Wales a similar 51% reduction was applied. However, in Northern Ireland a drastic reduction of 73% is proposed.

I referred in my opening remarks to the rural areas of Ballyholland and Derrylecka, and those are the best examples that I can give of rural communities that are under threat. If the proposed draconian measure were implemented, those two areas — over 100 streets, avenues and cul-de-sacs — would be merged into a ward of the city of Newry. Those making the recommendations — and others who are content to let them be implemented — are prepared to sacrifice the heritage and distinct identities of two very proud and respected rural communities.

That is but one example, and I am sure that Members can find similar examples in their own areas. I support the motion, and, like Members on the opposite Benches, I request that the recommendation is put on hold until the Assembly is up and meeting properly. Only then can Members make a decision. That decision should not be made for them by outsiders. As the song said:

"For the stranger came and tried to teach us their way".

Members know what is best for this area.

Mr Shannon: I wish to declare that I am a member of Ards Borough Council and have been for 22 years. It is one of the Province's premier boroughs, and I am happy to be a member of its council.

In tha gein oot an sharein o' funs is foar mare seryus

An tha facts er glaring oot tae see.

Strangford is an area of outstanding natural beauty. It is a place with a vibrant history that celebrated its four-hundredth year in style. Ards Borough Council has striven to let the world know about its pride in local history, about its pride in the sheer beauty and majesty of the lough, about the charm of the small villages along the peninsula and about its pride in having gardens that have been nominated as world heritage sites. I am not merely blowing about the many attractions that my borough has to offer at any time of year — those attractions are particular to the Strangford area and are vastly important to the people who live on the lough's beautiful shores. However, if those facts are relayed to someone from, for example, Dundonald or Carryduff, that pride will be somewhat dissipated as those people relate their pride in their districts. What may seem normally like friendly rivalry will be more serious in the context of the allocation of funds. The facts are stark.

Prof Paul Carmichael of the University of Ulster said:

"local government must be genuinely local if the system overall is to retain a sense of being responsive to local needs. By this reckoning, the new seven 'super councils' are a travesty of genuine local government."

It is at best unlikely and at worst impossible that a city council could understand the needs of a rural area and vice versa. The system devised simply does not take into account the sense of affinity that is needed to ensure a successful local government regime. One need only sit in on any council meeting to see the diversity of opinions with regard to allocations of funding. We have all experienced that and can imagine the difficulties that the proposed amalgamations would cause.

Communities are being thrown together geographically, as the areas have little in common to link them. Given that no names could be found to unify the districts — as the Local Government Boundaries Commissioner, Dick Mackenzie, admitted — it is abundantly clear that the seven-council model suffers from a complete lack of local identity.

Members may have read a recent 'Belfast Telegraph' questionnaire, which invited readers to suggest names for the seven new councils. One of the more amusing responses was that they should be named after the Seven Dwarfs because the Seven Dwarfs have as much affinity with the seven proposed council areas as anybody else.

There is no question that a more streamlined system of local government is needed in Northern Ireland. However, the seven-council model is clearly not the best way forward, and should not be taken beyond the consultation process. The fact that four of the five main parties agree that it is not the best way forward for the Province is proof of that.

The vast majority of elected representatives are opposed to the seven-council proposal. A majority of the 1,400 people surveyed across the Province by the Northern Ireland Statistics and Research Agency came out strongly in favour of an 11- or 15-council system, as opposed to the 113 people who responded to the further consultation document on the seven-council model. Why is that the case? The reason is that there is a widespread and legitimate fear, not only with regard to the loss of local identity, but with regard to the loss of local accountability. A local representative would have little say in the outcome of council meetings because 250,000 voices would have to be represented in each council area. Compare that with Scotland, where the quota is 100,000 for each council. In Wales, to which the Secretary of State is keen to compare us, only 1,500 votes are required to achieve election to a council. However, 5,500 votes would be required to gain a seat on one of the seven super-councils.

People in the fishing village of Portavogie can have quite legitimate fears that their needs will be overlooked in favour of the needs of those living in Dundonald on the outskirts of Belfast. If Northern Ireland were to be divided into 11 council areas, that would give added scope for true power sharing, genuine local democracy and lower-level accountability. The seven super-councils would be too remote and would not be sufficiently representative of local communities.

The loss of accountability and local identity would be a major problem. The seven-council model would impose sectarian divides and split the Province into the nationalist west and the so-called unionist east, with Belfast in the middle, pulled between the two. It is surprising that a Government that have urged us to break down dividing walls, to integrate more fully and to pull down the barriers between us are now, to all intents and purposes, formalising those very divisions.

The formation of seven super-councils will polarise political opinions and agendas, whereas the 11-council option would diminish somewhat the impact of the north-south and east-west divide. If we are to believe that the way forward is by living in peace together — and I hope that that is the aspiration of many, if not all, in this Chamber — this polarisation is a poor substitute and a very bad idea.

What is it hoped to achieve by that kind of segregation, other than to throw a bone to Sinn Féin? That party has the greatest desire to segregate and to polarise in the hope of steering the population towards its agenda. The intention to strengthen segregation goes against everything that Government urge us to achieve here and raises serious questions about what is behind this move and about what the Government have in store for us.

We should consider the impact on health and social services and the education boards. In those areas, identity will also be lost, so we must look at the whole picture to see how it might develop.

The Assembly should insist that the Secretary of State do away with the implementation of the seven-super-council arrangement and have the 11-council model in its place. The Assembly must back that proposal because it represents the views of the majority of the people in the Province.

The wishes and ultimate well-being of the electorate are paramount: research conducted by the University of Ulster, and the wishes of my constituents, state that the majority of people want more than seven councils — they want 11 councils. The ultimate well-being of our people lies in the Assembly's ability to carry out a full needs assessment of the boroughs and consequently to implement the best possible solution.

Lord Rooker, the Minister with responsibility for the review of public administration, set out the criteria for the creation of the super-councils. He stated:

"local government must ... be at the heart of local services, locally delivered, operating at a size and scale that will allow a council to stretch itself in terms of the services it delivers now and into the future."

The criteria are worthwhile, but if the seven-council plan is implemented, it will not fulfil them, no matter what way one looks at it. It is up to the Assembly and its Members to find a satisfactory solution. Most — if not all — people think that the solution is the 11-council plan, which would streamline vastly without losing identity and accountability.

The problem must be solved at a local level and not by those who have a different idea of what is needed by the people of Northern Ireland. Members must insist that they are given the power to carry out what they have been elected to do. It is the wish of the majority of elected representatives and of the people of the Province. I urge everyone to support the motion.

Mr Beggs: I declare an interest as a member of Carrickfergus Borough Council, Carrickfergus Community Safety Partnership and Carrickfergus District Policing Partnership.

I too have serious concerns about the proposed seven-council model and the dangers that will result from a so-called local government that is large, impersonal and remote. Like other Members, I agree that the term "local" will be questionable in the proposed new super-councils.

It is good that additional responsibilities will be returned to councils from quangos and other bodies. However, will the decisions that the proposed new super-councils take be seen to be local and accountable to ratepayers? The proposed new councils will be very distant.

During the Troubles, local government was often the only source of local democratic accountability. It was a source of community stability, where local people could work together in the community's general interest in order to improve roads, health services and housing. That scenario should not be put at risk. The dangers of remoteness are evident in my constituency of East Antrim, which comprises Larne Borough Council, Carrickfergus Borough Council and some wards of Newtownabbey Borough Council. The proposed seven-council model would result in the constituency being split, with some councils being absorbed into North East and others into Inner East.

The proposal to reduce 26 local councils to seven is a dramatic, radical and risky shake-up. A sense of local identity will be lost, and the changes will affect many aspects of local communities. Some local newspapers may even be at risk because much of the coverage in such papers emanates from local councils. If local councils cover a huge geographical area, there would be relatively little to report in the 'Larne Times', 'Larne Advertiser', 'Larne Gazette', 'Newtownabbey Times', 'Carrick Times' or 'Carrickfergus Advertiser'. The collective effect will be that local cohesion will be put at risk.

3.45 pm

The proposed boundary changes, and how they affect my area, are particularly unacceptable. Larne Borough Council is to join Ballymena Borough Council, Ballymoney Borough Council, Moyle District Council and Coleraine Borough Council.

Larne is the gateway port for rural Northern Ireland, the premier rural port. It naturally gravitates towards Belfast and the main transport corridor along the A8, and along the east Antrim railway line towards Carrickfergus and Belfast. The natural community linkages are towards Ballyclare, Carrickfergus and Newtownabbey. I am a member of Raloo Presbyterian Church in the Larne borough. It is part of the Carrickfergus presbytery. I am also an officer in the East Antrim battalion of the Boys' Brigade, in the Larne area. The natural community linkages point, not towards Ballymena or Coleraine, but to the east Antrim area. The proposal is a nonsense. It goes against the grain. Why were such local aspects not taken into consideration when making these proposals?

Let us turn to Inner East Local Government District: Carrickfergus, Newtownabbey, Antrim and Lisburn. From Whitehead in County Antrim to Dromore in County Down.

Mr Poots: To Dromara, rather.

Mr Beggs: I beg your pardon, I meant to say Dromara. What is the connection between Whitehead and Dromara? I suggest that there is none. I have no wish to offend colleagues from Lisburn City Council, but I perceive that their area gravitates towards the Lagan valley corridor. They travel the M1 to Belfast, not the M2. Inner East Local Government District — the "Big Banana" or the "Banana Republic", as others have referred to it — appears to consist of the bits left over after the rest of Northern Ireland has been divided up. That is the only force binding together the disparate parts of Inner East. That is no basis on which to form a new council area. Larne, Carrickfergus and Newtownabbey have natural community linkages, and these could easily be respected in a 15-council model of local government for Northern Ireland. I suggest that it will not be possible to reflect local community concerns in the proposed seven-council model.

Much more than local councils are affected, however. Others have mentioned local strategy partnerships, community safety partnerships and district policing partnerships. It is doubtful whether local strategy partnerships will continue beyond implementation of the review of public administration. The structures of community safety partnerships and district policing partnerships appear to be amalgamating as, I believe, they should do. Will four council areas, each with three different partnerships, end up as one new strategic partnership, or district policing partnership, covering that entire area, with perhaps one or two members representing each council area? If that is the plan, there is a huge risk of losing the skills and cohesion that have developed in existing partnerships. Such a plan would go too far, cover much too wide an area and allow little opportunity for community involvement.

The motion expresses serious concerns about the dangers of the centralisation of jobs and services. When the Government identify savings as a result of the review of public administration, they mean savings from a reduction in the number of jobs. It is right to reduce costs for ratepayers by becoming more efficient. However, there is a need for balance. The greater the centralisation and efficiency, the greater the remoteness from the centre in peripheral areas. People will have to travel further to lobby a council committee or a council officer. Will those from Whitehead have to travel to Lisburn or Antrim to speak to the appropriate council officer or committee? Will those from Islandmagee have to travel to Ballymena or even to Coleraine — some sixty miles away — for the same purpose? The geography is wrong.

I must respond to derogatory remarks made about a part of my constituency. Alex Maskey referred to Larne. He is patently unaware of the “team Larne” approach adopted by Larne Borough Council. He seems unaware that at present Larne has an SDLP mayor or that it used to have an SDLP deputy mayor — within a borough that has only two nationalist representatives on a 15-member council. Under the new proposals, it is most unlikely that a nationalist in the proposed North East Local Government District area could be elected mayor of such a large district. Only through local interests and co-operation have members of Larne Borough Council seen fit to share the civic positions. That sense of identity and responsibility may easily be lost when formulae are introduced.

I also respond to accusations made by DUP representatives with respect to water charges and rates. The DUP Minister responsible for water in the Northern Ireland Assembly must have been aware of departmental options, yet he did not disclose any of the plans that were in the drawers in his Department. The DUP promised in its election campaign to stop water charges and to reduce rates. It has been the leading unionist party for over three years now, and in that time rates have increased not by 9%, but by 19%, and water charges are likely to be introduced. All that has occurred on the DUP's watch. It cannot blame anyone else.

The seven-council model is wrong — wrong geographically, for service accessibility, for jobs and for community cohesion. Like my colleague Sam Gardiner, I call on the Secretary of State to shelve the seven-council plan. He would not introduce such a plan in Wales were he faced with such an obvious lack of community support there. If he did he would probably not be re-elected, but, of course, he is unaccountable in Northern Ireland. Given the lack of community support, the seven super-councils should not be introduced here. I support the motion and I hope that all will join us, except for those who have some self-interest in generating further sectarian division in Northern Ireland.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I call Mrs Dolores Kelly.

Mrs D Kelly: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker; it is good to see you here. [Laughter.]

(Madam Speaker in the Chair)

Mrs D Kelly: Usurped once again. [Laughter.]

I wish to declare that I am a member of Craigavon Borough Council. I welcome the end of the dual mandate, and am hopeful that I will also see the end of the triple mandate.

In her maiden speech, Mrs O'Rawe referred to the representation of women in political life. I wish to draw her attention to a report, 'Women and the Review of Public Administration', published in September 2005 by Queen's University. That report found that concerns exist that the RPA could further reduce the opportunities for women's participation in public life as a result of the reduction in the number of councils and boards.

Perhaps the Member might be enlightened by the statistics contained therein, and consequently review her position on the seven-council model. After all, I do not believe that her constituents in South Armagh, or indeed those of her colleagues in South Down, will relish being dragged all the way up to Craigavon, or vice versa.

The reform of public administration is the most far-reaching reform of the system of public administration in Northern Ireland for a generation. It has enormous consequences for the way that public services such as health and education are delivered, and it poses new challenges for local government.

Increasingly in Western democracies there is a problem with reduced levels of involvement and participation by citizens in public life. One example is the decline in voter turnout in recent years; another is the fall of 82,000 in the number of voters listed on the Northern Ireland electoral register that was published last week.

In its comments on the RPA proposals, NILGA said that democratic processes should be valued, nurtured and supported in a way that is closely connected to the local community. People living on the shores of Lough Neagh and in the fishing port of Annalong have little in common, but under the seven-council model both areas will be part of the new super-council currently known as South Local Government District.

My party colleagues have outlined many of the SDLP's concerns about the model of local government imposed by this British direct-rule Minister. I wish to deal primarily with the consequences for rural areas. The RPA has determined that rural development delivery will move to local government, and policy will rest with the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development (DARD). The timing of the transfer of functions will significantly influence who delivers the next round of rural development.

It is, however, highly debatable whether local government will be ready to deliver the new programme in January 2007. I do not believe that it will be ready. On what evidence, therefore, has Sinn Féin supported the British Government's argument for the seven-super-council model, and what protections have rural communities been guaranteed? Has the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development been appointed as rural champion? I would think not considering its silence on Draft Planning Policy Statement 14 (PPS 14). There was not even a whimper from DARD on a planning policy that will mean no more housing in the open countryside and the effect that that will have on schools, rural businesses, post offices, and so forth.

There is no evidence that Government Departments have rural proofed their policies. After 15 years of rural development in Northern Ireland, we still do not have any legislative base or a rural White Paper. Ideally, a rural White Paper would capture the vision and encourage a common understanding of the value of rural areas as an asset to the region. A White Paper would also set out principles to ensure the equitable and sensitive provision of services and infrastructure to support and sustain rural areas. I reiterate the SDLP's call for a rural White Paper.

The option 7C model has been accepted by Sinn Féin without guarantees for the large rural areas. Ms Gildernew made much about rural communities and made many misleading comments about the SDLP and INTERREG IIIA in particular. Sinn Féin was caught on the hop by PPS 14, and some of its members even supported it at the outset. It is being caught out again in its support for British direct-rule Ministers in the option 7C model.

Perhaps Ms Gildernew's support for the option 7C model has more to do with sparing her blushes over the debate on which new hospital to support — one in Omagh or one in Enniskillen. First, she supports one hospital, then she supports the other. Members of Sinn Féin, the great negotiators, are more renowned, as the history books will show, for negotiating for themselves on such issues as on-the-runs and community restorative justice rather than for the interests of the wider community, and certainly not for the rural community. I support the motion.

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I declare membership of Cookstown District Council. After much alleged deliberation, the Government and their review of public administration team came up with seven so-called super-councils. Some people call them super-councils, and they can also be called sub-regional councils, but they can never be called local councils. In fact, they cannot be named at all, such is their lack of identity and sense of place or locality as is obvious in my council area, an area stretching from Ballyronan on the shores of Lough Neagh in south Derry to Belleek on the Fermanagh border.

A sense of place and identity remains crucial to local government. People have an affinity with and a sense of belonging to their district. One may say that that connection is local or parochial, but it is enriching since that sense of belonging creates a bond with local government as councillors try to deliver public services in a defined locality.

More importantly, local, regional and national governments throughout the world welcome engagement with and participation in local democracy. The lack of engagement with one's Government and the loss of feeling of belonging and affinity with them has led to particularly low electoral turnouts in western democracies. That is because councils are viewed as not belonging to the people, and their perceived remoteness, aloofness, distance and lack of identity are widely regarded as being the source of that disenchantment. However, the British Government introduce remote, aloof and distant models for so-called local government here. They do not learn.

I have looked at some other European models. Norway, with a population of 4.6 million, has two tiers of local government — 19 county authorities and 431 municipalities. It is proud of its local government, and it is presently devising measures to enhance equality and equity. Norway's aim is to guide local citizens' participation in local public life and formal decision-making processes.

4.00 pm

France, with a population of 58.5 million, has almost 37,000 communes, each with a mayor and a municipal council. Switzerland, with a population of 7.25 million people, has 26 cantons subdivided into districts, with 2,900 municipalities in total. There are other models, but those municipalities, cantons and districts have been developed over time for a reason: to enable participation; to respect diversity; and to help to prevent overwhelming domination by one community or identity over another. Those countries have tried to learn from the brutal excesses and worst elements of European history. The lesson is: accommodate, not dominate. We could learn their lessons of equality and respect for diversity. Here, however, the British Government introduce their proposals to Balkanise the North and, rubber-stamped by Provisional Sinn Féin, to create super-DUP-councils east of the Bann.

That plan will have economic consequences. We all know that we rely heavily on public-sector employment. People employed at all levels in local councils, education and library boards and the Health Service now face an uncertain employment future, courtesy of the review of public administration.

It is a setback for local government, a road map for future division, a body blow for local district town economies due to job losses. How can anyone in Government, in the RPA team or in Sinn Féin be so detached from the lives of ordinary people and blind to the consequences of these proposals as to advocate the present recommendations as a way forward?

Tacaim le rún mo pháirtí. I support my party's motion. Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

Madam Speaker: The Question is — Sorry, that was wishful thinking on my part.

I call Mr John O'Dowd to make the winding-up speech on the amendment. My apologies, Mr O'Dowd.

Mr O'Dowd: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Your wishful thinking was that I was not going to speak.

Today's debate, in a sense, has been very enlightening. Actually, it has been almost the opposite of that. It has shone much light on the debate on the RPA, and it has highlighted one important factor. All the parties, apart from Sinn Féin, are opposed to option 7C, but they cannot tell us which option they prefer, and why. Some say that they are in favour of 11 councils, some say they favour 15 councils, and others do not know how many they favour. In fact, one Member, who sits on Down District Council, was totally opposed to the RPA. The Member's contribution was about saving Down District Council. Perhaps it was about saving her council seat. The latter may be of more importance to her.

I speak in favour of our amendment, but, like many other Members, I am also a councillor — I sit on Craigavon Borough Council. The number of councillors who have spoken here today is the best argument that I have heard for ending the dual mandate. I shall return to that point.

Sinn Féin did not adopt the British Government's proposal. It was long thought out and debated by the party, but, more importantly, it was the product of consultation and thorough investigation by an independent research team. The party examined the proposal and came to its conclusion after looking at equality measures, and after ensuring that there would be a fairer rates base, no domination by any section of society and fair play for everybody. That was how we arrived at the option 7C model. However, it appears that many parties decided on the number of councils and then decided what argument they would use to arrive at that number. Few of today's contributions have shown why there should be 11 councils, 15 councils, or whatever.

They have not come to that conclusion. Some Members appear to oppose the option 7C model simply because Sinn Féin supports it, so limited is the political debate in their parties.

The DUP, in particular, says that it wants a reduction in the number of civil servants; it wants civil servants sacked in their hundreds, if not thousands. I note that one Member said yesterday that he wants thousands of civil servants to be sacked. The DUP also wants a reduction in the number of Government Departments, but not in the number of council seats. That party's attitude is one of, "don't touch our councils; they are ours."

The DUP says that it wants a reduction in the number of MLAs. Many prophecies were made in the Chamber yesterday, and I will make another: if the debate on reducing the number of MLAs ever reaches this Chamber, I predict that the Members opposite will vote against it, because it will go back to the old argument of, "save our seats, no matter what else happens". [Interruption.]

If I will be an old hand by the time we are in Government, you will be a lot older than me, I can assure you.

Madam Speaker: Please address your remarks through the Chair.

Mr O'Dowd: In proposing the motion, Mr Tommy Gallagher said that the option 7C model would result in trapped minorities, but the 15-council model that some SDLP members support will also result in trapped minorities. The difference with Sinn Féin is that we have been pushing and lobbying very hard to ensure that power sharing and equality exists on those councils. I am not talking about token power sharing; I am not talking about the token taig elevated to the position of mayor or deputy mayor to ensure that a Shinner does not get it. I am talking about all parties being included and all the voices on a council being heard.

However, the SDLP says that no model in the world will protect any minority. Is the SDLP saying that the 15-council model that it espouses will not protect minorities because no model in the world can do that? Sinn Féin is saying that there is a model. [Interruption.]

Tommy, I paraphrased what you said, and you can check the Hansard report afterwards. I believe that a model does exist, and that, collectively, we, as political parties, can come up with a model that will protect the minority voices within a council, and outside it.

The SDLP needs to ask itself about the unholy alliance that it has formed with the UUP and DUP. If we end up with 11 or 15 councils, that would satisfy the SDLP. However, the SDLP has not asked this question: are the DUP and the UUP prepared to share power? The record shows that they are not. The records of those parties on power sharing on councils are absolutely disgraceful.

The new unholy alliance, based on opposition to the option 7C model, escapes the fundamental facts. What lies behind that alliance? Removing the numbers element from the equation, if the councils do not serve all the people and if all the voices on councils are not heard and respected, it will be a disaster waiting to happen.

The loss of local identity and local voices has been discussed. What is the alternative to that? No Member has said that the 15-council model should have such-and-such — Sinn Féin has. Sinn Féin has said that the option 7C model should have local, area-based committees, made up of elected representatives. Such committees would act as mini civic forums, ensuring that the voices of local people, local minorities and local ethnic minorities can be heard, and would provide a forum where local decisions can be taken and local issues dealt with.

Mr Poots: Protestants in Newry?

Mr O'Dowd: Yes; Protestants in Newry. That is exactly where a local, area-based committee would work. We have come up with proposals on that.

The debate on the names of the councils is an absolute and complete load of nonsense. If a 15-council model were adopted, preliminary names would still be required. At the end of the day, I do not care if the new councils are called one, two, three, four, five, six and seven; it is the services that councils provide that are important to me. More importantly, the people who pay rates to those councils do not care what they are called. They want to ensure that those councils provide proper services to communities and individuals. The debate on the names of the councils is somewhat premature, and also unnecessary.

I would like to respond to Cllr Kelly's remarks about rural communities. She said that Sinn Féin is not interested in rural communities. It is strange, then, that in the two largest rural communities west of the Bann, people go out and vote for Sinn Féin MPs. They also send back a majority of Sinn Féin councillors and MLAs. The people in those rural communities must believe that we have an interest in them.

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Member give way?

Mr O'Dowd: No, thank you.

The Member for Upper Bann is confused. Sinn Féin has not signed up to all of the RPA. We are still in negotiations about the 7C model. We are certainly still negotiating about the quangos that surround all the issues within the RPA. The SDLP may have stopped negotiating, going into the political lobbying bodies, etc; Sinn Féin has not. Our party is in there negotiating the best possible deal for the whole community, including protection for rural communities.

I can put Mrs Kelly's mind at ease, if she has a couple of hours to spare — although it might take longer. The Member believes that Sinn Féin did not respond to PPS 14. Our response was very effective. She has the opportunity to read it, although she will need a few hours as it is very detailed. In fact, the next time I see her I will give her a copy.

Some of the myths are going to have to be got rid of here. The other parties are telling us that they need local voices, local communities. However, in the political panel's discussions about other sectors being involved, all the parties other than Sinn Féin opposed community involvement. They wanted it to be exclusively for councillors. How, then, are they looking for local voices?

Mr Weir: Elect them.

Mr O'Dowd: The Member is telling us that he wants local voices to be heard.

In conclusion, in these six hours of debate I have heard from the Benches opposite plenty of reasons for not wanting model 7C. I have heard little as to any alternative. What we have witnessed today is turkeys voting against Christmas.

Mr Hussey: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Standing Order 11(g) refers to Members persisting in irrelevance. I am questioning the relevance of the Member's concluding remarks to his proposed amendment, which affirms his support for a review of public administration that he himself admits they have not finished negotiating on.

Mr Maskey: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. A review is a review; it does not mean an outcome.

Madam Speaker: Mr Hussey, the speech has been concluded. It would be nice if we all took your advice.

Mr A Maginness: If I could say — [Interruption.]

First of all, I declare that for my sins I am a member of Belfast City Council and have been for 21 years. We have had a wide-ranging, interesting and worthwhile debate. I do not think that anyone in the House rejects the notion of a thorough review of local government, and no one has rejected the suggestion that there should be a serious reduction in the number of local councils.

Of course, there is an irony about the debate, in that the only party that has supported the British Government's conclusions in relation to local government has been Sinn Féin. Not only that, but Sinn Féin has stubbornly persisted in defending the British Government's conclusions. Perhaps it is some form of political infection that the party has picked up on its many trips to Downing Street. Sinn Féin's negotiators have spent more hours in Downing Street than the average Cabinet Minister.

Mr O'Dowd claimed that Sinn Féin put forward and supported the seven-council model and that it solidly resisted anything other than that model. However, Sinn Féin councillors on Fermanagh District Council supported the 15-council model. Perhaps Mr O'Dowd should go to Fermanagh and talk to his own councillors to get their genuine views. Those councillors rejected the seven-council model; they rejected the arguments emanating from Connolly House that thou shalt prefer the seven-council model and thou shalt obey Connolly House, no matter if you feel that people have lost their sense of place or think that the RPA conclusions on coterminosity are a nonsense.

The RPA proposes five health and social services trusts and seven health commissioning groups, so there is no coterminosity. At the outset, we were told that the principle of coterminosity constituted the very essence of the review of public administration. The Government have now abandoned that idea. Why? They have abandoned coterminosity for the sake of their own centralised administrative convenience, not for the people on the ground — council workers, councillors and ordinary citizens.

Sinn Féin blindly accepts that the distribution of rates throughout Northern Ireland will be equitable and that every council will receive the same support and be able to generate the same funds that Belfast does with its population of some 300,000 people. Although those facts are patently unsubstantiated by the Government, Sinn Féin is prepared to accept them as an act of faith. What kind of political evaluation of an important issue is that? This issue will affect ordinary ratepayers and all citizens of rural areas and rural towns.

People want equity and fairness, and they want the Government to prove that the arrangements that they are preparing to impose are fair and equitable. In spite of discussions, negotiations and representations by all the parties, the Government have refused to allow local politicians to determine this issue.

There is no reason why Sinn Féin Members could not have stood up today and objected to the first part of the motion but accepted the second part, which states that the Assembly should decide the future arrangements, but no: Sinn Féin does not want the Assembly to make that decision. It is opposed to both parts of the motion. During today's debate, which has lasted more than four hours, Sinn Féin has never said that it is prepared to allow the local Assembly to decide this important issue.

The reason for that is that Sinn Féin is determined to establish power bases throughout Northern Ireland that it hopes to control. This is about power; it is not about equity or a sense of identity for local people, but simply Sinn Féin's selfish interest in using power for party political advantage. There is no other explanation.

Sinn Féin talks about safeguards. Alex Maskey said that, in all seven new council areas, the minority community would not be less than 25%. That is absolute nonsense — check the figures.

In reality, minorities will be disadvantaged in situations in which there are large majorities, whether Catholic or Protestant, unionist or nationalist. That is unfortunate, but it is an obvious consequence of the way in which these arrangements have been determined.

Everybody wants safeguards to be included. The safeguards that we want are the same ones that everybody else wants. However, stating that everybody wants safeguards is not an argument; it does not support the seven-, 15- or 26-council models. The reality is that we have a new dispensation in which there will have to be power sharing and in which safeguards for minorities will have to be included.

Sinn Féin's argument, therefore, is spurious. In fact, it is a red herring that does not address the central issue of the number of councils that should exist. The SDLP wants to have up to 15 councils in order to dilute the sectarianisation of the new councils. If there are seven councils, the minority/majority differential will be seen in stark relief. That is unacceptable. If we have 15 councils or so, we will dilute the interface between nationalist and unionist. That is a very important element in determining a new dispensation for local government.

People will listen carefully to today's arguments, and they will be convinced that the argument for seven councils is wrong on all scores. Having seven councils will do nothing to advance the interests of the ordinary man and woman in the street. It will not assist us in any way in the creation of more efficient services, and it will diminish and destroy the sense of belonging and place that is important to the people of Northern Ireland.

Today's debate has been a good argument, but it is important for all of us to reflect on what has been said. The final decision on this issue must be referred to the new Assembly, in which it is to be hoped that all of us will participate. In that Assembly we can achieve a solid, healthy political consensus — not an unholy alliance — that the entire community can finally support.

Question put, That the amendment be made.

The Assembly divided: Ayes 16; Noes 44.

AYES

Francis Brolly, Willie Clarke, Geraldine Dougan, Davy Hyland, Alex Maskey, Fra McCann, Raymond McCartney, Barry McElduff, Philip McGuigan, Conor Murphy, John O'Dowd, Pat O'Rawe, Tom O'Reilly, Sue Ramsey, Caitriona Ruane, Kathy Stanton.
Tellers for the Ayes: Barry McElduff and Conor Murphy.

NOES

Billy Armstrong, Alex Attwood, Roy Beggs, Paul Berry, Mary Bradley, P J Bradley, Thomas Burns, Wilson Clyde, Fred Cobain, Michael Copeland, Robert Coulter, Leslie Cree, John Dallat, Diane Dodds, Mark Durkan, Alex Easton, Reg Empey, David Ford, Arlene Foster, Tommy Gallagher, Samuel Gardiner, William

Hay, Derek Hussey, Dolores Kelly, Danny Kennedy, Patricia Lewsley, Alban Maginness, Nelson McCausland, David McClarty, Alasdair McDonnell, Alan McFarland, Michael McGimpsey, Patsy McGlone, Stephen Moutray, Sean Neeson, Robin Newton, Edwin Poots, Margaret Ritchie, Ken Robinson, Mark Robinson, Jim Shannon, Mervyn Storey, Peter Weir, Jim Wilson.

Tellers for the Noes: Billy Armstrong and Thomas Burns.

Question accordingly negatived.

Main Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly expresses serious concern about the potential of a seven council model to centralise services, remove jobs and resources from many areas and to underpin sectarianism and community division; and further calls on the Secretary of State to shelve present plans for super councils and allow the decision on future council arrangements to be taken by a restored Northern Ireland Assembly.

Adjourned at 4.39 pm.

THE TRANSITIONAL ASSEMBLY

Monday 11 December 2006

The Assembly met at 10.30 am (Madam Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

The Equality Act (Sexual Orientation) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2006

Madam Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow two hours for each of today's debates. The proposer of each motion will have 15 minutes to speak, and all other Members will have 10 minutes.

Mr Donaldson: I beg to move

That this Assembly notes that the Equality Act (Sexual Orientation) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2006 have been laid in Westminster in advance of the equivalent regulations for the rest of the United Kingdom and calls upon the Government to withdraw these regulations and leave this issue to be determined by the Northern Ireland Assembly upon restoration.

Let me be clear from the outset that the motion is not about homophobia or gay bashing, as some have accused it of being. It is about something far more important — religious freedom in this country.

The motion is also about the role of the Assembly in considering important legislation that is meant to reflect the will of the people whom we represent. It is about the elected representatives of the people of Northern Ireland asserting their right to influence laws that will have such a significant impact on the lives of our constituents. That right has not been properly exercised in respect of these regulations.

There has been inadequate time for the public to respond to the initial consultation on the regulations. The Government's consultation document, 'Getting Equal: Proposals to outlaw discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation in the provision of goods and services in Northern Ireland', was launched in Northern Ireland on 29 July 2006, and the consultation closed on 25 September. That eight-week period included the entire month of August, which is one of the main holiday periods in Northern Ireland.

The Government's own guidelines state that public consultations should be held over a standard minimum period of 12 weeks. We had only eight weeks to consider the draft legislation. In the rest of the United Kingdom, the consultation lasted for the 12-week period. Why was Northern Ireland treated differently, and our consultation period reduced? The Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister (OFMDFM) has given no reason thus far to justify the shortness of the consultation period.

The regulations were made on 8 November 2006, just six weeks and two days after the public consultation closed on 25 September 2006. Do the Government really expect us to believe that six weeks was long enough to consider the 373 responses and to address the complex issues raised in those responses?

In a letter to my right hon Friend Dr Paisley dated 22 November 2006, the Secretary of State said that there had been 3,000 responses to the consultation in Great Britain, and that consequently the decision had been made to delay their implementation to:

"ensure a full and proper account was taken of them", that is, of the responses. In fact, the Government have delayed the making of the regulations in England, Scotland and Wales until April 2007.

If we take the 373 responses in Northern Ireland as a proportion of the overall response in the United Kingdom, we find that they represent some 11% of the total responses. However, the population of Northern Ireland is only 2.8% of the total population of the United Kingdom. Therefore the response rate in Northern Ireland was much higher than that in Great Britain, yet there has been no delay in implementing the regulations here in order to ensure that a full and proper account is taken of those responses. Again I ask the question: why is Northern Ireland being treated differently?

In England, Scotland and Wales, the difficult issues raised by the consultation process were described as resulting in the need to:

"make sure that there is effective protection from discrimination while ensuring that people have the right to religious freedom".

That view was expressed in an interview given on BBC Radio 5 on 26 October 2006. There is nothing to suggest that the complex issues raised on the mainland do not need to be addressed in Northern Ireland.

On Friday 8 December, 'The Independent' reported that there is a split in the Cabinet on this matter between the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland and his colleague the Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government, Ruth Kelly. The report states that:

"Peter Hain, the Northern Ireland Secretary, has pushed through regulations in the province that will be tougher than the Government plans for England, Wales and Scotland."

It continues by claiming that the Secretary of State:

“has defied a call by Ruth Kelly, the Cabinet minister responsible for equality, to hold fire until a common approach has been agreed.”

We have a situation in which the Secretary of State in Great Britain with responsibility for this legislation is saying to our Secretary of State, according to that newspaper report, that he should hold back until we get a common approach across the United Kingdom, and yet the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland seems determined to press ahead against that advice.

The Government's analysis of the responses to the public consultation in Northern Ireland was published only on Monday 27 November 2006. That is almost three weeks after the Government finalised the regulations.

Therefore it seems unlikely that the Government analysed properly the responses to the consultation paper before making the regulations. Surely Ms Kelly is right in saying that more time is needed.

Additionally, the published regulation 3(3) is a new harassment law, but no formal question was put on harassment in the consultation paper ‘Getting Equal: Proposals to outlaw discrimination on the ground of sexual orientation in the provision of goods and services in Northern Ireland’. In fact, paragraphs 4.13 to 4.15 of that paper set out reasons for not including harassment in the regulations. Paragraph 4.15 specifically states:

“On the basis of the complex arguments put forward we are minded to accept that it is not appropriate to legislate for harassment within these regulations.”

The regulations now contain provisions on harassment, but there has been no proper consultation on that important aspect of the regulations.

The regulations threaten to override the consciences and rights of free speech of Christians and others who object to homosexual practice. That contravenes articles 9 and 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights. Indeed, article 9 of the convention is given statutory force by the Human Rights Act 1998.

It is also worth noting that all six of the world's major religions are opposed to homosexual practice, and Judaism, Islam and Christianity all teach that it is sinful. Not all hon Members will agree with that view, but Christians and people of other faiths sincerely hold it. Given that these are new restrictions, the regulations will interfere with one's freedom to practise one's religion. The restrictions will apply to all aspects of society, and it is proposed that they should apply to the religious teachings, observances and practices, and services that religious organisations offer to the community. The Government say that exemptions are built into the regulations. However, those do not provide adequate protection for religious groups, churches and organisations.

Regulation 16 does not apply to the harassment provisions. For example, if baptism, communion or church membership is denied to a homosexual and the minister of the church meets with that person to explain in orthodox theological terms the religious belief that justified that denial, that person could bring a claim for harassment, complaining that the minister's approach had the effect of violating dignity or creating a “humiliating or offensive environment.”

Regulation 16(4)(a) says that:

(a) to restrict participation in activities carried on in the performance of his functions”.

That exemption covers the minister's refusal; however, it does not cover any subsequent explanations that are given by the church. Therefore a church could be sued for harassment for the way in which it refused a homosexual membership or for the way in which any other aspect of its religious observances were refused.

If I had time, I would give other examples as to how this legislation will have an impact on Christian bookshops, on Christian organisations that run old people's homes and on Christian owners of bed-and-breakfast premises. The regulations will cause major concerns for Christians who are involved in life's many normal activities and who believe that they have the right to exercise their religious conscience.

The harassment provisions also apply to state and independent schools and to universities. Therefore if a teacher teaches the orthodox Christian belief that homosexual practice is sinful, a pupil who self-identifies as gay could bring a claim for harassment, complaining that such teaching had the effect of violating their dignity or of creating an intimidating, “humiliating or offensive environment.” Is that the kind of situation in which we want to place our teachers? Have hon Members had the opportunity to consider that?

The freedom to teach religious belief also engages article 2 of the first protocol to the European Convention on Human Rights, which provides that:

“In the exercise of any functions which it assumes in relation to education and teaching, the State shall respect the right of parents to ensure such education and teaching in conformity with their own religious and philosophical convictions.”

10.45 am

How are we going to uphold that right in Northern Ireland when these regulations become law? How will parents have the right to send their children to school to have religious instruction based on biblical Christian teaching when it is possible that, under these regulations, teachers will be prevented from providing that instruction, or could be sued for harassment if they do? That is a matter for everyone in Northern Ireland who cares about religious freedom in this part of the United Kingdom.

There is no religious harassment law in Northern Ireland with respect to the provision of goods, facilities and services, yet harassment laws on sexual orientation have been inserted into these regulations. That is completely inconsistent with the declared aim of creating equality of protection for all categories of persons.

Part IV, article 31, paragraph 5(a) of the Fair Employment and Treatment (Northern Ireland) Order 1998 provides broad exceptions for schools. However, the Equality Act (Sexual Orientation) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2006 set down blanket anti-discrimination and harassment laws for educational establishments. Clearly, there is a contradiction between those two laws.

These regulations are far reaching. They will impact on many areas of life, and, therefore, will affect people in all areas of society in Northern Ireland — in education, business, the public sector, and especially those in the religious life and in religious organisations.

The Churches have spoken out very clearly on the issues. For example, in an article in 'The Catholic Herald' on 1 December 2006, the Roman Catholic Church in Great Britain warned the Government that if the regulations are implemented on the mainland, the Church will close the nine adoption agencies it runs, rather than be forced to place children for adoption with homosexual couples.

The role of the Churches in adoption, in social life and in civil society will be seriously undermined by these regulations. People in Northern Ireland depend on the Churches. The Churches provide support at community level and they are involved in the social life of our community. Nonetheless, these regulations have the capacity to undermine that involvement. Who will take up that work in the future?

In the Anglican Church, the Bishop of Rochester, the Rt Rev Michael Nazir-Ali, warned the Government that the regulations would certainly affect a great deal of charitable work done by the Churches and others, and that it will be the poor and disadvantaged who will be the losers.

The Presbyterian Church in Ireland has described the regulations as a worrying intrusion of legislation into the affairs of faith.

The Methodist, Baptist, Free Presbyterian and Elim Churches, and many other denominations, have expressed similar concerns. The Evangelical Alliance has made representations to the Government to press for the withdrawal of the regulations, and the Christian Institute is preparing a legal challenge in the event that the Secretary of State decides to proceed with implementation from 1 January 2007.

In his letter to my right hon Friend Rev Dr Ian Paisley, the Secretary of State confirmed that:

"These Regulations have not arisen through European law, unlike those relating to discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation in employment;"

He went on to say that:

"if a re-established Assembly wished to revoke the Regulations, legally I believe they would be entitled to do so."

Surely, Madam Speaker, that is a tacit acceptance that the Assembly has the right to consider and to determine this legislation, yet the Secretary of State seeks to deny Members that right.

The issue before hon Members this morning is that for the above reason, and all the others that I have outlined, the Secretary of State should withdraw these regulations and leave the issue to be determined by the Assembly upon restoration. I call on all parties in the Assembly to support the motion, and, in doing so, uphold its right to legislate on issues that quite properly are the concern of many people across the community in Northern Ireland.

Madam Speaker: I remind Members that the Business Committee agreed that this would be a two-hour debate. I already have more than enough Members to allow for a two-hour debate, and if every Member takes the full 10 minutes we will be over time. However, I do not want to restrict the speeches of any Members.

Ms Ruane: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. At the third session of the United Nations Human Rights Council, Norwegian Ambassador Wegger Strommen, speaking on behalf of 54 states including 18 members of the Human Rights Council, said:

"At its recent session, the Human Rights Council received extensive evidence of human rights violations based on sexual orientation and gender identity, including deprivation of the rights to life, freedom from violence and torture ... We express deep concern at these ongoing human rights violations."

Ireland and Britain were two of the states that signed that communiqué.

I welcome the fact that the House is having a debate on sexual orientation, but it is the wrong debate. Ian Paisley and Martin McGuinness as First Minister and Deputy First Minister designate, and Arlene and I as human rights and equality spokespersons, should be sitting together to work out a comprehensive programme for the gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender community. We should be talking about how to protect people who suffer as a result of homophobic attacks. There has been an increase of 175% in reported attacks — how many do not get reported? We should be talking about how to resource the organisations that work for the welfare of the gay, lesbian and bisexual community. We should be talking about how to link human rights and the equality sector to bring about change. Everybody should have the same rights and legal protections — there is no halfway house. You cannot have equality for some.

Ba chóir go mbeadh na cearta céanna agus an chosaint dhlíthiúil chéanna ag gach duine. Ba chóir comhionannas a bheith ann do chách — ní féidir idirdhealú a dhéanamh.

Despite what Jeffrey Donaldson said, the DUP is using homophobia for political gain. It is attempting to whip up homophobic sentiments that lead to discrimination and violence. It is setting the context for gay bashing and the human rights violations that the United Nations referred to in its communiqué.

This motion comes from a party that has a track record on gay and lesbian rights. In 2004, DUP councillor Arthur Templeton was found guilty of harassment and fined after making homophobic taunts against a council candidate. In November 2005, another DUP councillor, Maurice Mills, shared other pearls of wisdom when he described hurricane Katrina as having been sent by God to punish gay and lesbian people. Ian Óg, probably not wanting to be outdone, said in relation to the gay marriage of former UUP adviser Steven King:

“Most people in Northern Ireland find homosexual relationships offensive and indeed obnoxious and I say that from the position of research I have done.”

That is serious stuff. Although members of the DUP wring their hands and say: “Of course we are for law and order”, and “We abhor any crime against anyone” and “People should go to the police”, they fail to take responsibility for actions that may arise from their words. By failing to provide leadership, they are part of setting the context for an attack on a young man in a club or a park. Martin Luther King said:

Madam Speaker: Order. I remind Members of my earlier statement about criticising Members of other legislatures, or councillors, who are not in this House to defend themselves. I also ask Members to exercise caution so that they do not misrepresent other Members’ comments. I draw the attention of the House to the rulings recorded in the ‘Northern Ireland Assembly Companion — Rulings, Convention and Practice’, pages 81-82:

“no Member may make an interpretation of what another Member said ... To quote a Member as having said something that he or she did not say is unparliamentary.”

That applies not just to Ms Ruane, but to whoever speaks in future. Members should be careful about how they interpret each other’s remarks.

Mr Paisley Jnr: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Will you confirm that some of the DUP members that the Member indicted have been expelled for actions of a criminal nature? Will you also confirm that comments, supposedly attributed —

Madam Speaker: That is not a point of order, Mr Paisley. You have made your point, which will be recorded in Hansard, but it is not a point of order. Mr Hussey is not in the Chamber otherwise he could help me. I remind Members that, when they raise a point of order, they must cite the relevant Standing Order. A point of order, or a point of information, that does not relate to a Standing Order will not be accepted.

I apologise, Ms Ruane. You will be compensated for the loss of time.

Mr Maskey: Could you perhaps get a bit of order, Madam Speaker?

Madam Speaker: Are you challenging my ruling, Mr Maskey? I try to give all Members an opportunity to speak. In every parliamentary institution, there will always be talk across the Benches. That constitutes good debate. I will stop anything that impedes good debate practice, as I have done up to now.

Ms Ruane: It is a smokescreen to say that it would be better for the regulations to be passed in this House rather than Westminster. The real issue is that there should be no delay in bringing forward legislation. The gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgendered community is protected in the South of Ireland, and these regulations will provide protection in the North of Ireland. That is to be welcomed, and there should be no delay.

What are the effects of gay bashing? What are the effects of delaying the implementation of rights?

Mr Donaldson: What about the rights of Christians?

Madam Speaker: You should address your remarks through the Chair, Mr Donaldson, but please let the Member speak.

Ms Ruane: The findings of all reputable research into the effects of homophobia show that the gay community is disproportionately affected by suicide and self-harm. Ireland — North and South — has one of the highest suicide rates in Europe. It is a poor excuse for politicians to say that they are defending the rights of Christians to discriminate. Many Christians support the legislation and do not believe in discrimination.

There is much hysteria and misinformation about this legislation. Opponents claim that primary schools will be forced to actively promote civil partnerships to the same extent that they teach about the importance of marriage. They also claim that a printing shop run by a Christian will be forced to print flyers promoting gay sex. They claim that it will force a family-run bed-and-breakfast establishment to let a double room to a transsexual couple, even if the family think it in the best interests of their children to refuse to allow that couple into their home.

Let us debunk some of those myths. Printers will not be forced to print flyers promoting gay sex — or any other form of sex. They will, however, not be allowed to hang up a sign saying: “No gays served here”. Regulation 9 simply prohibits educational establishments from refusing to accept students on the grounds of sexual orientation.

Regulation 7(2)(a) provides that anyone providing accommodation —

Madam Speaker: I must interrupt you once again, Ms Ruane. If Members wish to ask another Member to give way, please do so. However, this loud barracking must stop.

Mr P Robinson: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Is it possible for you to extend your previous ruling on the misrepresentation of what Members say to include the misrepresentation of the regulations?

Madam Speaker: Not at this stage, Mr Robinson.

Mr Maskey: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. You correctly reminded Members about the context in which they should cite the previous remarks of other Members. Could you advise the House under which Standing Order you have ruled that Members may interrupt willy-nilly when they feel like it without challenge? You have challenged Members only twice so far.

Madam Speaker: The Speaker’s ruling in all matters is, as the Member has probably gathered, final.

Mr Maskey: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I accept that entirely. However, some Members are continually interrupting. You expressed a view to me privately that that is how Members from that party participate in debates. However, I do not accept that this is the proper way for a sitting to be chaired.

11.00 am

Madam Speaker: As I said before, Mr Maskey, when you commented about order in the Chamber, all parliamentary institutions have cross-Chamber comments. I will stop loud comments that interrupt the Member who has the Floor.

I do my best to keep order. The fact that this Chamber is smaller than those in comparable institutions has a bearing on that. However, I ask Members to allow whoever has the Floor to have his or her say. Members can ask the Member who is speaking to give way. I ask Members not to conduct loud conversations that prevent me from hearing what is being said by the Member who has the Floor.

Mr Maskey: I would like to receive a written ruling from Madam Speaker on the matter, showing the basis on which the ruling is being made. I am hearing an invitation for Members to have a free-for-all as long as they keep it below a certain level.

Madam Speaker: I thank the Member and I appreciate his concern. However, my ruling is final. If the Member wants to challenge my ruling, there are other ways to do that.

Ms Ruane: I will just have to get a louder voice and speak over the interruptions. [Interruption.]

Are you finished, George? I wish to pay tribute to the gay and lesbian community for its courage and bravery in standing up for its rights, and to the other groups that are supporting it. I call on all groups who are fighting for rights to stand alongside them because they should not stand alone.

The motion is part of yesterday’s agenda — part of the bad old days of the past. Members should move on and show leadership. The days of second-class citizenship and hiding our identities are gone. How does the motion fit in with our equality briefs?

The DUP talks a lot about law and order and respect for the law. I hope that it is going to uphold section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 and these regulations when they come into effect in January 2007. Is the DUP’s support for law and order selective; does it only support its idea of law and order? Let us move from the dark ages to the light of the twenty-first century. There is no room for discrimination in this century, and where it happens Sinn Féin will challenge it. No one should stand alone and suffer discrimination — the people who should stand alone are the discriminators.

Members should read the results of the recent Mori poll, which asked 1,100 people if they believed it was right for businesses to discriminate against gay, lesbian and bisexual people. An overwhelming 88% said no, showing that attitudes among young people are the most progressive on gay and lesbian rights. Gay bashing is not even a vote winner. The DUP should stop digging a hole for itself and join the rest of us to support anti-discrimination legislation that protects everyone. One never knows when it might be needed. Go raibh maith agat.

Mr Nesbitt: Madam Speaker, I shall endeavour to help you by keeping to the motion, which is primarily procedural. It asks where authority resides in the decision-making process with respect to Northern Ireland legislation. That authority should be in the Northern Ireland Assembly and not in a process that is taking legislation through Westminster for January 2007. The primary element in the motion is legislative; however, I recognise that the regulations will have an impact on communities in Northern Ireland.

Let me deal with those two points. I heard Ms Ruane from Sinn Féin talking on the radio this morning about the importance of respecting international law. I am conscious that Sinn Féin at almost every turn refers to the rights and equality of the people in, as it says, the “North of Ireland”. I am also conscious that the Government, at every turn, refers to rights and equality. Indeed, the Government, in their latest commentary on Northern Ireland, the St Andrews Agreement on 13 October 2006, made reference to rights on the first page of the document:

“equality and human rights at the heart of the new dispensation in Northern Ireland”.

The Ulster Unionist party asks for rights and equality.

I am a citizen of the United Kingdom, and I expect the same rights that are afforded to its other citizens — I expect parity of esteem with them. The United Kingdom Government must remember that, through the Council of Europe, they have signed up to and ratified a convention that dictates that political discourse of this nature is to be applied equally throughout the United Kingdom.

The Government have also signed up to and ratified measures to the effect that we, as a region of the United Kingdom, should have effective participation in the decision-making process. However, not one of those standards that the Government have ratified, and which they are supposed to endorse, is being applied in their actions with regard to The Equality Act (Sexual Orientation) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2006. Mr Donaldson dealt with that matter fulsomely, so I need not go into that in any great detail.

The rest of the United Kingdom was given three months in which to respond to the consultation on the regulations, but Northern Ireland was allowed two months. Why was the rest of the United Kingdom given a longer time in which to consult on the regulations? That does not represent equality and parity of esteem in the political process that the Government have signed up to.

By their own volition, and by the decisions that they have made in introducing the legislation, the Government are denying all Members the same rights that others will have. The Government need not say, as they have, that they will change the Order-in-Council system to make it a legislative process. That will not give us true, effective participation.

Therefore the Government have failed on the process, which represents the substantive part of the motion. The Government have failed to live up to the standard that they announced; they have failed to uphold what they signed up to through the Council of Europe. Therefore, they have failed the citizens of Northern Ireland by the manner in which they have adopted The Equality Act (Sexual Orientation) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2006.

Madam Speaker, you said that Members should be brief in their contributions so that every Member who wished to speak would have time to do so. I will endeavour to do that.

The second element of substance is not inconsequential. Sinn Féin has spoken of homophobia, and has said that the motion is gay bashing. Mr Donaldson has said that that is not so. I concur that it is not gay bashing, as does the Ulster Unionist Party. We respect the law, which permits gay and lesbian relationships, and civil partnerships.

Mr Campbell: Will the Member go further and agree that the House should condemn any attacks on anyone, and that that condemnation should be unequivocal? Does he agree that if every political party in Northern Ireland did that, we would be much better off?

Mr Nesbitt: It goes without saying that we condemn any attack from wherever it comes and regardless of its motive. People should operate, at all times, within the law and subscribe to it.

The issue of rights is central to the debate. The law states that the gay and lesbian community has rights, and we subscribe to those rights. Christian denominations also have rights. Certain questions must be addressed, and I am not fully satisfied that that has been done. Mr Donaldson went into those questions in detail, and I will remind the Chamber of a couple of them. If a Christian organisation wishes to found an adoption society, it can do so, and if it wishes that those for whom they will furnish a child are in a male-female relationship, it may say so. Should the gay and lesbian community be allowed to challenge that wish, and thus ensure that its rights are allowed to infringe the rights of the Christian community? There are two rights competing in that example, and they must be addressed.

Caitríona Ruane said that printers would not be forced to print flyers that advocate gay practices. If a Christian bookshop has books of a Christian ethos including Christian principles — Members know what they are, so I need not repeat them — and a gay or lesbian person comes into the shop, picks up a book and disagrees with what it says, does that person feel harassed, and will that bookshop, therefore, from 1 January 2007, be breaking the law? Those are fundamental questions.

This afternoon, the Northern Ireland Human Rights Consortium is holding a seminar to celebrate Human Rights Day. The date of 10 December is a hallmark day for the International Society for Human Rights; it was the date in 1948 when the Universal Declaration of Human Rights was agreed by the General Assembly of the United Nations. Sinn Féin mentioned the UN in its address this morning.

It is worth examining the fundamental freedoms that were agreed on 10 December 1948, which, along with two other covenants, formed the International Bill of Human Rights. Article 16 of that declaration is interesting. The words that it uses are important:

“Men and women ... have the right to marry and to found a family ... The family is the natural and fundamental group unit of society and is entitled to protection by society and the State.”

I quote from the UN, not from Ulster Unionist Party policy.

I am not saying that a declaration that was written in 1948 is sacrosanct today, because there have been changes in the law since then. The law changes in order to reflect changes in society. Members often quote from Hansard; remember that Mr Hansard went to jail because he took information from Parliament. Imagine if today people were put in jail for taking documentation out of the Chamber. As society changes, the law changes.

Nonetheless, Madam Speaker, certain fundamental issues must be addressed. The process by which the Government are putting the regulations through not only denies the proper process of equality in the treatment of the law throughout the United Kingdom, it denies the rights of people who duly feel concerned and are mindful of what the UN's Universal Declaration on Human Rights says about the importance of the family: the family must be protected.

Ms Lewsley: I oppose the motion. Let us be clear about what the regulations do: they protect people from discrimination. They ensure that gay, lesbian and transgender people have the same basic rights as the rest of us. Just as it is illegal to refuse to serve someone in a bar because of their religion, it will be illegal to refuse to serve someone because of their sexual orientation; just as it is illegal to deny people access to accommodation on the grounds of their race and nationality, it will be illegal to do so because of their sexual orientation. All that the regulations do is afford gay and lesbian people the same protection that is enjoyed by women, the disabled and ethnic minorities, for example.

The same protection has existed in the South for the past six years under the Equal Status Act 2000. If we would not accept, “No Dogs, No Irish”, why should we allow, “No Dogs, No Gays”? If we demand equality for some, should we not extend it to all? Let us be clear about the terrible extent of the poisonous effects of tolerating discrimination and harassment. One of the key areas covered by the regulations is education. A 2002 Department of Education survey of young people who identified themselves as gay, lesbian or transgender in Northern Ireland found that 44% were bullied at school because of their sexuality, 29% had attempted suicide, and 26% had self-harmed.

In those circumstances, can anyone seriously argue against a prohibition on discrimination and harassment at school? It is only by getting serious about tackling harassment that we can change those appalling figures.

Mr Donaldson: Surely the introduction of these regulations will create the possibility that teachers in schools, and others, can be harassed because of their religious beliefs? Surely two wrongs do not make a right. If it is right to introduce the regulations, why does the hon Lady think that the Minister in Great Britain is delaying their implementation?

Ms Lewsley: I take on board the Member's points. The Member has said that the regulations will prevent teachers from teaching against homosexuality in school. That is untrue — all that the regulations will prevent is discrimination and harassment, not the teaching of religious doctrine. Harassment occurs only if there is unwanted conduct that has the purpose or effect of violating dignity or creating an intimidating, hostile, degrading, humiliating or offensive environment.

In opposing these regulations, the DUP is showing itself to be the “Discriminating as Usual Party”. The DUP wants to deny gay and lesbian people equal rights. That is just wrong, especially when we consider the profound effect of intolerance on young people.

There has been much misrepresentation on the part of the DUP in its attempt to justify its stance. The DUP claims that the regulations attack freedom of religious belief. That is just not true. Nothing in the regulations means that religious doctrine cannot be taught in schools, nor will the regulations cover properties such as church halls or retreat houses, the main purpose of which is not commercial. The proof is that the South has had similar laws for the last six years, which have not created any bother or surprises. Provided that clear and sensible guidance is issued, the SDLP does not see why there should be problems in the North. However, should any such problems arise, it would be a simple matter to review the regulations.

For those reasons, the SDLP opposes the DUP's motion. Equality is a basic human right and the regulations vindicate that principle. The regulations have been laid before Parliament and should become law. I therefore oppose the motion.

Mr Ford: The Alliance Party supports the regulations, and it commented in favour of them during the consultation process. It is essential that there should be equality of opportunity, equality of access, equality of treatment and equality under the law for every citizen in this society, regardless of any groups to which they may or may not belong, or of their sexual orientation.

Mr Donaldson's principal complaint this morning was that the regulations have been held back in Great Britain, but are proceeding in Northern Ireland. He also complained about the length of the consultation process. I note that even he admits that there were 673 responses during the consultation period. The consultation process was undoubtedly shorter than the ideal, but it covered all of the main religious groupings in Northern Ireland and all of the key groups that have an interest in the area of sexual orientation discrimination. I am not sure that the response would have been any different had there been another four weeks — or 14 weeks — of consultation. To simply suggest that the timescale was the major problem does not seem to be going very far.

If the regulations are ready to go forward in Northern Ireland, the Alliance Party believes that they should go forward — bureaucratic engagement in Great Britain is no excuse for doing otherwise here.

Mr Poots: Does the Member support the views of the judge in the case taken against the Secretary of State by the General Consumer Council for Northern Ireland about the length of the consultation on water charges?

Mr Ford: I thought that the Member's intervention would be more relevant than that, Madam Speaker. Discrimination, homophobic bullying and violence exist today, and they must be dealt with today. If the Member cannot see that that is rather more significant than the timescale for the water charging consultations, I am afraid that he is in the wrong debate.

If the implementation of the regulations were left to a Northern Ireland Assembly, the attitude of the DUP suggests that it would do all that it could to block these, or similar, regulations. In the wider community, those who oppose the regulations are the same people who opposed the decriminalisation of homosexual acts a few years ago; they are merely fighting another battle further down the line. That is why, whatever their motivation, or whatever they claim their feelings to be, they are seen as being merely homophobic. This Assembly should not support a stance that can be interpreted in such a way.

Existing laws cover elements of discrimination against people on grounds of sexual orientation, but currently they fall far short of the provisions that apply for other categories of discrimination where offering goods and services is concerned. There are many cases in which it is legal to discriminate on the grounds of sexuality but not, for example, on the grounds of race and religion. The legislation that is being discussed this morning is a way to deal with that. I find it sad that exaggerated fears are being whipped up to suggest that the regulations go much further than any rational reading of them would reveal.

Although many people, particularly those who are members of religious groupings and denominations, are concerned about their position and the rights that are necessary for them to maintain their formal stance, they have all said that they oppose discrimination. It is perverse to whip up those fears and to suggest that discrimination is being applied in a reverse way.

Mr Donaldson: Will the Member give way?

Mr Ford: No. I have given way already for a fairly inconsequential intervention.

Madam Speaker, clear examples have been given that have been disproved by the fact that exemptions for churches and religious practice in Northern Ireland are actually wider — not narrower, as has been suggested — than those that are being proposed for Great Britain. Indeed, it will still be possible to discriminate in some areas against gays in a way that will not be possible in other areas.

Mr Donaldson's dismissal of concerns about harassment worried me. If he opposes the introduction of legislation against harassment, he could be interpreted as supporting harassment. That is a serious point, so I shall give him a few seconds to answer it.

Mr Donaldson: On that point, Madam Speaker, may I quote from the Secretary of State's letter to my right hon Friend Dr Paisley? On the issue of harassment, specifically in relation to Christian bookshops, which was an issue that we raised, the Secretary of State said:

"Whether or not an environment is 'hostile, degrading, humiliating, insulting or offensive' is a matter for the court. In this untested area it is impossible to predict whether a hypothetical book or poster could be considered 'hostile' etc. by a 'reasonable man' in all the circumstances, which is the basic test."

In other words, this has not yet been tested. The hon Member may find that, when it comes to the courts, I am right and he is wrong.

Mr Ford: Madam Speaker, it may have to come to the courts to test that.

However, the suggestion that displaying Christian books in a Christian bookshop amounts to harassment is far beyond any example from any other area. When Mr Donaldson uses phrases such as "homosexuality is a sin", he is actually suggesting that discrimination against the sinners is justifiable. That is the danger in the civil society in which we live.

Madam Speaker: Mr Ford, I remind you of my comments regarding misrepresentation of other Members' comments. Thank you.

Mr Ford: I am sorry, Madam Speaker; I thought that that was a direct quotation.

The sorts of examples that were given earlier that suggested that a minister explaining his church's position in a charitable and counselling way could be interpreted as harassment stretches the interpretation of instances of harassment way beyond anything that is credible under normal understanding of the common law. Harassment requires abuse and malice. An honest explanation of a theological position, given in love, cannot conceivably be regarded as such. To whip up fears that suggest that that would be the case seems to be taking an entirely unreasonable attitude to the regulations. Similarly, a number of Members have referred to adoption regulations.

Mr Nesbitt: May I ask a quick question? Madam Speaker, with respect to sexual harassment, the perception of the offended, not the person who commits the harassment, will cause problems. Therefore it is not what the bookshop might or might not do; rather, it is whether a person perceives harassment to have occurred. The Member has not addressed that fundamental point.

Mr Ford: The Member said that he would be quick.

Mr Nesbitt: I have raised a fundamental aspect of this matter that Mr Ford has not addressed.

Mr Ford: No. Weight may be given to perception, but interpretation is not solely based on perception; there must be an interpretation that goes beyond a simple perception. That perception must also be honest and reasonable. Those matters may need to be decided in the courts, but to suggest that there should be a blanket allowance for anything to be done — lest a matter be tested in the courts and turn out not to be to the liking of unionist Members — is surely not where we want the law to be.

Reference has been made to adoption regulations as though, somehow, there are large numbers of children about to be shipped off to be adopted by gay partners. The reality, as anyone with my background in social work knows, is that very small numbers of children are adopted, and the principle in adoption is that the needs of the child come first. To suggest that adoption is being treated in the way that has been suggested in this Chamber this morning is an utterly unreasonable perception of what is happening.

Mr Donaldson said that this Assembly should have the right to decide. Of course, this Assembly has no rights to decide anything — this is the Transitional Assembly. However, it seems that, if there is to be devolution and if this Assembly will have to take decisions in areas such as this, the comments made so far by Mr Donaldson, and the sedentary comments of some of his friends, suggest that there are real reasons for concern. Given their opposition to the regulations, I really wonder what guarantee society as a whole would have that members of the DUP, given power, would live up to their obligations on equality and a shared future in respect of all of our citizens.

Mr Shannon: I support the motion standing in the name of my colleague Jeffrey Donaldson. On Friday 24 November — a epic day in more than one sense, as we all remember — not only was much happening in the halls of Parliament Buildings, but the halls of Westminster were not silent either. While the eyes of our elected representatives were focusing on securing a future for our Province, The Equality Act (Sexual Orientation) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2006 were being forced through.

I am sure that all Members are fully aware of the implications for the people of Northern Ireland of that piece of legislation being pushed through behind closed doors. It is the clearest sign that those behind that underhanded manoeuvre were aware that the legislation was something that our constituents on, I believe, both sides of the divide, would not wish to be made law in this Province.

The matter should have been left until April 2007, when legislation is to be introduced in the rest of the United Kingdom, after the careful consideration period of nine months. At that time, the Members of this Assembly who are willing to follow through on their obligations will be deciding on the issues that directly impact upon Northern Ireland. Would it not have been better to do it then?

Northern Ireland has been cited as a test-bed region for laws that the Government feel are controversial for the mainland — the rates evaluation procedures are a perfect example. The push to implement the legislation here, with, subsequently, a lesser chance of adverse publicity, was a clear boon for those who have the agenda of promoting this form of positive discrimination, which is not wanted, or even needed, in the huge majority of cases in Northern Ireland.

Indeed, the consultation process in Northern Ireland showed overwhelmingly that these regulations were not wanted as they stand, never mind with the addition of the amendments concerning the illegality of so-called harassment that appeared in the final document. The document that was released for consultation expressly stated that there would be no law on harassment. However, a mere six weeks later, that had been added to the regulations and approved, dramatically expanding the ambit of the law.

The regulations make it illegal to harass someone on the basis of their sexual orientation. That seems to be fair enough on the surface, but one does not have to scratch too deeply to find that the reality is not so shiny as the surface implies. There is no clear-cut definition of what exactly constitutes harassment. Harassment is entirely based on the perception of the person who feels that they are the recipient of that harassment, which is defined as a violation of dignity, a hostile or insulting environment, and degrading or humiliating treatment. Surely, that is all in the eye of the beholder and, were that beholder to possess a prejudice against a member of the community with values opposed to their own, surely a hostile environment or an insult to dignity could be found in many situations. Is that equality?

11.30 am

One of Ruth Kelly's aides has said:

“Peter [Hain] is doing what is right for Northern Ireland, where there is a different history and system. We will do what is right for Great Britain.”

There is one thing that is undoubtedly true about that statement: we do have a different history and system in Northern Ireland. There is a decidedly stronger Christian influence in the Province; it is the Bible Belt of the UK. To try to enforce this legislation on us without consultation or the consent of elected representatives — without even an opportunity to debate or amend it, as is proper and right in a democracy — is a disgusting act of dictatorship. No thought or consideration has been given to the owners of businesses, who have always proclaimed their right to refuse admission.

We are assured that Churches will be protected and allowed to retain the freedom to preach their own morals. However, let me outline the consequences of this law should it be passed as it stands now. A man may hear in church the Bible clearly outlined, telling him to stand for what is right. At work the next morning, he may be asked by a group to illustrate the cover of a book of dubious nature, which goes against the beliefs he holds dear and the make-up of the person that he is. He will no longer be allowed to refuse politely, for fear that it may lead to a claim under the new legislation. Should he go against the person that he is, or follow the rigours of a law that clearly discriminates against his belief system? This new law protects a person's beliefs on Sunday but discriminates against them on other days of the week. Should he have to face a choice between his job and his integrity? There is plenty of freedom in the market, so why should those who will lose revenue from their businesses be further persecuted by the spectre of a fine?

Christianity is not merely a one-day wonder; it is a way of life. This legislation goes against freedom of religion and the right to form one's own beliefs that is secured in the Human Rights Act 1998, which Labour and Peter Hain have been so anxious to promote. Surely there is a right to protect the biblical foundations that established this nation. Queen Victoria, when asked the secret behind the greatness of England, lifted her Bible and replied that God was great and that she believed that he was the foundation of England. Were she to be asked that question today, she would need to be sure that it was a Sunday and that she was in church, on the off chance that someone might find that she was supporting biblical principles.

There is a factor missing from the calculation of this legislation: Christians do not want to discriminate against homosexuals. I would not refuse to sell to someone because of his or her sexuality, race, creed or colour, and I would not withhold constituency support from anyone for those reasons. However, that does not mean that I should actively encourage and promote homosexuality in my home or in my children's school education, or by hiring out my church hall for a rally or by putting advertising in my window. To be forced to promote that impacts adversely on my freedom, and it is unacceptable. It is also unacceptable to the people who support the DUP.

There are 7.3 million evangelistic Christians in England. That does not take into account the five million Roman Catholics, as well as Jews, Muslims and mainstream church-goers, who are opposed to this regulation in its very definition. That number far outweighs the number of those in favour, including the 6% of the population who make up the gay community.

There has been some talk of surveys this morning. In an independent survey in England, 70% of the 10,000 adults questioned stated that they believed that any law requiring people to promote homosexual practice should be applied selectively, in order to ensure that people with strong religious beliefs are not forced to act against their conscience. Furthermore, 66% stated that the law should not discriminate against religious groups in order to promote gay rights. Clearly, a large proportion of the population is opposed to this legislation.

The majority of people interviewed agreed that the Government should do more to promote traditional family and marriage values and less to promote gay and lesbian lifestyles. This was not a survey of church-goers but of people on the street. If that was the finding in England, how much greater would be the response in Northern Ireland? Yet this view was never taken into consideration. The only view that was considered was that of the loud minority who are goaded on by Labour, whose agenda seems to be to devalue the family and to break the Church.

The vast majority of people in the Province have no desire to withhold a cup of coffee in a café from someone who is homosexual; they just do not want to be forced to actively promote homosexuality, whether in the workplace, in their own businesses or in the education of their children. As a parent, I want my boys to learn about and value the importance of individuals in society and to respect all people.

However, that individual respect is not to be confused with condoning something that is contrary to God's law. My boys need to learn that; they do not need to be taught that anything and everything goes, when it does not.

I am no man's judge; I can be responsible only for my own actions and for my own conscience. My conscience does not allow me to remain silent and permit the implementation of these unfair and discriminatory regulations to proceed unchallenged.

Dr McCrea: Is it not already clear from the debate that the Secretary of State is forcing the regulations through because parties in this Assembly have made representations to stop any future Assembly from making that decision? That is the reason that the Government are forcing them through now.

Mr Shannon: I thank the Member for his intervention, and I endorse his point.

Those who seek to implement the regulations in Northern Ireland have done so in a distinctly underhand way while at the same time proclaiming that they are being introduced in the hope of finding equality. Where is the real equality? A chief executive of the gay lobby group Stonewall has been appointed as a commissioner to the new Commission of Equality and Human Rights (CEHR). A gay printer can refuse to print Christian literature, but a Christian printer can no longer refuse the tender of a gay magazine. Where is the equality in that?

Peter Hain talks about equality, and Colin Hart from the Christian Institute said that he should:

“read his own regulations, which elevate gay rights above all other rights for religious people ... It is a preferential status which will drive a coach and horses through religious liberty.”

I support the motion, which calls for the withdrawal of the regulations, thus leaving the issue to be determined by a Northern Ireland Assembly. The voices of the hundreds of people who have already registered their condemnation of the rushed way in which the legislation has proceeded, and its subsequent repercussions, warrant proper consideration. We need to ensure that the Secretary of State listens and does not continue to ride roughshod over the firmly held beliefs of the majority of people in Northern Ireland. Every business owner should retain the right to politely refuse business for whatever reason, and it is none of anybody else's concern why they do so, as long as there is a free and open market that will provide goods and services.

I do not intend to discriminate against any faction of society; I wish only to ensure that there is no positive discrimination, which is just as unsavoury, unnecessary and every bit as unacceptable.

Mr Maskey: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I oppose the motion. I take up Dermot Nesbitt's point about the position that the UN adopted in 1948. I remind him that, as of 1 December 2006, which was less than two weeks ago, a statement on behalf of 54 countries called for the UN to integrate modern thinking on discrimination. That thinking prevents discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation. I remind the Member that Ireland and Britain were signatories to that statement.

The motion argues that the introduction of the legislation be deferred on the grounds that the process behind it has been flawed. Those who support the motion have argued that the regulations are being introduced in advance of the introduction of their equivalent in Britain. They also argue that they support rights for all in our society, including those of the lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgendered communities. They talk about the rights of those whose religious beliefs the regulations would offend.

Several Members who have already spoken have indicated their personal opposition to the substance of the regulations. I accept that, under party discipline, and in recent times, disciplinary action has been taken against some DUP members. However, it is fair to say that, for many of us, the history of the DUP — and perhaps, even more so, that of the Free Presbyterian Church — will lead many of us to believe that a strong homophobic strain runs through that strand of our society. Many of us believe that, and our belief is based on the experience of seeing many years of strong campaigns that were headed by the leader of the DUP, who is sitting on the Benches opposite. It is his public right and privilege to be able to do that.

We could defer the legislation on the basis of a flawed process, given that people say that they oppose the process behind the legislation. However, they actually oppose the substance of the regulations. Deferring the legislation to an Assembly would worry people such as ourselves because we know in our hearts — and this is the key thing for many of us — that many of those who want this matter to be deferred want it to be so in order that they can oppose the substance of the regulations in the future.

I can understand that people believe that the introduction of these regulations may invite harassment claims or lawsuits against people in certain professions. However, I do not believe that that will be the case. As has already been spelt out, the regulations provide a number of exemptions — people are entitled to preach and to promote their own arguments, religious or otherwise. People are not allowed, however, to discriminate on grounds of sexual orientation against people who wish to access goods or services. That important point must be made.

It is also very wrong to say that, because the introduction of the regulations could hypothetically lead to a harassment claim being made against a person, no change should be made to the law. In fact, my party and I believe that the burden of ensuring that people who have no rights must outweigh the burden of protecting people who may be subject to future harassment cases. Ultimately, those in whose name the motion stands have put forward hypotheses as arguments.

We are dealing with people from the lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender community, who are suffering from physical attacks, verbal harassment, actual discrimination and other forms of abuse day and daily. Many of those people in our community are living in fear of their lives every day —

Madam Speaker: Order. I ask that there be less conversation while the Member is speaking.

Mr Maskey: They certainly live in fear of being discriminated against on a practical basis every day of the week. Their health —

Madam Speaker: Order. Just a moment, Mr Maskey. Did Members not hear what I said? Obviously not everyone did, because certain Members were still talking among themselves. Members, please desist from carrying on conversations when a Member is on his or her feet.

Mr Maskey: Thank you, Madam Speaker. On my party's behalf, I oppose the motion. To defer the introduction of the regulations because the process is considered to have been flawed is a false perspective. In fact, many of those Members who are opposed to the introduction of this legislation are opposed to its substance. We would have no confidence in putting the rights and entitlements of people from the lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender community into the hands of people who are avowedly opposed to that community having those rights.

I want to underline what is the very important issue: the hypothesis that an individual, group, Church or teacher, or whoever or whatever else, may face harassment charges in future is far outweighed by the need to protect under the law people right across our society, today, tomorrow and from here on in. At present, those people are being discriminated against and are the ones who have been suffering violent attacks. There is no hypothesis to be made there — those people are suffering directly daily. We want to support legislation that comes into operation sooner rather than later, in order to ensure that those people have the same rights and entitlements as everybody in this Chamber wants for themselves, their friends, their families, and those whom they represent.

Dr Birnie: Whatever one thinks of the outcome of this piece of legislation, it is pretty clear that there have been substantial defects in the process that resulted in the regulations. I submit that those defects should be sufficient for Members from a range of parties, regardless of their views on the substance of the sexual orientation regulations, to vote for the motion. The defects in the process have already been quite adequately rehearsed, but, in brief, they are threefold.

First, the consultation period was much shorter than normal Cabinet Office guidelines would recommend. Secondly, there were only about two months between the closing of that consultation and the drafting of the regulations. That strongly suggests that the Westminster Government had begun to write this piece of legislation before they had done the Northern Ireland public the courtesy of reading and analysing their thoughts on the questions in the consultation. Thirdly, I make the obvious point that similar regulations have been delayed until at least April 2007 in England and Wales, whereas they are to come into operation on 1 January here.

In short, therefore, the Government are rushing ahead with legislation in Northern Ireland but holding back in England and Wales. That prompts the question: why? Why are we being treated differently? Is Northern Ireland becoming a test bed? Have the Government cynically determined that, if they can pass this type of legislation in Northern Ireland, they will subsequently try the same trick in England and Wales?

There is also the question of why — and the report in 'The Independent' last week has been mentioned — the Secretary of State, Mr Hain, has come into conflict with the Cabinet's equality Minister, Ruth Kelly, and has simply decided to overrule her. We can only speculate on whether that all plays into the contest for the deputy leadership of the Labour Party.

Our unhappiness at the manner in which this piece of legislation has been processed increases as one considers the complexity of the matters that the regulations concern. In general, and my colleagues accept this, the question is one of rights. I submit that the issue in the regulations is that the rights of one group — those who practise or advocate a homosexual lifestyle — are being privileged over another group — those who object to such a lifestyle choice on moral grounds.

That brings in the question of the religious exemption — it is there, but it is certainly narrow. In practice, religious exemption is being qualified in two crucial ways. It will not apply to any church or religious body that is in a contractual relationship with the state, hence the example of adoption agencies, which were mentioned earlier. There is also the qualification that any such body could fall foul of the harassment provision.

My fellow Members and I are not advocating harassment, but the regulations have been drafted very broadly as far as a so-called offensive environment is concerned — and here I quarrel with the hon Member for Lagan Valley Ms Lewsley. As my colleague Mr Nesbitt said, the definition is subjective. Regulation 52 states that the burden of proof rests with the accused, and that is a dangerous precedent.

Madam Speaker: Before I call the next Member to speak, I think that we have all been treated equally today — we are all cold. I have checked and I hope that the Chamber will be heated soon — in addition to the hot air. I call Mr Pat Ramsey. I hope that you will be all right, Mr Ramsey.

Mr P Ramsey: I hope so too.

This debate is hugely important. The SDLP understands the sensitivities around some of the principled points made by those from the Church sectors. However, the SDLP is committed to the promotion of human rights and equality, which is why we fought to make equality a key part of the Good Friday Agreement. We need to ensure that the agreement's promise on equality and human rights is there for all. That is why the SDLP is opposing the motion.

Good debates were held last week on the review of public administration and how certain sections of the community — whether Protestant or Catholic — feel about marginalisation, alienation and ensuring that people are not discriminated against. We are aiming, as best we can, to ensure that everyone in our society is part of the shared future that is so important to the Government.

Some of the objections to the regulations, such as those made by Jim Shannon, mentioned the forcing of churches to open up parish halls to gay groups. That is misleading. Regulation 16 clearly exempts organisations based on religion or belief from a charge of discrimination provided that they are solely religious, and not commercial, organisations. Therefore, the objection has already been covered.

Discrimination of any type should be outlawed. These regulations go some way towards ensuring that people are not discriminated against on grounds of sexual orientation in respect of the allocation of goods, services, accommodation, education, and availability and access to public authorities.

Why should any person be treated less favourably because he or she has, or is perceived to have, a particular sexual orientation? That is unfair and unjust, and it should not be allowed to continue. Passing this legislation will ensure that — just as it is illegal to refuse to serve someone on the grounds of religion or gender — it will be illegal to refuse to serve someone on the grounds of sexual orientation. This is about equality for all.

The current situation that permits injustice on the grounds of sexual orientation is unacceptable and damaging not only to lesbian, gay and bisexual people, but to the whole of society.

To quote Dr Martin Luther King when he was in Birmingham jail in 1963:

“Injustice anywhere is a threat to justice everywhere.”

I have heard people criticise the legislation, stating that it will violate freedoms. That is not true. Contrary to what has been claimed, regulation 16, which is comprehensive and detailed, provides certain specific exemptions on the grounds of religious beliefs.

The legislation will enshrine in law the principle of equality for everyone, regardless of sexual orientation.

It will provide safeguards for everyone, including everyone in this Chamber, against that type of discrimination, and it will provide a legal remedy for anyone who has been treated less favourably on the grounds of sexual orientation. The regulations cannot make people respect homosexuals or cherish them as part of our society, but they can prohibit discrimination against them.

Equality either exists or it does not — there is no halfway house. A situation in which discrimination against a fellow human being continues to be lawful does not make it right. Nor does it make for a fair and equitable society.

Why should we hold up this important piece of legislation any further just because it is being introduced in advance of equivalent legislation in Great Britain? The matter needs no further delay. The current situation that permits injustice on the grounds of sexual orientation is unacceptable and damaging not only to homosexuals, but to society as a whole.

The legislation should be allowed to come into force to guarantee that everyone is subject to equal treatment, regardless of sexual orientation.

Mr N Dodds: Is there not a fundamental issue at stake for parties such as the SDLP and others that advocate devolution? We are told that we should have devolution so that local parties and local politicians can make the decisions. However, in this one area, because they do not like the particular outcome that may arise, they demand that the Government go ahead and ram this legislation through the House of Commons. There is a fundamental dichotomy in all of this that is surely embarrassing for the hon Gentleman. Does he feel no embarrassment about that at all?

Mr P Ramsey: I do not, and I am sure that the hon Member will have every opportunity to make his own speech and address some of the matters that have been raised, such as the objections to the owners of bed-and-breakfast accommodation being able to refuse entry to gays. No one in a commercial operation should refuse entry to anyone. We used to see signs saying: “No Irish need apply” or “No British need apply”. We do not want a situation in which gays are totally discriminated against.

A point was made about a prohibition on teaching against homosexuality in schools. That is untrue. The regulations are to prevent discrimination and harassment — not the teachings of religious doctrines.

I spoke to the Rainbow Group, an organisation that promotes and advocates the rights of gays across Northern Ireland. Homophobia is a serious problem across Northern Ireland and in my constituency. The PSNI, along with most parties in the city, brought forward protocols aimed at addressing and reducing the level of homophobia. Those measures were successful, and all political parties contributed to that. A recent study among lesbians and gays revealed that harassment and violence are serious problems.

In total, 82% of respondents have experienced harassment, and 55% have been subject to homophobic violence. It is expected of us as civic leaders to try to ensure that we are creating a society in which everyone is equal; no one is marginalized; no one is alienated; and all people can participate in the shared future that we all agreed upon.

Mr Ervine: Madam Speaker, I rise to oppose the motion. Equality is equality is equality. If we refuse any human being the entitlement to equality, we deny ourselves proper equality. It is either for everyone or for no one. The Democratic Unionist Party has made great play of the fact that the Secretary of State is determining that the Assembly should have this legislation stuffed down its throat. He may well be doing us a favour.

In fact, he may also have done us favours in the past, and I have not heard too many raucous comments from Members of that party about them. For instance, he just declared that there would be an election, having previously said that one would not take place until 2008. I did not hear any raucous complaint about that.

Mr Donaldson: We asked for it.

Mr Ervine: I know that you did — so you do not mind an Order in Council when it suits you — [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Members will please address their comments through the Chair.

Mr Donaldson: Will the hon Member give way?

Mr Ervine: No, I will not.

We have the option to live in a modern, decent society, and if we choose to have equality, it must be for everyone. This is a nice country with a great opportunity, but it is a bit like the beautiful girl who goes to a beauty salon and comes out with warts on her nose.

There are jobs at hand. It is not just about Catholics and Protestants; our ethnic minorities are having nightmarish experiences, and we must have some sense of leadership that creates a condition in which the circumstances that happen on the ground are perceived to be absolutely intolerable. I certainly perceive that young people do silly things because it is on behalf of the DUP. That is the mindset that is out there. We must have leadership that guarantees the circumstances in which everyone is equal and equally protected under the law.

I was not fast enough to my feet earlier to respond to a couple of DUP Members. They said that it would be better if every human being were free from violence and harassment. However, no one told Daphne Trimble that. No one told Ken Maginness that when he was being kicked. In other words, the DUP can have a sweet and wholesome view on harassment, but in effect, when its members are in a massed gang in a car park in Portadown, they do not behave in quite the same way — [Interruption.]

Mr Donaldson: What about John Allen in Ballyclare? And the Quinn children? And Raymond McCord?

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr Ervine: It seems that any defence mechanism is to be used to cover up one thing. Not only is the DUP not split on this issue; it is not split from the Catholic Church on it either — [Interruption.]

A Member: That is correct.

Mr Ervine: I know. The DUP makes interesting bedfellows when it suits.

[Laughter.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr Ervine: There are a number of factors at play, which we might address instead of playing the DUP's game. What is so harrowing is that the DUP operates a process of clairvoyance — and it is never good news. As the saying goes, every Prodigy knows the future but it is never good news. There is legislation coming and it cannot be bad enough. It will be terrible. The DUP is over-egging the pudding.

In reality, there are human beings who struggle to come through life with the realisation that they are different. It is a horrific condition for a young man or woman to realise that they are out of step with the rest of society. It brings immense pressure.

Let me give you some examples of things we could be talking about. Northern Ireland has the highest teenage suicide rate; one of the highest teenage pregnancy rates; the highest rate of heart defect; and the lowest levels of educational achievement in Europe.

Yet here we are, talking about ensuring that we guarantee that those ogres in the gay and lesbian community do not get equality.

Mrs Foster: That is rubbish.

12.00 noon

Mr Ervine: That is effectively what you are doing.

Let us be realistic: in terms of how a person sleeps, eats, does a day's work or functions as a human being, treating a gay or lesbian person as an equal will do them absolutely no harm and will not, in any way, diminish them as a human being.

I worry about the concept of homophobia. I know that we are pressed for time, Madam Speaker, and I appreciate being called to speak. I will not take up that much of your time. However, it is worth highlighting research that was done in the United States. Overtly homophobic people were wired up to electrodes and shown heterosexual images and then homosexual images. This is a true story, Madam Speaker. Lo and behold, you will never guess what inspired them most. I do not mean that personally against any human being here.

People who are confirmed in their own sexual orientation are probably less frightened than those who are not. It seems that some people display an over-the-top reaction to those who are different. Many young working-class men will express it through a sense of superiority, whether it is over an ethnic community or those whom they perceive as abnormal.

The sentiments and attitudes of people such as those in the DUP — and the DUP is surely not alone — is that it is OK to treat those people as inferior. They are not inferior; they are equal, and they should be equal in all aspects of life as far as it is earthly possible for us to deliver. Northern Ireland has the opportunity to deliver that equality. The Secretary of State is doing us a favour by passing these regulations because, if such a circumstance were to come before this Assembly, we would end up with a horrible gridlock. The Secretary of State has done things before. I do not mean to be too unreasonable, but some people say that staying out of a devolved Assembly for long enough would allow the Secretary of State to get all the nightmare stuff in place so that we do not have to do it.

For those Members who are absolutely serious about the upset that these regulations will cause in the odd bookshop — never mind that porn can be bought from any newsagent's top shelf — the reality is that, had they taken the responsibility that was offered to them, they could have made all kinds of changes. They could have had the opportunity in the Assembly to pass these regulations.

When this motion is defeated, or goes nowhere, perhaps those Members' constituents, for whom they fight great battles, will realise that, had those Members taken the opportunity in the first place, they could well have had a voice in what society would be like. The jury is out on how they would reform equality, certainly for those people who have suffered indignity, hurt and horror for many years.

Mrs Foster: I sometimes wonder whether Members take the time to read the motion on the Order Paper before entering the Chamber. The Member who has just spoken did not do so; otherwise he would not be talking about equality for homosexual people. Nobody is saying anything about that in respect of this motion.

The motion concerns two things: the role of law in addressing issues in society and the manner in which the regulations are being introduced. Do not let the truth get in the way of a good story, David Ervine.

Fundamentally, I am not opposed to equality, but these regulations are. When did anyone expect Sinn Féin to call for a matter to be decided at the Westminster Parliament — out of the control of the Irish people, as that party would see it? The headlines from this issue can be summarised thus: "Hain does not trust local politicians to take decisions", and: "Republicans support British rule". That is a slightly bizarre situation, I think you will agree, Madam Speaker.

Colleagues have spoken about democratic deficits, and my friend George Dawson will touch on that when he winds up the debate. I want to consider the proper role of the law in dealing with such matters as social change. Parliament should be very careful when legislating in such an area. Rather than producing the kind of liberal, tolerant society that we all want, the regulations are in danger of stoking up grievances and making life more difficult for those whom they seek to help.

I am concerned that lawyers will be the only people who will benefit from these regulations — and I say that, given that I have a vested interest. The problem of using the law to change society is that it is necessarily a blunt instrument that will create many unintended and undesirable consequences. Given the timescale, there is not even an adequate opportunity to consider such matters in detail.

There is a saying in the law that ignorance of the law is no defence. I hope that my friends will read the Protection from Harassment (Northern Ireland) Order 1997; if they do, they will have no defence for what they have said today. The 1997 Order says that:

"a person shall not pursue a course of conduct —

- (a) which amounts to harassment of another; and
- (b) which he knows or ought to know amounts to harassment of the other."

Harassment legislation already exists, ladies and gentlemen. Article 3 of the new regulations defines a new offence of harassment on the grounds of sexual orientation, which, as Mr Nesbitt pointed out, is tested subjectively, not objectively. That provides an extra protection for the gay and lesbian community above that which is given to the rest of us. People do not realise that legislation for protection from harassment already exists. It protects us all; if we want equality, that is the way that it should be.

Much has been said about homophobic attacks, especially by Sinn Féin's human rights spokesman — if there is such a thing. If she supported the PSNI and the Policing Board, she would do much more to deal with all hate crimes, be they homophobic, sectarian or racist. Of course, her party chooses not to join the PSNI or to support the rule of law. Sinn Féin should not lecture us about the rule of law when it cannot itself support the rule of law. I wonder whether Sinn Féin will expel any of its members who are found guilty of criminal offences, as my party has done in the past in relation to homophobic attacks.

Mrs Long: I believe that freedom of speech —
[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mrs Long: Freedom of speech and freedom of religion are important and fundamental freedoms, and I am sure that all Members want to see them protected. The right to express my faith and beliefs openly and honestly in a temperate fashion is one that I value immensely and want to see defended for all people. However, those are not the only freedoms and protections that are important in society. Those of us who enjoy those particular rights, protections and safeguards should be those who most wish to see them extended to all people.

We should surely want to see the freedom to live free of harassment and intimidation and to receive equal treatment under the law in matters of the extension of goods and services to all people. Equality and human rights are not fixed quantities. Extending them to others does not diminish one's own; in fact, creating a more equal, open, honest and fair society actually strengthens all our positions and rights.

The motion raises a number of issues, most notably, the differential between our situation and that in England and Wales, the reasons for any deferral and the effectiveness of the consultation. It is my understanding, having researched the issue and spoken to those who were involved in the decision to defer the legislation in England and Wales, that it was simply impossible for the 3,000-odd consultation responses that they received to be processed in advance of the November deadline. I also understand that there is a long-standing agreement between Government and business that legislation that affects businesses will be advanced only at two times of the year — November and April. On those grounds, these regulations could not have been brought forward in advance of the April deadline. No one to whom I have spoken has the sense that the Government have gone cold on the legislation in England and Wales.

Furthermore, in relation to the effectiveness of the consultation, I accept Jeffrey Donaldson's point that the consultation period was short and perhaps not as well timed as it ought to have been.

However, it is clear from the number of detailed responses received that all the substantive issues have been raised with the Department. Furthermore, the fact that exemptions granted to religious bodies have been strengthened during the process means that the consultation has affected the legislation. Therefore consultation has been effective in taking account of representations made during the process; many consultations in Northern Ireland do not result in changes to legislation. That must be recognised.

The legislation contains grey areas, which will be tested in court, as happens with all legislation. On the basis of common sense, a judge will decide whether those grey areas can be sorted out properly. It is not possible to legislate for each individual situation; that is a fact with all legislation.

The Member for Strangford Mr Jim Shannon — and I hope that I am not misrepresenting him — argued that a businessman should retain the right to refuse business politely from a gay person. If the hon Member for Strangford had suggested that it would be acceptable for a businessman to refuse business, politely or otherwise, from someone with a disability, a Muslim, a Jew, a Chinese person, a black person, a woman or a Christian, it would have been a complete affront to the House. We must be very careful about saying that people should have the right to refuse business simply on the basis of people's beliefs, lifestyles, or who they are. That is not acceptable, and it does little to convince people that the motion is not driven by prejudice.

Some Members have suggested that the legislation would impose a duty to promote homosexuality: nowhere in the legislation is there a demand to promote a homosexual lifestyle. That claim has been made in the House this morning; Members can read it in Hansard. The legislation contains no duty to promote or defend a homosexual lifestyle: the duty is to treat people with respect.

Mr Donaldson: Will the Member give way?

Mrs Long: No, I will not give way at this point.

I have discussed these issues with people who have lobbied strongly to find protections for those with Christian principles. It is my understanding that there is not an issue with regard to bed-and-breakfast accommodation, homes for the elderly, and so forth. The legislation does not preclude Christian owners of guest houses or old people's homes from applying their Christian principles against all people who are in sexual relationships outside marriage and saying that they will accept only people who are single or married. The legislation simply states that a person cannot accept an unmarried heterosexual couple but refuse an unmarried homosexual couple. That is quite right. If this concern stems from genuine Christian principle rather than prejudice, the law provides protection for people to take those decisions.

It has been suggested that simply stating one's belief that homosexuality is a sin could lead to a charge of harassment, but there is no evidence that that is the case. Repeated and intemperate remarks targeted maliciously at an individual would constitute harassment. I question whether any Christian would wish to target his or her views repeatedly at an individual in an intemperate manner, because I would question whether that person is a good witness.

12.15 pm

On a personal note, it grieves me, as a Christian, that those of us who profess a personal Christian faith are so often seen to be in the heel-dragging section of the population when it comes to issues of human rights and equality. We ought to be at the forefront of the movement to extend to everyone the same rights that we enjoy. We should extend protections and safeguards under the law to all people, thereby reflecting the inherent dignity, worth and value of every human being, as it is my belief that we are all created in the image of God.

[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order, order.

Mr Dawson: I have no hesitation in saying that I approach these and other regulations and laws from the standpoint of Christian morality. That is my world view. It is my right to have, defend and express that world view. It is my right to allow that world view to influence my decisions, my life and my actions. I share that view with many hundreds of thousands of people across Northern Ireland.

The DUP's approach to the regulations is not simply based on the fact that it does not like them — although it does not. The regulations are a direct attack on the right to hold, express and manifest a religious belief. They are an attack on freedom: on freedom of speech and freedom of religion.

Mr Poots: Has such an attack not already taken place in the Chamber this morning? Mr Maskey attacked both the DUP and the Free Presbyterian Church. Perhaps Members are aware of Cardinal Ratzinger's statement that homosexuality is:

"a more or less strong tendency ordered to an intrinsic moral evil, and thus the inclination itself must be seen as an objective disorder".

Madam Speaker: Mr Poots, I draw your attention to what I said at the start of the debate. You must be careful not to misrepresent the remarks of other Members.

Mr Poots: I do not think that I have misrepresented anyone thus far.

Madam Speaker: Are you taking part in the debate, Mr Poots?

Mr Dawson: I had given way to Mr Poots.

Madam Speaker: You have given way for quite some time, Mr Dawson, which eats into the time that you have to speak.

Mr Dawson: The interventions from Sinn Féin Members today have convinced the DUP, yet again, that they have no commitment to the principles of democracy.

I too am aware of the current Pope's comments on homosexuality, as quoted by Mr Poots. I am sure that the Members from both the SDLP and Sinn Féin will brand the current Pope as homophobic for making those remarks.

The regulations fly in the face of opposition from both Protestants and Roman Catholics and are being implemented for the benefit of a tiny, vociferous minority. They are a charter for the persecution of anyone with a moral conscience. Anyone who reads the national newspapers will have seen page after page of comment and criticism from the Churches. The Roman Catholic Archbishop of Birmingham, the Most Rev Vincent Nichols, has accused the Government of an:

"aggressive reshaping of our moral framework".

The Catholic Church in England and Wales has warned of a rebellion in schools and charities. Those people are not foot-draggers — they have a clear moral conscience. The Bishop of Rochester, the Rt Rev Michael Nazir-Ali, warned the Government that the regulations:

"will certainly affect a great deal of charitable work done by the churches and others. It is the poor and disadvantaged who will be the losers."

It is hard to see how the equality agenda will be advanced when the poor and the disadvantaged are the ones that suffer. In recent meetings with my party leader, both the Catholic Archbishop of Armagh and the Church of Ireland Archbishop of Armagh have raised these issues. That demonstrates the concern about the regulations felt by the religious community in Northern Ireland. The Presbyterian Church has described the regulations as a:

"worrying intrusion of legislation into the affairs of faith."

I have spoken to the clerk of the general assembly about the matter and am aware of his concerns about the regulations.

This is bad law. It will result in the harassment of Christian people.

However, to summarise the main points; first, there has been inadequate consultation on the regulations. The facts are as follows: eight weeks' consultation time was given, with four weeks of that time being in the holiday season, in contrast to the Government's own recommendation of 12 weeks. Six weeks of consideration was given to the local responses, while in the rest of the United Kingdom the responses are still being considered. Are we to believe that the issues raised here are of less importance than those raised in the United Kingdom, or are we to believe that the Secretary of State and the Northern Ireland Office are of a higher intelligence, so that they can deal with the issues in a better way than the rest of their GB colleagues?

The Government published the consultation responses after the proposals were laid in Parliament. Perhaps it was because consideration of the proposals had not been completed until the additional three weeks had elapsed. Going further than that, however, the consultation misled the public. In paragraph 4.15 of the consultation document, it specifically states that:

“On the basis of the complex arguments put forward we are minded to accept that it is not appropriate to legislate for harassment within these regulations.”

Yet there is a harassment provision in the regulations. The Government, while stating that they were not going to include such a provision, have gone back on what they said, and there has not been adequate consultation on the harassment provisions.

Mrs Foster: Is the Member aware that the jurisprudence on the term “harassment”, under the Protection from Harassment (Northern Ireland) Order 1997, is given the widest possible meaning when it comes before the courts, because that is what happens?

Mr Dawson: I thank the Member for her intervention. There has been quite a number of barrack-room lawyers in the House today, but none of them has been accurate in what they have said. However, I appreciate the comments from a lawyer.

Mrs Foster: Legal aided. [Laughter.]

Mr Dawson: Not only has there been inadequate consultation on the matter, the regulations create inequality rather than equality. The European Convention on Human Rights states that the right to hold religious belief is absolute. Consequently, the Government cannot penalise those who for religious reasons hold that homosexuality is wrong or sinful. The Government, and Members opposite, may not like that view, but we have the right to hold it and not to be persecuted for holding it.

As my hon Friend, Mr Donaldson, has said, the six major world religions are opposed to homosexual practice. Judaism, Islam and Christianity all teach that homosexual practice is sinful. Bible teaching affirms that the only legitimate context for sexual relations is within a monogamous, heterosexual marriage. Furthermore, the exemptions in the regulations do not provide adequate protection for religious people, and that is particularly true of the harassment section that my hon Friend has already referred to.

Regulations 9 to 11, for example, lay down blanket anti-discrimination and harassment laws for education. There are no exemptions in relation to education. It will, therefore, be argued by some people that the regulations should apply in the content of the curriculum. A gay rights activist, for example, could say that a school that uses novels in relation to heterosexual love must also use novels with a theme of homosexual love. A similar argument could be used to justify equal treatment of homosexual and heterosexual sex in sex education lessons.

That is not, as some have said, scaremongering. The gay and lesbian lobby has already targeted schools in Canada, forcing books onto the curriculum against the views of teachers and parents in that jurisdiction. In 2002, the Chamberlain case in the Canadian Supreme Court struck down the decision of a British Columbian school board to refuse approval for three kindergarten schools to promote homosexual views in the classroom. That is not scaremongering; that is what is happening, and what happens across the Atlantic today will happen in Northern Ireland tomorrow.

These regulations violate the consciences of Christian children and their parents, and those of people in other religions as well. The regulations go further than any protection that there is for religion in Northern Ireland. The Fair Employment and Treatment (Northern Ireland) Order 1998 provided broad exemptions for schools, but these regulations do not.

One can therefore sue in order to put homosexuality onto the curriculum in Northern Ireland, but one cannot sue to remove it from the curriculum or to protect children against the teaching of homosexuality. That is what these regulations will do. The ‘Getting Equal’ consultation stated that that would not be the case. On page 2, it states that the regulations’ express aim is:

“to bring protection from sexual orientation discrimination into line with existing legislation that prohibits discrimination on the grounds of ... religious belief”.

However, the regulations on sexual orientation go much further than those that protect religious belief in Northern Ireland.

Madam Speaker, I am coming to the end of my speech. In the history of this island there were laws that were known as the penal laws.

Madam Speaker: You have gone over your time, Mr Dawson.

Mr Dawson: I require just two seconds Madam Speaker; grant me some latitude for the winding-up speech.

Madam Speaker: That is fine.

Mr Dawson: The penal laws excluded non-Anglicans from positions of authority in business and politics. The sexual orientation regulations have the potential to exclude from business life and other aspects of society those who hold Christian moral views. That new secular ascendancy will penalise and exclude all those —

Madam Speaker: Thank you, Mr Dawson.

Question put.

The Assembly divided: Ayes 39; Noes 39.

AYES

Tellers for the Ayes: Jeffrey Donaldson and Edwin Poots.

NOES

Gerry Adams, Alex Attwood, Dominic Bradley, Mary Bradley, Francis Brolly, Willie Clarke, John Dallat, Pat Doherty, David Ervine, Seán Farren, David Ford, Tommy Gallagher, Carmel Hanna, Davy Hyland, Dolores Kelly, Gerry Kelly, Patricia Lewsley, Naomi Long, Alban Maginness, Alex Maskey, Fra McCann, Kieran McCarthy, Raymond McCartney, Alasdair McDonnell, Barry McElduff, Philip McGuigan, Mitchel McLaughlin, Eugene McMenamin, Francie Molloy, Conor Murphy, John O'Dowd, Pat O'Rawe, Tom O'Reilly, Pat Ramsey, Sue Ramsey, Margaret Ritchie, Caitríona Ruane, Kathy Stanton.

Vote on vacancy in Membership [Michael Ferguson (deceased)]: Gerry Adams.

Tellers for the Noes: Eugene McMenamin and Sue Ramsey.

Question accordingly negatived.

Madam Speaker: Order. I remind Members that, under Standing Order 18(f), if the votes in a Division are equal, the amendment or motion shall not be carried. Therefore the motion is not carried.

The sitting was suspended at 12.43 pm.

On resuming (Madam Speaker in the Chair) —

2.00 pm

Fire and Rescue Service Draft Integrated Risk Management Plan

Madam Speaker: The Business Committee has allowed two hours for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 15 minutes to speak, and all other Members will have 10 minutes.

Mr McGuigan: I beg to move

That this Assembly notes the 'Draft Integrated Risk Management Plan consultation document 2007/08' prepared by the Fire and Rescue Service and calls for any conclusions and recommendations to ensure that present standards are maintained and that the safety of our citizens is paramount over any other consideration.

A Cheann Comhairle, I have an engagement simultaneous to this debate. I will have to make my contribution and then leave, for which I apologise. However, I will be back before the debate is finished.

I acknowledge and welcome the amendment proposed by Mervyn Storey and Peter Weir of the DUP. The sentiments expressed in the amendment are implicit in the motion, so I have no difficulty in supporting the amendment. This is an important debate, and it should not be constrained by party lines. It involves social and safety issues.

The Fire and Rescue Service published its draft integrated risk management plan (IRMP) for 2007-08 on 1 November 2006. The consultation period will end on 31 January 2007. I urge all Members to ensure that they participate fully in the consultation process.

The Fire and Rescue Service integrated risk management plan for 2006-07 states that:

"A fast response to incidents can make the difference between life and death. The Fire Service Emergency Cover (FSEC) process therefore concentrates on the effect of attendance times as the primary driver for reducing risk to life by operational means.

It is also important that the correct number of firefighters attend each incident to enable firefighting operations to be conducted in a safe and effective manner. Collectively this response is known as the 'speed and weight of attack'."

I do not think that any Member will find any difficulty in supporting that assertion. However, we now face the difficulty that, contained in the new draft integrated risk management plan, there are proposals that counter that statement. There is a proposal to cut the number of fire engines from two to one in 12 towns across the North, including two towns — Ballymoney and Ballycastle — in my constituency.

Integrated risk management planning is the technology used by the Fire and Rescue Service in the strategic deployment of resources within a brigade area. There have been three previous integrated risk management plans in the North; the subject of today's debate is the fourth. The consultation document contains a lot of technical jargon. However, for the ordinary layman or laywoman, it would be a straightforward assumption that response times for fire engines reaching the scene of a fire are crucial in saving lives.

The new figures for response times introduced by the Fire and Rescue Service to high-, medium- and low-risk call outs reflect that fact. For example, in a medium-risk call out, the first appliance should arrive within 12 minutes of the call being made. In all call outs, the second appliance should arrive within three minutes of the first appliance's arrival. It should be remembered that, in many house fires, a second appliance is critical to ensure safety. Indeed, in the case of a call out where a person is reported trapped in a house, the Fire and Rescue Service currently sends three fire engines.

Those attendance times are the core of the argument that the Fire and Rescue Service is wrong to even consider the removal of 12 engines from the 12 towns in the North. The three-minute time lag is crucial to the safety of firefighters and the public. Statistics show that, of all fire incidents, house fires still claim the lives of most people or cause the most injuries.

I quoted earlier from last year's integrated risk management plan:

"A fast response to incidents can make the difference between life and death."

Is that quote not as true today as it was last year?

The quote goes on:

A Cheann Comhairle, these points were accurate on 1 April 2006; they remain accurate now, and they will be accurate in the future. If any fire engines are removed from those 12 towns and their surrounds, the Fire and Rescue Service will not make its own response times, and lives will be put at risk. In Ballycastle in my constituency for example, if the second engine were removed, a second fire engine would not be in attendance within the required 15-minute timescale; and the three-minute time lag between the first and second engines arriving, so crucial in circumstances of serious house fires, could be massively exceeded. Typically, distance times will be 20 to 25 minutes and greater.

The bottom line, a Cheann Comhairle, is that no matter where people live, they have the right to equal access to essential services. Current standards must be maintained, and the safety of citizens and firefighters must be paramount. The proposals contained in the draft IRMP consultation document jeopardise those standards and must be removed.

Go raibh maith agat.

Madam Speaker: I have received one amendment to the motion, which is published on the Marshalled List of Amendments.

Mr Storey: I beg to move the following amendment: Leave out "notes" and insert "condemns the proposals contained in", and leave out all after "Service" and insert

"to remove the second fire appliances from twelve towns in Northern Ireland, thus endangering the safety of both firefighters and the public."

The process of consultation has already come in for some criticism in this House — and rightly so. The IRMP consultation over the past three years could not be described as widespread or well informed. If the imperative is to have a public consultation process, an equal imperative is that that process be transparent and accountable. The Fire Brigades Union describes the process to date as a sham, used to endorse strategic decisions that have been taken in advance of consultation by senior Northern Ireland Fire and Rescue Service (NIFRS) managers. If that is the case, it is to be regretted, and it is something that this House should not endorse.

As a former member of the Fire Authority for Northern Ireland, I can say that we should be proud of the local Fire and Rescue Service. Too often it is the Cinderella of the emergency services and fails to get the recognition and resources that it deserves.

This issue should not be used as a political football. It is an issue that should unite all the parties in this House, because the Northern Ireland Fire and Rescue Service has, throughout the difficulties that the Province has faced, been at the forefront of ensuring the safety of residents. I wish to place on record our appreciation of the work of the Northern Ireland Fire and Rescue Service through 35 years of terrorism wreaked upon the Province and supported by some Members in the House. We welcome the fact that, belatedly, those Members are coming to support it.

The proposals in the draft IRMP will lead to fire cover by postcode. The costs are, as yet, unquantified and the proposals are unwarranted and unsafe, not only for firefighters, but for the public of Northern Ireland.

The Member for North Antrim referred to the Fire Authority for Northern Ireland's acceptance of the emergency response standards. Those standards set out the requirement for the attendance of fire appliances and, in particular, for the attendance of a second fire appliance.

I remind Members of the fire stations at risk: Ballycastle, Ballyclare, Ballymoney, Castlederg, Clogher, Holywood, Kilkeel, Lisnaskea, Maghera, Newtownhamilton, Portstewart and Rathfriland.

Members should also remember that not only are the stations listed in the draft IRMP for 2007-08 at risk; it is also proposed to review cover for the city of Belfast. Members cannot suppose that stations in their constituencies are not under threat, simply because they are not mentioned.

I trust that the proposal is not a cynical attempt by the board of the Fire and Rescue Service to change the provision of service delivery. If so, it should declare that openly and transparently. It should put the precise proposals about those stations on the table.

Computer software — the Fire Service emergency cover system — is used to analyse historical incidents, and census data is used to identify risks in the Fire and Rescue Service area in order to determine the appropriate response standard. That methodology indicates that in Northern Ireland — as in the rest of the United Kingdom — most fires, fatalities and injuries arise from fires in homes. When standards are met, fire crews are able to function within safety systems and in the knowledge that they can ensure people's safety. In all risk categories, there is a maximum of a three-minute time-lapse between the arrival of the first and the second appliance. That is to ensure that the response time and the weight of attack are adequate for the risk in all circumstances. That three-minute time-lapse is at the core of the contention.

The IRMP proposals are flawed and dangerous. If the proposals to remove the second appliance from the 12 designated locations are realised, it will not be possible to have a second appliance in attendance within the stipulated time in those areas that have been targeted for cuts. Ballycastle has been mentioned; to that I add Ballymoney, in my own constituency. If those towns have to depend on a second appliance coming from Coleraine, it will take more than the time stipulated in the approved emergency response standards.

In Northern Ireland, all stations reach that response time on 75% of occasions. Those stations that currently lag behind and that fail to meet response times on 25% of occasions will now have those 12 stations added to their number. Instead of an enhanced service providing improved delivery, these proposals will have a detrimental effect on the Fire Service. The IRMP proposals undermine the dwelling-fire-risk assessment that underpins the response standards published and approved by the Fire Authority for Northern Ireland in April 2006. It is not true to say that there are fewer call outs. In certain circumstances, there are fewer mobilisations of fire appliances because of the authority's decision to reduce attendance to automatic fire alarms. However, it is disingenuous to assert that there are fewer fires. In the light of the ongoing threat from dissident organisations — if there is such a thing as dissident republicans — we must ensure that fire cover and response times are adequate.

The proposals are not costed, and no figure has been put on any saving. All Members are in favour of efficiency, but that should not be achieved at the expense of the safety of firefighters or citizens.

2.15 pm

Any savings will be minimal. The focus of the IRMP should be to enhance the safety of our community. We all, at some time, have had to depend on the Fire Service; I doubt whether there is one Member who has not had to call out the Fire Service. It would be a terrible tragedy if any of us in the Assembly or any of the citizens of Northern Ireland had need of the Fire Service and found it inadequate or incapable of delivering. I commend the amendment to the House and ask each party to support it and the Northern Ireland Fire and Rescue Service.

Mr Cree: Colleagues get many consultation documents; some relate to change in operation and others to improvement in services, whereas some are not interested in improving services but are more concerned with reducing costs and the number of employees. Studying the Northern Ireland Fire and Rescue Service's draft integrated risk management plan, I find that it does not address any of the foregoing points. Rather, it attacks the service's capacity to meet its own standards for response times. At first glance, the document appears innocuous; however, on closer examination, its proposals appear fundamentally flawed.

Throughout my comments, I wish to refer to the fire station in Holywood, but they apply equally to the other 11 stations. There are two front-line appliances based in north Down, in the station in Holywood. Under this plan, one of them would be removed and the station downgraded. No savings are contemplated. The recent investment there of £40,000 in the training of 10 new firefighters would have been totally wasted. That is ironic, as Holywood is one of three centres of excellence in Northern Ireland, and it provides NVQ learning standards to new recruits. Holywood station covers a wide area, from the Knocknagoney Road to the Devil's Elbow, including a development at Kinegar Exchange that will include the new IKEA store. It is also part of the emergency response plan for the George Best Belfast City Airport. Moreover, it services huge depots in the harbour estate, Palace Barracks and significant fuel storage at Kinegar.

The consultation document is based on a review of the usage of second appliances and does not appear to consider actual demand. For example, at the time of this review, Holywood's manning levels were 50% of its intended establishment, due to staff shortages. This seriously compromised Holywood's ability to mobilise its two appliances in 2005, and therefore the figures in the document do not represent reality. In the document tables, Members will see that in the years before 2005, Holywood's response was exactly three times the ideal figure.

The proposals from the service's consultation document envisage replacing the second front-line appliance with a small fire safety unit, whatever that may be. That would seriously compromise the service's ability to provide adequate cover. It is difficult to see how the Fire Service could guarantee us predetermined response times. The second Holywood appliance has been in use for many years and has probably been fully depreciated. All the staff work part-time, and the volunteers represent no standby cost at all. Why dispense with such an economic and valuable service?

In summary, Madam Speaker, the loss of a second appliance would be a waste of staff resources in the light of the recent recruitment in Holywood, and it may compromise response times as laid down in the 'Northern Ireland Emergency Response Standards and Integrated Risk Management Action Plan 2006/07', which was published in April 2006. That loss will also cause considerable concern and criticism in the public arena, as has already been evident.

Mr Kennedy: Will the Member confirm that his concerns are for all the stations mentioned — including Holywood — but, particularly, for Newtownhamilton in Newry and Armagh?

Mr Cree: I thank the Member for his intervention. I am concerned about Newtownhamilton, and all of the others on the list.

The small fires unit would represent an additional cost — not a saving — to the Fire Service, and it would restrict current operational resilience. The current manpower level at the Holywood fire station offers a flexible pay-as-you-go resilience for its surrounding areas in times of seasonal and political demands, and its strategic location and manning levels offer a cost-effective opportunity for extra resources in the greater Belfast area. I support the amendment.

Mrs Hanna: Public safety is paramount, and it is essential that fire and rescue services are maintained to excellent standards. The SDLP will be making a comprehensive response to the draft consultation on the integrated risk management plan. We are aware of the vital role that the Fire Service has played over many years and through the Troubles, when there were often added risks beyond those associated with rescuing people and extinguishing fires — and I in no way wish to oversimplify the role of the fire officer. The ongoing attacks on the emergency services and on Health Service personnel must also be proactively addressed and removed.

The draft consultation document is part of a regular exercise, and it is useful in anticipating long-term development. However, I fully understand local concerns about each fire station in the ongoing consideration. Public safety must be uppermost in our minds, and integrated planning for all of the emergency services to come together effectively and efficiently is crucial in all situations from the smallest kitchen fire to a major incident. Many of those services come under the umbrella of the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety.

Some of the arguments are, naturally, local, and my SDLP colleagues will provide an all-over view, from the local to the big picture. Some arguments are concerned with the question of what is local and what is regional, and with what measures are required to get the most efficient and effective system and the best value for money. Those requirements must be looked at in conjunction with what is best for the wider community, as would be done in a regional Assembly.

I would have preferred the draft consultation document to have contained a lot more information. It would have been helpful to have seen the annual report of the chief inspector of the Fire Service referenced to proposals in the draft, and I also would have liked to have seen more details on training and the planning of the geographic workload. The document should also have recommended that the Fire and Rescue Service have the ability to exercise more local control and a greater flexibility of staff and resources. Additional details on costing, risk assessments and analysis would also be of benefit; they are very important. If the Fire and Rescue Service is considering the removal of pumping, a risk analysis must be carried out, and the public must have more information on the risks to them if that happens.

There also needs to be a greater explanation for the reduced number of call outs. Is that due to better education on how to reduce the risks of fires — be it through carelessness with a cigarette or a chip pan? Or, might it be related to the end of the Troubles — as we know it — and reflective of a more tranquil society? We need more information before we can make an adequate response.

Mr McCarthy: I want to take this opportunity to praise the courage, dedication and hard work of all the staff of the Northern Ireland Fire and Rescue Service in ensuring the safety of people throughout Northern Ireland. For years, Fire Service personnel have put their lives on the line daily to save others. That must be recognised.

I am pleased that the Fire and Rescue Service's draft integrated risk management plan includes a proposal to conduct risk assessments of buildings that were not included in the 2005-06 plan. I welcome that initiative and hope that it will help to raise safety standards and save lives. With regard to proposal 3 — the location of fire stations and resources in Belfast — I understand the need for a review of facilities in the light of changes in demographics. However, the review must enhance the service and ensure better protection for the people of Belfast. I hope that, given the increase in population in the city, the Fire Service will consider providing additional appliances in order to save life and property.

Mr Storey: We must be under no illusion that this is about the provision of additional locations for fire stations. Page 12 of the draft proposals clearly identifies current resources and names the stations in the city of Belfast. There is no provision for that to be expanded. Members must be sure that they understand clearly what is being proposed.

Mr McCarthy: I thank my colleague for his intervention. I understand exactly what is being proposed.

Proposal 4 of the draft document looks at the viability of second appliances in many towns in Northern Ireland. Removing second appliances could place the safety of local people at risk. We must do all in our power to prevent their removal. There must be no cost- or corner-cutting measures where people's lives are involved.

I want to raise a massive problem that faces local firefighters. In recent years, there have been many attacks on Fire Service staff trying to go about their work. It beggars belief that misguided young people — usually children — should launch attacks on firefighters, who are often trying to save the lives and property of people in their own areas. I appeal to parents and guardians to ensure that their children are not engaged in that shameful and reckless activity. I welcome the recent advertising campaign aimed at stopping such behaviour. Those who are caught attacking local firefighters must be dealt with severely by the police and the courts, as they endanger the safety not only of firefighters but, indeed, of the wider community. The issue must be tackled head on. Fire Service staff should not have to run the gauntlet of hatred when they are trying to save lives and property.

I strongly condemn the proposed removal of second appliances from 12 towns across Northern Ireland, including Holywood and Newtownhamilton, which were of concern to another Member. I suggest that, rather than decreasing the number of appliances, we must maintain whatever is required in order to provide the best Fire and Rescue Service for everyone in Northern Ireland. I am happy to support the motion and the amendment.

Mr Hay: I am glad that, as a public representative, I have the opportunity to speak about such an important issue on behalf of the wider community. I always worry when I see consultation documents, from wherever they may come. They are always concerned with reducing resources in Northern Ireland. I believe that the risk management document goes a long way towards doing that.

My town of Londonderry was not one of the towns that were named in the document. However, the important point is that at some time in the future, it could be. My hon Friend from North Antrim Mervyn Storey has already described a situation that could occur in Belfast. Therefore we all should be careful, because these recommendations could have a snowball effect across Northern Ireland.

2.30 pm

As many Members have already mentioned, it is important that we recognise the service that all our emergency services have provided, especially through the difficult years here. Many members of those services have made the supreme sacrifice — none more so than those from the Northern Ireland Fire and Rescue Service. It would be wrong if the House did not recognise the great sacrifices that have been made.

It is tragic that all our emergency services, especially the Fire Service, have experienced difficult times. We can all recall that, a few years ago, members of the Fire Service had to stand on picket lines to try to get a reasonable salary for the difficult job that they do. Everyone in the House at the time supported their actions and what they were trying to do. That action was about getting recognition for what they provide for all citizens in Northern Ireland from the Government and from the Fire Service.

The bottom line is that any reduction in resources to the Fire Service must be condemned. I am glad that the Member who proposed the motion has accepted the amendment, which makes the motion a lot stronger. It goes a long way towards sending a clear message to the Government and to the Fire Service that they must keep their hands off the Fire Service and make absolutely sure that there is no reduction in the resources that it needs to do its job. That clear message must be sent today.

Mr Storey: Does the Member agree that there is an urgent need for the Northern Ireland Fire and Rescue Service to establish the training facility that has been on the long finger since I was a member of the Fire Authority for Northern Ireland? I understand that an imminent announcement may be made about the location of that facility. However, a number of fire stations across the country still require new premises. In particular, there has been an attempt over the past three or four years to find a suitable location for the fire station in my constituency of Ballymena.

Does the Member also agree that it is contradictory that the draft plan contains a proposal for a reduction in the number of second appliances when, in January, the Northern Ireland Fire and Rescue Service will look for additional recruits, even in those locations from which it proposes to remove a second appliance?

Mr Hay: I certainly agree with those comments. As I said, my greatest fear is that this is the start of a process that could lead to total and absolute disaster for the Fire Service in Northern Ireland.

I also agree with the hon Member that quite a number of the Province's fire stations do not meet the standards that they should. Many fire stations also need to be relocated, and that has created difficulties.

This House must send a loud and clear message to those who want to tamper with any of our emergency services: it cannot and should not happen.

We should be building on our emergency services, especially our fire services and resources, which are very much needed. I support the amendment.

Madam Speaker: Before I call the next speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of Members that this will be the first occasion that the Assembly will hear from Mr Willie Clarke, when he will be making what can be described as his maiden speech. As Members know, the convention is that such a speech is made without interruption.

Mr Clarke: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. In supporting the amendment I wish to stress the vital importance of ensuring that there is adequate emergency fire cover, particularly in isolated rural areas. It is clear from the response that Sinn Féin has been receiving across the Six Counties that there is widespread opposition to the proposals contained in the annual integrated risk management plan.

The board of the Fire and Rescue Service has recently reiterated the message that the safety of the general public and firefighters across the North remains its number one priority. Those are worthy sentiments, which, sadly, have little or no basis in fact. There is growing concern about how the review will impact on towns and villages across the North.

In my constituency of South Down, the recommendations outlined in the review will result in the removal of one fire appliance from each of the fire stations in Kilkeel and Rathfriland. That will mean that there will be insufficient cover to provide the minimum level of protection that all communities should be entitled to when an emergency occurs.

The review mentions that specialised fire units will replace existing fire units, without specifying in any detail what exactly those units are, or how they are going to provide cover for local communities or indeed the wider population. There will also be specialised appliances housed in Rathfriland but kept on standby to be sent to calls all over the North, meaning the pool of the available staff in Rathfriland will be significantly reduced and less able to deal with local emergency call outs, such as house fires.

The existing large firefighting units can attend both small and large fires and will therefore provide the necessary flexibility that allows them to deal with a wide range of incidents. The smaller units are designed primarily to deal with small fires, but there is no mention of their capacity to deal with large fires or any other type of emergency call such as car accidents. Therefore, the proposals represent a reduction in the levels of equipment available to deal with all but the most minor of incidents.

The Fire and Rescue Service is in the process of creating full-time crews and fire stations in places such as Portadown and Newtownards. Contrast that with what has happened in rural areas such as Kilkeel, Rathfriland and Newtownhamilton and, just as importantly, the surrounding hinterland — the logical conclusion is that those rural areas are being downgraded significantly in order to pay for the upgrade in larger towns.

Given the areas in which the improved cover is being proposed, one might be forgiven for thinking that the people making the decisions are being highly selective about where they are improving facilities. I strongly believe that certain geographical areas are going to lose out as a result of the review. The view in my own constituency is that rural areas across South Down are being penalised and placed at risk in order to ensure a first-class service elsewhere.

How do the changes tally with the board's claims that it would not compromise the safety of the public and firefighters, nor the ability of firefighters to deal with emergencies? In reality, the Fire and Rescue Service is peddling empty rhetoric in an attempt to put a positive spin on what are unacceptable cuts to our emergency services. Having a second fire appliance is of vital importance and is needed in order to meet the standard required to deal with house fires. Will a householder, whose home is engulfed by fire, be expected to wait in the hope that a tender will make it in time as it travels from a major town many miles away, presuming, of course, it is available at the time of the emergency?

My constituency has one of the worst road infrastructures in the North. In Down district there is not one millimetre of dual carriageway. The Fire and Rescue Service is distorting and minimising the level of risk in places such as Kilkeel and Rathfriland in order to justify cuts to the fire stations in both towns.

Allowing for an arrival time of 21 minutes, instead of the existing 12-minute call out time, would place people at unacceptable risk. Local firefighters, who provide a wonderful service, and constantly put their lives at risk serving the community, may be placed in the position where they are forced to act against legal guidance, if, for example, they attack a house fire without waiting until a second appliance arrives.

Will those firefighters be placed in the impossible position of having to ignore the pleas of families, friends and neighbours to tackle the fire because they need a back-up crew to protect them in case the fire spreads and they risk their lives unnecessarily? Will the senior persons responsible for reducing the numbers of machines simply blame the local crews and say that they should have known the risk or should have waited?

The local provision of machines and people should provide a reasonable safety net for the local community. This reduction in large firefighting machines will significantly undermine the safety of communities. If the number of calls is to be the only yardstick used when making these decisions, the safety of the community will be compromised. People will be penalised and left with less protection. On the occasions when something unforeseen happens, the Fire and Rescue Service argues that the number of calls attended to is not the only factor on which its policy is based. However, it has yet to mention any other criteria, such as risk.

This is not just a question of pounds and pence; the bottom line is that the Fire and Rescue Service must be able to provide an effective response to all local emergencies. In rural areas there is a very real concern that communities will be left exposed to unacceptable risk. No matter where people live, they have an absolute entitlement to equal access to services. We have given assurances that Sinn Féin will not back any proposals that will result in the withdrawal of fire appliances and endanger people's lives. Firefighters on the ground — and I have spoken to those in my constituency of South Down — are clearly opposed to any withdrawal of appliances. I urge the Assembly to support the amendment. Go raibh maith agat.

Mr Elliott: Madam Speaker, I have been told that the sound is extremely bad in this corner of the Chamber. I suggest that there is some sort of organised situation to prevent the Ulster Unionist Party from being heard. I just want to clarify that that is not the case. [Interruption.]

Perhaps some Members are interested but do not want to hear what I have to say. That is fine.

Emergency services — the Fire and Rescue Service, the Ambulance Service and even the Police Service — are coming under increasing attack from the public. That is not acceptable in this community, and I want to make that absolutely clear from the outset.

All of this appears to be rural apartheid. Most of the towns that have been targeted serve isolated rural areas. That is the case in my constituency of Fermanagh and South Tyrone. I am concerned about the continued centralisation of services, which is a worry to my constituents, who feel increasingly isolated. We have seen in recent weeks that fire, whether deliberate or accidental, has the potential to kill and seriously injure and to damage property. It can happen within seconds and minutes. Those seconds and minutes are vital; services need to be at the scene quickly.

In particular, I want to cite Lisnaskea in County Fermanagh. If the first appliance is already attending an incident and a call comes in about an emergency in Rosslea, for example, the nearest appliance will be 26 miles away in Enniskillen. That is, at minimum, a 45-minute journey. In that time a property could be devastated, and it could mean life or death for people in or near that property. If there were a serious accident, people could die before the Fire and Rescue Service reached them. That is one of the biggest concerns for me and for my constituents.

In a house fire, noxious fumes and smoke can overcome the occupants before they have time to raise the alarm. An arson attack on retail premises can cause millions of pounds' worth of damage in a very short time — almost instantly. That is why it is vital that these services remain close at hand.

Mrs I Robinson: Does the Member agree that this Government have told us ad nauseam that less is better? We have seen the absolutely disastrous effect of that: less policing has meant more crime; fewer beds have meant longer waiting lists; and now fewer fire and rescue services will mean greater potential for loss of life and increased waiting times for fire appliances to arrive at the scene of road accidents, at which their equipment is needed to cut victims from vehicles.

2.45 pm

Costs cannot be the driving force for our emergency services. We must all support the amendment if we are to send a clear message to Government that less is bad.

Mr Elliott: I thank the Member for her intervention. I certainly cannot disagree with her comments, sentiments and interpretation of what the Government believe. That is the point that I have been trying to make.

I am aware that the Government are also having an internal review of ambulance services, which are equally critical to this community. In recent discussions on the location of health services, various stakeholders widely used the notion of the "golden hour" to attempt to justify where accident and emergency services should be sited. When the Fire and Rescue Service attends fires or other emergencies, seconds and minutes are important.

Therefore cost-cutting for the sake of cost-cutting is not desirable in this community or in any other community, whether here or on the mainland. It is a false economy on the Government's part.

Like the Fire Brigades Union (FBU), I am concerned by the proposal to remove the second fire appliance from the 12 designated locations. I fear that to do so will negatively impact on the entire community and on the safety of many, not only in isolated rural areas, which obviously I am more prone to support, but in areas such as Ballymoney and Holywood, which are in key locations. Their removal will compromise firefighters, who have a significant job to do in this community. They will be hampered in doing their job successfully if the draft IRMP is implemented.

I do not want the public, or firefighters themselves, to be put at risk for the sake of money. Financial costing is required in every organisation, but there is a tipping point at which safety becomes the overriding issue. That may have to be achieved, even though I do not accept that it should be achieved for financial reasons.

The arrival of a fire appliance in the first few minutes of a fire, road traffic accident or other emergency is vital to minimising the damage to life or property. I note with interest that the FBU, in its briefing paper, has reservations about the way in which the previous three IRMP consultations were carried out. The FBU has raised an issue that other Members and I regularly raise: even when we respond to consultations, and experts respond to consultations, our responses are often not listened to. The Government think that they know better than the experts, but the Government are often wrong.

Ms Lewsley: I also wish to add my words of thanks to our firefighters in Northern Ireland for the courage and bravery that they have shown, and I extend that thanks to the rest of the emergency services. It is important to point out that the Assembly gave the first special Assembly award to our firefighters. That is a true reflection of our recognition of all their hard work.

It is important that we note that this is the fourth integrated risk management plan consultation that the Northern Ireland Fire and Rescue Service has conducted. Each consultation is followed by an action plan, which, in theory, is informed by the responses that have been received. The three previous consultations were not widely responded to; for example, only six written responses were received to last year's consultation.

Mr Weir: There have been concerns at times at the way in which the responses have been counted. There has been a slightly dubious quality to the way in which that has been done. I know of at least one occasion when perhaps hundreds of responses from serving firefighters that were received were counted as one response because they contained a similar point of view and used similar language.

I would take some of the figures that appeared in the responses to the consultation with a small pinch of salt.

Ms Lewsley: I thank the Member for that intervention.

It is often said that we in Northern Ireland are subject to consultation overload, which has already been mentioned. However, this is one consultation that we must not ignore, because there is a real danger that untested, untried and un-costed cuts in fire cover will be the result.

To understand the problem with the Fire and Rescue Service board's draft IRMP, we must understand the present standards stated in the motion. Evidence confirms what many firefighters already know: most fire-related fatalities occur in the home. Only last April, the NIFRS announced its emergency response standards; in other words, the number of fire engines and firefighters to be mobilised to any type of incident. The Fire and Rescue Service has set itself the target of meeting those response standards on 75% of occasions.

That methodology is accepted as the appropriate means of determining standards across the UK. In fact, the process has identified that, because of growing traffic congestion, the Fire and Rescue Service has difficulties in meeting attendance-time targets, particularly in Poleglass and Lagmore in my constituency. However, measures are being considered by the Fire and Rescue Service to address this failure. In the short term, the Fire and Rescue Service will have a fire engine on standby in Dunmurry. In the longer term, there will be a new fire station with the sole purpose of ensuring that attendance times can be met. There can be no doubt that the appropriate attendance in respect of "weight of response" and "speed of attack" must be seriously considered if lives are to be saved in dwelling fires.

The 12 fire stations highlighted for review during the consultation have been designated as being in medium-risk areas. The Fire and Rescue Service's standards state that, for a house fire, the first engine must attend within 12 minutes and the second within 15 minutes. Many Members have highlighted those times during the debate.

The nub of the issue is that, if the Fire and Rescue Service board's review of usage of second engines in those locations results in any decision to remove or replace them with another type of fire appliance, it will no longer be possible for fire crews to meet the attendance times for dwelling fires, simply because the second engine will have to be mobilised from a neighbouring town and will be unable to attend the incident within the stipulated 15 minutes.

For well-founded safety reasons, firefighters operate within rigid standard operating procedures. Firefighting must be organised and disciplined, otherwise people get hurt. The Fire and Rescue Service's standard operating procedures require that the range of incidents that it deals with be approached in a methodical manner.

Imagine a house on fire with a family trapped on an upper floor. The first fire engine arrives, and the firefighters have a number of questions to answer instantly. Do people need immediate rescue? How many water jets will be required to extinguish the fire and stop it from spreading to adjacent premises? Is a water supply available? Will firefighters need to enter the burning building wearing breathing apparatus? Will it be necessary to put a ladder up to the upper floor? Do any casualties require immediate first aid? Those are just some of the immediate decisions that firefighters are faced with in a life-threatening situation.

There will be five firefighters on that first fire engine. They, and the unfortunate people who are trapped by the fire and smoke, depend on the second fire engine arriving within the next three minutes. Any delay will have a significant impact on a fire and rescue officer's decision-making process in the critical initial stage of an incident and on whether there will be a successful outcome. If the draft IRMP goes through unchallenged, that second fire engine will be more than three minutes away, and the consequence will be that lives that could have been saved will be lost.

There are three key points that Members must grasp. The first is that the Fire and Rescue Service is proposing to consider whether an alternative specialist appliance would be more appropriate at the 12 locations.

Members must not be duped into believing that any specialist appliance will be an adequate replacement for a traditional fire engine.

The term "specialist appliance" refers to aerial platforms, command and control vehicles, and rescue tenders for dealing with road traffic collisions. They are designed, and intended, for specific purposes, and do not carry either the crew or the equipment to deal with house fires. Therefore, whether the Fire and Rescue Service decides that it might be appropriate to locate a turntable ladder in Kilkeel or a rescue tender in Ballymoney, the need still remains for a traditional fire engine and crew to deal with dwelling fires in those areas within the emergency response standards attendance time.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Wells] in the Chair)

The second point is that the Fire and Rescue Service has set a target of meeting its emergency response standards on 75% of occasions; that target is arbitrary. Other fire and rescue services in the UK have set targets higher than 75%. That constitutes fire cover by postcode lottery, and our community deserves better.

The third point is that the proposal to replace the designated fire engines has not been costed. The Fire and Rescue Service does not intend to reduce attendance at dwelling fires. The problem is that the attendance of the second fire engine will be slower and less effective. The same costs will still be involved: the fire engines have already been paid for, and the firefighters are already employed. The proposal will result only in later attendance times, and that will be past the point when they could have had any positive impact in a life-threatening situation.

The question must be asked: what does the proposal achieve? A cynic might deduce that the proposal is someone's bid for the post of Chief Fire Officer, by impressing figures in the sponsoring Department. The proposal is certainly not in the interests of the Fire and Rescue Service's effectiveness and efficiency, and it is most certainly not in the interests of safety.

Mr Deputy Speaker, it is the duty of elected representatives to oppose any cuts in the Fire and Rescue Service that will increase the risk to our community. The Fire Brigades Union is encouraging all parties to respond in writing to the consultation, highlighting the dangers. As Carmel Hanna has already said, the SDLP will be doing that, and I encourage other Members to do the same. I support the amendment.

Mr Shannon: I am glad to see that we are all on the same wavelength on this issue.

We are told that the proposal for up to 12 fire stations to lose their second appliance is an attempt to streamline the Fire and Rescue Service. A table of usage has been published, which I presume is meant to illustrate how usage of those appliances has decreased in those 12 locations. However, there are some problems with the table; one is immediately apparent to me, as I am sure it is to other Members.

I want to use the example of Holywood, which my colleague the Member for North Down Mr Cree has already mentioned, because it is close to my constituency. Holywood may lose its second appliance because of a decrease in its usage. However, the second appliance in Holywood is used more often than the first appliance in Castlederg; I know that my colleague Mr Buchanan will have something to say about Castlederg. There is a similar situation in places such as Newtownhamilton and Rathfriland, where usage is slightly down. If Holywood is taken as an indicator of intent, Castlederg may not only be in danger of losing its second appliance but also its first appliance. That is the logic of that table.

How does that achieve the aim of the integrated risk management action plan? The aim is stated as:

"working towards ... community safety ... to reduce injuries and deaths across a wide range of life threatening emergencies".

The proposed action plan does not make sense in fulfilling that objective. In 2005, Holywood's second appliance was used in 57 life-threatening situations. In 2004, the figure was almost treble that, at 147 life-threatening situations. We cannot look at one year's reduction, one year's victory, and place the lives of the people under the remit of that brigade in danger by jumping the gun and taking away a vital service provision. We cannot cut corners. Anyone who has had the misfortune to be a victim of a fire, or even to have witnessed a fire, and experienced the speedy response and life-saving actions of crews working in tandem knows that the removal of that option lessens the chance of survival. Not only is there a danger to the general public but there is a danger to the brave men and women of our Fire and Rescue Service, who rely on one another for their very lives and the lives of others.

They move as a very well-oiled team. To take away a section of the team is to disrupt the system, piling too much pressure on one team, and leading to a higher chance of a tragic outcome. This is not scaremongering: fewer firefighters equals greater risk. I fully comprehend the need for streamlining and increased efficiency, but this attempt to cut back in these circumstances is incomprehensible. If the Fire and Rescue Service is to gain control of fires and to save lives and properties, it must do so at full strength.

I do not wish to be facetious. However, if it were suggested that the oxygen tanks carried on firefighters' backs should only be half-filled in an attempt to save money, on the premise that, on average, a full tank of air is not used each time, people would be up in arms. They would be exasperated at the idiocy of the suggestion, yet they are faced with a lifesaving resource being shunted to save money. That is unacceptable.

I am not advocating that two teams should always be in the fire station on the off chance that there might be a fire. However, it was invaluable to have the engine and back-up available to respond to the 57 situations that required assistance in Holywood. I could understand a cutback if the vehicle had never been used, but as it has been used once every two and a half days in recent years, and once a week last year, the proposal seems nonsensical. I cannot fathom the rationale behind these plans. Try telling the 57 victims of the fires attended by the back-up team working alongside the first engine that that back-up was unnecessary, despite it having saved their livelihoods — even their lives. If the Fire and Rescue Service is to provide the required response, it must do so with every conceivable aid at its disposal. To attempt to cut down on that cannot be sensible and should not be supported.

Northern Ireland has many fire stations with a large number of staff at the full-time stations and a large number of full-time and retained staff at the other stations. There is also a voluntary station. Those teams are responsible for 660,000 homes. Statistically, 2.5 people live in each home, and it is the job of firefighters to ensure that their lives will be saved should the unthinkable occur.

We must also consider the possibility of a factory fire similar to the one that an English fireworks company suffered recently, in which two fire officers lost their lives. If several brigades were to respond at once to such a fire, they might leave the constituents of the Fire and Rescue Service's home remit unprotected in the event of a fire or a road traffic accident. That is where the added security of a second appliance is priceless. Although Holywood would suffer the initial loss of a back-up team, Ards, Bangor, Castlereagh and neighbouring towns, which have relied upon that back-up and have been secure in the knowledge that it was there, could also feel the effect of its loss.

Decisions such as this affect not only one station or brigade; they can have a ripple effect. Like a stone thrown into a pond, the ripples can be far-reaching depending on the weight of the stones thrown. This document suggests that the stone is a weighty one indeed.

Therefore I support the amendment to the motion. I urge that the recommendation to remove these 12 appliances be taken no further and that the consultation process and our full support be pledged to the sustenance of these much-used and essential pieces of equipment and team members. To do other than that is to endanger the lives of the men, women and children of the Province and to heap potentially even more danger and destruction on the men and women of the Fire and Rescue Service, who sacrificially serve us.

The bottom line is that if funding is needed to support this, it must be found. Funding can always be found for abstract, less worthy and less essential causes, and it must be found in this case. Money is the driving force behind these absurd regulations. I can think of no other reason to attempt to cut back the number of appliances.

It is not up to the Fire and Rescue Service to choose between saving lives and saving money. In fact, that should never register as a choice. Fire and rescue services should not be diminished or decreased; on the contrary, they should be enhanced and expanded. To make that happen, all Members must support the amendment.

Mr Berry: I support the motion and the amendment. The amendment, in Mr Storey's name, strengthens and enhances the motion. I do not say that from a political perspective, but because an important, clear and concise message must be sent to the Minister, the Chief Fire Officer and the chairman of the Fire Authority for Northern Ireland.

I served on the Health, Social Services and Public Safety Committee during the period of devolved government — I know that other Members in the Chamber today also served on that Committee — and we continually sent a clear message to the Department, the Minister, the Fire Authority for Northern Ireland and the Chief Fire Officer that services needed to be maintained and strengthened, not reduced. Time after time, they came up with all of the concoctions of the day to reduce services, and the current IRMP document is another part of that agenda.

Some of those people are a law unto themselves. Everyone involved must receive a clear message from the Chamber today. Much that has been said in the debate has been helpful to the firefighters across Northern Ireland, and I place on record my gratitude to them for their tremendous work and dedication over the past 35 years or more.

It is a shame that we, as Assembly Members, have to plead with the Department and the Minister for present standards to be maintained. Shame on the Minister, the Department and all of their officials that Members have to make such a call today. As the motion states, and many Members have affirmed:

“the safety of our citizens is paramount”.

I, like other Members, condemn the proposed changes and the removal of second appliances from 12 towns across Northern Ireland. One of those towns, Newtownhamilton, which is in my constituency of Newry and Armagh, sits right on the border. It is a shame and a disgrace that the Department and the Fire Authority for Northern Ireland are even considering removing appliances from rural areas. The Chief Fire Officer must sit up and listen to what is being said.

Although Members mentioned individual fire stations, the bottom line is that regardless of whether one fire appliance is removed from one station, or each of the 12 stations loses a fire appliance, the loss of one is one too many. It is disgraceful that they are considering the removal of one fire appliance, never mind 12.

The proposed reduction in services is nothing more than a cost-cutting exercise. I commend the Fire Brigades Union, which has continually lobbied strongly, not for its own agenda, but for the firefighters and all citizens across the community. Members must ensure that they send a strong, clear message that any reduction in service is uncalled for and totally opposed and that any reduction to the current service is unacceptable. Time after time, in my experience, the Fire Service's senior officials have come up with plans on how to reduce services. The bottom line is that no party will accept the reduction of services in the Northern Ireland Fire and Rescue Service.

Again, I put on record my support for the motion and the amendment. The Minister, the Chief Fire Officer and the chairman of the Fire Authority for Northern Ireland must receive a clear and concise message today.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Buchanan: I too support a worthy motion that has been well debated in the Chamber today. The loss of 10% of Northern Ireland's firefighting appliances, as proposed in the draft IRMP document, will undoubtedly have serious and detrimental consequences for communities across Northern Ireland. They expect and deserve a service that is fit for purpose and that can be called upon whenever an emergency arises. When a member of the community calls the Fire Service, it is because of a life-threatening emergency or the danger of property being destroyed.

There are two key factors in making safe and effective responses. The first is attendance time — the time it takes for a fire engine and crew to arrive at an emergency incident. The second factor is the number of fire appliances and firefighters needed to deal with the emergency in hand. However, the proposals in the draft IRMP document will undermine those key factors and will undoubtedly result in lives being lost.

In April 2006, new Northern Ireland emergency response times for the Northern Ireland Fire and Rescue Service were clearly highlighted in the IRMP document. However, those times cannot be met if there is to be any cut in appliances at the 12 threatened fire stations in Northern Ireland.

I want to refer specifically to Castlederg fire station, where there is a proposal to cut back from two engines to one. There is no doubt that that will pose a major threat to safety in that rural community. Castlederg is 20 miles from Omagh and 15 miles from Strabane. It would take up to 25 minutes for a second engine and fire crew to come from Omagh or Strabane to Castlederg. To go from Castlederg into the rural community, wherever in that community the emergency might be, could take up to another 10 minutes. That is far beyond the stipulated requirement laid down in the emergency response standards. A fire emergency or road traffic accident will result in certain death or destruction.

The threat posed to the already dwindling emergency services cover in rural west Tyrone, one of the largest rural areas in Northern Ireland and an area of high deprivation and poor roads infrastructure, is outrageous and creates a life-threatening situation. Such penny-pinching and money-saving proposals run contrary to the provision of sensible and effective fire cover. They are ill-judged, ill-timed and downright dangerous. Not only will the lives of the public be placed in greater danger, but so will the lives of the fire crews who so courageously deal with emergency incidents.

Rather than improving this invaluable emergency service, the proposals in the draft IRMP document, if carried through, will result in its destruction. I condemn any cuts in the Fire and Rescue Service throughout Northern Ireland. I support the amendment.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Tá mé iontach buíoch díot as an deis seo a thabhairt domh labhairt ar an leasú don rún. Sa chéad dul síos, ba mhaith liom mo mheas ar na seirbhísí éigeandála a chur in iúl: an tseirbhís póilíneachta, an tseirbhís otharchairr, agus an tseirbhís dóiteáin.

I am grateful for the opportunity to speak, and I add my voice to those in favour of the amendment. First, I wish to place on record my admiration for the work of all the emergency services — the Police Service of Northern Ireland; the Northern Ireland Ambulance Service; and the Northern Ireland Fire and Rescue Service. Quite often they operate under very difficult circumstances and show incredible courage and bravery in the face of frequent life-threatening situations.

3.15 pm

I am sure that every Member of the House will join me in condemning those who attack members of the emergency services as they go about their important business of life-saving and protecting public safety.

Just as we expect the emergency services to come to our aid when the safety of the public is under threat, we have a duty to go to their aid and to support them when their safety and their ability to uphold public safety is threatened, as it is by these draft proposals. Some of the proposals in the draft IRMP document will threaten the safety of firefighters and the general public.

The document opens up the possibility of replacing the second fire engine in 12 towns throughout the North of Ireland, one of those being Newtownhamilton in my constituency.

Newtownhamilton is an isolated community that occupies a pivotal position in relation to Newry, Armagh, Keady and Crossmaglen. It is hilly country where the road system does not allow easy or speedy access. This is an area where there are frequent gorse fires during the summer and where a second fire engine is absolutely necessary. The Fire and Rescue Service tells us that in some cases second fire engines may be replaced by specialist vehicles.

However, specialist vehicles are by definition of limited use and in no way serve as an adequate replacement for a second fire engine. By its nature, fire requires a speedy response if life and property are to be protected. The removal of a second fire engine from those 12 stations will mean that response times in those areas could become longer, with the effect that the health and safety of the public will be placed at risk.

If the proposals are adopted, an outbreak of fire will require a second fire engine, and there will be an increased response time, which will put the public and the firefighters at risk. For this reason, it is clear that any proposal to remove second fire engines from the 12 stations will place the public and firefighters at risk. I call on all parties and members of the public to oppose the proposals. I commend the motion to you.

Mr Hussey: I apologise for my absence when the motion and the amendment were being moved during the earlier part of the debate. I understand that the amendment has been accepted, which I welcome. My constituency colleague, Mr Buchanan, has referred to one of the areas that is a particular concern of mine in my home town of Castlederg.

However, Members should remember that it is not that long since the Fire Service was renamed the Fire and Rescue Service. The rescue ability depends on what is described as the “speed and weight of attack” of the particular emergency that the service has to deal with.

Furthermore, there are other emergencies apart from fires. Fire appliances turn out frequently to road traffic accidents. It is totally irresponsible of the relevant authorities, whose prime responsibility should be safety, to put forward a proposal that will diminish the effectiveness of a public service.

The new proposal will put lives at risk. I am particularly concerned that it will endanger lives in my constituency. I am sure that other Members have highlighted their particular concerns.

We are talking about an integrated emergency service. The appliances were not located randomly; they were placed in those areas to serve the needs of the surrounding communities. To remove any of that cover now or in the future is totally irresponsible, and I welcome the motion and the amendment.

Standards of emergency response are based on the current distribution and logistical arrangements that the Fire Service operates under. The three-minute time lag, which is how long it takes for the second appliance to arrive after the arrival of the first, is based on the current layout of where our appliances actually are.

I referred earlier to the “speed and weight of attack” towards any incident that the Fire Service deals with.

That weight is based on the number of firefighters, as well appliances, who attend an incident. The safety of those who arrive on site with the first appliance would be compromised if they did not have the appropriate weight of attack — or weight of support — when they arrive at a situation, and the safety of crews must be considered.

When crews arrive on site, they are concerned about the safety of the public, and saving and maintaining the integrity of property and other assets. That cannot be compromised. I wholeheartedly support the motion and the amendment, as accepted. I hope that those responsible will remember what it is that we are talking about — a Fire and Rescue Service. Let us not compromise that.

Mr P J Bradley: I apologise for my non-attendance at the earlier part of the debate. I was at a meeting about a meeting about a meeting. [Laughter.]

I am confident that the Members who spoke before me were critical of any attempt to reduce the level of service provided by the local fire stations in the 12 towns referred to in the draft integrated risk management plan.

Coming from South Down, it is only natural that I am concerned about the proposed 50% reduction in services in Rathfriland and Kilkeel. I recently met with, and listened to the concerns of, representatives from the Rathfriland station. I wish to go on record in support of their opposition to the proposed reductions.

Kilkeel and Rathfriland fire stations cover an extensive rural area, a very large tract of which is mountain area with gorse, farmland and hill land. Indeed, when gorse fires break out, I have often witnessed through my window the apparatus coming out immediately from Rathfriland, sometimes backed up by those from Newry. That second appliance can be key to fighting a mountain or gorse fire, and any attempt to do away with that would defeat the whole purpose of firefighting.

I referred to my meeting with representatives from the Rathfriland station. Rathfriland is a two-pump station, with a firefighting team of 20 members: three teams of six and two reserves. I imagine that that is the picture at most of the other 11 stations designated for cutbacks. We must listen to and take our brief from the people that man the fire stations. They are the professionals, and any attempt to think differently from them would be wrong. Members need only look at the threats to services. Since the Assembly first met, threats to services have often been discussed in the Chamber: threats to the Health Service, education, the Planning Service, the Water Service and the Ambulance Service. It is now proposed that the Fire and Rescue Service — Mr Hussey reminded Members of its dual role — be added to that list.

The Assembly must go forward. I do not often say such words, but those listening to this debate must ensure that this service is not be allowed to come under threat — especially in rural areas. We must listen to the Fire and Rescue Service and to those on the ground who fight the fires, rather than Ministers who do not know the countryside in this part of the world.

Ms Ritchie: I apologise to you, Mr Deputy Speaker, and to Members of the House, for not being in the Chamber at the beginning of the debate. I was a party delegate at the Programme for Government Committee.

One of the fundamental requirements for any rural or urban community is a well-equipped, well-staffed and adequate integrated Fire and Rescue Service. The proposals in the draft plan will not provide that, and they will leave rural communities in danger and peril. A cursory examination of the published consultation document — the subject for discussion today — reveals that the real intention of the Fire and Rescue Service is to reduce the service to the community through the proposed withdrawal of the second fire tender from 12 fire stations, many of which are located in extremely rural parts of Northern Ireland.

Questions immediately arise as to the rationale and purpose of such restrictive proposals. What is the real purpose of the consultation document?

Why does the Fire and Rescue Service propose to remove the second fire tender from those 12 stations, including two in South Down — one in Kilkeel and the other in Rathfriland? Why put the knife into rural communities? Why does it want to undermine services to rural communities and put the people there at risk and in grave jeopardy?

Is it not the case that the Fire and Rescue Service faces difficulties recruiting part-time firefighters in some areas? A campaign is to be launched in the new year for certain parts of the rural community. Would it not be better to adopt a more positive approach to the Fire and Rescue Service, rather than that of the knife and the proposed implementation of cuts? Where in this document does the Fire and Rescue Service express concern for isolated rural communities?

I encourage young people to join this worthy profession and continue the good work undertaken by their forefathers, who protected this community through some difficult and trying times and put their own lives in danger to afford safety to others. Their work should be applauded, and the best way to do that is for young people to be encouraged to join up and fight to protect rural communities. The recruitment of young part-time firefighters must be on a fair and equal basis. No restrictions must be placed on where full-time, part-time or senior officers reside — reports in previous years have indicated that that practice was promoted by the Fire Authority for Northern Ireland.

Mr Hussey: Surely, with regard to part-time retained officers in particular, where they actually live is important?

Ms Ritchie: I agree with the hon Member, but it has been the case that full-time senior fire officers have been dictated to as to where they reside. That is wrong, because their expertise could be required immediately in emergency situations, and my comments probably bear out what the Member previously said.

The Fire and Rescue Service must withdraw its plan to remove the second tender from the 12 fire stations. Looking at my own constituency, Kilkeel and Rathfriland are isolated rural communities, as Mr P J Bradley has already pointed out. Members probably know that themselves. The fire station in Kilkeel services a distinct mountainous rural community where speedy responses are vital in emergency situations. The needs of local communities, and the seasonal demands of the tourist and fishing industries, must be taken into account to ensure that, in those cases, the second tender is retained.

3.30 pm

Accessibility, adequacy, availability and community requirements are the central criteria to measure any fire and rescue service. If the service does not match those requirements, then the Fire and Rescue Service must ensure that they are met through the retention of the second fire tender and the improvement of the service throughout Northern Ireland. We have fought long and hard for essential services for rural communities, and one of those essential services is a sound and equitable fire service. If necessary, this matter should be referred to the Programme for Government Committee for full and detailed discussions to ensure an adequate Fire and Rescue Service.

Mr Dallat: I am the seventeenth contributor to this debate, so most issues have been covered — or have they? Perhaps not. Each Member has spoken with great affection about his or her own area and the loss of the second pump, and I agree with that. However, it is only when one looks at this daft idea with a more holistic approach that one begins to realise how serious it is.

Mr Storey drew attention to the potential losses in his constituency of North Antrim. There are losses in east Derry as well and in Mid Ulster. In the tourist area of Ballycastle and Portstewart, where the population quadruples in the summer time, the loss is serious. Twenty miles inland, Maghera fire station services a large rural area where there is a lot of forestation. Parts of that area are also subject to flooding. Members referred earlier to road accidents; God knows there are enough of those. When one considers all these factors, the picture becomes even more serious. That area is also on the north Atlantic air route. No one wishes to predict another Lockerbie or Pan Am disaster, but emergency planning must take all factors into account. Had it not been for the work of the Scottish Fire Service after the Lockerbie disaster, many more would have lost their lives. That too is a consideration.

All this is about cost effectiveness. From my experience on the Public Accounts Committee, I can assure the House that financial problems relating to the Fire and Rescue Service's board and the Fire and Rescue Service have nothing to do with the brave men and women on the ground who fight fires. I have no wish to embarrass Mr Storey, but the problems are with the Fire and Rescue Service's board itself, its predecessor, and how it spent money. Mr Storey made reference to the Boucher Road training centre. What sensible fire agency would have bought land and spent millions of pounds on it, only to discover that fires could not be lit there? That is madness. Other matters, such as credit cards and so on, we can pass over.

After the debate, what will happen? There are some people listening in the Public Gallery, but I doubt whether any of them are members of the Fire and Rescue Service's board. If Members are sincere and genuinely concerned about the 12 fire stations threatened with the loss of a second fire appliance, they should redouble efforts to ensure that the Assembly continues. It must take responsibility for emergency services, ensuring that communities are not threatened by the bureaucrats and well-paid consultants who take millions of pounds out of the public purse every year but come up only with daft ideas over which the public have no influence. Thousands of people have already signed the petition against the proposals in this consultation document. Members can lend support to local communities by working together to ensure that the Assembly continues in order to stop the madness that has gone on, not only in the Fire and Rescue Service, but in every other aspect of life.

Mr Weir: I wind up in support of the amendment. I am glad that for once the Assembly speaks with one voice. The Member who moved the motion accepts the amendment, and all parties support the motion as amended.

Only a limited number of points need to be dealt with, but I wish to deal with them briefly before I move on to the substance of the amendment. Carmel Hanna pointed out a lack of clarity in the consultation document. I believe that to have been a deliberate attempt to obfuscate the need for adverse comment, to try to — forgive the pun — pour cold water over the report and try to ensure that the level of public concern is reduced. I agree with Kieran McCarthy and others who called for stiffer penalties for those who attack the emergency services.

I join with all of those Members who paid tribute to the emergency services, particularly the Fire and Rescue Service.

I take issue to some extent with the remarks of Willie Clarke and Tom Elliott — both of whom obviously have concerns about their own communities — who saw the report as a question of rural interests against centralising urban interests. It is a question of services being withdrawn across Northern Ireland. One has only to look at proposal 3, which implies a direct threat to the future cover of Belfast. That should be something that unites us: it is not just a threat to rural interests but to rural, urban and suburban interests. At risk are small towns across Northern Ireland, rural areas and inner-city areas. We must all speak with one voice.

Patricia Lewsley graphically indicated the practical ramifications of the recommendations. Like her, I question the motivation behind the report. Jim Shannon mentioned the "ripple effect"; that issue needs a strong focus. John Dallat highlighted the impact that seasons have on a number of fire stations, but that point has not been considered. However, I disagree with him slightly about consultants. Unfortunately, and to its great shame, the report comes from within the Fire and Rescue Service itself, rather than, for once, being produced by outside consultants. That makes it more worthy of condemnation.

There are a great deal of weasel words and ambiguities in the report, and the purpose of the amendment is to deal with those. At no stage are reductions, job cuts, or increased threats to safety mentioned. The report uses euphemisms and talks about review of services, and on one occasion weasel words such as "review resource usage" are used. If that is not code for cutbacks, I do not know what is.

Therefore it is important that Members, by way of the amended motion, send out a clear signal to the Fire and Rescue Service that parties are united in their opposition to the proposals.

Mr Storey: Does the Member agree that there is a serious issue regarding the timing of the proposals? The report clearly states that after 31 January the Fire and Rescue Service:

"will review our proposals in light of all the comments received".

Those decisions will be made at a meeting of the board of the Northern Ireland Fire and Rescue Service in February 2007. The report does not refer to any further consultation on the final proposals that will emerge from this document.

Mr Weir: That highlights all our concerns as to how real the consultation should be. It is only by sending a clear signal from this Assembly that Members can put a spoke in the wheel of the process.

The previously mentioned principal proposals are based on the consultation document's fourth proposal, which deals with and names 12 towns throughout Northern Ireland. According to the document, the intention is to review, replace or reduce the number of fire appliances from two to one in each location and to replace them with small fire units.

The Fire and Rescue Service needs to be asked a range of pertinent questions about those small fire units. For example, will they be able to offer the same level of cover as the existing appliances? If they are replacements for current front-line appliances, will the Fire and Rescue Service guarantee appropriate cover from other areas within the agreed response times? If two major fires are reported at the same time in the same area, what will be the potential for those units to attend? Will they lead to a reduction in manpower? Will they offer the same opportunity for strategic cover as the existing appliances?

Leslie Cree highlighted a range of issues. The proposals run contrary to many of the actions that the Fire and Rescue Service has already taken. Forty-thousand pounds were invested in recruitment in the past 18 months in Holywood fire station; however, that investment runs contrary to what actually happened in that station. That is not a unique case, however.

The response times of the second fire appliance will be the key issue. As indicated, where there is a house fire that does not threaten anyone's life, or no life is reported as being at risk, a minimum of two fire appliances are required to attend. Patricia Lewsley perhaps understated the situation in her example of people being trapped upstairs; when that type of information is known, three fire appliances should be present. With the best will in the world, and even if a fire appliance were being driven at breakneck speed, there is no way that any fire engine could be in Holywood within three minutes.

There is a particular problem with Holywood's reduced cover, as has already been stated. In these days when we are living under the threat of international terrorism — and when airports in particular tend to be targeted — it is a disgrace that the George Best Belfast City Airport is being left with inadequate cover.

Jim Shannon mentioned the ripple effect of such changes, and that has not been brought out sufficiently in the debate. Any action taken in the 12 stations will impact on their surrounding areas in two ways. I will take Holywood as an example, but it would apply equally to any of the other 11. If a fire in Holywood required a second appliance, one would immediately have to be brought in from Knock or Bangor. What would happen if there were a fire in Castlereagh or Bangor shortly after one of their appliances was brought in to provide extra cover in Holywood? Their local fire stations would be unable to respond effectively, because they had automatically lost one of their appliances to assist in Holywood. The people of Castlereagh and Bangor would be in danger. The effects will be felt not just in Holywood and Newtownards.

In the past, when there have been one or two fires in Bangor, for instance, Holywood fire station has provided cover, as Knock fire station has done for its surrounding areas. Firefighters might be unable to deal with a fire in Bangor because they cannot get support from Holywood. What is true of Holywood is also true of the other 11 stations at which cutbacks are being made. There is a clear knock-on effect.

The draft consultation document's recommendations will leave firefighters in one of two situations: they will be unable to cope with the fire and have to wait longer than what is acceptable for a second fire appliance — which will inevitably place lives at risk — or the response of the local fire station will be such that firefighters will disobey their health and safety regulations and go in to try their best to save lives when they are understaffed due to the reduced cover. Firefighters will put their lives at risk. If the proposals are allowed to go through, people's lives will be put at risk.

In the Chamber, Members often talk about life-and-death decisions. Today, we are faced with a clear-cut example of such a decision: people will die if the recommendations are implemented. That is why Members must send a clear message that the proposals are unacceptable, and I want to hear a united voice in the Assembly saying no to the proposals. I commend the amendment to the House.

Mr McElduff: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Ba mhaith liom mo thacaíocht don leasú a chur in iúl chomh maith. Is maith an rud go bhfuil gach duine sa Seomra ag caint d'aon ghuth ar son an leasaithe.

I support the amendment, and I commend my colleague Philip McGuigan, a Member for North Antrim, for tabling the motion. I am also happy to acknowledge that the amendment put forward by Mr Storey and Mr Weir added value to it. The key points have been addressed across the parties, and the motion has attracted widespread consensus and unanimity. There is, therefore, no need to engage in unnecessary repetition.

I want to be personally associated with the comments of my West Tyrone colleagues Derek Hussey, who spoke about his home town of Castlederg, and Tom Buchanan who supported him. I wish to be associated with their comments on this matter, although not perhaps on every matter.

Mr Weir: I think that the feeling is mutual.

Mr McElduff: Yes, I think so. Are you keeping well yourself, Peter? [Laughter.] All Members acknowledge that the proposals are driven by a cost-cutting agenda.

3.45 pm

The safety of our citizens is not being treated as the paramount consideration. As my colleague Peter Weir mentioned, the Assembly is speaking with one voice on the issue. When the Assembly speaks with one voice, as democratically elected representatives, its Members expect to be heard and responded to. Is anybody listening? They must listen. If the people's elected representatives speak with one voice, in a corporate sense, there is an onus on the Departments that are responsible for those issues to sit up and take notice.

I shall conclude by drawing attention to departmental guidelines on rural proofing. As other Members have pointed out, the proposals will have a disproportionate and negative impact on rural communities throughout the North. That begs the question of whether the rural proofing of departmental policies means anything. At lunchtime, I had a meeting with senior civil servants about the concept of rural proofing. What is it? Does it apply? Does the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety have any interest in rural proofing? I understand that rural proofing is the process by which Government policies are examined carefully and objectively in order to ensure that they treat rural dwellers fairly and, in particular, to make sure that public services are accessible to people, on a fair basis, regardless of where they live in the North.

I ask the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and the Fire and Rescue Service to pull back from the proposals. I also ask the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development to do its work and ensure that its sister Departments do not take decisions that will have an unduly negative impact on rural communities. Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

Question, That the amendment be made, put and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly condemns the proposals contained in the 'Draft Integrated Risk Management Plan consultation document 2007/08' prepared by the Fire and Rescue Service to remove the second fire appliances from twelve towns in Northern Ireland, thus endangering the safety of both firefighters and the public.

Adjourned at 3.47 pm.

Tuesday 12 December 2006

The Assembly met at 10.30 am (Madam Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

Introduction of the Offence of Corporate Manslaughter

Madam Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow two hours for each of today's debates. The proposer of each motion will have 15 minutes to speak, and all other Members will have 10 minutes.

Mr Gardiner: I beg to move

That this Assembly calls upon the Government to introduce legislation introducing the offence of corporate manslaughter to Northern Ireland, where it could be proven that culpable negligence by a firm was a major contributory factor to the death of an employee or subcontracted worker; and further calls for the introduction of an additional offence of secondary liability for corporate manslaughter, where it could be shown that a company's failings were provably caused by the culpable negligence of one or more individuals within the firm.

The Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Bill is currently in the House of Lords, having already passed through the House of Commons. The Bill applies to Northern Ireland as well as to England and Wales. In Scotland the offence of corporate manslaughter will be called corporate homicide. The Bill was introduced in the House of Commons on 20 July 2006. It passed Standing Committee B on 31 October 2006 and looks set to become law during 2007.

Therefore why, Madam Speaker, am I calling on the Government to extend the legislation to Northern Ireland? The clue is the second part of the motion.

There I call for an additional offence of secondary liability for corporate manslaughter, where it could be shown that the failings of a company, public body or organisation were caused by the negligence of one or more individuals in the firm or organisation involved. When I talk about organisations, I include councils, health boards and Departments.

The reason why I am calling for that extremely important addition to be made to the legislation is not to seek retribution, even though retribution is a perfectly legitimate principle on which to base law. I seek that addition on the principle of effective deterrence.

An article on the Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales's (ICAEW) website summarises the likely impact of the Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Bill as follows:

"companies that comply with existing health and safety legislation have nothing to fear."

It continues:

"Companies found guilty of corporate manslaughter will face an unlimited fine, as well as a remedial order requiring the company to address the cause of the fatality".

The article concludes:

"As long as employers exercise due diligence in managing their health and safety risks, in the event of an accident, they are likely to have most of that duty of care discharged under the law".

The Government have confirmed that view. During the Bill's passage, Ministers have stressed that no new burdens will be placed on companies that already comply with health and safety legislation. In short, the new corporate manslaughter law will impose penalties no different in form or severity to existing health and safety legislation and manslaughter legislation. Under existing legislation, unlimited fines are already in place. Imprisonment is already an option under existing gross negligence manslaughter law.

Under that law, the Crown Prosecution Service (CPS) states that, where it can be proven that:

"There was a duty of care owed by the accused to the deceased", that

"There was a breach of the duty of care by the accused", that the "Death of the deceased was caused by breach of the duty of care by the accused", and that

"The breach of the duty of care by the accused was so great", that can be described as gross negligence and is therefore a crime.

The problem with existing legislation has always been that, for a company to be prosecuted for gross negligence manslaughter, it is necessary to identify a "controlling mind", who is also personally guilty of that manslaughter. It is not possible under present law to add up the negligence of several individuals in order to show that the company or corporate body was grossly negligent. A specific individual must be identified as a "controlling mind" in order for corporate manslaughter to be proven. For that reason, a separate offence of corporate manslaughter had to be created.

At present, under the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974, employers whose negligence leads to the death of an employee or a member of the public can be convicted only where there is sufficient evidence to prove that individual members of the senior management team were guilty. Those individuals must be prosecuted before the company or corporate body can be prosecuted. To date, only seven small businesses have been found guilty of negligence. It was for that reason also that the new offence of corporate manslaughter had to be created.

When it becomes law, the Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Bill will give the courts the power to decide whether the collective failings of a company's senior management team amount to a gross breach of the company's responsibility to protect the health and safety of its employees and the public.

The Government have stated that examples of such breaches will include failure to ensure that staff have adequate health and safety training and to check that equipment is in a safe condition, that lifts are maintained and adequate fire precautions have been taken.

Under the proposed legislation, an organisation will be guilty of the offence of corporate manslaughter if its activities are organised by senior managers in such a way as to cause a person's death and amount to a gross breach of a relevant duty of care that the organisation owed to the deceased.

To decide that question, any jury would have to consider whether the evidence showed that the organisation had failed to comply with the relevant health and safety legislation or guidance. The Bill also sets out a number of other factors for the jury to consider, such as whether senior managers sought to cause the organisation to profit from its health and safety failure. In other words, did the firm or corporation deliberately cut corners to reduce costs or boost profits?

Critics of the proposed legislation are already concerned that such additional factors will make it difficult to obtain a conviction. The overriding and most worrying aspect of this situation remains, however, that the new corporate manslaughter Bill lacks teeth. It has virtually no effective deterrent impact beyond that of existing legislation.

It is appropriate, Madam Speaker, to define what we are talking about in human terms. I began to call for corporate manslaughter legislation three years ago following the death of one of my young constituents in an accident during a motorway-upgrading and bridge-widening project near the junction of the M1 and Black's Road at Dunmurry. His death was a tragedy for his family. A young man's life; all the potential he has to offer — that is beyond price.

I felt that my young constituent's death had wider implications. I have lost two other constituents to industrial accidents in the past three years. The Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents (RoSPA) reported that there were 24 fatal accidents in Northern Ireland in 1998-99. There were 19 the following year; 16 the year after; 12 the year after that; and 21 in the year 2002-03.

More significantly, RoSPA reported that fatal accidents were at a rate of 2.17 per 100,000 employees in Northern Ireland in 1998-99, compared with just 0.8 in Great Britain. RoSPA summarised the situation as follows: there are about 20 fatal injuries each year; 70,000 cases of ill health are caused or aggravated by work activities each year; some 365,000 days are lost due to accidents at work each year; and the cost to employers is up to £370 million and to the Northern Ireland taxpayer over £500 million.

RoSPA further indicated that there are about 350 deaths of workers and members of the public in Great Britain every year due to reportable accidents at work. Taken on a pro rata basis, that means that Northern Ireland could expect to have about 10 deaths a year from accidents at work. Northern Ireland has 20 fatalities a year — twice the Great Britain average. Workers are twice as likely to be killed at work in Northern Ireland as they are in Great Britain. That is why we in Northern Ireland need to take the problem more seriously.

For those reasons alone, quite apart from the human tragedy, Northern Ireland must act. I am concerned that deterrent factors in the proposed UK corporate manslaughter Bill are inadequate. Those problems could be best addressed by the introduction of a new offence of secondary liability for corporate manslaughter. Juries could be asked to establish whether management failure had caused or contributed to a death. On the basis of such a finding, the Director of the Public Prosecution Service (PPS) would then determine whether an individual within a company should be prosecuted for manslaughter.

Only individual responsibility for the death of a worker — beyond the issue of overall company negligence — will make individual managers take this issue seriously and give sufficient priority to worker safety.

Many feel that big organisations such as building firms have broad backs and that if an organisation is blamed it will simply be subject to financial penalties. That is not enough to change attitudes in the construction industry. If the death of workers on site is to be taken seriously, people will have to feel that they, individually, will face a manslaughter charge if they have been negligent. That is the sort of sharp focus that we need.

10.45 am

The duty of care underpins the operation of a civilised society. Therefore the deterrent factor must loom large in the corporate manslaughter legislation, and individual accountability must not be lost sight of. The additional offence of secondary liability for manslaughter must become an integral part of the new legislation.

Madam Speaker: I have received one amendment to the motion, which is published on the Marshalled List of Amendments.

Mr McLaughlin: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

I beg to move the following amendment: At end insert:

“; furthermore this legislation should apply to all employers, including government agencies and, in keeping with this principle, this Assembly calls for the removal of Crown immunity from prosecution.”

I welcome the debate, although I regret that, once again, we are discussing an important issue on which the Assembly is powerless to act. This matter, along with water charges, health, education, rates and so on, would be better addressed by locally accountable Ministers in our own Assembly. I believe that all those issues will eventually be addressed by an Assembly because the political will clearly exists. I welcome the fact that across all the Benches there are those who recognise the need for a locally accountable Executive to respond to those important issues. I hope that between us we will resolve, through direct dialogue, the few remaining issues so that an Executive can function in future.

I propose the amendment, as it supports and strengthens the motion. I strongly identify with and appreciate Mr Gardiner's motion and the arguments that he made in support of it. However, the amendment addresses some of the deficiencies in the Westminster Bill, which is substandard in important respects, as Mr Gardiner mentioned. It fails to address comprehensively work-related deaths in many circumstances.

My amendment addresses the anomaly of Crown immunity from prosecution. In the interests of justice and equality, as well as of workplace safety, this must be abolished. An employee of Government agencies, or his or her dependants, should be afforded the same duty of care as any other employee in any other sector of the economy. Therefore we would best serve those whom we represent by working on solutions that would remove the privileges and anomalies in the system and deliver equality of protection to all workers.

In the 12-month period to March 2005, 88 people lost their lives in work-related accidents in Ireland; 73 in the South and 15 in the North. Since most of those deaths and injuries occurred in the construction industry, and given the numbers of construction workers who travel to sites throughout the island, this issue must be addressed on an all-island basis. A definition of work-related deaths and injuries should be developed that takes that into account.

Another important issue arises from the methods of calculating the statistics of work-related fatalities and injuries. The Services, Industrial, Professional and Technical Union (SIPTU) has warned that the number of work-related fatalities could be 10 times higher than is reported. For example, SIPTU has pointed out that occupational fatality statistics do not include the deaths of employees who are killed in road traffic accidents while driving as part of their normal employment. However, statistics tell us that up to one third of all road accidents are work-related.

Likewise, illnesses contracted at work that can lead to fatalities outside the workplace are not included in work-related statistics. For example, workplace-related cancers such as asbestosis, instances of which are particularly high in the North, are not recorded. In addition, non-fatal work-related illnesses and injuries can cause serious deterioration in the quality of life, including, in some cases, disruption of ability to participate in the workforce, or reduced life expectancy. The absence of statistics on such illnesses and injuries shows that they are not being treated with the seriousness that they deserve.

A Cheann Comhairle, the important point to make is that nearly all such work-related illnesses, injuries and deaths are preventable, provided that proper safety regimes are in place and are implemented with due diligence. Employers stand to benefit from measures that reduce workplace injuries, illness and stress, so it is hard to understand why employers' organisations continue to resist measures that would improve health and safety. Such benefits would include improved productivity due to lower rates of sickness, absenteeism and staff turnover, and improved recruitment and retention of trained staff.

Sinn Féin does not believe that there is any acceptable excuse when employers fail to meet worker health and safety standards and obligations under the law. My party wants the establishment of a universal, all-island commission on health, welfare and safety at work, which is centrally involved with the Health and Safety Authority (HSA) in the South and the Health and Safety Executive (HSE) in the North. We want the initiation of an all-island workplace health strategy to reduce and remove all aspects of ill health that arise from unsafe work practices. We want immediate steps to be taken in order to tackle the shortage of health and safety inspectors, as that has been identified as a major factor that hinders the authorities' ability to carry out inspection and enforcement functions. That would obviously require the injection of additional resources to enable the HSE to fulfil its responsibilities under strengthened workplace health and safety legislation.

The provision of Government grant aid for sectoral trade-union safety training would be another progressive step. Sinn Féin wants there to be a legal obligation for employers to agree a programme of general health and safety training with the HSE that would meet specific requirements, depending on the substances and processes used in the workplace. The introduction of mandatory safety training, which new employees could take on full pay, would also contribute significantly to improving health and safety statistics.

The introduction of legislation that obliges employers to notify the HSE of any events that occur at their place of work, including exposure to noxious substances that result in workers' absence for more than three consecutive days, is comparable to existing legislation and to regulations in other European economies. Such legislation would provide greater accountability and reassurance that such issues would be dealt with. Finally, I ask for support for the conclusion of an international convention against asbestos production and use.

Let us make no mistake: work-related death through lack of proper safety measures or employer negligence is a crime. There is widespread support across the political spectrum for many of the changes that have been proposed in the legislation on the accountability of companies. However, there would be further support for those changes if sufficient thought and attention were given to the accountability of company owners and directors. Furthermore, even if those issues were comprehensively addressed, it is not proposed that they would be applied in the North of Ireland. Why not? Do workers here not deserve the same entitlement to protection? The motion allows the Assembly to state clearly that it believes that they do.

The Westminster Bill's proposed changes, which provide Crown agencies with immunity from prosecution for the offence of corporate killing, should form no part of any legislation that applies to workers' rights legislation here. All bodies, Government or corporate, should be liable to prosecution if culpability or neglect can be proven. The proposer of the motion has highlighted that. Corporate manslaughter legislation is already in place in many economies and in many countries. It has proved to be a key tool in the battle to reduce workplace accidents and fatalities.

I ask Members to support the amendment. Go raibh míle maith agat.

Mr Storey: I support the motion, but not the amendment. The proposer of the amendment has raised a few issues that must be corrected for the sake of the record. He said that the Assembly is powerless to act on this important issue, but it seems as though the lack of power and will is coming from the Member's party, not the Assembly. His party has failed abysmally to do anything in the past few weeks or months — years, even — to convince my community and the people of Northern Ireland that it is in any way interested in having a peaceful, stable and prosperous Northern Ireland. The proposals and actions of that party are always minimalist.

The proposer of the amendment said that he wants the amendment to be accepted in the interests of justice and equality. He also said that negligence is a crime. Does he accept that —

Mr O'Dowd: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Will you rule on the relevance of the Member's comments to the motion and the amendment?

Madam Speaker: Thank you, Mr O'Dowd. I will allow Mr Storey to continue, but I will listen to how he develops his remarks.

Mr Storey: Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The proposer of the amendment said that negligence is a crime. I take issue with that. Does he accept that the murder of Jean McConville was also a crime, as it was quite clear that —

Madam Speaker: Order. Mr Storey, those comments are not relevant to the motion. Please keep to the motion. Corporate manslaughter is a serious subject, and I would be grateful if you would confine your remarks to the motion.

Mr Storey: Madam Speaker, my comments relating to the contribution of the proposer of the amendment are also serious, and they will be recorded as such.

I support the motion. As one who worked for almost 20 years in industry before becoming involved in politics full-time, I saw at first hand the unfortunate situation where employers take a cavalier attitude towards their responsibilities. Anyone who has responsibility for employees owes them the most common and acceptable protection possible, so that the utmost protection is provided in all circumstances.

The statistics quoted by the hon Member Mr Gardiner are regrettable. The Assembly would be doing a disservice to the people of Northern Ireland if Members somehow allowed the debating of this issue to be seen as an opportunity for them to merely salve their consciences and show their concern, rather than as an opportunity to make appropriate responses to the issues that are prevalent in society.

Look at the statistics that the hon Member quoted. There is a concern that we all bear responsibility. As Mr Gardiner proposes, there should be an offence of corporate manslaughter where it can be proven that culpable negligence by a firm is a major contributory factor in the death of an employee. That is a key element of the motion.

All Members should come to the Assembly with a sense of duty and responsibility. If Members are serious in their concern for the proposal, they will support the motion and impress their concerns upon the Government — a Government who appear to be cavalier in their attitudes towards the safety of their citizens with regard to security and the roads infrastructure.

The proposal to reduce the finance for our roads by 40% or 50% will undoubtedly lead to a continual decline in, and deterioration of, the roads infrastructure. That results in accidents and deaths on the roads for which the authorities take no responsibility. I support the motion.

Mr Attwood: I welcome the motion, the amendment, and the thoughtful speeches from their proposers. First, we must put the problem into context: it is estimated that businesses, commercial enterprises or companies may have had some culpability in between 250 and 300 deaths since 1999. However, only five people and five businesses have been found guilty of any criminal act. As Samuel Gardiner pointed out, there are, on a pro rata basis, some 20 deaths a year in the North, and that is a significant problem.

Today, we should be trying to work out a legislative approach that deals with those 250 deaths in which there is corporate responsibility. I cite the incident at Zeebrugge, which was a very public example of corporate failure; the issues around the death of Victoria Climbié; the death of Jean Charles de Menezes; and the deaths at Deepcut Barracks. Legislation must deal with cases of great public concern when a corporate enterprise, a business or public body has failed in its standard of care to the individual. We need to work out a law that will address the problems that were identified in the cases of Victoria Climbié, Jean Charles de Menezes and others, including deaths in the North over the past 30 years in which there was corporate failure by public bodies.

The problem with the legislation resides in two areas. As Mr Gardiner pointed out, if a prosecution for corporate failure is to succeed, the standards of proof applied to businesses must be properly established. Mr McLaughlin identified the second problem: how far does Crown immunity extend in the legislation? It extends far beyond what the Assembly, the House of Commons or the House of Lords should accept.

If there were another killing like that of Victoria Climbié, the question arises whether a public body that had contributed to that person's death could be prosecuted under this legislation. The argument is uncertain, because, as Mr Gardiner pointed out, a successful prosecution could not be brought in that case, or high-profile cases in this jurisdiction, because the standards of proof are too high.

The standard of proof should be stated as “beyond reasonable doubt” or “in the balance of probabilities”, or another standard that is close to either of those, but not the standard of falling:

“far below what can be reasonably expected”.

To prove a case against a public body or business, the plaintiff must demonstrate a failure to comply with health and welfare requirements or, as Mr Gardiner pointed out, that the manager sought to profit from a failure to uphold appropriate standards or that there had been a gross breach of the relevant duty of care.

When a case is brought to the PPS in the North, or before the courts in any jurisdiction in these islands, trying to meet those standards in a difficult case will be so demanding as to inevitably lead to failure. The second part of Mr Gardiner's motion is important because it aims to moderate those very exacting standards of proof in a way that creates some possibility whereby a public body or private enterprise may become vulnerable to prosecution.

The standards set by the Bill, if it becomes law, are so exacting and demanding that prospects of a prosecution in many — or even a few — of the 250 deaths that will arise over the next four or five years, is slim to the point of being negligible. Great public debate will arise around cases of public concern following the failure to successfully prosecute those who should be responsible before the law.

The second issue with which there are major problems is highlighted in the amendment proposed by Mitchel McLaughlin, which concerns the question of where Crown immunity begins and ends. Although the original draft of the Bill addressed Crown immunity and provided that persons in the Police Service of Northern Ireland or in other public bodies that are involved in the administration of law and justice might be subject to a corporate charge, the Bill has subsequently been amended by the British Government in a damaging and fatal way.

I shall provide three examples. There are additional draft exemptions in the legislation proposed by the British Government that provide a blanket exemption for deaths of civilians caused by the gross negligence of the police or others — such as the intelligence services and MI5 — in the performance of policing or law enforcement activities.

Moreover, there will be an exemption for the killing of members of the public that occurs in situations of terror, civil unrest or serious public disorder in which the police come under attack or face the threat of attack or violent resistance.

I ask Members to apply those circumstances to some of the tragic cases in the North's history. Apply them even in cases in which the police have come under attack, and subjected to threat and terrible violence, but where, nevertheless, a police officer or commander committed a grave error that led to the death of an individual. Those exemptions would allow that police officer, in criminal terms — or the police service, in corporate terms — to walk away. All Members know of cases involving use of force by the police or the military, or cases with MI5 involvement, that gave rise to public concern. All of those matters will, in all likelihood, be exempted under the proposed legislation. That is the importance of the amendment proposed by Mitchel McLaughlin.

I know that it will be difficult to reach cross-party consensus on such an issue. However, Members should try to do that today. During sittings of the Committee on the Preparation for Government dealing with law-and-order issues this summer, a significant event happened. On 23 August 2006, all of the parties that were represented on that Committee, including the Alliance Party, agreed the following motion:

“This Committee calls on the Government to review policy on the publication of reasons where there has been a failure to prosecute and the collapse of prosecutions.”

Two or three years ago, that would not have happened, because there was then a sense that the prosecutors and the state knew best. There was a sense that, if a case collapsed or did not proceed, there must have been a good reason.

The situation changed because of concern within unionist parties about the collapse of the Stormontgate case and because of the subsequent failure of the Attorney-General and the PPS to give adequate reasons for the collapse. The public concern that arose from the failure to explain why that case collapsed led to all parties agreeing to communicate to the British Government that the issue was one of cross-party concern.

Members should accept the Sinn Féin amendment, not because it will lead to open season on the state and its agencies, but because it will limit the power of the state to walk away from issues of public concern that involve lethal force.

Madam Speaker: I now call Francie Brolly. This will be the first occasion on which the Assembly will hear from Mr Brolly, who will be making what can be described as his maiden speech. As Members know, it is the convention that such a speech be heard without interruption.

Mr Brolly: Go raibh míle maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. My father was a strong nationalist and a significant member of the old Nationalist Party. As a young child, I got to know all the nationalist luminaries of the time, who were regular visitors to our house in Limavady — a house that at times served as a party office as much as it did a home. My father was a tireless political activist; his bedtime reading was the electoral registers and the minutes, motions and agendas of Limavady Rural District Council and Derry County Council, on both of which he was a long-serving member.

When we moved to our native Dungiven, he became the secretary of the local GAA club. Concerned about the level of unemployment in Dungiven, he initiated a drive for the building of what was then called an advance factory. He went on to persuade Desmonds textile manufacturers to set up in the village. As people around our way say: “He was in everything but the crib.”

In 1970, he was a foreman on a housing scheme in Lettershandoney. I was teaching in Dungiven at the time. On the morning of 23 February, the local curate came to my classroom door and motioned me out. “Your father has had an accident at work”, he said. “Bad?” I asked, “Bad”, he said. And it was very bad — my father was dead. He had gone down into a 15-ft-deep unshored trench to organise pipe-laying. The trench collapsed, and he was buried alive.

A radio broadcast that evening said that a worker had died as a result of an accident on a building site. “A worker” — as if a man is no more than his job description.

When jobs were scarce, work was paramount. Workmen were plentiful, exploitable and expendable. My mother was pitifully compensated, and the company was told not to let it happen again. Nothing much has changed. People still die at their places of work, and employers still escape any fitting and proportionate sanction. In 2005, only 40 employers in the Twenty-six Counties were prosecuted for breaches of health and safety regulations. The average fine was approximately £8,000.

My mother’s compensation was £7,000. I suppose the assessors thought that £7,000 was a lot of money for her in 1970.

11.15 am

A mere six employers were penalised in the Six Counties in 2004-05. The largest fine imposed was £100,000 against Farrans (Construction) Ltd, following the death of a 20-year-old who was electrocuted. Was £100,000 a lot of money for Farrans (Construction) Ltd in 2004?

No Irish employer has served a day in prison for criminal negligence resulting in the death of an employee. That prompts me to recommend the establishment of an Irish commission on health, welfare and safety at work, especially at this time when there is such a high level of employee mobility throughout the Thirty-two Counties, particularly in the construction industry.

Although I support the substantive motion strongly and absolutely, I am concerned about the title “corporate manslaughter” and, therefore, about the concept of corporate guilt. As long as company directors are not made personally amenable to the law, but can shelter under the umbrella of corporate culpability, we will not have the issue of safety at work tackled with the urgency and the thorough commitment that would be the desired outcome of the motion and amendment. A few months in jail would concentrate the mind of a careless employer.

To finish, I will digress a little and make a plea to all Members here. Thousands of people genuinely sympathised with me on the death of my father. However, some whom I knew bore a grudge against members of his employer’s family and would have used my father’s tragedy as a stick to beat them with. My personal experience would not allow me to use any victim of any tragedy to make cheap political points. Let us, in the spirit of the motion, look after our living in the home, on the streets and in the workplace, and let the dead rest in peace.

Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

Madam Speaker: The next Member to speak, Mr Davy Hyland, will make the winding-up speech on the amendment. This is the first occasion on which he will have addressed the Assembly, so he will be making his maiden speech.

Mr Hyland: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

Last week P J Bradley referred to his cold. Today I have a cold and a sore back, and I hope that it is not due to the arctic conditions that we endured yesterday in the Assembly. Perhaps Members saved some taxpayers’ money by cutting down the fuel bills. However, it is more likely that old age is setting in, as I have to use my reading glasses.

Christmas is traditionally a time of celebration, family reunions and giving and receiving presents — a holiday time when one can overindulge in food and drink and not feel too guilty about it. However, it is also a time of reflection when the previous 12 months can be reviewed — the highs and lows, the good times and the bad.

For some people, Christmas can be a sad period when they remember their loved ones who are no longer with them. It is a particularly difficult time for families who have lost loved ones because of unnecessary accidents at home, on the roads, or in the workplace. Sinn Féin supports the motion because too many people have been injured or have lost their lives through work-related accidents.

Yesterday, a delegation of firemen sat in the Gallery. On seeing them, I remembered the two firemen who lost their lives tragically last week while dealing with an explosion in a fireworks factory in England.

In 2005, 73 people lost their lives in work-related incidents in the Twenty-six Counties, which was a 30% increase on the previous year. There were 15 work-related deaths in the Six Counties in the 12-month period to March 2005 — a total of 88 in the whole country.

The construction industry remains the most dangerous industry for employees. In the Twenty-six Counties, 23 construction workers died in 2005. Thirty years ago, after finishing university, I took a job as a brickie’s labourer on a building site in Newry. The foreman was called Dominic Craven. Unfortunately, there are parallels with Francie Brolly’s case; we were working on a new Housing Executive development in Newry that necessitated the building of trenches. Dominic was a man who was not afraid to get his hands dirty and work in the trenches, yet one collapsed and he was killed instantly. Afterwards, I wondered why no public inquiry was held into his unnecessary death, or, indeed, why there was no public apology from the firm. Perhaps an apology would have implied guilt on the firm’s part. I wondered also whether his wife was compensated adequately for her suffering and loss.

Illnesses contracted at work can also lead to work-related fatalities outside the workplace. Work-related cancers caused by working conditions in the linen and shipbuilding industries in the North have always been particularly high.

The important point to recognise is that many such work-related illnesses, injuries and deaths are preventable, provided that the employer exercises due diligence. Indeed, the HSE estimates that up to 70% of deaths in the workplace are the result of serious management failures.

Ultimately, companies are not responsible for killing workers; it is people. Fatalities in the workplace are avoidable and are often caused by fundamental safety shortcomings throughout an organisation, the blame for which can be properly laid at the door of the chairman, chief executive and board of directors as appropriate.

Many employers who are responsible for dangerous working conditions are never held accountable, nor made to change their practices. As with other laws relating to workers rights in Ireland, health and safety legislation is rarely enforced, and penalties for violations are not strong enough. As Francie Brolly pointed out, no Irish employer has ever served a prison sentence following the death of a worker.

Sinn Féin welcomes the Safety, Health and Welfare at Work Act 2005 in the Twenty-six Counties, which contains significant increases in fines and penalties to deter non-compliant employers. However, fines are not enough when an act of negligence leads to a worker’s death. Corporate killing is a crime, and corporate manslaughter legislation exists in other jurisdictions.

For example, in Canada, Bill C-45, better known as the Westray Bill, provides for the crime of corporate killing. It was enacted following agitation in response to the Westray explosion in Nova Scotia, which killed 26 miners.

On a more positive note, Sinn Féin feels that an all-Ireland commission on health, welfare and safety at work, should involve both the HSA and the HSE. A 10-year, all-Ireland workplace health strategy to reduce and remove all aspects of ill health arising from unsafe work practices would be beneficial. We should tackle the shortage of health and safety inspectors in the Six Counties and Twenty-six Counties immediately, as that shortage has been identified as a factor hindering the ability of the authorities to carry out their inspection and enforcement functions.

Furthermore, sufficient resources must be injected into both the HSA and the HSE to enable them to fulfil all their responsibilities under existing worker health and safety legislation.

We also support grant-aided safety training for trade unions on a sectoral basis.

Yesterday, Peter Hain — sorry, that was a Freudian slip — Peter Weir talked about the importance of cross-party support in opposition to the closure of fire stations in the North. I welcome the fact that all parties in the Assembly are today united to defend the rights of ordinary men and women in their workplace. It is right to highlight the offence of corporate manslaughter and the need for legislation to be introduced in the North of Ireland.

Culpability is a difficult subject. No one would like to be accused of responsibility for another person's death, but companies and firms are ultimately answerable for the safety and well-being of their workforces. That must be the clear message from this Assembly.

Mr K Robinson: Today's debate has been important, not simply because worker protection is an important matter in itself but because this Assembly can be seen to be debating a bread-and-butter issue that affects the everyday life of working people rather than simply occupying itself with what has been described in other quarters as a high-wire act. It is important that the electorate perceive that the Assembly works in their interests and on their behalf.

Seeking to put legislation in place that secures higher standards of safety in the workplace is an appropriate and important matter for us to consider. As the Member for Upper Bann Mr Gardiner said, legislation to create the offence of corporate manslaughter, which will apply to Northern Ireland as well as other parts of the United Kingdom, is already making progress through the House of Commons.

Though some industries are taking the improvement of safety standards seriously, and with a degree of success, more remains to be done to reduce the current levels of workplace injuries and fatalities. It is to be hoped that today's debate will inform the legislators in Westminster and get them to reconsider the issue of secondary liability for corporate manslaughter, which we believe — and as has been illustrated in today's debate — will create the deterrent factor necessary to focus minds on the need to ensure close adherence to health and safety considerations in the workplace.

That that deterrent factor is necessary is all too obvious, and we have heard some graphic illustrations of the impact on families from Members who have spoken today. Mr Gardiner drew attention to the fact that the rate of fatalities from industrial accidents in Northern Ireland is twice what we could expect on a pro rata comparison with GB. That points to the need for a more robust culture of industrial and worker safety than currently prevails in Northern Ireland.

The essential building block and foundation for that new culture has to be a corporate manslaughter Bill — one that has teeth. If the Bill's deterrent factor is inadequate, the whole exercise will be a waste of time. The drafters of the legislation at Westminster have had grave difficulty in producing a Bill that incorporates the wide range of concerns expressed in the Chamber today.

In some ways, the new legislation will lead to the abandonment of the current legislative position. At present, the prosecution of individuals has to take place before action against a corporation or employer is even possible. The proposed new legislation enables the prosecution of the corporation or employer immediately, subject to decision by the Director of the Public Prosecution Service. In some ways, the baby has been thrown out with the bath water.

In its anxiety to make the prosecution of corporations easier, Parliament has ignored the aspect of individual accountability that is involved in any industrial fatality. I concur with Mr Gardiner that the culpability of individuals within corporations, companies, and Government Departments and agencies is important.

The matter of Crown immunity has been referred to in the proposed amendment. There is now a step forward and a recognition in the legislation currently before Parliament that Crown immunity, as a principle, is being breached. I appeal to the proposer of the amendment to recognise that, so that the House can unite around the original proposal in order to show the public, the employers and the Westminster Government that we are serious about the matter. We recognise that they have at least breached the principle of Crown immunity in this first instance. Perhaps we can deal with the remaining issues at a later stage.

11.30 am

Government agencies can now be made individually and personally accountable in some way, and the issue of industrial safety will now be taken seriously. Clause 16 of the Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Bill currently proposes that any individual working for a corporation, Government Department, agency or body be expressly excluded from the Bill's operation. Clause 16(1) states:

"An individual cannot be guilty of aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring the commission of an offence of corporate manslaughter."

Clause 16(2) states:

"An individual cannot be guilty of aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring, or being art and part in, the commission of an offence of corporate homicide."

The Assembly must speak out about that serious flaw in the Bill currently going through Parliament. In particular, I ask those MLAs who are also Members of the Westminster Parliament to take that message back to the House of Commons. Members must do so on behalf of the families of the 20 or more people who die each year from industrial injuries.

Members have heard highly personal descriptions of such cases. The descriptions went beyond the fact that a worker had been killed in an industrial incident as broadcast on radio, to the impact on the family left behind. The hurt and the pain for that family do not end with the broadcast: they continue, perhaps for generations.

The only way in which to reintroduce personal accountability is to introduce a related and dependent offence of secondary liability for corporate manslaughter. In practice, the UUP envisages that that would work by requiring juries to establish whether management failure had caused, or contributed to, the death in question. On the basis of that finding, the DPP would determine whether individuals in a company should be prosecuted for the manslaughter, in addition to the prosecution of the company, corporation or agency involved. That would give the new corporate manslaughter legislation a necessary cutting edge and would underpin it with a deterrent impact — both of which are currently lacking.

There is no question that the corporate manslaughter deterrent effect is necessary. Year after year, the construction industry is one of the worst offenders in relation to industrial injuries and fatalities. I will not bore the House with the figures now, but in Northern Ireland injury rates remain stubbornly high, whereas in GB they have consistently dropped over the last four or five years. It is possible, therefore, to make inroads into those figures, providing everyone accepts that the safety measure of a corporate manslaughter deterrent must be introduced.

Between January and October this year, as many people were killed in the construction industry as there were in the whole of 2000: there has hardly been great progress. The fact that the record for industrial deaths in Northern Ireland is markedly poorer than that in GB must be a cause for concern and for action.

Let us anchor that in the report of a tragedy that was reported by the media in the past week. It was reported that the Water Service in Northern Ireland had been held responsible for the death of a contractor who was killed in an explosion at a treatment works last year. A Crown censure hearing was held following a HSE investigation. The Water Service accepted the censure and presented to the hearing information on measures that it had put in place since the blast to prevent it happening again.

Crown censure is an administrative procedure followed by the HSE in circumstances in which a case cannot be taken to a court of law because of Crown immunity from prosecution. Under the proposed corporate manslaughter law, the Water Service would almost certainly have been brought to trial for that offence. Therefore, one positive aspect of the proposed legislation is that Crown immunity has been breached for the first time.

However, there is concern about industrial deaths and accidents across Europe. A study of comparative industrial death rates in Sweden and Denmark showed that the levels are much lower in Sweden. Perhaps that reflects the fact that there are lengthy periods of apprenticeship in Sweden, during which significant time is spent ensuring that health and safety issues are to the fore, whereas in Denmark much more is learned on the job and on site. Therefore, major issues of training and health and safety awareness must be addressed.

In 2000, a building contractor in Spain was sentenced to 18 months' imprisonment following an industrial accident that led to the death of a worker. The court ruled that that contractor had committed homicide by failing to fulfil health and safety obligations.

It is also worth pointing out that, as they were going through a building boom in Spain, the number of deaths and injuries on building sites increased dramatically. That is something that we need to bear in mind. We too are going through a building boom, so it is particularly important that we address these issues quickly.

I am running out of time, unfortunately. We can see that we are dealing with a western European problem. I had hoped to refer to several of the contributions made by Members, but time is against me. In general, there has been great support across the Chamber. I repeat my appeal to the Member who moved the amendment to look at it again so that we can move forward as a united body in support of the motion.

Question put, That the amendment be made.

The Assembly divided: Ayes 22; Noes 22.

AYES

Alex Attwood, Mary Bradley, Francis Brolly, Willie Clarke, Mark Durkan, Michelle Gildernew, Carmel Hanna, Davy Hyland, Dolores Kelly, Gerry Kelly, Patricia Lewsley, Raymond McCartney, Patsy McGlone, Philip McGuigan, Martin McGuinness, Mitchel McLaughlin, Francie Molloy, John O'Dowd, Pat Ramsey, Sue Ramsey, Caitriona Ruane, Kathy Stanton.

Tellers for the Ayes: Davy Hyland and Sue Ramsey.

Tellers for the Noes: Wilson Clyde and Leslie Cree.

Question accordingly negatived.

Main Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly calls upon the Government to introduce legislation introducing the offence of corporate manslaughter to Northern Ireland, where it could be proven that culpable negligence by a firm was a major contributory factor to the death of an employee or subcontracted worker; and further calls for the introduction of an additional offence of secondary liability for corporate manslaughter, where it could be shown that a company's failings were provably caused by the culpable negligence of one or more individuals within the firm.

Madam Speaker: Members will know that the Business Committee has arranged that the next debate will commence at — [Interruption.]

Order. I am on my feet, and I am speaking. It seems, however, that Members intend to leave the Chamber anyway.

Members will know that the Business Committee has arranged that the next debate will commence at 2.00 pm.

The sitting was suspended at 11.49 am.

On resuming (Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Wells] in the Chair) —

2.00 pm

Police College

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has allowed two hours for the debate. The Member who moves the motion will have 15 minutes to speak, and all the other Members will have 10 minutes.

Mr Campbell: I beg to move

That this Assembly calls upon the Government to provide the necessary funding to allow a new police college to be built in Northern Ireland.

The new £130 million facility will encompass a site of more than 200 acres. It was supposed to have been completed by next year, but it is now almost two years behind schedule. As well as the annual intake of new recruits, serving officers would also heavily use it. It could also be shared by other police services, not just in the British Isles, but further afield. Fire Service investigators, ambulance response teams, bank staff and domestic violence specialists could also avail themselves of the new facility.

The present college at Garnerville is completely unsatisfactory. Indeed, Deputy Chief Constable Paul Leighton admitted yesterday that trainees currently have little more than a telephone box around which to simulate incidents.

Everyone with the best interests of first class policing at heart wants a new purpose-built college that will provide a world-class training facility. Even Chris Patten, many of whose views my party does not endorse, said:

“The Northern Ireland police should have a new purpose-built police college and the funding for it should be found in the next public spending round.”

That, of course, was several years ago. That sentiment was further emphasised in a report from the Oversight Commissioner, who recognised that the training, education and development of police officers and civilian staff is crucial to the success of policing.

More and more people from Northern Ireland and beyond are choosing policing as a career. Setting aside, for the moment, the current disgraceful and discriminatory recruitment practices to the policing service, the PSNI is dedicated to serving the entire community and making life here safer for everyone. All existing staff who require ongoing training deserve the highest-quality training in the best possible environment. They also deserve the support of all the political representatives of all the political parties in Northern Ireland.

The new college will enable us to bring together police training in a single, purpose-built, world-class facility and allow us to build connections with other police services across the globe.

After the negative reputation that this country endured throughout the decades of terrorism here, we have an opportunity for Northern Ireland to become renowned internationally for something positive, but the Government are dithering. Resources were promised for this college, and a previous Northern Ireland Grand Committee, a body that has met just this afternoon in Belfast for the first time —

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Campbell: Thank you. I have just left it in order to be here.

At a meeting of the Northern Ireland Grand Committee on 6 February 2003, the former Northern Ireland Minister, Jane Kennedy MP, said, and I quote:

“I can confirm that the delays to the project have been due primarily to difficulties associated with identifying a site, and that those difficulties are now being overcome. There is no problem regarding resources ... the availability of finances is not a problem; the development of the project has been the problem, and I hope that we can now bring this matter swiftly to a conclusion.”

When pressed further on the funding of the project, by my party leader, Dr Ian Paisley, Mrs Kennedy went on to say:

“I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept my reassurance that on Patten’s recommendations regarding the policing college, resources are not the issue. The problem is getting the plan to its final stages and carrying it through to completion; and I hope to see that happen very rapidly.”

We are nearing the end of 2006, and building has not yet commenced. Therefore, we appear to be little further on.

In passing, I shall speak to the SDLP amendment. Cookstown may be the location for the college, and, if so, we should all support that. If not, obviously the Northern Ireland Policing Board will seek out the location that is the next most suitable. However, I am sure that other Members will campaign on behalf of their individual localities. For example, I contend strongly that the Army camp at Ballykelly, with its excellent topography, road links and proximity to an airport, is an excellent location. Nonetheless, I digress.

The key is to get the go-ahead and the resources to build the college. David Nairn of the Police College of Northern Ireland stated that the college should provide training and education of the highest quality for all police staff. He also said that:

“The unparalleled expertise we hold places us at the forefront of specialist operational training in the United Kingdom. We are undoubtedly best placed to offer our knowledge to both public and private sector organisations and police services across Great Britain and Republic of Ireland. Having accumulated a wealth of operational experience through policing in Northern Ireland, I believe our training provision is truly unique and pioneering.”

That is undoubtedly the case; however, we need the full resources in order to complete the job. An organisation that seeks to deliver a first-class service needs first-class facilities. A state-of-the-art college will provide untold opportunities for Northern Ireland. Government must act immediately to unlock that potential.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I have received one amendment to the motion, which is published on the Marshalled List of Amendments.

Mr McGlone: I beg to move the following amendment: Leave out “Northern Ireland” and insert “Cookstown, Desertcreat site”.

A LeasCheann Comhairle, I appreciate that that specific detail about the location of the police college is the only difference between the amendment and the substantive motion. Mr Campbell has clarified his position on that point, and I thank him for doing so.

For that reason, I submit the following matters of fact for inclusion in the Official Report of this debate. Recommendation 131 of the Patten Report states:

“The Northern Ireland police should have a new purpose-built police college and the funding for it should be found in the next public spending round.”

Following detailed and open competition in the search for a site, the police college project board recommended that the new site for the college should be Desertcreat, outside Cookstown. The deputy chief constable chairs that board, which comprises other members of the PSNI, the Policing Board and representatives of the Northern Ireland Office (NIO). It is also supported by a team of external consultants. All sites that were submitted were fully evaluated and were visited prior to that recommendation being made to the entire Policing Board in February 2004. On the basis of the business case that was submitted in support of the Cookstown site, the decision of the board was, and remains, unanimous.

In July 2005, outline planning permission was granted for the site. The Chief Constable supported recently, publicly and fully the decision to progress with that site. The site has now been formally transferred from the ownership of the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development (DARD) to that of the Policing Board at, I am reliably informed, a relatively modest cost.

At a meeting with the Policing Board on 10 October 2006, the Secretary of State confirmed that Cookstown remains the site for the college, and he gave assurances about the Government’s continued commitment to the project.

From my correspondence with the Policing Board, I am aware that the site has further potential for the Fire and Rescue Service, which is currently also assessing its requirements for a firefighters’ training college.

It makes sense for the emergency services to share facilities at one location. Indeed, there would be further opportunities for training for other emergency and police services on the island of Ireland, from Britain and from other countries. First, however, it is high time that the Government committed to proper resources for a new, state-of-the-art police college to provide the foundation for the new start to policing itself. Instead of dithering and allowing construction and related costs to rise, which they have already done, the Government should get on with the work and commit to this project.

Molaim an leasú. I commend the amendment to the House. Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

Mr G Kelly: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Sinn Féin believes that police training is an indispensable part of changing the culture and ethos of policing. That change is essential in order to achieve the new beginning to policing that was enshrined in the Good Friday Agreement and for which our party and our community continue to strive.

The RUC was a paramilitary, sectarian force born out of the turmoil of partition, drawn, in the main, from the UVF of the time. It was a partisan, state, political police force. Thirty years of conflict reinforced that mindset and behaviour. The problem was highlighted in the Patten Report, which was published in 1999 — and I thank Gregory Campbell for quoting from the Patten recommendations — and which states in paragraph 4.5:

“Human rights training in the RUC also lags behind other police organizations we have spoken to. In the new curriculum (introduced only this year), of 700 sessions of training there are only 2 sessions dedicated to human rights, compared with 40 of drill and 63 of firearms training”.

That is why we need a new beginning to policing, and Sinn Féin has been and still is working hard to secure that.

We need a new beginning for many reasons, not least because there is still a gun culture in the PSNI. In the recent past, we have witnessed PSNI members shooting up tyres of articulated lorries on the Falls Road and driving on motorbikes and firing into vehicles that they believed to have been stolen. Worst of all, in 2003, Neil McConville was shot dead by the PSNI during a pre-planned operation.

The NIHRC, in the foreword to its report, ‘Human Rights in Police Training, Report Four: Course for All’, published in April 2004, states:

“Our evaluation concludes that although the course complied with the requirements of the Patten Report to a certain extent, it did contain some weaknesses from a human rights perspective. The Commission has therefore framed its recommendations to take account of the fact that the Course for All will not run again.”

The report found that, for example, participants displayed sexist, racist and sectarian attitudes and that, generally, tutors did not intervene to explore or to challenge those attitudes.

Paragraph 2.2 of the report also states:

We have some distance yet to go to achieve a new beginning to policing, and central to that, of course, is the transfer of powers at the earliest moment. I want a police training college where no one is trained in the use of plastic bullets and where the Irish national flag is given the same respect and prominence as any other national flag. I do not want a police training college where police learn to arrest people simply because they speak Irish but one where the new recruits are not coached in how to break down the front door of a family home at 5.00 am and maraud through it with semi-automatic weapons, while the occupants, including children, are verbally abused and terrorised.

If the proposer of this motion seeks a new police training college to expunge those human rights violations from policing, it is more than welcome. If an end to the practices that I have described is facilitated or helped by the creation of a new police training college, it cannot come quickly enough. If it helps to facilitate a new beginning to policing, which is enshrined in the Good Friday Agreement and which Sinn Féin is determined to deliver, bring it on. However, if this debate is about who gets to have a high-profile development in their backyard, the public will see through that.

We know from places such as Palace Barracks that it is not the building that has been the problem in the past but what went on inside the building. Indeed, it is rather like the problem of what used to go on inside this Building in the golden era of the old Stormont apartheid regime.

The British Government should release the funds to build a new police college, but, more importantly, the transfer of powers on policing and justice must take place within a reasonable time frame to ensure that any new college is part of building a truly new policing and justice dispensation and is not just another monument to more of the old agenda. Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

2.15 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker: Members who serve on the Policing Board may wish to speak during the debate. It is important that those Members declare such an interest, as it is highly relevant to the debate.

Mr Kennedy: Mr Deputy Speaker, I shall immediately indicate that I have been a member of the Policing Board since April 2006, lest you take or authorise any enforcement action against me. [Laughter.]

My party and I strongly support the motion. This debate is a somewhat bizarre event. The previous contributor, Mr Kelly of Sinn Féin, has just said that a police training college is essential. I may have missed the news overnight or earlier today, but I have not yet heard details of the calling of the ardeomhairle meeting that will lead to the Ard-Fheis, resulting in Sinn Féin's signing up to policing. However, now Sinn Féin wants a college. Sinn Féin Members tell us that they want to train police recruits, yet they refuse to give support to the rule of law or to the policing institutions. That is an intolerable and unsustainable position.

My best advice to Mr Kelly and his party is to stop lecturing MLAs and the people of Northern Ireland on issues of policing, and to stop falsely denigrating, and making crude, outrageous and unfounded allegations against, the honourable members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary, who stood against anarchy on behalf of the decent people of this country while the republican movement attempted to wreak havoc. Mr Kelly would be better served proceeding immediately to ensure that his party does the right thing and signs up to policing without any further delay.

I indicated that I am a member of the current Policing Board. The first Policing Board started work on the college project as far back as 2002. Very commendably, the independent members and the elected representatives on the board approached this important matter in a mature fashion, and have agreed on how the project should proceed. That should be recognised as a unique feature of the Policing Board's work, and should be recognised particularly by the Secretary of State and the Government.

Throughout the history of the project, we have heard words of encouragement but have seen little action from NIO Ministers, some of whom were mentioned earlier. The commitments that Jane Kennedy gave were mentioned, and there were various meetings with Shaun Woodward — if anyone remembers him.

As a result of the processes that the Policing Board engaged in, outline planning approval has been granted to the site at Cookstown. Like the Member for East Londonderry Mr Campbell, I have no doubt that there are Members who would have preferred locations in their constituencies to have been chosen — as I do, he said modestly. [Laughter.]

Lord Morrow: Name them.

Mr Kennedy: There is plenty of ground around Armagh, and there is a lot of room at Bessbrook. However, we must accept that the Policing Board, having studied the matter in some detail, has now purchased and gained planning approval for the site at Cookstown, which appears to be the most likely candidate for the college. I have no doubt that other Members, including those who belong to my party, will advocate alternatives, but we should concentrate on and recognise the work that the Policing Board has carried out on this matter.

Two outline business cases have been made, of which the latest gives a cost of at least £131 million. Once the Government heard those serious sums of money being bandied about, they started to get cold feet. The Policing Board has approved the business cases and has entered into long correspondence with the Government on them. It has met the current Minister with responsibility for security, Paul Goggins, and his immediate predecessor, Shaun Woodward. Representations have also been made to the Prime Minister, but, at this stage, the Government are offering only £90 million, which realistically would only serve to upgrade the existing police training centre at Garnerville.

What we want, what Northern Ireland wants and what the Policing Board wants is a modern, twenty-first-century centre of excellence at the designated site. The Policing Board met the Secretary of State immediately before the talks at St Andrews. The Secretary of State, keen to see progress, indicated that there was still a strong commitment to the new training centre, but he has not yet come up with the extra money. Indeed, in correspondence that the Policing Board has received, the NIO has confirmed that no money additional to the £90 million will be made available, and, further to that, it is not prepared to allow the Policing Board to borrow money to deal with the shortfall.

The Government response is very unsatisfactory indeed. It is the view of the Ulster Unionist Party that Her Majesty's Government alone should fund a new policing college — in full. It is not the business of the Government of a neighbouring jurisdiction to send money or to make donations towards the building of a centre that is the responsibility of this part of the United Kingdom. The new college should be state-of-the-art to maximise its potential as a world-class centre of excellence.

It is reasonably safe to predict that the Assembly will agree the motion, and therefore we hope that the Secretary of State will heed us rather than turn a deaf ear while playing pretend politics and ignoring the work of the Assembly and its Members. We say to the Secretary of State and to the Government: it is time to fund the new police college, and the sooner, the better.

Mr Hay: Like the Member who moved the motion, I have no problem with the amendment. We would be fools if we did not want such a project in our areas — a project that will probably cost, when finished and operational, about £150 million. .

I suppose that I digress a little when I say that I am a member of the Policing Board. It is important to declare that interest.

This project has been in the minds of members of the Policing Board from its establishment in November 2001. The new board had many issues to deal with, but we were all focused on how we might deliver a new police training college for Northern Ireland and where it might be sited. There were many discussions on its location.

As members of the Policing Board, some of us were certainly battling for our own areas; there is nothing whatsoever wrong with that. Since 2001, this project has been very difficult — although not from the point of view of the Policing Board, which has been united and clear about what needs to be done to deliver this huge project costing over £130 million. It will have huge economic spin-offs for whichever area is chosen as the location, and for Northern Ireland as a whole.

It is rather sad that Sinn Féin has turned this issue into a political football, but it does not surprise me. Every political party and every individual could unite on this motion, if politics could be left aside. This project will be worth £150 million when it is up and running. I do not know of any political party, or any individual representative, who would not want such a project in his or her area. It is sad that Sinn Féin has decided to bring politics into this. As with so many issues, Sinn Féin will agree to a number of things, but always with preconditions attached. That is the tragedy of Sinn Féin's politics across Northern Ireland, especially where policing and support for law and order are concerned. There should be no preconditions when it comes to policing and the rule of law in Northern Ireland.

The Policing Board has been dealing with this protracted issue for quite a while. Other Members have mentioned the board's meetings with the Secretary of State and Government Ministers. There have certainly been plenty of promises, but there has been no delivery. The Policing Board had a meeting with the Secretary of State before the St Andrews talks, and the board thought that he would write us a cheque for the shortfall, but that did not happen. Even more annoying for the board members was the fact that Government officials worked alongside the project team in developing the project, so they were aware of its cost at every turn — they were not suddenly hit with a bill for £130 million.

Mr Weir: Although I am only making an intervention, I should declare that I am a member of the Policing Board.

Does the Member agree that the Government's obfuscation on giving the green light to the funding for this police college will work not only to the detriment of policing in Northern Ireland, but to the detriment of taxpayers in Northern Ireland? As anyone who has been involved in any large-scale capital project will know, the longer that a project is delayed, the more the costs go up. Thus, as a new police college will eventually be needed at some stage, the delay is simply adding to the final price tag.

Mr Hay: I certainly agree with the hon Member for North Down. The Policing Board's greatest fear is that if the project is delayed for another six months or another year, it will cost us even more. That is the greatest worry, and that is why the board has been trying to drive this project on. There is no doubt that there is total unity in the board's focus and in its plans to move the project on. The problem is that the Government have still not come up with the shortfall.

In the past few months, the Government have once again decided to carry out a scoping exercise, which is why other locations in Northern Ireland were considered. However, a decision has now been made, and I believe that if the shortfall can be found, work on the project will begin at Cookstown. I have no doubt about that whatsoever.

All the other sites that were considered presented several difficulties. It would be totally negative, for several reasons, for the project to be moved. For example, it has taken a long time for a second business plan to be developed. The Government carried out a scoping exercise. Good work was done by the Policing Board, which tried to move the obstacles from the door and assist the Government. However, as Danny Kennedy mentioned, the board does not seem to be able to convince the Government at the highest level, even by making representations to the Prime Minister. The board has not been able to move from the door the obstacles to obtaining short-term funding.

2.30 pm

In his most recent report, the Oversight Commissioner made it clear to the board and to the public that the facilities at Garnerville are of a Third World standard. I challenge any Member to go to Garnerville and dispute that its fixtures are of a Third World standard. In order to have an effective and efficient Police Service, there must be a new police training college. The House must send out that message. The Government knew all along what the project would cost: they worked with the Policing Board and its subcommittee; they worked out the business and economic plans for the project; and they knew what it would entail several months before the figure, which was then only £90 million, was announced. The House, and, in particular, those of us who are members of the Policing Board, cannot accept that.

The House calls on the Government to put their money where their mouth is. They clearly indicated that they would provide all the money that was needed for the new college. The Policing Board should not have to go along with a begging bowl to any other Government looking for them to part-fund the college. That is wrong. There have been all sorts of rumours that the American Administration or the Dublin Administration might fund the college. In the past few weeks, the Dublin Administration have made clear that the new college is a British project in Northern Ireland so the British Government should pay for it. The American Administration have said the same. We must not fool ourselves. The House must say to the Government that we shall not seek funding elsewhere: they must pay for the new college.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The next Member to speak is Mr Raymond McCartney. This is the first time that Mr McCartney will address the House. It is, therefore, his maiden speech. Members are aware that it is convention that such a speech be heard without interruption.

Mr Raymond McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. As it continues in its efforts to create a new beginning to policing, Sinn Féin contends that proper and supervised training is an indispensable part of changing the culture and ethos of policing in the North. Indeed, the whole concept of change is fundamental to any attempt to create a new beginning in policing as outlined under the terms of the Good Friday Agreement. Central to that change is the need to ensure that all those who want to police us are imbued with the highest standards of human rights training and are free from political control. No ifs, buts or maybes. Indeed, it was heartening to hear William Hay say that politics should be taken out of policing. That has been Sinn Féin's position for many years. I could not agree more with what he said.

Any proposed police training college should not be reduced to a debate about cost, who should pay for it and in whose townland it should be located. Although £120 million — some say £150 million — would buy an awful lot of bricks and cement, missing from the debate so far, to some extent, is any commentary about what training ethos should be promoted in the new building. One wonders how much has been spent on the building to date, despite not one brick having been laid.

As well as that, there is little or no recognition of what failed in the past or of what permitted Patten to say that the RUC training college was an abysmal failure by any standard, where the emphasis was more on military training and where the notion of civic policing was simply that — a notion for some distant place, but not here in the North.

The need for properly structured, delivered and received training was further highlighted in a recent Human Rights Commission report, 'Course for All', which states:

"Human rights and equality were not accorded a sufficiently central place in the course."

That is bad enough, but the following observation was made about those who were given the responsibility of acting as tutors to the new recruits;

"Certain tutors also made inappropriate remarks on occasion, compounding some of the difficulties involved in inculcating a culture of human rights in the organisation."

The Human Rights Commission found that the content of the training course materials appeared to understate the nature and depth of the difficulty faced by the police in gaining the trust of different sections of society. Material relating to such issues as sectarianism and past abuses of human rights did not feature, and the authors of the report concluded in paragraph 2.3:

"In ignoring the historical and current context, the course failed to lay a proper foundation for the lessons it wished to impart."

The Human Rights Commission is also critical that the training did not meet the requirements laid down by Patten to apprise officers of the other new institutions such as the Human Rights Consortium, the Equality Commission and the office of the Police Ombudsman. That finding has been endorsed by the Oversight Commissioner. In that context, how can one be surprised that the Police Federation holds the office of the Police Ombudsman in utter contempt?

Gerry Kelly envisages a training college where the Irish national flag can be displayed, and it will be an environment in which training will be enshrined in a human rights ethos, and with proper content, delivery and supervision. It does not need the ardcchomhairle to state that; it has been stated in the House today.

The British Government should release the funds to build a new policing college, but they should also deliver the transfer of powers on policing and justice and, therefore, offset the possibility of yet another damning report on police training by the Human Rights Commission. Let that day come soon. Go raibh maith agat.

Mr Armstrong: I have no problem in supporting the motion. I was a police constable from 1975 to 1989, so I know the importance of good training and the need to have a special building for that purpose. It is two years since the Policing Board announced its approval of the purchase of the 210-acre site at Desertcreat, close to Cookstown, for the new police college. Two years ago, the Policing Board took the first step in its agreement with the Independent Commission on Policing for Northern Ireland, which emphasised the importance of a new state-of-the-art police college to the long-term success of the training programme and the transform-ation of Northern Ireland's Police Service.

The police college is seen as the cornerstone for providing new recruits, as well as seasoned police and civilian personnel, with an environment conducive to modern learning and development techniques. However, the funding for the college, which was to have been found in the next public spending round, has fallen short by £40 million. It is imperative that the Government fund that shortfall now.

The training facility at Garnerville was originally a temporary measure, and it was never of an adequate standard, but, unfortunately, it was the only option for too long. Northern Ireland's police force — formerly the RUC, and which is now known as the RUC George Cross — was renowned worldwide as a first-class force against the evils of society. Just think about what a new state-of-the-art academy would do for the PSNI and what possibilities it would open up for reaching out to police forces worldwide now and in the future.

It is a shame that, following the progress achieved in finding a suitable site and the establishment of a public-private partnership (PPP), sufficient funding is not available from the Government. Is that another case of the Westminster Government holding back funding from Northern Ireland as a threat to push the political parties together into political progress? The training and progress of the Police Service of Northern Ireland should not be held to ransom by the lack of political progress.

In the Northern Ireland Grand Committee in February 2003, Jane Kennedy told Lady Hermon that there was “no problem regarding resources”. This delay will surely incur further costs, bumping up the full and real cost of the police college. Despite assurances from Lord Rooker in the House of Lords on 12 July 2006 in a response to a question for written answer that the:

“consultancy work and the commencement of the construction of the college are on hold”, until the final money is found, that setback will cost the Government more money in the long term.

It is imperative that the Government at Westminster incur the complete cost of the police college and find the funding shortfall. The Police Service of Northern Ireland is being developed and trained to guard and protect all the people of Northern Ireland, and therefore it is vital that the funding be found within the United Kingdom. The PSNI cannot afford to divide its loyalty with another country south of the border, should the Republic of Ireland Government be urged to fund the college. The Westminster Government must make up the remaining £40 million of the total cost of £143 million for this college.

We are at a critical stage — delays are creating doubts in the minds of the police, who are in need of a new training facility, and those businesses, schools and Mid Ulster communities that are looking forward to a state-of-the-art facility being established at Desertcreat, close to Cookstown. The building of the new college at Desertcreat will be a tremendous boost for Mid Ulster and has the potential to inject much-needed finances into the local economy, acting as a catalyst for other ventures in the future.

The Desertcreat area is embedded in history. It is close to Tullyhogue Fort, where the kings of Ulster were crowned, and to Loughry where, in the 1930s, an agricultural college for ladies was sited, followed by agricultural colleges for both sexes and, more recently, the College of Agriculture, Food and Rural Enterprise (CAFRE). The area has always been a place where new ideas are developed and expanded. Today's Northern Ireland cattle herd originated from the Desertcreat farm where artificial insemination was first developed, again in the 1930s, putting Northern Ireland on the world map. [Laughter.]

It is no coincidence then that the Policing Board felt that Desertcreat would provide an excellent site for the future training and development of the PSNI. We do not need to debate that Desertcreat is the ideal site for the college: the Policing Board has made that decision, and it has been confirmed by the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland in the House of Commons. Cookstown is centrally positioned in Northern Ireland, only 50 miles from most places. It is easily accessible by the main A29 road that reaches from Coleraine to Armagh and is a short distance from both the M1 and M2.

The Cookstown area is becoming better known for its entrepreneurial businesses, with many large national companies setting up there. The people of Cookstown are anxious to see the cutting of the first sod on the site without delay. It is felt that the new police academy will bring additional investment to the area and promote development in the neighbouring towns and villages.

Madam Speaker — [Laughter.]

I am sorry, Mr Deputy Speaker. I conclude by saying that the new police college is vital for the future development of the PSNI; it cannot be delayed any further. To do so would have adverse consequences in many areas, including additional costs to the taxpayer, a continued lack of adequate facilities for the Police Service and a loss of confidence in the people of the Cookstown area. The Government must make up the extra money.

2.45 pm

Mrs D Kelly: I welcome the honest and frank debate and the unanimity expressed so far in the Assembly in support of a police college and, in particular, for the specification in the amendment of the Desertcreat site in Cookstown. However, I will not be lectured on human rights or human rights training by parties yet to call for the return of exiles, at least for Christmas.

The SDLP believes that everyone is equal before the law and that no one is above the law. We will expose cover-ups, whoever is responsible — be it the state in the Finucane case; Sinn Féin and the IRA in the McCartney case; or loyalists in the McIlwaine case. We demand that all democratic political parties accept the rule of law and policing. In the twenty-first century, police officers and trainees deserve proper facilities. I hope that the Desertcreat site becomes a twenty-first-century facility and a centre of excellence.

I am concerned at the disingenuous nature of the comments of the hon Member Mr Gerry Kelly, who, when speaking this afternoon, failed to note recent progress on implementing the Patten Commission's recommendations. Some 87% of the 160 recommendations have been either fully or substantially implemented. In response to Members who commented about other facilities and opportunities in their constituencies — and I do not blame them for doing so — it was heartening to hear that the Secretary of State, at his meeting with the Policing Board on 10 October, noted that the Ministry of Defence had offered no sweeteners with any of those sites. Full land value would have to be paid for any one of them. It is appropriate that the Policing Board has pursued and obtained the 220-acre to 230-acre Desertcreat site and that in July 2005 outline planning approval was granted.

Surely provision of the police training college at that site shows a commitment to the Assembly's decision on decentralisation and the provision of facilities across the North of Ireland.

I support the amendment and hope that all Members will get behind the Policing Board in this debate, and I call on the Secretary of State to do likewise. I understand that Minister Goggins is to return to the Policing Board before the end of December, and I hope that within days he will make an announcement that will be satisfactory to us all.

Mr G Robinson: I am delighted to contribute to today's debate, albeit briefly, since I await in eager anticipation further contributions from the Members opposite — namely Sinn Féin — who, if rumours are correct, are preparing to embrace fully policing and all its structures, without the Irish tricolour. However, having heard the contributions of Gerry Kelly and Raymond McCartney, I think that we may be waiting a long time.

I support the motion wholeheartedly, not only because it was tabled by colleagues and Members representing East Londonderry and North Antrim respectively, but because two vital components of world-class policing are education and training and development. Those components are integral to the provision of a world-class Police Service. I am confident that those elements will be greatly enhanced by the college that is envisaged. However, that dream can only be realised as a result of a firm, unambiguous and resolute commitment from the Government that the required additional funding will be forthcoming immediately. That funding must be made available as a matter of the utmost priority.

Although I, and most of those whom I represent, dearly wish to see any future police training college operate on the site of Ballykelly's historic Shackleton Barracks in my East Londonderry constituency, I will be content when the funding shortfall is overcome and a long-overdue twenty-first-century training academy is provided for the Province.

That facility will be in stark contrast to what is currently available at Garnerville. In response to a question for written answer tabled by my esteemed colleague Mr Gregory Campbell MP, Mr Paul Goggins MP wrote on 29 November 2006:

“Ministers have been exploring all avenues ... to ensure that the project provides value for money.”

The Minister with responsibility for security should be informed that the overriding importance of this project should not, solely, be one of value for money. Similar importance must be placed on delivering a facility that meets the needs, and enhances the effectiveness and efficiency, of the police and the community that they serve.

Mr McCarthy: I support the amendment and the motion.

The Alliance Party expresses its deep disappointment at the Government's delay in providing the up-to-date, state-of-the-art police college that they promised. That facility is part of the Patten Report on policing in Northern Ireland, and a suitable site has been identified in Desertcreat.

I am pleased that Members are using the name Desertcreat, which is a townland in County Tyrone. As an ardent supporter of the use of townland names, I believe that Members should keep that name in the forefront of our deliberations.

There was a glimpse on television yesterday evening of the inadequate and outdated facilities at Garnerville in east Belfast that have been mentioned on numerous occasions in the Chamber today. That establishment is long past its sell-by date, and the Government must be criticised for dragging their heels on the issue of a replacement. If money can be found for unwanted wars in Iraq and other places, surely money can be found to provide a quality police college that turns out quality policemen and policewomen to serve in Northern Ireland.

I welcome the assurance given by Mr Campbell that funding is available, although I remain sceptical. If the Irish Government wish to make use of the new training college — and there is no reason why they should not — I am sure that a financial contribution will be forthcoming, and it should be welcomed.

When the new police college is completed, I suggest that it be called the “Desertcreat Police College for Northern Ireland”.

Mr Hussey: I declare that I am a member of my local district policing partnership (DPP), which may be relevant.

The issue that we are considering is the provision of a world-class training and education facility for the Police Service. My late younger brother did his training in Enniskillen, County Fermanagh. Currently, provision is at Garnerville. My memories of Garnerville go back to my days at college in Belfast, when it was not a police training college. Members may recall the previous use of Garnerville. I support the motion in the context of what it is designed to achieve and what we all, I suspect, wish it to achieve — namely, world-class training and education.

Mr McGlone referred to the idea of the development of a joint blue-light college, and I support that. However, I do not fully support the amendment, and I am sure that the proposer of the amendment will understand that. I will come back to that point. In regard to the pedigree of the site mentioned in the amendment, I will address that issue in time.

Like other Members, I urge the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr Brown — who I understand may be seeking another job — to meet the financial requirements needed to start this project immediately. The Treasury holds the purse strings. Members have already said that the longer that this project is delayed, the larger the shortfall will be. It is imperative that the project be started as soon as possible. Funding could be made available after Christmas, as everything is more or less ready for work to begin on site, and that is what we should aim for.

I found it interesting that Mr Raymond McCartney, in his maiden speech, supported Mr Hay’s suggestion of taking policing out of politics. Why, if he wants to take policing out of politics, does he put so much emphasis on having policing devolved to politicians in Northern Ireland? I fail to follow his logic.

I now move on to fiscal pragmatism. If the funding is not forthcoming, Members must consider the alternatives. I proudly declare a further interest as a representative for West Tyrone. I trust that the party sitting at the top right-hand side of the Chamber will appreciate that I support the economic desires of its party colleague and MP for West Tyrone. I trust that that party and its MP appreciate that. We look towards joined-up government.

Planners tell us that we should utilise brownfield sites. The proposal is for a greenfield site. We have a site at Lisanelly — and I refer to the townland name. That site, combined with the Army base at St Lucia, would be equal in size to the site currently available. It has the substructure, the surface infrastructure and the necessary security perimeter. It also has world-class third-level educational provision in the brand new college in Omagh adjacent to it. In such circumstances, £90 million would possibly enable a college to take recruits and personnel before the end of the next calendar year. If that is a fiscal requirement, and if that is being pragmatic, I am not ashamed of that. However, I urge the Government to fund the project as it stands. If they do not, I urge the Policing Board to consider the motion and to put in place the mechanism that will provide that college as soon as possible.

Mrs Foster: I declare that I am a member of the Policing Board and am very honoured and privileged to serve on it.

Members have heard about training for the RUC — now the PSNI, incorporating the RUC GC. However, we fail to hear about the cowardly campaign of terrorism against RUC personnel over the past 35 years. Police officers returning from work at night were shot in the back of the head, and officers were blown up by an under-car booby trap on their way to work in the morning. Sinn Féin’s memory is very selective — a bit like its attention to the rule of law.

I pay tribute to the officers of the RUC, and their families, who made the ultimate sacrifice for the entire community.

3.00 pm

I turn to the issue of the policing college. My colleagues have already said that it is an abdication of responsibility on the part of our Government to make available only £90 million for building the college, and to fail to provide the extra £40 million that is required. We may as well not get any money at all if the Government are not prepared to provide the required amount.

There is no doubt that Garnerville is a college from the dark ages and, as my hon Friends have said, it has facilities that one would expect to see in the Third World. Yesterday, I listened to Deputy Chief Constable Paul Leighton on the radio, describing the rooms in which student officers sleep and share bathroom facilities. I wondered why training was ever moved from the depot in Enniskillen. However, that was probably due to the threat of terrorism at that time from colleagues of those who sit opposite me in the Chamber.

If the Government are sincere about policing and justice as a central issue in Northern Ireland, they must divvy up the money for the new policing college. We cannot have a twenty-first-century police service with nineteenth-century facilities. The Government deliver good rhetoric on policing, but when it comes to delivering resources, it is quite a different matter.

I have brought a copy of today’s ‘Daily Telegraph’ to let the House see the headline that states that 900 police stations have shut up shop. That number relates to police stations in England and Wales over the past 14 years, where the vast majority of those that remain open are operating only during limited hours. Since the Patten Report, we in Northern Ireland, including my constituents, have seen the closure of a number of police stations. We are told that those closures are not about cutting resources, but about using them more effectively. My colleague William Hay, the Member for Foyle, is the chairman of the finance committee of the Northern Ireland Policing Board, and he tells me that policing is always faced with financial constraints. Therefore, if it is not about cutting resources, what is it about?

According to today's radio reports, there were five robberies of elderly people last night in one area. Phone-in radio shows demonstrate that the public are not satisfied with the level of resources that are put into policing in Northern Ireland. That is true whether it relates to manpower, human resources on the ground, or the new policing college. The message from this House to the Government is that they cannot police Northern Ireland or any other part of the United Kingdom on the cheap. They should make the money available for the new college immediately. I support the motion.

Mr McFarland: I had the experience — or perhaps the good fortune — to have served on the first Policing Board, but I am no longer a member after standing down in April.

Like our experience during the first Assembly mandate, the first Policing Board adopted a DIY approach in that it sought out the best policing practice from around the world. Since 2001, the PSNI has developed world-class expertise, particularly in community policing. The PSNI is a world model for human rights policing, with its code of ethics for each officer and its rigorous annual human rights inspection by two of the UK's foremost human rights lawyers, Keir Starmer and Jane Gordon. If Members have not read their reports, they should do so.

The expertise of our community police service is coupled with the background of the RUC as the best anti-terrorist police service in the world. Former RUC officers are currently stationed across the world in places such as Iraq, training people in state-of-the-art anti-terrorist techniques.

Thus, the PSNI is well placed to deliver world-class training for both its own recruits and those from overseas. It is in that context that the idea for the police college has been developed. I was involved in discussions with the NIO, and there were assurances that the full cost of the college would be covered. Indeed, we said that the Policing Board would probably not proceed with the project unless that undertaking was given.

What has gone wrong? Why are the Government procrastinating now? We have had agitation from some in Londonderry to halt the project and to resite it there. There have been voices trying to steer the college to assorted former Army bases around the Province, and some have been demanding joint training with the Garda Síochána on the new site — hence the Irish Government's trying to offer money. I am not too sure that the gardai trainers at Templemore are too impressed with that idea.

My guess is that the delays represent the Government putting pressure on the PSNI and the Policing Board to cut back on its enormous £720 million budget. Could it be that the NIO has its eye on clawing back the 3,000 additional police officers that Patten proposed for Northern Ireland in order to move us out of conflict? Watch this space.

Each month's delay increases the cost of the original ambitious concept — a world-class college, offering training that only the PSNI, with its expertise in both community and anti-terrorist policing, can provide. If that is to be met, the NIO must crack on and meet the obligations that it accepted in 2002.

Mr Shannon: I support the motion. There was a great cheer on the day that planning permission was sought. That was a major hurdle on the way to building a new police college. The funding seemed secure, as the college was recommendation 131 of the so-called Patten Report, which, as we all know, the Government have been keen to implement in full. As usual, however, once the Government's agenda had been fulfilled — namely, to get rid of the Royal Ulster Constabulary — the rest of the recommendations were pushed to the side.

It was recommended that the PSNI be provided with an infrastructure for development and training excellence, so the search began to find the facilities that could provide a state-of-the-art training college that would draw worldwide renown and hopefully attract much-needed positive attention to Northern Ireland and its policing policy. A site was found, a blueprint drawn up, and a community buoyed by the promise of a boost to their local economy. Here we stand, however, attempting to get the Government to live up to their promises on at least that one area.

There is no doubt that we are in great need of a facility that not only deals with the day-to-day service to the community that the Province needs but that has the capacity to train for the ever-more-possible threat of chemical or biological warfare. The 210-acre space provides room for a train carriage, plane fuselage and on-site bank to simulate hijackings and robberies, as well as purpose-built accommodation with 300 rooms, and a village built for public order training complete with decontamination units. The estimate of £80 million was a modest sum, especially when taking into account the sheer class of what was being timetabled.

To accept any less would be unthinkable when one looks at the amount of money that the Government have poured into futile exercises such as the Bloody Sunday Inquiry. Here is something that would not only benefit police training, and consequently the safety of the 440 policemen and policewomen recruited annually and the communities that they serve, but that has the potential to benefit other police services on the mainland.

When seeking to build a twenty-first-century facility for a twenty-first-century police service, one must pay twenty-first-century prices. It is possible that other services such as the Fire and Rescue Service and the Army bomb squad could use the facilities, which would go some measure towards offsetting the cost factor. The simple fact is that Garnerville does not come up to scratch and needs replaced. The old adage that if something is worth doing, it is worth doing right, fits this situation perfectly. Hugh Orde has said that the current facilities are limited, with no specialist information technology provision. Interview and courtroom-training facilities are poor, and the physical training suites are grossly inadequate.

There must be a drastic overhaul. Given the circumstances, there is no point in Members pushing for anything less than excellence. To do so would do a disservice to the future of Northern Ireland and to the PSNI in particular.

The Committee on the Preparation for Government's findings on the economy made it abundantly clear that, in a new period of stability, Northern Ireland has huge potential to thrive, if given the opportunity to do so. Investment is needed, and it is slightly surreal that the Government are quibbling over the relatively small sum of money that is required for the police college. If funding were to be sought for such frivolous nonsense as the Millennium Dome, the required money, and more, would be granted in the blink of an eye. However, it is not granted for a police college with the capacity to rejuvenate not only the town in which it is built but the entire Police Service. Northern Ireland's status as a twenty-first-century country is being shunted to the side.

The building of the police college must begin as soon as is practicable. There has been some talk of going ahead and getting a loan for the outstanding sum of £40 million, and I support the drive and determination of those who desire to see the full potential realised as soon as possible. If it is necessary to take out a loan, it must be done.

Undoubtedly, it is entirely up to the Government to find the funding needed for the police college. It is probable that the Government are merely chancing their arm by attempting to withhold what should be given freely. They do so in the hope that Members will throw up their heads, become frustrated at all the delays and, anxious to move ahead, find another source of funding. After all their wavering and fickleness, the Government must move forward and provide the necessary funding immediately. Without further delay or postulating, the Government must fulfil their obligation to provide the best possible service to the people of the Province by building a purpose-made facility that will be an example to other services and a means to a safer, secure and stable Northern Ireland.

Mr Attwood: I acknowledge everyone who has contributed to a new beginning for policing, particularly the Police Ombudsman, the members of the DPPs and the Policing Board. The biggest single achievement of the Good Friday Agreement is that much of the best work done over the past number of years, and many of the best opportunities for our society created in that time, can be sourced in the work of all those who signed up to a new beginning for policing five or six years ago. That is why the British Government should now respond quickly and positively to the leadership of both the Policing Board and the PSNI by funding the new police college.

I listened intently to the debate, and I look forward to hearing what Ian Paisley Jnr has to say. However, during the course of the debate, quite a number of the speeches made from the unionist Benches moved closer to Patsy McGlone's amendment. I urge the unionist parties to support the SDLP's amendment. My primary reason for doing so is that Gregory Campbell quoted what Jane Kennedy said about a new police college when she was Security Minister, some time ago. He quoted her as having said that "resources are not the issue" and that she hoped that things would progress "very rapidly". At that time, her comments were unambiguous.

However, now, significantly later, there is still ambiguity about funding for the new police college.

Mr Poots: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I have allowed Mr Attwood some time to declare an interest, but I note that he has not yet done so. As he is a member of the Policing Board, it is appropriate for him to declare that now.

Mr Attwood: I thank the Member for that prompt, and I so declare.

Since Jane Kennedy's comments, there has been ambiguity, delay and doubt about the funding of the policing college. There are elements in the British Government who, for whatever reason, want to cause further delays and create greater doubt about that funding. If the Assembly does not unanimously, or at least substantially, endorse the amendment, those elements will feel somewhat reassured.

Given that there are some indications that the Minister with responsibility for security, Paul Goggins, may be minded to make a decision about funding of this matter in the very near future, and that he appears to be a man of good intentions, I urge all parties, even at this late hour, to accept the amendment. That is how the political leadership in the North can send out a message of certainty in the midst of the delay and doubt that have characterised the British Government's response over the past three or four years.

3.15 pm

A number of Members have commented on the prospect of the Dublin Government making a contribution to the police college. The SDLP negotiated a provision in the St Andrews Agreement for North/South funds, over and above any of the other institutions of the Good Friday Agreement that are now in place or that may develop in the future. I have heard nobody, in this Chamber or outside, oppose the Irish Government's making a contribution to the North through North/South funds. I have heard nobody declare that he or she does not want a new road built in some border area because it is to be part-funded by the Irish Government. No strategic, political or other reason has been offered to explain how the SDLP proposal with respect to North/South funds poses any political threat to any interest in the North.

The SDLP says that it is quite proper to extend that argument to a moderate contribution from the Irish Government towards the police college. We do not do that just for some narrow political reason, although some would portray it as such. We do it because of the Patten Report and because the relationship between the gardaí and the PSNI is such that having a facility in the North part-funded by the Irish Government and which the Irish Government and the gardaí, and perhaps other emergency services in the South, can use makes sense.

Jim Shannon made a very interesting point. He rightly identified many substantial reasons for needing a police college in Desertcreat, including the threat of international terror and chemical attack, with a consequent need for decontamination chambers and the like. The Patten Report said that there is a need for joint disaster planning and training. Any chemical attack in this part of the world will affect the people of this island equally. Why not have the Irish Government contribute a moderate sum to the police college in the North in order that they, through the gardaí, and ourselves, through the PSNI, can have joint training exercises in case that sort of disaster is inflicted on our people?

It makes sense in policing, practical, operational and community terms, and we should do it. For that reason, among others, we are not saying that we should go to Dublin with a begging bowl. If Dublin thought that it was giving money to the North, for any reason, to go in a begging bowl, it would quickly and rightly show us the door. There are strong imperatives for North/

South funding of various dimensions being extended to the police college.

I listened intently to the Sinn Féin speeches. In one way they demonstrated a misunderstanding, and in another way they were downright muddled. Gerry Kelly said that Sinn Féin wanted a new training college and that it should fly the Irish tricolour. He implied that the tricolour should fly equally with the Union flag. What Sinn Féin fails to recognise is that the only flag that currently flies over any police building is that of the PSNI, and that flies only at police headquarters. How can he argue that the Irish national flag should fly over police stations and the new police college when the Union flag has not flown over any police building for the past five or six years?

Sinn Féin twice referred in a disparaging way to high-profile police developments being in somebody's backyard, and said that the issue of the police college should not be reduced to whose townland it ends up in.

I beg to differ. One of the reasons that the Policing Board was attracted by the application for the college to be built at the Desertcreat site near Cookstown was, in my view, because it was a substantial investment in the west of this part of Ireland — a place that has historically and structurally suffered disadvantage and discrimination.

If I had the choice between a police college at the Maze site or one in the west or the north, on the grounds of discrimination and disadvantage, I know which location I would choose. Jim Shannon had the good sense to make that point, unlike the Sinn Féin representatives, who had the bad sense to oppose that approach.

The third reason that Sinn Féin was muddled and confused is that it quite rightly referred to a series of human rights commentaries about the police training college and its human rights provisions. However, those representatives failed to mention all the follow-up reports that were commissioned by the Policing Board and others in order to correct the deficiencies in human rights training to the point that, if they would only read the most recent report of the Policing Board's human rights advisers, Keir Starmer and Jane Gordon, they would see how far human rights culture and training have progressed. That work is not finished. However, the Patten Report said that the job of implementing the Patten reforms should fall to the Policing Board, and not through grandstanding outside the Policing Board, as Sinn Féin has done over the past number of years.

We need a police college in the North to demonstrate modern and progressive policing, to embed the Patten reforms and policing change and to drive forward the policing agenda. However, there is another reason. The SDLP is of the view that a police college should become an international centre of excellence, where other societies that are emerging from conflict can come to this part of Ireland and be trained in best policing practice and policy. Over and above the domestic and national needs for a police college in Cookstown, there is, ironically, an international need, whereby Cookstown police college could become a symbol of best policing practice across the world.

Mr Paisley Jnr: At the outset of my speech, I declare that I am a member of the Northern Ireland Policing Board.

This debate is not about where a police college should be built, despite Members' obvious and clear entitlement to indicate where they would like the college to be built. The debate is about something else altogether — delivery. It is about the delivery of the necessary resource to build the police college and the delivery of the will to see the police college built.

We have cleared a hurdle in relation to where the college should be built, because the Policing Board, and all the political parties represented on it, has unanimously endorsed where the college should be. That is why the DUP has no problem with the proposed amendment to the motion.

As with so many issues in Northern Ireland, we discuss delivery. Delivery by Sinn Féin on the rule of law is an issue in this debate, just as that party's failure to deliver is an issue. It was made an issue by the contributions of Sinn Féin Members. There will be no confidence that there will be delivery on a justice and policing Minister within a certain given timescale until Sinn Féin signs up to and supports the rule of law, the Police Service of Northern Ireland, and the rule of law demonstrated by our courts — in total.

During his contribution, Mr Kelly begrudgingly made several comments about the police college. He said that the issue is not about the building but about what goes on inside the building. However, it was clear from Mr Kelly's comments that he does not have a clue about what goes on in that building and that he has not had a clue for some time. Mr Kelly now wants a police college, but he wants it without his supporting the PSNI and the rule of law. I say to him loudly and clearly that he must totally support the Police Service, he must totally support the rule of law and he must totally support the royal courts of justice. Then he will see a college working appropriately and properly.

He had the audacity to say, "Bring it on". One of the things that he wants is an end to training in the use of baton rounds.

Well, if they stopped rioting in north Belfast there would be no more need to have training in baton rounds. Bring it on: stop the rioting in north Belfast.

Mr Kelly said that he wanted to see the Irish national flag flying over the police training college. Mr Attwood has quite rightly pointed out that if Mr Kelly wants the Irish national flag, he will also want the Union Jack. Therefore, this afternoon Sinn Féin is calling for the Union Jack to fly over police establishments in Northern Ireland. What a change we have seen in Sinn Féin today.

Of course, Mr Kelly does not want to see training in the use of water cannons. I know that from time to time he has had an annual wash-down from water cannons. Again, if they stopped the rioting in certain parts of Ulster, water cannons would no longer be used.

Madam Speaker: Mr Paisley, I remind you that we do not want personal comments.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Absolutely.

Sinn Féin should go and live in the real world.

Mrs D Kelly: I am sure that the Member would wish to include in his call for an end to rioting the rioting surrounding parades and at Whiterock. While I am on my feet, let it be noted that I am also a member of the Northern Ireland Policing Board.

Mr Paisley Jnr: In his contribution, Mr Kelly made some awful characterisations and slurs about the Police Service of Northern Ireland, and about the Royal Ulster Constabulary, which preceded it. He indicated that it was a partisan police service that derived from the Ulster Volunteer Force. That is a slur, and it does nothing to demonstrate that Sinn Féin has crossed the Rubicon in its little narrow mind that it must cross if we are going to see support for the police and the rule of law. Sinn Féin is giving no indication that it wants to change.

While we are talking about organisations, let us talk about the great Óglaigh na hÉireann — what has it morphed from? It has morphed from the psychopathic headbangers of Patrick Pearse into the drug-dealing, granny-beating, child-killers of Northern Ireland.

Madam Speaker: Mr Paisley — [Interruption.]

Order. Mr Paisley, please keep to the motion. I am sure that you are articulate enough to do that.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Thank you for that prompting, Madam Speaker.

We also heard a masterful contribution on policing from another Member of Sinn Féin — the one-time hunger striker who did not make it. Of course, his brother runs Community Restorative Justice Ireland (CRJI). If we look at the model advocated by that particular organisation —

Mr Raymond McCartney: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. That is not true. He does not run CRJI. The Member is wrong and he should withdraw his comment.

Madam Speaker: Thank you. I remind Members that they should be careful in how they talk about people who are not Members of the House. Mr Paisley, will you withdraw that remark?

Mr Paisley Jnr: Madam Speaker, I am going to defend the remark on this basis — it must have been his twin brother, or someone remarkably like him, who advocated community restorative justice to the Northern Ireland Policing Board.

Mr Raymond McCartney: There is a difference between advocating community restorative justice and the statement made by the Member. He made a very clear statement that the person concerned was running CRJI, and he is wrong.

Madam Speaker: I agree with you, Mr McCartney.

Mr Hussey: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. Mr Paisley, would you repeat the comment that you made about Mr Raymond McCartney's brother?

Mr Paisley Jnr: He helps to run the CRJI, and he is a member of that organisation. Madam Speaker, if it would help to clarify the situation, I will say that he helps to run it. Let us deal with the issue. Mr McCartney said — [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. Do people not listen to what I say at every sitting? We must have order in the House. Can I also —

Mr Hussey: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Just a moment, Mr Hussey, I am on my feet.

I heard what you said, Mr Paisley. I took it that you felt that Mr McCartney's brother had helped to run CRJI. If that is not correct, I would ask you to withdraw the remark.

Mr Raymond McCartney: He said very clearly —

Madam Speaker: That is fine, Mr McCartney. Sit down. I will examine Hansard and I will come back to the issue.

Mr Raymond McCartney: Please do.

Madam Speaker: Thank you very much.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Madam Speaker, I am happy for you to examine Hansard.

Madam Speaker: Mr Hussey has a point of order.

Mr Hussey: I would like to raise a point of order under Standing Order 2(a). Madam Speaker, you said that if any Member rose to make a point of order, they were to name the relevant Standing Order. That constantly does not happen in the House. Thank you.

Madam Speaker: I certainly agree with your comments, Mr Hussey. That does not stop Members from doing so, however, and that is why I asked whether people ever listen to what I say.

Mr McLaughlin: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Can we take it that, under Standing Order 2(a), we can treat Mr Paisley Jnr's earlier comments — in fact, his entire contribution — as having the same integrity as they had when he talked about community restorative justice?

3.30pm

Madam Speaker: As I am sure that Mr Hussey would point out, that is not a point of order. I assure Members — including Mr Paisley Jnr, who I know will agree — that I will look at Hansard and will come back to it.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Some Members are obviously reluctant to hear about community restorative justice. Why is that? Is it because community restorative justice groups' exercising of policing and the type of policing that they want exiles people from Belfast? Do they want people to withhold information from the police and the courts? Or is it because the head of training of one of those groups was convicted for the murders of Corporal Wood and Corporal Howes in Belfast? Is that the sort of police training that they want in Northern Ireland?

Madam Speaker: Mr Paisley, I ask once again whether that has anything to do with the police college. It does not, as far as I am concerned.

Mr Paisley Jnr: It does absolutely; my point is about training.

Mr Raymond McCartney indicated that he wants a new ethos in policing. If that ethos is the same as that of the CRJI network, that is not the ethos that people in Northern Ireland need, nor is it the ethos that the Protestant community wants. Indeed, I bet my bottom dollar that it is not the ethos that Roman Catholics want for their country either.

Mr Raymond McCartney: Will the Member give way?

Madam Speaker: In case you did not notice, Mr Paisley Jnr, a Member asked whether you would give way. However, it is up to you whether you do.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I am well aware of the Members who wish me to give way, but I will not do so.

The ethos of the police should be — and is — that they support democracy, that they support wholeheartedly the rule of law, that thou shalt not kill and that thou shall respect diversity. That ethos exists in the police training college, and has existed there for some time. However, the ethos of republicans has been to bomb, kill and murder police recruits.

In my constituency, I once saw republicans plant a pipe bomb underneath the car of a Roman Catholic man who had been recruited to the Police Service. That bomb had been planted by republicans, and that action was not condemned by the Provisional IRA or its spokespeople.

Quite rightly, many Members have taken the opportunity through the debate to say where they want a new police college to be built. However, in its past and current forms, the Policing Board has been selfless in ensuring that it gets the best site for Northern Ireland. Acquiring such a site should result in the building of a new police college. However, it is ironic that the failure to implement a proposal that has unanimous political support is being blocked by the NIO, the Treasury and the Government. It is perverse that the NIO is stumbling on and delaying the issue.

I ask Members to consider the contribution that our police officers make to police training across the world. Former RUC officers manage police training in Kosovo, and a former assistant chief constable manages similar training in Basra, yet Northern Ireland still lacks the state-of-the-art, world-class training centre that it deserves.

Some Members called for the location of the college to be changed. If the location is changed, costs will either increase or decrease. However, that is not the issue. The issue is whether we can build a college that has the unique selling point of a tactical training village such as that mentioned in the current police-college business strategy.

The current facilities in the police college at Garnerville are Third World. We recognise that a new college must be built; we will not settle for second best. It is therefore up to the British Government to give the money now to ensure that we have the first-class college that Ulster deserves for its police recruits.

Question, That the amendment be made, put and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly calls upon the Government to provide the necessary funding to allow a new police college to be built in Cookstown, Desertcreat site.

Adjourned at 3.35 pm.

THE TRANSITIONAL ASSEMBLY

Monday 18 December 2006

The Assembly met at 10.30 am (Madam Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

ASSEMBLY BUSINESS

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. When will you be able to explain the security regulations of the House to the Members of the Assembly? There seems to be an effort to remove members of our police force from parts of this House. I want to know what that is and why new rules, which did not operate before, have now come into force. Members need to know exactly where they stand. I hope that at some convenient time — not today — you will be able to make a full statement from the Chair, as happened in the House of Commons when it experienced similar trouble. Let us keep to the same rules.

Madam Speaker: Thank you, Dr Paisley. I have not heard of any such changes. As you know, I told the House that I was looking into the matter. The Assembly Commission has set up a special security review, involving its members and other invited personnel. At this stage — as I have already explained to you — there is an interim agreement with the PSNI for security in this Building on sitting days from 8.30 am until 6.30 pm. That arrangement will stay in place until full devolution, when it is hoped that we will have our own corps of PSNI people to look after us.

That is as far as I can go at the moment, because that is as far as the security review has gone. There is no change or diminution of security, especially on sitting days. I will be reporting back.

Mr P Robinson: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. There have indeed been further restrictions on members of the close protection unit (CPU); can the CPU be taken into consideration when the review is being carried out? Can you also look at the access being provided to the CPU as compared with that being provided to the non-police escorts of other members of the Assembly?

Madam Speaker: Thank you, Mr Robinson. I certainly will be looking into that. As all Members will appreciate, I cannot discuss security in any great detail on the Floor of the House. I hope that Members, and everyone else who comes to or works in the Building, feel safe and looked after. Your and Dr Paisley's comments will be taken into account. That is as far as I can go on the Floor of the House. I hope that you appreciate that.

Water Charges

Madam Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow two hours for each of today's debates. The proposer of each motion will have 15 minutes, and all other Members who wish to speak will have 10 minutes. Two amendments have been selected and published on the Marshalled List. The amendments will be proposed in the order in which they appear on the List. When the debate has concluded, I shall put the Question that the amendment be made for each amendment in turn. If amendment No 1 is made, I shall not put the Question on amendment No 2.

Mr Robert McCartney: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. On the Marshalled List of Amendments, amendment No 1 appears to be down in my name, unless there is another R McCartney. [Interruption.]

Oh, there is? Thank you very much. Madam Speaker, he must be travelling incognito, because I have never come across him in the Assembly.

Madam Speaker: I am sure that that is to his detriment. Mr Raymond McCartney is here, and unless you want us in future to call you Mr McCartney QC to make it clear —

Mr Robert McCartney: No, just call me Mr Robert McCartney and the other Mr Raymond McCartney; that would seem to be the proper way to do it.

Madam Speaker: As always, Mr McCartney, I will listen to what you have to say.

Mr Cree: I beg to move

That this Assembly notes the Government's unacceptable proposals and legislation for the introduction of separate water charges in Northern Ireland, and calls on the Minister for Regional Development to examine and review the provision of water and sewerage facilities so that an improved service may be provided and an acceptable funding arrangement be enacted to cover the costs involved.

This motion was drafted some time ago, during the summer. It would have been nice to have had the opportunity of discussing it before the legislation had been passed, but obviously the Secretary of State was not prepared to let us do that. Things have moved on since then and I am aware that there are two amendments, which is entirely fitting. The first one contains a lot of detail and merit. The second, which is the amendment from the hon Member for North Belfast Mr Maginness, also has quite a lot to commend it, and I would be prepared to take that one on board.

During the past three decades our water and sewerage infrastructure has suffered significant underinvestment by successive British Governments.

The Water Service now faces a £3 billion investment requirement to comply with EU directives on water quality, to respond to increasing demand for water and sewerage services and to replace ageing infrastructure.

In May 2002, the Chancellor announced the new borrowing power for the first Executive to finance infrastructure investment, subject to the debt being paid from additional local revenues.

Few people would object to paying more for an improved service, but the scheme devised by the Government does not have the support of consumers, any of the political parties or the trades unions. This is the first time that the Government have got all parties to agree on something. We were told that we would not have to pay towards the charges, but the Government have reluctantly had to agree that that is untrue.

In 1997, the comprehensive spending review (CSR) changed the system, but no reduction was made in the local rates. Prior to the privatisation of the Water Service in England and Wales, the Government paid a green dowry, and Northern Ireland was given a £50 million annual payment for the improvement of its water service. That money has not been ring-fenced — it has gone into the pot, or, should I say, a black hole.

While we might, therefore, share in the benefits of water reform, it will be at an unacceptable cost. The scheme is fundamentally flawed. Members know that a financial agreement was signed by the Treasury and the Secretary of State in 2005, but no one has seen that document. However, we know that it is central to the decision-making process, the financial model, the licence and the handling of assets. A letter of governance will give effect to the transfer of assets from the Department to Northern Ireland Water Ltd, the new company, and that letter will not be subject to scrutiny either.

I am also concerned about the disposal of surplus land. In reply to a parliamentary question, we were informed that the Water Service has 130 sites that it has deemed surplus to requirements and, therefore, suitable for selling. Some of the decisions on those sites go back 16 years, and nothing has happened yet. Under the Government's plans, we do not know how those disposals will be dealt with or who will get the proceeds from the sales in the first three years.

Lord Trimble: The Member is concerned about who will receive the proceeds from sales in the first three years. Under the legislation, disposals are subject to approval by the Department. However, during last Monday evening's debate in the House of Lords, Lord Rooker — speaking on behalf of the Government — said that the Department would be immediately issuing a general authorisation for disposals, and that from that point onwards there would be no Government or departmental regulation of disposals. On that point, Lord Glentoran, for the Conservative Party, believed that he had received a concession from the Government whereby the regulator would have a regulatory function with regard to those disposals from 2007. Is the Member aware of what the position is on that issue, because there was doubt on Monday night as to whether Lord Glentoran had received anything of substance?

Mr Cree: I thank the hon Member for his intervention. Last week, the Subgroup on the Comprehensive Spending Review and Programme for Government; Rates Charges; and Water Reform received evidence from a group of people, one of whom was the regulator. I am conveying the information that he supplied to the subgroup, so it may well be that the noble Lord has been sold a pup.

Members have not had access to the strategic business plan, but we know that the cost of capital will be 5·8%, and that is the highest in the UK. The debt provision has been set at 5%, which is low considering the experience across the water. One in four county court judgements in England and Wales are for non-payment of water bills. Last year, there was a 43% increase in legal action. Who will pick up the cost of non-payment of bills?

There is a major concern about the efficiency targets for the new company and who will pay for any failure to meet them? The Water Service's land and assets are valued at £5·6 billion. They will be written down to £1 billion, and that will become the capital value of the new company. A dividend of £58 million — 5·8% of £1 billion — will be paid to the Government. If the dividend is not paid in full each year, the Department for Regional Development will have to make up the difference. We are told that the capital figure was recommended by the consortium led by the Union Bank of Switzerland and was necessary to ensure that the business would continue to be financially sustainable.

Clearly, that arbitrary valuation is costly to consumers. If it were a third less than the £1 billion figure, consumers could save £20 million each year. Remember that ratepayers paid for a significant portion of those assets over the years, with taxpayers paying the rest.

10.45 am

During subgroups' evidence sessions, I was surprised to learn that access to the borrowing requirement depended on the introduction of water charges. Price protection must be extended until 2015, or until the new company breaks even. Of the £3 billion planned for investment, it has been estimated that approximately £1·4 billion relates to the capital backlog from the past. The Treasury should pay that to alleviate the capital problems of the company, whose arbitrary capital value is a significant cost to consumers. The strategic business plan must be available for public scrutiny before the Minister signs it off. The asset management plan and the estate management plan must also be considered. Neither is available yet, although the water reform legislation has been approved.

Following strong representations from the Consumer Council and other bodies, the Government developed an affordability tariff for those households that are in receipt of benefits. Whilst it was welcome, there is no indication of what will happen to the tariff after 2010. Will the Government continue to fund it, or will other consumers have to pay more? Will other services be cut by the same amount? The affordability tariff will apply to 200,000 households, that is approximately one third of all households, a large and important section of the population. However, another large group of households, which is just above the lowest income group, will be dramatically affected by water charges and other increased costs that are in the pipeline. Those people are concerned about their financial situation, as many are retired and living on limited pensions. Government has not addressed the major problem that others may fall into the poverty trap.

There are many problems with the Government's proposals for water reform. They have pressed ahead and paid little attention for the concern expressed by political parties, the Consumer Council, the trades unions and everyone else, including the High Court. In the last few days, both the subgroup on economic issues and the subgroup on the comprehensive spending review, rates charges and water reform have taken evidence from the key players. Much useful information has come to light that reinforces our concern on how the Government have formed their view. It seems to be a mishmash of public spending rules and business practice without much common sense. We do not have the necessary information to enable us to form a detailed critique of the proposals. However, we know that what is being delivered is seriously flawed.

When the Act comes into effect in April 2007, a range of organisations will be involved in overseeing water and sewerage services. The Department for Regional Development (DRD) will have a general oversight role, and the Department of the Environment's (DOE) Environment and Heritage Service (EHS) will be an environmental regulator and overseer of private water matters. The Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure (DCAL), the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development (DARD), the regulator and the Consumer Council will also have a role to play.

Are the roles of those bodies clear? Are there adequate and workable relationships in place in order to ensure that co-ordination is effective? We regret that the Secretary of State refused to listen to the Programme for Government Committee's call for the deferment of water charges so that the Assembly could debate the matter. I contend that there is still time, and that we must wait until the Programme for Government Committee has concluded its deliberations next month.

Mr Raymond McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Tairgim an leasú. I have always taken comfort that there are two McCartneys in the Assembly. I hope that Mr Robert McCartney also takes some comfort from there being another McCartney to join him.

Mr Robert McCartney: None at all.

Mr Raymond McCartney: No offence taken.
[Laughter.]

Mr Robert McCartney: It was given. [Laughter.]

Mr Raymond McCartney: I beg to move amendment No 1: Leave out all after “charges” and insert agreement within the Preparation for Government Economic Challenges sub-committee and the Programme for Government committee;

“and further notes:

the work of the subgroup on Comprehensive Spending Review and Programme for Government; Rate Charges and Water Reform;

the ongoing work on an Economic Package for an incoming Executive; and calls on the Secretary of State to make all necessary provisions to allow an incoming Executive to examine alternative models to deliver the public service that is the Water Service.”

I want to state my party's support for the motion; to offer the rationale for its amendment; and to seek support for it.

All parties in the Assembly have stated their opposition to water charges publicly. However, despite that united opposition, not only has the British direct rule system allowed the opposition to be ignored, it has permitted the Department for Regional Development to proceed in a way that has treated public opinion with utter contempt.

Even though legislation has now passed through the British parliamentary system, all parties in this Assembly should send a clear message that the incoming Assembly and Executive will seek ways to offset that legislation and its effects. Not to do so would only strengthen the view that it suited the parties in the Assembly to allow direct rule Ministers to introduce charges while we took cover through suspension. Let the issue serve as a timely reminder that we, as political representatives, have let down the people on whose behalf we have been mandated to legislate. The Assembly should be in the position to do what it was elected to do.

We must ensure that the Assembly and the Executive will not allow this unfair tax to remain on the statute book unchallenged. We will explore all alternatives. The Coalition Against Water Charges provided the Subgroup on the Comprehensive Spending Review and Programme for Government; Rates Charges and Water Reform with a paper written by David Hall, which looks at more equitable alternatives — in particular, the payment of charges through the regional rates system.

Our message must be clear that the Assembly offers a way out of all this for those who will face an uncertain future because of water charges; those who are already in the cycle of poverty; those who will inevitably find themselves in that cycle in the not-too-distant future; and those whose jobs become more uncertain by the day as privatisation looms large in the background. By supporting the amendment, we will more than just reaffirm our opposition to water charges.

Last week the Subgroup on the Comprehensive Spending Review and Programme for Government; Rates Charges and Water Reform took evidence from a number of concerned groups. The evidence provided by the Anti-Poverty Network and the trade union representing Water Service workers shows that this is a real and present problem. We have the power to do something about it, and Sinn Féin wants to do something about it.

The Assembly should learn the lesson that initiatives should not be rushed into without full appraisal of all possible outcomes — a lesson that was learnt from the reinvestment and reform initiative. The Department for Regional Development — like consecutive direct rule Ministers in the past — has used the reinvestment and reform initiative as the rationale for the need to levy charges for water usage.

Sinn Féin accepts that there is a need for investment in water and sewerage infrastructure and believes that the blame for the lack of proper investment in that infrastructure over the years lies squarely with the British Government. With that in mind, Sinn Féin has argued for the required investment to come from a peace dividend, and that remains high on the party's agenda in its discussions with the British Government. My amendment points to some practical steps that can take us away from the disastrous consequences of water reform.

I am also aware that Mr Maginness — and in case there is any confusion I mean Alban Maginness rather than Martin McGuinness, who is also a Member of the Assembly — has also tabled an amendment. Sinn Féin will withdraw its amendment and support his amendment.

Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

Madam Speaker: I call Mr Alban Maginness to propose the second amendment published on the Marshalled List of Amendments.

Mr A Maginness: I beg to move amendment No 2: Leave out all after “Ireland” and insert

“, deplores the Secretary of State’s refusal to heed the Programme for Government Committee’s call for deferment of the Water and Sewerage Services Order, and believes that in the absence of a known Strategic Business Plan, Asset and Estate Management Plans, final licence details, adequate regulation or due consumer protection, the public can place no reliance on the figures which Ministers are indicating for future water charges and awaits a report from the Programme for Government Committee.”

I am grateful to Mr Cree and Mr Raymond McCartney for indicating that they will accept the amendment tabled in my name on behalf of the SDLP.

I hope that the House will reach the same broad consensus on the issue that has been reached in Committee. The Committee on the Preparation for Government and the Programme for Government Committee have made great progress in achieving political consensus on the issue.

The Government’s proposals, which Mr Cree ably outlined, are in effect a privateer’s charter. There is no doubt that the Government framed their proposals with a view to ultimately privatising the Water Service. With that privatisation will come a huge asset-stripping exercise by whoever buys or takes over the Water Service in whatever form it takes.

The assets at this moment are in the region of perhaps £5 billion. Those are rich pickings for anyone in the private sector who takes over the Water Service.

We have had the experience of Northern Ireland Electricity and the Northern Ireland International Airport being sold off. Will we ever come to our senses on selling off public assets, which are for the good of all of the community? They should not benefit private greed. They should be there to service the people, and if there are assets that are surplus to the requirements of the Water Service, or indeed any other public body, then they should be disposed of in a proper and transparent fashion, in the full interest of the people. The public interest must be served.

If Members look at the proposals that have been made, they can see the lack of transparency with, for example, the strategic business plan. There is no transparency with the licensing of the Go-co, the liabilities that that company may have, or the sustainability of that company when it goes into operation on 1 January 2007. There are disturbing reports of high levels of inefficiency in the Water Service. That inefficiency can create a situation in which the new company is unsustainable in the medium term. If it does become unsustainable in the medium term, what then happens to the company and the Water Service?

The Government’s lack of transparency has been deliberate and is to disguise their objective, which is ultimately to privatise the Water Service. We should be in the position of protecting the public ownership of the Water Service and the land and assets belonging to it.

Mr Robert McCartney: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: Yes.

Mr Robert McCartney: I am grateful to the Member for giving way. When the Member talks about sustainability in the short term, does he agree that it will always be sustainable, in so far as the public and the consumers will be used as a cash cow to ensure its sustainability?

Mr A Maginness: That is the very point that I would make to the House, and I am grateful to my learned Friend for raising it.

The reality is that the company itself is not going to be given the proper support that is necessary to ensure its sustainability. Despite the fact that successive British Governments have failed to invest in the Water Service, the Government have not presented the people of Northern Ireland with the necessary additional funding to invest in the Water Service. There has been no green dowry for the Water Service here. The present underinvestment is solely the responsibility of successive British Governments, and yet they are asking the people of Northern Ireland to pay for their neglect. That is the reality, and it is totally unacceptable to the people of Northern Ireland.

The Government’s contempt can be seen not just for the political consensus on this issue within this House and among the wider trade union movement, voluntary groups and the Consumer Council; their contempt for the legal process here could be seen when the Government Minister in the House of Commons rejected the recent ruling by Mr Justice Weatherup on the lack of consultation that the Government engaged in on these proposals.

Mr Justice Weatherup’s point was not a narrow technical one. It was based on good legal precedent — the Coghlin principles. Those principles demand that any public body should conscientiously enter into consultation with its consultees. In other words, one cannot just pretend to consult; there must be a conscious effort. The Government were in neglect of their heavy legal duty to do that. Mr Justice Weatherup made a point of legal substance, but the Government, in the House of Commons, rejected his findings. That is deplorable, but it is typical of this Government’s determination to treat the people of Northern Ireland with contempt. This issue is simply a further reflection of that contempt.

11.00 am

In the SDLP’s view, the utility regulator will not have sufficient power and the breadth that is necessary to regulate the water industry. Furthermore, the regulator will have no control over the disposal of assets, no matter what Lord Glentoran was assured of in the House of Lords. The reality is, as my Friend Mr Cree has said, that he was probably sold a pup. Lord Glentoran was given an assurance, which he accepted, and for which he will rue the day, because there is no additional power going to the regulator in relation to that assurance.

It is disgraceful that the Government have put a time limit of three years on the affordability tariff. What will disadvantaged and vulnerable people in the community do after that date, when the tariff runs out? How are they going to deal with the increased costs and charges that the water company will be under pressure to impose? The Government have shown gross irresponsibility on this matter.

There are many other concerns that one could address in relation to this woeful piece of legislation.

Madam Speaker: Mr Maginness, your time is up.

Lord Morrow: I congratulate Mr Cree on bringing this motion before the Assembly. It is an important issue that has united all sections of the community and all political parties. However, the Government are, sadly, not prepared to pay any heed to what any of the parties has to say, or, indeed, what the people of Northern Ireland and the trades unions have been saying about water reform.

It has been correctly said that this is a classic example of the Government doing the wrong thing at the wrong time. Any justification for the Government's intentions must surely have been removed by the High Court declaration of 22 November; but, alas, according to Lord Rooker, who spoke on the matter in the House of Lords on 8 December, it is not to be that way. It seems that nothing can change this Government's attitude on this important issue.

None of the Ministers who have steamrolled this through and who will implement it will have to live with their decisions. They will demand that the people of Northern Ireland pay up, but they will be far away when the bills drop through the letter boxes.

It is clear, from the positions taken by the political parties, that there is widespread opposition to the Government's proposals. Indeed, the DUP won a substantial mandate in the 2005 Westminster election on the basis of a manifesto commitment to oppose Government proposals on water charging. Therefore, there is no support in the Province for the Government's plans. Time and time again, the Government must get the message that they are a Government of imposition and do not rule with consent. The Government intend to impose these swingeing water charges, but, of course, they will not have to pay.

In this parliamentary session, water charging is one of the most, if not the most, important issues to affect Northern Ireland. Due to the process by which Northern Ireland legislation is dealt with at Westminster, the Order will receive scant attention in a Committee, with no possibility of amendment. For a Bill that has 308 clauses and 13 schedules, it is constitutionally outrageous that Government should give a mere hour to an hour and a half to debate something that will have such an impact on the people of Northern Ireland. The pre-legislative consultation process does not make up for that inadequacy.

Although there are significant accounting issues on whether water services in Northern Ireland should be self-financing, the evidence for, or detail of, water charges should, ultimately, be a matter for the people of Northern Ireland to determine. There are spending implications for Northern Ireland if we do not proceed with water charges, but those choices should be left to the people of Northern Ireland.

In addition to the general considerations that I have set out, there are several specific objections to the Government's proposals.

First, they do not take account of the contribution already made to the provision of water services. Although not specifically related to the detail of the Order, no account has been taken of the contribution that is already made towards the cost of water services through the regional rate. Inevitably, that will increase the average water charge and make the introduction of water charges more unaccountable than would otherwise have been the case. It is one thing to pay for water; it is quite another to pay for it twice.

Secondly, the Government were disingenuous with their justification for water charges. The Government have sought to justify water charges on the basis that they were addressing the Water Framework Directive. However, they then devised a system that did not meet the requirements of the directive.

Thirdly, the Government have used water charges as a mechanism, and as a cover, to increase massively the level of local taxation in Northern Ireland. At the same time, there has been a significant increase in the regional rate, and a new rating valuation system. Although there may be justification for a separate charging mechanism for water services, that does not mean that there must be a significant increase in the overall tax burden.

Fourthly, the Government have reneged on proposals in relation to the reinvestment and reform initiative (RRI). As originally proposed, water charges were to be regarded as qualifying revenue when considering the capacity to avail of the borrowing power under RRI. Since then, the Government have changed the rules, and, as a result, there is no advantage, in terms of borrowing, to water charges. When compared with the overall Northern Ireland budget, water charges make up a very small percentage of local spending. The significant additional burden of water charges on the householder makes little difference to what can be done about spending.

The DUP continues to oppose the privatisation of the Water Service in Northern Ireland and believes that any future change to the status of the Water Service should come about only in circumstances where there is widespread support in Northern Ireland.

It is unreasonable to expect householders to pay the cost of road drainage. That should be met from other sources.

My party believes that the option of voluntary metering, with appropriate consideration given to infrastructure costs, should be available for all Northern Ireland consumers. We reject both the requirement for universal metering, as it is too costly, and no metering, as it is too unfair. The capital value of a home is too inaccurate a measure of the householder's ability to pay for it to be used as the only method of assessing water charges. The argument that only the better-off would opt for metering could be negated by setting the fixed cost element at an appropriate level. Ultimately, wider availability of water metering will promote greater conservation of water. In the Government's proposals metering is made available to certain groups, and we welcome that, but we do not believe that it should be limited to those groups. It is not clear that vulnerable groups will benefit from metering. Therefore, the alternative of metering, as presently proposed, may prove to be an empty gesture.

Over the past few decades, Northern Ireland has faced greater challenges than any other part of the United Kingdom, and Northern Ireland is less able to pay water charges than any other region. In those circumstances, my party believes that the average water charge in Northern Ireland should be no higher than the average paid in England and Wales, with a maximum charge fixed at that level. That should produce an appropriate balance: Northern Ireland's householders would be required to make a real contribution towards the cost of water, but not be punished for a lack of Government investment. The Government's proposal to protect vulnerable groups is one of the more welcome aspects of the package, but we believe that such protection should not be temporary. The DUP will continue to oppose water charges, and we support the motion.

Mr Neeson: I welcome the debate and thank Mr Cree for bringing the motion before the Assembly. The Alliance Party will support the amendment proposed by Mr Alban Maginness, which brings the motion up to date.

No issue has created more public concern in Northern Ireland than that of water charges, not only among the elderly, but among householders generally. The Government have misled the community by claiming that we do not pay for water at present. We are paying water charges through the regional rate. If the Government introduce water charges next year, will the regional rate be reduced? That needs to be addressed.

We all know that there have been problems with the Water Service. In the twenty-first century, it is unacceptable that raw sewage is pumped into Belfast Lough at Blackhead. There are many other shortcomings in the service. Those must be addressed, and EU directives on water must be met. How has this situation arisen? The simple answer is underfunding by direct-rule Ministers over the years.

It is easy to point the finger at direct-rule Ministers, but Northern Ireland was coming through 35 years of turbulent Troubles, during which budgets had to be redirected away from the Department of the Environment and the Water Service. The legacy of the Troubles cannot be ignored. In the Subgroup on the Economic Challenges facing Northern Ireland, the so-called peace dividend was discussed. One of the issues put before the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Gordon Brown, when he met a delegation of Members, was the question of delaying implementation of the legislation until the Assembly was up and running.

There was a negative response from the Chancellor; he said that if we were prepared to sell off the assets of the Water Service, we could keep the money. His bottom line was that if we sold off the Bog Meadows, we could keep the money.

11.15 am

A lot of interest groups have voiced their opposition to the introduction of water charges. I congratulate the General Consumer Council for Northern Ireland for its work. That organisation went to court and got a ruling in relation to the haste with which the Government carried out its so-called consultation.

As other Members have said, there is a need for transparency and for the publication of the strategic business plan.

The legislation is deeply flawed. Once again, there is the issue of the people who will, unfortunately, get into debt because of water rates. A class society is being created — a society in which those less well off will have to pay their debts sooner than those who are better off. Many other issues also show that the legislation is deeply flawed.

We are witnessing the introduction of the privatisation of the Water Service through the back door. A few years ago, I wrote to Mr John Spellar — he became a Minister in the Northern Ireland Office — voicing my concerns about the possibility of water privatisation being introduced to Northern Ireland. Mr Spellar wrote back saying:

"I am fully aware of the very strong opposition to water privatization across the board in Northern Ireland."

He went on to say:

"Apart from privatization itself, I am also concerned at proposals to introduce legislation through the back door, particularly on water metering."

To the Members of the House I put the question: can we trust this Government? The answer is no.

Mr Robert McCartney: I would not buy a new car from them, let alone a second-hand one.

Mr Neeson: That is true.

I wish to express my disappointment with the stance taken by Lord Glentoran in the House of Lords last week. Normally, Robin would be very supportive of the interests of the people in Northern Ireland.

We have to put the water charging being proposed by the Government into perspective. It is not a utility tax; it is a property tax, because the charges are being based on the value of people's homes.

I must question the relevance of the debate in the House today and the other debates that have taken place. The people who should be dealing with this issue are those who were elected by the people in Northern Ireland. Sinn Féin and the DUP may bleat about the question of water charges, but the timetable for deliverance is there. The question is: can the DUP and Sinn Féin deliver within that timetable?

Mr Robert McCartney: I support the motion and the amendment in the name of Mr Maginness. There is no support for these proposals from the consumers, the unions or, indeed, the parties. Today, I have listened to speeches that would have done credit, both in material and presentation, to another place. However, I regret to say that those considerations, so ably put, have come rather late in the day. Although Members are concerned with the future, we must examine the past: it was a devolved Assembly that put forward the proposals, albeit in embryo form, for the hikes in the regional rate and the imposition of water charges that are being suffered.

In May and June 2002, the then Minister of Finance and Personnel, Seán Farren, talked in the Chamber about future financial provision and fresh streams of revenue. I questioned his use of such euphemisms to describe what he meant when clearly the only streams of revenue available to him were an increase in the regional rate and the imposition of water charges. All of that goes back to the failure of the parties who signed the Belfast Agreement to spend adequate time on the financial considerations of accepting devolution. According to the former Secretary of State, and effective political Minister in 1998, Paul Murphy, the parties spent exactly 15 minutes discussing those considerations. At that time, it was known that there was a black hole of capital underinvestment of some £10 billion, to which I repeatedly drew attention in the House. In May 2002, again in November 2004, and most recently in July 2006, I wrote major articles for the 'Belfast Telegraph' outlining what was in prospect for the regional rate and water charges.

Why were the parties in the Assembly so tardy in responding to what would clearly be a fundamental issue? The reason is plain: the parties had, in large part, been responsible for what is now being imposed. The constant defence of Northern Ireland Office (NIO) Ministers, in relation both to the imposition of water charges and the hike in the regional rate, has been that they are merely putting into practice what the devolved Assembly contemplated and intended to do.

As Lord Morrow quite properly said, it is sad that the Government are not prepared to listen. Members must always remember that a devolved Assembly, if restored, can only do what is possible within the financial limitations that the British Treasury will always impose upon it. Minister Hanson made that point when he said that if devolution were restored and the Assembly decided not to impose water charges, it would have to find from other sources the £300 million that water charges would have raised.

The Secretary of State has pointed out that if there were any capping of regional rates or any other amelioration of the rates burden, the money to allow for that would have to be found from within the financial resources of Northern Ireland.

It is all very well to talk about what a devolved Assembly would do and how it would alleviate these problems, but it will be possible for it to do that only by extracting money from other sources. Whether the cake is divided up by a NIO Minister or by some resurrected Assembly, it is the same cake. The only function that the Assembly, if resurrected, will have is to make provision for different slices for different public needs. However, the amount of money in the pot will never increase. When Members talk about what can be done, what will be deferred, or how they will improve the lot of the consumer, they must bear in mind that there is no magic touchstone that will, if the Assembly is restored, provide a panacea for our economic ills.

I wish to comment on the parties who attended the St Andrews talks and variously signed up for a road map, a route map, a new agreement, or, as some people claim, a review of the Belfast Agreement. Whatever they signed up to, it appears — according to the Secretary of State in Parliament — that the UKUP, and myself in particular, are the only people who are not crying "hallelujah" about it.

What did those parties who were for the St Andrews Agreement bring back to address our economic problems? Absolutely nothing, other than an airy-fairy promise of an economic package, which those two fraudsters outside No 11 Downing Street represented as £50 billion over the next 17 years. When that package was examined, it had not a single ha'penny of new money in it.

Absolutely nothing was brought back from St Andrews. The capping of rates was hailed as a triumph, but it will help only 3,000 households in Northern Ireland and will have absolutely no bearing on the vast bulk of the people who face huge rises in regional rates. Another claim is that something has been done about water charges. In fact, absolutely nothing has been done. The £300 million will still have to be found.

Will the Assembly cut back on education programmes? Will it cut back on money that is necessary for health, or for the environment? Where will the Assembly find the money to distribute largesse in the form of abolishing water charges? Where will it find the money to do something about the rates system? When the Assembly was in charge, until October 2002, it did not find any means within the limitations imposed on it by the British Treasury to do anything other than consider the imposition of water charges and carry out a fundamental review of rates on a capital-value basis. It is time for everyone to be realistic, and not simply to stand and protest, if that protest is to be a futile and meaningless one.

Whether Members belong to the DUP, Sinn Féin, the SDLP or the Ulster Unionists, they cannot continue to con the people that they will wave some type of magic wand and usher in a golden age when devolution is restored. They will still face the same problems that were faced by the Northern Ireland Assembly when it was up and running.

11.30 am

While it gives me no pleasure to point out the realities, it gives me an increased sense of well-being to realise, from the quality of the speeches that have been delivered, that there is a new awareness. It is an awful pity, therefore, that, in April 1998, Members did not possess such awareness when the terms of the restored, devolved Assembly were agreed.

Mr Shannon: At the beginning of the debate on this issue, a press release issued by the Department for Regional Development on behalf of David Cairns stated that:

“Legislation which will shortly go to Parliament will provide a framework to improve drinking water, better protect the environment, enhance the ability to sustain economic growth, improve essential services and introduce new protections for customers.”

That is exactly what Northern Ireland needs: the rest of the UK has enjoyed such services for years, while, because of the Troubles, we have been denied them.

David Cairns pointed out just what we have been missing out on in Northern Ireland. No one here will question that, except, perhaps, the point about drinking water: if we need improved drinking water, what quality of water have we been drinking for the past 30 years?

Undoubtedly, this inefficient and unstable system must be reformed. The problems that Members of the Assembly — and, indeed, the people of the Province — have are the manner in which the reform is being carried out and the question of who will foot the bill. In many cases, how will people be able to afford the hike on top of their rising rates, heating, fuel and food bills? David Cairns has issued assurances that over a quarter of customers will receive automatic assistance with their bills, but that begs the question: what will the remaining 75% be made to sacrifice to enable them to pay their water charges?

Not satisfied with the rates hike, which means that households will have to strain to pay more based on the capital value of their homes, the Government are further burdening families and small businesses with water charges, which are also unfairly distributed. An example of this unfair distribution would be a four-bedroom home, housing five children and their parents. Under the proposed system, the parents would pay a higher bill proportionate to the amount of drinking, washing and bathing water that they need. Ten years later, however, when the children have flown the nest, leaving their parents alone in the house, is it fair that they must continue to pay the inflated charge based on the number of taps in the house? Should those parents continue to face the high charge in spite of the fact that they will use no more water in their four-bedroom home than they would in a one-bedroom flat? Is that the fairness and equality that have been mentioned? Is it any wonder that my constituents are asking for meters to be installed to ensure that they do not pay extra for their water? This is simply unacceptable.

Another fact is that although a couple could have paid £80,000 for their house 15 years ago, that house could now be worth £200,000. That couple's income may not have risen at the same rate, yet they are being asked to pay a huge amount in charges. For how much longer will the middle classes who just “get by” have to foot the bills of the inadequacies and inefficiencies of Government practice?

As it stands, the strategic business plan for Northern Ireland Water Ltd does not set out a sustainable future. It seems that, for the objectives of the plan to be fulfilled, there will have to be further price hikes, more burdens placed on the average households and an endless accrual of mounting charges. That approach does not seem to pass the consumer-fairness test. The capital value of a person's property has no link to his or her ability to pay the proposed water charges or to be able to keep up with those payments in the event of an illness or retirement. It is a grave mistake to assume that a large house means a large income, and the general public cannot be expected to underwrite that mistake.

As the findings of the judicial review initiated by the Consumer Council show, the legislation has been rushed through, with the result that we have been handed an unfair, messy, piecemeal effort that will need much clarification and tidying before it can go any further. Despite assurances from Government officials, it is clear that there is less accountability than there is with energy provision or other products. Why is this? Is this yet another attempt to push through unsatisfactory legislation that benefits no one but the Treasury and Government accountants? Is this another abuse of direct rule to punish us for not jumping through Labour hoops?

For three years, Northern Ireland consumers will have the cushion of the Government's pledge to pay the £30 million affordability tariff, but what will happen after that? Will consumers pay? If the Government want to ensure fairness and equality, confirming that the majority of consumers will not be forced to pay for the minority who cannot afford the charges, they should offer us a positive assurance that they will continue to provide the subsidy along with other alternatives.

As the Consumer Council has clearly and concisely stated, that can be achieved by making a bond to continue to pay the affordability tariff, by continuing price pegging beyond the current three-year promise and by requiring the Go-co to deliver a business plan that will ensure sustainability and guarantee protection and the best possible service provision to the people who foot the bill. Surely that is not too much to ask for — indeed, we are entitled to that.

The proposed system does nothing more than grab at money, with no thought given to the future and how those targets can be reached and sustained. Over the next 20 years, an additional £3 billion will be needed for the new system, which, on top of other bills, equates to some £10,000 per household. That does not take inflation in the housing market into account, which is another hidden burden, meaning that more families are on the breadline. That is no exaggeration, given that over 350,000 people are officially on the poverty line in Ulster, with 24% unable to pay for adequate heating. The majority of people have no savings and are, according to the Simon Community, only two pay cheques away from homelessness. The added burden of water charges can only push more people towards the poverty threshold. There are over 200,000 vulnerable households in the Province, and those who are just above this level cannot afford to maintain this load, and they should not be expected to.

There are worries not only about the costing and financing of the proposed legislation but about accountability, which I mentioned earlier. The £1 billion loss due to electricity privatisation and the Thames Water plc increase have been cited as clear examples of what happens when regulators are not accountable; something must be done about that. The question rightly arises: does the legislation provide the framework of accountability to stop tests that have been failed in the past from failing yet again? This rushed job has not provided that assurance. When will the assets totalling £5.6 billion be available to sell? Who will regulate the regulators? Most importantly, to whom will the regulators be held accountable? Those are issues that must be clarified; without that clarification, the legislation should not, and cannot, go forward.

I have highlighted only a couple issues, because I know, given that the legislation is a quagmire, that other Members will want to dwell on other areas. There are many other issues such as bad debt, price pegging and the capital backlog. However, even the few points that have been made are enough to illustrate how ill conceived this legislation is. Consequently, I support the motion for an immediate in-depth review of the legislation by the Minister with responsibility for regional development. David Cairns stated that, after the devolved Administration was put in place:

“It will then be for local ministers to decide how best the policy might be developed to provide protection for those who need it most.”

I believe that that is impossible. It not only indicates that the Minister is aware of the fact that Members of the Assembly should create a policy that benefits the people of Northern Ireland, but it clearly shows that the legislation, in its current form, does not protect the people of the Province and is being used as another prod in the direction of devolution at the cost of our constituents.

This cannot and will not be tolerated by members of the DUP or Members of the Assembly. We will not allow ourselves to be held over a barrel at the risk, and to the detriment, of Northern Ireland. We have long been neglected in this area, and the legislation does not include the necessary amendments; it cannot continue any further. If we wait until devolution to amend the legislation, that will be like shutting the gate after the horses have bolted. The legislation is useless, intolerable, unacceptable and seriously undemocratic.

Madam Speaker: Members, Ms Kathy Stanton will now make her maiden speech. As Members know, it is the convention that such a speech be made without interruption.

Ms Stanton: Go raibh míle maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

I support amendment No 2, proposed by Alban Maginness. Under these water reform proposals, water affordability will be out of the reach of many households in the North. This is not a green or an orange issue but an issue that unites all of us. If the legislation is not deferred, it will have drastic and long-term effects on all people, but especially on the 150,000 families that will be driven further into poverty and debt. Income will not be enough to meet the ever-increasing privatisation of public services. If the proposed legislation is adopted in its present form, an income at or above the relative income poverty line will not be enough.

The Northern Ireland Anti-Poverty Network (NIAPN) has estimated that roughly 37% of the average non-itemised rates bill goes towards water and sewerage provision. The Minister's proposed additional water charges will be based on the value of a person's house. That is deeply worrying for low-income households, as well as for those on benefits or in receipt of a pension. We have already been paying for our water, yet we are now being asked to foot the bill for the British Government's failure to invest in our infrastructure.

The value of people's homes has risen dramatically over the years. It has been quoted that house prices are rising £100 a day. People's incomes, however, have not increased in line with that rise in order to meet what the Government propose. On average in the North, where there is a higher cost of living, people earn 20% less than they do in Britain. Water charges will simply push people further into poverty and debt. We already have worse poverty figures than anywhere else in Britain or Ireland.

My constituency of North Belfast and that of West Belfast contain 17 of the 20 most deprived super-output areas (SOAs) in Belfast, yet those two constituencies receive a mere 8.3% of total inward-investment assistance between them. The groups and communities that are least able to pay will be affected most by the proposed charges. As I said earlier, the legislation will drive 150,000 families deeper into poverty and debt.

It is ironic that the British Secretary of State published an anti-poverty strategy last month, yet the Minister with responsibility for regional development is simultaneously proposing charges that will significantly increase poverty levels. Where is the logic in that? To introduce water charges contradicts the latest DRD report, which reaffirmed the Government's commitment to effective protection for those on low incomes.

The North of Ireland has experienced failed policies from England that have resulted in lower wage levels and in higher levels of family and child poverty, of inequality, of disability and of illness. Save the Children estimates that one in three children in the North live in poverty. Fuel poverty is already a major issue, but the British Government's plans to introduce water charges could lead to many homes in socially deprived areas also having to come to terms with water poverty. NIAPN is on record as saying that to privatise water and sewerage services will, in effect, privatise all of the North's households. Tenants will face growing charges at a time when some private landlords are already bleeding their tenants dry.

Any private company's priority is to represent the interests of its shareholders in order to ensure that they get a return on their investment. The only way in which to guarantee that they get that return is to continue to increase charges. We only have to look at past mistakes — namely, the privatisation of NIE — to learn from them. The people actually pay the levy that NIE says that it contributes to deprived communities. The result is that the poorest in society pay the most, and even then they are only paying for basic needs.

The Transitional Assembly should ensure that people are put before profit, and we should not allow the British Government to blame the people for not having adequate incomes, for being unemployed or for having to live in poverty. It is the Government's responsibility to protect the rights of citizens, and water provision is one of the most basic rights. Statistical evidence has shown that unemployment has dropped yet poverty has increased. Inadequate social-welfare payments are much more a cause of poverty than unemployment.

Therefore, once again, we see with this latest piece of legislation the dominant theory prevailing — we have been set up to fail the people. Will the poor always be with us? Put simply, the answer is yes, but the numbers of poor will also be increasing. Brigid Reynolds, in her paper 'Mind the Gap between Rich and Poor', asked a conference that I attended last year how we can expect our economic and social infrastructure to catch up with that of the rest of Europe if we gather less taxation income than it takes to run the infrastructure that is already in place in most of those European countries.

We will never bridge the social and economic infrastructure gaps unless we invest a larger share of our income in building a fairer and more successful Ireland.

Sinn Féin supports the role of trades unions, Water Service employees, anti-poverty groups and the Consumer Council in their bid to ensure that the privatisation agenda is reversed.

Mr McGimpsey: I support the motion.

Like most Members, I believe that water is not an economic commodity to be charged for; it is a human right. The debate is not about how much water people use; it is about how much water they need. We have a water system for good reason: 100 years ago, diseases such as cholera and typhoid were rife in Belfast, and the solution was to ensure the proper disposal of waste through a sewerage system and to ensure the delivery of clean drinking water to each household.

Even in the halcyon days of free enterprise and business in Britain, it was recognised that water services could not be provided privately at a profit. Therefore, it was public expenditure that provided the sewerage system, built reservoirs to store water and provided a system to deliver clean drinking water to each house. That is the system that we inherited. It was reinvested in over the years religiously and, over the years, everybody in Northern Ireland paid for water through the regional rate. We continue to pay for our water to this day, so the assertion that we do not is simply untrue. There is, of course, a problem with crumbling infrastructure.

When the Executive took over in November 1999, they discovered that the infrastructural deficit in Northern Ireland was approximately £15 billion. That was no surprise. Over 30 years, the cost of the war was around £500 million each year. Although successive direct-rule Ministers said that the money was provided over and above normal revenue and would not affect normal provision of services; it did. In fact, that £500 million a year, which was used to pay for all the burned buildings and buses, for the agony and misery and for the Army and police, came from normal funding revenue. Funding for the Water Service was no different.

The Executive took over the need for massive investment in hospitals, roads and public transport, and some of the results of that investment can be seen today. The Water Service was an area under consideration. However, it is not true that the Executive intended to privatise water services or to start charging for water. Certainly, the then Minister, Peter Robinson, proposed some options, but that was as far as it got.

It is true to say that, historically, a green dowry was provided for water provision in Northern Ireland, as was also provided for England, Scotland and Wales. Central Government made massive investments in the water industries in England, Scotland and Wales in order to fatten them up for privatisation. Water services in England and Wales were privatised, but Scotland did not follow suit. However, no similar investment was made into Northern Ireland's green dowry. That is why there is such a huge problem now.

Mr Robert McCartney carefully analysed our problems, he did not analyse the solution so carefully. We are clearly facing a privatisation agenda. The steps taken so far make sense only if they contribute to selling off the water industry. Therefore, a sustainable level of charges per household must be created. Alban Maginness talked about sustainability, which is one of the problems in the Water Service's business plan. Currently, each household pays around £130 per annum for water through regional rates; under charging, that figure will treble to around £400 per annum, and that is just the start. Those charges will create the cash flow and funding for the new company.

In the legislation, I notice that Peter Hain has christened the new company a "Go-co". That is an interesting name. As we know, the Go-co will have a captive market for providing our water. Water is an absolute essential — we cannot do without it. People will have to pay pretty much what the new company dictates. I have no confidence in regulators. I have seen how the electricity and gas regulator operates, and he does not do a particularly brilliant job for the consumer.

The water and sewerage service is a public asset; it has worked as a public asset for 100 years — there is no need to sell it. Instead, the need is for investment, which we must seek ways to secure. The last thing that we should do is to sell our water utilities. There is no need to sell that public asset, and members of the public do not want it to be sold. In every consultation that has been carried out on this matter, the public tell us not to sell water utilities, but that is being done, over their heads. That is pretty much what one gets under direct rule, and that demonstrates the need for devolution.

If we have a devolved Assembly, this issue certainly will not be any easier to address, and the situation may not be much better, but at least we will be managing the matter ourselves. At least we will deal with this matter with regard to the priorities that must be considered, rather than have the current situation whereby we go annually to London with a begging bowl for money.

Northern Ireland's financial situation — not least as a result of 30 years of war — leaves us with a gross Treasury spend of about £16 billion and a tax take of about £10 billion. There is a gap of about £6 billion, and the Treasury and the Government are now telling us that, with the war over, we must be treated in the same way as every other part of the United Kingdom and that we will have to pay a bit more. One of the key ways to address that problem is to increase our tax yield through more business activity, more enterprise, etc. That would allow us to manage our economy well and to pay our bills better. However, Northern Ireland is by no means the only region of the UK that is in the predicament of deficit funding.

The way forward is to manage those matters ourselves through devolution. There are ways and means of addressing the problems. For example, such has been the level of underinvestment that, currently, about 50% of all pumped water is wasted through leaks in pipes. That demonstrates how badly the water system has been maintained over the years. There has been a substantial number of new housing developments, all of which have new water systems installed. It will take years to do the necessary work to address the problems with the old systems that were originally installed.

The last thing that we should do is to sell up and follow the privatisation agenda. When Mo Mowlam was Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, she promised on behalf of the Labour Government that there would be no privatisation of the water industry. We must look hard at how we can force the British Government to honour at least one of their promises, and that promise in particular.

Ms Ritchie: Madam Speaker, I am afraid that I have a cold, so I apologise if my diction is not altogether clear. On behalf of the SDLP, I thank Mr Cree for his timely motion. I also thank the parties that have supported the amendment standing in the name of my colleague Mr Alban Maginness.

Successive British Governments have defied collective political and community opinion in Northern Ireland, which voiced clear opposition to new separate charges for water and sewerage. The current Government are no different and have defied the collective political will of this Assembly, the reasoned protestations of the Committee on the Preparation for Government for the deferment of the legislation, and the legal judgement of Mr Justice Weatherup, which clearly demonstrated that the Department for Regional Development had not carried out an adequate and proper consultation with the major stakeholders in respect of the draft legislation. All of that happened in spite of the fact that the Secretary of State and his coterie of Ministers insist that they listen to the collective will of this Assembly, take on board our views and opinions and take on board the views of the wider public, who have voiced opposition to such charges. However, none of that opposition was listened to.

Notwithstanding all of that opposition, water and sewerage charges will be introduced from 1 April 2007. Until we have restoration of our political institutions and a major change in Treasury policy on the management, allocation, and distribution of public finances, our ability to do much about that is gravely restricted.

However, we can lobby strenuously to ensure that the Go-co remains in public ownership; that the necessary regulatory and consumer-protection safeguards are put in place; that the full implications of the draft licence for the operation of the company are made available; that the strategic business plan is made available; and that the privatisation of the public's assets is resisted at every turn and opportunity.

A cursory look at the Government's propaganda leaflet of a few weeks ago tells us why we need to pay for water and sewerage services. We all know that it costs money to make water safe to drink and to remove sewage and waste water from our homes, but the leaflet deliberately fails to mention that we already pay for the provision of those services. The Government did not take sufficient steps, over the long period of direct rule, to improve the infrastructure significantly, and now they want the people of Northern Ireland to pay for the infrastructure deficit that, through their serious neglect, they allowed to occur.

Water charges will affect all households, irrespective of income. We will all pay water charges. The Government have stubbornly refused to take on board the fact that incomes in Northern Ireland do not compare with those in many regions of Great Britain. We pay more for food, electricity, insurance, clothing and energy, yet we earn much less. The Government have obdurately failed to extend the affordability tariff beyond 2010. What will happen to those most in need and those who cannot afford to pay? Water, as has already been said, is essential to our very existence. Water poverty could become a reality for some individuals, like fuel poverty has become, so measures must be taken to address the issue.

Furthermore, the Government have failed to acknowledge that many people who live on or just above the breadline, or who are above the threshold for benefit eligibility, will be forced into poverty through having to pay new, separate water and sewerage charges, combined with a new rates valuation under the review of rating policy. We know that the Government, in their quest to set up a self-financing company, sought to use a billing and debt-recovery mechanism that would have stigmatised people — so much for egalitarian principles.

The draft legislation is now in place. It does not set out a system that is fair, affordable or sustainable. Consumers are expected to pick up the bill for past under-investment and to pay charges based on the capital value of their homes. Political solutions are required in order to address the situation, and we must provide the lead.

There are many questions that the Government should answer. Why did the direct-rule Administration exceed their duties as a temporary caretaker? Why are the Government usurping the role of a future Executive and tying that Executive's hands for decades to come? Why are there insufficient resources in health and education? Where is the money that we are owed for years of underfunding of our roads, railways and water infrastructure? Where is the money that was specifically given for improvements in our water infrastructure? How much of that was diverted into security? Why are we being forced to pay for direct-rule neglect? Why did the Government recruit consultants, at a cost of over £18 million, to prepare for water reform or privatisation? That money could have been invested in the upgrading of the beleaguered infrastructure. Why did the Government insist on weak regulation in their legislation to govern the work of the regulator? What kind of Government classifies people as "rock bottom"? What an insulting remark to make about many vulnerable, disadvantaged people in Northern Ireland. The British Government should be ashamed of themselves.

Mr Dawson: Does the Member agree that another fundamental question that must be asked is why the Government increased the capital value of the company that is to become the Go-co so that water charges would be increased beyond what is necessary?

Ms Ritchie: I thank the Member for that information — I agree with him. It is all about preparing the Go-co for privatisation, when it will sell off the assets that belong to the people of Northern Ireland. My constituency of South Down supplies a large proportion of the water that the city of Belfast uses. There is no way that we will stand by and allow the public assets of Spelga Dam and the Silent Valley to be sold in order that the fat cats can earn money at our expense. That should not and will not happen. We must resist it.

12.00 noon

Much could be said in this debate. However, as a priority, questions must be asked about the legislation that has already been passed, and much must be done by the Programme for Government Committee. Basically, are the capital value and the standing charge the fairest premise for water charging; is the Treasury and Secretary of State's financial deal the best one for water customers; is the Go-co the best model; is self-financing the best system; and is the charge fair, affordable and sustainable?

The draft strategic, estate and management plans must be published. How on earth was legislation enacted before those plans were published and before there was any consultation on them? The reason is that people are trying to bring in privatisation by the back door.

The full impact of the governance and the licence must be revealed — what is in public ownership must remain in that domain. Full authorisation and enforcement must pass to the regulator next April, and there must be no exceptions. Concrete arrangements must be put in place to make it a duty for the Go-co to consult the Consumer Council on all matters that impact on consumers. Above all, we need a first-class water and sewerage infrastructure, which should have been provided over a long period of time — the local community should not have been forced to pay for it. Notwithstanding that, we must ensure that rigorous and robust measures are put in place to protect the people whom we represent and all consumers in Northern Ireland.

Lest we forget, the majority of people in Northern Ireland have indicated their opposition to the imposition of new water and sewerage charges. We should not forget also that there will be two charges — a water charge and a sewerage charge — and that will particularly affect city and town dwellers.

Mr McCarthy: I support the proposal and amendment No 2. Members may recall that, a few years ago, the cross-channel Minister Lord Dubs told us that an increase of £70 per household per year would make up the necessary water and sewerage investment required for Northern Ireland for years to come. That amount was included in the regional rate at that time.

That same Labour Government are now ignoring that investment and are screwing householders in Northern Ireland with a new, separate, diabolical and disgusting charge for water and sewerage. I call it a tap tax. This is the biggest con perpetrated by any Government. It is deceitful and fraudulent. The Labour Government are being downright dishonest, and they should hang their heads in shame. Of course, the Government are not alone as regards this shameful new tap tax; some blame must be placed on the Executive in the previous Northern Ireland Assembly.

It all started when Tony Blair and Gordon Brown landed at Belfast City Airport with a bag full of money and were greeted by the then First Minister and Deputy First Minister. The Alliance Party was sceptical of that bag of goodies and said so. We knew that the money was not a gift and would have to be repaid by the people of Northern Ireland. The chickens have now come home to roost at a dreadful cost. I recall a Member of the same Executive coming out of a posh hotel in Belfast and telling us that if we wanted services we would have to pay for them.

I give credit to David Trimble, who was First Minister at the time, for his efforts in the House of Lords last week. After having given their commitment to support Mr Trimble, the Tory Lords, including some from Northern Ireland, stabbed him in the back.

As I said, tap taxes are only a front for handing control of the water and sewerage services to the highest bidder. That may not happen today, but it will happen in the days ahead. Every Member who has spoken in the debate has stated that that is a process of privatisation. That process is wrong.

Some local people are saying that this Assembly is being delayed deliberately from getting back to work so that the London Government can introduce all those iniquitous schemes that will cost our constituents dearly. At the same time, our local, new Executive can wash their hands of those schemes and absolve themselves of any blame for draining constituents of their hard-earned cash.

We have any God's amount of water in this country — some people say that we have far too much. Of course, nothing comes free; we all pay income tax, rates and so forth each week and month. The solution is to simply manage resources better. As I said earlier, we pay already for water and sewerage services through the regional rate. That point has been made repeatedly in the Chamber this morning. We should check out Lord Dubs's efforts a few years ago. Why have we been treated differently from people in Scotland? They got a green dowry to put their services in order, and the rate was increased slightly so that those who earn can pay their way, and, where necessary, other less-fortunate people get an allowance.

This new charge is nothing short of a tap tax. The Government have been deceitful, fraudulent and hypocritical in asking people to pay on the value of their homes. Conservation of water is not mentioned at all, despite the fact that the European directive was supposed to be about conserving water.

I refer to a conversation that Shaun Woodward had some time ago with a meeting of cross-party Assembly Members. In that meeting, he threw down the gauntlet and told them that they will have the powers to repeal those charges. I challenge those parties to make that an election pledge: as soon as a working Executive is established, their first priority should be the repeal of the iniquitous tap tax.

Mr A Maginness: I shall be brief. I want to thank Assembly colleagues for supporting the amendment. In particular, I thank Mr Cree for supporting it, and I also thank Sinn Féin's Raymond McCartney for his support.

The amendment reflects a general consensus that exists in the House. That consensus opposes the legislation, which has been passed in Westminster. It also supports in great measure the community's opposition to privatisation, and it also gives positive support to the disadvantaged, who will find that any water charging is a heavy burden. It is important that a strong and clear message goes from this House to the people of Northern Ireland and, particularly, to the British Government that a clear consensus across all the parties — and across the community — rejects the Government's proposals and legislation. That consensus also rejects the introduction in the near future of water charging.

Mr Raymond McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

When I spoke earlier, I said that our party would withdraw the amendment. Mr Cree's motion and Mr Maginness's amendment cover the points that we would have wished to make.

It is good to see cross-party support in total opposition to water charges. Members have made the point about the impact that those charges will have on poverty levels in the North of Ireland. We all realise that there is a great fear of privatisation. The Department for Regional Development's consultation process has been exposed — by the General Consumer Council, in particular. It is to be supported in its efforts to ensure that any future consultation process will be efficient and effective.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment. Go raibh maith agat.

Amendment No 1, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr Beggs: I am pleased that Leslie Cree has brought this motion to the Floor of the House today, and I thank Alban Maginness for his constructive amendment. It is also helpful that there is a degree of cross-community support gathering around the issue of water charges. If we speak as a united group, we have a much better chance of influencing change.

Under direct rule, our water services have suffered from 30 years of underinvestment. Northern Ireland Office Ministers frequently diverted funds towards security budgets. That was perhaps most evident with regard to in-year allocations. Instead of money being made available for water services, schools or the Health Service, it was moved to overextended security budgets. In England and Wales, the upgrade of water services was largely funded by the green dowry. Although Northern Ireland received £50 million a year for that purpose, that money disappeared into the block grant; it was not directed to the Water Service. Consequently, there has been a lack of investment, and it is unfair that Northern Ireland consumers should be expected to pick up the tab at this stage.

My colleague Leslie Cree mentioned a number of unsatisfactory issues with regard to the draft Water and Sewerage Services (Northern Ireland) Order 2006, in particular the lack of clarity and the governance arrangements, which makes the amendment in the name of Alban Maginness most appropriate. It refers to the absence of a strategic business plan, of asset and estate management plans, and of final licence details. Why have those been kept secret?

There is inadequate regulation, particularly in the first number of years. That is especially relevant with regard to the sale of any surplus assets that the new Go-co will determine. Of even greater concern is the fact that Lord Rooker, in the course of the debate in the House of Lords, indicated that, in the first three years, there will be a general authorisation for those sales. Why has the regulator's role been limited during that period?

The General Consumer Council for Northern Ireland, which has campaigned actively on behalf of consumers, has highlighted that it does not agree with OFREG's assertion that it has the necessary consumer protection powers in law, particularly in the crucial three years leading up to 2010, when customers will be expected to take on the full cost of water and sewerage services.

Interestingly, in responding, I suspect, to that comment, the regulator, Mr Osborne, stated in an email that emerged during the course of the General Consumer Council's action in the High Court:

"If DRD think I am happy, they are deaf and stupid. Will step up the volume further next week. Perhaps they are not truthful."

There are a number of issues that give the public serious cause for concern in the light of comments from the General Consumer Council and from the regulator. I suspect that Mr Osborne would rather that some of those comments had not been made public. However, there is deep concern in the community about the Government's proposals.

There are two other aspects of the Go-co, which was opposed by the Ulster Unionist Party, that I wish to address. A Go-co is defined as a company that is initially publicly owned but destined to be privatised. In England and Wales, water companies have a commercial value, and that is demonstrated in the stock market. That is why they often change hands in takeovers.

Initially, the stock market was not interested in such a proposal for Northern Ireland because of the huge holes in our infrastructure and the potential for fines falling on consumers. Essentially, its concerns were that suitable returns could not be achieved. Is the Government, by the back door, through limiting the role of the regulator, creating freedom and opportunity for private sector investment during that initial period? That is a matter of deep public concern.

During the legal action taken by the General Consumer Council for Northern Ireland, a senior civil servant was quoted as saying in a memorandum that the Treasury was pushing for a minority shareholding to be sold to the private sector, and that the Treasury wanted the new body to be sold off before 2008. He went on to say that there would be limited restrictions on sales of assets.

There is real and genuine concern in the community about this. Is this good for the public? I suspect not. Perhaps profit is being created to attract that private sector minority shareholding interest within the next three years. That is not in the public interest and it is not in the interests of Northern Ireland consumers or ratepayers.

The new dividends demanded by Treasury are also causing concern. In Northern Ireland that dividend has been calculated at a value of 5.8% of the assets — initially, £58 million a year will be returned to the Treasury. Why is the dividend set at 5.1% in England and Wales, and, interestingly, at 4.1% in Scotland? Why are Northern Ireland consumers being asked to pay over the odds as regards the dividend to the Treasury? There are several areas of concern, and I urge Members to come together and support the motion as amended by Alban Maginness.

Question, That amendment No 2 be made, put and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly notes the Government's unacceptable proposals and legislation for the introduction of separate water charges in Northern Ireland, deplores the Secretary of State's refusal to heed the Programme for Government Committee's call for deferment of the Water and Sewerage Services Order, and believes that in the absence of a known Strategic Business Plan, Asset and Estate Management Plans, final licence details, adequate regulation or due consumer protection, the public can place no reliance on the figures which Ministers are indicating for future water charges and awaits a report from the Programme for Government Committee.

The sitting was suspended at 12.18 pm.

Implementation of Bamford Review

Madam Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow two hours for the debate, with the Member who moves the motion having 15 minutes to speak and all other Members who speak having 10 minutes. Two amendments have been selected and published on the Marshalled List. The amendments will be proposed in the order on which they appear on the list. When the debate has concluded, I shall put the Question that each amendment be made in turn. If amendment No 1 is made, I shall not put the question on amendment No 2. If that is clear, I shall proceed.

Mr McCarthy: I beg to move

That this Assembly accepts the findings of the Bamford Review of Mental Health and Learning Disability (Northern Ireland) and calls on the Ministers responsible for all appropriate departments to take immediate steps to implement its recommendations.

I declare a real interest in the contents of the Bamford Review in that we have a 37-year-old daughter with profound learning difficulties, and my family and I know about all the problems surrounding mental health, as do hundreds of other families throughout Northern Ireland.

We want the best services available, be it in health, education, housing, respite care or whatever. For too long, mental health, well-being and learning disabilities have been the Cinderella of all statutory agencies. That must stop now. Everyone in society is entitled to equality and life, and if the Assembly supports my motion today, we will have played our part in bringing a better quality of life to a great many people.

I also serve on a cross-party group on mental health, and I put on record my sincere thanks to the other Assembly Members who work closely together to get the best for their constituents. I offer thanks to the Northern Ireland Association of Mental Health, to Alan Ferguson, Graham Logan and everyone in University Street for their help and co-operation on every level.

In October 2002, the Health Department initiated a major wide-ranging and independent review of the law, policy and provision affecting people with mental health needs or a learning disability in Northern Ireland. Four years of hard work have now largely been completed, and I sincerely thank those involved for their dedication.

The Bamford Review of Mental Health and Learning Disability is the most significant and comprehensive review of mental health services and learning disabilities ever undertaken in Northern Ireland. The review has been overseen by a steering committee comprising representatives from professional and other interest groups in the mental health and learning disability fields. Much of the review's work has been carried forward through 10 expert working committees, which have presented their reports with recommendations for the modernisation of mental health services in Northern Ireland. There is a paper, not a report, on autism spectrum disorder.

It is vital that the recommendations stemming from the review are implemented to the fullest extent. The review was under the chairmanship of Prof David Bamford of the University of Ulster until his untimely death in January 2006. It would be remiss of me if I did not refer to the debt that the review owes to David Bamford. He was an excellent leader and a real professional in his work.

The subsequent and vital impact on services would be a fitting tribute to his life and work. It was in recognition of Prof Bamford's contribution to the work of the review that the then Minister of Health, Shaun Woodward, agreed to the request from Prof Roy McClelland and his colleagues that the review be recognised formally as the Bamford Review of Mental Health and Learning Disability (Northern Ireland). Prof Roy McClelland took over the reins of leadership at that time, and I sincerely thank him and his team for their continuing work.

The review took into account recent policies and other developments here and in the rest of the EU. It sought to address how best to provide services to people with special mental health needs or learning disabilities, in accordance with the statutory equality obligations of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 and the Human Rights Act 1998, while considering how to promote their social inclusion.

The review also sought to address how to promote positive mental health in society by analysing the relevance of key concepts such as community education and promoting mental health awareness. It undertook research to facilitate its work, and it has set out examples of best practice that are available regionally, nationally and internationally.

The review has come to fruition with most of the reports now complete. It has been a mammoth task, and the steering committee and expert working groups involved deserve great credit for what they have accomplished.

'Equal Lives: Review of Policy and Services for People with a Learning Disability in Northern Ireland' is a report that deals primarily with people with learning disabilities. The needs of that group are different to those who have mental health problems. It is vital that the recommendations contained in the report are considered on their own merits.

There are more people with a learning disability in Northern Ireland than there are in any other region in these islands, and the numbers are likely to increase by around 20% in the next 15 years. Investment in new styles of services has not kept pace with changing needs and aspirations. There are more people living in long-stay hospitals and residential homes, and those accommodations provide poor value for money. We have many fewer places in supported accommodation, hence families have to continue caring for longer. Almost one third of family carers in Northern Ireland are single parents, and they are mainly widows aged 65 years or over.

People with a learning disability do not have the same opportunities as their peers as regards further education, vocational training and paid work. The 'Equal Lives' document contains 74 recommendations to take forward its vision for the future. To maximise the impact of change, it will be essential to progress each of the objectives in parallel. Although some recommendations will not require funding, they will require considerable investment of planning time from staff and will also have to be introduced incrementally.

The 'Equal Lives' document sets out an ambitious programme for change, with a clear policy direction for people with a learning disability. The values and objectives of that review should form the benchmarks by which future policy and service developments should be measured. It is incumbent on Government Departments to move without delay towards establishing the implementation arrangements necessary to underpin the new vision for improving the life chances of all people with a learning disability, and the lives of their families.

On 31 October 2006, the Bamford Review formally closed at the 'Making it Happen' conference in the Stormont Hotel in Belfast. Prof Roy McClelland, chairman of the review, declared that the baton for the reform and modernisation of mental services must be handed over to the politicians.

The onus is on the Government to ensure that the Bamford Review's recommendations are implemented. I call on the Government and the Members here to think mental health and to think learning disabilities. It will be our responsibility to make it happen in what will be, I hope, a devolved Assembly on 26 March 2007. It is a major responsibility. The mental health of our citizens and future citizens depends on the implementation of the recommendations, and on us.

There is an inherent danger that the Government will do nothing more than pay lip-service to the review and leave it on the shelf to gather dust.

We must not allow that to happen. I call on my fellow Members to agree that mental health and the implications of the Bamford Review be afforded the highest importance in a newly devolved Assembly, and that a major priority for the Assembly be the implementation of the review's recommendations. The review has done its job. The future mental health of all our citizens is in the hands of their elected representatives in the Assembly. It is up to the Assembly to grasp that opportunity and ensure that the Government take action on the set of recommendations with which they have been presented. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr McCarthy: How will the recommendations be implemented? The review goes one step further and provides a briefing paper titled 'Reform and Modernisation of Mental Health Services and Learning Disability'.

There is a need for a new vision, prioritisation of the mental health of the people of Northern Ireland and a refocusing on the needs of those with mental ill health and learning disability. The strategic priorities road map identifies several key issues, which include the promotion of positive mental health and the prevention of mental ill health as a priority for the entire community; reform and modernisation of mental health services; and the need for a person-centred approach that values people with a learning disability as citizens, and that enables them to use mainstream services and be included fully in the life of the community. Anything less is totally unacceptable.

The recommendations demand a multi-sectoral approach. The danger of siloing them into the health portfolio must be avoided. There are clear and important implications for all Departments, including the Department of Education, the Department for Employment and Learning and the Department for Social Development. The implementation of the Bamford Review's recommendations necessitates adequate resources. The review recommends doubling the present spend on mental health services and learning disability from approximately £300 million to £600 million over 15 to 20 years. I call on my fellow Members to agree that a percentage of the peace dividend moneys should be soundly ring-fenced for the implementation of the Bamford Review.

Mr S Wilson: Given that, to date, the peace dividend money has amounted to nothing, a percentage of nothing will not help the situation.

Mr McCarthy: I suspect that the Member, when he is negotiating with Tony Blair and Gordon Brown, is in a position to squeeze as much as he can out of them.

The Government must draw up a comprehensive post-Bamford action plan to oversee the necessary step change. At the Bamford Review's 'Making it Happen' conference on 31 October 2006, Minister Paul Goggins highlighted the important role of a new champion for mental health. He said:

"I want mental health and learning disability to move to the top table of the health service."

Members will agree with that 100%.

Minister Goggins continued:

"We need someone to champion its cause, and fight for the new services that people need. I am pleased to announce that the new post of Director for Mental Health and Learning Disability has been advertised today. This person will be crucial in taking forward the Government's response to the Bamford review."

The Minister also highlighted the fact that the Government would have to take action as a result of the review when he said:

"Many of the review's recommendations impact not only on health and social care, but on all public services in Northern Ireland, including education, employment, training, housing and social security benefits. I have decided, therefore to establish an Inter-Departmental Task Force to oversee the whole Government response to the review."

At least Paul Goggins is committed. Those are encouraging words from him. However, there must also be action. It is up to the Assembly to ensure that the Government adhere to the strategic priorities for the implementation of the report. I call on the Assembly to think mental health, to think learning disability, and to give the motion the support that it deserves.

Dr McCrea: Although it is true that the Minister has said some fine words, and has made an announcement about appointing a champion for mental health, without providing the finances that are needed to back up those fine words, all the words of the day will not solve the problem. Does the Member agree?

2.15 pm

Mr McCarthy: I absolutely agree. The major disappointment of the conference in the Stormont Hotel was that although the Minister said many fine words, he did not say that there would be any extra funding. It is up to us, as Members of the Northern Ireland Assembly, to fight for that, and I am sure that we will. Every Member knows people who have mental health problems or learning disabilities. For too long the mental health services have been the Cinderella services of Northern Ireland, so I ask Members to give their full support to the motion.

Mr S Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCarthy: Yes.

Madam Speaker: I am sorry, Mr Wilson, but Mr McCarthy has finished.

Mr S Wilson: But he gave way.

Madam Speaker: According to our clocks, he was in his last minute of speaking time.

Please be quick, Mr Wilson.

Mr S Wilson: The Member raised a lot of issues and mentioned that the necessary finance is not available to address all the issues. To which of the priorities identified in the Bamford Review does he think that the Assembly should give priority?

Mr McCarthy: As I said at the start, I have personal experience of learning disabilities, as my 37-year-old daughter has learning difficulties, so I would certainly choose that issue. However, mental health covers suicide, self-harm and other issues, and we all want a fair share of the money that is available.

Mr McElduff: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Can you make a ruling on the use or non-use of mobile phones during debates in the Chamber?

Madam Speaker: Mr McElduff, I do not need to make a ruling. It is convention that a Member should not have a mobile phone on — especially if the Member is a Chief Whip.

Mr Adams: Maith thú, a Cheann Comhairle.

I beg to move amendment No 1: At end insert

"; calls on the Programme for Government Committee to ensure that the required extra financial investment in services as identified by the Bamford Review is included in the discussions for a financial package for a new Executive; and further calls for the full resourcing and immediate implementation of all the recommendations of the Bamford Review in relation to suicide and self harm."

I think that we will get support from the Benches opposite for this amendment, because it deals with some of the issues that our Friends have raised.

Ba mhaith liom a rá go n-aontaím le Kieran McCarthy, nó is ceist an-tábhachtach í an cheist seo, go háirithe ceist an fhéinmharaithe.

I want to deal specifically with the issue of suicide and how the Bamford Review recommends that we should begin to deal with this dreadful scourge. Our colleague John O'Dowd will deal with the background, breadth, undertakings and implications of the Bamford Review.

Suicide is the biggest killer of our young people, and although young men are statistically at the highest risk of suicide, the problem transcends gender, age, class, ethnic background and religion. The suicide rate in my constituency of West Belfast is over twice the regional average — and the rate in North Belfast follows closely. The Bamford Review quite rightly points out that the challenge that we face in addressing the issue of mental health promotion requires action at personal, public and political levels. It recognises that suicide prevention is an integral part of mental health promotion and further recommends that suicide prevention be made a public health priority.

In the last year, a suicide strategy, 'Protect Life: A Shared Vision', has been launched for the Six Counties. The development of this strategy is in no small measure attributable to the campaign of the families and friends of those bereaved through suicide.

I mo cheantar féin tá barraíocht daoine — fir agus mná óga go háirithe — ag cur láimhe ina mbás féin. Is fadhb ollmhór í, agus caithfidh muid a bheith soiléir faoi sin ag gach leibhéal sa chomhphobal.

As MP for West Belfast, I am honoured and humbled to be in a position to work with many families from West Belfast, the Shankill, North Belfast and beyond in their campaign to achieve the aims of this strategy. This Assembly and the Executive must make tackling suicide and self-harm a priority.

I would be surprised if there were Members in the Chamber who have not been touched by the scourge of suicide within their broader family circles. One only has to talk to any of the families, friends, parents, partners, or siblings who have lost a loved one through suicide to understand the devastating impact that it has on our communities. When we talk to families, we also realise just how inadequate our society and our health services are in dealing with suicide and its impact. As political representatives, we must rectify that. That includes rising to the challenges set by the Bamford Review.

Bhuail mé le daoine ó theaghlaigh atá fágtha i ndiaidh duine féinmharú a dhéanamh, agus caithfidh mé a rá go raibh mé an-tógtha faoina ndóigh. Caithfidh muid a bheith cinnte go ndéanfaidh muid ár seacht ndícheall le cuidiú leo i gcibé dóigh ar féidir linn.

All of us must play our part in the destigmatisation of mental health problems. We must challenge the so-called macho culture that exists in our society, and which leaves many of our young people feeling that the only option they have left in the world is to end their own lives. However, challenging that culture is not enough. We must ensure that when people seek help, the services exist to help them. Services must be there 24 hours a day, seven days a week, 365 days a year, because the problems that cause a sense of hopelessness do not end at 5.00 pm or take the weekend off. Services must be tailored to suit the needs of our people.

I and other Members have heard many families express total disbelief at how their loved ones sought help from the statutory services only to be denied treatment, put on a waiting list, or — worse still — ignored by some uncaring, or perhaps overworked, service providers. That cannot be allowed to happen again.

The Bamford Review rightly states that we need more community-based services, more psychiatric nurses, more psychiatrists and more psychologists. All of that requires funding, planning and the political will to implement the report. Sinn Féin is doing its best to secure the increased funding that is required to provide the type of services envisaged by the Bamford Review.

I am committed to doing all that I can to ensure that the issue of suicide prevention is addressed in a strategic manner. I appeal for all-party support for families who have been bereaved through suicide. We owe a huge debt of thanks to those bereaved families who have made a real difference in raising awareness, as well as in securing more resources. We must also acknowledge the very hard work of the healthcare professionals who, with poor resources, have also done their best. They too deserve our gratitude. They and the affected families need this issue to be given the proper political priority. They need Members to ensure that the proper resources, funding, training and staff are available.

Both of the elected Chambers of this island must act together. Suicide is a problem throughout Ireland. In 2003-04, there were 577 deaths by suicide. Official records for 2005-06 show that the number of such deaths has risen — a total of 645 people across Ireland ended their lives through suicide during that period. Those figures do not take into account those who have tried to take their own lives and failed, or those cases that were not reported.

The number of deaths by suicide exceeds the number of road deaths. This is a national disaster and it requires a national disaster plan. That is why Sinn Féin has called for suicide prevention strategies North and South to be integrated into an island-wide programme, and for this issue to be given governmental priority by the North/South Ministerial Council.

Tá mé cinnte — agus tá daoine eile anseo cinnte fosta — go mbeadh Rialtas na Breataine ag déanamh i bhfad níos mó dá mbeadh an líon céanna daoine ag fáil bháis sa Bhreatain.

If that many people in Britain were losing their lives through suicide, the British Government would take more action than it has here thus far.

The Government in London do not have the political will to implement and fund the recommendations of the Bamford Review, so it is up to us, the representatives in this Chamber, to do that job.

Tá Sinn Féin ag obair le grúpaí ar fud an oileáin seo agus ar fud na sé chontae, nó is fadhb í an féinmharú in achan áit in Éirinn. Tá cúpla focal scoir agam i dtaca leis an ábhar.

Sinn Féin's 2006 health policy document, 'Healthcare in an Ireland of Equals', identified suicide as a distinct priority area, requiring concentrated co-operation between the Governments, the health services, the voluntary sector and the communities — in other words, a multi-agency approach. We continue to lobby for and support those affected by suicide to ensure that that becomes a reality.

Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

We all have to co-operate. We have to work together no matter what our differences are. The current rate of suicide is a national crisis, which needs a national, united, joined-up approach. The communities that we represent, especially our young people, deserve nothing less. Go raibh maith agaibh.

Mrs D Kelly: I beg to move amendment No 2: At end insert

“supported by adequate financial and other resources.”

I thank Mr McCarthy for moving the motion. The reason for our amendment is to ensure that additional finances and resources will be provided and that the Minister is left with no doubt about what is required. I acknowledge that there is little difference between our amendment and the one tabled by Sinn Féin.

The SDLP welcomes the findings of the Bamford Review and congratulates all those who participated in it. The review represents a comprehensive analysis of current mental health and learning disability services and provides a vision for future service delivery. It has long been recognised that both of these services suffer from chronic underfunding, and the Bamford Review continually refers to that deficit.

I attended the ministerial launch of the review a few weeks ago, and, like practically all of the attendees, I was astounded that the Minister failed to acknowledge that the implementation of the review would require additional financial investment and other resources. No new moneys are available for mental health and learning disability, yet the Civil Service practice of employing consultants continues unabated.

We heard this morning that over £18 million was spent by the Water Service on consultancy fees alone — money that could and should have been spent on service delivery, whether in health, education or housing. Finances, and other resources such as staff, are already overstretched. My colleague, the Member for South Belfast Mrs Hanna, will speak comprehensively to the motion. I shall deal primarily with the recommendations in relation to child and adolescent mental health services.

According to the 2001 census, 451,514 people in Northern Ireland — 27% of a population of 1.7 million people — are under 18 years of age, and 398,056 people — 23% of the population — are under 16 years of age. Those figures were published by OFMDFM in 2004, yet the Bamford Review found that there has been no comprehensive study of child mental health. Instead, we have to rely on research conducted in England and elsewhere.

In Great Britain, it has been shown that 30% to 40% of young people may at some time experience a mental health problem, while up to 20% will have been diagnosed with a mental health disorder. As Members know, however, Northern Ireland has higher levels of socio-economic deprivation. We are also emerging from conflict and continue, sadly, to be a deeply divided society. Children and young people are inevitably affected and influenced by community tension and can be directly caught up in violence.

Furthermore, we are all acutely aware of the alarming rise in the number of young people who are becoming alcohol-dependent. It is not uncommon to hear of children as young as 12 years of age consuming alcohol. Substance abuse is also increasing. What does this say about how our society protects its young? It is important to note that Northern Ireland has a higher overall prevalence of mental illness of a magnitude estimated at 25% higher than that in England.

Although that refers to rates in the adult population, it can be assumed that rates in children are similarly higher than in England. The Bamford Review noted that, at its lowest estimate, approximately 45,000 children and young people aged between five and 15 years will have a moderate to severe mental health disorder and require intervention from specialist child mental health services, while 340 children and young people will require inpatient services.

No specialist residential facility exists for those 340 children and young people: shame on the Minister, and shame on the Department. Meanwhile, young people with learning disabilities, and their carers, find it harder to avail of appropriate therapeutic interventions and environments than adult sufferers.

Physiotherapy graduates cannot find employment in Northern Ireland. Currently, many must go to the US, Australia and New Zealand to practice. I must declare an interest, as a former occupational therapist. According to the Bamford Review, there are no occupational therapists in the Child and Adolescent Mental Health Services (CAMHS), yet the waiting lists for these therapies remain unacceptably long — in my constituency, it takes over 18 months to get a first appointment — at a time when personal development is of the utmost import.

Suicide levels and instances of self-harm continue to be a huge concern. I welcome the establishment of a Regional Suicide Task Force. However, that is only part of an overall series of recommendations.

The Bamford Review clearly and correctly acknowledged the need to integrate health, social and educational services for children and young people in particular, but also for wider society.

The Minister must ensure that the actions set out in the report are followed as swiftly as possible, and provide adequate financial and staffing resources to do so. The Bamford Review recognises that staffing levels are inadequate to meet even present requirements. Failure to implement the review will condemn thousands of the young, and their carers, to a bleak future, and will represent a high cost to society. I support the amendment.

Mrs I Robinson: There is a lot of work to be done to lift mental health higher up the Northern Ireland political agenda, and as various Members have stressed, there is good reason to pursue that course. A Member asked which area of mental health should be prioritised. In my view, there is no area that could be singled out for priority. All areas in this sector are crucial and are crying out for help.

According to the World Health Organization, more than 19% of the total burden of disease in Western European countries is attributable to mental illness, compared with 17% for cardiovascular disease, and 16% for cancer. It found no other health condition responsible for more than 8% of disease.

Statistics show that the prevalence of mental health problems in Northern Ireland is 25% higher than in England, yet the share of the health and personal social services budget that is spent on mental health in England is 11.8%, compared to 9.3% in Northern Ireland. Based on the 2003 figures, to match the English share, spending on mental health in Northern Ireland would have to be increased by 26%, or £60 million.

It is now possible to estimate the cost of not promoting mental health. The Sainsbury Centre for Mental Health, in conjunction with the Northern Ireland Association for Mental Health (NIAMH), estimated that the total cost of mental health to the Northern Ireland economy was £3 billion for 2002-03. Their research applies and adapts analysis methods used by the Sainsbury centre that are now accepted and quoted by Ministers.

Effective mental health promotion is essential. Better services are required for people with mental health problems and learning disabilities, within a clear framework to promote positive mental health and to reduce stigma. We must invest more in mental health promotion. Northern Ireland must have a comprehensive and sustained mental health promotion campaign. That was highlighted in the Bamford Review, and in particular in the report of its Mental Health Promotion Committee entitled, 'Mental Health Improvement and Well-Being — A Personal, Public & Political Issue'.

I quote from the review:

"Promoting positive mental health and the prevention of mental ill health is a priority for the entire community."

It found that, central to the success of mental health improvement and well-being, was a recognition at all levels that mental health is everyone's responsibility. It further states:

"mental well-being underpins all aspects of health and well-being; and mental health, like physical health, is a resource to be promoted and protected."

To achieve this, the report concludes that what is needed is:

"increased cross-sectoral, collaborative work among key agencies and central government departments — partnerships between health and social services and education agencies hold particular potential".

The Minister with responsibility for health, social services and public safety, Paul Goggins, has announced the establishment of a mental health directorate early in 2007. That is welcome; however, it will require commitment to a cross-sectoral, interdepartmental approach to mental health promotion.

There is a danger of mental health promotion being "siloe'd" into the health portfolio. We must ensure that all Government Departments are signed up to mental health improvements and well-being. When cutting the first sod of Craigavon Area Hospital's new mental health unit, Paul Goggins said:

"The future of mental health service provision will require a multi-agency and a multi-disciplinary approach."

The 'Mental Health Improvement and Well-being — a Personal, Public and Political Issue,' report expresses the view that to realise the vision for mental health promotion there is a need for a focused, resourced, centrally driven, cross-sectoral, cross-departmental and prioritised approach. None of us can quibble with that.

The review recommended the establishment of a regional mental health promotion directorate, with a regional director at the heart of Government. That recommendation was designed to ensure that mental health promotion should be a policy priority across the whole of the public sector and provide a sustainable regional strategic focus for mental health promotion. The creation, instead, of a new post, of director of mental health and learning disability who:

"can work across government and act as a chief advocate for the improvement of the mental health of Northern Ireland population" is undoubtedly welcome, as I have indicated.

However, the report on mental health improvement and well-being expresses the view that:

"If this post negates the creation of a Regional Director for Mental Health Promotion, then the Review considers it essential that as part of this post's wider responsibilities there must also be a priority for the provision of a regional strategic focus for mental health improvement and well-being."

I concur with the view expressed in the report that :

"Mental health promotion must take place in a range of settings, for all stages of the life cycle and at various delivery levels".

It states that it must occur in places such as schools, primary care, the workplace, further and higher education rural areas and communities, including marginalised groups and faith communities.

Mental health promotion must be delivered and be accessible at all stages of life, particularly for children and adolescents, older people and people in receipt of statutory mental health services. There must also be various levels of action to ensure an effective mental health promotion strategy. Those should range from regional, down through local communities to families and to individuals.

The building at regional level of a capacity to deliver mental health promotion in all these sectors and settings is essential, and it requires a focus on training, guidance and research. I will use one example. Mental health promotion in the school setting is an obvious opportunity for cross-sectoral working. The report made clear reference to the fact that schools have a significant influence on behaviour, attitudes and development of young people.

I know from experience in my constituency of the importance of good understanding of mental health issues in the classroom. Just last week I saw a girl of 12 who is suffering severe bullying at school. She came into my office with her parents. She was crying because her life was not worth living, because bullying was reaching beyond the school into her home, and, through her mobile phone, to the places she would go for leisure. That girl wants to die. She and her family are at their wits' end. What can seem a relatively trivial matter to some may have massive repercussions for others. There are well-documented examples where bullying has led to young people committing suicide.

Reduced self-esteem in young people can have a marked impact on their development. Members need only look at the number of young women with eating disorders for whom self-esteem is a contributing factor. It is good that we are going to have improved hospital facilities for children and young people with mental health needs. However, a lot more needs to be done for those with eating disorders. People in Northern Ireland cannot afford to continue to rely on travelling to England for the best services.

The Bamford Review report 'A Vision of a Comprehensive Child and Adolescent Mental Health Service' states:

"Mental health promotion and prevention in the school setting should be developed across all schools to include Independent School's Counselling services, the health promoting schools, and pastoral care initiatives."

However, targets set in the 'Promoting Mental Health Strategy and Action Plan for 2003-2008' regarding education and mental health promotion have not even been addressed, let alone delivered. In that context, it is alarming that the funding for a post in the Health Promoting Schools Project has been discontinued. The post had been funded for three years yet neither the Department of Education nor the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety has seen fit to fund it in the future. That is a disgrace.

I am aware that I am running out of time. There is a lot more to discuss on this subject, which is dear to my heart, having had a member of my family die with Alzheimer's Disease and another with mental health illness. I would love to have said a lot more about various points in relation to mental health. However, I support the motion.

Mr Kennedy: Thank you for the opportunity to contribute to this important debate. I congratulate Mr McCarthy for bringing the issue to the Assembly's attention, and I apologise on behalf of the Member for North Antrim, Rev Robert Coulter, who is unable to attend this afternoon. He strongly supports the recommendations contained in the Bamford Review, as does the Ulster Unionist Party.

The historical under-investment in our mental health services in comparison with the rest of the UK — and the higher levels of ill health here — together with the impact of mental health on families, communities and business all point to the very pressing need for the Bamford Review's recommendations to be implemented.

Northern Ireland needs modern mental health services that respect the fundamental dignity of service users and which are oriented towards recovery.

Children and young people must have access to mental health services that far surpass the present provision. The promotion of mental health is crucial to our economic health and well-being and it must become a key concern for the Government. Through the Bamford Review, the next Executive has a roadmap for delivering the mental health and learning resources that Northern Ireland needs urgently. If we are going to move to a fair and more decent society the Bamford Review must be heeded and its recommendations implemented.

Last year, 200 children in Northern Ireland were placed in adult mental health units: that is a shameful fact. If our society is serious about the obligation we have to all our children then it is essential that we implement the Bamford Review's recommendations.

The report, 'A Vision of a Comprehensive Child and Adolescent Mental Health Service', states:

"Mental health disorders in young people impact significantly on the lives of those affected and the quality of life of those around them."

Wider society pays a high price for the failure to tackle those problems effectively. Collectively, the cost is reflected in social disruption through educational attainment, mental ill health, antisocial behaviour and the financial costs related to each of those. I wish to take the opportunity to congratulate the hon Lady for Lagan Valley Ms Lewsley on her appointment as

Northern Ireland Commissioner for Children and Young People. The Children's Commissioner, Barney McNeany, in August described the services as "clearly not good enough", and said that:

"the Government must now act with increasing urgency to improve services."

2.45 pm

Our society's children and young people, some of whom are extremely vulnerable, deserve better than overstretched and under-resourced mental health services. The impoverished state of those services results in the need for more costly interventions after childhood and mars the lives of individuals and families, robbing them of opportunity, stability and normality. It is essential to implement the Bamford Review's recommendations to create social justice and a fair and more decent society for our children.

The Bamford Review challenges everyone: the general public, health professionals, all Government Departments and elected representatives to commit themselves to promoting mental health and well-being. It states that "social cohesion", economic competitiveness and the "quality of life" in our society are all dependent on mental well-being.

I strongly endorse the Bamford Review's call for a regional directorate for mental health promotion to be created at the heart of government in Northern Ireland to drive forward a mental health promotion strategy. The high personal, social and financial costs of Northern Ireland's poor mental health require the promotion of positive mental health to be a priority for the Government, as it is for the Scottish Executive. Scotland's National Programme for Improving Mental Health and Well-being demonstrates the potential for devolution, whereby locally elected representatives and local Ministers can drive forward practical strategies for a fair and decent society.

The Bamford Review provides a roadmap and a comprehensive strategy for Northern Ireland. It offers the hope of a society in which the mental health and well-being of every person is promoted. I support the motion.

Mr Storey: I support the motion. There is a growing body of research on the effectiveness of mental health promotion and robust evidence based on specific interventions. However, much of the research focuses on mental illness as opposed to good mental health. Promoting positive mental health is necessary at all stages of life. Early intervention for children and adolescents has been proven to enhance their resilience to mental health problems. Older people, an ever-growing population group within society, also have specific needs. There is strong evidence to show that good mental health can be promoted in a range of settings, such as schools, the workplace and further education colleges. It is crucial to pay attention to rural areas too.

Mrs Foster: The Member for North Antrim and I represent rural constituencies. Would he agree that rurality is often an additional stress faced by those who need to access mental health services?

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for her intervention and concur with her comments. Members who represent rural constituencies will have no difficulty in agreeing with her comments.

The effective delivery of mental health promotion in all sectors and settings in Northern Ireland will depend on building knowledge, expertise and capacity. That process should include training, provision of information, guidance and further research.

There is an extra dimension to the causes of mental ill health in Northern Ireland. The fabric of many communities has been destroyed by the legacy of over three decades of terrorism. It is a matter of some regret that, in the House today, the party opposite seemingly displayed a conscience about deaths — given the fact that it supported mass slaughter of the innocents in Northern Ireland.

Communities need to grow and develop. In so doing, they will enhance the levels of trust, sense of belonging and the potential for participation to promote emotional well-being. Although some progress has been made towards that vision, much still needs to be done. Spending on mental health services has mushroomed in recent years. In 2003, the health trusts in Northern Ireland spent £150 million, which was an increase of more than 31% on the figure four years before.

That comprised £85.5 million for hospital services; £25.5 million for community health services; and almost £40 million for personal social services. That figure does not include the £34 million cost of GP consultations on mental health, or £44 million for psychiatric drugs. Moreover, the costs to our economy of lost output, informal care by family members, and the impact on individual quality of life, have not been considered.

Much good work has been done recently in the Province on suicide, particularly through the task force led by Colm Donaghy. The establishment of that task force was triggered by the large occurrence of suicides in the Province, particularly among young people. After heart disease and cancer, suicide is the greatest cause of lives cut short in the Province.

Greater community and voluntary sector involvement is needed. More resources must be invested, including extra training for health professionals. Improved co-ordination among schools, youth organisations and health bodies could also help.

With the increasing popularity of television and the internet, people lead more solitary lives. The sense of community has been diluted; individuals have less contact with their families and their neighbours and, as a result, they have fewer people to confide in. Bereaved families describe little available support when dealing with the aftermath of suicides. That is a crucial deficiency to address. Often, family members can feel personally guilty after a suicide.

Much more must be done to tackle the stigma of mental illness and increase public awareness about mental ill health and the risk of suicide. That will require substantial funding. The increasing prevalence of suicide among young men is not confined to Northern Ireland; the same pattern is reported across the United Kingdom and in many other countries.

A large majority of those who commit suicide were suffering from mental disorders at the time of death. Chronic ill health can be a contributory factor, and many suicidal individuals have a history of alcohol or drug misuse. Unfortunately, binge-drinking is increasingly common in society, and suicide can also result from transient mood swings associated with alcohol consumption.

The role of the media must also be considered. Reports in 1999 showed that suicide rates increased after television programmes about suicide. Other reports in 1986 and in 1990 showed that the means and timing of suicides were influenced by earlier suicides that attracted attention in local communities or that had received widespread publicity in the media.

Mental health services have always suffered in terms of funding compared to specialities, treatments and conditions that are deemed to be more acute. However, access to mental health services for children and adolescents is a particular area of concern. Despite a higher number of suicides among teenagers, children and young people, they have had to wait for up to four years for an initial psychiatric assessment in the Province. In my constituency of North Antrim, the chief executive of Causeway Health and Social Services Trust confirmed that the waiting time for children who needed to see an occupational therapist was some 44 months. That is unacceptable in the twenty-first century.

Social and cultural factors have led to more young people requiring assessment. Drugs, sexual abuse and difficult domestic environments are also contributory factors. Many more behavioural conditions and autistic-spectrum disorders are now being diagnosed, and those numbers will continue to rise.

Planning for future resources must take into consideration the changing demands of this specialist field. We need to invest in more psychiatry staff — not only consultants, but junior medical staff, nurses, social workers, occupational therapists, psychologists and physiotherapists — for work with children and adolescents. Current resources are already overstretched.

I conclude by drawing to the attention of the House the impact that inadequate funding would have on some services. In my constituency, there is an excellent organisation, the Compass Advocacy Network, which is a self-help organisation for people with learning disabilities. Some time ago, I received correspondence from that organisation that underlies and underpins the importance of ensuring that there are adequate resources for such organisations. Unfortunately, such organisations face severe funding problems. If the Compass Advocacy Network did not exist, that would have an adverse impact in my constituency and, in particular, in Ballymoney. We raised that issue with Paul Goggins, the Minister with responsibility for health, social services and public safety, when he visited the organisation a few weeks ago. The correspondence states:

“Over 30 individuals would lose the opportunity to avail themselves of training opportunities/meaningful work placements within the Compass facilities;

These individuals would be forced to return to the generic provision of day care which is already over-stretched and bottlenecked and inappropriate for most individuals’ needs;

Over 240 group members would be unable to access an impartial advocacy service and would lose the social, recreational, support, confidence and empowerment benefits of being part of an independent group. They would also lose the information service”

— provided by organisations such as the Compass Advocacy Network —

“in relation to signposting, benefit information and family/carer support”.

That is only the beginning of the awful impact that losing the Compass Advocacy Network would have.

Madam Speaker, I support the motion.

Ms S Ramsey: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

Like other Members, I want to thank Kieran McCarthy for tabling today’s motion. I hope that he takes on board the amendment proposed by my colleagues. All Members who have already made a contribution to the debate have referred to, and highlighted, the issues of suicide and self-harm, so the amendment strengthens the motion.

In late 2002, the then Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, Bairbre de Brún, launched a major review of mental health policy and, more importantly, mental health legislation. All the proper policies may be in place, but Departments will carry out their statutory duties only when legislation is enacted. Like other Members who have already spoken, in 2002 I was a member of the Committee on Health, Social Services and Public Safety. The Committee welcomed the Bamford Review, because members dealt with mental health issues all the time. The Committee went further and called for additional moneys to be made available immediately, in the interim, in order to deal with those issues.

People often talk about mental health provision and children's services as being the Cinderella services of the Health Service. The Committee asked for moneys to be ring-fenced for those services, because, depending on the prevailing Health Service crises, money could have been taken away from mental health provision and children's services to be spent elsewhere. I agree with Iris Robinson that much work remains to be done to ensure that mental health issues stay at the top of the agenda. The Bamford Review has achieved that and has even gone somewhat further.

I want to commend members of the Bamford Review team for the reports. Much work, time and energy was expended on the review, and we all have a duty to ensure that Professor Bamford's legacy lives on by implementing all the recommendations as quickly as possible.

It is not possible to build good mental health simply by focusing on areas where there are problems and responding to them. Good mental health for our children and young people requires energy and investment in promoting mental health from birth. Just as good nutrition from birth helps to reduce rates of disease, that timescale applies to mental health. We must begin by ensuring that parents are informed and supported to allow them to give their children the best chance of enjoying good mental health throughout their lives. That must not be overshadowed by the need for further investment at the sharp end of mental health services.

3.00 pm

To properly implement the recommendations of the Bamford Review and to address mental health issues, emotional well-being must be promoted from birth onwards. To support that, we must ensure the provision of accessible, community-based services with expertise in promoting mental health. The infrastructure for delivering such services is already in place in many communities, and we should not lose sight of that. Many local community groups are doing positive work. That work can be developed further through the extended schools programme. However, as I said earlier, funding must be put in place to allow adequate staffing and training resources to be made available.

Many Members mentioned children's and young people's services. Children and young people, and their families, must be able to access the therapeutic services that they need within their local communities without experiencing long delays. My colleague Mervyn Storey highlighted some of the delays that people face. Waiting 44 months for an appointment is, in my view, unbelievable and should not happen in this day and age. We need also to balance statutory services with the role of the community and voluntary sectors in delivering early intervention and prevention services. In recognising the role that those sectors play, we must ensure that those services are funded from the outset.

As has been highlighted, many children who are referred to child and adolescent mental health services can wait from between 18 months to two years for an initial appointment. If some of those children could access community-based services quickly, they might not need psychiatric services and their difficulties would not worsen while they wait. If someone were to wait for four years for an appointment to see a dentist, his or her tooth would eventually need to come out.

Funding for level-one services should be a priority and must be the first strand in an overall funding strategy for mental health services. However, it is also crucial that further funding be made available for services at levels two, three and four. Long waiting times and the failure to provide the services required must be addressed as a matter of urgency. Simultaneous investment across all levels of services, both community and acute, is required if there is to be any impact on addressing current levels of mental health, as well as promoting emotional well-being.

I want to focus on those children who have learning difficulties. Assessing the type of mental health services that those young people need is often difficult. Experience tells us that the mental health of young people with learning difficulties is overlooked. For example, a young person with learning difficulties, who is also suffering from depression, will often have their depression overlooked as simply being an aspect of their overall condition. However, recognising depression as a specific condition for which a young person with a learning difficulty needs treatment can make a huge difference to his or her quality of life and ability to reach his or her full potential.

It is crucial that there is a clear recognition of mental health issues among young people with learning difficulties. It is vital that a mental health professional be included in multi-disciplinary teams to work with children and young people with learning difficulties.

All Members have mentioned the issues of suicide and self-harm. We are all aware of the tragic suicide rates, particularly in my constituency of West Belfast and in the North Belfast constituency. The fact that all Members have highlighted the problem of suicide shows that we need to take that issue on board. Indeed, that is why my colleagues tabled an amendment to the motion to ensure that, in the interim, we can tackle some of the issues that the Bamford Review raised.

The review was a huge undertaking and has made many recommendations to take forward mental health issues. It is crucial that a mechanism be established to monitor the outcomes of the recommendations. All too often, the best recommendations are made, but the real problem is in their monitoring and implementation and whether they prove to be effective in addressing mental health needs across the community. I support the amendment to the motion.

Mr McFarland: I commend Professors Bamford and McClelland, and their colleagues, on their report. Mental health has always been a Cinderella service throughout the United Kingdom, but, in Northern Ireland, it is an enormous ticking time bomb. The legacy of 30 years of conflict is beginning to show.

I am familiar with the work of Combat Stress, which is the Army's mental health organisation. Each year sees former members of the regular Army, the UDR and the Royal Irish Regiment experience increased mental health problems due to their service in the Province. From my time on the Policing Board I know that former RUC members have similar difficulties. Post-traumatic stress and mental problems affect family life and can manifest themselves in alcohol abuse and in an inability to lead a normal, balanced life.

There is little new about this. All conflicts produce mental casualties. Shell shock was first observed during the First World War. In some cases it was considered to be a form of cowardice, until the might of medical opinion changed that. In the Second World War there were some who dealt with all of this more easily than others. It can increase with age; as you get older you have time to examine what you have gone through, and sometimes older people have much more difficulty as they start to dwell on the things that they have done in their lives.

I have spoken to both loyalists and republicans who were involved in the conflict. Both sides have similar problems with some of their activists. Whichever side you were on in the conflict, the medical services in Northern Ireland are going to have to pick up the tab for the last 30 years.

The Bamford Review proposals for improved medical care must be properly funded and put in place if we are to be ready for the coming increase in mental casualties of the Troubles. I commend the motion to the House.

Mr P Ramsey: I support the motion and the amendment.

This motion affects every constituency in the North. The Bamford Review is long overdue, and we should not delay in implementing its recommendations. There is now recognition on the part of the Government that we need to improve the standard of delivery of all our mental health services.

In my constituency, Foyle, we have one treatment facility for people with mental health difficulties. Gransha Hospital is an old-fashioned building with out-of-date wards and no special provision for young adults. It is not designed to treat people with complex mental health difficulties, and it is not meeting the needs of the people in the constituency. While funding has been announced for a new mental health crisis service at Gransha, we do not know the time frame for its delivery. The current crisis service is only for adults; yet again we have gaps in the service, with no provision for children and young people.

We have no provision for out-of-hours services between 1.00 am and 8.00 am for people with mental health difficulties and no support mechanisms for those with relatives threatening suicide or in need of specialist treatment. That should not be happening in our society. We should not be sending people who need advice, support and treatment home to wait for a community psychiatric nurse to come on duty in the morning.

Some months ago my child had to go to the health centre. There I met a friend who had taught me at the local technical college. He was in tears because his 21-year-old son could not get any support on a Sunday afternoon. The locums did not understand the situation. He had to wait until Monday, literally sitting on his son to prevent him from committing suicide.

We need the Government to devise an action plan for the implementation of the Bamford Review's recommendations. We need specific dates for each action, and appropriate funding must be made available. It is time that the Government compensated for the years of underfunding of our mental health services and made a firm commitment to improving them. We cannot delay in implementing these recommendations. The current service provision in my constituency is appalling and cannot continue.

At this time of year the support that those suffering from depression and mental illness desperately require should be available. I dread to think about the availability of psychiatric nurses and out-of-hours services over the Christmas holidays. Christmas should be a time of rest and relaxation. This time last year, a neighbour of mine, who had been struggling, went into the River Foyle. We have difficulties in Derry with people jumping into the river for whatever reason. It took a month for that man's body to be found.

Today, another family waits for news of a son. He went into the river two weeks ago, but his body has still not been recovered. Suicide brings a legacy of trauma to families.

For some families this time of year will be filled with worry and stress. Those families may have to support someone who has mental health difficulties, and they may have to do so without the help of statutory agencies. Let this Christmas be the last that those people with mental health difficulties have to rely on their families and friends. I demand that the Government step up and meet the challenge of reforming our mental health services.

Members have spoken passionately about mental health difficulties and compassionately about those who suffer as a result. Sometimes when we are preparing for these debates, we wonder whether permanent secretaries will take note of them, or whether the Secretary of State will, by right, direct Departments to take appropriate action. Judging from the comments of Members in this debate, it is clear that politicians in Northern Ireland are saying that enough is enough. I sincerely hope that the Secretary of State will properly recognise that, particularly where this subject is concerned.

Dr McCrea: I congratulate Mr McCarthy on tabling the motion. He has performed an excellent service in allowing this matter to be brought before the House.

I also have considerable sympathy with the wording of the second amendment. "Adequate financial and other resources" are essential ingredients that the House should consider seriously, and those words are appropriate additions to the motion.

I come to this debate with no specialist knowledge. I have no experience in those professional fields — such as psychology — with which the motion deals. However, I speak to the motion from a pastoral position, having experienced the solemn and sad realities of what it is like for those plagued with the tragedy of mental health difficulties. I have often said to people that if they have never experienced the pain of mental health problems, they ought to get down on their knees and thank God. Other sicknesses can be understood, and although people give easy solutions such as, "Pull yourself together", they may as well drive a dagger into the hearts of those who suffer. Had it been possible, those people would have pulled themselves together already. They feel that they are consumed by an illness that they cannot understand. If a person has a gash or a broken leg, the doctor will prescribe the medication or treatment that is necessary to cure it. In the same way, people with mental health problems can understand the healing process, but they cannot understand the depths of what is happening to them. Their lives are changed completely.

Some Members have talked about suicide without embarrassment and without apparent consciousness of what causes it. As far as this House is concerned, the terrorism of the past 35 years drove many of our people to suicide. That has left a tragic mark on society that will take years to heal.

A great deal of emphasis has been put on mental health problems. I want to deal, however, with those aspects of the Bamford Review that deal with learning disabilities. The Member for South Belfast Carmel Hanna will remember that when she was Minister for Employment and Learning, I led a delegation of concerned parents from across the community in Northern Ireland to discuss with her the important issue of learning disabilities. Since then, we have kept the group together and extended it. We have met regularly with Mr McClelland and with others, and we have also met with the departmental group that the Member for South Belfast set up. We have met on numerous occasions, and we continue to meet because, five years later, we are not much further down the road.

3.15 pm

It is absolutely necessary to tackle moderate and severe learning disabilities. I was first faced with the reality of this situation when I met two mothers and a father. They were concerned about where their severely disabled children would be placed when they reached 19 years of age and were put out of what is the best provision for children with special needs in Northern Ireland — special schools where they receive excellent, A1 provision. Those facilities, whether in Magherafelt, Antrim, Newtownabbey or other parts of the Province, give provision that is second to none. Parents tell me constantly that their children receive the best possible help, education and assistance up to the age of 19. However, when the children reach that magical age there is nothing available for them.

Mrs D Kelly: I thank the Member for giving way. Does he agree that although the best provision is still available, there is a chronic underfunding of therapeutic services and that many children in special schools are denied that service because of lengthy waiting lists?

Dr McCrea: I accept the Member's point. Children receive that service until they are 18. However, once they reach their nineteenth birthday, even though their mental capacity and learning ability may remain that of a five-, six- or seven-year-old, they are told that their education is finished. It is a crime and it is inhumane. My heart goes out to their parents. They are told that their children — if they can get a place — will be put into an adult centre along with 60-year-olds. Those young people will sit in a corner and fossilise — if they are fortunate.

I met the Member for South Belfast, who was in the Executive at the time, and brought a group of people who had been told that there were no places for their children. Those children had received provision until they were 19, and then they were told that there was nothing available for them — even in an adult centre, which would have been totally inappropriate. I salute the adult centres; they provide appropriate provision for the appropriate age. However, they do not provide for a young person of 19 years of age with a mental capacity of a seven-year-old.

I brought those parents to see the then Minister because they were at wits' end corner. They had been told that their children had received provision until they were 19 and that they might be offered a place in an adult centre. However, they were told that no places were available and that their children would have to sit at home until some provision could be found. The mother of one of the children was a single parent trying to hold down a job to give as much as she could to her child. She was at wits' end corner. An official from the Department asked her whose child she wanted to put out of the adult centre so that her child could have a place. The mother did not want to put any person out; she simply wanted some provision for her child — as any mother would.

There is not only inadequate provision for 19-year-old children: there is no provision. This society had better realise that the human rights of those young people are being completely denied, and if Government do not do something about it, those people should have recourse to the courts to establish their rights.

What other child of seven would be told that their education is finished? Not one. Society says that there should be lifelong learning. There was, and is, a weakness in the former Department of the Member for South Belfast. Its emphasis is not on learning: it is on employment. Many of those young people will never be employed, as they have severe physical and learning difficulties. If people are unemployable, they are cast onto the heap and no provision is made for them.

It is an absolutely scandalous disgrace that any Government in the twenty-first century regards it as progress to tell a child who has the mental capacity of a seven-year-old that their education has finished and that no more is available for them.

Given that special schools cater for people up to the ages of 18 and 19, such schools ought to exist for older people. If a child who goes through primary education reaches 11 years of age, they naturally progress into the next stage of education, and into the next and so on — that is what is called lifelong learning. However, children with learning disabilities are not given that opportunity.

We must change our mindset about the matter. That is why I support the second amendment, which states that the review has to be:

“supported by adequate financial and other resources.”

I ask the Assembly to support our young people and those who cannot speak for themselves. I reject the first amendment because it puts the matter on the long finger. The Government must take its responsibilities seriously by starting the job right now.

Mr Shannon: Given today's speeches, there is no doubt that everyone is passionate about the issue and that everyone can give an example of someone whom they know who needs help. The Bamford Review has been long overdue, and its findings are in no way surprising. Its recommendations range from dealing with those who suffer in the community as a result of mental illness, to those who suffer in hospitals, to those serving custodial sentences, and to those who are institutionalised.

Paul Goggins said that the system needs major modernisation, and he has announced the creation of the post of director for mental health and learning disability. The creation of that post is one of the report's recommendations. Although that innovation is welcome, it reflects the necessity to have a driving force that will lend a degree of permanence.

Mr Adams: On a point of order. The Member who spoke previously said that the first amendment put those measures on the long finger. However, the first amendment actually says that:

“extra financial investment in services as identified by the Bamford Review” should be:

“included in the discussions for a financial package for a new Executive”.

The amendment also calls for the “immediate implementation” —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order. However, Members will vote on the amendment later.

Mr Shannon: There is a clear need for increased cross-sector collaboration and partnership between different Departments, especially the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and the Department of Education.

Mental health statistics for Northern Ireland are shockingly frightening, and everyone has mentioned them today. One in four people in the Province is affected by a mental illness at some stage of their lives. Of those who claim incapacity benefit, a third do so under the heading of mental illness, and the number of adults who suffer as a result of mental illness is 20% higher than on the mainland. Indeed, my colleague Dr McCrea has commented on that point.

There is also the noteworthy fact that those who suffer as a result of mental illness have the lowest employment rate among all disabled people. In 2003, over £44 million was spent on psychiatric drugs, in comparison with the £25.4 million that was spent on community health services. That shows a clear over-dependence on suppressing the effects of mental illness rather than curing the problem. That is not to say that I wish to see medication halted or decreased; rather, I support the recommendations to promote positive intervention and positive mental health needs.

Mental health professionals and charitable institutions alike have called for the funding that is allocated to mental health services in the Province to be doubled. Currently, £100 million is spent on those services. The time has come to move towards a more responsive care-and-treatment package in which GPs and community teams work in tandem to give effective counselling and personal support in an attempt to reduce dependency on medication.

To achieve that, more psychiatrists, psychologists and mental health workers need to work together. They must be dedicated to integrating their patients back into society. That will lessen the burden on carers and families and will enable sufferers of mental ill health to work and have a positive influence on our society.

The appointment of more trained anorexia or bulimia professionals is one area that should be considered. There is anger and helplessness when we recall the story of the 17-year-old girl who was starving herself to death in the Ulster Hospital because she was held firmly in the grip of anorexia, which is a mental illness. Nothing could be done to help her. Her family had attempted everything, including getting help from specialists who suggested that she should go to England, where she would be at the bottom of the waiting list for such help. That area has been overlooked, and it is time that we considered it.

Over 1,700 people in the Province are suffering from anorexia; many more suffer from bulimia, but there are no specialist centres here to deal with those conditions. That is a major issue to be addressed in the area of mental illness. The disorders can affect children as young as seven, and if the recommended positive and early intervention measures were implemented, it might mean that the scourge of eating disorders would be addressed rather than ignored and swept under the carpet.

The report cites the need for reform in the spheres of education, employment, training, housing and social security, and the Government Departments must begin to work together to promote good mental health and to do all in their power to re-integrate those who are ill into society instead of adopting the previous mantra of medicate and redesignate.

Mrs I Robinson: Does the Member agree that Daisy's Cafe at the Ards Hospital in the Strangford constituency is a model of employment — in fact, a centre of excellence — for people who have special needs and learning disabilities? There, young people over the age of 19 are trained in catering, and they enjoy employment in serving and cooking. Does the Member agree that it is a wonderful role model that should be rolled out across the Province and one that people should visit with a view to emulating in their own areas?

Mr Shannon: I thank the Member for her intervention, and I certainly agree with her. It is a place that I attend regularly, and most Members from the Strangford area will also have done so. It helps young people and gives them an opportunity that, perhaps, they are not getting elsewhere.

The Bamford Review deserves full credit for its full and clear recommendations, but there are many areas in which it does not go far enough. Too often in my constituency — for which Iris Robinson is also a representative — I have not only seen how individuals are affected by having a learning difficulty or mental illness, but how their families are affected, and those effects are exacerbated by a lack of support for them.

One must not forget about the elderly people who have mental illnesses. The Bamford Review states that by 2018 there will be a 50% increase in the number of older people in society. If those numbers are applied to the area that my colleague Iris Robinson and I represent, they show that our constituency will require approximately 150 beds that we do not have. Help and support are required now. There are presently 14 people in my constituency who do not have accommodation. They are still in hospital, and they need to get out. That is another issue that must be addressed, and the Bamford Review clearly sets out other areas that need to be tackled.

The role of carers is taken for granted, and their needs are overlooked. That must also be examined. The responsibility borne by a carer often leads to depression and mental exhaustion, and that leads to illness. Statistics recorded by Mencap show that 50% of carers suffer from ill health, and, more worryingly, 80% of families feel close to breaking point. I have spoken to some of those families and carers, and there is obviously a problem with their situations that must be addressed.

That matter should fall firmly within the remit of the mental health and learning disabilities forum, and, as we seek to renovate the current system, it should be addressed. Cross-departmental co-operation will be a great aid in combating that problem. For instance, if the social worker of a child with autism were to notice that the mother was depressed, there should be a clear system to advocate the speedy provision of care and respite in an attempt to halt the progression of depression.

The more information on a patient that is communicated to relevant Departments, the more the patient's welfare will benefit. For instance, when a child with Down's syndrome finishes school, there should be an open door from the education system to the next step in what should be a fully resourced and individually tailored training programme in the training network. It should be the aim of the training network to find work in which a young adult will be happy and in which he or she will benefit the community and his or her family.

That system may seem simple to many, but the practicalities of such a system require money, time and dedication, and it is hoped that the new post that has been created will go some distance in achieving that. The onus on achieving that lies with the newly appointed director and Ministers, and I call on them to speedily implement the findings of the Bamford Review and to take on board the wider mental health and learning disability issues that should be addressed.

The Bamford Review has clearly illustrated that the key to improved service lies within communication and individual assessment of needs. A much stronger support network must be made available, not only to the sufferer, but to the family, and those needs must be immediately attended to and not hindered by needless red tape and bureaucracy.

The co-operation of the planning department is required to ensure that beds are set aside for the elderly, mentally-infirm patients. It is wrong that the planning department can obstruct the provision of those beds when the opportunities for them to be provided do exist. A more flexible and sympathetic understanding from the department would enable those beds to be realised in other areas of my constituency. I support the motion.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I call Mrs Carmel Hanna to give her winding-up speech on the second amendment.

3.30 pm

Mrs Hanna: I also commend the initiative from the Member for Strangford Mr McCarthy in tabling the motion. I support both amendments. At the outset, I want to mention that Prof David Bamford, who was originally appointed to chair the review, sadly died before the work was complete. His deputy, Prof Roy McClelland, ably took forward the task. Both those men, and all the participants on the steering committee and members of the expert working committee, have shown great commitment and dedication.

A strength of the Bamford Review is its comprehensiveness. Its reports cover all aspects of mental health and learning disability, including human rights and equality, forensic services, child and adolescent mental health, mental health promotion, alcohol and substance misuse, 'Equal Lives' learning disability and adult mental health services. I hope that the two largest political parties can resolve their differences on the acceptance of power sharing and of signing up to a lawful society in order to enable the Assembly to get on with the real business for which it was elected — to govern Northern Ireland and, indeed, to implement the strategies of the Bamford Review.

Nothing is more important than protecting the most vulnerable in society — those who are mentally ill and those who have learning disabilities. As a member of the Northern Ireland Association for Mental Health's all-party Assembly group, I have appreciated the opportunity to work with, and learn from, other elected representatives, service users and carers.

Just as we all have accepted the vision of a National Health Service that embraces the promotion of positive health rather than a service that treats ill health and picks up the pieces, mental well-being must be positively promoted, encouraged and protected. Mental and physical well-being are inseparable; there cannot be one without the other.

As a social democrat, the belief that everyone in society needs a helping hand sometimes is at the core of my political philosophy. Few of us get through life without a challenge. Mental ill health should not be treated differently to physical ill health. No stigma is attached to cancer. The vast majority of people face times in their lives when they cannot cope, so why should anyone be reluctant to acknowledge that?

The Bamford Review states that mental ill health affects one person in four and costs an estimated 3% to 4% of gross domestic product (GDP), yet that statistic is understated. Many people in our community are embarrassed about their situation and tough it out because of the fear of admitting to vulnerability. That is a very human and understandable trait. However, we must open the window and let the daylight in on that situation, so that openness towards mental health becomes as societally acceptable as it is for physical health. Next month, the mental health charity Rethink will launch a month-long campaign to try to unpick that stigma, and much more.

We live in a competitive society with unprecedented pressures, particularly on young people. The pressures of consumerism and the fixation on youth and appearance are all around us. Human beings are more than that, however: we are citizens. We must re-establish core values that respect the dignity, integrity and autonomy of the individual human being. Members are aware of the high incidence of suicide, especially among young men. The figures are horrifying, especially when one thinks about the young people and their families. A suicide prevention strategy is in place that works with bereaved relatives and community workers and, indeed, provides GP-awareness training. However, the challenge highlights the need for a joined-up service and more appropriately trained personnel.

The proposed resourcing of modernisation and reform has significant capital and revenue investment implications, which many Members have mentioned.

The health budget already accounts for 43% of Government spend. However, additional core funding is absolutely essential if the priorities listed in the Bamford Review are to be addressed.

It is well documented that taking positive action and applying resources as soon as a problem is identified can avoid a much greater spend later, and that applies particularly to health issues. Per head of population, funding for mental health services in Northern Ireland is far behind that in Great Britain. That shortfall is compounded by the well-documented fact that there is more mental health illness in Northern Ireland than in Great Britain. The motion rightly mentions cross-departmental responsibilities; the health budget cannot be expected to take all the strain.

I welcome the assurances that Paul Goggins, the Minister with responsibility for health, social services and public safety, gave in a letter to me. He said that strengthening mental health and learning disability services in response to the Bamford Review has been identified as the number one priority for the forthcoming comprehensive spending review. However, it is up to all of us to ensure that adequate resources accompany that prioritisation.

I also welcome the decision to appoint an independent chairman — a champion for mental health — to head a cross-sectoral, cross-departmental directorate.

The Bamford Review, and its various strands, is extraordinarily wide ranging. The Bamford Review's all-embracing nature, which makes it very exciting, innovative and life enhancing, also makes it a challenge to implement. We must remain focused on the vision and the big picture, but leadership and teamwork at provider level are also crucial. Modernisation and reform depend on changes to existing systems and practices, and new partnerships must be developed between the statutory and voluntary sectors. Appropriate cross-sector working must be cultivated.

Making social inclusion a reality requires those bodies with responsibility for education, housing, employment, leisure, and health and social services to be fully committed and involved. That would really be joined-up government with a vengeance. Given that our small, intimate society has a population of only 1.7 million and that, unlike in Great Britain, health and social services are already integrated in Northern Ireland, the review presents us with a real opportunity — provided the goodwill, commitment, positivity and energy are there to make it work.

It will involve a culture change across all disciplines. We must develop new ways of working and build on international best practice. We need to challenge traditional ways of doing things and think of imaginative and creative ways to involve support staff, volunteers, users and carers. Working in the mental health field is challenging, and we must retain our excellent staff. Training opportunities must be maximised.

A more holistic approach is needed. For example, should a GP find that he or she has no community psychiatric nurse to whom to refer a patient, and that the consultant's list is at least a year long, he or she is most likely to prescribe drugs to the patient rather than take a more holistic approach.

In particular, people with a learning disability must be valued as citizens and be empowered to use mainstream services so that they can be fully included, as of right, in the life of the community. That can happen only if there is a genuine commitment on all our parts to work proactively at all levels of society to include the learning disabled as equals — in schools and in employment, and where housing issues are concerned. They must be able to participate actively in decisions that affect their lives. That requires families and carers to be supported to enable the learning disabled to take managed risks and to lead more independent lives.

There are 180,000 carers in Northern Ireland; 7% care for somebody with mental health needs, and a further 15% care for someone with mental and physical health needs. Carers and family members are usually the first, and sometimes the only, source of support for a person with mental health problems, especially in Northern Ireland.

We should help to build support networks to decrease the loneliness and isolation experienced by people with mental health problems and those who care for and support them. The National Health Service could not survive financially without carers.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member draw her remarks to a close?

Mrs Hanna: Much will revolve around how we imagine ourselves as a society. Large sections of our community have been brutalised by the past 30 years. We must build a civic and caring society and re-examine our values and our attitudes to alcohol and drugs. We need to recreate a sense of community.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up. I call Mr John O'Dowd to make the winding-up speech on the first amendment.

Mr O'Dowd: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

I thank the proposer for tabling the motion. Kieran McCarthy and I have worked together on the Bamford Review and Action Mental Health in its monthly briefings and in lobbying Ministers on the review.

When Bairbre de Brún said in October 2002, a LeasCheann Comhairle, that there would be a major review of mental healthcare and learning disabilities in the North of Ireland, she made it clear that the review would be carried out with a strong user focus, including user and carer representation on the main steering groups that would oversee the work. She announced that Prof David Bamford of the University of Ulster would chair the review.

The background against which the review was commissioned was one of historic and grossly inadequate psychiatric care, with treatment limited at times to drug therapy, often without any regard to diagnosis. There was a scarcity of acute and psychiatric beds, a lack of options of therapy, and there were Victorian facilities, one of which I visited. In my 10 years as an elected representative it was the most depressing place that I have ever been in. The facilities in which long-term mental healthcare patients were kept were disgraceful. The only good aspect was the determination and commitment of the staff to do all in their power for their patients.

Recently, I visited excellent facilities in our health system, but, unfortunately, they are the exception rather than the rule. The provision of mental health services to adults, children and adolescents throughout the island of Ireland has proven to be inadequate — one in every four Irish people is expected to suffer some form of mental illness. Psychiatric services for children and adolescents remain scandalously under-resourced and underprovided for in every part of Ireland. Many children are deprived of psychiatric treatment due to a lack of inpatient beds, while services for adolescents have been totally unsatisfactory.

In the intervening period since the then Minister de Brún announced the various expert working committees and task forces involved in the review of mental health and learning disability, including service users and carers, under the guidance and leadership of Prof Bamford, the professor set about a momentous task with diligence and professionalism. The work of the committees was extremely wide-ranging, as demonstrated by even the most cursory description that I can give here of the working groups' remit.

The learning disability working group reviewed policy and services for children and adults with learning disabilities; the adult mental health working group examined primary care provision, acute services, rehabilitation and community care for adults with mental health problems; the social justice and citizenship working group considered relative legislation and other requirements particularly related to human rights, discrimination and equality of opportunity; the legal issues group reviewed the Mental Health (Northern Ireland) Order 1986; and the Mental Health Commission and the Mental Health Review Tribunal examined issues relating to people who cannot look after their own property and affairs as a result of mental ill health. Added to these are the equally important working groups that examined mental health promotion, child and adolescent mental health, dementia and the mental health issues of older people, alcohol and substance misuse and forensic services.

These working groups sought to address and correct the lack of proper service provision and the absence of much needed assistance and lack of access to professional healthcare when such help was initially needed. However, it had long been recognised that early interventions are especially important for people with mental health problems, particularly the young.

3.45 pm

Mental-health provision is a much-neglected area of the Health Service. In recent years, funding for mental-health provision has fallen behind other more media-friendly and politically popular health and education services such as the acute sector. Before the Bamford Review, no service framework was in place to deal with mental ill health, and no attempt had been made to implement a mental-health promotion strategy. Child and adolescent mental-health services were similarly underdeveloped.

The stigma that was wrongfully attached to the subject meant that service users with a mental-health difficulty or a learning disability and their carers were often not in a position to exercise their grievances in the same public manner as those, for example, who used accident and emergency (A&E) departments. In short, successive direct-rule Ministers believed that they could put the needs of those with mental health difficulties or learning disabilities on the back burner because not as many voices were shouting loudly enough.

Thanks to the work of Prof David Bamford, his colleagues, and all those service users and carers who participated in the review, that is no longer the case. Sadly, David Bamford, for whom my party and I had great respect, died before this work could be completed. Prof Roy McClelland ably took on the leadership of the review, but the publication of the various reports cannot be allowed to be the end of the review process. Instead, their publication must be viewed as an opportunity for a new beginning. For that new beginning to take root and to impact positively on people's lives, the question of resources must be addressed. That is why my party decided to table its amendment. The amendment has not been tabled in an attempt to usurp or undermine the motion but to strengthen and develop it further.

Prof Bamford recognised the need for additional resources to be provided, when, in December 2004, he wrote an open letter to direct-rule Minister Ian Pearson, specifically asking that money be ring-fenced to allow the review's recommendations to be implemented. David Bamford described how, despite the best efforts of staff, many current services were at, or near, crisis point. Pro rata by population, at least £50 million should have been allocated to specific mental-health services in the North between 1999 and 2006. No such allocations were made, however, despite £1.25 billion being allocated in the same period to similar services in England, Scotland and Wales.

Lest anyone be mistaken, Sinn Féin believes that remedial action is needed to deal with the situation on an all-Ireland basis, North and South. My party has previously proposed that an all-Ireland implementation body be set up as a matter of urgency to deal with the appalling neglect of mental-health provision, which neither health Department, North or South, has succeeded in addressing. A new all-Ireland implementation body to deal with mental-health issues across the country would constitute one of the most progressive achievements for the new incoming power-sharing Executive and all-Ireland institutions. I accept, however, that that issue is not the one that we are debating, and it is not immediately related to the motion or to our amendment.

The harsh reality facing the Assembly today is that about 29% of households in the North are defined as being poor, with a further 21% considered to be vulnerable to poverty, owing to low income. Half of all those households include at least one family member with a long-term illness or disability. Those are the people who suffer most from the underfunding of mental-health or learning-disability provision. Those are the real people and families experiencing the sharp edge of health inequality.

The problems confronting the Health Service and general public health in the Six Counties are the legacy of years of underinvestment and neglect by successive British Governments. It will take a substantial effort to recover the situation, but that can be achieved if the political will is there. This Assembly can demonstrate the potential of that political will today by making our amendment.

Just as the Assembly called with one voice for the rejection of water charges and greater investment in our economy, it should speak with one voice today to call for greater investment in our mental-health and learning-disability services. The negative impact of the Northern Ireland budget on mental-health and learning-disability provision has had a profoundly adverse effect on the quality of life of a substantial section of our community. There is in the wider community, however, a recognition, which our direct-rule Ministers obviously do not share, of the need to provide access to mainstream health and social services provision and education for people with a mental-health difficulty or learning disability.

One of the Bamford Review's publicly stated goals was to anchor its recommendations in a broad financial and economic context. That is what our amendment is about. By making our amendment, this Assembly, through the Committee on the Programme for Government, can show that all parties have the political will to ensure that the required extra financial investment in service provision, as identified by the Bamford Review, will be included in discussions for a financial package for a new Executive.

If we are to treat the work of the Bamford Review seriously, ensuring delivery of those resources in order to bring about an effective, all-encompassing service provision will be the touchstone of our collective political ability. Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

Mr McCarthy: I thank all the Members who supported the motion. It is clear that mental health and learning disability issues affect every man, woman and child in Northern Ireland, and every Member who spoke today showed real concern about that.

The Bamford Review has been the most important and far-reaching inquiry into mental health and learning disabilities that Northern Ireland has ever seen, and it contains vital information and road maps for the way forward. Members wish to give their best for the people of Northern Ireland in relation to mental health and learning disability. I have no problem with the second amendment, although I do have some concerns about the first. At this time, there are Ministers who can take immediate action in relation to what Members have discussed, whereas the Programme for Government Committee is just that — a Programme for Government Committee, with no powers.

In relation to suicide and self-harm —

Mr O'Dowd: I wish to clarify that the Sinn Féin amendment in no way stops the Assembly from lobbying the Ministers who are in a position to act. The amendment is a continuation of that work, and ensures that the next Executive have the finance to work for it. Sinn Féin is not saying that the Minister should not be lobbied for those resources.

Mr McCarthy: Suicide and self-harm, which are referred to in amendment No 1, are vital and important, but it is not on. It would be wrong for me to speak against amendment No 1, because in the Portaferry and Kircubbin area of my constituency, we have suffered through suicide and self-harm, and I do not wish to oppose anything that might bring benefits to those people. I ask that we join together —

Mrs D Kelly: I thank my colleague from Upper Bann Mr O'Dowd for his clarity in relation to ongoing and present lobbying for resources. In our amendment, we were trying to say that it should be immediate. Given that understanding, I am happy to seek the leave of the House to withdraw my amendment in favour of the other amendment and the composite motion.

Amendment No 2, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr McCarthy: I am glad that we are all in agreement. This issue affects us all and transcends all boundaries, classes, colours and creeds. If the Assembly can agree on the way forward to provide for and implement the Bamford Review at the earliest possible moment, then it will have contributed enormously to the mental health and well-being of all the people in Northern Ireland.

Question, That amendment No 1 be made, put and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly accepts the findings of the Bamford Review of Mental Health and Learning Disability (Northern Ireland) and calls on the Ministers responsible for all appropriate departments to take immediate steps to implement its recommendations; calls on the Programme for Government Committee to ensure that the required extra financial investment in services as identified by the Bamford Review is included in the discussions for a financial package for a new Executive; and further calls for the full resourcing and immediate implementation of all the recommendations of the Bamford Review in relation to suicide and self harm.

Adjourned at 3.54 pm.

Tuesday 19 December 2006

The Assembly met at 10.30 am (Madam Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

ASSEMBLY BUSINESS

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Will you make a statement on the security regulations in the House before we rise today? It is a matter that I have raised with you previously. When a similar circumstance arose in the British House of Commons, the Speaker made a full statement on what had happened. This House deserves the same.

Madam Speaker: Thank you, Dr Paisley. I agree with you. If you recall, when the House first sat after the incident, I made a statement giving some idea of what arrangements would be made in the interim. The Assembly Commission has commenced its review of security, two meetings of which I have attended. You and Mr Robinson kindly took time to speak to my officials yesterday, and we take on board all your information and advice.

I assure you that once the review has been completed, as much of it as can be revealed will be made available to the House. My officials have consulted the Westminster review of security, and our review is being conducted along the same lines. You are quite right: on the occasion of which you speak, the Speaker of the House of Commons made a full statement, such as I gave on the Monday after the incident. I will make a further statement. If Members wish to know any more, they should contact my office. I am sure that you agree with me that it would not be proper to reveal full details of the security review in the House. I hope that that is sufficient for now.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Thank you.

Protection for the Elderly

Madam Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow two hours for each of today's debates. The proposer of each motion will have 15 minutes, and all other Members will have 10 minutes.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I beg to move

That this Assembly calls for the appointment of an Interim Commissioner for the Elderly to identify urgently a strategy to assist, protect and develop provision for the elderly in Northern Ireland.

The statement:

"How blind we are in the midst of so much enlightenment" was made hundreds of years ago, and it could be made again today. In a time of so-called progress, supposed opportunity, and so much alleged freedom, we are still so blind to the need of those who require so much from us, especially the elderly.

Northern Ireland has an ageing community. How we decide to protect their interests today will determine the shape of our own tomorrows. This is a must-have debate and I am delighted that we are having it today, given the circumstances, especially those pertaining to older people in the community.

Today ought to be declared "Grey Power Day" in Northern Ireland. I hope that the people who have made Northern Ireland what it is today will thank their political representatives because they believe that those representatives care for them.

I notice that an amendment is being moved this morning. Division on the motion is not necessary, and I am concerned about how that division came about. I received an email from Help the Aged. That organisation did not go to other parties in order to get an amendment proposed; other parties contacted Help the Aged about an amendment to the DUP motion. That is unpalatable, because a political squabble is not necessary nor is it in the best interests of the elderly. That email tells its own story.

I say to those groups that might be exploited by a political squabble to look at the no-day-named motions that have been available since the Transitional Assembly started. Only one party has brought forward a motion on the issue; every other party had the chance to do so but did not. That says a lot about who really cares about bringing forward a motion on the issue. Those parties scurrying around looking for an amendment should back the motion.

What we need is not Members squabbling about how the law is implemented; we need the implementation of good law. Whether the law is implemented by a commissioner or by the current ministerial team is irrelevant. We need good laws that are implemented effectively and efficiently. Many of those laws already exist but are not being implemented well.

A joined-up approach across the various Government Departments is needed to address this issue; and that could, and may, lead to the establishment of a commissioner. It could also lead to the effective implementation of existing laws by current and future ministerial teams.

The motion calls for an interim commissioner with a specific time-locked brief to scope and identify a strategy that will assist, protect and develop provisions for the elderly across all Departments. As I have said, that may result in a permanent post or the effective and efficient implementation of the law.

It is logical to have a commissioner, and we should take that step. It is important that society gets real and demonstrates that it really does care about people who are in need. Importantly, it also needs to show that it cares for the elderly, who are the most vulnerable.

Members have a duty to debate this issue effectively and efficiently today. My party and many others have demonstrated considerable commitment to the elderly. Apart from the obvious fact that my party is led by an octogenarian — and that is not a personal comment, Madam Speaker, and I hope you will not rule me out of order. No other party lives up to that standard.

The DUP campaigned for a policy —

Mr Kennedy: Yes, yes.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Mr Kennedy looks older than my party's leader, by the way.

[Laughter.]

The DUP campaigned for, and delivered, the provision for free travel, and I was glad that the Northern Ireland Assembly passed that legislation. The DUP also campaigned for, and delivered, through the effective Minister Dodds and Minister Morrow, the warm homes scheme for the elderly.

I am glad to have the opportunity to put some startling facts about the elderly in Northern Ireland on the record. Around 49% of people who are classed as elderly live on an income of less than £10,000 per annum. Fifty-four per cent of households that include people aged 60 or over are in fuel poverty. More than 80,000 elderly people in Northern Ireland live alone. Between 2000 and 2005, more than 2,000 people aged 65 and over died due to winter crisis problems.

Many of the 64% of people aged 65 and above have a long-standing illness and are entitled to claim benefits. However, they do not do so because of ignorance, pride or because they are daunted by the benefits system. In Northern Ireland, 19% of 50-year-olds have mobility problems, which is almost 8% above the national average.

Those statistics reveal that although there is a plethora of Government policies for the elderly, most of them have failed. The Assembly must address that failure. Developing a strategy that urgently addresses the situation and sets in place a defined course of action to ensure the implementation of legislation, and joined-up government for the elderly is one way to ensure the efficient and effective delivery of the goods for the elderly population in Northern Ireland.

When the Assembly was fully operational, it supported winter fuel payments, which started in 2000 under Minister Dodds. One of the greatest indictments of the current Government and their policy is that, despite their pretence to care about the needs of our elderly community, they have not bothered to increase the winter fuel allowance since then. The oil companies have kindly increased the cost of winter fuel each year, and the gas companies have increased the cost of heating.

It is important to get grey power working. That should ensure that pensioner poverty is eradicated sooner rather than later. The Government have a strategy to eradicate pensioner poverty by 2010. The Assembly must help them in doing so and ensure that the Government are held to account.

As an aside to the debate, several years ago I had the opportunity to visit the United States of America on a visitor programme. During that visit, I met several trade union groups. The group that impressed me most was the American Association for Retired People (AARP). It was the most effective pressure group ever, and no politician in America dared to ignore its voice. When the AARP spoke on guns, welfare, or any political issue affecting America, the politician who ignored it did so at his or her peril.

Grey power in Northern Ireland should take a leaf out of the AARP's book. Politicians who ignore the voices of the elderly in Northern Ireland should do so at their peril. Effective campaigning for the elderly in Northern Ireland must be put in place.

I turn now to issues that have affected our community in recent weeks. Members have been reminded of the horrifying physical attacks that are being carried out on the elderly. Such deplorable attacks must be condemned unequivocally. Today, some Members will pose as defenders of the elderly and, indeed, will pay lip-service to the sentiments that I have expressed. However, as with every other important issue in Northern Ireland today, provision for the elderly comes down to one thing: the delivery of effective policy. We must ensure that we have delivery and not more process.

10.45 am

Members should call a spade a spade and see through a lot of the humbug. I use this platform today to call on those who have refused to support the police and refused to endorse the rule of law and our courts without qualification, to do so. Their failure to do so is not just a failure for everyone else in society; it is a major failure for the elderly people who are suffering because of lawlessness in our society. They should put up or shut up. There is no excuse not to support the effective enforcement of the law and its agencies.

The current spate of attacks on the elderly that has horrified us all has been aided and abetted by a general lawlessness and a lack of leadership from those — especially in Sinn Féin; let us call a spade a spade — who will not support the police. A significant section of the community is encouraged to ignore the rule of law, oppose policing and hate the courts, and we wonder why there are those who feel empowered and free to attack the most vulnerable in our society. The failure to support the rule of law has had hideous consequences for our society. Unfortunately, the people reaping those hideous consequences today are the elderly.

I am throwing down a challenge today. People want to be powerful for the elderly: if they want to support the elderly, they should not pay lip-service or give sentiment. We need support for the rule of law, the police, the courts and this society, so that we can go forward with strength as one. We can and must do that.

There are many public safety campaigns for the elderly that the House should support. The police in my constituency have piloted the 'Message in a Bottle' scheme, which provides the elderly with an identifiable message that they can put somewhere safe in their home. If their home is broken into, or if they fall ill, the emergency services are able to get immediate details of their medical needs — if they need tablets or other medication, they are able to get them. It is a very effective policy, and I encourage the police and the Government to roll the campaign out across the Province.

There are neighbourhood watch schemes in many areas; they should be developed and extended across the Province. Police resources should be allocated to allow more officers to serve the community on beat duty and targeted calling with the vulnerable. We need proactive intelligence-driven policing, not reactive guesswork after an elderly person has been attacked. Members have heard today that many problems have been associated with poor detective work and inefficiency; I hope that we can have more efficiency in the future.

The House should unite behind the motion. We need a step-by-step strategic approach, not a knee-jerk approach. We need a real approach to effective delivery of the law to the elderly — that is what they want. In my constituency office, the over-65s tell me that they have problems with their pensions that need sorting out, and the under-60s have problems with benefit care. They want streamlined, effective and efficient delivery of services, and the House should ensure that that is what they get.

Mrs O'Rawe: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

I beg to move the following amendment: Leave out all after "an" and insert

"Independent Commissioner for Older People who would have the necessary powers to effectively promote, safeguard and protect the rights of older people."

This amendment is intended to strengthen the motion, not to take anything away from it. It has been worded by organisations that represent and work for older people.

By 2020, more than half of the population in Ireland will be over 60, yet, increasingly, older people are marginalised and their contribution is not fully recognised.

Older people are no longer willing to be marginalised or treated as less than equal citizens. They are on the move through organisations such as Help the Aged, Age Concern and Ageing Well, and I take the opportunity, a Cheann Comhairle, to commend those organisations for the work that they do. Campaigns by those organisations and others have taken the issues affecting older people from the periphery to the centre of political debate. They have recognised that the negative attitudes to ageing across the island have prevented the development of the policies and structures needed to address poverty, ill health, isolation and violent attacks.

A Cheann Comhairle, not a day goes by without news of some terrible attack on older people, yet the publication of a safety strategy has been met with more delay, which is totally unacceptable. What we and older people need as a society is a clear plan of action to reduce attacks and tackle offender behaviour, which will ensure that older people are safer and feel safer in their homes.

Earlier in the year, Sinn Féin outlined its agenda for older people when it published our 'Forget-me-not Charter for Older People'. That recommended a number of actions to ensure that the rights of older people were fully protected; it also recommended a commissioner for older people. Although there is no magic, quick-fix solution to either the cancerous attacks on older people or the wider barriers that older people face, it is clear that we need a proactive and centrally-driven response.

As regards the violence that is directed at older people, we need a joint approach that is grounded in local communities and implemented where it can make a real difference to the lives of older people. Although we need more resources to improve security in the homes of older people and increase their sense of security, such measures will only deal with the symptoms. They are not the cure for the problem of attacks on older people.

A Cheann Comhairle, turning homes into fortresses is not a long-term solution to the problems of isolation, alienation or vulnerability. Resources and actions need to be targeted to support communities in challenging the violence of those who target older people. We need to support older people in realising their vital role in our communities.

Older people have made a lifetime contribution to society through their work, taxes, rates, National Insurance contributions and voluntary work, but the standard of living of many of our older people does not meet their needs or reflect their contributions.

It is an indictment of Government policies that so many older people die each year from cold-related illnesses, and thousands more suffer from the indifference of a cold society. It is vital therefore that mechanisms are developed to properly value, and recognise, the lifelong contribution of older people to society.

Our party believes that we need to support older people in realising their vital roles in their communities. We are the losers without their contribution. That means addressing issues such as low income, access to transport, health, education and housing, and ensuring that the voices of older people are heard. Older people should be consulted on decision-making at all levels of government. A commissioner for older people would provide an important mechanism for challenging and reviewing policy and decision-making, and would give a focused role in decision-making and in articulating the demands and rights of older people.

However, ministerial responsibility that specifically deals with the rights and entitlements of older people, that drives strategy and decision-making, and that can take action across all Departments, must put the rights of older people at the heart of Executive decision-making. It would also create a mechanism for direct democratic accountability. A cross-departmental working group could deal effectively with the many cross-cutting issues that affect older people.

Figures from the Northern Ireland Statistics and Research Agency (NISRA) for 2005 estimate that people over 60 make up 19% of our population; that is almost the same as the combined population of the Belfast and Antrim council areas. Many hard-hitting statistics demonstrate the disadvantaged circumstances and vulnerability of older people: 54% of householders in the North aged over 60 are living in fuel poverty; over 80,000 older people live alone; and 2,020 winter deaths occurred among those aged 65 and over between 2000 and 2005.

The aim of a commissioner for older people would be to promote and safeguard the rights and best interests of older people. The commissioner would adopt the principles set out by the United Nations action plan on ageing, which sets challenges for Governments that address issues and opportunities associated with an ageing population.

A commissioner for older people should have powers of enforcement to enable the process of change that is needed to bring older people in from the cold. I ask Members to support the amendment. Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

Mr Armstrong: Yesterday morning, the Black Santa began the annual sit-out at St Anne's Cathedral at which he raises funds for needy causes. This year, Rev Houston McKelvey and his team realise the needs of elderly people in society, and they are urging the public to think about that sector in particular as they make their donations this year.

Elderly people are among the most financially and personally vulnerable in society, and it is appropriate that resources be channelled towards making their latter years as comfortable as possible. Over 80,000 older people in Northern Ireland live alone, and 53% of those people say that loneliness is the major problem that they face. It is believed that 5% of older people are at risk of abuse at any time.

Northern Ireland is experiencing a demographic shift. About 16% of the population — over 275,000 people — are of pensionable age, and that is estimated to rise to 24% in 2013. Over 61,000 pensioners — 22.2% — live in poverty, with almost 1,200 suffering cold-related deaths in 2004 and 2005. Those statistics have not recently crept up on us. The Government have been trying to address those facts and figures, but a commissioner for the elderly would enable people to assess the changes that are necessary across the spectrum of legislation and concentrate on the needs of the elderly.

It is essential that Northern Ireland — like its neighbours in Scotland and Wales — appoint a commissioner for older people to promote an awareness and understanding of the rights and interests of older people and to review the current policies, laws and practices relating to that sector of our community. He or she should promote best practice on the part of those who provide services to older people, while also promoting the skills and experiences of older people. A commissioner for the elderly should also be charged with publishing research on matters relating to the rights and interests of older people.

Northern Ireland is primarily a rural region. Our population is scattered, and many people are isolated in rural areas. Isolation causes difficulties for those who are agile, but it greatly affects the lives of the elderly. There are 80,000 people living alone in Northern Ireland. The direct-rule Administration does not take account of Northern Ireland's rural make-up. The rural towns and villages are lifelines for those living in further isolation. Proposals to close rural hospitals and schools are ridiculous, and the thinking behind such ideas beggars belief. Are the Northern Ireland Ministers proposing to close the countryside and change the way of life in Northern Ireland? A huge number of our ageing population will not accept that, and their voices must be heard.

It is essential that a commissioner for the elderly be appointed urgently in order to ensure that older people are protected and their rights safeguarded. It is natural that we should want that to happen in anticipation of our own old age. However, it is imperative that we consider not only ourselves in old age, but those who are of pension age already, and make the necessary changes. I fully support Help the Aged's vision of a world where older people are free from disadvantage, poverty, isolation and neglect. We must celebrate the fact that we are living in a society in which people are living longer. We must banish the perception that an increase in the number of older people is a burden on society. The appointment of a commissioner for the elderly will work towards that.

11.00 am

Ms Ritchie: I rise in support of the elderly population. The issue must not become a political football. During the debate, there have been examples of political point-scoring. All elderly people have rights, irrespective of their political or religious differences. The needs of elderly people, rather than parties' political wants, must be the number-one subject of the debate.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Wells] in the Chair)

With the number of elderly people in the population expected to rise over the next five to 10 years, according to figures from NISRA, it is imperative that a restored Executive and Assembly introduce and refine a range of strategies and policies that place the needs and requirements of older members of the population high up on any agenda. That includes the need to work alongside the law enforcement agencies in order to mitigate the influence and impact of crime, criminality and vandalism on elderly members of the population, and those incidents that prevent them from leaving their homes, making them feel like prisoners in their own surroundings. Anyone who feels like that must be protected and supported.

However, running in parallel with the range of policies and strategies is the need for a wide range of services encompassing statutory residential care, nursing provision and access to community care packages, all of which fall into the ambit of the provision of care and services for the elderly. I want to focus on that point. Help the Aged has undertaken a considerable body of research. It believes that older people have the right to live free from fear and harm. Disadvantaged older people must be freed from poverty, isolation and neglect. I agree with both of those viewpoints.

However, the Department of Health is acting contrary to the needs of older people through the implementation of the reform and modernisation agenda, which will result in the removal of statutory residential beds — one of the elderly population's primary needs. That is happening as we speak. We have seen the closure of long-established residential care homes and resource centres. This is happening at a time when not an awful lot of money is being invested in home help, community care programmes and occupational therapy services. What will happen to elderly residents in statutory care who do not have any family to care for them? What will happen to those who need constant care and attention and will not be catered for in supported housing, which, as you will be aware, Mr Deputy Speaker, seems to be the favoured option of some of the health trusts?

Current Government policies are Treasury-driven and do not reflect a pragmatic or practical approach to the urgent needs of the elderly, who require constant care and attention and who can take ill at any time without warning.

Mr Deputy Speaker, you and other Members will be aware that in my constituency the Down Lisburn Health and Social Services Trust has been forced, like other trusts in Northern Ireland, to reconfigure its services for the elderly. It has proposed the closure of two statutory residential homes, which will result in the removal of 80 beds. The two homes earmarked for closure are St John's House in Downpatrick and Seymour House in Dunmurry. People need care and protection from the cradle to the grave, and it is essential that elderly people are given that care and protection, whether in their own homes or in a care environment. It is our duty and responsibility to ensure that not only are champions appointed to make care of the elderly a priority, but that there is a compelling political imperative to make that happen in a restored Assembly and Executive.

Public consultation undertaken earlier this year clearly demonstrated a defined opposition to the closure of both those homes — a total of 6,081 responses were opposed to it. What was the trust made to do? It was forced to give an appraisal of the oldest home, St John's House, using a scoring mechanism that had low marks for accessibility and functionality. The appraisal gave the impression that the home did not even have a roof, even though it is situated in the centre of Downpatrick, adjacent to the existing hospital.

Undoubtedly, the trust, guided and directed by the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, has embarked on a consultation process having already made a decision to close the home, and it has made the scoring fit that premeditated decision. According to the list presented, St John's House was the oldest home. It is 10 years since it was last allocated expenditure, so one could say that it was perhaps a tidy choice for closure. That decision places at risk its current residents, potential residents and the elderly in the community.

There was no recognition of the glowing terms of reference that St John's House received, the high quality of care it offered, or of its contented residents, both long term and those for whom it provided daily respite care. The Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and its custodian, the trust, simply want to implement their predetermined agenda and the reform and modernisation agenda, which is simply about the demolition of elderly care and protection. Do not be fooled by what the Department says. Let us start afresh in the provision of care and protection of the elderly and in the safeguarding and promotion of their rights.

Elderly people must have care options, be that community or residential care. Mr Deputy Speaker, the proposed decision to close residential homes in our area is unacceptable, indefensible and unsatisfactory. Capital funding must be provided to upgrade and replace the home. Statutory residential provision must be made available in our area — that is the view of the local community, and it must be honoured.

We have heard much this morning about the need to protect the elderly in their own homes and the need to provide them with residential care or community care packages. However, we know that the Department has not adequately invested in community care, and those of us who have had direct experience of this issue will know that community care packages are only as good as the people and the trust providing the care. Thus, the elderly are totally reliant on people who already undertake a wide range of jobs in the community. A long-standing commitment to the issue is necessary, and I hope that a restored Assembly and Executive can make such a commitment possible.

We also need a champion — an independent commissioner — to identify the requirements of the elderly, some of which have already been implemented — for example, free travel. I hope that all-Ireland free travel will be introduced in April, which will allow elderly people to travel the length and breadth of this island.

I am concerned about those members of our elderly population who can no longer enjoy the fruits of life and have to be protected in residential care. It is imperative that we ensure that the reform and modernisation initiative of the Department is removed from its strategy and agenda, because it does not serve the elderly well. Each one of us here must act as champions of the elderly. The reform and modernisation agenda must relinquish all thoughts of closing statutory residential provision or any form of residential provision. The Programme for Government Committee and the incoming Executive and Assembly must give priority to policies that reflect the needs and requirements of the elderly.

Mr McCarthy: I support the motion.

If this Assembly is to be of any use to the people of Northern Ireland, it must provide a fair deal to our senior citizens. Our senior citizens are a proud and independent people. They have served this country well and must be protected as they retire and hang up their working tools, at whatever age.

I had the pleasure, during the Northern Ireland Assembly, of chairing a cross-party group working on senior citizens' concerns and their problems. It was called the Age Sector Reference Group. That group regularly brought senior citizens from all corners of Northern Ireland to Parliament Buildings to discuss their needs and ways of overcoming their problems. I take this opportunity to thank those dedicated people. They are still campaigning, and it is obvious they have not solved all their problems. I hope that, when a new Assembly is fully working and operational, a similar group of people will carry on where they left off.

It annoys me enormously when I hear of senior citizens being denied millions of pounds in benefits, to which they are entitled, through no fault of their own. They go without just because the system is cumbersome, and the form-filling just puts people off. We must devise a method, through social security, where every senior citizen is made aware of his or her entitlements and, if necessary, given help to receive all that is due.

I wish to pay tribute to Age Concern, Help the Aged, Advice Northern Ireland and other groups for their assistance at this level. We, as a society, must never accept that an elderly person has to choose between eating and heating.

I am delighted that this motion has reached the Floor of the Assembly. It gives us all an opportunity to make plans to be carried out when we have the power through a devolved Assembly. In fact, I would support not only an interim commissioner but a full-time officer as well to deal solely with the issues that affect our elderly folk.

During the life of the Northern Ireland Assembly we introduced free travel for our over 65's. Ian Paisley takes credit for free travel, but we all played our part in that. I would like to take some credit for free travel on the Strangford ferry. After free travel was introduced on our roads I made enquiries of the Department about the ferry crossing. No one knew if we were going to get it free or not. After we had finished with the Department, we got it free. Every little helps.

We must now champion those female senior citizens who have reached the age of 60. As Margaret Ritchie has said, it is to be hoped that in April 2007 free public transport across the whole island will be in the pensioners' sights. However, it is not much fun for a 65-year old pensioner to go on a free jaunt when his wife, who has not reached the age of 65, has to sit at home. [Laughter.]

11.15 am

As usual, the principles of equality tell us that that is wrong. It is unfair and must be rectified.

We fought age discrimination and won. Our slogan — “never on the scrap heap” at 60 for women and 65 for men — is now history, I am glad to say. People now have a choice and can work for as long as they see fit. I applaud the Ulster Unionist Party's health spokesman, Rev Dr Robert Coulter, who is planning to continue his work in the next Assembly in March — and why not? If Robert, or anyone else, has the health and the desire to continue helping people, I say well done and keep going — even if the pressure not to do so is coming from within his own party. A proven record is preferable to an unknown quantity.

Senior citizens have been the target of robbers, muggers and gangsters. Everyone has a duty to support the police in catching these morons, who ought to be dealt with severely. A good stiff deterrent might give them reason to stop their activities. In a small, sheltered housing development in Ballywalter in my constituency, a co-ordinator was employed for more than 20 years to keep an eye on the 20 residents of that development and did an excellent job. That person has now decided to retire but will not be replaced. This has created fear and apprehension among the senior citizens living in that development. A new alarm system is being put in place, but it is not the same as having a person on the premises.

There are many ways to help our senior citizens. If we are to have a commissioner solely responsible for their welfare, this country can say that it looks after all its senior citizens well. There are many issues that affect our elderly population that would justify the appointment of a full-time commissioner. I support the motion.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The next Member to speak is Mrs Norah Beare. This the first occasion on which Mrs Beare will speak in the Assembly. She will be making her maiden speech. Members will be aware that it is convention that during such a speech there are no interruptions.

Mrs Beare: It is a great privilege for me to address the House today. I congratulate my colleagues on tabling this timely motion. As others have done, I should declare an interest, in that I reached pensionable age not long ago. We are living in an age in which there has been a decline in traditional values in sections of our society, particularly the value of respect for one's elders.

I know that we should not be alarmist. The PSNI will tell us that there has been no marked increase in the number of attacks on the elderly. However, the majority of people cannot comprehend the mindset that would lead someone to attack a pensioner. Therefore every incident that has made the headlines over the past few years is deeply shocking. We have to send out the message that such behaviour is unacceptable and that our elderly are valued. We can effectively demonstrate that value in the way we treat pensioners across the entire spectrum of public policy. Only by the appointment of a dedicated commissioner can all those strands and competing interests be pulled together.

I shall take this opportunity to mention some of the priorities that a commissioner could include in a comprehensive strategy. After a lifetime, a decent standard of living is not too much to expect. Frankly, we do not prove that we value our older population when so many pensioners are living in poverty and struggling to meet the basic costs of living. Government's responsibility is not only to ensure decent incomes, but to minimise those costs. Making provision for the elderly in the new rating system should have been one of the first priorities of the policy process, rather than a point on which Government had to be pressed.

I am mindful of the difficulties that many pensioners face when battling winter colds with severely restricted budgets. I welcome the increases in the winter fuel allowance. However, the implementation of increases designed to keep pace with the rising cost of most home fuels has been delayed too long.

Our focus should not simply be on pensions, healthcare or any of the issues that are obviously linked to elderly people, important as those matters are. As members of the community, the majority of everyday issues affect older people, and the impact of every public policy on them should be considered.

Older members of society have a greater reliance on local services. For example, the changes and closures in the Post Office network have had a disproportionate impact on pensioners. Accessibility is a key consideration, and, consequently, pensioners depend significantly on public transport. The introduction, by the DUP, of free transport was a tremendous development, but the Assembly must ensure that the services are there to be used. In many cases, elderly people have been disproportionately affected when certain services have been discontinued. When these decisions are taken, there must be more evidence that elderly people have been considered and that alternative arrangements have been examined.

A commissioner for elderly people will have the resources and impetus to give a concentrated view on policies that have the potential to affect the older population. It has been demonstrated that improvements can be made to the quality of life experienced by pensioners through policy changes — I have already mentioned free transport.

The recent introduction of age discrimination legislation is another positive move. For some time, firms such as B&Q and Sainsbury's have welcomed applicants from the older age group in recognition of the value that their experience can bring. I hope that one consequence of the new legislation will be that every firm will accept the fact that people are not ready for the scrap heap when they hit 50 years of age — or, in my case, 60 years of age — and that companies actively pursue the qualities that older employees can offer. In the same way that the energy and fresh perspective of a young person can offer specific benefits to a firm, so too can the more considered and experienced approach that is offered by an older person. A diverse mix of ages and qualities will make a difference to the standards and services of any firm, and such recruitment practices should be embraced.

A commissioner for older people should have a specific remit to cut through bureaucracy, not add to it. The position of the Commissioner for Children and Young People demonstrates the difference that an independent champion can make by evaluating the competing interests of Departments and agencies to formulate a cohesive and co-ordinated strategy. At a time when there is an ageing population, Members should send out a strong signal that they will be proactive when looking after the interests of people, regardless of their stage of life.

Mr Deputy Speaker: There will be several maiden speeches this morning, and Mr Fra McCann's speech is in that category. I remind Members that there should be no interruptions.

Mr McCann: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

As other Members have indicated, it would have been preferable if cross-party agreement on the amendment had been reached. That would have sent out a strong and positive message that we can put traditional political animosities to one side and find common ground in agreeing a mechanism that prioritises the needs of older people in society and protects and champions their rights. A political squabble is not in the best interests of older people; agreement would move us forward.

Regardless of political opinion or background, Members can agree that older people are being sold short. Their lives are made harder by the barriers that they face — economic barriers, housing problems and difficulties in accessing the services that they require. Those problems and difficulties are numerous, and the solutions are long in coming.

I confess that I have not always been as up to date on these issues as I should have been, and it is only through the lobbying of many of the organisations that deal with the rights of elderly people that I am now more aware of the serious deficiencies in the way that elderly people are viewed.

Discrimination against older people in our society is to be deplored. If the Assembly were live, and if the institutions were working fully, we could — and would — find the political will to make the necessary legislative changes that would make all the difference to the lives of thousands of people.

I hope that, before long, we will be working with a commissioner and that we will be sitting in a working Assembly pushing through legislation that will make those all-important changes and working to ensure that such a commissioner will have the powers to promote, safeguard and protect the rights of older people.

Several years ago, I was shocked when someone from Help the Aged told me that, at the age of 50, I should class myself as elderly. It is a bigger shock to delve into the many pieces of literature available on the rights of elderly people. It is then that the extent of the problem, and how it has been ignored, can be understood.

As politicians, we have a duty to put right all practices that discriminate against any section of our community. It is our obligation to rectify those many wrongs. Had we been able to obtain unity today, we would have sent the all-important message that we will be the bringers of change when we have the opportunity to do so.

I work on behalf of many elderly people in my constituency, making representations to many statutory and non-statutory bodies on constituency issues. The same problems are echoed in many areas across the North. I understand the fear that elderly people feel when they receive a form from a Government agency and have no one to complete it for them. I understand the annoyance of a phone call or a visit from people with the label of authority, who have been abrupt, and who have left without fully explaining why they called in the first place.

Those are but two of the many issues that impact on the daily lives of elderly people. If some research were carried out, or if time were spent reassuring people that help is available, things could be different. People could retain their dignity and not feel that they are a problem.

I am sure that many Members have received briefing material from Help the Aged and Age Concern; such material contains stark facts and figures. We hear about the need for lifelong learning, and the changes required to make that a reality; the need to extend free transport throughout the island of Ireland; the need for easier access to the Government-subsidised rural transport initiative; the right to a decent standard of living; an end to discrimination in healthcare; and many other issues faced by the elderly.

The issue that is currently to the fore is community safety; how we can make life safer for elderly people and how we can work together to tackle the blight of the growing number of attacks on older people over the past several years.

Housing for the elderly is also an issue. Sinn Féin believes that housing is a fundamental right. Elderly people are often isolated in areas where accommodation for the elderly is sited. Sinn Féin believes that the discriminatory practice of refusing to sell bungalows or apartment accommodation to the over-60s should cease.

The Housing Executive should extend the system of community wardens to all communities to help to deal with the problems faced by all people, but especially the elderly. Fully resourced residents associations would also encourage the representation of elderly people on committees, help to break down barriers and feelings of isolation, and ensure that the needs of older people in our communities are properly addressed.

A security review of all residential premises housing elderly people should be carried out. All new social housing should be designed to meet the needs of the ageing person. There should be recognition for elderly people in the housing selection scheme through the allocation of additional points — the scheme currently hampers the possibility of older people being housed in areas of high demand. More resources should be introduced to end the unnecessary delays in occupational therapist visits and completion of works. There should be a better mix in new housing developments and investment in sustainable communities.

There are many more issues in relation to housing and many other areas of life that make elderly people feel like second-class citizens. We are the people who can play a major role in making the type of changes required to make a difference. I support the amendment.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The next Member to speak is Mr Copeland. He, too, will be making his maiden speech, and I ask that Members listen to his speech without interruption.

11.30 am

Mr Copeland: I stand in the corner of the Chamber, where I have sat for many weeks. Mr Deputy Speaker, you used the word “maiden” to describe what I am about to say. That is a term that implies virtue and innocence — commodities that are rare enough outside the Chamber, rarer inside it and rarer still in a middle-aged former soldier.

Anyone who has ever spoken to me would be quick to admit that I have never been noted as being short of something to say, and that has occasioned some comment as to why I have sat in silence in the corner of the Chamber for so many weeks. The truth is that this is not the body to which I sought election — it is a follow-on, a territorial army — the TA — the Transitional Assembly. Before that, we had the Hain Assembly, and I have sat, watched and listened. I am painfully aware that the settled will of all 108 Members in the Chamber, were they all here, could not currently occasion the changing of a light bulb in a chandelier in the Great Hall.

This debate is interesting — some of it is eloquent, some of it is intelligent and some of it is well thought out, but all of it amounts to nothing other than hot air because this Assembly has reposed in it no ability to introduce, change or pass any piece of legislation that would be to the benefit of the people who sent us here.

I turn to the matter of elderly people. My grandmother was born on the last day of 1898. On the last day of this year, she will celebrate her one hundred and eighth birthday. She was 30 years of age before she was afforded a vote — 30 years of age. She went to school until she was 11 years of age but benefited from an education system that taught her to read, write and count properly — abilities that seem to evade pupils in today's schools at the age of 15 or 16. She moved to her current house in 1921 and has stayed there ever since, raising seven children. She is as mentally active as most people I know but she does suffer from the passage of time. She is lucky in that she has maintained her dignity to a greater degree than many of the elderly people who come to my constituency office six days and four nights a week.

My father is in his mid-80s. He was born not quite in the shadow of the gantries but in Coburg Street, off the Ravenhill Road, in a two-up-two-down house that he shared with his parents, brother and two sisters. He was born at a time when children were not condemned by a postcode at the date and time of their birth to poor education and poor employment prospects. He found and secured employment as an apprentice at Harland and Wolff shipbuilders. As a young man, my father looked up at the Castlereagh Hills and decided that he wanted to live there. Through work, advancement and graft, he built his own home 55 years ago, where he has stayed ever since.

All the issues that we debate in this place can affect the people who sent us here. However, the truth is that, so far, everything that we have said, discussed, hypothesised about and put forth theories on is not worth the paper that it is written on unless the House has the ability to introduce relevant legislation for the benefit of the people who sent us here.

There are difficulties, and I appreciate them. Some Members to my left have difficulties with some Members to my right, who are deemed not fit for power. "Power" is a word that, in politics, terrifies me, because power cannot be divided; responsibility can be divided but power cannot.

I understand the difficulties. Members on the opposite Benches know about my background; I have spoken to them about it. I am a unionist, a Protestant and an orangeman. I am a former commissioned officer in the Ulster Defence Regiment. My wife is a unionist, a Protestant and an orangewoman. She is a former constable in the Royal Ulster Constabulary, who was shot once and blown up three times before she was 19 years of age. That is the reality of what is in our past and what is in our future.

I know where this place is going and so does everyone else, including the people outside the Chamber. This is a process and a journey. It is a railway journey in the fog; we cannot see where we are going, but everyone knows where we are going. The sooner we get there and own up to the responsibilities that we have to the people, the happier the people of Northern Ireland and I will be. We have a population of 1·7 million people, and we suffer the vagaries of life in this place in equal measure.

Do I support the motion? Yes, of course I do. Who would not? If I go through the Lobby or raise my hand or say "Aye", will that bring the actions called for in the motion closer to becoming a reality? Of course it will not, until we acknowledge and accept the responsibilities given to us by the people.

The aged are the people who gave us the chance to be what we are. It is incumbent on us to act not just for them, but for all sections of society, and not to go through a piece of theatre in this Chamber that does not change anything. As I said, the settled will of all of us could not change a light bulb.

Mr Dallat: It is very difficult to follow that.

This matter is, of course, worthy of debate. It presents an opportunity to discuss the very real issues that the elderly face across the spectrum. From the outset, the SDLP has favoured the appointment of a commissioner for older people. If anything, the justification has become more obvious as older people face new forms of poverty, discrimination, intimidation and other types of physical and mental abuse. Any society that does not appreciate its elderly or work positively to enrich their lives is sadly lacking in its responsibilities and, therefore, the poorer for it. For that reason, I support strongly the sentiments expressed by Mr Copeland, although he comes from a quite different background.

The breakdown in family structures and cohesion has resulted in a serious weakening of close family ties, particularly between the first and third generations. That is unfortunate for many reasons, not least because the older generation — the grannies and grandads — are one of the most valuable learning resources for younger people. The appointment of an independent commissioner would provide an early opportunity to begin rebuilding the bond between younger and older people. It would permit the introduction of new and innovative schemes delivered through schools, clubs and societies and help to build the kind of relationship that has been eroded over the years because of our changing lifestyles.

Some time ago I had the privilege of welcoming to this House a group of students from St Paul's College, Kilrea. They were accompanied by grannies and grandads — not their own but adopted ones. That project was encouraged at the time by the Government and it was worthy of being rolled out across the region. The appointment of a commissioner would mean a new pair of hands to promote schemes such as that so that new and sustainable friendships are built for the mutual benefit of all generations. Protection for the elderly comes in many forms and cannot possibly be delivered in its entirety without a strategy and without a commissioner dedicated and committed to championing the rights of those so badly neglected. Indeed, if it were not for the sterling work of the voluntary organisations such as Help the Aged, the Society of St Vincent de Paul and the Salvation Army, the situation would be much worse.

Members will be aware of the outrageous attacks on older people, usually for money but sadly often for nothing more than to persecute older people through intimidation, vandalism and damage to property. A commissioner for older people would be expected, in my opinion, to recommend new legislation to this House to ensure that the courts send out a clear message that older people are a protected group of citizens who will be ring-fenced against unequal treatment in any form and by anyone.

Older people in nursing homes can have the best of times, but they can also have the worst of times, depending on the location. Their rights as citizens should not cease when they go into nursing care, but all too often that is what happens. That is a major issue for an independent commissioner on which to concentrate his or her mind. There are of course many other issues affecting older people whereon the Government have failed miserably to bring forward the legislation necessary to protect their rights or have ignored serious issues that have emerged over time.

Although I accept that the Assembly has no power, we should hope that by the end of this debate we have done more than produce a party-political broadcast, given that some of those who thumped their chests in the Chamber today were far away when the elderly marched in Belfast to get a modest increase in their pensions. Come election time, the names of some of those elderly people will be on the list for a postal vote, sometimes without their approval.

Let us end the debate on a positive note. The image of the Assembly is, to use a common phrase, at rock bottom. A burst of sincerity and a commitment to put people before party, especially when those people are the most vulnerable, would be infinitely useful. Let us cut out the crap and get on with what we are paid to do. That is the real test, and some of the guff that Mr Paisley Jnr spoke earlier cuts no ice: it is as functional as an ashtray on his much-talked-about motorbike.

Mr Berry: As the youngest Member of this Assembly, I support the motion that stands in the names of Lord Morrow and Mr Paisley Jnr. I support the call to protect, assist and develop provisions for the elderly in Northern Ireland. I also support the motion's call to appoint an interim commissioner for the elderly. It is important that such a commissioner works closely with the two main advocates for the elderly, Help the Aged and Age Concern. Indeed, I want to put on record the tremendous work that those two groups carry out for elderly people: they are strong and effective voices for them.

How can the elderly be assisted? Although many issues have been raised already in the Chamber this morning, problems remain to be solved, such as ensuring that elderly people have easier access to necessary benefits. We must ensure that they claim the appropriate benefits. Last year, older people left over £4 million-worth of benefits unclaimed in the United Kingdom.

There must be greater awareness of the entitlements that are available under the warm homes scheme, which has already been mentioned. That was a very welcome scheme that the then Minister, Nigel Dodds MP, introduced. That strategy is still meeting the tremendous need that exists in the community, but it needs further promotion, given that 25,000 people aged over 65 died last year as a result of cold-related illnesses.

We also need to ensure that all the appropriate agencies, particularly the PSNI, work closely with local elderly residents to ensure that they receive the free measures that are available to help them secure their homes.

Transport services in Northern Ireland are very poor, and they need to be more accessible to, and reliable for, the elderly. We can also consider developing for the elderly other provisions that are poorly served across the United Kingdom. We need to ensure that those provisions are strengthened, not removed or reduced.

An interim commissioner could examine the differences in health provision across the new boards and trusts. We must ensure that personal social services and mental health services for the elderly are improved and protected.

Lord Morrow will be aware that the Armagh and Dungannon Health and Social Services Trust introduced this month a new meals-on-wheels service for elderly residents in Dungannon. That service is soon to be expanded to Armagh. Were elderly people consulted about that new service? What impact could it have on home-help services, given that hours could be reduced? Many elderly people are thankful for the home-help workers who come into their homes each day. Sometimes they are the only people whom those elderly people see. Health and social services trusts and boards must be monitored, and the voices of the elderly must be heard to ensure that they get the proper services.

Elderly people need someone to protect provision for them, and help to enhance services.

11.45 am

Much has been said about the need for our elderly to be protected. All too often, we learn of cowardly and disgusting attacks on our elderly population across the country. Our stomachs churn when we see on the news, or read about, pensioners describing the dreadful ordeal that they have faced at the hands of thugs who have entered their homes. We hear reports of elderly people being tied to chairs as their homes have been ransacked, and reports of their being thrown to the ground, having hammers pushed into their faces and being told to shut up or else they will be killed. It is disgusting and frightening to think about.

Far too often, we witness pensioners in tears on television gripping hankies as a result of the previous night's attack. We look at bruised bodies and faces and at bloodshot eyes — all because our elderly people need further protection.

That shameful trend must stop, and the Government must implement the long-promised community safety strategy for older people. Both Help the Aged and Age Concern in Northern Ireland have worked tirelessly to impress on the Government the need to revive that long-awaited strategy. David Hanson MP must take urgent action to work in partnership and deliver for the elderly people as he has promised.

Implementation of a strategy or the appointment of an interim commissioner certainly would not represent the waving of a magic wand. Strategies or commissioners will not solve all the problems on their own. However, it would represent a positive start if action were taken and resources provided to tackle those shameful attacks and trends.

The best scheme to help reduce and prevent crime would involve the Government, the PSNI, the wider community and — most importantly — the elderly people who are suffering. We were informed on 30 November 2006 that Age Concern, Help the Aged and the Northern Ireland Council for Voluntary Action (NICVA) had written to the NIO's community safety unit to request an update on the progress of the community safety strategy for older people. The question posed was: "What is happening with it and when?"

The community safety unit's response must be a positive one. I call on Minister Hanson to step up to the mark and deliver on the strategy. This Assembly must assist the voluntary bodies — namely, Age Concern and Help the Aged — with their demands on behalf of our elderly community.

If appointed, an interim commissioner for the elderly must work in partnership with the Government, the voluntary bodies, the PSNI and all other relevant agencies to deal with the issues facing our society. An interim commissioner would provide a welcome voice for all the elderly people who seek protection; would support delivery of local services; would assist the agencies to make a positive difference; and would be an effective link to the new patient and client council that is being set up under the review of public administration (RPA). We must work in partnership to help the elderly population feel safe again.

This Assembly must send out a clear and united message to all the relevant Ministers that an interim commissioner must be appointed to champion the needs of our elderly. The elderly need our support and that of the Government. They need access and choice, but, most of all, they need their dignity restored and protected.

Mr N Dodds: It is a pleasure to participate in this important debate. I am delighted to follow the hon Member for Newry and Armagh, who raised important points about the community safety strategy. Members on all sides have made important points about the need to appoint a commissioner for older people.

This is an important debate. Older people, and those who work with older people, recognise that, under the previous devolved arrangements, the Northern Ireland Assembly did important work to advance the interests and causes of our senior citizens. It is right and proper that the Transitional Assembly should focus its attention on our older people's needs through this debate on the appointment of an older persons' commissioner.

While we can discuss whether a commissioner should be an interim appointment or have an independent role, we must concentrate on the need to reach agreement on all sides that such a post should be created. At the outset, it is important to agree that an office should be set up to focus on the rights, concerns and interests of elderly people, and to advance their interests across all aspects of government and the wider community.

That is not a new demand; it has been around for some time. Northern Ireland has made considerable advances by appointing commissioners for children and victims, and creating other important independent roles to monitor, supervise and advance the interests of a whole range of sectors. It is essential that such a large, diverse and important sector of our community, which has contributed so much to society and that continues to do so, should have a champion to speak on its behalf.

Of course, many older people are well able to speak for themselves. In our constituencies, we have all met senior citizens who are extremely vociferous, energetic and active in representing a range of issues and interests in the community. Many older people simply want the right, and the resources, to enable them to live independent lives, free from worries about poverty and social exclusion. To achieve that, the Government must ensure that they deliver, across a range of policies, the means by which older people can, if they are able and if they wish, live independent lives.

However, many people in society, particularly senior citizens, are unable to live the independent lives to which we all aspire and many need a great deal of assistance along the way. It is when we, as public representatives, interact with the elderly and the agencies dedicated to helping them that we see the needs of the elderly at first hand and realise in how many areas of public and social policy more could, and should, be done to assist senior citizens. We need to take that very seriously. Many Members across all parties already do so, and the debate illustrates that.

Mr McCann: Will the Member give way?

Mr N Dodds: I will not, as my time is limited, and I wish to pursue a number of points. However, I am sure that the hon Member will catch the eye of the Deputy Speaker in due course.

It is essential that a commissioner be appointed as soon as possible by any Government, whether devolved or direct rule. Such an appointment should not await a devolution settlement but should proceed as quickly as possible. We must act in defence of older people; they need a champion across a range of issues.

Many Members have highlighted the issues of pension provision, benefits and fuel poverty. The concerns that older people raise with us, as constituency representatives, are access to the Health Service, hospital waiting lists and decent and suitable housing. Many elderly people benefit from the assistance of carers or, indeed, are carers themselves. Fuel poverty, crime, employment and transport also affect older folk, yet those are areas in which Government policy and delivery is often deficient. It is essential that those policy areas be tackled.

What could a commissioner actually do? In Wales, a commissioner for older people will be appointed next year, and it will be interesting to compare some of the work that is planned for the commissioner in that jurisdiction with what a Northern Ireland commissioner might do.

One of the main tasks for a commissioner for older people would be to influence policy and the legal regime that governs and affects older people. Such a commissioner would inform and support older people, be an advocate for their causes, safeguard their rights, be a point of contact in the investigation of complaints, promote awareness of their interests at Government level and encourage good practice. A commissioner's office could conduct research and develop policies for older people, ensuring that Northern Ireland complied with best practice. Northern Ireland should be at the cutting edge, not only in the United Kingdom but in Europe, in delivering services to older people.

(Madam Speaker in the Chair)

Many issues must be examined. We need a commissioner who can be a strong voice for senior citizens, and who can highlight and tackle issues such as age discrimination. Older people will be the first to say that they do not want an image being sent out of their being vulnerable, weak and unable to do things for themselves. We need a commissioner who will promote, encourage, support and facilitate a positive image of ageing and of older people. We are all getting older and, God willing, will be in the older people sector eventually. We must ensure that, as society gets older, all citizens, including young people, are given a positive image of older people. A commissioner for older people could help in that regard.

It is a difficult task. The appointment of a commissioner will not be a panacea for all problems for older folk. Policies will still need to be developed, and Government will still have to contend with competing departmental priorities and financial restrictions. As elected representatives of the people of Northern Ireland, we are sending out a positive message from the Assembly that, both now and in the future, the concept of a commissioner for older people is important. We are reiterating our support for senior citizens in a wide array of areas and saying that the appointment of a commissioner for older people should be a priority for a devolved, or direct-rule, Government. The House will wish to be united on that issue.

I am sure that the entire House will join the Members who have already spoken about Age Concern and Help the Aged in congratulating those organisations for the work that they have done to promote the interests of older people in Northern Ireland. I wish them well in their continuing work.

Mr Hillis: I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak to the motion. It is encouraging that, before today's debate, the idea of, or aspiration for, a commissioner for older people received enthusiastic cross-party support. It is academic whether the commissioner is an interim or permanent position. It could be argued that we either have a commissioner or we do not have a commissioner. Do we really want a halfway house? We could send out a far better message if we were to unite on the motion rather than be divided on such a vital issue.

Traditionally, many other countries and cultures have had an entirely different outlook towards elderly people than we do. In China, for instance, elderly people are revered as repositories of wisdom.

Many African nations have the same commendable philosophy. It would therefore be fitting for this Assembly to place on record the support of all political parties for the appointment of a commissioner for the elderly, whether interim or permanent. That would be an important first step in acknowledging the need to promote awareness and understanding of the rights and interests of older people.

12.00 noon

As other Members have highlighted, we lag behind our colleagues in Wales and Scotland. The National Assembly for Wales is to be particularly commended, as it intends to appoint an independent commissioner for older people next year. An Independent Communications and Management (ICM) poll in Wales showed that nine out of 10 people support a strong, independent commissioner for older people. The Scottish Parliament is actively debating the creation of a similar post.

Older people in Northern Ireland must be watching those developments with much frustration, as the devolved Governments of Scotland and Wales are busy instigating policies that our older people equally deserve. It is to be hoped that, with the imminent return of a devolved Assembly, we can turn this aspirational motion into reality. We are all too well aware that, while Members can make all the speeches that they want and posture as much as they like, until the Transitional Assembly becomes a real Assembly we are wasting our time.

The motion is vital to a large section of our community. Statistics on the number of older people in Northern Ireland vary greatly, but the figure is at least 200,000. That is set to rise to 24% of the population by 2013. Older people bring considerable assets to our country. They each bring a lifetime's experience, and they are hard-working when given the chance to show their talents and skills.

It is particularly sad that older people are frequently discriminated against during all stages of the employment process, from recruitment and training through to redundancy and retirement. I am especially pleased that the law is changing in Northern Ireland so that older members of the workforce who wish to continue in their jobs cannot be forced out simply because they have reached a certain birthday. Many older workers have much to offer, and many employers have told me how valuable their more senior employees are to their businesses.

Regrettably, many senior citizens do not enjoy good health. I am shocked that, according to overall UK figures, 25,000 people over the age of 65 died from preventable, cold-related illnesses last winter. In many cases, those deaths were a result of poverty and poor housing. Statistics show that, at any one time, 500,000 older people are believed to be abused in the United Kingdom. Shockingly, 46% of abuse directed towards elderly people is committed by family members — shame on them.

We are also told that one million elderly people will be spending this Christmas alone — nobody calling to say hello, just sitting by themselves over Christmas. This society should be ashamed of itself.

It seems that every news bulletin contains a report about the latest attack on an elderly person in their home. Older people are often seen as easy targets for burglars and muggers. Police statistics published recently by the BBC showed that there were 140 attacks on the over-50s in the four months up to last September. For the same period of this year, there were 204 attacks — a whopping 45% increase.

In reality, older people are less likely to be the victims of violent crime, but their fear is very real. This should be a priority issue for the police and for policy-makers.

Older people are to be ignored at our peril. They have major economic clout. Statistics show that older consumers — people aged over 50 — spend more than £170 billion each year. That is a lot of cash in anyone's language. Also, we are all aware that older voters are much more likely to exercise their franchise than the more junior members of the community. That is something always to be remembered, especially in the run-up to March 2007.

Madam Speaker: I apologise for calling Mr O'Dowd out of turn.

Mr O'Dowd: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

I support the amendment. However, I also congratulate Ian Paisley Jnr and Mr Morrow for proposing the motion. The amendment is not about usurping the DUP's motion. When the other parties contacted the lobby groups for older people, it was not in conspiracy against the DUP. It is common practice for political parties to speak to non-governmental organisations (NGOs), trade unions, etc, when matters come before the House for debate. We want to ensure that the motions that we pass are as representative of the needs of the people as possible.

As Mr Hillis said, it is unfortunate that this is only a motion and will not become legislation. We need to get to the point where we are able to introduce legislation before the House, rather than motions.

The amendment would strengthen the motion. It would not dilute it or take away from it; it would strengthen it, and that is why my party supports the amendment, which was drafted after discussions with older people's groups.

The amendment calls for an independent commissioner. It is in that independence that power and strength will lie for anyone who is placed in this post. We must ensure that he or she is not under the governance either of direct-rule Ministers or of the next Executive. We have to ensure that the commissioner is prepared to stand up to politicians and NGOs alike — to all sectors of administration — to ensure that the needs of the people who he or she is appointed to represent are indeed represented. That is paramount. That is where the power of any commissioner will lie.

It was said earlier that the British Government want to eradicate poverty among older people by 2010. We are two weeks away from 2007, and many older people are living in poverty as we speak. My constituency of Upper Bann includes the Craigavon council area, which has one of the highest cold-related death rates in the winter months of any region in the North. When I saw the figures, I could not believe that so many people were dying from the cold in our society. The role of an independent commissioner — and of an incoming Executive — would be to ensure that we eradicate such things.

We know what is needed. There is no need for an interim commissioner to reinvestigate the needs of older people. The lobby groups, the NGOs and the older people themselves know. They are in and out of all of our constituency offices every day. We know the needs of older people. It is time for an independent commissioner to be appointed to ensure that those needs are met.

In relation to crimes against the elderly, it is unfortunate that politics has been brought into the debate and that Ian Paisley Jnr has used this debate to lambaste my party over policing. He used our serious concerns about the accountability measures in policing to suggest that somehow Sinn Féin's view on policing allows attacks on older people to take place.

Following the logic of that argument, there should be no attacks against the elderly in North Antrim, North Belfast or Upper Bann — but there are. Therefore, that is not a logical argument. Jail is the only place for people who attack and intimidate the elderly, and there is no hiding place for them in the nationalist and republican community. It is unfortunate that the Member chose to insult that community by saying that those hiding places exist: they do not.

It is important that we use today's debate to go forward with a united voice. Perhaps the amendment will not be made, but if we politicians, who are much-maligned in this part of the world, can send a message to direct-rule Ministers — and, indeed, to any incoming Executive — that it is time to make appointments and to publish and implement a safety strategy for elderly people, we will have done a good day's work.

Mrs M Bradley: Recent media and public attention has focused on sudden outbursts of attacks on the elderly, such as the rampage in south Antrim last week. However, the sad and disgraceful fact is that elderly people are robbed every day in Northern Ireland. Recent statistics tell us that there have been more than 560 such attacks since the beginning of the year — nearly two attacks each day. I am sure that many other attacks do not get reported and, therefore, are not counted in current statistics. If those crimes are to be stopped, we need to understand them better. More research is necessary. A targeted system of prevention to deter offenders is also necessary, and it must be supported by community action.

The full impact of those crimes can be understood only in the context of the isolation that many elderly people feel already. Not only are they being attacked physically and robbed of their possessions, they are often alone and helpless in dealing with the aftermath. My immediate fear is that those attacks will isolate elderly people further, compounding their fear and making it difficult for them to leave their homes, while making them more fearful of staying in their homes.

That is why we require a commissioner for the elderly who is charged with empowering them in all aspects of their lives, not least in helping them to prevent and cope with any crimes that may be committed against them. However, I feel strongly that, as a matter of urgency, a task force should be created that incorporates the manpower of all the statutory bodies that have that responsibility to all generations, particularly the elderly. As recent attacks illustrate, elderly people are being preyed on by mindless thugs and individuals who see them as easy targets. Any proposed task force should be able to research and develop strategies to prevent such crimes and to provide assistance and resources to protect the older members of our communities.

Too many elderly people lead miserable and sad existences. Many live in one room of their homes, such as their fears of incurring huge electricity bills and using too much oil. Their meagre state pensions and miserly winter fuel allowances simply do not equate with the rising costs of maintaining a warm home.

Fuel poverty is an all-too-common plague in our society, and elderly people are one of the most vulnerable groups who suffer as a result of that. Fifty-four per cent of householders aged 60 and over currently live with the misery of fuel poverty. The all-too-common utility-bill hikes, combined with a non-index-linked pension, are enough to make elderly people worry about the cost of living without having the additional anxieties of feeling under threat within their own four walls.

I am sure that we all have older family members whom we are keen to protect. However, more than 80,000 older people live alone in Northern Ireland, and a substantial number of those are literally alone in their communities because they have no families at all. I urge society to stand up and be counted and to help identify and assist such people, who are perhaps afraid to ask for help, or, more likely, are afraid to leave their homes because they do not know whom they can trust.

In recent years, horrific injustices have been inflicted upon the elderly. Women in their late 80s have not only had their houses burgled, they have been subjected to the humiliation of rape. Elderly men have been beaten almost to death for a few pounds. How long can we allow that to go on? It is not only a disgrace on those who carry out such attacks; it is a terrifying indication of where our society is heading.

As politicians, we have a responsibility to lead on the issue. We must not wait for the problem to get worse before taking practical and radical steps to secure the immediate prevention of crime against the elderly, proper means of support for them and the provision of the research and resources needed to make the lives of the elderly easier and safer. That is a necessity, not a luxury; indeed, feeling safe in one's home is a basic human right.

Such attacks occur not only in Antrim but throughout Northern Ireland. In my constituency of Foyle, there has been occasion to condemn attacks on those who care for the elderly as well as elderly people themselves. That is totally unacceptable in any society.

Older people want nothing more than to live in peace with dignity — they certainly deserve to. I ask the House to unite in support of the amendment, which was requested by Help the Aged, who represent the interests of the elderly. Members are all big enough, old enough and brave enough to stand together to support the most important people in Northern Ireland — the older generation.

Lord Morrow: I regret the attempt to divide the House on an issue around which Members should unite. It beggars belief that, on such an issue, and while paying so much lip-service to the elderly, two parties have united in an attempt to amend the motion. Why they cannot support the motion is beyond me; they gave not a single reason. Not one of their Members could find fault with it. They have been exposed as wanting to play politics with an issue that should be above politics.

As one goes through life one learns to judge people by what they do rather than by what they say. It is certainly better to judge political parties in that way. Let us examine what some parties do when they can help the aged. When my party drafted its manifesto, it took the matter so seriously that it drew up a 12-point commitment to senior citizens; others sat idly by and did nothing. Today, they pay lip-service to the elderly and claim to be very concerned.

Furthermore, when Nigel Dodds and I were Ministers we did more than pay lip-service to the elderly; we pioneered the winter fuel payment on their behalf. We also introduced an A to Z guide to help and assistance —

Mrs D Kelly: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. When Mark Durkan was Finance Minister, he prioritised fuel poverty and the then Minister refused —

Madam Speaker: That is not a point of order.

Mr Dallat: The Member brandishes his party manifesto. Is it not a rule of the House that exhibits should not be displayed?

Madam Speaker: I will look into that, although I understand that that is, by convention, permissible.

Mr Dallat: I was rebuked when I held up a book entitled 'Lost Lives'. If that book was not acceptable, a DUP manifesto is scarcely permissible.

Madam Speaker: I totally agree.

Lord Morrow: When you throw a stone into a pack of dogs, you always know the one that you have hit. [Interruption.]

If you have something to say, Mr Ervine, get up and say it. Normally you are not worth listening to.

Mr Berry spoke earlier and hit the nail on the head when he said that that we must say with a clear and united voice to everyone out there that we are serious about this matter. The challenge to the House is whether Members are really serious — are we here to pay lip service to helping the elderly or do we really want to better their lot? Members will see in a few moments which is the case.

If the House unites with me on nothing else, it should unite with me in paying tribute to Help the Aged and Age Concern and acknowledging their superb work in helping that section of our community. Those organisations are very often a link to the outside world for many people, particularly those who live alone.

I wish to share some relevant and important statistics with the House. The population of Northern Ireland in 1999 was 1.7 million, of which 472,000 people were aged 50 or older. The proportion of the population aged 60 and over is 27.9%; the proportion aged 75 and over is 9.1%. Twenty-four per cent of households are headed by a person over 65. The proportion of older households who are owner-occupiers is 57%; 33% are in Housing Executive accommodation. Those figures speak for themselves. There is a direct challenge here for us as public representatives and as an Assembly, and a great responsibility lies upon us.

Mr Shannon: Two thirds of the acute beds in the Province are filled by the over-65s; there have been 600 burglaries, 350 violent crimes and 210 assaults carried out in six months against the elderly; £1 million pounds in benefits is unclaimed. Does the Member agree that it is urgent that an interim commissioner for the elderly be appointed right away?

Lord Morrow: I accept the point and thank Mr Shannon for bringing that to the attention of the Assembly.

I take issue with Mr McCarthy — and I am sorry that he is not in his place at the moment — in relation to his point on free travel. It was the DUP Ministers Peter Robinson and Gregory Campbell who introduced that. Mr McCarthy made the inaccurate comment that free travel does not include the Strangford ferry. I want to clarify that, because it was the same two Ministers who pioneered the free travel on the Strangford ferry. [Interruption.]

The Member can shake his head, but it is a fact. [Interruption.]

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: That wee man from Coleraine would not know.

Lord Morrow: He would not know; that is right.

'The Irish News' carried an article on 30 January about the work of Help the Aged. They brought to light the startling figure that one in every eight older people is subject to abuse of some shape or sort. That is a startling figure, and the Assembly has to say that this issue must be tackled.

I welcome Mr Dodds's comments. He outlined, in some detail, what he envisages the role of a new commissioner to be. However, he also struck an important note when he talked about the importance of not depicting the elderly as not fit for purpose. Take a look round the House today: many elderly people make a valuable and useful contribution, not only to the life of the Assembly, but to work outside it.

I do not regard the elderly as less articulate, less skilful or less able. Many are highly capable and should not be dumped as though they are the rubbish of society when they reach 50, 60, 70 or 80 years of age.

Some people, when they reach the twilight years of their lives, make a greater contribution to society than they did when they were younger. It is, therefore, important for the Assembly to unite in support of the motion proposed by my party colleague Mr Paisley Jnr.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Question, That the amendment be made, put and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly calls for the appointment of an Independent Commissioner for Older People who would have the necessary powers to effectively promote, safeguard and protect the rights of older people.

ASSEMBLY BUSINESS

Resignation of Patricia Lewsley

Madam Speaker: I wish to advise the House that I have received a letter of resignation from Ms Patricia Lewsley. Her resignation takes immediate effect; therefore, the arrangements provided for in Standing Order 17(h) will apply. I remind Members that Mr Durkan, the nominating officer for the SDLP, may exercise the right to vote in respect of that vacancy.

Lord Morrow: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Is that resignation effective from today, yesterday or now?

Madam Speaker: It takes immediate effect.

The sitting was suspended at 12.28 pm.

On resuming (Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Molloy] in the Chair) —

2.00 pm

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

Free Personal Care

Mr Deputy Speaker: The next item on the Order Paper is the motion on free personal care.

Mr Kennedy: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. I wish to raise a concern. The Speaker has, very helpfully, provided Members with a copy of correspondence from the Secretary of State detailing his response to the Assembly debate on the review of public administration (RPA). It appears that the Secretary of State is ignoring the wishes and representations made in that debate.

On behalf of the Ulster Unionist Party, I wish to register my great dissatisfaction that, in this Transitional Assembly created by the Secretary of State, he is not prepared to accept the democratic will of the Assembly and its view on the RPA. I would be grateful if, through the Speaker's Office, that view could be conveyed to the Secretary of State.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I will refer your concern to the Speaker, Mr Kennedy. However, it was not a point of order.

The Business Committee has agreed to allow two hours for this debate. The proposer of the motion will have 15 minutes to speak; all other Members will have 10 minutes.

Rev Dr Robert Coulter: I beg to move

That this Assembly calls on an incoming Executive to undertake an independent review to establish the cost, and resources required, of implementing free personal care for the elderly, taking note of the experience of the Scottish Executive and Scottish local authorities, and to provide a timetable for the introduction of such free personal care in Northern Ireland.

This motion concerns many people in our country: almost 30% of our population are aged over 50; and more than 16% are over retirement age, which is 65 years for men and 60 years for women. In some areas, pensioners number an even higher proportion of the population. In Belfast, for instance, pensioners account for almost 18% of the population. By anyone's standards, the pensioner population is therefore a very significant and — in my view, at least — undervalued segment of society.

Society is ageing. By 2025, for the first time, the number of people in Britain over the age of 60 will outnumber those under 25. That trend will accelerate as the large post-war baby-boom generation enters retirement. In sheer population terms, therefore, public policy will need to focus significantly more on the older population than it does at present. Political establishments will also have to sit up and take notice of older people as the number of older voters increases. Even if politicians do not take policy decisions in the interests of older people on grounds of basic human decency, they will have a very good reason for doing so as the older persons' vote increases. Unlike twenty-somethings, older people actually cast their votes.

Free personal care for the elderly is an aspiration that we in the Assembly must work towards in the most practical and fiscally responsible way possible. That is why, through the motion, I advocate a proper, fiscally prudent and responsible way forward and why I advocate that the incoming Executive urgently commission an independent review to establish the cost and resources required to implement a programme of free personal care for the elderly in our Province.

That method of proceeding is important as a statement of the Assembly's maturity in its approach to framing legislation. Members owe it to the taxpayer to take a hard-headed practical approach on all aspects of public spending, no matter how sensitive or desirable that spending may be.

Anyone can demand a wish-list without the responsibility of having to pay for it. Indeed, those parties that have never been in Government can easily demand this or that policy aspiration, knowing full well that they are never going to have to exercise the fiscal discipline to actually define where the money to pay for this or that scheme has to come from. That fiscal discipline should apply to everything that the Assembly does.

No matter how worthwhile the measure is, the electorate will not thank us if we spend its money without due consideration of where that money comes from or what other service will suffer. We must put it in the overall range of public spending in a prioritised order.

There is a range of factors that an incoming Administration will have to consider and evaluate as part of an economic appraisal of a policy of free personal care for the elderly. I suggest that those should include demography and population projections for the 60-plus age group, based on census data and a healthy life expectancy. In Scotland, for instance, a 0.25% per year reduction was arrived at in the proportion of the older population that requires personal care services.

Again, consideration should be given to the level of informal care. In Scotland, they arrived at a figure of 12% based on some of the limited comparative information that was available from related research on the issue from America. Scottish experience has also indicated that there has not been a significant reduction in informal care, despite the rolling-out of a policy of free personal care for the elderly in 2002. I also suggest that an assessment of the level of unmet need is required. In Scotland, that was estimated at an annual range of between £15 million and £25 million; by extension, I estimate that the Northern Irish pro-rata level is between £5 million and £8.5 million. Cost progression is also an important factor to be considered. In Scotland, a 2% year-on-year real increase in the costs of care over and above inflation was assumed.

Workforce availability and associated training factors; the impact of changing patterns of care and care practices; the impact of inflation on all forward projections; and predictions of realistic delivery costs must also be arrived at. We must also consider the policy's interaction with other financial support programmes, and the extent to which those might help to mitigate costs.

All the factors that I have listed are part of the complex evidential base on which to set the levels and the procedural base for rolling out a programme of free personal care for the elderly. That list is not exhaustive, and some areas are disputed, especially those associated with future growth costs.

Having said all that, and having set out the most effective way to proceed in the terms of both the motion and how a future Executive could handle the rolling-out of this programme, I am sure that free personal care for the elderly should be very high on the must-do list for the Assembly and its incoming Executive. Financial considerations aside, this policy is surely an acid test of any truly civilised society.

In two reports, as long ago as March 1999 and September 2003, the Royal Commission for the Long-Term Care of the Elderly recommended the introduction of free personal care, underwritten by general taxation, based on need rather than wealth.

It is true that some 70% of older people in long-term care get some state help with the costs. Many of those people will have had to use their not necessarily large capital, including the proceeds of selling their house, and so suffer the indignity of being reduced to penury before state support kicks in.

That is an unacceptable situation in any civilised society, and we must not allow it to continue. The issue must be tackled; elderly people have paid their dues to society throughout their lifetimes, and no one with any conscience believes that they should be reduced to penury before the state kicks in to help them.

As long ago as July 2002, the Scottish Executive introduced free personal care for the elderly — a move supported by all political parties in the Scottish Parliament. I hope that similar support will be shown in this Chamber. The debate on the future cost projections for that policy is ongoing in Scotland. However, the Scottish Executive and the Royal Commission have stated that it is affordable.

The charity Alzheimer Scotland has also said that tomorrow's older people are more likely to be fit and active than those of previous generations, and will thus require fewer services. Had the Father of the House, my Friend Dr Paisley, been in the Chamber, I would have asked him to join me in bowing to the sentiment of that statement.

In 2005-06, free personal care cost a mere 1.73% of the Scottish health budget. According to evidence provided to the Assembly's Health Committee in May 2002, the cost of free personal care in Northern Ireland would be between £40 million and £50 million. That figure equates to a mere 1.85% of the £2.7 billion Northern Ireland health budget for 2004-05.

In 2003 and 2005, the Ulster Unionist Party made manifesto commitments to work for the introduction of free personal care, and we intend to work hard to honour those commitments. The Assembly decision in 2002 to introduce free nursing care — but not free personal care — was intended to be, as recognised by the Royal Commission, a transitional position in the context of establishing the cost of, and securing resources for, free personal care. That decision was made some four years ago, and enough time has elapsed for the Assembly to take action on the matter as a priority.

With regard to providing free personal care for the elderly, change is the only option before the House. The current position must be changed. A research paper commissioned by the Scottish Executive showed that, with an increasing proportion of Scots owning their homes and with the value of almost all homes exceeding the capital limits for means-tested contributions to elderly care, a failure to adopt a policy of free personal care would result in the balance of cost moving away from the state towards homeowners. That was considered to be a backward step, and one that would put social policy into reverse.

Northern Ireland faces the same issue. In 1971, 45.9% of Northern Ireland households were owner-occupied; in 2001, that figure had risen to 68.8%. The dramatic increase in home ownership in Northern Ireland will remove an increasing proportion of people from the existing publicly funded personal care safety net.

The Royal Commission's report from 1999 states that:

"The system at the moment helps people who are poor, demands that people of modest means make themselves poor before it will help, and affects people to a lesser degree the richer they are and better able to afford the sums required."

The Royal Commission has described free personal care for the elderly as:

"in the best tradition of social policy in this country", which ensures welfare, security and dignity for those of modest means who have worked, paid their taxes, saved and who own their homes. To introduce free personal care for the elderly would, therefore, be intrinsic to the way that we develop social policy in this country. It would be entirely consistent with the principles underlying the concept of a National Health Service and the social services that are provided. The time for that requirement to be provided has not only come — it is long overdue. I therefore have pleasure in moving the motion.

2.15 pm

Mr McCarthy: I beg to move the following amendment: Leave out all after "Assembly" and insert

"notes the research previously carried out on the costs of free personal care in Northern Ireland, as well as the results of the introduction of free personal care in Scotland, and calls on any incoming Executive to introduce free personal care in Northern Ireland as a priority."

I disagree with little that the proposer of the motion said. However, Northern Ireland is awash with reviews, reports, consultations, etc, and we do not need to wait for any more research to be done on this subject. Before us is a 100-page report on free personal care in Northern Ireland, which was commissioned during the time of the Northern Ireland Assembly. It has been updated until 2005.

I am delighted that this important issue has been brought to the Floor of the House. It does not seem that long ago that I stood in the same place and moved amendments to the Health and Personal Social Services Bill 2002 in order to provide free personal care alongside free nursing care for the elderly. Sadly, the other parties in the Assembly rejected my amendments at that time. The proposed measures did not have to be introduced immediately, but at the Minister's discretion and when funding became available.

Had the amendments been included in the Bill, the Assembly would have been much further down the road towards accomplishing its goals. I am convinced that a golden opportunity to progress what has become an important subject in the meantime has been missed.

I am pleased that all Assembly parties showed their commitment to free personal care in their 2003 manifestos. The British Medical Association (BMA) also supports the provision of free personal and nursing care in Northern Ireland. The Alliance Party's position is that no time should be wasted in fully implementing the Royal Commission's recommendations as soon as a new Executive is in place.

Following agreement by the Assembly to accept the Royal Commission's recommendations on long-term care for the elderly in Northern Ireland, the Northern Ireland Assembly set up an interdepartmental group based on the Scottish Executive's care development group.

The reasons given by the Sinn Féin Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and the SDLP Chairperson of the Health, Social Services and Public Safety Committee for rejecting my amendments to the Health and Personal Social Services Bill 2002 on 24 June 2002 were that the necessary funding was not in place and that the time was not right. Indeed, almost any excuse was given not to include the amendments, which, as I said, did not necessarily have to be implemented there and then.

The Executive received a report in July 2002, which, as I said, has been updated on a yearly basis ever since. However, that report was never made public because of the suspension of the Assembly in October 2002. I managed to get a copy of the original report and its updates. It shows that the background work on this important issue has been done and it includes all the questions raised by Rev Coulter.

Scotland introduced free personal care in 2002, and the Scottish Executive gave money to local authorities to implement the policy. We can learn lessons from the experience there. The 2003 update of the Royal Commission's report, the Sutherland Report, criticised the failure of Governments throughout the UK to implement the recommendations of its report and said that the state should exempt personal care from means-testing altogether. That is very important. Let us ensure that the next time the Royal Commission comments, it can add Northern Ireland to the list of the parts of the UK that have implemented the recommendations in full. Let the Assembly today end the scandal of older vulnerable people having to sell the roof over their heads — often the home in which they have lived for many years — to fund care for which they have already paid through the payment of taxes all their working lives.

The Alliance Party welcomes the change of heart on this issue, particularly the new commitment to free personal care from colleagues in the Ulster Unionist Party. I hope that they, and all the other parties in an incoming Executive, will turn their paper promises into a living reality —

Mr Kennedy: Hear, hear.

Mr McCarthy: — and not duck the challenge at the last minute as they did on 24 June 2002. We need action, not further reports or consultation documents.

Dr McCrea: I support the motion, and I welcome this opportunity to debate the issues that it raises.

As many Members will be aware, my party played a prominent role in the Northern Ireland Assembly in highlighting the need for free personal care for older people. Many, if not all, elderly people in the Province have paid taxes and National Insurance in the belief that when they were old and in need, perhaps due to disease or disability, the state would readily assist them.

Like the Royal Commission's 1999 report on long-term care for the elderly, we recognise that people can reasonably be expected to meet certain costs. The Royal Commission divided the care issue into a number of categories. It said that living and accommodation costs were the sort of costs to which people could reasonably be expected to contribute. However, it said that nursing and personal care costs should be met out of general taxation.

Our senior citizens deserve the right to retain their independence, pride and self-esteem and the right to be able to continue living in the area that they have made their home. As mentioned in the motion, the Scottish Executive introduced free personal care for the elderly. We can learn much from the Scottish experience, both positive and negative, and the bulk of my remarks will relate to the developments there and the lessons that we in Northern Ireland can learn from them.

In Scotland, England, Wales and Northern Ireland, projected growth patterns for the older population over the next 50 years are similar, with the population aged 85 and over growing most quickly. Variation in income, wealth and receipt of state benefits within the countries of the United Kingdom is greater than the variation between them. Thus, Scotland as a whole is broadly comparable with other parts of the United Kingdom in respect of its demographic characteristics and the average economic circumstances of older people. It provides a useful case study of the provision of free personal and nursing care, which has implications for other parts of the United Kingdom.

The Scottish Parliament's Health Committee said that the policy, which was introduced in 2003, had provided greater security and dignity to many older people, but that demand was outstripping available resources in many of the country's local authorities. The Committee said that the Scottish Executive should carry out a thorough review of resources required by councils to finance free personal care adequately.

In Scotland, local councils have this responsibility. Almost half of Scotland's 32 councils had waiting lists for free personal care. There was confusion over whether the policy covered meal preparation costs, which were being charged by some councils but not by others. In 2004-05, the total funding of £147 million left councils with a shortfall of £73 million to provide free personal care.

The Health Committee report also stated that the Executive should "remove the financial incentive" for councils to delay assessments for free personal care by introducing a mandatory deadline or by allowing claims for free personal care to be backdated from the point of eligibility rather than the point of assessment.

According to a recent independent assessment conducted by the Joseph Rowntree Foundation, free personal care — such as help with washing, dressing and grooming — has alleviated money worries for older people in Scotland with modest means and has not led to a feared reduction in the informal support provided by relatives and friends. Initially, the Scottish Executive allocated £8 million for the increased provision of formal care to offset an expected reduction in informal care. There is no evidence, as yet, of any such switch. Indeed, free personal care at home has helped informal carers by giving them more time to do other less hands-on support tasks.

The independent report contains an economic analysis, which shows that the policy has cost more than expected. For example, in 2002-03, £127 million was spent compared with the £107 million planned. Similarly, in 2003-04, £143 million was spent rather than the expected £125 million. Nevertheless, that represents only 0.6% of the Scottish Executive's total budget of £25 billion, so it had only a relatively marginal impact on spending in other areas.

However, Scotland now has waiting lists to restrict elderly people's demands for free personal care. A statistical snapshot taken on a single day in February showed that 4,005 people were waiting to be assessed; an additional 709 people had been assessed but were still waiting to receive a service. The report anticipates that a major increase in the number of people aged 85 years or over might lead to a tripling of the public cost of personal care by 2053. However, a further shift towards the provision of more care services at home, combined with policies to promote a healthier life expectancy, can significantly reduce the projected bill.

Several wider lessons and conclusions can be drawn from the report. Free personal care can support clients' wishes for person-centred care that is sensitive to individual needs. By shifting the balance of care, costs can be moderated. It is important that projections of future trends do not simply reproduce existing models of balance of care. A new approach to the costing of care packages that avoids the problematic classification of tasks and their allocation to different budgets could address many difficulties, for individuals and for the delivery and cost of service provision. Free personal care can make provision for people of modest means, especially women and people with conditions such as Alzheimer's disease, more equitable. For that group, personal care payments are no longer a burden, particularly towards the end of their lives, when such care is vital. However, they can still face charges for some aspects of their care.

There is a need for balance between nationally agreed priorities and local authority autonomy. Free personal care promotes more joined-up approaches, reduces money worries and enables informal carers to continue caring. Thus it can improve clients' quality of life and support for their care choices.

2.30 pm

The costs of free personal and nursing care expressed as a share of national output depend on underlying demographic change; they are also sensitive to the balance of care provision, a shift to more care at home, older people staying healthier for longer, changes in the cost of care, the rate of economic growth, and changes in the proportion of the population funding their own care due to changing rates of home ownership.

The future costs of personal and nursing care are uncertain. Unless cost increases are restrained, demographic pressures will lead to substantial increases over the next 35 years. The rate of cost inflation in healthcare is several percentage points ahead of the general rate of inflation in the economy as a whole, and that should not be overlooked. In introducing free personal care in Northern Ireland, we would have much to consider. It may not prove as straightforward an undertaking as some imagine, but it is vital that we face the challenges and let our elderly population know that the Assembly and, possibly, a future Executive, would give a high priority to the senior citizens who have made this country as prosperous as it is.

Ms S Ramsey: Go raibh maith agat, Mr Deputy Speaker. Like other Members, I thank the Rev Coulter and Billy Bell for tabling this motion calling on an incoming Executive to undertake an independent review leading to the implementation of free personal care. I also want to touch on the reviews and consultations that Kieran McCarthy mentioned. With that in mind, my party will support the amendment. Some Members highlighted the stark statistics on free personal care, and all of us in the Chamber have been working to ensure that it is introduced.

In this morning's debate, in which calls were made for the appointment of a commissioner for the elderly, several Members spoke about the difficulties facing our senior citizens, ranging from brutal attacks to fuel poverty and ill health. It was interesting to note that it was yet another issue on which all the parties could agree and that they supported the motion and the amendment.

My party colleague Pat O'Rawe mentioned the fact that by 2020 more than half the population of Ireland will be over 60 years of age. It struck me that half the Members in the Chamber might reach that age next year or the year after. The Rev Coulter and the Rev McCrea both quoted some statistics, and I do not propose to go over them again. However, those statistics make it clear that the outlook is stark for those who gave so much to society and who, in many cases, moulded our communities into what they are today.

Society is judged by how we treat our young people and our elderly citizens alike. I would like to know how we would be judged. I also want to commend organisations such as Age Concern and Help the Aged, which for years have highlighted issues that affect the elderly in our society. Those organisations and others from the community and voluntary sector have ensured that those issues have remained centre-stage.

I am proud to support the motion and the amendment. In the last Assembly I tabled a motion on the no-day-named list, calling on the Executive to make finances and resources available for the introduction of free personal care. Kieran McCarthy will agree with me that none of the parties has paid lip-service to the issues. We all worked towards free personal care and agreed on it in the House and in the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety.

Kieran McCarthy is also aware that when the then Minister for Health, Social Services and Public Safety, Bairbre de Brún, introduced free nursing care in 2002, she made it clear that she was keen to introduce free personal care. However, at that time, the Executive had not identified the financial resources. That was an issue then, and, four years on, it is still an issue. I hope that we do not have to wait another four years; the quicker that an incoming Executive sort that out, the better.

In the 2003 Assembly elections, as several Members have mentioned, the five main parties had a commitment to free personal care written into their manifestos. Consequently, 105 MLAs are committed to the introduction of free personal care. Everyone is working towards that. People who are directly affected — healthcare professionals, carers, stakeholders, politicians and families — also support the introduction of free personal care.

In 2002 and 2004, the BBC conducted surveys, 'Your NHS: For Better or Worse'. In both surveys, viewers voted the issue of free long-term care for elderly people as the top NHS priority.

Discrimination in the provision of health services that are available to older people must be addressed. There must be an adequate level of nursing care and residential accommodation, as well as a wider review of services for people with head trauma, including strokes and resulting from accidents, the objective being to remove discrimination in the provision of services to those aged over 65.

The introduction of free personal care for all older people is essential. The refusal by the British Government to provide free personal care has serious implications. Rev McCrea gave the example of people who suffer from illnesses such as Alzheimer's disease. Dementia may not be classified as a health need, and that will lead to the denial of necessary services.

The needs of carers must be addressed. When I was a member of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety — Rev Coulter will be aware of this — we took evidence from people who were carers for 24 hours a day, seven days a week and 365 days a year. That presented a stark image of the issues that must be addressed. An appropriate package should be funded to ensure that day-care provision, respite care and so forth, are available.

In Scotland, what has free personal care meant? There are three key elements to the legislation: free personal care for elderly people; the regulation of care services for elderly people; and the take-up of direct payments. That legislation has provided greater security and dignity for elderly people; it has allowed for them to be cared for more readily at home, assisted their carers and reduced the number of delayed discharges, thus freeing up NHS resources; it has largely ended disputes about the care of elderly people between local authorities and health boards; it has led to fewer complaints about the care of elderly people being reported to the Public Services Ombudsman; and it has prompted consideration to be given to the development of an elderly person care policy.

However, there have been concerns about the implementation of free personal care for elderly people in Scotland. Some Members have referred to these problems, which include: questions about the funding formula put in place by the Scottish Executive; the operation of waiting lists for free personal care by local authorities; the failure by the Scottish Executive to enforce clear guidance on key aspects such as the preparation of meals; the level of free personal care funding that has not increased in line with inflation — an issue on which this Assembly should keep an eye; and a lack of clarity regarding the date from which payments are required to be made, which could create a financial incentive for local authorities to delay assessments. This Assembly must learn from those mistakes and ensure that they are not repeated here.

During yesterday's debate on the Bamford Review of Mental Health and Learning Disability, I said that it is all well and good to have the debate and produce recommendations, but it is the outcomes that must be carefully monitored. I take on board what Rev Coulter said, and Sinn Féin will support the motion and the amendment.

Mrs Hanna: I support the motion. I was a registered nurse, and I spent the seven years before I was elected to the Assembly assessing older people for domiciliary care. Therefore, on a daily basis, I was in contact with older people who needed care. That experience brought home to me the unfairness of the system, which created uncertainty about the future care of people who were at the stage when they should have been able to make the best of their lives. At times, people considered it necessary to sell their homes to pay for their care. Those people had paid taxes and had scrimped and saved for a home of their own in order to provide for their family. This is, understandably, a hugely emotive issue.

Let us ensure that the Assembly will be up and running in March so that we can implement free personal care in Northern Ireland. To that end, I hope that the two largest parties will step up to the mark by accepting power sharing and by signing up to the requirements of a lawful society. That will enable us to get on with the real business that we were elected to carry out, which is to govern Northern Ireland. To do otherwise will mean that all of these debates on issues that we feel strongly about may well be useful, but will constitute nothing more than the product of a talking shop.

The SDLP is in favour of the full implementation of the Royal Commission's recommendations on long-term care. It is impossible to separate the nursing and personal care elements of long-term care; they are not separated when elderly people are in hospital, so why should they be separated when they are at home or in residential care? I made that point in a statement on 1 January 2001, and I am sure that many Members supported me. It is long past time to give older people the dignity, equality and fairness in healthcare that they deserve. The complexity of separating the nursing and personal care elements is counterproductive.

I am disappointed that there has been point-scoring on this matter. Age Concern has given Members a list of the debates that have taken place in the Assembly, and no one here should be ashamed. Everyone has supported the principle of free personal care for the elderly. Members did not support Mr McCarthy's amendment to the Health and Personal Social Services Bill on 24 June 2002 because we were in the middle of an interdepartmental review. Shortly after that review was completed, the Assembly was suspended. It is very unfortunate that we have not achieved free personal care, but it is now time to get on with it.

I would like to go through the main recommendations of the Royal Commission's report, 'With Respect to Old Age: Long Term Care — Rights and Responsibilities'. First, it states that, where the need for long-term personal care has been established, it should be provided free of charge. Secondly, it states that care should be provided on the basis of need, rather than on whether it is being provided at home or in hospital. Thirdly, it states that the whole community should share the risk of care payments — a cost best met through general taxation. Fourthly, the report states that the cost to the nation as a whole is affordable; around two years ago, the cost to the UK was calculated at around £1 billion a year.

What is personal care, and why have we ended up with such a complex system in which it has been separated from nursing care? Personal care has best been defined as help that would not be carried out by a registered nurse, but might include: help with personal care; help with dressing; help with mobility, including getting in and out of bed; and help with meals. No one is going to exploit that type of care. People are entitled to it.

Long-term care services for older people are acutely under-resourced. Re-igniting the debate exposes the complexity of the current system. I firmly believe in the National Health Service and I believe that older people should receive high-quality care for ever. In short, the system has to be fair, but meeting needs is very important. Older people are entitled to dignity and peace of mind.

2.45 pm

I am a strong supporter of community care, and I firmly believe that the National Health Service should provide help and support for patients in community settings. Indeed, if we were better at doing that, we could use our acute hospital beds more appropriately.

Although it is not specific to today's debate, I believe that providing for older people's lesser needs — by ensuring that there were more podiatrists so that older people can stay on their feet, more physiotherapists and more occupational therapists — would be a real help. Through free travel and other measures, we can keep older people mentally and physically alert. As other Members said, some of us are getting closer to the point of free travel than others, so we all have a vested interest. It is also a fact that our older population is growing in size.

We cannot ignore the implications of funding for long-term strategic planning; we must develop an evidence-based approach to that. Whether older people are cared for at home or in care homes, it is essential that we have much more health-and-safety monitoring. I note the significant issues of cost and practicality that must be weighed when we consider those matters.

The motion in the name of the Rev Robert Coulter mentions the Scottish model. I have been following the Scottish experience with interest, but it is not without flaws, as other Members stated. It was estimated recently that 5,000 Scottish pensioners are waiting for personal care because many local councils, through which the funding is provided, do not have sufficient resources. Perhaps that system is not working out as had been hoped. That is all the more reason for watching that space carefully to see how Scotland manages its system. An impact assessment is being carried out, but we do not have the report yet.

Our dilemma has been compounded — as my colleague Margaret Ritchie mentioned during this morning's debate — by the fact that practically all our statutory homes have been closed. That was a big mistake that the Thatcher Government made some years ago. We support the independent sector, which, we realise, has concerns about making its homes a viable business, but we must look at the matter from a health-and-safety point of view. We no longer have statutory homes, so we have lost that benchmark.

Finally, I restate that personal care should be available without charge for everyone in Northern Ireland who needs it, whether at home, in a care home or in hospital, whether they have Alzheimer's disease or cancer. Such care is free for those with cancer, but it is not free for those with Alzheimer's disease, and that is grossly unfair. I hope that an operational Assembly will soon be in place so that we can consider urgently implementing the necessary policies.

Mrs Foster: I support the motion in the names of Billy Bell and the Rev Robert Coulter. We have reflected much this afternoon on the Scottish experience, where nursing and personal care in residential homes is state-funded at a flat rate of £65 a week for nursing care and £90 a week for personal care. It is important to note that domestic personal care is also free.

There has been much talk of the Royal Commission's 1999 report. Central Government implemented some of the commission's recommendations but rejected the key measure of free personal care.

The current system of means testing may, on the face of it, seem fair, but it has many hidden problems. It is degrading to older people, Mr Deputy Speaker — an intensely proud group, many of whom still do not take up benefits to which they are entitled because of that pride.

Many older people who are by no means wealthy but who have a small amount of savings and may own their own home are forced to deplete their savings and sell that home to fund their care. Those people have been thrifty throughout their working lives, and they have put a little bit aside and want to provide something for their children when they are gone. However, the Government have denied them that right.

The need for long-term care is, of course, very unpredictable — any of us could need it — but at present, older people are being punished for that unpredictable contingency. In the United Kingdom last year, about 70,000 people had to sell their homes to fund their care. It is shameful that such a thing should happen in this day and age.

I declare now that I am a practicing solicitor, and every month in that practice I come across older people who are worried — indeed, some of them are very distressed — about their future. What kind of country does that to its elderly citizens? Hardly anything makes me angrier in my professional life than seeing older people despair about their future. [Interruption.] That will be the phone.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I remind Members that they must switch off their mobile phones when they are in the Chamber.

Mrs Foster: In 2003, the Royal Commission updated its report. It noted that only 0.6% of the Scottish Executive's £25 billion budget was spent on free personal care. Therefore the argument that free personal care would put an excessive burden on the block grant does not stand up to close scrutiny. Indeed, the Royal Commission concluded that the costs were a reasonable and proper claim on the public purse. I concur with that.

The introduction of free personal care will bring many ancillary benefits. Removing worry from our elderly people will be a huge relief to them. In addition, if people avail of free personal care in their own homes, hospital beds will be freed up. Indeed, Carmel Hanna referred to that. At present, many people remain in hospital for longer than is medically necessary. They must wait until a care package is arranged. That means that their stay in hospital is prolonged. If free personal care were available, they could be discharged earlier.

Recently in Fermanagh we had a very exciting presentation on the technological advances in telemedicine and how the most vulnerable in society can use those to enable them to remain in their own homes while being monitored at a distance by a healthcare professional. If we are considering introducing a free personal care policy — and I hope that we are — we should do so in the context of future technological advances.

Elderly people in County Fermanagh often tell me that, above all, they want to remain in their own homes for as long as possible. They do not want to have to go into a nursing or residential home. It would be wonderful if, as a result of the adoption of free personal care for the elderly, more of them could remain in their own homes. They would be happy in their place, and technological advances would mean that they would be free from fear.

The adoption of free personal care by the next Executive would empower the elderly community. That would be welcomed not only by elderly people but by their families, by their carers and by the public as a whole.

I support the motion, and I hope that the House will unite on this very important issue.

Ms Gildernew: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Like other Members, I want to thank Rev Robert Coulter and Mr Bell for tabling this motion, and I am glad to contribute to the debate.

I want to examine some of the social circumstances that show why we need a domiciliary and nursing care provision that meets the needs of the elderly and vulnerable in our society.

According to the anti-poverty and social inclusion strategy, 'Lifetime Opportunities', 54,000 pensioners now live in poverty. Life expectancy is now more than 70 years of age for males and females, and that figure is likely to rise. In fact, a girl born today in one of our maternity hospitals has a life expectancy of 82.4 years, so people will be able to live much longer. That is partly down to our diet and how we look after ourselves, but advancements in medicine and technology also play a role. Many people who would previously have died from an illness can now enjoy longer lives.

We have an ageing population. Some have complex needs, and care for the elderly is becoming more difficult. As other Members have already said, many people want to continue to live in their homes, but they need support to enable them to do that, and it is becoming more difficult for elderly people to live with family members. We cannot ignore the fact that children of elderly people with complex needs and in need of long-term nursing care can find the situation hugely distressing. When care becomes a necessity, children experience guilt because they feel that they are letting their parents down. The heart-rending decision that those children face must be acknowledged. To add to their burden, the cost of nursing-home accommodation can be absolutely prohibitive.

I welcome the fact that, when she was Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, Bairbre de Brún introduced free nursing care. Had the Executive not been suspended in October 2002, the ongoing work at the time, which my colleague Sue Ramsey outlined earlier, would have been completed by now.

Central Government's refusal to provide free personal care has serious implications, for example, for people who suffer from Alzheimer's disease. Dementia may not be classified as a health need, and that can lead to access to the care required being denied.

Carers' needs must be addressed, and funding must be made available to provide appropriate support, including day care, respite care and domestic care. My colleague Pat O'Rawe outlined Sinn Féin's agenda for older people when we published our 'Forget Me Not' charter. It recommended a number of actions to ensure that the older people's rights and entitlements were fully protected. One of its priorities was free personal care for all older people.

The debate on free personal care is highlighted in the report 'With Respect to Old Age: Long Term Care — Rights and Responsibilities', which the Royal Commission on Long Term Care presented to Westminster in 1999. One key recommendation said:

"In our judgement it is right for the state to exempt personal care from means-testing altogether."

The Scottish Executive implemented the Royal Commission's recommendations in full in 2002, and the commission's follow-up report in 2003 criticised the failure to implement the recommendations elsewhere. That exemption for personal care is an important issue not only for older people and their families, but for the wider public.

When we have an independent review, we must get it right. The Scottish Health Committee's tenth report, which was published in June 2006, recommended that five initiatives be undertaken to address the problems with personal care that Scotland had experienced since the implementation of 'With Respect to Old Age' in 2002. The report said:

"the Scottish Executive should undertake a thorough review (based on the experience of the last 3 years) of the resources required by local authorities, collectively and individually, to adequately finance free personal care. This may require an increase in funding, or more equitable distribution amongst local authorities."

The second recommendation was:

"loopholes that permit the use of mechanisms to effectively 'ration' free personal care should be closed, if necessary by changes to the legislation."

The report continued:

"the Scottish Executive should enforce the guidance on those aspects of eligibility which local authorities claim remain ambiguous. It should ensure that services such as assistance with meal preparation, where they are part of assessed need, are eligible for free personal care."

A further recommendation said:

"the Scottish Executive should also adopt a mechanism for determining the long-term level of financing of free personal care. They should decide whether to increase it in line with the rate of inflation or to use some other indicator as decided by themselves."

The final recommended initiative stated:

"the Scottish Executive should remove the financial incentive for local authorities to delay assessment by either: allowing claims for free personal care to be backdated from the point of eligibility rather than assessment; or introducing a mandatory deadline for assessments, e.g. within two weeks of application."

We must ensure that we look at the experiences of other places before we decide what model the incoming Executive should bring into being. When we implement free personal care for the elderly, it is important that we get it right.

3.00 pm

Therefore it is important that we look elsewhere in order to ensure that we get the best possible package. As has been stated, we are judged by how we treat our elderly, our children, and the vulnerable in our society. We have a long way to go before our elderly feel not only protected, but valued. I support the amendment. Go raibh míle maith agat.

Mrs M Bradley: I support the motion. It is right and proper that we call for an independent review into care for the elderly. As the Member who spoke previously said, it is important for the elderly that any such review gets it right. Families with two elderly parents living at home often suffer greatly from a lack of free personal care. A parent who has the misfortune of having to be placed in a care home full-time or to remain in hospital permanently is penalised for owning his or her home. However, the parent who is left at home often comes out worse: he or she endures the stress and strain of having to find the money at the end of every month to pay for the other's personal care, not to mention money to keep the home warm, pay bills and buy food.

People need to know that personal care should mean personal care, without their having to give away everything that they own in order to pay for that care. That is the worry that our older people face.

Older people who do not want to go into hospital or a nursing home but who want to remain in their own home also find it difficult to afford to pay for the necessary care that will allow them to do that.

I missed some of the debate, Mr Deputy Speaker, for which I am sorry. I am sure that a great deal has been said on the subject. I would not delay any independent review. I would give it my support, provided that we conduct a proper investigation and get it right.

Mr Dallat: Free personal care is a basic service. It is a response to need and a recognition of the lifetime of service that tens of thousands of people have given in many ways to society. It is worth recalling that most of those people contributed to society during the past 35 years of horrendous difficulties. Many loved ones in both communities experienced poverty in one form or another. Poverty is not only about money; it is about loneliness, isolation and the lack of personal care.

The debate about cost is over. The issue is about implementing the service and ensuring that money is ring-fenced in order to sustain it. That will be the function of a new Assembly, and that is the challenge — nothing else.

Having spoken to families from eastern Europe over the years, I found that the one thing that they missed most after the fall of socialism was the protection that retired and elderly people were offered. Although I do not support a return to the past, it is important to point out that, even in countries where democracy had serious constitutional defects and money was scarce, there was an emphasis on caring for the elderly and infirm. How much more important is it, here in the Western World, where we figure among the richest, that we should be able to offer free personal care? It is not something that should be offered in the future; it should be offered now, or at least after the March elections.

Let us bring to an end the need for the elderly to march to Belfast city hall to demand basic rights, which often, as I have said, they have done without the support of some of those Members who have offered platitudes. The real world is much easier to live in than the one where promises are made but never delivered. Personal care is often on the cheap, provided by relatives who receive no pay, give up their social life, lose their friends and who will lose out on a pension because they have not paid the necessary National Insurance contributions.

On occasions, personal care is left to good neighbours or even to strangers and voluntary organisations. Home helps make a massive contribution by working much longer hours than those for which they are paid.

They do not get a fair mileage allowance, as they rush from house to house to perform miracles in time limits that are outrageously short. Scrooges, masquerading as Government agencies, deliver personal care annually, and save something like £650 million because they do so on the cheap and at the expense of others.

Perhaps, for the first time, there is a sense of urgency about the issue. The practice of offering platitudes may be over; the human rights and dignity of the elderly seem at last to have become an election issue. If such is the case, and there is a clear commitment to the introduction of free personal care, Members can celebrate Christmas with a clearer conscience.

However, it remains the case that somewhere, perhaps not far away, there are older people who will have nothing to celebrate at Christmas: no friends, no visitors and no personal care.

I support the amendment. Let me make it clear that I have the highest regard for Rev Robert Coulter, who has displayed a lifetime of commitment to the care of the elderly. However, endless reports raise hopes but deliver nothing. The Good Friday Agreement promised equality for all, and that certainly included the elderly, who, as I said at the outset, worked through a lifetime of violence. They, more than most, are owed a peacetime of love and support. That has to include free personal care.

Mr O'Dowd: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

I support the amendment. Today has been a good day for the Assembly. However, Members must constantly remind themselves that this is merely a Transitional Assembly and that it has no power. However many motions the Assembly agrees, it will remain powerless to do anything to implement them. Today's debates demonstrate the need for the Assembly to take control of its own destiny. If Members cannot implement the agreement reached this morning, or that which I hope will be reached this afternoon, we will have let down the elderly, who do not need further motions of support or declarations of intent — they need action.

Bairbre de Brún, as Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, introduced free nursing care in 2002, but she was unable to secure finance from the Executive to pay for free personal care.

Mr Durkan: I will take this opportunity to advise the Member on two points. First, as Minister of Finance and Personnel, I — and the Executive as a whole — budgeted for free nursing care. However, the money was not spent, because the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and her Department did not produce the necessary legislation. Secondly, there was commitment to provide money for free personal care when proposals came forward.

(Madam Speaker in the Chair)

Mr O'Dowd: I am grateful to the former Minister. He will be aware that a motion on free personal care was denied because the rest of the parties on the Business Committee would not agree to it.

With respect to legislation, the then Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety brought forward a raft of wide-ranging legislation. Had the Assembly been permitted to complete its term, I have no doubt — and I am sure that the Member has no doubt — that free personal care would have been included.

Mr Durkan: The budgeted money was already returned.

Mr O'Dowd: Thank you.

The motion sets out a mechanism for the way forward. That is important, since there are concerns that parties are entering another consultation process. Members are going to end up being politicians in power — they will no longer be politicians in opposition, shouting comments from the Back Benches. They will have to map out a realistic fiscal way forward.

Despite all Members agreeing, as do I, with the sentiment that free personal care should be introduced immediately, the incoming Executive will have to plan their finances, as will the Programme for Government Committee and its subgroups, which meet here regularly. It also brings into question other developments that are going on around us. The comprehensive spending review, which Margaret Thatcher used to refer to as cuts and which the Labour Party now refers to as a spending review, will impinge on an incoming Executive.

It highlights the need for any new Executive to have tax-raising or tax-varying powers. As Robert McCartney reminded the Assembly yesterday, our hands are tied, fiscally, by the British Exchequer. Despite the best intentions, and finances being made available or not, it will be difficult for any incoming Executive to introduce all the measures that they would like to. Members must examine seriously the matter of tax-raising powers and tax-varying powers.

As I said, a Cheann Comhairle, I support the motion and the amendment, which, I believe, the proposer of the motion is willing to adopt. In the near future, I hope that we will be in a position of power and able to implement the policies that have been the subject of today's debate. Go raibh maith agat.

Mr McCarthy: I am grateful to everyone who has contributed to the debate; it is an important and vital subject that has been on the agenda for too long. With regard to implementation, I hope that when March comes around and a new Executive is in place, there will be no more pussyfooting around. That is why I tabled the amendment. We have had reports, consultations, and debates until they are coming out of our ears. They have been updated in 2003, 2004 and 2005, and I am sure that they will be updated in 2006.

The information is there in great detail. There is no need to delay the implementation of free personal care for all our citizens who require it. The last time that we discussed the issue I said that if it is good enough for Scotland, it is good enough for Northern Ireland. There have been ups and downs in Scotland, but personal care is provided free, and that is what we want to achieve. The last thing that we want is for our senior citizens to have to sell their homes to find dignity and peace in their ageing years. I appeal to Members to support the amendment and to take action on this issue as soon as the Assembly comes into being in March.

Mr Elliott: I welcome the opportunity to make the winding-up speech in this debate. In case anyone feels that they are not seeing right, I am neither Rev Robert Coulter nor Billy Bell.

I wish to declare an interest in the issue of free personal care for the elderly. It may not affect me personally, but, as someone who lost his father in the middle of the summer after he had suffered for 20 years with advancing Parkinson's disease — and my mother-in-law has had severe Alzheimer's disease for a number of years — I am aware of the personal difficulties that many of our senior citizens in this Province face.

In the event of devolution, local politicians will have to make tough decisions that will impact on us all. Members heard Kieran McCarthy highlight some of the issues. The plight of the elderly and the care that they receive is one area where a functioning Northern Ireland Assembly has the potential to make a significant difference in the Province. As medicine advances, our life expectancy continues to rise. Many developed economies are struggling to cope with the modern demographics, which show an increase in the number of elderly people and a fall in birth rates — the problem that immigration is often cited as a tool to remedy.

3.15 pm

My colleague in Fermanagh and South Tyrone Arlene Foster spoke about new technology that may be installed in the homes of senior citizens in Fermanagh. Given all the technological advances, it is disgraceful that in this day and age, those living in the area served by the Sperrin Lakeland Health and Social Care Trust must wait two years and four months for an assessment by an occupational therapist. Even those on the priority list must wait four months. In these days of modern technology, that should not be acceptable in the care of the elderly. A functioning Assembly could make a significant difference to such problems.

Several of my constituents who contacted me when on a waiting list, particularly the routine waiting list, passed away before an occupational therapist's report or assessment could be done — and I would be surprised if other Members had not had the same experience. The assessment may have been for something simple, such as the adaptation of a bathroom or bedroom at a cost of only £1,000. However, because those people did not have that kind of money, they could not go ahead with it. That is totally unacceptable.

According to Age Concern Northern Ireland, between 1996 and 2036 the percentage of the population in the Province aged 65 or over will almost double from 13% to 24%; and by 2020 one in four EU citizens will be aged 60 or over.

As the members of each generation move from the world of work to retirement, it is only right that they receive the required personal care from the state — they should not be forced to sell their homes to fund it. The older generation has contributed to building a prosperous nation from which everyone benefits. It is ironic that many of those who have worked positively for the Province and the nation must sell their homes to provide for themselves in their advancing years. In the modern age, that too should be unacceptable.

Members of the Assembly are lucky to have the opportunity to learn from Scotland's experience of the provision of free personal care. Perhaps Scotland did not get everything right, but at least, as other Members indicated, the Assembly can get it almost right. The system will never be perfect, but the Assembly can build on the progress made in Scotland. In June 2006, the Scottish Health Committee reported on the care legislation and concluded that the introduction of free personal care was broadly successful. The UUP wants it to be even more successful in Northern Ireland.

However, the report raised questions about the implementation of the policy. As expected, there is intense demand for free personal care, and the amount of money allocated to implementing the policy means that supply falls short of demand. The Committee also felt that funding should be index-linked, which is something that the Assembly must carefully consider before rushing headlong into the provision of personal care for the elderly.

In addition, there appears to be ambiguity about the eligibility criteria; about half of local authorities operate a waiting list, which has led the Committee to refer to a postcode lottery for care. Enough has been heard about postcode lotteries in Northern Ireland, particularly in relation to education; the same should not apply to the provision of care.

In June 2006, the Scottish Minister for Finance and Public Service Reform, Tom McCabe, published a consultation document entitled 'Transforming Public Services'. I wonder whether the responses to that consultation will receive as little regard as those received on the RPA in Northern Ireland. Mr Hanson is tasked with overhauling the entire public sector: local government; health boards; enterprise companies; the Fire and Rescue Service; the police force; and various quangos.

Leaving aside the controversy over the seven-council model, the RPA will bring about major changes in the structure of the provision of health and social care in Northern Ireland. As Members go back to the drawing board to redesign public services, it is the opportune time to provide the type of personal care that our elderly people deserve.

We do not have an open chequebook, and this will, of course, require funding. However, as is the case for prescribing drugs for breast cancer, Alzheimer's disease or multiple sclerosis, committing the funds and tackling the problem early is beneficial to the patient, the family, the carer, and the NHS.

It is very difficult to get enough carers in the local community to look after people in their own homes. Many carers who work for various trusts and agencies are paid a pittance for the work that they do. Some are provided with no additional travelling time between visits and are run off their feet for very low wages.

Family carers also receive very poor recognition in Northern Ireland. Many people give up lucrative careers and good jobs to look after relatives, whether that involves looking after elderly people or those handicapped in some other way. They do not receive recognition and they are being used by the state. That is unacceptable and it must be addressed.

We must learn from the Scottish Executive and not just implement the policy as it was implemented in Scotland. We must build on their experiences.

Question, That the amendment be made, put and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly notes the research previously carried out on the costs of free personal care in Northern Ireland, as well as the results of the introduction of free personal care in Scotland, and calls on any incoming Executive to introduce free personal care in Northern Ireland as a priority.

Madam Speaker: Before I adjourn the Assembly, I want to take this opportunity to wish you all a very happy and peaceful Christmas and an extremely successful 2007.

Adjourned at 3.23 pm.

THE TRANSITIONAL ASSEMBLY

Monday 8 January 2007

The Assembly met at 12 noon (Madam Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

ASSEMBLY BUSINESS

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Before the Assembly went into recess, you promised that you would make a statement about certain happenings that occurred in the House and their implications for the security of its Members. Can you tell the Assembly when you will make that statement? Will you do so today?

Madam Speaker: Thank you, Dr Paisley, for your point of order. I will not make such a statement today. My officials have been seeking meetings with the relevant people. I am grateful for your communication with my officials on the issue. However, I understand that arrangements are being made for a meeting to discuss these issues. I will make a statement in the Chamber at the earliest opportunity.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

Agriculture

Madam Speaker: Before the debate starts, I want to inform Members that the Chief Whip of the Ulster Unionist Party has told me that there will be a smaller delegation than usual from that party at the debate because some of its members are attending a funeral.

The Business Committee has agreed to allow two and a half hours for each of today's debates. The proposer of each motion will be allocated 15 minutes to propose and a maximum of 15 minutes to make their winding-up speech. All other Members who wish to speak will have a maximum of 10 minutes.

Mr Ford: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I notice that the Gallery is quite empty, even though I understand that a large number of visitors intend to listen to the debate. I wonder if there is a communication problem with those visitors.

Madam Speaker: Mr Ford, I am sure that that matter will be dealt with. However, as the Member is probably aware, Members should not refer to visitors in the Gallery.

Mr Ford: Or even the absence of people in the Gallery.

Madam Speaker: Mr Ford, you have made your point, but do remember that, in future, the Gallery should not be mentioned on the Floor of the House.

Mr Elliott: I beg to move

That this Assembly deplores the over-bureaucratic administration within the Northern Ireland agricultural industry and calls on the government to implement legislation / regulations with less gold-plating, and to put in place a review of current legislation and regulations with a view to reducing any unnecessary bureaucratic burden; and further calls on the government to implement the initiatives set out in the Ulster Farmers' Union document 'Five Steps to a Better Future'.

I declare an interest in the debate; I am a farmer in my constituency of Fermanagh and South Tyrone. I do not know whether it is absolutely necessary to declare that — it is sometimes more of a hindrance than a help.

The motion seeks to address issues that have a direct impact not only on myself but on many thousands of farm businesses, large and small, across the Province. I trust that we can unite on the issue and that it will have widespread support from all parties and local politicians — that point came across during last week's Business Committee meeting.

A few years ago, shortly after I became actively involved in politics, I met a person in a street in Enniskillen who told me that I must be mad to be involved in two of the most unpredictable professions around — farming and politics. I will not go so far as to say which is the worst of the two professions.

The success and profitability of the agricultural sector reverberates throughout rural communities and the entire Northern Ireland economy. Nobody can deny that agriculture has suffered greatly in recent times as a result of BSE, foot-and-mouth disease, increased competition and changes in customer preference. Moreover, every so often there is mention of the possibility of an outbreak of diseases such as bird flu and blue tongue. Farm incomes have taken a battering, and many farmers have chosen — or have been forced — to leave the industry or to supplement their meagre farm incomes with external employment.

However, farmers are a very resilient breed. Many of them have stuck with the profession throughout the crises, which makes the prevalence of bureaucracy and form-filling all the more unbearable and undesirable. This is an area in which our own Government could take a stand and make a change. Instead, the rafts of complicated paperwork from the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development (DARD) and, increasingly, from the Department of the Environment (DOE), continue to plague businesses and stifle the changes that are necessary for survival in this highly competitive marketplace.

Some people would have us believe that farmers always have something to complain about. However, make no mistake; excessive paperwork is driving many professionals to despair, and not only those in the farming industry — police officers, teachers and health professionals also have to spend increasing periods of time preparing reports and filling out questionnaires and forms of one description or another. That places a significant burden on them and on the taxpayer because such activity takes time, and time is money.

The Confederation of British Industry (CBI) continually flags up the cost to UK plc of ratcheting up the amount of bureaucracy in business, and it is constantly exasperated that its pleas go unheard. After today, we hope that those pleas will not only be heard, but that Government officials, Departments and Ministers will do something about the problem and not simply pay lip-service to it. They have the power to do something about it.

At the most recent CBI conference, the Prime Minister, and, perhaps more importantly, the man who may succeed him, the Chancellor, both pledged yet again to cut red tape from business. Even more recently, Downing Street reiterated that promise. However, as we have seen in the past, those promises will not be honoured. We are well aware that that has been the case not only in the agricultural industry, but throughout politics in Northern Ireland.

It is time that promises made to the people were honoured.

The red tape in the agrifood sector has been very well highlighted by the Ulster Farmers' Union campaign. It has run a high-profile and high-impact campaign calling upon the Government to cut it out. The campaign was one of five recommendations made by the Ulster Farmers' Union to improve the industry under a devolved Northern Ireland Assembly.

A day rarely goes by when a farmer does not contact someone in my constituency office, or me, complaining of problems that stem from excessive bureaucracy. The decoupling of farm subsidies and the changes to the integrated administration and control system (IACS) of farms has resulted in penalties amounting to some £2.3 million being imposed for unintentional errors. Indeed, many farmers have employed professional form-fillers, and even they have had trouble getting their heads around this bureaucracy and red tape. If they cannot do it, how can the ordinary farmer? Farmers want to get on and do what they do best — farm their land. They do not want to be tied up in bureaucracy, red tape and administrative work, which is alien to them.

The effect of gold-plating, whereby a Government Department overzealously interprets and implements an EU directive, cannot be underestimated. This is a major contributory factor to the burden felt by farm businesses.

I was in Sweden and Denmark in April of this year. They have the same EU regulations that we have in Northern Ireland, but they are implemented and interpreted differently by their Governments. All I am asking for is a practical, common-sense approach from this Government towards the implementation of EU regulations — nothing less. We always have to gold-plate it. We have to go to the top band of implementation while other countries in the EU implement to the least possible effectiveness.

One classic example of this is the 30-day standstill rule for cattle. The piece of EU legislation at the root of this rule was interpreted completely differently by the Department of Agriculture in Northern Ireland from other regions of the European Union, where such a nonsensical rule does not exist. The disparity caused has resulted in cattle importers withdrawing from Northern Ireland at a time when the cattle industry is toiling, since the reopening of the beef export market just last year, to regain business that it had lost. However, this opportunity is being lost and hampered by our own Government regulations.

Do not get me wrong. Standards exist and are needed to safeguard the welfare of animals and consumers, to afford environmental protection and, ultimately, to maintain the industry for years to come.

The livestock industry in Northern Ireland has one of the highest levels of traceability in the world. Indeed, this is one of the major selling points to the public, who are becoming increasingly aware of the supply chain. This would not have been achieved if it were not for the well-kept herd records and documents that we already have in Northern Ireland. A certain degree of regulation is therefore absolutely essential. The UUP has no difficulty with that.

The proposed new waste disposal regulations are another difficulty. Farmers will be asked to apply for exemption to dispose of such things as used fencing posts and hedge trimmings. If there is no improvement in the situation in which farmers are being asked to fill in a form just to ensure that they are adhering to the latest guidelines on waste, I agree with the Ulster Farmers' Union that a boycott of these new rules may be the only option left to make the point until a more workable interpretation of the waste rules is introduced.

Farmers do not want to opt out of this new initiative. They all accept the need to handle farm waste responsibly, but I cannot accept the approach taken by the DOE that has turned the whole process into a complicated system of exemptions and licences. That is not what farmers are about, and it is not what they want.

The introduction and interpretation of the new waste regulations have produced many complications and too much bureaucracy.

12.15 pm

The large number of farm inspections that are being carried out is another time-consuming and administratively costly issue with which farmers must contend. They are obliged to undergo inspections of cattle identification, cross-compliance, field and farm, and issues that relate to health and safety. They must also comply with the Northern Ireland Farm Quality Assurance Scheme (NIFQAS) and have their animals tested for tuberculosis (TB) and brucellosis. Need I go on? The Province needs a single inspection regime.

The benefit of such a single inspection team is that each inspector would be trained to cover all aspects of farm inspections, be those agricultural, environmental or related to health and safety. Therefore having a single on-farm inspection would be better than the current situation, in which different inspectorates perform five, six or seven inspections on some farms in one year.

Introducing single on-farm inspections is an obvious solution to a problem that is draining public resources as well as farmers' patience. The current system is another appalling example of the bureaucracy that Departments impose on farmers. I make no apology for continuing to refer to the unacceptable bureaucracy that is imposed on farmers in the Province.

The excessive levels of unnecessary bureaucracy — which show little sign of abating — are unworkable. In many areas, the tipping point has been reached: the damage that is being done to the sector outweighs the benefits. Recently published Government statistics show that the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development issued 18 business surveys last year, with an estimated cost to farm businesses of over £318,000. Only the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment issued more. That £318,000 is probably just the tip of the red-tape iceberg with which local farmers have to deal.

I am sure that other Members will cover in more detail the various recommendations that the Ulster Farmers' Union made. The recommendations that are contained in 'Five Steps to a Better Future' offer practical, common-sense initiatives to improve the industry. Although parties have their own policy interpretation of the recommendations, they represent an issue on which Members generally unite. The document does not contain gimmicks or buzzwords; it recommends sensible, doable changes that will effect improvements for farmers and the public.

The recommended local-produce procurement initiative would champion local produce in the public sector. The clear labelling on beef of its country of origin is essential to give local beef farmers a helping hand and to bring them back into a successful export market. If consumers can see the source of the beef that they buy and know where the farmers whom they support come from, they may give more backing to local producers.

Climate change is a topic that is on everybody's lips. Local farmers should be in a prime position to help the nation meet its targets for green-energy production while finding a much-needed extra stream of income. The Ulster Farmers' Union proposal to promote the use of locally produced renewable energy in public buildings is an example of how the Government could put their money where their mouth is. That would set a good example to householders and help local farmers and growers.

Unnecessary layers of bureaucracy must be pared away to reduce impediments to business and, putting it bluntly, to save money. The Secretary of State's about-turn on the future of the Northern Ireland Agricultural Wages Board (NIAWB) does not sit well with his party's pledge to reduce unnecessary bureaucracy. When that quango was established, it performed the essential task of safeguarding farm workers' rights to a fair wage. It also offered a benchmark for farm owners and managers. However, it is no longer required, and the Government must carry out their original pledge.

I hope that Members will agree to the motion. I could talk for hours on this subject, but I will not — I am sure that all Members will be pleased to hear that. I want to see the Government, through DARD and the DOE, introduce a practical, workable approach. Rather than imposing unnecessary and unreasonable bureaucracy and red tape, those Departments should be available to assist farmers through these difficult times.

Mr Clyde: As I have been involved in agriculture all my life, I too should declare an interest.

Agriculture was the largest industry in Northern Ireland, before the outbreak of BSE. That was followed by foot-and-mouth disease, with its restrictions on the movement of cattle. The combination of those two diseases resulted in the end of the export of beef and live animals.

Following BSE and foot-and-mouth disease, DARD imposed so many restrictions that many farmers decided to reduce their farming interests or to retire altogether. Currently, only 25% of Northern Ireland farmers work full time on their farms. The massive drop in profits means that more than 50% of farmers are over 55 years old, as few young farmers see a future in working on the family farm. Twenty years ago, agriculture was the biggest employer; today, it is in real decline. Much of that is due to bureaucracy imposed by DARD, of which I shall give some examples.

In the Republic of Ireland, the CAPI IACS form consists of two sides of A4 paper; in Northern Ireland, it is eight pages. One unintentional error on that form can result in farmers losing tens of thousands of pounds. That is wrong.

There are 19 statutory management requirements to be adhered to for CAP inspections, as well as good agricultural and environment conditions. Under the current system, eight different inspectors from DOE and DARD can visit one farmer over a matter of days. There is an issue with the severity of CAP inspections. DARD appears to have a policy to look for faults during cross-compliance inspections. In 2005, £2.3 million was taken away from farmers as a result of errors and breaches. The comparable figure in the Republic of Ireland was £229,000.

In the first year of the single farm payment scheme, a large number of farmers lost out due to unintentional errors in respect of duplicate fields. Duplication may occur — for example, when a farmer includes land that he uses as conacre on his IACS form that the owner of the land also includes. The Department should return those forms, indicate the mistakes, and allow farmers 30 days to correct them. It seems that DARD has a “can’t-do” instead of a “can-do” attitude.

I turn to the issue of waste management. Approximately 28,000 farms are large enough to have at least one employee. Each farm business must register separately to secure an exemption to handle certain farm wastes, such as the storage of second-hand wire and paling posts, the burning of hedge cuttings and the movement of stones and soil. To gain exemptions to handle those farm wastes, a number of forms must be completed. I suggest two possible solutions: first, wherever possible, farms should automatically be exempt from regulations; secondly, farmers should receive an exemption by ticking a box on their IACS form.

Farmers work a long day every day, usually from 6.00 am to 6.00 pm and beyond. At the end of their working day, they have paperwork to complete in the evening. It is therefore easy to make mistakes when filling in forms. Often, those mistakes result in the farmer being penalised by the Department. On the other hand, civil servants in DARD can also make mistakes — are they penalised? I do not think so. Mistakes are blamed on computers or, on some occasions, the farmer.

It seems that the Department will use any excuse to hold up the single farm payment. In my constituency of South Antrim, a water pipeline is being laid from Lough Neagh to Belfast. A farmer informed me that he must write to the Department to explain what he will do with the land when work on the pipeline is complete before he can receive the single farm payment.

There are other conditions imposed by DARD. One is a six-day standstill rule for a farmer who sells stock. If he buys an animal and brings it to his farm, he cannot sell any stock for six days.

If the farmer takes an animal to market, does not sell it and brings it back to his farm, the same six-day standstill period applies. DARD also imposes a 30-day standstill on the movement of animals bought at market for export to other EU countries, and that puts buyers off. The imposition of a brucellosis test in the 30 days before animals can be sold results in additional cost to farmers.

The EU directive on nitrates restricts farmers from spreading slurry for several months. Given the change in climate, I suggest that such a restriction should apply only in December and January.

Those are some reasons why I support the ‘Five Steps to a Better Future’, as advocated by the UFU, and I support the motion.

Ms Ruane: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Cuirim fáilte roimh an díospóireacht seo inniu.

I welcome the debate because my party and I feel strongly that the rural way of life is under severe threat. Moreover, there is a lack of understanding and a dividing or fault line in Irish society between the city slickers and the rural communities. In County Mayo, there were townies and buffs — anyone who lived outside the town was called a buff. Other derogatory terms such as redneck and, famously, culchie are often used to describe people from rural communities.

I am originally from County Mayo in the west of Ireland, and some people may say that I should have stayed there.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

[Laughter.]

Ms Ruane: However, here I am — for better, for worse, for richer, for poorer. I have a strong sense of the land and agriculture and the role that they play in our society. I am aware that many farmers often endure a lack of respect but, ultimately, whether here in Ireland or in any country in the world, they put the food on our tables.

My father had a great grá, or love, for the land. He was a part-time farmer from peasant stock — and I use the word “peasant” proudly — during some of the worst times for farmers in Ireland. The centenary of the death of a famous Irishman, and one of my heroes, Michael Davitt, who fought for the rights of small farmers is being celebrated. As children, we learned about his three demands — they were a bit like those of the UFU today, but differ to an extent because times have moved on. In Michael Davitt’s time, however, there was landlordism in Ireland and he demanded free sale, fixity of tenure and fair rent. Therefore, Sinn Féin continues a long tradition of fighting for the small farmer.

Michael Davitt was also a Fenian in the best, or true, sense of the word and not in the derogatory way in which it is sometimes used. Cuirim fáilte roimh an díospóireacht seo.

Mrs D Kelly: As the Member has quoted Michael Davitt, will she agree that in latter years he denounced violence and progressed the cause of the peasant farmer, and indeed many people living in poverty, not only throughout the island of Ireland but throughout Britain?

Ms Ruane: That is a debate for another day. Michael Davitt is my hero and a proud Fenian. To do justice to the debate today, I will not be deviated from it by Dolores or anyone else.

I pay sincere tribute to the farmers’ unions and stress the need for continued partnership with them, and Sinn Féin looks forward to continuing that work. I join my party colleagues Michelle Gildernew and Francie in urging Members to support the motion that rightly recognises the considerable difficulties faced by farmers who are being increasingly burdened by overly bureaucratic and complicated procedures and legislation.

There is general agreement between Sinn Féin and the farmers’ unions — the UFU and NIAPA (The Northern Ireland Agricultural Producers Association) — on the difficulties facing the industry. Not least of those difficulties is the fundamental problem of red tape in DARD and the practice of gold-plating EU regulations to the detriment of farmers, their families and rural communities in general.

When the Sinn Féin Assembly team met with representatives of the farmers on several occasions to discuss the key issues facing the industry, the importance of tackling the red tape in DARD and of establishing a Programme for Government for an incoming Executive of locally accountable Ministers was top of the agenda.

The contrast between DARD’s approach and that adopted in Dublin could not be more stark. Indeed, that was highlighted by the DUP MEP Jim Allister, no less. A comparison of the two approaches illustrates why all-Ireland co-operation is needed on the real and practical issues that impact on rural communities across the country, and the Six Counties in particular.

12.30 pm

The response shown through the farmers’ charter is a case in point. The zero-tolerance approach of DARD is hurting farmers who are penalised when they make even the slightest error in completing copious unwieldy and overly complicated application forms. Many farmers whom I have spoken to have told me that so much time is spent filling in forms that it impacts on their ability to work the land.

In the South, the charter of rights for farmers for 2005-07 stressed the need for user-friendly farms and maximum consultation. We need the same provision in the North of Ireland, and Sinn Féin joins others in calling for a similar charter. Indeed, an all-Ireland approach to farming is essential. The failure of DARD to be a champion for farmers highlights why it is so important to have in place a fully functioning, power-sharing Executive and North/South Ministerial Council.

For the past two years, my party has organised a number of public meetings with farmers throughout my constituency of South Down, where we have focused on key issues such as the proposed Mourne national park, the impact of EU directives and the more recent planning directives. I have no doubt that the problems that are besetting rural communities are being further compounded by a growing level of frustration at the amount of red tape that farmers are facing every time that they are faced with filling in a form.

The current situation is indicative of a system that is, quite simply, failing farming communities. We have reached a point where farmers are being unfairly penalised because of the bureaucratic hoops through which they are expected jump every time that they apply for a basic entitlement.

The Ulster Farmers’ Union’s policy document, ‘Five Steps to a Better Future’, puts forward a number of workable and extremely practical measures that, if implemented, would go some way to addressing the excessive amount of red tape. Sinn Féin agrees that an independent review of the cost, volume and often unnecessary nature of farm bureaucracy must be a priority for an Assembly when one is reconvened.

Other practical steps that could be taken include compulsory beef-labelling in the food sector, showing the country of origin of beef in restaurants. That relatively simple measure would be an excellent way of promoting the North's agricultural produce. Compulsory beef-labelling in the food service sector has been implemented in the South of Ireland and is an effective and relatively simple marketing tool.

My party supports the removal of the Agricultural Wages Board (AWB) because, with the introduction of the minimum wage in 1999, the AWB has become yet another layer of unnecessary bureaucracy.

Furthermore, we want investment in the farming industry to allow farm businesses to be handed over to younger family members. We also advocate the introduction of a farmers' retirement scheme. We welcome the UFU's focus on renewable energy opportunities — that is far-sighted and is the way to go. Planning policies need to be in sympathy with local people while also securing the future of our rural landscapes for the next generation.

We are debating these issues in the Transitional Assembly, but it has no power. We still have direct-rule Ministers. We call on the DUP to join the rest of us in getting the Assembly and the all-Ireland institutions up and running. That is what farmers — on every corner of this island — need. We need to work closely with the South of Ireland at all levels so that we can become champions for our farmers and help to build a dynamic, confident and vibrant industry.

Now is a time of tremendous opportunity; marketing should be done on an all-island basis, using our clean, green island trademark — oileán glan glas. More people are aware of the importance of organic food, and we need to support farmers who are developing that.

My father was a learned man who, like many people in the farming community, was interested in education. However, he also had a real grá, or love, for the land. We had a few acres of land; we would cut turf every year. We had cattle and a little vegetable garden that the rabbits and cows used to break in to — they ate more vegetables than we ever did. However, my abiding image of my father was that he would come in from work, put on his anorak and boots to go and find Daisy, our cow. On the way out, thinking that she did not see it, he would rob my mother of a little piece of her brown bread. Daisy would come running up to him.

If we are to support farmers of the present generation, we need to take seriously the issues raised by both farming unions. “Culchie” is a derogatory term often used to describe people from rural areas — I do not know whether it is used in the North of Ireland, but it is in the West. It is derived from the name of the town Coillte Mach. It is a small, one-street town — well, it probably has three streets now. Every year the people of the town held a “culchie-come-home week” festival. The word “coillte” means “the woods outside” in Irish. I am proud to be a culchie. Go raibh maith agat.

Mr P J Bradley: I do not exactly have an interest to declare, but I too was brought up on a small farm. I was lucky; I grew up on a farm to which no bills ever came. We did not have plenty of money, but neither had we a car, nor electricity, nor a telephone. That was a different era; time has moved on. [Interruption.]

My colleague has suggested that we did not have to pay for anything, but we did. [Laughter.]

I thank Tom Elliott for agreeing to sponsor the motion with me, and I also thank the members of the Business Committee. All five political parties were involved in the meeting on 3 January 2007 where it was agreed that the motion would be debated today. That itself sends a message on behalf of farmers and rural communities to whoever might be listening that, in the Assembly, there is unity on the need to address the plight of farmers.

The motion is a twofold exercise. It demonstrates to the farming community that all parties represented in the Chamber are fully committed to supporting the industry — to the best of our current ability — in whatever way we can. It is also an opportunity to give proper recognition to the excellent and ongoing work by the UFU on behalf of its members and the industry. The motion was prompted by the recent launch of the UFU's early initiatives programme, ‘Five Steps to a Better Future’. I thank the UFU for its willingness to share its research and findings with the SDLP during a visit to Parliament Buildings, and with all the parties at its Antrim Road headquarters in December. I have no wish to be presumptuous, but I believe — and I have heard it already — that my appreciation will be echoed during the course of the debate. I also pay tribute to the consultants involved on their professional input to that presentation.

When — or should I say, if and when — the Assembly gets up and running once more, our new Ministers could do worse than be assisted by that publication, which was prepared by professionals during what has been a period of limited care and attention by direct-rule Ministers since October 2002. Any incoming Minister of Agriculture will welcome the fact that priorities for attention are listed, as he or she goes about planning the future survival of all farming. He or she will be further encouraged that the priorities were endorsed in January 2007 in this Transitional Assembly. We also have the report of the vision group, as initiated by my former colleague and Minister Brid Rodgers. That will also be of great benefit to any incoming Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development.

Mr Elliott dealt efficiently with the demands that bureaucracy continues to make on family farms. It is wrong and unacceptable that farmers should have to split their working activities on a 50:50 basis between manual work outside the home and reading EU, UK and DARD documentation, filling forms, keeping records and contending with the proliferation of inspectors who have virtually taken up residence on some of the larger farms.

It was pleasing to learn in December that proposals driven by farm commissioner Mariann Fischer Boel are eventually being taken forward in Europe to streamline EU market rules for agricultural products. Press release IP/06/1824 states that the aim is to establish a single common market organisation for all farm products to replace the 21 existing organisations. That is part of the Commission's better regulation agenda to cut red tape.

The press release went on to advise that the proposed Common Market Organisation (CMO) would allow the repeal of more than 40 Council Acts and replace over 600 legal articles with fewer than 200. The Department of Agriculture should monitor the progress of the proposed EU changes, and as soon as they are introduced the Department must embark on its own programme and make changes to reflect the EU reduction in bureaucracy. There is no doubt that the 21 organisations, the 40 Council Acts and the 600 legal articles that are referred to — and currently apply — do make implementation demands on the Department. However, when the proposed changes are made in Brussels, there will have to be visible evidence of pro rata changes in DARD.

Most interested Members of the Assembly have seen the 'Five Steps to a Better Future' document. I wish to devote the remainder of my speech to dealing with the subject of public procurement, and my colleagues Dolores Kelly, Tommy Gallagher, and Patsy McGlone will deal respectively with the different sections of the publication.

I welcome the fact that the importance of public procurement is one of the five initiatives highlighted in the publication. That section is directed primarily at the current and, hopefully, at the next, home-based, Minister of Finance and Personnel. It deals with public procurement and highlights how a firmed-up policy on public procurement could enhance the production and use of locally produced farm supplies. The proposed initiative refers to Government procurement in England through the Public Sector Food Procurement Initiative (PSFPI) that applies there. PSFPI legally binds all national and regional authorities in England to increase tenders for small and local producers. The legislation has, among its objectives, the aim of increasing the capacity of small suppliers to meet demand. Each Minister, all Departments and every member of the Northern Ireland Procurement Board should become fully versed on the detail of the points referred to in step two of the document, which deals with public purchasing.

Given that a Government policy on food procurement has been operative in England for almost four years, I believe that it is not too much to ask any incoming Minister of Finance and Personnel and the Northern Ireland Procurement Board to recognise the benefits to the local economy, rural communities and farmers if the legislation contained in PSFPI were to be introduced in Northern Ireland. The last telephone call that I took before coming into the Chamber was from a farmer who knew that this debate on red tape was taking place. He is involved in the potato sector and is still waiting for a winter-aid payment, yet farmers in all the other sectors have been paid. Because of red tape, he is still waiting for that money to come through. As Members speak, there are farmers who have been waiting for payments for a couple of years — they are still not receiving them.

I am pleased to jointly move the motion. I sincerely hope that those in a position of responsibility will pay immediate heed to the comments made, in the Chamber today and that they will commence the work required to assist in reinstating the viability of family farms and the rural economy. After all, agriculture is the leading industry in Northern Ireland, and it is the duty of Members to keep it that way. We do not have the ultimate powers; however, those who are currently in power and those who will come into power should do what they can to protect the industry.

Mr Ford: I welcome the opportunity for the Assembly to debate this topic and thank Mr Elliott and Mr Bradley for introducing the motion. I start by declaring my second-hand interest — as my entry in the register of Members' interests shows, my wife has an interest in matters agricultural, and I do declare that I got my wellies dirty before I came here this morning.

I wish to look at one particular aspect of the way in which bureaucracy has operated and at one of the few successes that the former Assembly could record. Back in the early part of 2002 the Committee for the Environment had to consider slurry and silage effluent storage regulations. Madam Speaker, I trust that I have not offended your sensibilities by referring to them. When the DOE sent civil servants to that Committee — and I am sure the Minister at the time will recall exactly how his officers carried out their functions — it was clear that there was no understanding of the needs of Northern Ireland's farmers.

All that the DOE did was to change a few words here and there in the regulations that had been introduced in England and Wales some years earlier to make them fit for Northern Ireland — then it imposed them on us. I remember meetings at which members of the Committee for the Environment tried to question officials to find out what was what. I have no doubt that the Committee Chairperson, the Member for Mid Ulster Dr McCrea, has memories of the fight that he and I had with officials on that occasion.

The attitude of the DOE civil servants was that they knew what they wanted to do, and they did not care what anyone else thought. That led to huge problems in trying to persuade people about the realities of farming. For example, the DOE civil servants argued that in the year in which the regulations were introduced in England and Wales, pollution incidents were cut by 50%.

I asked the officials whether they could explain how such an amazing change could happen, and also for the rainfall statistics for the two years in question, since most people know that problems with silage effluent are closely related to rainfall. However, they did not have any rainfall statistics. Since they were quoting statistics for overall pollution incidents, I asked whether they could give me a 10-year trend rather than just taking two random years, which might have illustrated how successful the regulations had been. The civil servants did not have those figures either.

I then asked the officials whether they were aware that farmers in England and Wales were able to get capital grants to install slurry stores and silage effluent run-offs at the time that the regulations were introduced there and which did not exist in Northern Ireland five years ago. They did not even know that grants were available at the time. However, they expected Northern Ireland farmers, at a time of huge financial difficulty, to fund the additional required storage. It was only through pressure being put on the DOE civil servants by the Committee for the Environment, coupled with lobbying by the Ulster Farmers' Union and others, that there was any change in the way in which those regulations were applied.

When some capital funding was obtained — inadequate though it was — DARD went ahead and gold-plated the storage requirements so that all the extra funding that was given for capital grants was used up on that gold-plating. The two Departments responsible were totally inadequate in their understanding of the needs of the farmers for whom they sought to legislate.

DARD officials should take back responsibility for reflecting back to other Departments the needs of the agriculture industry and working farmers. They should not always assume that their job is to impose the wishes of other Departments on farmers, when those Departments have simply lifted regulations as they have been applied across the water but which do not apply in Northern Ireland. Sadly, that is one example of the many things that DARD officials have failed to do in liaising with other Departments. The key requirement of the Ulster Farmers' Union's five-point plan — the need for DARD to start to review its red tape — is absolutely correct. Until DARD examines what is necessary, appropriate and reasonable, we will not move forward.

P J Bradley referred to the issue of public procurement, and that is another area in which Northern Ireland has failed to make any of the changes that have been made in the Republic or across the water. Government spokesmen talk about the need to cut down on transport. The issue of food miles has suddenly become a major issue in the UK; however, in Northern Ireland, the response from DARD is doing nothing to encourage a reduction in food miles, which would benefit the environment by cutting down on unnecessary transport and assist agriculture and food processing, which remain, despite all the recent changes, vital sectors of our economy. Those industries would have a future if DARD would only give them the support that they need.

Notwithstanding the issue of procurement, the Government have completely failed to act on the issue of energy. The Government recently produced a £59 million renewable energy fund, which, among other things, gives grants to individuals for micro-generation on their own houses. However, at the same time, the challenge fund that helped some farmers to develop biomass businesses with willow and miscanthus has ended. What worse example could there be of a lack of joined-up government when the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (DETI) is funding a set of grants for renewable energy while, at the same time, DARD is stopping funding for the production of the materials that produce renewable energy?

NIO Ministers have completely failed to take account of initiatives that are joined up, match one another, or have any real opportunity to give farmers the long-term security of income that they need and require — it has been about initiatives that look well.

DARD is not the worst Department when it comes to looking at the issues, although there may be people who believe that it is. In the previous Assembly, I was a member of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development and the Committee for the Environment, and DARD civil servants had a greater understanding of what needed to be done. However, at times there was an inability to reflect that understanding elsewhere, and DARD was unable to look at the overall needs of the industry with civil servants from other Departments.

Until there is some form of joined-up government in which OFMDFM works with DARD, DOE and DETI on issues such as energy and public procurement, there will be no prospect of giving farmers — on whom much of our economy, and all our rural economy, depends — the income and security they need. That will only happen when we have a working Assembly. Today's debate should reinforce the need for the Government and those parties that have the opportunity to put structures in place to do so now so that our farmers and everyone else will benefit.

Dr McCrea: Agriculture remains Northern Ireland's primary industry, and yet the unacceptable amount of red tape imposed on it is crippling and threatens the future of those employed in the industry. It also threatens rural life in Northern Ireland.

Recently, I had the opportunity of raising the issue of Northern Ireland agriculture in a debate in the Great Hall in Westminster. I pointed out that agriculture is three times more important to the Northern Ireland economy than it is to the UK economy as a whole. Through such debates, and today's debate, I trust that someone in Government will wake up to the serious threat facing the industry and take the action necessary to remove some of the impediments that stand in the way of progress.

There are more than 27,000 farms in Northern Ireland, half of which are large enough to have at least one full-time employee. Similar to other regions of the UK, there have been great changes to the agricultural sector here, resulting in many farms merging with others and becoming larger. That reconstruction has resulted in the number of farms falling by approximately 1% to 2% per annum. Fewer young people are entering the industry and older farmers are leaving — we are seeing a haemorrhage in the farming industry.

I understand why so many young people fail to enter the industry. They cannot enter an industry if there will not be a viable wage at the end of their labours — and the tragedy is that there is not a viable wage. There is a great hoo-ha when we hear that farm incomes have increased by 10% due to something that has happened in the previous year, but 10% of little is still little. We must realise that the agricultural industry is facing a crisis. Departments — not only DARD — have an interest in this debate, and issues must be faced and grappled with. Everything humanly possible must be done to save the industry.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Molloy] in the Chair)

It is noteworthy that farmers on large holdings have a younger age profile than those on smaller holdings. Therefore it is vital that farmers are given the help and assistance necessary to survive. I fear that the agrifood sector, Northern Ireland's largest employer, will be unsustainable without larger holdings having a secure and viable long-term future.

Northern Ireland farmers supply the Province's main food-processing companies. Furthermore, a large volume of milk is exported from Northern Ireland to the Republic of Ireland for processing. The Northern Ireland food industry has a gross annual turnover of more than £2 billion, which accounts for approximately 21% of the total turnover of our manufacturing sector. The two largest sub-sectors of the food industry — milk and milk products, and beef and sheep meat — account for almost 50% of that industry's turnover. That reflects the importance of those commodities for Northern Ireland's primary production.

My colleagues and I again recently met an Ulster Farmers' Union team, which was led by its president, Mr Kenneth Sharkey. We discussed the union's 'Cut it Out' campaign, which calls for more farm work and less paperwork. I thank the union for its active leadership in the fight to preserve Northern Ireland's farming industry. I assure the union and the industry that the Democratic Unionist Party will resolve to support their efforts, and that we will use our team at Westminster to constantly press the Government to act in the interests of the farming community. Similarly, our MEP, Mr Jim Allister, has used his skills to great effect in the European Parliament on the matter, and he will continue to do so.

The Assembly informs the Departments of its disgust at some of the gold-plating for which they are responsible and its disgust at the regulations that are being forced on the farming community. Although other regions of the United Kingdom can focus on local supply, such as farm markets, and on niche markets, such as organic produce and traditional breeds, that is not an option for Northern Ireland farmers because they rely on exporting 70% of their produce outside the UK.

The Government can do more, and they could display a better understanding of the crisis that the industry faces. For example, the high number of farm inspections was mentioned earlier. There is duplication of inspections, which may originate from DARD, DOE, and the farm quality assurance scheme, etc. That duplication means not only a duplication of costs; if one wants to bring disease to farms, a good way to do so is to have inspector after inspector visiting and moving around. That threatens the security of the disease-free status that the Northern Ireland farming community has enjoyed and has sought to protect.

Instead of having a plethora of officials who inspect one farm after the other, filling in their own forms and keeping themselves in a job, we must seek practical solutions. More is spent on officialdom in Departments than on trying to keep the farming industry alive. We must ensure that the issues are tackled practically and cohesively.

The DOE seems to hold a different opinion than DARD. I concur with the Member for South Antrim Mr Ford, who said that there seems to be a lack of cohesive thinking in the Departments. I recall a meeting that our party held with the DOE and DARD. When they were together, it seemed that, although DARD took the lead, the DOE tail was wagging the dog. It seemed as though the DOE was the unmovable object and wanted to gold-plate legislation. I can understand why we have gold-plating, but it must be applied across the whole of Europe. I am sickened that regulations are being forced down the throats of farmers in Northern Ireland, while in the Irish Republic or other parts of Europe, it seems that anything will do. There is no level playing field, and we demand that there be one.

I remember the crisis in the pig industry in Northern Ireland, and I recall meetings that took place at that time with Lord Dubs. Before that crisis, the Department told farmers that if they gained a quality-assured certificate, they would be on the pig's back and that everyone would want their produce. In reality, instead of being on the pig's back, they were under its belly. The Department placed so many regulations on the farming community that it put it into the pig's manure.

It is time for realism in the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development. There has to be joined-up government to ensure that we save this vital industry for rural Northern Ireland. I believe that it produces the best produce in the world. We should be backing the industry to the hilt.

1.00 pm

Food produced in Northern Ireland should be labelled so that people know that they are getting the best possible quality — instead of food from another part of the world getting a Northern Ireland label just because it is processed here. We must ensure that there is honesty and integrity in the industry. Elected representatives and the Assembly must stand 100% behind the farming community, which forms the backbone of Ulster industry — in fact it is our primary industry. We have a duty to give that community our wholehearted support.

Mr Kennedy: It is always a pleasure to speak after Dr McCrea. He is a hard act to follow, and I congratulate him again on another fine speech.

I welcome the opportunity to participate in this important debate, and I thank my colleague Tom Elliott and Assemblyman P J Bradley for bringing this important issue to the attention of the Assembly. A high degree of public interest has been created today.

Agriculture remains one of the largest employers in Northern Ireland, and it is one of the key industries — if not the key industry. It is certainly a key industry in my constituency of Newry and Armagh. I join with others in paying tribute to the UFU. For many years, the UFU has provided its members with good, steady, consistent leadership, and its administrative department has produced excellent briefing papers and documents that are an important asset to public representatives.

On behalf of the Ulster Unionist Party I welcome the 'Five Steps to a Better Future' initiative, which was launched by the UFU in November 2006. The first step in that initiative is to reduce bureaucracy in agriculture, which has led to the new 'Cut It Out' campaign. There is too much red tape in the agriculture industry affecting the day-to-day work of farmers. I can confirm — as will other Members — that it is causing unnecessary stress and worry, leading in some cases to serious medical conditions and suicide. Farmers are finding themselves in difficult situations, and the quicker that the Government realise that they are adding to the pressure on farmers — in many ways, they are inflicting it — the quicker they will realise that they need to do something about it.

The general view expressed by Members from all parties in the House is that there is too much red tape, not only from the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development, but from associated Government agencies and, in particular, the European Union.

Earlier, it was mentioned that Government agencies have commissioned 18 business surveys into local farms, costing approximately £318,000. However, the cost to genuine farmers was £2.3 million in penalties. Therefore, we must ask what manner and level of madness are DARD and Government agencies permitting when an industry — in particular, the agriculture industry — has to employ professional form-fillers?

Mr Hussey: It is my understanding that the ratio of DARD civil servants to farmers is between 1:7 and 1:8. Is there a degree of self-protectionism from the Department in that it must generate red tape in order, at times, to justify its existence?

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Kennedy: I thank the Member for his well-made and relevant point.

Northern Ireland's farmers and agriculture industry need and want a locally devolved Administration at Stormont as quickly as possible. On behalf of the Ulster Unionist Party, I hope that that is achieved as quickly as possible. Direct rule Ministers have been either incompetent or not sufficiently interested in Northern Ireland's agriculture industry. Therefore, they have not represented the industry properly and have not dealt with its problems.

In addition, since 1997, the Labour Administration has been largely unsympathetic to the United Kingdom's rural communities. I have no doubt that a devolved Assembly would be more responsive to the needs of the agriculture industry in Northern Ireland. It might not solve all the industry's problems and would not be — and could not be — a panacea for all its ills.

Mr Simpson: Does the Member agree that red tape is a problem in the farming community? For example, one of the major obstacles faced by farmers is that when they consider re-diversification, they are met by the bureaucracy of the Planning Service.

Mr Kennedy: I very much share the Member's concern about that. I make the point that not only will dealing with the problem of red tape be a priority for the Minister of Agriculture in a newly devolved Administration, it will be the Executive's priority to create the conditions for joined-up government, which, hitherto, have not existed. If the agriculture industry is to find its way through many of the problems that it faces, such conditions must exist.

I have no doubt that an Executive and working Assembly would make a significant contribution to renewing confidence in the agriculture industry. I welcome this debate.

Mr O'Dowd: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

I support the motion. However, it highlights the weaknesses of the business conducted in the Chamber for the past number of weeks. The motion:

“calls on the Government to implement legislation/regulations with less gold-plating”.

The fact is that the elected representatives in this Chamber should be the Government. Unfortunately, we have spent the past hour outlining the agriculture industry's problems. The agriculture industry knows what its problems are. It needs solutions to those problems from an effective local Administration that can help to resolve them.

The EU is responsible for much red tape. However, it is down to civil servants to interpret that red tape. We have seen examples of how other EU nations interpret red tape. Indeed, we need only look to the Government of the Twenty-six Counties.

Indeed, many farmers who are in the Public Gallery or are watching this debate on television have farms that straddle the border. On one side of the border, DARD implements a ridiculous amount of red tape, and, on the other side of the border, an Administration operates a policy that is pro-farming and pro-agriculture. A local Administration could greatly improve the situation for the agriculture industry. We cannot solve all its problems, but one hour's debate — or one, two or three days' debate — will certainly not solve those problems.

We were elected to make decisions and to implement legislation and policy; that is what we should be doing. Would it not be more effective for Assembly Members to debate this motion at an all-Ireland ministerial council meeting than in this Chamber? Would it not be more effective to lobby the European Union with a single voice? It has already been stated that the agriculture industry does not have the same impact on the UK economy as it does on the economy of the island of Ireland. Agriculture does not have a voice in the British Government, but an all-Ireland ministerial council could be a single voice for agriculture that could not be ignored.

I am my party's health spokesperson, and Members may wonder why I am speaking to a motion on agriculture. The basic tenet of a healthy society is the food that it consumes. Our locally produced and manufactured food is undoubtedly the best in the world, and over the years it has been proven that food from local farms is second to none. That is why we need an agriculture industry. We must ensure that our food is produced locally and is not shipped some 1,000 miles from various places around the world to the plates, diners, restaurants and schools meals kitchens of Ireland. The longer that food travels and is stored, the less healthy and nutritious it is.

The rural community is under attack from various quarters. There is Draft Policy Planning Statement 14 (PPS 14), proposals to close some rural post offices — which we will debate later today — health planning and threats to our rural schools. All those attacks are detrimental to the agriculture industry and rural communities and should be resisted by a local Executive, not an Assembly debating shop.

After today's debate, a single voice will emerge from the Assembly. Unfortunately, DARD is not packing its computers into removal vans and pulling out of DARD offices. Tomorrow morning, DARD officials will implement the same policies that they implemented today, and the agriculture industry will face exactly the same problems. All we can do is debate. It is clear, a LeasCheann Comhairle, that we are in danger of producing more methane than the entire agriculture industry. Go raibh maith agat.

Mrs D Kelly: Several Members have highlighted overly bureaucratic administration in the agriculture industry, and I support those views. My contribution on behalf of the SDLP will be to call for the implementation of the Ulster Farmers' Union initiative for origin labelling of beef in the food sector industry.

Throughout 2006, the Ulster Farmers' Union was in correspondence with DARD, the self-proclaimed rural champion, but to no avail. It is clear from the correspondence that not only was there an attempt to kick this issue into the long grass but, in typical Civil Service-style manoeuvres, to pass responsibility to an agency — in this case, the Food Standards Agency Northern Ireland. That ploy got short shrift, but the anomaly still exists in Northern Ireland of food-labelling regulations for beef applying to retail products but not to beef destined for the food service sector. The food service sector is growing rapidly in Northern Ireland and, in 2005, was estimated to be worth £1.6 billion, representing a growing market opportunity for local producers.

1.15 pm

In recent days, we have heard commentators, including celebrity chefs — I do not know if my colleague from Upper Bann is one of those or not, but I do know that he has such a background — speaking about food miles as being a deciding factor when meat, chicken, fruit and vegetables are being purchased.

More people are becoming increasingly discerning about the food they buy: we know that from the way major retailers have advertised Northern Ireland produce so enthusiastically. The measure was introduced in response to customer demands to be able to buy local products. Why should customers of the food service sector — restaurants, pubs and other catering outlets — not have the same choice?

DARD quotes European legislation as its guide and states that costs are prohibitive — not something that seems applicable when determining whether to hire consultants to advise on policy matters. DARD has even asked the UFU whether the industry could meet the potential increase in demand if such an initiative were to be introduced. Therefore, DARD is not contemplating that such a demand is possible, and, if one does materialise, DARD is wondering whether it can be met. Is DARD a rural champion or defeatist?

I assure Members that the farming community will rise to the challenge gladly. After all, farmers are not afraid of hard work or long hours. Consumers too will meet the challenge gladly. They have already indicated their desire to have “labelling of origin” introduced. Consumer research conducted by the UFU in the ‘The Irish News’ and the ‘News Letter’ in 2004 showed that 96% of consumers would like to have the option of having dishes prepared with local produce in local restaurants; 99% want local produce to be labelled on restaurant menus; 97% would support a restaurant that voluntarily promoted local produce and low food miles; and 100% of respondents want to see more restaurants providing local produce.

Further research by Periscope and the Institute of Grocery Distribution (IGD) also shows a growing interest among Northern Ireland consumers in purchasing local produce. DARD should show some leadership, even at this stage, by introducing a voluntary scheme. I know that that would be welcomed by the UFU.

During the debate, we have heard examples of good practice and proactive measures by the Government in the Republic of Ireland. The Minister, Mary Coughlan, announced the introduction of the Health (Country of Origin of Beef) Regulations 2006, which came into effect on 3 July 2006. That decision by the Government in the Republic of Ireland highlights the need for urgent progress to be made on the issue in the North. The Scottish Parliament is also taking steps not only to assist the farming community but to give the public the good information that it wants by introducing a voluntary code.

A restored Assembly could make a difference to the industry. The SDLP welcomes the will to work positively for the good of all in Northern Ireland, and I trust that other parties will show moral courage in the days and weeks ahead. Indeed, Mr O’Dowd talked about how this Assembly, while it can debate, has no power. That is true, but let us hope that he and his party will stop giving the DUP a veto on policing so that we can all move ahead.

Finally, I too congratulate the UFU on its vision and on its efforts to cut red tape in the industry. I support the motion.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I welcome the debate and the immense interest being shown in it. I was a Member of the Northern Ireland Assembly and of the Committee on Agriculture and Rural Development, and it became very hard to drag people out to a debate on agriculture. Perhaps the presence of so many people watching us today has encouraged Members to come to the debate, and I genuinely welcome that interest. As well as that, there may be an election coming, and that may have something to do with some people’s interest in the issue.

However, it is good to get packed Benches, new faces and new Members speaking in the debate. People from the farming community and the rural community will judge for themselves as to the voices that are committed to the subject, and I hope that after today’s debate they will continue to see that there are people in public life who support them and want to see them endorsed, encouraged and supported in a practical and efficient way.

I apologise that after my speech I will have to break with convention and leave for the meeting with the Security Minister in the Senate Chamber. I do not want the Member who will follow me to think that I am leaving because he is speaking.

A Member said earlier that we should be the Government, that we should be in charge and that we should be responsible for running the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development. Of course local people want Northern Ireland's elected representatives to have their hands on the levers of power and to run an efficient and effective Government. What they do not want, however, are parties in here that are not truly democratic and that are not linked to the democratic way forward. What they do not want is an Assembly that will become unstable, as happened in previous efforts to get an Assembly up and running.

What farmers want to hear today is that there is going to be a real, genuine, solid commitment by all parties to the rule of law, support for the police and for the courts. Then we can move on and see progress happen instead of this nonsense of paying lip-service to the democratic principle and then ignoring it in the breach. Perhaps the reason — and this may have dawned on some Members — that health rather than agriculture spokespeople are taking part in this debate is that certain selection processes have not taken place. Perhaps some people are going to be deselected. We just do not know; however, stranger things have happened. We shall see in the days ahead.

This is a worthy motion and one that the DUP, through its agriculture spokesman, Mr Clyde, has supported admirably today. 'Five Steps to a Better Future' is a very progressive document and shows that the UFU is taking the initiative. Where the Department has failed to identify issues or, worse still, has ignored issues, the UFU wants to do what it claims to do best — to represent the men and women of the field and try to identify and resolve the issues.

The motion focuses a good deal of attention on red tape and bureaucracy; however, it would be wrong to assume that that is all that the UFU has identified in its report. It has identified a host of issues that the Department should get to grips with.

Mr Shannon: Is the Member aware that there are 1,440 Department of Agriculture and Rural Development officials in County Down — one for every two farmers — while in the west of the Province there are only 400 in each county? Is he also aware that such is the monitoring and the officialdom in County Down that the Department has been known to hire a helicopter to check on farmers? Will the Member agree that the introduction of a citizen's charter would be the best way forward so that there would be no criminalisation or penalisation? Will he further agree that 14 days' notice of an official visit to a farm is the way forward?

Mr Paisley Jnr: The issues that the Member for Strangford has identified go to the heart of the motion. It is not just the gold-plating; it is the crippling effect on the industry in Northern Ireland. There are so many officials, as Mr Shannon has rightly pointed out, that they almost outnumber the people entering the agriculture industry.

The UFU report identifies real, positive wins, and we should not have to wait for an Assembly Government to get up and running. DARD could start putting them in place immediately. I know that departmental representatives are here today, and I would encourage them to look at this report and recognise that there are points in all five sections that could be acted on and put in place immediately, if they really cared about listening to the farming community.

Mr Storey: Does the Member agree that there is a serious issue when a Department has an underspend of 40% of EU Peace II money, which equates to €32.5 million, at 19 September 2006? Surely serious questions must be asked about why the Department has allowed that scandal to continue?

Mr Paisley Jnr: I am glad that the Member has raised that point. I have just picked up the publication, 'Department of Agriculture and Rural Development: Resource Accounts 2005-06'. The Member has identified the startling waste that goes on. Members should study Mr Storey's remarks, which he makes as a member of the Peace II monitoring committee. I congratulate him on the work that he does in that area.

In the publication, the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development claims to have four aims, including improving the economic performance of the agrifood industry and strengthening the economy and social infrastructure of the farming community. However, the red tape that currently exists and that is being introduced is at such unprecedented levels that it is crippling the industry. The Department cannot fulfil the aims of its report if it allows that to continue. It must cut the tape and let people be free to do what they are supposed to do, which is to be good businesspeople who efficiently and effectively carry out the important task of providing food for the community.

In its 2006 'Cut It Out' campaign, the Ulster Farmers' Union said that form-filling errors cost the local industry £2.3 million. We see the effects of such errors not only in farming, but across the business sector. If the Federation of Small Businesses supported us in a debate tomorrow about red tape, the same themes would be identified. There is a poison at the heart of Government: if they cannot deal with a process, they put red tape on it to slow it down. That is a minefield, and it must be tackled urgently.

In Northern Ireland, a lot of legislation must be complied with, principally that which comes from the European Union. However, other Departments encourage that because of the enforcement systems that add significantly to such legislation. Mr Shannon and Mr Storey have illustrated that issue very clearly. Other EU member states do not add the same amount of red tape and compliance legislation that we do.

Clearly, a balance must be struck. Enforcement is good in principle: there must be enforcement and compliance so that the consumer has confidence in the product. However, a balance must also be struck between over-enforcement, which we clearly have, and the over-indulgence that seems to occur on the part of the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development. There have been many examples of that, and I would like to pick up on two.

The first is water quality. In Northern Ireland, that is dominated by not one, two or even three European directives, but four. There is a new Groundwater Directive; the existing Groundwater Directive, which stays in place and still has to be complied with; the Nitrates Directive, which caused untold problems for this House and for the farming community; and, of course, the Water Framework Directive. Those highlight the over-bureaucracy in the Department. Europe should streamline all that into one simple directive and one simple enforcement regime, instead of having the separate regimes that are associated with those directives.

In this morning's post I received Northern Ireland Statutory Rule No. 508, which has the very long title The Sheep and Goats (Records, Identification and Movement) (Amendment) Order (Northern Ireland) 2006. That has nothing to do with the goats in the Assembly; it is to do with another additional requirement on sheep and goat farmers. In addition to the current ear tag that they have to put on sheep and goats, they will now have to find a blue tag — I do not think that all tags are red, white and blue — to put in sheep's ears. It actually specifies that the new tag must not obscure any other tag that appears on the sheep's ear. Soon every sheep in Northern Ireland will have to have a filing cabinet for all the forms that are associated with it. That situation highlights the nonsense that the farming community has to go through. Instead of being able to raise the beast, get it to slaughter and get it into the food chain as quickly and efficiently as possible, we have this nonsense of filling in form after form.

The Department must review and reduce the burden of red tape that is on the industry and remove it as soon as possible. I hope that Commissioner Fischer Boel's current review of the effects of the CAP across the member states gets to grips with this issue and deals with it efficiently and effectively.

1.30 pm

Rev Dr Robert Coulter: I too am glad that this motion has been brought before the House, and I congratulate those who have put their names to it. It allows us to highlight some of the problems that the farming community faces.

As others have already eloquently pointed out, red tape has gone beyond the realm of acceptability on farms. The other evening I was talking to some farmers at a function, and they were discussing ear tagging. The end product of the conversation was that the Department should develop sheep with six ears to accommodate all the tags. That shows the nonsense that is emanating from the Department.

Coming late to the debate as I do, there is little left to say. However, I would like to highlight the cost of inspections. Has the time not come for the Select Committee on Public Accounts to investigate the Department for value for money? How much do inspections cost? What is their end product? How does the Department achieve value for money if, as we have been told, there is one departmental official for every seven or eight farms in the country?

No other business is as burdened by rules and regulations as the farming industry. It is a major industry in Northern Ireland, supporting some 50,000 jobs on farms and 18,000 jobs in the agrifood sector, which has an annual turnover of £2.4 billion. What other industry is so vital to the economy of the country and so burdened with red tape? I cannot think of one. If an industry is brought in from America or another country, the Government bend over backwards to give it grants and other assistance. Yet a home-grown, home-made, home-serviced industry has a pile of red tape heaped on it year upon year. Surely the time has come for the Department to consider seriously its value to the industry. The Department needs a change of mindset on the matter.

This brings me back many years to when a town of which I was mayor was considering building a new meat plant. The number of regulations that we had to comply with was so burdensome that we wondered at times whether it was worthwhile. When we went to the Continent, however, we saw meat plants that had not half the regulation to which we were subject. Our regulations extended to the number of centimetres required in the approach to the killing zone. I am tempted to say that our officials must have a bureaucratic disease that requires them to place this burden on those who are doing something worthwhile in the country. I appeal to the Department to consider its attitude to farmers.

There are many other things that we could talk about. Food miles have already been referred to. There is no sense in bringing food halfway around the world when we could produce it at home; in treating that produce with radiation or chemicals to keep it fresh when our farmers can provide the same produce locally; or in bringing meat from the other side of the world when our own farmers produce the same cuts — only better.

Does the Department apply the same regulations to foreign meat producers and ask whether the same demands are made of them? What does the housewife think when she sees two cuts of meat in the supermarket, one from Northern Ireland that is overburdened with red tape, the other from a foreign country that seems not to be subject to the same regulations? Yet she is expected to provide meat for her family.

The Department must be challenged on those moral questions. I ask DARD to ensure that its attitude to the farmers of Northern Ireland is ethical.

Very little has been said about biofuel, although Mr Ford mentioned the energy side of the agriculture industry. What is the Department doing to assist and encourage farmers to get into the biofuel industry? This is a new era for farming, but, as Mr Ford said, it seems that the Department's attitude is to make it more difficult for our farmers to get into something that will really help the industry.

We also need to help our farmers to deal with the supermarkets. Time after time, in rural communities, I come across farmers who say that they are up against it when it comes to the big fellows, who can pull down the price. Look at the cost of milk, for example. How much does the farmer get for his milk per litre? How much must a housewife pay for a litre of milk that she buys off the shelf? Where does the money go in between? Those questions need to be addressed and answered.

DARD has a great opportunity to take the issue by the scruff of the neck and deal with it ethically, honestly and straightforwardly, so that it can stand before the Public Accounts Committee and say that it is giving value for money.

I congratulate the UFU for its initiatives and for dealing with people on the ground. I plead with the Department to stop looking only at legislation and to look at people. The stress that farmers endure has been mentioned, as has the plethora of forms that they must fill out. Will departmental officials please tell me whether they are going to support the farmers, as they should, or whether they are going to support mere legislation?

Ms Gildernew: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I commend the farmers' unions and others for the work that they have done in the rural and farming sector. I welcome the president of the Ulster Farmers' Union, Ken Sharkey, and people from the farming community who have come to hear the debate.

Agriculture remains an integral part of the Irish economy, and the rural way of life is an essential part of our culture and heritage. For generations, the industry has withstood successive British Governments' policies to force people out of farming and into towns and cities. Draft PPS 14 is the most recent example of those policies.

Agriculture employs more than 50,000 people in the North, and a further 18,000 are employed in the food-processing sector. The farming industry generates £2.4 billion for the economy, which is a significant contribution to the gross domestic product (GDP). However, the possibility of an end to devolved Government here leaves the farming community with probably more to lose than any other grouping or industry. Much of the primary legislation that affects farming comes from Brussels, and its application, interpretation and implementation is one of the biggest challenges facing the sector. Without a local Minister in charge, and without the Assembly and its scrutiny Committee in place, DARD is not fully accountable. The result of that is that farmers are being short-changed. Funding programmes that should have been fully implemented have not been, and, as a consequence, millions of pounds have been lost to the industry.

All parties have voiced widespread concerns in the debate about the way in which DARD operates. Its methods have caused unnecessary hardship. The culture of red-tape bureaucracy and the lack of support and flexibility offered to farmers are the hallmarks of the way in which DARD does business in the North. I presume that I speak for all parties when I say that that no one is attacking DARD employees; rather, the policies and the ethos at the top of the Department are the problem.

I have listened carefully to Members' comments. In particular, one Member's comments must be noted. It is unfortunate that Ian Paisley Jnr is no longer in the Chamber, but he should perhaps remove his blinkers for a second and put the interests of the farming community ahead of his own narrow political agenda. He is obviously not talking to farmers because, if he were, he would know that farmers continually say that local politicians should return to power and that there must be a local Minister for agriculture. If he cannot understand the relationship between health, good diet and farming, he is sorely missing the point. It is good to hear that he missed me, having thought that I should have spoken earlier in the debate. It is good that he noticed my absence.

Sinn Féin has consistently highlighted problems with DARD and, more fundamentally, the continuing damage to the local industry through its being tied to a UK position on agriculture, particularly with regard to Europe. The British agricultural policy actively supports a cheap food policy that is destroying rural communities. That policy permits the import of cheap food from countries across the world that, as Bob Coulter pointed out, do not have the same stringent controls as here. At the same time, the British Government support the dominance of massive supermarkets that control the prices paid to farmers. That must be reversed. Bob Coulter also highlighted the difference between the farm-gate price and the supermarket price. I thank God that it is no longer only housewives who go to the supermarket nowadays — consumers come in all shapes, sizes and genders.

Sinn Féin has repeatedly argued that the development of an all-Ireland agricultural framework is in farmers' interests, particularly in respect of EU negotiations and the implementation of EU guidelines and directives. Nowhere is an all-Ireland approach more urgently needed than in tackling the rural crisis that affects much of Ireland. There are clear benefits to the removal of UK status from food exports from the North. An all-Ireland food promotion agency and an all-Ireland strategy to promote animal health and consumer confidence must also be established.

Ireland's agricultural industry and rural life is continually being damaged by central Government on both sides of the border, by the EU and by world economic policies. That requires an urgent all-Ireland response. Greater co-ordination across Ireland is needed in order to find more effective ways to challenge the implementation of the raft of EU directives that will have a massive impact on farmers' futures. Rural communities are right to feel betrayed: farm incomes are plummeting; promises of investment in employment, housing and infrastructure in rural areas have been broken. Hundreds, perhaps thousands, of people will leave the farming industry in years to come.

A common agenda for Irish farmers, fishermen and rural communities is essential. There is strength in unity. If Irish farmers took a moment to examine how their French counterparts act to support one another, they might learn that united they stand, divided they fall. There is much agreement between Sinn Féin and the Ulster Farmers' Union on the problems that face the industry, not least the fundamental problem of red tape and bureaucracy in DARD and the practice of gold-plating regulations to the detriment of farmers. Others Members have said plenty on those issues already, so I will not go into any more detail.

The UFU has identified five clear priorities for an incoming Executive in order to make early progress on a range of issues. Food miles will be an issue for a local produce public procurement initiative. It is ironic that some hospitals import patients' food from Wales when some of the best quality food in the world is available here.

Beef-labelling, in particular, should be compulsory. The poultry industry is under pressure from labelling requirements. More must be done to support the poultry industry. A renewable energy public procurement initiative should be introduced. Much more could be done to support new technologies. We can also learn from research into developing markets that has already been done on the island by organisations such as Teagasc. We must also be mindful of the VAT and taxation requirements on biofuels, as those must be made as attractive as possible to consumers.

The abolition of the Agricultural Wages Board is also one of the UFU's five priorities. Sinn Féin endorses all five priorities and gives its commitment to champion them.

It is a time of huge challenges and opportunities for the farming industry and rural community. Without going into more detail about red tape, I wish to highlight the huge difficulties surrounding the single farm payment.

1.45 pm

The "duplicate field" issue has been a huge problem, particularly for smaller farmers who are often the worst affected as the duplication query on their farms can comprise a large percentage of the overall claim and may, in fact, lead to a larger penalty, or, in the worst-case scenario, cancellation of the entire payment. Farmers should not face considerable financial penalties given that the system was new, extremely complicated, and that errors were made through no direct malice on their part. Sinn Féin supports the UFU's efforts to have the problem highlighted in Europe through derogation on penalties for duplicate claims.

Another example of the different approach taken in the Twenty-six Counties is the 'Charter of Rights for Farmers 2005/07', which was introduced by the Minister for Agriculture and Food, Ms Mary Coughlan, a year ago. It provides information on many issues mentioned this morning, such as application procedures, inspection arrangements, eligibility and compliance issues. It also sets out specific details on time frames for the delivery of payments.

Critically, the charter is tolerance-based, a concept that has been accepted by the EU Commission. The lack of tolerance by local Government Departments has led to high financial penalties on the local farming industry. A farmers' charter could help to address that and would make an immediate difference to farmers' lives. We are all aware of the amount of forms that have to be filled in and the penalties that are imposed if they are not. It seems that DARD's policy is "do as I say; not as I do". However, when the Department makes mistakes, the same obstructions are not placed in its way.

Members have talked about how rural communities have been undermined. Draft PPS 14 is an example of one policy that undermines those communities. John O'Dowd talked about rural post offices and schools and the loss of access to healthcare services, and it is clear that the industry faces huge challenges.

The reform of the common agricultural policy (CAP) and single farm payments were supposed to ensure that farmers had the freedom to farm and to diversify. However, the culture of bureaucracy that continues to exist in DARD makes a mockery of that objective, and the situation is now much worse. Farmers are facing death by a thousand cuts, and that situation has to be reversed immediately.

We need a local Minister — there is no question about that. Sinn Féin has argued consistently that farmers in the North are not getting a fair deal. The Department has not been their champion. A local Minister would do a better job than any direct-rule Minister, and, as I have said many times before, it does not matter to which party that Minister belongs. The British framework does not just fail our industry; it also sells us short. We have so much going for us — our clean green image and the quality of our food — but we are being hampered. We should have one of the most vibrant farming communities in the world, yet we do not. We need a local Minister, and we need one now.

Go raibh míle maith agat.

Dr Deeny: Mr Deputy Speaker, thank you for allowing me to speak in the debate. I thank Mr Elliott and Mr PJ Bradley for raising the matter, and I commend the comments that Members have made.

Some people might ask why a doctor would speak on the issue. However, as Mr Paisley Jnr mentioned earlier, agriculture is our main industry, which makes it an immense issue for the people of Northern Ireland. I represent a cross-section of the community, not just across different churches, but across different occupations and professions too.

Members will have to excuse me as I am just getting used to the reading glasses that I bought in Dunnes Stores for £5 — as a doctor, I should have gone to see an optician. Anyhow, when I read the first line of the motion:

“That this Assembly deplores the over-bureaucratic administration”,

I thought that it referred to all professions in Northern Ireland. I have been a doctor for 27 years, and I know that healthcare staff certainly find it soul-destroying and demoralising that they must deal with so much bureaucracy. I am married to a teacher, and I know that the same bureaucracy exists in the teaching profession. As Tom Elliott mentioned, there is bureaucracy across many professions and it is driving people away from them.

What qualifies me to speak on a farming issue? Farming, like medicine, is a vocation. When people talk about vocations, they often mention medicine, teaching, or the spiritual or ministerial life. However, farming is a vocation, too. As Mr Clyde said, farmers work from six in the morning until six at night.

I did not discover until I did general practice that farmers often do not get holidays because they do not have cover. I believe that farming is a vocation.

What qualifies me to speak on this? I am not from a farming background, but I now live in a farming setting in Tyrone. My mother came from a farming background in the very far east of County Down.

Mr Coulter and Mr Kennedy referred to an important matter. I am a GP in a farming community. Many of the farmers are not just my friends but also my patients. The health concerns that I have for the farming community are down to red tape. Although we laughed about the six years on the sheep that Mr Coulter talked about, it is serious. In the Health Service, we feel the same.

I got involved in politics through a health issue. I was often quoted as calling the Health Service, because of what is happening here, an administrative monster, indeed, a bureaucratic cancer. I have been watching it for over 20 years now. I do not know what sort of a disease it is, but it is certainly contagious. And it is not just the Department of Health that has it: it has spread to the other Departments, including farming. This is a nonsense, and it is time that we as a society that is a part of Europe looked at our legislation. I agreed with Mr Coulter when he asked what was more important. Of course, we need legislation within reason, but we need to talk to the farmers.

My concern is, primarily, what this is doing to our farming community. The loss of incentive has to be mentioned. Many young people are being put off farming simply because of the red tape and the amount of time that they would have to give to it. Rather than dealing with the livestock and the beasts, as they are called, they are dealing more and more with paper. As an experienced GP more of my time, and that of my colleagues, is now spent looking at forms and ticking boxes than dealing with sick people. I know from my farming patients that they are doing the same rather than dealing with the beasts.

I do not like the blame game that goes on in politics. I have a brother in the legal profession. Some of my fellow Assembly colleagues who not here today are in the legal profession. The legal profession — I will keep going because they are not here today. [Laughter.] I say this in front of my brother: lawyers have to catch themselves on. They are ruining society. Everything now is defensive. We are practising defensive medicine in case we are sued in the High Court. The same applies to how farmers work. Instead of using common sense, we are being defensive because of fear of the High Court.

Without pointing the finger solely at our legal colleagues, the fault may also lie with our claim culture. People are now into claiming. In the medical profession we call it “compensationitis”. We have to put a stop to it and bring common sense back into the equation, where we can support the people working in these important jobs, including farming.

We should not forget that this part of the world is rural, both North and South. Setting aside the populations of the cities, the vast majority of people, North and South, live in the country. Yet all of this bureaucracy is due to centralisation. The rural people seem to have been forgotten about. The Government should not forget that people who live here in the North are rural people.

When Members canvass for votes, they should show their support for the farmers.

It is a pleasure to support the motion, and it seems that everyone has supported it. It is wonderful to have everyone on board. Other Members have mentioned that all parties support the farmers. It is great to see that in Northern Ireland, and I do not intend to rock the boat.

Mr Poots: With the exception of the odd jab between the DUP and Sinn Féin, everybody has been speaking with the same mind. Perhaps I should keep the debate going and remind Sinn Féin Members that the only party preventing Northern Ireland from having an agriculture Minister is Sinn Féin. Perhaps Sinn Féin will tell us today when its Ard-Fheis or conference will be called and when Ms Gildernew and those of her colleagues who do not support their leadership will do so in order to allow the party to call the meeting. Perhaps we can get on with establishing a Government in Northern Ireland on the back of that.

The motion contains many issues that must be addressed. Northern Ireland has been bogged down with red tape and bureaucracy for some time. We need to know what the detailed rules for the implementation of the nitrates directive are, and the farm nutrient management scheme must be more practical. The scheme that will deal with the protection of air, soil and ground waste is another example of the gold-plating of environmental issues in which the Government have gone over the top.

Are the Government interested in the environment? I heard Mr O'Leary from Ryanair taking on a former Minister who had responsibility for agriculture in Northern Ireland, Mr Pearson. Mr Pearson came out worst in the exchange. I was glad to hear Mr O'Leary taking on the Government on the environment, because the Government merely pay lip-service to the issue. Nowhere is that more obvious than in the agriculture industry.

Many regulations are being applied to the agriculture sector across Europe, but the most damaging factor to the worldwide environment is the deforestation of South America. Forests are being burned to create more land in which to produce more beef that will be shipped to Europe to prop up a low beef price so that supermarkets can flog cheap beef and screw the farmers in the United Kingdom. That will prevent United Kingdom farmers from getting a decent price for their beef. The Government are happy with a cheap food policy when that process can be applied, and they are not concerned about the environment, deforestation or its impact on Africa and other parts of the world.

We hear a great deal about ethical food policy. The United Kingdom imports chicken from south-east Asia that is not produced ethically. The chickens are reared on wire-mesh floors that are suspended above carp pools. The carp feed on the faeces of the chickens and are then used in food production. The intestine, bones and offal of the carp are cooked, turned into meal and fed to the chickens. That would not put the desired sizzle into your chicken, but the British Government allow that food to be imported into our country. Consequently, chicken prices are driven down, and the people who are producing it properly, ethically and with regard for the environment are undermined.

Today, the poor old Department has been hit, quite rightly, left, right and centre. However, in a declining agriculture industry in which the numbers involved and the profits have reduced, DARD has been innovative in creating jobs for civil servants — not for anybody else. Since there are fewer farmers, one would anticipate that fewer people would be required to regulate farming. However, what has happened? More regulations have been produced to sustain the same number of civil servants to regulate fewer farmers. That is a critical problem for farming, and consequently many people have been driven out of it. The regulations make farming less profitable and more burdensome, and they make it more difficult for farmers to do their job.

(Madam Speaker in the Chair)

2.00 pm.

There was a recent document on animal welfare legislation that was to have been responded to by December 2006. The best thing that DARD could do for animal welfare would be to allow farmers to do what they are supposed to do, and that is the farmer's primary job of animal and crop husbandry. Farmers are not allowed to look after their animals and crops, because they are burdened by paperwork. It can be more detrimental to profitability to make a mistake in the paperwork than a mistake on the farm that might lead to the loss of livestock. It is sensible for farmers to look after that paperwork because of the burden that the Department could apply to them. The more that DARD puts costs into the industry, the more that people leave that industry.

The issue of BSE arose 10 years ago and led to the decline that has taken place in the agriculture industry in Northern Ireland. At that time, we were warned of an epidemic in CJD and new variant CJD (nvCJD). On reflection, more farmers have lost their lives through suicide than through nvCJD. Although it has been a terrible thing for those families who have lost relatives through nvCJD, the impact goes beyond those individuals. Many people have gone through traumatic experiences as a consequence.

I left school to go to agriculture college and to become a farmer; that was all I wanted to do when I was at school. A generation on, my oldest son is 17 and I would not contemplate the possibility of his leaving school to come home to farm on a full-time basis. That is the difference in the agriculture industry over one generation. Young people, the lifeblood of anything, are staying away from the industry to go into other jobs where they earn decent wages and get respect for the work that they do.

We hear people on programmes such as the 'Stephen Nolan Show' talking disparagingly of culchies. There is no respect for those people who work hard to produce a high-quality product. The most important product that people use is the food that enters their bodies. Northern Ireland farmers do that job, and they do it well. We need a Department that will support them to do that job, a Department that is slimmer and more efficient. I am not suggesting that civil servants be sacked, but we must look to efficiencies in the Department and consider a situation where civil servants who leave are not replaced. The Department must not cost the public exchequer more money than the agriculture sector actually makes. It is not sustainable for a Department to cost the taxpayer more in pounds and pence than is yielded to the people in that industry.

I welcome the many people from the farming community who are here today, and I trust that we can look to a better future in farming. However, that can only happen when the Government give proper and full support to that industry.

Mr Gallagher: I welcome the debate. I want to mention the important contribution that farmers can make to the development of renewable energy and the reduction of our reliance on imported coal and oil, which contributes enormously to the problem of climate change.

Before doing so, I agree with those Members who spoke about the excessive levels of bureaucracy, particularly in DARD. Some of the regulations that have been mentioned are daft and nonsensical: one states that a farmer must use red diesel in his tractor for certain tasks but change to white diesel for others. Some of the red tape concerning the cutting of hedges and the disposal of the cuttings is absurd. Although some level of bureaucracy may be necessary, it could be significantly reduced.

I hope that someone from DARD will get the message from today's debate that the present use of red tape causes high levels of stress, considerable anxiety and worry for many farming families. In its policy document 'Five Steps to a Better Future', the UFU recommends the involvement of the farming community in producing renewable energy.

This winter alone, everyone has experienced floods and storms. We can see that climate change is happening here in Northern Ireland, not in another continent or at the North Pole. It poses a threat to future society, and something must be done about it. Although Northern Ireland covers a small area where carbon emissions are concerned, we have a responsibility to reduce our reliance on fossil fuels.

Some measures are being taken to address the problem. For example, there is some agreement at EU level and beyond — among some countries, at least — to take the problem seriously. Targets have been set to reduce CO₂ emissions in Northern Ireland: by 2010, they should be reduced by 20% from their 1990 level, after which there should be continued annual reductions of 1.5%. The target date is 2010; it is now 2007, and Northern Ireland still relies almost entirely on imported coal and oil for its energy needs. Those fuels contribute most directly to global warming. At the same time, there is a failure to harness those energy sources, such as biomass and biofuels, that could bring enormous benefits.

There are some exceptions: in my Fermanagh and South Tyrone constituency, a well-known company, Balcas, has won international awards for its use of wood pellets to produce energy. It is a large company that employs almost 1,000 people, and it meets all its energy needs through the use of wood pellets. Wood has been described as a carbon-neutral fuel, because as it grows, it absorbs roughly the same amount of carbon as it emits when later burned.

Land and climate conditions here mean that every farm in Northern Ireland can help to reduce the reliance on imported fossil fuels by growing willow and different forms of grass, such as pampas, or sunflower crops.

The Government must also be prepared to take some brave steps, to show the way and to encourage the development of renewable energy systems. That is why the UFU's initiative calls on the Government to procure locally sourced renewable energy to use in its Departments. That should be a priority for the new Executive.

We need that commitment, not just from the Department of Agriculture, but from all Government Departments. For example, they are committing themselves to converting to the use of woodchip to heat and provide energy for buildings, but we need other incentives to encourage the building of low-energy housing and the installation of renewable energy sources in existing houses.

Alongside that, we need a policy for vehicles, at least for those vehicles belonging to Government Departments that are taking their responsibilities seriously by increasing their reliance on sustainable fuels. There is more that can be done by the Government to demonstrate to farmers that there is a future for them and that it is a future for the development of a sustainable and profitable supply of renewable energy.

There is undoubtedly untapped potential for our farmers to grow the crops to produce biofuels and wood, such as willow trees, for biomass. I welcome the debate, and I hope that its result will be that the plight of the farming community is taken more seriously by an incoming Executive.

Mr Armstrong: I rise to support the motion as a paid-up member of the Ulster Farmers' Union. As a farmer and an Assembly Member, I know the problems that the farming community has faced over the past ten years since Lord Dubs came to Belfast at the time of the pig crisis.

It gives me great pleasure to conclude the debate deploring the over-bureaucratic administration of Northern Ireland's farming industry, and I back the call made by the Ulster Farmers' Union to implement initiatives that would have a positive impact on the circumstances and morale of the farming industry in Northern Ireland.

The publication of the agricultural census in 2006 shows a continuing and worrying decline in the number of farms in Northern Ireland, with a loss of 325 farms recorded last year. The total number of active farm businesses in Northern Ireland stands at 27,000. Over 50,000 people are employed on local farms with a further 18,000 in the food processing industry, contributing to £2.4 billion to our economy.

If any other industry suffered the same decline, there would be an outcry, but sadly the Government are slow to support Northern Ireland's largest private sector industry. Instead, it seems that DARD is intent on policing the farmers instead of supporting them. DARD used to be there to strengthen agriculture. That was the case eight years ago — that is what Ian Paisley said, and most of the farmers today in the Assembly know that. However, it is now entangling farmers in more red tape, which slows the agriculture industry down. Furthermore, we have fewer farmers. As Derek Hussey said, there is one farmer to every seven or eight officials. That is a big problem, and it seems that someone is keeping himself in a job.

I welcome the Davidson Review of the implementation of the EU legislation. It said that in many cases, the legislation has been gold-plated in its implementation to the extent that it may run contrary to its objectives. That means that the extra measures that are implemented can seriously harm the competitiveness of the farmers in Northern Ireland.

In recent times, farmers have had to face a vast range of new legislation imposed by the EU. Those have been further imposed by Westminster and implemented by DARD. Members in our debate today have referred to the various implications of the new regulations including farm waste, farm nutrient management and single farm payment, and many have not even received the weather aid for their potatoes. I think that Mr Bradley highlighted that.

All have agreed that the Government have painstakingly imposed EU legislation and that they have created huge unnecessary problems. We all know of the planning problems: a farmer who wants to build an extra chicken house or put up a wind turbine cannot get his plans through without a pile of red tape.

In farming, the volume of red tape is excessive. Members have heard outcries from numerous farmers in Northern Ireland, many of whom are facing heavy financial penalties. The strict approach taken by Government — by DARD — in applying penalties for non-conformities is totally unacceptable, especially since such an approach is not applied in other EU states.

2.15 pm

At present, five separate Government agencies are responsible for the inspection and enforcement of these regulations. That is overly bureaucratic, and those agencies should be subsumed into a single inspectorate.

I support the introduction of a farmers' charter, which would allow farmers to be free from administration and unnecessary paperwork and offer Northern Ireland farmers the same level of protection that is available in other EU states.

In October 2006, I visited Denmark to look at dairy farming methods and how Danish farmers deal with nitrates, in view of the new EU legislation now being implemented in Northern Ireland. I was amazed and encouraged at seeing how closely Danish farmers worked with their Agriculture Department, each supporting the other to ensure that the industry was promoted.

All our farmers want is a common-sense approach, but they are not getting that. I commend the Ulster Farmers' Union on its paper, 'Five Steps to a Better Future: Early Initiatives for a New Programme for Government'. It is straightforward and to the point in its recommendations to Government and a future devolved Assembly. Colleagues have already detailed the merits of the five points.

Agriculture is the single largest private sector industry in Northern Ireland, and it requires the support of all consumers. In the competitive world in which we live, it is necessary for Government to ensure that the industry is helped — rather than hindered — in reaching the best possible export markets, because Northern Ireland is an exporting country.

In recent years, Northern Ireland's consumers have been educated to demand higher quality food, which our farmers supply to supermarkets, restaurants, schools, hospitals, and so on. Northern Ireland consumers recognise the quality of local produce and choose it for themselves and their families. However, the increasing demands placed on farmers hinder the work that they endeavour to carry out daily.

I fully support the motion and call on the Government to implement the initiative of the Ulster Farmers' Union and to demonstrate to farmers that they will be supported in ensuring the future of the agriculture industry in Northern Ireland. These initiatives, if adopted, would be relatively inexpensive and would offer a much-needed boost to the largest industry in Northern Ireland.

However, since 1998, when I was first elected to the Assembly and met Lord Dubs, the then direct rule Minister with responsibility for agriculture and rural development — we all know the stories about him — only lip-service has been paid to the agriculture industry. Until we, as elected representatives, can hold local Ministers accountable, there is little chance that anything can be achieved beyond debating the issue.

Danny Kennedy referred to the Labour Government's inability to feel sympathy; we know how much sympathy the Labour Party has shown over the past eight years — that is, not much to rural communities in Northern Ireland. Furthermore, Members have already referred to the need for devolved Government.

These problems are another example of Northern Ireland being held to ransom by lack of progress in the political process. For Northern Ireland to move forward we must get the democratic Members of this Assembly up and going. The Ulster Unionist Party has shown leadership over the past eight years. It is now time for Sinn Féin to show some leadership and a commitment to fundamental democratic principles.

I am pleased that all parties support the motion. I wish to thank Tom Elliott and P J Bradley for tabling the motion, and also all Members who have taken part in the debate. I also thank the Ulster Farmers' Union, which is working hard in a difficult situation to highlight the plight of local farmers.

All Members have agreed that our farmers demand not only devolved Government but joined-up government in Northern Ireland.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly deplores the over-bureaucratic administration within the Northern Ireland agricultural industry and calls on the government to implement legislation / regulations with less gold-plating, and to put in place a review of current legislation and regulations with a view to reducing any unnecessary bureaucratic burden; and further calls on the government to implement the initiatives set out in the Ulster Farmers' Union document 'Five Steps to a Better Future'.

Closure of Post Offices

Madam Speaker: Order. The Business Committee has allowed two and a half hours for this debate. The Member proposing the motion will have 15 minutes, and there will be 15 minutes for the winding-up speech. All other Members will have a maximum of 10 minutes to speak.

Lord Morrow: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Is it not the custom that, when you are on your feet, all Members should be in their seats? Today in particular, I noted that when you stood to announce the next item of business, Members made a point of leaving the Chamber. Will you clarify for Members — yet again — that when you are on your feet, every other Member of the House should be in his or her place?

Madam Speaker: I am most grateful to Lord Morrow for making that comment. Indeed, I have mentioned to the Clerks that I will raise that issue again at the tomorrow's meeting of the Business Committee. Before Christmas, it seemed that that issue was commented on every week. I am at the stage where I may bring in my school cane — however, Members may enjoy that too much.

[Laughter.]

Mr Hay: I beg to move

That this Assembly deplores the introduction of proposals by the government to close a number of Post Offices across Northern Ireland; and the implications these proposals will have for rural Post Offices.

The motion stands in my name and in the name of the Member for North Down Peter Weir. However, I will accept the amendment in the names of Mr McGlone and Mr Dallat, as it certainly adds to the motion.

The debate is important because the proposed changes will have a serious, devastating and unprecedented effect on the post office network across Northern Ireland and will lead to the closure of over 100 post offices in Northern Ireland. Members have had this debate before: in March 2000, the Government announced a review of services in the post office network across Northern Ireland. The Member for East Londonderry John Dallat tabled a motion that rightly criticised a number of issues in that review.

Mr Dallat's motion received the House's full support, and I hope that this motion will command the same level of support.

Out of that review, the Government announced several initiatives, the real purpose of which was to strip and downgrade essential Post Office services. The Government determined that social security benefits and other important payments would be paid directly into customers' bank accounts.

Any business, irrespective of what it is, that loses, or is stripped of, essential services, can go only one way — it must close. It will become unprofitable and will no longer be economically viable. That has been the history of Post Office services across Northern Ireland, and the outcome of every proposal that the Government or Post Office Ltd have acted on here. In March 2004, the Government announced more initiatives, which, they claimed, were about transforming Post Office branches in Northern Ireland. Those initiatives led to the closure of almost 20 post offices.

Alistair Darling is the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry at Westminster. I do not know whose darling he is, but after this debate he will probably not be the darling of this House. In December 2006, he announced a restructuring plan to help modernise post offices. As I have said, every initiative from the Government or Post Office Ltd has ended in the closure of post offices. That has been the bottom line.

Every Member will agree that local post offices, whether in rural or urban areas, are a vital part of our community. The Government's latest proposals will have a major impact, especially in rural communities across the country. The closure of village post offices will have a disastrous effect on rural life. I acknowledge that the plans will also result in the closure of urban post offices, but my information suggests that the rural community will suffer more than anyone else in Northern Ireland.

Mrs I Robinson: Does the Member agree that the rural community will suffer a double whammy? Not every small village or hamlet has a bank. Our roads infrastructure and bus services are so poor that even to travel to larger towns requires a major effort, meaning that rural communities are the worst hit by closures.

Mr Hay: I agree with the hon Member. The figures show that the vast majority of post office closures will occur in the rural community. When considered alongside the effect that draft PPS 14 will have on rural planning, the proposed closure of rural schools, and rural transport concerns, we are all aware of the serious effect that those closures will have. The rural community is facing many other problems, but insult is added to injury when we see what the Government have planned in the way of post office closures in Northern Ireland.

2.30 pm

Every Member would agree that rural and urban post offices form the backbone of local society and economy and that they provide essential services to the community. Post offices in Northern Ireland have been social outlets, especially for the elderly. Going to the post office is probably the only time that many elderly people get out and socialise. People in Northern Ireland have always felt that post offices provide more than a service — they are a vital social outlet.

The Government's plans threaten the whole post office network on a large scale as never before. If the proposals go through as the Government plan, 2,500 post offices across the United Kingdom would close, including 100 in Northern Ireland. However, the tragedy is that it does not stop there. Post Office Ltd has told Government in the past few days that of the 14,300 post offices in England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland, it intends to operate just 4,000 in the next few years. By 2009, 2,500 post offices will have closed, but Post Office Ltd has said that it wants to go further. For commercial reasons, it would like to operate only 4,000 post offices in the United Kingdom, which is a serious situation for post offices in Northern Ireland, England, Scotland and Wales.

The closures do not affect post offices only. Many small businesses, including shops, are built around post offices in rural areas and they operate successfully. My greatest fear is that the number of intended closures will have serious financial knock-on effects for small businesses. That is a tragedy.

Members have debated this issue before. The Member for East Londonderry, John Dallat, moved a motion in the House in 2000. At that time, Members believed that the Government would listen to their views on post office closures and how we might run post offices in future. Practically all the debate fell on deaf ears. Indeed, before 2000 the Government and Post Office Ltd were determined to have fewer post offices across the United Kingdom. Eighty-two per cent of small businesses believe that the closure of post offices will have a serious effect on their business. Information from the small business sector shows that 88% of small firms send their mail through the Post Office every day and 69% send invoices: 87% of mail is business mail. That is a flavour of the real — if limited — business carried out by post offices in Northern Ireland. Just imagine the effect that the Government's proposed post office closures would have on the small business sector in Northern Ireland.

This is not simply a matter of the closure of post offices; I believe that it will have serious consequences for the entire Northern Ireland economy. There is no doubt that the Government's proposals — if they are allowed to get away with them — will lead to the United Kingdom being absolutely stripped of post offices, particularly in Northern Ireland.

The Government have proposed mobile post offices — that may work in England and Wales, but it will not work in Northern Ireland. That suggestion is intended to soften the blow of the closure of post offices. This House should be very critical of the Government's proposals and should call on them to sustain our post office network, particularly in rural areas. The Government must put real finances into the post offices that are still open and operating. Those post offices want to operate and remain open for business, but we face the problem of a Government that have continually withdrawn services, leaving those offices non-profitable.

The Government tell us that the post office network is £2 million in debt, but that is simply due to the Government's stripping of services at every opportunity. The Government say that they are examining the development of mobile post offices across Northern Ireland. The Government believe that that proposal might work, but the only measure that will work in Northern Ireland — and, I believe, in England, Scotland and Wales — is for us to clearly tell the Government that if they really want to sustain post offices in the long term, they must provide long-term finances and recognise that post office services are vitally important to the Northern Ireland economy.

Mr Dallat: I beg to move the following amendment: Leave out all after "for" and insert

"all Post Offices, urban, suburban and rural; and calls on a future devolved administration to work in conjunction with the Post Office and the Social Security Agency to retain Post Office card accounts; and further calls for the development of other government and financial services which address the needs of recipients of state benefits and pensions, other Post Office users and future potential customers."

I welcome the decision by Mr Hay and the DUP to accept the amendment. I am delighted that we shall be unanimous in our determination to ensure that the post office network continues to exist. Mr Hay pointed out that a previous Assembly had debated this issue. At that stage, it seemed that the future of the post office network was guaranteed, particularly in rural areas, but also in disadvantaged suburban and urban areas. At that time, officials from the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister visited Coleraine, which was to be the site of a pilot scheme for new services. Unfortunately, other political matters overcame the need to save the post offices, and the matter was ignored by the various Government Departments that could have introduced new services throughout the post office network and thereby removed the threat of closure that so many offices now face. The Government could at least have defended the present service, rather than stand idly by and watch those offices be whittled away.

There are various predictions about the number of sub-post offices that might close — some say 100 of the 540 that still exist. However, we all know that the situation will probably be much worse if we do not immediately begin to develop our own model for future post office services. The amendment was intended to illustrate what could and should be done.

During the long regime of direct rule, we have been forced to adopt models in practically every facet of life that are alien to the rural environment in which many of us live. The issues that face rural communities were highlighted during today's earlier debate on agriculture. By and large, we do not live in cities of hundreds of thousands, or millions, of people in close proximity to one another. We are a scattered community with a poor transport infrastructure, and the further one moves from the greater Belfast area, the truer that becomes. In those circumstances, the post office is often the hub of the local community and performs a unique service — in both parts of the island. The post offices are worth saving, not just for the sake of keeping them, but to improve, update and enhance the level of service for the people whom we represent.

I am an eternal optimist. Assuming that there will be a new Assembly, it must immediately put its stamp on the urgency of the delivery of Government services. It would be reasonable for the Assembly to do a deal with the Social Security Agency, over which it would have the control, to continue the payment of benefits through the Post Office card system. The Assembly would not be dependent on Britain for that. The Assembly could also direct the Departments to make better use of the Post Office in their attempts to put into the public arena the information, advice and help that those people who are often in the greatest need require to qualify for the millions of pounds of unclaimed benefits.

In the Republic of Ireland, where post offices are experiencing similar difficulties, the Government have acted to inject new life and services into the network. That is not perfect, but it is a start that will sustain rural post offices in areas where there are no banks and no other means to address financial matters.

In life, everything changes, and the Post Office is no different. The tragedy is that no one is controlling the changes in the Post Office, and rather than modernise post offices in a way that ensures that they keep pace with the passage of time, the Government are quite happy to allow them to be killed off. There have been various schemes, but none of them has been supported properly. Perhaps the worst example of that is the card system, which worked very well and was welcomed by many people who did not want to use banks.

Despite their best efforts, postmasters — in particular, sub-postmasters — have been treated extremely badly. Indeed, very often, as we heard during a recent meeting in the Long Gallery, they are forced to invest their own finances to keep in place services that are not only wanted, but badly needed. That is shameful and illustrates just how far removed Government are from the people whom they are supposed to represent. That must change now. I suggest that that is another reason to get the Assembly up and running.

In other parts of the world, post offices are used as centres where various public services can pitch their tents to deal with and listen to members of the public. In some rural areas, the police or their administrators are available at certain times to deal not necessarily with serious crime, but with local issues and complaints from members of the public. There may be a role for organisations such as the Citizens Advice Bureau (CAB) that support and help the public in an ever-complex society. There are no limits to how the Post Office could be modernised to continue serving the people, which has been its role since the introduction of the penny black stamp and the mail coaches.

We remember many people from the past for what they created. Examples are John Boyd Dunlop who invented the pneumatic tyre, Harry Ferguson who invented the hydraulic tractor, and many others who transformed the lives of people today. Would it not be a pity if this generation were to be remembered for what it destroyed rather than what it created? Let us begin by saving the Post Office and let us do that from today.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Beggs: Although I support the motion, I welcome the amendment tabled by Mr McGlone and Mr Dallat. There is a need to go further than the motion, and I am pleased that Mr Hay has accepted the amendment. The amendment enhances the motion by highlighting that, because both are at risk from the current proposals, there is a need to support urban and rural post offices.

Recently, there have been a number of closures in my constituency. Kilwaughter post office closed after financial uncertainty meant that it failed to attract a new sub-postmaster. Furthermore, in the urban Carrickfergus area, Woodburn post office and Eden post office have closed. In Larne, the Harbour sub-post office and Waterloo Road post offices have closed. Clearly, it is an issue that has affected and will continue to affect urban and rural post offices.

2.45 pm

Post offices are particularly important to the rural community, but, as I said, they are also an important focal point for many urban communities. The financial pressures on the post office network exist in urban and rural settings equally.

The amendment mentions the Post Office card account and calls for a future Administration to work with the Post Office and the Social Security Agency to retain post offices. The card account has become almost the heart of post offices. With the transfer of some payments to banks, post offices now make a significant part of their earnings from the card account. Were the Government silly enough to award the contract to PayPal or some other service, it would be the death knell for many post offices, and perhaps for the whole network. It is strange that the account is out to contract, and there appears to be a real risk that it may go elsewhere. That would be unacceptable. The Government should stop playing about and sort out the details well in advance because uncertainty does not help the post office network.

There are approximately 14,000 post offices in the UK, and around 8,000 of them serve the rural community. On 14 December 2006, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, Alistair Darling, announced the publication of the consultation document 'The Post Office Network', which includes the Government's proposals for restructuring the national post office network. He said that he expects that 2,500 post office branches will close. However, it appears that the total may go far beyond that figure, and I do not think that that is an exaggeration. Therefore sustainability is a huge problem facing urban and rural post offices.

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry proposed also that there should be further investigation into the role that local authorities and the devolved Administrations in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland might play in influencing Post Office services and how they might best be delivered. However, I must issue a word of warning. Does he want to transfer more funding from the central Exchequer to a devolved Assembly or to local ratepayers or is this a neat way of passing down the costs? It would be worthwhile to have discussions on the matter, as this should not be a basis for simply transferring costs from central Government to local devolved Administrations.

The Citizens Advice Bureau has advised that the post office network serves about 84% of people in rural areas who live within one mile of a post office and that, in addition, two thirds of villages with between 500 and 1,000 inhabitants have a local post office. Not only do the post offices provide a range of postal, Government and commercial services, but their presence brings additional benefits to the local community. For example, they make a positive contribution to local businesses by increasing the number of people who pass through a particular location.

Frequently in the rural setting retail stores are under pressure owing to the success of supermarkets, etc. The post office network is a vital part of the rural community as it keeps local shops open. It must be remembered that many people do not have the ability to travel to supermarkets regularly so those rural retail operations are an essential requirement for the rural community.

Postwatch found that:

“whether affluent or disadvantaged, traditional village or post war estate, the closure of the rural post office appeared to have had far-reaching effects upon both particular individuals and the community in general. It became apparent that the post office played an extremely important role in the rural community, a role that transcended the provision of post office services or even the goods sold at the store which was often attached.”

Many bodies have recognised the importance of post offices in isolated areas. There is a real risk that if rural post offices were to close, the viability of local convenience or grocery stores would be lost. That might apply to urban areas also, meaning that pensioners or young mothers would have to walk considerable distances to get to the grocery shops. The closure of post offices could make it difficult for disadvantaged people to obtain cash and basic groceries, if these were previously provided by their local post offices.

I have noticed an increasing number of cashpoints in rural settings, but they are the type that charge users £1 to withdraw £10. Many people who cannot afford banking services, or who are not financially secure enough for the banks to want their business, are reliant on the services provided by post offices. Even if they have a bank account and are able to use a cashpoint, 10% of their money could be lost to an access company. If there is no local post office, people often have to pay for transport in order to obtain their cash. That is another problem, with many people taking all their money out at one time, which may put them more at risk.

Why do many of the main banks in Northern Ireland not allow their services to be used in the post offices? The banks in England and Wales do, and it is a major benefit to local communities in accessing their bank accounts. The issue is under review by the Competition Commission; I hope that it will force the banks' hands, because the ability of people in Northern Ireland to access competitive banking services has been restricted. It is an important issue that must be addressed.

There is also a lack of joined-up thinking among Departments. The Post Office and the BBC are both publicly owned. Why on earth has the contract to sell television licences gone outside the public sector? We are paying for a private sector company to collect those payments. Surely the Government should adopt some joined-up thinking, retain the TV licence contract, and enable some of that income to pass through the post office network.

There have been developments in other parts of the United Kingdom. In Wales, £750,000 a year has been approved for rural retail services and post offices. The Scottish Executive are encouraging post offices to provide an Internet-access service. Such issues will also have to be addressed here.

The Ulster Farmers' Union has highlighted the potential closure of post offices and the adverse effects on rural communities. This comes on top of the centralisation of health services, the pressure on rural schools and changes to planning policies. Rural communities are at serious risk. I support the motion and the amendment. I hope that all Members will support them.

Mr McLaughlin: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I also support the motion and the amendment. I commend my colleagues on bringing them before us. It is an important opportunity for us to send a clear and united message of support for our post offices.

The plan to radically reduce the number of post offices will have a dramatic effect on local communities, particularly, but not exclusively, in rural areas. Post offices are the mainstay of many shopping malls and high-street retail centres, but, in a very particular way, they benefit rural communities.

In a relevant study, Postwatch Scotland found that due to the limitations of transport in rural Scotland, if post offices were closed, there would inevitably be an increase in vehicle use and a negative impact on the environment. Therefore, the argument for maintaining a strong network of rural post offices is that it would be good for the environment and for accessing important public services.

The postal authorities have an obligation to ensure that no more than 5% of users' premises are further than five kilometres away from an access point that is capable of receiving registered mail — normally defined as a post office — but in Scotland this has already gone beyond 19%. This part of Ireland — and the area west of the Bann in particular — has similar rurality. I echo the comments of Tom Begg, chairman of Postwatch Scotland, who said that rural post offices need “long-term clarity” together with “short-term certainty” — a bit like the Assembly, I suppose. He said that they also need:

“a change programme based on clear criteria of customers' needs”.

I also agree with him that:

“Change should not be a top-down approach ... Government's consultation should be based on evidence and recognition [and prioritisation] of customer needs”.

Dr Begg argued for local consultation on individual changes because:

“One size does not fit all ... Local needs and capabilities differ”.

That precisely echoes the conclusions of the Assembly's own economic subgroup in respect of Treasury's general strategy for the regeneration of a regional economy. One size does not fit all. What works in London or in the south east of England does not necessarily benefit any other region. Clearly, rural areas will be particularly affected by the loss of a service as essential as the local post office. In many rural areas, the post office is not only a commercial enterprise, but the eyes and ears of a community. Often the postmaster or postmistress is the first to realise that an elderly member of the community may be ill or in need of assistance as a direct result of noting the disruption of longstanding routine or because regular clients do not turn up to collect their pensions or avail of other post office services.

The closure of post offices will affect economically deprived areas the most, as it is in these areas that many people have no economic rationale to have bank accounts. Of course, these citizens are often the most vulnerable in society and are therefore even more dependent on post offices for essential services. If these cost-saving measures are permitted to go ahead, the most disadvantaged in society will suffer: the elderly; people on low incomes; people with disabilities; people who cannot afford to own or maintain a motor vehicle. Many people in these categories carry out most of their financial transactions in the local post office, and closure would be a major disruption to their way of life. In rural districts, where transport provision is often very limited and banking facilities invariably scarce, how can those without personal transport access bank or post office services?

The withdrawal of Government business has created this crisis. Deliberate Government policy and dogma is the real reason that many local offices are now considered unviable. It is the inevitable result, not of the loss of any traditional customer base, but of Government action in running down many services that were once the mainstay of post offices.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Wells] in the Chair)

This Government understands cause and effect better than most. When payment of benefits moved from payment books to electronic accounts, post offices lost out dramatically because Government encouraged recipients to have their benefits paid through bank accounts. The loss of the NIE powercards, TV licence saving stamps and other prepayment cards to convenience stores was yet another blow. Therefore I contend that it is deliberate Government policy that has the post office network in the state that it is in; and deliberate Government policy is required to secure the survival of this essential community service.

Rather than closing post offices, Government should be looking for ways of expanding the range of services available through this vital community network. Post offices provide community and social benefits, as well as direct and indirect economic benefits, and should therefore be supported to the maximum extent. The Government need to realise that investment and support for building up human and social capital is as important as many other mainstream Government programmes for giving local and sometimes isolated communities a sense of worth and well-being.

For the rural community, all of this is additional evidence of Government's intention to destroy a traditional way of life. First came PPS 14; then the announcement that some — perhaps many — rural schools would have to close; and now the local post offices may also be shut.

Those developments continue the worrying erosion of essential services in rural areas. That will lead to depopulation and the fragmentation of long-standing communities.

3.00 pm

To survive, rural communities need the post office network. We need to see actions that will regenerate our local communities and our rural communities, not irresponsible and unaccountable actions that will decimate them.

UFU president, Kenneth Sharkey, speaking on behalf of the farming community on the potential closure of post offices, said:

"This is removing a very valuable service from the rural areas affected and is another example of how policy makers are ignoring the impact of their decisions on rural communities".

He continued:

"Many farming families live in isolated areas and they feel their services are becoming less and less accessible."

The UFU highlighted recent decisions that will impact negatively on rural communities. Issues causing concern included: healthcare services being centralised; rural schools facing an uncertain future; plans to reduce the number of fire appliances covering rural areas; draft PPS 14 dashing many people's expectations of living in their communities; many school bus routes in rural areas not being treated, despite icy and frosty conditions; and the wider transportation policy, particularly as it affects the rural community.

The cumulative effect of all those measures will serve only to force people out of rural areas and into larger towns and cities, further depopulating the countryside. This Assembly should unanimously endorse the motion in order to make it clear that that will not happen. I support the motion and the amendment.

Mr Neeson: I also support the motion and the amendment. I deeply regret the fact that this Assembly has no powers. These debates are beginning to resemble the weekly rituals that we experienced at the Forum for Political Dialogue in the Interpoint Centre. This is not so much a transitional Assembly as a pretend Assembly, given the way in which things are going. It is like the old definition of an Irish Parliament — everybody talks but nobody listens.

On 24 October 2006, more than 30 MLAs met with the National Federation of SubPostmasters (NFSP) in the Long Gallery. That meeting came before the statement from the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, Alistair Darling, on 14 December 2006. One could understand the NFSP's deep concerns about the future of small post offices in Northern Ireland and the business as a whole. In my constituency of East Antrim, several small post offices have already been closed. My local post office at Milebush has closed, and many people miss it badly.

Mr Hay outlined how the closure of post offices affects other businesses. My colleague Naomi Long reminded me today of the experience in Ballybeen. After its post office was closed, the shops alongside it closed down. When the post office was moved out of the town centre in Carrickfergus, businesses there were also badly affected. Therefore the closure of post offices does have an impact on other businesses.

One of the NFSP's main concerns was the possible demise of the Post Office card accounts (POCAs) by 2010. Some 4.3 million people use POCAs every week to access their pension and benefit payments. POCAs currently bring in an average of 10% of a sub-postmaster's income. December's ministerial statement seems to suggest that the POCA will continue or at least that another method of payment will be introduced. That is to be welcomed, and it reflects the efforts of the NFSP's national campaign at Westminster and in other UK regions.

A great deal of pressure and competition has been coming from the banks and building societies. According to an NFSP briefing paper, recent research from the National Consumer Council (NCC) has found that:

"the Post Office is well regarded as offering a good, accessible service".

The briefing paper continues:

"and is viewed as both better trusted and more accessible than the banks."

Older people and the less well off tend to use post offices most. Research by Postcomm shows that sub-postmasters and post offices play an invaluable roll in communities by providing support for vulnerable residents, including older and disabled people.

Post offices in rural areas also provide a focal point for communities. The Welsh Assembly created a post office development fund, which provided grants of up to £50,000 to 125 small post offices in a bid to ensure that they continued to exist as the hub of their communities. Research has shown that that particular scheme has worked very well.

As I said at the outset, if the Assembly is serious about making life better here, the restoration of devolution by 26 March 2007 is seriously needed.

Dr Birnie: I support the motion and the amendment. My party agrees with the fundamental principles of the motion, and the amendment brings additional value to it in two senses. First, it widens the scope of consideration to all post offices, not simply those in rural areas — there is also an issue about post offices in urban areas, which I will refer to later. Secondly, the amendment makes valuable suggestions as to how the Government and their agencies might react to that position.

The context to the motion is the proposal to shut around 2,500 rural Post Office branches across the UK. In the last few years, there has already been a reduction of around 3,000 branches in urban areas across the UK. Northern Ireland has been part of that so-called rationalisation of the network.

I want to highlight those bodies that have responsibility for the current situation and might have responsibility for its improvement. First and foremost are the Post Office and Royal Mail. It must be emphasised that, to some extent, they are victims of the situation. The Post Office is primarily a commercial organisation. However, as has already, rightly, been indicated in this debate, its business and operations have significant social and community benefits. Given that the Post Office is required to balance its books, there is a problem when demand for its services is in a trend decline.

It is to the credit of the Post Office, Royal Mail and indeed Postwatch, the associated consumer protection watchdog, that elaborate consultation processes are in place to deal with situations that arise from proposed closures. However, my experience in south-east Belfast — and I am sure that many other Members can confirm this from their own experiences — is that in the past six years there have been between six and 10 branch closures and relocations. I am aware of only one case in which the decision has been reversed following consultation. Therefore, my experience is that while consultations pretty much run their course, the decisions go ahead as previously announced.

Critically, the Government also have responsibility for those matters. Postcomm has recently reported on the extent to which the reduction in the UK-wide post office network, both urban and rural, is largely a product of the fact that the Government, and their agencies and corporations, have stripped back the number and type of products that can be provided by post offices. I am sure that that point has been made many times during the debate.

Consider the move away from the payment of benefits at post offices, the prospective withdrawal of the Post Office card account in three years' time, and, more recently, the fact that the Post Office lost the contract to sell television licences. Strictly speaking, the decision on the contract was not so much central Government's as the BBC's. Of course, the BBC is a public corporation, and we should perhaps be asking why it decided to make that decision.

It is also important to mention a third set of organisations with responsibility in this area: the high-street or commercial banks — although thus far they may not have adequately recognised their role. Like the post offices, banks are commercial, and, as we well know, profit-seeking and profit-making organisations. It is entirely understandable that the major banks, such as the Ulster Bank, Northern Bank, Allied Irish Bank, and so on, do not relish competition, and that has been the subject of enquiries by the General Consumer Council for Northern Ireland and the Office of Fair Trading (OFT) in recent months.

However, the banks in Northern Ireland could have done more to ally themselves with the network of Post Office branches. Arrangements could have been worked out to allow banks to use post offices as additional outlets at which certain bank services — the operation of accounts and so forth — could be provided. We have still to come to terms with the fact that a high percentage of people on low incomes in the Province do not have proper access even to basic bank accounts. That denies them many advantages, such as debit arrangements, which are taken for granted by those of us who do have bank accounts.

At the heart of the debate is the need to resolve a tension between two different ways of running organisations and two different logics. On the one hand is the market-based, commercial approach, and, in normal circumstances, the importance of that approach would be stressed for most business activities because it provides a competitive service and choice for the customer and it maximises the benefits to the customer.

However, a second approach may apply to post offices. There is a strong argument for advocating that the postal service be regarded as a universal service. In other words, provision should be the same wherever you live, be it on the Orkney Islands, in Strabane or central London, regardless of location or density of population. Basic postage rates and delivery standards — next-day delivery for first-class letters, for example — should be the same, regardless of where people live. If we accept that logic for that aspect of the postal service, we should also accept that there is a need to ensure that universal provision of service applies to the geographical spread or density of the network. That is why the amendment quite properly refers to the scale of the Post Office network, both urban and rural.

3.15 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker: I apologise to Jim Shannon.

Mr Shannon: Mr Deputy Speaker, your apology is accepted. I knew that you would call me in time.

The Post Office network reaches into every urban community and almost every sizeable rural settlement. The fact that 94% of the UK population lives within one mile of a post office is an indication of their importance.

The Post Office has around 28 million customers who use the 170 different services available to meet their individual needs, at their convenience. The Post Office has more branches in the UK than all of the banks and building societies combined. Those figures paint a fairly positive picture, but the reality is not so rosy.

Post offices have had to face more than their fair share of challenges in the last few years. Every business has its ups and downs, but the network has had to take one bitter blow after another. Some 2,500 urban post offices have been closed under the network's reinvention programme. The network has been losing £3 million a week, and it is currently supported by an annual £150 million social network payment from the Government. That payment was set to expire in March 2008, but I am glad to say that the deadline has been extended until 2011.

Nevertheless, the future sustainability of the Post Office beyond 2011 is anyone's guess. It may seem to be a hopeless loss and bad business to keep pouring money into something that appears to be unsustainable. However, it should be taken into account that Royal Mail Group registered recorded profits of £537 million for 2004-05, while the Post Office recorded a 7% loss of £110 million in the same period. The crux of the problem has been the change to the direct payment of pensions and benefits, which traditionally accounted for 40% of Post Office income. The maths are not difficult — a 40% loss of income has resulted in a 7% drop in profits. It is clear what, if not who, is to blame for that loss.

While the introduction of the Post Office card account has alleviated some losses, the Government have revealed their intention of withdrawing the card account by 2010 and have already begun the migration of card accounts into bank accounts. Frighteningly, 10% of sub-postmasters' pay comes from the card account, while other Government contracts, which are under threat, such as bill payments, account for a further 5% of that pay. The new products, despite being great for everyday customer use, do not come close to offsetting the loss of Government contracts.

There is yet another set of numbers, which speak for themselves. The biggest petition ever signed in the United Kingdom was carried in 98 mail sacks to London on 18 October 2006. Those sacks contained four million signatures of people who did not want the closure of any more post offices. That cannot and should not be overlooked. That volume of support is almost unheard of, and that warrants a more detailed study as to why so many people are worried about post office closures.

The Government must step in and halt the absurd withdrawal of support for a national institution. Instead of desecrating that institution and running it down, there must be more provision for the suite of post office-based banking products, including an enhanced form of the card account, and offering improved customer service options that include financially excluded groups.

The Government must realise the important role that post offices play in the social life of towns and, more importantly, villages, as a place where members of the community can mix and mingle, where the vulnerable elderly are recognised and looked after by friendly staff who understand their needs, and where the youngest children can come to open their first savings accounts and learn a little about the other vital services offered. That is a vital part of country and town life, and its loss will socially exclude even more people who feel uncomfortable with banks, or who cannot use the internet to access their accounts or download the stamps that they need.

The 2007 consultation on the future of the Post Office states the aim for 90% of people to live within one mile of a post office. At present, in the rural community, 95% of people are, on average, three miles away and that rises to six miles in more remote areas. Imagine how that distance will lengthen with the closure of more post offices.

The mobile van service, which has been mentioned during the debate, is ludicrous. Opening a community hall once a week does not come close to fulfilling the needs of our rural communities, or the needs of our vulnerable elderly, for whom taking a bus into a main town elevates the fear and probability of being watched and perhaps attacked. That fear is prevalent in the older community.

The Government have a duty to the 28 million customers who use post offices each year. Those people require, and have come to depend on, Post Office services. They do not want the unnecessary changes that have been brought about by pen-pushers in Whitehall who have no idea what it is like to live in rural areas.

A survey by the National Consumer Council showed, overwhelmingly, that post offices were thought to be more accessible than banks and, more importantly, more trustworthy. As well as that, only 4% of villages have a bank, but at least 60% of villages have a post office. It is clear that many people do not have access to a bank, and, if rural post offices are closed, those people will be isolated from the necessary funds and weekly essentials, as have been, and should be, provided by post offices.

Rural businesses that are situated near to post offices attribute over 15% of their business to them. A recent survey by the Federation of Small Businesses (FSB) cited that an overwhelming 82% of small businesses said that the closure of their local post office would adversely affect them. The Royal National Institute for the Blind (RNIB) has stated that post office closures will hit blind and partially sighted people particularly hard. They will be left feeling even more socially and financially excluded than they already do, and they will no longer be able to rely on local post offices to help with the mountain of forms pushed on them by the pen-pushers.

Many people see post offices as their link to the wider world. They are places where staff are available to help them, where they are known and where their abilities and disabilities are known and catered for. The Post Office is an institution that must be given precedence for Government business, where it is reasonable and just, as is the case here. Members should encourage the public to support the Post Office's valid and useful system to help them to learn about the many services that the Post Office provides and to inform them of how well trained the staff are to offer advice and support. That should be the task before the House; we should not have to fight the Government for the Post Office's very existence.

The future of the Post Office must be considered with a view to how the Government will sustain post offices in the long term, not simply abandoned without thought for those who rely on them and trust them. Why should small towns and villages be made to suffer once again the costs of a revolution that is unnecessary and repugnant to the people for whom we have the greatest duty of care: the pensioners, children, disabled and millions of others who depend on the services that are so excellently provided by people who work so hard in post offices. The Post Office deserves the reputation that it has acquired over the years as trustworthy and secure premises for the everyday needs of local communities. I support the motion and the amendment.

Mr Brolly: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. At the root of the legislation and policies that are threatening country dwellers, there seems to be a widespread lack of understanding and knowledge of the rural way of life. As we know only too well, bias is cradled in ignorance. In the certainty that the nitty-gritty of the motion and amendment will be well and fully presented by others, I will take a wider look at what lies behind this kind of legislation and the reason why legislators think that they can make these changes.

In debating the motion, it is important to consider the historical and — it now seems — endemic bias against rural dwelling and rural development. Historically, the Roman Empire has a lot to answer for in this part of the world.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Brolly: Not only the Roman Catholics. I have no doubt that the building of cities by the Romans was an important part of their control strategy: if the people were herded together, they could be monitored, serviced, educated and disciplined more efficiently and more economically.

The cities were beautifully constructed to sugar the pill of wrenching people from their natural, rustic environment, and citizens of Rome had rights that did not apply to the general population. The right not to be flogged for transgressions was one of many attractive incentives offered to them —

Mr Weir: We are all interested in the history lesson. Would the Member even bring it up to 1798? At least that is AD instead of BC.

Mr McLaughlin: Do you not want to hear about 1690?

Mr Brolly: He knows all about it. Thank you for that intervention. I intend to carry on, and I will get to the point.

One incentive to go to the cities was that, if you were a citizen of Rome, you had a right not to be flogged when you transgressed. In that way people were persuaded to leave their wee farms, and head up the Appian Way.

Thus, the building of cities, the marketing of city dwelling and the inevitable development of a bias towards urban culture came about courtesy of the invasion and occupation of England by the Romans. As the English gradually became almost as Roman as the Romans, native leaders emerged to promote and maintain the Pax Romani. Centuries later, the English did what the Romans did not do — they invaded and occupied Ireland.

Among other things, civitas is the Latin word for city. A related word, civilitas, has come into the English language as meaning civility or being civilised. When the Romans invaded and occupied England, the natives naturally struggled with the language of their new masters, just as the colonised Gaels of Ireland and Scotland were later to have difficulty with the mishmash of Anglo-Saxon Latin that is modern English. West Cork English and lowland Scottish English are good examples of the many regional dialectal products of the failure of the Gael to master English and speak it like gentlemen. Is it plausible that the early Roman English failed to appreciate the distinction between the words civitas — a city —

Mr Deputy Speaker: I am sure that this has some relevance to the closure of rural post offices, but would the Member come to the point.

Mr Brolly: I can assure you that I will come to the point, and I will do so within the 10 minutes. You have interrupted my flow.

Is it plausible that the early Roman English failed to appreciate the distinction between the words civitas, meaning a city, and civilitas, meaning civilisation, and that the legacy of that is that, to this day, to be considered civilised one must live in a city — Belfast? Could that be why rural dwellers, and their places, are given derogatory names such as “culchie” and “the back of beyond” by city dwellers? The term “culchie”, as my hon Friend said earlier, specifically describes a native of Kiltimagh in Co Mayo.

Whatever the historic origins of anti-rural bias, there can be no doubt that such a bias does exist, and that the corridors of power are trodden mainly by city slickers — we can name-call too — who have little understanding of country people and no understanding of Latin.

Country people from this part of Ireland have been under siege by current British direct rule to an unprecedented degree. The ink is not dry on one piece of repressive and destructive anti-rural legislation before the next is prepared.

3.30 pm

Therefore those of us who live in rural Ireland need our city cousins to stand with us in our fight to maintain a viable and vibrant rural constituency and to appreciate that country people, who love and care for their countryside, are its eyes, ears and protectors. Down through the ages, rural communities have proven to be the safe repository of our indigenous cultures and genuine enlightenment.

Everyone must say no to an Administration that seem intent on destroying the urban-rural balance that has served us so well for hundreds of years. Everyone must reject any legislation or proposal that would contribute further to rural decline, be that the centralisation of healthcare services, the decimation of the rural school network, reduction of cover for the Fire and Rescue Service, Draft PPS 14, reluctance to provide proper public transport, road infrastructure and road maintenance in rural areas and —

Mr Kennedy: What about post offices? [Laughter.]

Mr Brolly: Mr Kennedy took the words out of my mouth. [Laughter.]

Finally, everyone must say no to the proposal to close rural post offices, which for so many country people are their focal point and potential lifeline. I support the motion.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Tá áthas orm seans a fháil leis an rún seo a phlé. I was going to title my speech, “The role of the Vikings in the desecration of rural post offices in Northern Ireland.” [Laughter.] However, after hearing Mr Brolly’s speech, I changed my mind.

I am pleased to support the motion. As Members have said, rural community life has been under threat from various sources for several years. Not least among them, as you know, Mr Deputy Speaker, is Draft PPS 14, which Members have debated in the House. During that debate, I outlined the dangers to small rural schools inherent in that draft policy.

The latest threat to rural life is the news that several post offices are threatened with closure. The withdrawal of the POCA creates the risk of hundreds of post offices closing as a direct result of the loss of income and spin-off businesses that the card account generated. That could potentially affect every area in Northern Ireland.

More than four million people use the card account to access pensions and benefits, and it is due to be scrapped in 2010. The Department for Work and Pensions (DWP) has already begun to take away the card account from more than 40,000 customers, forcing them to have their pensions and benefits paid into bank accounts. Many banks still refuse to allow their customers free access to their accounts at the post office.

Post Office Ltd is still outside the Link system. A bank account is of no use to pensioners or persons without a car whose nearest bank is miles away and who cannot draw money from their local post office because their bank has not signed up to the scheme. Millions of customers chose the POCA as their most suitable method of payment. The Government should respect that choice, not restrict it.

A recent Age Concern report shows that 99% of older people in rural areas consider their local post office to be a lifeline. Many older rural dwellers already feel isolated, and that report shows that 56% of those aged over 60 who live in the countryside fear that post office closures will leave them even more isolated. Some 73% of older people believe that they will not be able to access similar services to those provided by the Post Office if its card account is withdrawn. The only viable way in which to ensure that rural dwellers, especially older people, have access to the services that they require is to retain the POCA, thereby ensuring the survival of many small post offices.

The closures will create problems for disadvantaged residents who want to get cash and basic groceries, given that those services were previously provided by their local post office. Problems will be created for the elderly, the disabled and anyone who has restricted mobility, such as mothers with young children, who may experience difficulty travelling to branches that are further away.

The increased pressure that closures put on other branches means that we can expect longer queues and poorer services and facilities. Local residents will feel a loss of independence and community spirit, and there will be damaging repercussions on local shops and businesses.

The threat is not only to rural post offices. ‘The Last Post’, a report from the New Economics Foundation (NEF), states that when an urban post office closes, businesses, community groups and local people experience significant knock-on effects. One in six of the urban closures occurred in deprived areas where the role of the Post Office is, in the words of the report, “particularly valuable”.

Evidence published in November from the Trade and Industry Select Committee showed that sub-postmasters in urban areas are also under threat from the withdrawal of the Post Office Card Account. The account is currently worth £403 a month to those sub-postmasters, compared to an average of £249 a month. The New Economics Foundation believes that that lost income could prove to be the “tipping point” at which many post offices become no longer viable.

The local post office is as integral to the community infrastructure as the local school, the doctor’s surgery or the library. It is often in the local shop, and one supports the other. Without the business that the post office generates, the shop will close, and the community will lose two key services in one fell swoop. If our local communities are to remain strong and vibrant, they must retain those vital services, not least, the local post offices.

The Government can still act to allow the Post Office to retain the card account and to extend the range of services that it offers, and they must do so before it is too late.

Mr Deputy Speaker, I am pleased to support the motion and the amendment. Go raibh míle maith agat.

Mr Newton: I support the motion, and I am indebted to my colleagues for tabling it. I shall concentrate on two areas: the social and business aspects of the impacts of the closures.

There is an affection for local post offices. Closing them would create a great deal of emotion. In making his announcement, Alistair Darling said that the loss-making Post Office network — and we know that it is a loss-making network — cannot be left as it is and needs to be rescued. Any sensible person will realise that, in a UK context, that rescue plan means taking about 2,500 offices out of circulation. There can be no doubt that that plan will have a negative impact on the Post Office network throughout the Province, where there may be dozens of closures.

The section of the community that will be hardest hit by the plan will, of course, be our senior citizens. However, others will also be hit hard, and I will discuss them later. Closing local post offices will mean that senior citizens will have to travel increased distances for their pensions or for their other business. That will make them more vulnerable. We all know that our senior citizens are in many cases being specifically targeted because they have money in their home or on their persons at some stage in the day. That makes them more vulnerable to those who prey on them.

As other Members have said, post offices are not just places to buy stamps. They are, in many cases, a part of the fabric of society and a focal point in many urban districts and villages. They serve needs far beyond the commercial, and Government financial support for the service should be a priority. It is the actions of the Government that have created the problems: they have steadily withdrawn Post Office services: the sale of TV licences, pension payments and so on.

I will quote a sub-postmistress who appeared on a local BBC news broadcast. When interviewed, she told it like it is. She accused the Government of stealthily eating away at the income of post offices through the withdrawal of services:

"We'd like the government to undertake an assessment of the social ... role played by post offices in communities right across the UK and for them to provide ongoing support to the non commercial parts of the network. We'd like a network that is viable, a network that isn't subsidised totally.

"We want the work and we want to do it well and we want to serve our customers. We are a part of a community."

She continued:

"In many places when the post office closes, the community loses its heart, the people don't come down to the towns and villages ... and the communities just die."

I can testify to the truth of that with respect to urban post offices as well.

With respect to business, there are nearly 14,000 post offices in the UK; 480 of them are Crown offices, and 13,280 are private businesses. Those are small, independently-owned businesses, each of which is important to the success of the Northern Ireland economy in the regional context.

A Member who spoke earlier referred to research carried out by the New Economics Foundation, an independent think tank separate from the Government. For the first time a reputable organisation has quantified the contribution that urban post offices make in some of the most deprived areas of the UK. The report says that they play a particularly valuable role in deprived urban areas and outlines the threat that they now face from changes to the Post Office network. As has already been said, post offices in urban areas have borne the brunt of recent closures. Over the past two years more than eight urban post offices have closed for every rural post office closure. More than one in six of the urban post office closures took place in deprived areas. Three wards in East Belfast are among the ten most deprived wards in Northern Ireland.

Further in-depth analysis of the impact of post office closures on small businesses reveals that in Manchester, following the closure of the local post office, 60% of local businesses witnessed significant impact to their businesses, their clients, their customers or to the area in general. Local businesses also reported difficulties with making cash deposits and other banking issues. Extra costs were incurred with increased staff time required to visit post offices further away; and there were longer queues at the remaining post offices. Trade associations noticed the knock-on effect in reduced footfall in shops in the vicinity of the closed post office, and small businesses reported significant loss of custom. That indicates that in an urban district a post office performs the same function as an anchor tenant in a huge shopping centre.

3.45 pm

The danger is that when an amenity such as a post office disappears from a community, those who are financially mobile are more likely to leave, leaving a higher concentration of deprivation, which, in turn, can lead to further loss of amenities. Analysis by the New Economics Foundation (NEF) of the social value — as distinct from the business value — of urban post offices reveals that 66% of people surveyed in Manchester said that they would be affected by the closure of their local post office.

The NEF analysis found that groups affected by post office closure included schools, local universities, credit unions, and community groups. Some 53% of people surveyed in the vicinity of just one closed post office in Manchester now buy groceries elsewhere as a direct result of the closure of the post office, which has meant significant implications for that community and the local traders. Qualitative research from the NEF study emphasises the vital and overlooked social services role played by post offices. That evidence supports previous research that found that half of sub-postmasters in disadvantaged areas keep an eye out for between 20 and 50 vulnerable customers.

The issue is clearly not one of stopping a haemorrhaging network of offices; there is more to the problem than the Government are prepared to consider. Any decision regarding the Post Office network must be taken holistically. A thorough review of the social and economic impact of post offices should be undertaken, and a balanced decision made. The Government must take significant steps to safeguard the vital role that post offices play at the heart of communities.

Mr Hyland: A LeasCheann Comhairle, I support the motion and the amendment to it. Between 2001 and June 2006, the number of post offices fell from 17,743 to 14,376 — a loss of nearly 20%. In the North of Ireland, 11.5% of post offices have closed during that same period. Moreover, the Government are intent on closing thousands more. Royal Mail believes that it can run a commercial network with 4,000 post office branches instead of the current 14,000. As other Members have outlined, the impact on local communities should be considered, as should the numbers of full- and part-time jobs in the post office sector.

The chief reason for the closure of post offices is the change in shopping patterns. There has been a failure to recognise, or even appreciate, that for some people — particularly older people in rural areas — post offices offer an essential community service and that the closure of a local office can be a real blow.

Age Concern's director general, Gordon Lishman, has stated that thousands of older people in rural areas have told Age Concern that the local post office is an absolute lifeline. He also said that many older people use their local post office as a one-stop shop, somewhere where they can access their pensions and benefits, pay their bills, find information and — above all — socialise.

However, post office closures do not impact on rural areas and communities alone. Sean Neeson talked about the impact on Carrickfergus. As a Newry person, I wish to talk about the impact of the loss of Newry city post office, which Danny Kennedy and Dominic Bradley will know about. For years — indeed, decades — that post office was the hub of Newry. It was located in the middle of Newry's main street opposite its famous cathedral. It was a meeting place for all the people of Newry: young and old, Catholic, Protestant and dissenter, men and women, boys and girls.

Where is the post office now? It is hidden away at the back of SuperValu supermarket. As a result, part of old Newry has died, sacrificed for expediency and bigger rents. The hub of Newry is now its shopping centres. That is a sad reflection on the Post Office and its treatment of its customers — the people who ensured its survival over the years.

All post office closures are subject to public consultation, so it is vital that everyone voices their views and opinions if a local post office is under threat.

Postwatch, the postal service watchdog, examines every proposed change to assess whether the local post office network can remain accessible and sustainable and offer a good quality service. Though Postwatch cannot veto closures, it should be remembered that its efforts, combined with those of the general public, have had some saving effects in the past. However, as Esmond Birnie said, the consultation process is often a fait accompli.

The motion makes sense and deserves the support of all Members of the Assembly as well as the wider community, who have suffered most from the ill-placed and ill-timed Government directive on Post Office services.

Ms Gildernew: Go raibh míle maith agat, a Leas-Cheann Comhairle. Like many in the Chamber today I am in favour of the motion and the amendment on the closure of post offices, both rural and urban, though I am going to concentrate mainly on rural post offices.

As has already been said, post offices are a vital backbone of our communities, especially in rural areas, where they are often the last piece of social infrastructure left in place. This matter is similar to this morning's topic of the challenges facing the farming community in that both amount to the same thing — death by a thousand cuts. Services have been haemorrhaging from post offices over the years and now they have nearly nothing left, rendering them no longer viable or sustainable.

I recently made representations on behalf of the proprietors of a post office in Augher who were trying to expand its services in an attempt to sustain their business. It is one of the many that has a shop relying on its footfall. It was difficult for me to help them to enhance and improve the services that they already provided. Part of the reason for that difficulty can be traced back to the first Assembly and our experiences in the Committee for Social Development, when changes were being made to the legislation concerning the move from benefit books and giro cheques to card transactions. That Committee fought hard to ensure that Post Office services were not lost; I was opposed to anything that would cause a deterioration of those services.

Since then, I have had first-hand experience of the difficulties that those changes caused. When my first child was born I went to open a Post Office account for my family allowance payments. If I had given my bank details the matter would have been sorted in two minutes. However, because I wanted to use my local post office I had to fill out forms and bring them back to be stamped in the post office, which was much more difficult and inconvenient. I felt that I was being pushed towards using the bank and away from the post office. Nevertheless, because of my commitment to local rural post offices, I did my best to ensure that I used that service.

That death by a thousand cuts is evident in the age profile of sub-postmasters and -postmistresses. The Federation of Small Businesses issued a briefing today containing a survey of its members. I wonder whether the federation has surveyed how many sub-postmasters and -postmistresses are approaching retirement age. Again, there is a correlation between this issue and farming. Post offices are becoming so unprofitable that people are not being encouraged into the business. Obviously, more money can be made more easily in other businesses. Many of the people who run local post offices are keen to get out of that business.

It does not seem to me that running a local post office that is not attached to some other venture could be profitable in 2007, given the reduction in transactions and services that they are facing. The British Government's policy is to run them down to such an extent that they cannot be sustained. I welcome and support the motion and the amendment, and I hope that we can do all in our power to ensure that that vibrant link with rural communities, the elderly and the vulnerable, and those without access to public transport — the local post office — is kept and maintained and is sustainable and viable. Go raibh mile maith agaibh.

Mr Hussey: I support the amendment, although I have a greater affinity with the original motion, which concentrates on the area that I am concerned about.

On 14 December 2006, Alistair Darling made a statement to the House of Commons on the Post Office. He said:

"We will therefore consider what role local authorities in England and the devolved Administrations in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland might play in influencing how the postal services are best delivered in the future."

I wonder what notice Mr Darling will take of our debate today. It is a pity that the MP for Fermanagh and South Tyrone, Ms Gildernew, could not have been in the House of Commons to challenge Mr Darling when he made his statement.

Postwatch found that:

"whether affluent or disadvantaged, traditional village or post war estate, the closure of the rural post office appeared to have had far-reaching effects upon both particular individuals and the community in general. It became apparent that the post office played an extremely important role in the rural community, a role that transcended the provision of post office services or even the goods sold at the store which was often attached."

Members are familiar with that scenario and have addressed that issue this afternoon.

I am reminded of a small rural post office between Castlederg and Ederney. It is about four or five miles out of the town up to Killen and another seven or eight miles to Ederney. Think of the area that would be affected if that post office were to close, and think of the small hardware store attached to the post office, the adjoining village shop, the pub and the nearby chippie. There is also a small local store selling agricultural supplies.

Mr Kennedy: What about the church?

Mr Hussey: Killen does not have a church. However, the orange hall is directly opposite the post office. That post office is truly at the heart of the community. Postwatch has described how many of our rural post offices are at the heart of communities.

The closure of a rural post office can result in problems for disadvantaged residents and those who live in the surrounding area when they try to access cash and basic groceries, which were often previously provided in the post office. The heart is ripped out of the community when the post office goes.

Reference was made during this morning's debate to remarks made by Kenneth Sharkey of the Ulster Farmers' Union, who said that it seemed inevitable that we would lose some rural post offices. Members can agree with that, despite the fact that the Government are putting this matter out to consultation. We all know about Government consultations.

A very valuable service is being removed from the rural areas affected, and that is another example of how policy makers are ignoring the impact that their decisions will have on rural communities in Northern Ireland. Many farming families live in isolated areas, and they feel that some services are becoming less and less accessible. Members will agree with that.

In the same House of Commons debate, Mr Darling said:

"The post office provides an important social and economic role, particularly for our rural communities and deprived urban areas"

— so he proposes to cut them back. The Government also published new access criteria for post offices. They stated that 90% of the population should be within one mile of a branch — that is great. In rural areas, 95% of the population should be within three miles of a branch, which doubles to six miles in remote areas — talk about being peripheral. I can think of a post office at Killeter that closed a couple of years ago. If people lived beyond Killeter towards the Donegal border, they were seven miles beyond that post office in any case, and it was another six miles from Killeter to Castlederg.

Someone who lives near the Donegal border in the Aghyran area may have to travel 13 miles to reach the nearest post office. Even by the Government's standards, that is not acceptable. Where are we going?

4.00 pm

The House of Commons Trade and Industry Select Committee issued a report that attacked plans to end the Post Office card account and demanded more funding for the Post Office network. The report called for the maintenance of both urban and rural networks, which it described as "the heart of the community". Post offices must be the gateway for Government services, and more products must be developed to assist in protecting their long-term viability. That point is relevant to the latter part of the amendment, which is very welcome. We are simply asking the Government to do what the Trade and Industry Select Committee's report recommends.

I support an investigation into the role that local authorities and devolved Administrations in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland might play in influencing how Post Office services are best delivered in future. The Government must at least listen to us and try to act on the good sense that they are hearing from this Chamber. I support the motion.

(Madam Speaker in the Chair)

Mr Armstrong: I support the motion. Post offices play an important social and economic role in the communities that they serve. The announcement by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry that the Government intend to close 20% of its 600 post offices in Northern Ireland is likely to have a detrimental effect, especially on our rural areas.

As mentioned in today's earlier debate on agriculture, it seems that the Labour Government's policy is to concentrate on our cities and towns and to move people's homes out of the countryside and rural areas, as imposed by the implementation of draft PPS 14. The Government's policy means the closing of rural schools, as proposed by Sir George Bain, and forcing people out of jobs in the countryside, whether in farming, agriculture, rural schools or post offices.

It is obvious that the Labour Government are out of touch with the realities of Northern Ireland, which is a predominantly rural region of the United Kingdom whose character is defined by precisely those elements that the Government are trying to remove from our way of life.

For the second time today, I state that a devolved Assembly is essential for the future of Northern Ireland: it is time to progress to a fully democratic Assembly without delay.

Many post offices are situated away from main centres of population, and their closure would result in a marked downgrading of services for rural dwellers. A post office is not just a place to buy stamps; it is often a focal point in a district on which the elderly depend. The removal of that central point in rural communities, coupled with the closure of rural schools, could prove the death knell for rural communities.

The Government have been instrumental in funding community groups, which bring people in rural areas together. However, the Government are not consistent because they are closing the lifeline of rural areas — the post office. The very presence of post offices in rural communities makes a positive contribution to local businesses by increasing the number of people passing through a particular location.

If the post office in a rural community is closed, many people, particularly the elderly, the disabled and those without personal transport, will be cut off from society, from accessing cash and from the ability to carry out basic tasks such as buying groceries and paying bills. In Northern Ireland, rural communities can stand alone without people having to go to larger towns and cities as part of their daily lives. Rural communities have to survive without the first-class road structure and public transport systems that exist everywhere else. What is the sense in removing those facilities from our rural communities without first ensuring that those living in them will not be cut off from society?

I acknowledge the hard work and dedication of our postmasters and postmistresses who have had to deal with the modernisation of facilities in post offices, including card systems. They have also had to cope with the loss of various facilities, such as customers' ability to pay for their television licences. They continue to provide an excellent service to their customers, despite continually having to prove their worth.

Although post offices used to be a service administered by Government, they must now show that they are cost effective. Just like traffic lights, post offices will continue to provide a service for everyone in our communities. Traffic lights cost approximately £30,000 but generate no income: they are a service. They alleviate the huge cost of road traffic accidents. However, can a price be put on the rural way of life? Just as traffic lights are essential to the rural way of life, post offices are the focal points of communities.

Post offices are now present in many large supermarkets as franchises, selling off what was the Royal Mail. Many areas of Northern Ireland seem to be becoming more like other parts of Europe where it is difficult to find a post office, let alone a stamp. Is this the result of another European directive that has been filtered down to Northern Ireland?

Government policy should be to support our post offices. The Government have considered only the financial picture and have failed to recognise the contribution that post offices make to Northern Ireland society. I support the motion and the amendment.

Mr McGlone: Go raibh míle maith agat. As someone who lives in and represents a rural area, I can state that the role of post offices has been articulated amply here today. In isolated communities, local post offices provide older people, disabled people and those on low incomes who cannot afford extra travel costs with access to their attendance allowances, disability living allowances, income support and pensions.

I listened intently to the debate, and feel that the Assembly should pay tribute to those postmasters and postmistresses who, over many years, when providing services to the public, showed exemplary courage when faced with numerous attacks and robberies from a variety of paramilitary fundraisers.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr McGlone: As Mr Hussey said, post offices generate business for other businesses. Many post offices are located in small rural shops. Indeed, many of those are under threat from multinational retailers. Card accounts were introduced to allow people to withdraw their tax credits, benefits and pensions in post offices. The withdrawal of that system, seemingly at the whim of the Department for Work and Pensions (DWP), and the Post Office's loss of the right to sell TV licences, has been referred to as death by a thousand cuts. That is exactly what it is.

This morning, I spoke to a postmistress who told me that the Government and the management of the Post Office must get their act together. The Post Office has said that it cannot plan without there being certainty, but it must plan nevertheless. As was said by my colleague from Mid Ulster, and has been stated by the National Federation of SubPostmasters, the Post Office must modernise its facilities.

It has been drawn to my attention that, for example, an elderly person who pays his or her bills either at the end of each month, every two months, or whenever suits, cannot withdraw more than £600 from a post office in one day, which means that if he or she needs to pay an exorbitant or increased fuel bill, he or she must return to the post office the next day. Indeed, unlike most supermarkets, post offices cannot provide customers with cashback. The facilities must be modernised.

The Government should be taking a leading role in ensuring that banks enable their customers to access their bank accounts and carry out a wide range of transactions in post offices. Major banking groups do not allow their customers to access their current accounts in post offices. The Government must provide balanced information about the payment options for benefit claimants and pensioners, including the availability of the cheque payment service.

Why should there not be new services? There is talk of investment — there should be investment for the future. Why should sub-postmasters not provide front-line financial advice and be trained, accredited and rewarded for doing so? As Post Office Ltd's only shareholder, the Government should oversee this process. All post offices should provide convenient access to public services, from the payment of fines to fielding lost property. Why not?

The Government must actively encourage their Departments — and local authorities — to make a range of services available and accessible through kiosks in local post offices. They are the hub of rural communities, both socially and economically.

Today we must send a clear message to Government and to Post Office Ltd that, on behalf of our constituents, we want twenty-first century services from a twenty-first century Post Office, and that they should be planning and investing in that. Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

Mr Weir: I will try to keep my remarks brief. A vast range of issues has been well covered during the debate — indeed, probably a much greater range of issues than one had initially anticipated.

We have gone from the very interesting analogy between our Post Office system and the traffic lights to delving into a deep sense of history. I thought that at some stage during the debate someone would mention Postman Pat; however, it seems that it is Postman Caesar who is at the heart of our problems. Indeed, I wondered briefly whether the Member opposite mistakenly believed that he was in some sort of panel game where the idea was to describe the motion without actually making any reference to it. Fortunately, after approximately eight minutes the words “post office” did appear in the Member's speech.

The points have been well made and well covered, and I am very glad to say that we are speaking today with one voice. It is important to recognise, as the amendment does, that this issue affects both rural and urban areas, although there is great concern that the current proposals would hit particularly hard in rural areas.

From a personal point of view, this is something that matters deeply to me. Both my parents worked all their lives in the Post Office, and I commend in particular the remarks of Mr McGlone about the faithful service that postmasters and postmistresses gave throughout the Troubles, when many of them were subjected to horrendous attacks and robberies by various paramilitary groups and criminal gangs. They strove, both in rural and urban areas, to try to retain a sense of normality and a sense of community throughout that time. In their hour of need, it is incumbent on us to stand up for them.

While we are focusing on the situation in Northern Ireland, a number of Members also pointed out that this important issue goes beyond our shores, and there are a number of indicators of that. For example, with regard to the importance of post offices, a 2004 Postwatch survey indicated that 75% of people felt that their local post office was extremely important, 59% regarded it as essential to their way of life and 91% felt that it played an important role in their community.

Since this issue has come to the fore in the last few months, a vast range of organisations has expressed concern at the Government's plans, including the various UK churches, all the major trades unions and the Federation of Small Businesses. Age Concern has expressed grave concerns about the effects on the elderly, and Citizens Advice has come out very strongly against the proposals. In local papers throughout the United Kingdom a range of concerns has been raised by local councillors, councils and MPs of different political parties. It is very clear that the Government do not have strong political support for their proposals. In the House of Commons an early-day motion expressing concern over the potential threat to the Post Office system was signed by 400 MPs, including Kate Hoey, who is the chair of the parliamentary all-party group on sub-post offices.

Indeed, there could be no greater expression than the petition handed to Downing Street in October, which had over four million signatures. I am informed that it was the largest petition ever on a peacetime issue. That shows the strength of feeling that there is on this.

4.15 pm

Given that amount of heat, it was inevitable that Alistair Darling would try to alleviate the level of concern by throwing out some sops in his statement on 14 December. Two things in particular were mentioned. One was the idea of 500 mobile post offices — a number of Members have been rightly sceptical about whether that would operate particularly well in any part of the UK and especially in Northern Ireland. I do not think that any of us, with the greatest respect to the fast-food industry, want to see our post offices transformed into a sort of mobile chip van moving from area to area. It simply would not work in Northern Ireland. Again, I am very sceptical that it would work anywhere. There were general references to services being provided in village halls, community centres and pubs. This is a very clear spinning exercise on the part of the Government in order to pretend that they are not downgrading the system.

The proposer of the motion referred to some of the euphemisms with which we are all too familiar on this issue as with others. We are talking about “transforming” and “restructuring” post offices. Those are euphemisms; the Government are supporting post offices in the same way that a rope supports a hanging man. That is the level of support that has been provided by the Government. They have shown disregard for post offices and the rural community. As a number of Members have said, this Government are blind and deaf to the needs of that community. Time and again this Government, who see themselves largely dependent on urban votes, have disregarded countryside issues.

The second sop that was thrown out by the Minister was some movement on the original plan to scrap the card account in 2010, with an indication that there would be some kind of replacement system. That has been highlighted by a number of Members. The Minister gave no guarantee that that replacement system would be controlled by the Post Office. As Mr Beggs said, it will be put out for tender. The extent to which Labour Back-Bench Members seized on this as some great concession that would safeguard the future of post offices shows that they were happy enough to fall for the con. If the intention is to replace the card scheme with something else within the Post Office, why abolish it in the first place? It is simply an effort by the Government to get over the hump of the next election; to try to buy off some of the vast opposition to this; and then continue with what they have been doing to post offices for years.

As many Members have said, this will have a significant effect on people, particularly in rural areas. One thing that has not been mentioned is that there will be a large reduction in the number of jobs, and not just directly in the post offices themselves. In many cases the post office is the hub of the community. Remove the post office — force people to go into the towns and cities — and you not only take the custom away from the post office, you take it away from the surrounding shops as well. The level of convenience is simply not there.

It has been said that a number of villages and hamlets around the country have no bank facility. I know from experience in my constituency that that extends beyond the smallest of villages. Millisle, for example — a village of 2,500 or 3,000 people — does not have a bank. Until a few years ago, it did not even have a bank machine. If an area of that size does not have a bank, how many other small villages around the country do not have one? How much is this an attack on the heart of the rural community?

The most vulnerable in our society will be hit: the elderly, who are most dependent on post offices; the disabled; and those without personal transport. Those are the people who will suffer. It is right that we consider economics, but when we look behind that cold hard face, the daily lives of many people are adversely affected.

The present crisis has arisen because the Government have deliberately and stealthily taken services away from post offices. For example, the payment of benefits, once purely the domain of post offices, is now subject to much wider distribution. Indeed, it has been proposed that the payment of benefits should be shifted entirely away from post offices. Television licensing, car taxation and other services have also been removed. Post offices have not been allowed to operate on a level playing field.

We can propose a positive agenda for creating a productive role for post offices in the future by ending the restrictions that are placed on them. We are told of various monopolies that post offices have enjoyed in the past regarding various services that only they have provided. It is no longer appropriate that only post offices should provide those services, but let us at least create a balanced picture and allow post offices to lift some restrictions on their activities.

There is currently a limit on the amount of money that can be withdrawn from a post office at one time, which means that some people must go back a second or third time to withdraw more cash. Moreover, post offices cannot work with carriers other than Royal Mail. Perhaps that could be examined. Various suggestions were made in the House of Commons, such as a greater degree of co-ordination among post offices and local councils to identify services of outreach to the community that councils could provide. Dr Birnie mentioned the Welsh model of support. There is a vast range of possibilities. However, the most important single measure, as the amendment emphasises, is the retention of the card account scheme. If that scheme is retained, it will provide at least some security for the future.

Our concern is to protect both urban and rural communities. We face difficulties but, on this occasion, there is not a lone voice calling from the Assembly to the Government, as is often the case. We have support across the country on this issue, which affects everyone. I believe that we should use our strong and united voice to state that it is unacceptable to destroy the post offices and the way of life of many of our communities. The Assembly must clearly say no. I urge Members to support the motion, as amended.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Question, That the amendment be made, put and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly deplores the introduction of proposals by the government to close a number of Post Offices across Northern Ireland; and the implications these proposals will have for all Post Offices, urban, suburban and rural; and calls on a future devolved administration to work in conjunction with the Post Office and the Social Security Agency to retain Post Office card accounts; and further calls for the development of other government and financial services which address the needs of recipients of state benefits and pensions, other Post Office users and future potential customers.

Adjourned at 4.24 pm.

THE TRANSITIONAL ASSEMBLY

Tuesday 9 January 2007

The Assembly met at 10.30 am (Madam Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

THE LATE MR DAVID ERVINE MLA

Madam Speaker: It is my sad duty to inform the House of the death of Mr David Ervine, a Member for the East Belfast constituency. In accordance with convention, as a mark of respect for Mr Ervine, the sitting will now be suspended until 11.00 am.

The sitting was suspended at 10.33 am.

*On resuming (Madam Speaker in the Chair) —
11.00 am*

ASSEMBLY BUSINESS

Madam Speaker: Given this morning's suspension, the House may wish to note that today's planned meeting of the Business Committee will now take place at 1.00 pm. The sitting will continue until that time.

Before proceeding to the next item on the Order Paper, I wish to draw the attention of the House to the point of order made yesterday by Lord Morrow about Members not being in their places when the Speaker is standing. I said yesterday that I would raise the matter with the Business Committee, and I will do so later today. For now, I simply draw the attention of the House to the importance of Chamber etiquette in ensuring that business proceeds smoothly and in a dignified manner.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

Road Safety

Madam Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow two hours for each of today's debates, the Member proposing each motion having 15 minutes to propose, with 15 minutes for the winding-up speech. All other Members who wish to speak will have a maximum of 10 minutes.

Mr Raymond McCartney: I beg to move

That this Assembly notes the ongoing tragedy of deaths and serious accidents on our roads and calls on an incoming Executive to introduce a new rigorous Driver Testing framework and a Road Safety and Education programme, with the emphasis on groups most likely to be involved in road traffic accidents, reflecting international best practice, and including co-operation between all Road Safety agencies, North and South, in carrying out a safety audit of the road network and the development of a National Road Safety Campaign.

Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Éirím le labhairt ar son an rúin, agus tá mé ag lorg tacaíochta dó ó achan pháirtí agus ó achan Chomhalta sa Teach seo.

I propose the motion on behalf of Sinn Féin, and in doing so I seek the support of all Members and all parties. Road deaths have no boundary of geography, class or creed, and it is unnecessary to offer any explanation to anyone here of the impact on a family of losing a loved one to a road traffic accident. Neither do I wish to reduce the motion to a list of statistics, however revealing they may be, because every Member here is familiar with them to one degree or another.

In October 2006, in the Long Gallery, Ursula Quinn provided a personal and poignant testimony to the enduring effect that a road death has on a family. That event had all-party support, and resulted in a pledge to support the efforts of the "Driving Kills" group. From personal experience, we can all acknowledge that the tragedy and grief of many families is compounded by the realisation that the accident and resultant death could have been prevented. Other families and groups who have had experience of those tragedies join us today in the Public Gallery.

The rationale behind the motion is to put a stop to the complacent attitude that road deaths are an unavoidable consequence of road use. They are not; road deaths can be avoided, and it is our responsibility to do all that we can to end that complacency in the first instance, and to seek co-ordinated, properly resourced programmes to prevent unnecessary fatalities. It is worth noting that the World Health Organization has enshrined the concept that road deaths and injuries are not inevitable consequences of increased road use.

The motion is not intended to offer or prescribe a definitive programme by which road deaths can be reduced. There are many different factors, views and initiatives, all of which can play a vital role in tackling the problem, and all important and worthy of support. The motion is designed to make the issue of reducing road deaths and injuries a programme priority for the incoming Executive, and to ensure that that Executive provide the direction, emphasis, policy and resources to achieve that aim.

The motion offers a number of key areas that Sinn Féin believes can impact on the frequency of road accidents, so that a reduction in deaths and injuries can be made. These include a more rigorous testing framework, with greater emphasis on road safety education programmes that continue after the driving test. This must be aimed at the groups that are more likely to be involved in road accidents.

A safety audit of the roads network should be carried out on an island-wide basis. That can be assisted by the development of a properly resourced national safety campaign that has the potential to become the body to hold the relevant Departments, North and South, to account.

Great work is already in place in Ireland, and further afield, highlighting the correlation between speed, alcohol and the incidence of accidents. We have to look to the international experience and their programmes and initiatives, which are beneficial in reducing death and injury, and bring them into operation here. I have no doubt that other Members will bring to the debate other programmes and experiences — and I welcome that and look forward to hearing them.

Members have to work in a co-ordinated and collective manner to ensure that all of this becomes a priority programme of work for the incoming Executive. This motion, supported by the Assembly, will provide the necessary dynamic to ensure that the incoming Executive properly address the reduction of deaths and injuries on the roads.

I ask for Members' support on the issue. I apologise that I will have to leave the debate to attend the Subgroup on Policing and Justice.

Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

Mr Poots: I beg to move the following amendment: Leave out all after "introduce" and insert:

"a wide ranging strategy involving all relevant agencies, including measures reflecting international best practice, to tackle the problem; with particular attention paid to those most likely to be involved in road traffic accidents."

The Democratic Unionist Party has always given priority to road safety. In the Environment Committee, the former Chairman, Dr McCrea, and I pursued a strong line on road safety. It was the work of that Committee that led to the Department of the Environment (DOE) introducing more road safety officers to schools.

The Committee also highlighted the issue of driving while on drugs, which was not being taken seriously by anybody at the time. The facts presented to the Committee were that over 20% of people involved in fatal road incidents had drugs in their bloodstream. Some 4% of that 20% had taken legally prescribed drugs and around 20% had taken illegal drugs — of which over 12% was cannabis. It is nonsense to say that cannabis does not have many side effects. People are dying on the roads on a weekly basis because of the use of cannabis and because they have taken a car out after taking cannabis.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Wells] in the Chair)

The Committee also did a rigorous report on school transport. I regret that we did not have an Assembly to follow through on the issues raised in that report. Following the report, Members have had all the excuses and prevarication that one might expect from direct rule Ministers. They have said that there is no money to reduce the number of children per school bus seat from three to two, for example; that there is no money available to put seat belts into buses or to resolve the issue of standing in buses. That may be an argument on finance. However, there is enough money in the Department to have the high hazard signs fitted on buses, to put on flashing lights and to take many of the other steps proposed in that report. I do not think that it is too badly off to do that or to take many of the steps proposed in the report that do not carry such a huge financial burden as others.

In the South of Ireland, five young schoolgirls were killed on a bus, and a more recent incident took place in London. We cannot take it for granted that incidents like those will not happen in Northern Ireland. Everybody will be wringing their hands and asking why it has happened, and the excuse will be that we did not have the money to do it.

I have particular concerns about speed limits in Northern Ireland. They need to be revised, on the advice of those who have relevant experience. I understand, from people involved with road traffic accidents and who have a fair degree of expertise in making assessments about them, that current speed limits are not fit for purpose. They are not relevant. For example, there are places where the speed limit is too high and others where it is too low. One finds a 30-miles-per-hour speed limit outside many schools, where there is great danger, with young children going about and a lot of parked cars, yet people can legitimately drive there at speeds of up to 30 miles per hour. Again, motorways were designed in the 1960s. Cars at that time were the Ford Anglia, the Hillman Imp and, for the well-to-do, the Ford Corsair. They certainly did not have the anti-lock braking system, side-impact bars and all the equipment that modern cars have. In many instances, the 70-miles-per-hour speed limit is too slow for the motorway. It does nothing for road safety to have such a speed limit. In other places, the speed limit is too high, and that should also be addressed. My party therefore has many major concerns about road safety.

I support the road safety advertising campaigns. I have met with those behind them. We discussed whether such advertising campaigns should be run on a national basis, and whether GB advertising campaigns should be used in Northern Ireland. They are very expensive to make, and the cost runs into hundreds of thousands of pounds. However, it was demonstrated that Northern Ireland has particular issues with regard to road safety. It has its own problems and intricacies. In conjunction with marketing experts, the Department was able to identify them, and the decision was taken to choose a more expensive, Northern Ireland based, advertising campaign. That was a correct decision; and that is the reason that the amendment is worded as it is.

Road safety is a Northern Ireland issue, with problems particular to here, and it should be dealt with on a Northern Ireland basis. What happens in other jurisdictions is for others to deal with. There is potential for a degree of co-operation on some aspects, but advertising campaigns and other road safety measures should be on a Northern Ireland basis. It would be impossible to organise these on the all-Ireland basis suggested by Sinn Féin because a completely different system operates in the Republic, with different speed limits. The Republic's road safety problem is greater than that of Northern Ireland, and I wish the Government of the Irish Republic well in reducing the number of deaths that take place there. I welcome the European aspect that is being delivered, whereby those who break the law in one jurisdiction cannot drive in another. That, however, is a European, as opposed to an all-Ireland, aspect. Northern Ireland has its own particular road safety issues. The Northern Ireland Assembly has a responsibility to address the issues that prevail here and to concentrate on its own affairs.

Mrs I Robinson: Does the Member agree that it would be helpful if car manufacturers worked alongside other agencies to look at ways of addressing the problem of speeding? That would be particularly helpful in those areas where young people live to speed and then die as a result of speeding. Manufacturers should be involved in trying to reduce speeding.

11.15 am

Mr Poots: Yes, absolutely. Training young people to drive, in particular, is very important, and the current driving test is a nonsense. If anyone carried out a three-point turn in normal road circumstances, as is the case in the current driving test, he or she is likely to cause an accident because of the length of time that the manoeuvre would take; the same could be said for reversing around corners.

In order to test their real ability, people taking the driving test need to be allowed to drive on dual carriageways, motorways and main roads where it is possible to drive up to 60 miles per hour. The current driving test is not an accurate test of people's ability to drive in normal road circumstances. They merely go through the motions and afterwards drive nothing like they did in the driving test. The test needs to be more practical; the Department must deliver a test that is more akin to real driving conditions. Those are not just my words — they are also the words of the examiners, who say that the driving test is no longer fit for purpose.

Mr Gardiner: On behalf of the Ulster Unionist Party, I support the amendment. We are very concerned about road safety in Northern Ireland, and we lend all the support that is humanly possible to improve road safety. Educating our young people on road safety is vital. So often it is the child who can say to the driver of the car: "Dad, you are driving too fast, slow down".

We appreciate the work that the Fire and Rescue Service does in relation to accidents on our roads, highways and byways. We also thank the medical staff of our hospitals, who have to try and repair those broken bodies, and also the PSNI, which is always at our beck and call when an accident occurs on our roads.

We could do more to improve road safety. While we in the Assembly seem to be powerless at the moment, we call on the Department for Regional Development (DRD) and the DOE to be proactive in that role. When driving along many of our roads, many of the signs are barely visible because of bad weather conditions. They are either filthy, obliterated or you just cannot see them.

While in other areas you see signs on poles by the roadside, in parts of my county, Armagh, instructions are marked on the road in very loud and bold markings in gold and red paint. I find that very attractive and more impressive than the many poles on roadsides, because you drive past many of them, not noticing them because they are so numerous.

We must move further and ask DRD to look seriously at engaging in modern technology. We have experience of some of the valuable work that has been done in our universities — for example, Queen's University has an excellent department for investigating and carrying out research — and with satellite navigation, and I hope that the Department will take on board the need to engage in modern technology.

Furthermore, car manufacturers should be ordered to amend car specifications to enable a signal to be sent to alert the driver to the fact that they are driving too fast or that there is danger ahead. Such a signal could be triggered from a pole at the roadside as a car passes and sent to a mechanism fitted in the car to alert the driver that there is an accident ahead or that they are over the speed limit. We must be proactive and advance with the modern day and age.

No doubt, there will be other Members who will speak today and give statistics on the figures relating to deaths, casualties and injuries. I and my party convey sympathy to all those who have suffered bereavement, especially over the last year and in the period just after Christmas, when the home is not the same due to an unfortunate road accident or an accident caused by a drunk driver.

Therefore bitterness and resentment are felt in many homes in Northern Ireland because of what can happen as a result of bad driving and poor road safety standards. The UUP wants to improve those standards, and Northern Ireland can lead the way by using modern technology to alert drivers and by introducing better road safety education to all schools.

The requirement to sit a written examination before taking the driving test was introduced about 15 years ago, but it now seems out of date. People still speed and do not take care on the roads. The Department for Regional Development also has a responsibility to straighten those bad corners at which many accidents happen. One accident or one death is one too many, and the Department should take emergency action to address such problem areas on the roads, because people must be protected. The UUP supports the amendment.

Mr Dallat: As a former teacher of road safety and moderator of examinations in that subject, this is one of the most serious topics that the Assembly could debate. In my role as teacher — and since — I have mourned the deaths of pupils and past pupils, and I understand something of the grief of parents and families. Perhaps that is why I am disappointed that an amendment has been tabled and that all parties will not vote collectively on the motion. I understood that, following the St Andrews Agreement, all parties supported North/South bodies, increased co-operation between the PSNI and the Garda Síochána, the harmonising of penalty points and joint advertising on television. Deaths on the road know no political boundary. Members who are in the House and who are from the North have lost loved ones on roads in the South, and others who are from the South may have lost loved ones in the North. Those people will not understand the need for division.

Road deaths and serious injury in road accidents have haunted us since the Locomotives Act 1865 — known as the “red flag” Act — was passed. That restricted the speed of horseless carriages to 4 mph in the countryside and, believe it or not, to 2 mph in towns. The Act also required someone to walk in front of the carriage carrying a red flag, as the Act’s nickname implies. The Act was not repealed until 1896 following serious lobbying by the Royal Automobile Club (RAC), which subsequently organised the London to Brighton run in celebration at being allowed to speed.

Seven years after the “red flag” Act was passed, another road traffic Act made it an offence to be drunk in charge of a horse and cart or a horseless carriage. Today, unfortunately, speeding and drinking and driving are still two of the main reasons why so many people continue to lose their lives.

In modern times, road fatalities peaked in the mid-1970s, when 375 people in the North lost their lives. In 2006, the figure dropped from 150 to 125, which is good news. However, it provides no cause for celebration, especially for those families who are grieving for the loss of their loved ones. The Republic also reported its lowest number of road deaths for 40 years, but that figure fell far short of targets. A total of 500 people lost their lives on this island — that is not a cause for division.

In Britain, the number of fatalities last year was over 3,100, and, despite a proliferation of speed cameras and fixed cameras that affect over one million drivers each year, that figure has not fallen significantly. The Northern Ireland Assembly doubled the number of road traffic education officers from nine to 18. Presumably, they have had an impact in the schools and have contributed to road safety education. However, little has been heard of them in the public arena.

Looking beyond these islands, it is useful to note that France has had considerable success in reducing its road fatalities.

It is claimed that much of that success can be attributed to the French President, Jacques Chirac, who made road safety an election issue. The result is that road fatalities in France have been halved in three years. Scandinavian countries are also better than we are at dealing with road safety, and there is much to be learnt from them.

It is often pointed out that during the Troubles more people lost their lives on the roads than through violence. As Members know, enormous efforts were made by people from all over the world to solve our political problems and to identify the causes of those deaths. Enormous sums of money have been spent on security — perhaps billions of pounds. By contrast, much less has been done to bring an end to the slaughter on the roads, and precious little has been done to create an overarching body to deal with road safety issues.

I acknowledge the work of the Road Safety Council of Northern Ireland, which is unique to these parts. Believe it or not, the total resources of that body are a full-time chief executive, currently acting up, and one part-time member of staff. The new organisation in the Republic, the Road Safety Authority, has 309 full-time staff and the power to bring together all Government Departments with responsibility for road safety. No one can tell me that there is not a lot that we can learn from that. Is it not time that we had a similar body, with powers to knock heads together to make road safety the issue that it is in those countries where the death toll is considerably lower?

Over the Christmas period, there was a high-profile campaign about drinking and driving, yet a huge number of motorists were caught over the legal limit — some of them by a considerable margin. Unfortunately, most of the publicity went to the police officers who, I regret to say, figured in the overall list. Little has been said about the others who were on the roads with excess alcohol in their systems. How many were caught the morning after, when they thought they were safe to drive? Can drinking and driving be viewed purely in isolation, when Members know that there is a serious problem relating to alcohol generally? That issue must be examined.

Reference has been made to the driving test, which, apart from the introduction of the theory section, has changed little over the years. New motorists have no experience of the horror of road accidents, and these are not simulated in any training programme. On the contrary, the test is no more than a meander through the suburbs, on routes that most candidates know like the backs of their hands. No part of the test is conducted on the motorways — or after nightfall, when the greatest number of young people lose their lives. After the test is passed, there is no follow-up to measure the new driver's skills, attitude and progressive experience. There is the advanced driving test, but few take it. That does not apply to any other skills programme, where there is much less risk of causing death or of being killed. That must change. There must be a progressive programme to ensure that young people are nurtured through those difficult years and that they remain alive.

Let us hope that this debate lays a foundation stone upon which we can build a new approach to an issue that affects so many families and worries so many parents sick as they lie awake at night until their sons and daughters return safely. Many here understand what that is about. When I was young, I certainly did not understand it, but as a parent I do.

Together, North and South, we can create a new partnership and harness our experience, knowledge, and grief to follow the example of others and have this island talked about not for the number of people who are killed day and daily, but for our success in addressing a scourge that is largely ignored by the motor manufacturers. Some of the advertisements for leading manufacturers on television are a disgrace. They encourage decent young people to become boy racers. Someone must take control of that.

The insurance companies have a role to play as well. Young people might be more encouraged if they were charged a reasonable premium when they began an insurance policy so that they had something to protect, rather than being charged exorbitant premiums which would have no effect in the case of an accident.

11.30 am

Breweries also have a role to play. If there were fewer happy hours and promotions, fewer young people might be goaded into doing the wrong thing. Many people — and I have named some of them — are making vast fortunes out of motoring and motor sport, but they contribute little to protecting those who end up in the morgues awaiting identification by distraught relatives.

The fatalities for 2007 have already begun, and, in fact, one of them was from my constituency. Let us hope that a new Assembly — which I expect at the end of March — will give top priority to making improved road safety essential. We can do it, and I hope that it can be achieved collectively with the co-operation of all parties.

Mr McCarthy: This is a timely debate, because, unfortunately, fatalities on the roads are reaching unacceptable levels. Road safety should and must be the number one priority for everyone — young and old. The Alliance Party will support every effort to prevent road accidents. I support the motion and the amendment.

One life lost or one person injured on our roads is one too many. My heart and deepest sympathies go out to those people who have lost their lives, who have been left with terrible injuries as a result of a road traffic accident and who have been left behind to grieve the loss of a dear one. As public representatives, Members are all too aware of tragedies that have hit our constituencies, and of the untold misery and pain that comes with fatal accidents.

This Assembly should have the legislative power to introduce measures to combat the risks on our roads, and I say hurry on the day when we can help to prevent or at least reduce the senseless carnage on the roads.

I offer my sincere gratitude to the emergency services. They deserve the highest credit and thanks for their work. It is they who are first summoned when an accident takes place and who have to attend to the carnage. Regardless of training, one cannot be prepared for some of the horrific scenes that the emergency services face. Everyone has loved ones and family; it must be heartbreaking to have to go to a mangled vehicle and attend to the victims.

There is an ever-increasing volume of traffic on the roads; therefore road users who are in charge of what might be classed a lethal weapon must have their wits about them. There is no room for risk or distractions. The aim is to reach one's destination safely and with respect for other road users, even if that means being slightly late for an appointment.

Many reasons have been given for the carnage on roads; we are told that the biggest culprit is alcohol. Once again, it seems that the UK legislation relating to this issue is 30 years out of date. The alcohol limit is 80mg of alcohol per 100ml of blood — approximately double the limit in most other European countries. There is, therefore, much room for improvement.

Speeding, particularly by younger drivers, is also a major factor in road crashes. The Alliance Party welcomes the imminent introduction of the draft Road Traffic (Northern Ireland) Order 2007, which will assist the Northern Ireland road safety strategy (NIRSS).

Last week, I met with representatives of the British Medical Association in Northern Ireland (BMA (NI)). They are concerned about road traffic fatalities and are calling on Government to take steps to cut down the number of road accidents.

As Edwin Poots mentioned, the Committee for the Environment recommended some simple changes to ensure safety on our school buses. These included the provision of a seat belt for each pupil, the suggestion that only one pupil be allowed in each seat and a range of other safety measures. That report is probably gathering dust on a shelf somewhere, and yet the carnage goes on. Yesterday evening, I read about a fatal bus crash across the water. If its passengers had been wearing seat belts, those deaths and injuries could have been prevented. We must think about that issue.

During the last Assembly mandate, I requested funding to improve the surfaces of a couple of the major roads on the Ards Peninsula in my constituency: the A20 from Newtownards to Portaferry and the A2 coast road from Newtownards to Portavogie. I also requested funding for other roads on the peninsula. However, rather than increased funding, the overall roads maintenance budget was reduced.

I would like Peter Robinson to resume his post — or another Member to be nominated — as Minister for Regional Development to take charge of local roads as quickly as possible. At least Mr Robinson introduced the second phase of the Comber bypass, for which we had campaigned for 30 years. The sooner a local Minister is in place, the sooner all our roads will be improved.

I understand that the current Minister with responsibility for road safety has cut the funding that the Road Safety Council of Northern Ireland allocates to local government road safety committees. My colleague Naomi Long wrote to the Minister to ask him to meet with the Belfast area road safety committee. Unfortunately, he refused because his diary was full.

The road safety committees run on a very low budget. They address the education of young people and young drivers, and promote advanced driver training to increase awareness. However, they are struggling to fund such simple things as paper for their school poster competitions. That is shameful: the Minister should be ashamed of himself.

The Republic of Ireland is considering using our road safety committees as a model to address its situation. However, for the want of a few hundred pounds, we are jeopardising them in Northern Ireland. Again, the Minister responsible must assess that situation.

Road safety means that proper investment should go into all our roads, not just the motorways. The A20 and the A2 to Portaferry and Portavogie, to which I referred, have had their fair share of fatal accidents. The most recent involved a young Glashy College student who lost his life just before Christmas. Like so many others, these roads were designed for donkeys and carts some years ago. They are certainly not up to what is required of them now.

Life is precious. All road users are at risk. The next Assembly must take the lead in implementing measures to stop road carnage.

Mr Donaldson: I welcome this morning's debate and commend those who tabled the motion. Road safety is an important issue. Indeed, it is a priority issue that a new Assembly must tackle in Northern Ireland.

Not a week goes by without headlines on the news — whether radio or television — bringing distressing scenes of families who have had the tragedy of losing a loved one visited upon them. We have seen that all too often in Northern Ireland, especially amongst our younger people.

This issue affects us all; it cuts right across the entire community, and we, as political representatives, must give it a higher priority. This debate is a welcome step in the right direction.

Last year, there were some 125 fatalities on the roads in Northern Ireland. While that marks a reduction in the number for the previous year, it is, nevertheless, still far too high. In particular, deaths among young people are a real cause for concern. A couple of years ago, four young men were killed in a road traffic accident in my constituency. They attended Lisburn Institute of Further and Higher Education, and I attended a special service that the institute held to commemorate those four young lives. I remember the impact that those deaths had on the young students in that college. They were absolutely devastated at the loss of their young friends — four lives cut short and needlessly lost. We must provide political leadership in this area and must urge those with statutory responsibility to introduce additional measures to tackle the problem.

Lisburn, in my constituency, does not have a particularly proud record when it comes to road traffic accidents. In 2005-06, we topped the league table in Northern Ireland for fatalities and serious injuries. In Lisburn, there were 94 road traffic accidents involving fatalities or serious injuries; closely following that was Fermanagh with 74; Ballymena with 63; Foyle with 59; and Dungannon and South Tyrone with 57.

Those statistics are frightening, and they also highlight the fact that many road traffic accidents occur in rural areas. Indeed, the statistics for Northern Ireland show that more deaths occur in rural areas than in urban areas, which is due in no small part to drivers travelling at excessive speed on country roads that were never built or designed for such speed.

Between 1994-98, males aged between 16 and 25 made up only 8% of Northern Ireland's population, yet accounted for 21% of road traffic accidents involving death or serious injury. Some 19% of those accidents were attributed to excessive or inappropriate speed, and 12% to cases that involved drugs and alcohol. A staggering 50% of road traffic accidents involving fatalities or serious injuries are down to careless driving. Road safety advertisements and publicity campaigns often emphasise the dangers of alcohol, and that approach is welcome and commendable; we must discourage people from drink-driving. However, half of all road traffic accidents involving death or serious injury are down to careless driving, and we need to examine that issue carefully. It is partly a matter of education.

Earlier, Mr McCarthy welcomed the introduction of the draft Road Traffic (Northern Ireland) Order 2007, which is due to come into force shortly. The Order will bring Northern Ireland into line with other parts of the United Kingdom as regards enforcement on our roads. Some of the measures that are envisaged in that Order are to be welcomed. For example, I understand that, in future, courts will be able to offer retraining for drink-driving offenders in exchange for reduced punishment, and that the courses will be held at the attendant's expense. That is not just a matter of ensuring that the punishment fits the crime, but of ensuring that those who have a history of drink-driving are given the help that they need to deal with any alcohol problem and to address their driving habits.

Mrs I Robinson: Will the Member agree that if a person continually offends and is caught speeding, after having taken drink or drugs, the penalty should be much stiffer in order to send out the message that, although help is available through the courts and various agencies, continual bad behaviour on the roads will result in stiff penalties for abusers of the system?

Mr Donaldson: I thank my hon Friend for her intervention. I agree entirely. Although on the one hand investment must be made in education and training for young people in particular, at the same time penalties must be stiffer for continual offending. I am sure that all colleagues have encountered cases of serial offenders in their own areas — people who regularly appear in court for traffic offences. I am sure that we have all met families who have lost loved ones on the roads, particularly through joyriding, or “death driving” as it is more aptly known. The penalties for joyriding are not severe enough. When a driver regularly reoffends, the courts ought to consider removing that person's driving licence for life when it is clear that he or she will not be able to kick the habit of careless driving or drink-driving.

The Order will also introduce variable fixed penalties for speeding to match the severity of the offence and graduated fixed penalties for vehicle-roadworthiness offences. It will introduce new penalty points for failure to wear a seatbelt, using a mobile phone while driving, not being in proper control of the vehicle and contravention of temporary speed limits — all of which are known to contribute to careless driving. The police will also be given the power to arrest any individual who does not stop for a police officer and the power to undertake drug-impairment tests.

Steps are also being taken to bring our licensing system into line with that of the rest of Europe. Through my work in the Transport Select Committee in the House of Commons, I am aware that moves are also being made to regularise Northern Ireland's vehicle and driver licensing system to make it compatible with the system in Great Britain, so that there will no longer be the nonsense that drivers with Northern Ireland driving licences — which are not recognised by the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency in Swansea — and who have incurred a penalty in Great Britain, cannot simply pay a fine, but must appear in court.

I started by saying that we, as politicians, have a responsibility to do something about the problem. The Northern Ireland road safety strategy is welcome. The Association of British Insurers recently published proposals to reduce the number of deaths on the roads, especially among young drivers. There are good recommendations in that document, which I commend to the Assembly.

Finally, I want to draw Members' attention to a presentation that will be given by the Road Safety Council in the Long Gallery on 29 January 2007. I hope that it will be a platform for the formation of an all-party group on road safety that will bring all parties together for a common cause, to tackle the issues and to demonstrate to the general public that their political leaders are serious about dealing with the problem in Northern Ireland. I hope that all parties will support the formation of such an all-party group in the Assembly.

Mr Armstrong: I support the amendment. Northern Ireland lost 125 people on its roads last year, each representing a tragic loss to families, friends and communities across the Province. Each death is one too many. Northern Ireland's aim in 2007 is to continue to work together with, and take advice from, its counterparts in other areas of the United Kingdom in order to find additional ways to reduce the number of tragedies on its roads.

The annual cost of road accidents and consequent injuries to the Northern Ireland economy is £400 million — a huge cost to the taxpayer that must be reduced. The Northern Ireland road safety strategy, launched in 2002, has already had a significant impact in reducing the number of deaths and injuries on the roads. Any plans that can improve the awareness and concentration levels of road users are welcome in the effort to promote safety.

Government Departments and the Police Service of Northern Ireland are working well together to promote an integrated approach to road safety. With support from the community, they continue to endeavour to reduce the number of deaths on the roads. That is yet another area where any normal, democratically elected person or party should have no hesitation in supporting the Police Service of Northern Ireland in their efforts to promote road safety.

As a region of the UK, we are part of the national challenge to reduce the number of people killed or seriously injured in road accidents. An enhanced education programme is a necessary part of any strategy to reduce the number of road accidents. The Driving Standards Agency has designed and implemented an additional voluntary training service for new drivers, Pass Plus, with the help of insurers and the driving instruction industry, to give new drivers advanced training in safe driving. That programme covers potential dangers such as driving in town, in all weathers, at night, on rural roads, dual carriageways and motorways. No such scheme has been implemented by the Driver and Vehicle Testing Agency in Northern Ireland. A devolved Assembly or, in its absence, direct-rule Ministers, should consider such a scheme. We must grasp the nettle and show young people that we politicians feel very strongly about this matter and are going to do something about it.

Great Britain is introducing a new rigorous driving test framework, and moving towards a more demanding driving test. It is important to ensure that Northern Ireland is part of that debate and keeps pace with what is happening in the rest of the United Kingdom. Education is the basis of any advanced driving programme, and that must include children at primary school. The driving test should be based on education provided at that early age. As Sam Gardiner said earlier, young people are the eyes and ears of the future, and they will alert drivers and parents if they feel that their lives are in danger. It becomes natural for them to think of safety in their lives, the more so when they become drivers.

I agree with Edwin Poots, who said that in some cases the speed limit is too high, and in other cases too low. That must be amended. Only through the successful operation of the Assembly and its Committees will we be able to change that. All of this hot air is useless until Sinn Féin becomes a democratic party and we can move forward without our hands being tied.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Murphy: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I support the motion, but I would like first to address the amendment. When I read the amendment this morning, I thought that it might be something to do with DUP or unionist sensitivity about language because the motion refers directly to North/South measures. However, having listened to Edwin Poots, I now believe that it is much more than that. Sadly, that reflects a rather blinkered view of this problem on the island of Ireland. There are many DUP and Ulster Unionist representatives from border constituencies, such as Maurice Morrow, one of the proposers of the amendment. He surely knows that the tragic phenomenon of road deaths is not confined to one side of the border, and a different approach — [Interruption.]

If the Member wants me to give way, I am happy to do so. He obviously does not; he has nothing to say.

It is not confined to one side of the border, with a different set of problems and a different approach needed on the other side. Anyone who lives in or represents a border area knows that many main roads run across the border and back again within two- and three-mile stretches and, therefore, what is needed is an approach recognising that fact.

It is no surprise that Co-operation and Working Together (CAWT), the agency that monitors such things, has produced statistics showing that there is a proportionately higher chance of road fatalities occurring in border areas North and South than on the rest of the island. There are a number of factors involved, but surely we cannot ignore the fact that the problem stretches across the island. We cannot ignore the fact that we have a land border and different jurisdictions. There needs to be a common approach between those jurisdictions to tackle the problem.

Another problem that I have with the amendment is that both Edwin Poots and Billy Armstrong derided the current driving test and argued that there were deficiencies in it. However, the amendment removes the call for a rigorous new driving test examination.

Before Christmas, I had an experience similar to that of Jeffrey Donaldson: I was invited to speak at an event following the deaths of two men on the Dublin Road on the outskirts of Newry. It struck me that, like many other road traffic deaths, the accident involved two separate individuals — both of whom I knew; one was a taxi driver and the other was a young man from my constituency whose family I know — who were both killed in an accident involving a car that was being driven by young people. It would be inappropriate to go into the details of the accident, because some matters are still sub judice. However, the broad picture given by the report of that accident fits the general pattern of so many others — speed, road structure, unfit vehicles, and vehicles being driven without due diligence.

Other people have talked about speed and the abuse of drink and drugs while driving, and I will speak about those briefly. Education is a key factor. It has been well proven — and statistics show very clearly — that the people most likely to be involved in that type of activity are young men. That is not to demonise all young people; the majority of them, including young men, drive responsibly and with caution. Sadly, however, all the statistics show that young men are the most likely to be involved in car accidents, serious injuries and road fatalities while under the influence of drink or drugs, and that is where education must be targeted. While education programmes are being targeted at pupils in secondary and grammar schools, it is time to consider introducing such programmes in primary schools also.

Again, the matter is not confined to the Six Counties; it applies across the island. John Dallat referred to the new Road Safety Authority in the South; it seems to have had some success, and lessons can be learned. We are not living in a bubble, and those of us who represent border constituencies know that road fatalities are not confined to one side of the border or the other and are not due to different sets of reasons on one side of the border or the other. That must be taken into account in our approach.

Detection and appropriate punishment are also involved, and those are matters for agencies on both sides of the border. There are issues that need to be addressed. Jeffrey Donaldson referred to the licensing anomalies between here and Britain, but there are also anomalies in detection and punishment between here and the South.

Road structure is another factor playing a key part in road traffic accidents and fatalities, particularly in the border areas. It has been said that the majority of accidents and fatalities happen in rural areas, and it is no surprise that there is a link between that fact and the substandard structure of roads in rural areas — and the decreasing budgets for road structure in those areas, and in border areas particularly.

There are questions to be asked about our main roads too. When the Newry bypass was opened a number of years ago, people from all political parties, and those who lived along the bypass or used it, complained about the substandard lighting and the dangerous carriageway layout. It became the most dangerous stretch of road in the North of Ireland, if not on the whole island.

It took many years of lobbying before a simple set of street lights was erected at each junction of that bypass. I am thankful that since their recent installation, there have been no further fatalities. The roads agencies should not wait until 16 or 17 people have died on a stretch of road before reacting with such simple measures.

12.00 noon

The new stretch of the A1 from Loughbrickland to Beech Hill has recently been completed at a cost of more than £20 million. Already, questions are being asked about safety measures on that stretch of road. Speed limits were introduced on the A1 at Dromore, and, eventually, an underpass was built. However, that brand new stretch of road has similar junctions and cross-cutting traffic to those that were on the Newry bypass. Must we wait until there have been 15 or 16 deaths on that stretch of road before the Roads Service starts to spend the money that is required to provide the necessary standard of roads on this part of the island?

Reasons for and remedies to the tragedies that we experience day and daily were proposed during the debate. All those proposals have merit. However, one matter that is certainly a factor in many of road deaths has not been addressed, namely, the driving of unfit vehicles and driving without insurance. Unscrupulous car dealers have, by and large, escaped responsibility for some of the fatalities on the roads. Those dealers sell so-called runaround cars for relatively small amounts to people whom they know not to have proper licences or insurance. Those vehicles are sold without a care or a thought in the world to the outcome. In the recent case to which I referred earlier, the car in which those young people were travelling had been bought only the previous day for a relatively small sum. Therefore those dealers cannot evade responsibility.

The solutions do not lie only in detection, rigorous driving tests, better roads and better standards of driving; we must also address social responsibility. People must take responsibility for their actions and businesses and for how those contribute to road tragedies. Those who knowingly sell vehicles to people who are not responsible enough to drive them bear a huge responsibility, and they should carefully examine their actions.

The motion is sufficiently comprehensive to address what the debate should cover. I hope that when this Assembly gets down to business at the end of March it will seriously tackle this issue. I commend the motion, and I regret that the amendment has brought narrow party politics and blinkered thinking into the debate. Go raibh míle maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

Ms Ritchie: Many Members have addressed the same point — the need for road safety to be addressed in a co-ordinated fashion if the tragedy and trauma that many families have experienced due to road deaths are to be reduced.

One of the most compelling requirements of an incoming Executive and Assembly is to establish a strategy, policies, and an implementation plan for a wide range of public safety measures that incorporate and encompass co-operation between Departments and the Police Service of Northern Ireland. Such a strategy and policies would address safety on our roads and ensure that our neighbourhoods are places in which people can live, work and enjoy their recreational pursuits free from the onslaught of violence, assaults and criminality. Road safety is one component of that strategy that must be given a much higher priority. The motion, which my party supports, addresses the need for robust measures on road safety on the island of Ireland. It also addresses the need for promotional schemes to make road safety a number-one priority. Those measures are urgently required, and they must be implemented on a co-ordinated basis through the development of a road safety authority in the North that is comparable in size, resources and remit to its equivalent in the South of Ireland.

In April 2006, my colleague Mr Dallat and I met the chairman and chief executive of the Road Safety Authority in the Republic of Ireland. We were amazed by the authority's work remit and by its range of resources. We were told that it is important to examine the causes of road accidents. Did the accidents happen because of the configuration of the road or the road surface? It is equally important to examine the state of mind of the driver of the car that may have caused an accident. What provoked the driver to behave in the way that they did? Those important issues must also be examined in Northern Ireland.

Road safety should affect every aspect of our lives. At the weekend, I found an appropriate quotation that, I feel, encapsulates the issue of road safety:

"Safety is not a gadget but a state of mind."

When we are on the roads, we should provide a safe environment for everyone by putting safety first.

The Road Safety Authority in the South of Ireland, which has its headquarters in Ballina, County Mayo, is charged with improving Ireland's poor road safety record. It is responsible for several road safety programmes, including education, testing and licensing for drivers, vehicle testing and standards, road safety research, and the establishment and administration of a driving instructor register. It will also be responsible for managing Ireland's driver test centre network. We need such a body in Northern Ireland, which must be co-ordinated with the law enforcement agencies on the island and with the Road Safety Authority. We should also have joint advertisements and promotion schemes that urge safety on our roads.

At present, road safety in the North is managed by two Departments, which work with the Police Service. There is also the Road Safety Council, which has inadequate resources to run a road safety programme. In fact, road safety education officers employed by the Department of the Environment cannot now attend district road safety committee meetings to talk about the important issue of road safety. How can the Department of the Environment garner information about road safety in district council areas, or assist with programmes to reduce the number of road traffic accidents, if it does not hear the views of the local community? Perhaps the views of local community representatives do not mean anything to the Department or the Minister.

In a recent letter to me, the current Minister with responsibility for the environment disregarded the need for road safety co-ordination and cohesion because, according to him, the Department of the Environment co-ordinates everything; it does not. The Department does not have the necessary authority, will or expertise to do its job of improving safety on our roads. We must ask the basic question: what priority has been given to road safety by the current direct-rule Administration? Their ad hoc, disjointed and reactive approach must be refuted and challenged. Current policies must be changed urgently, but that will only happen if an incoming Executive and Assembly have the will to ensure that road safety is of paramount importance and a number one priority.

Other Members have already referred to an overall lack of resources and only reduced resources being available for structural road maintenance. Over the past few years, the Department for Regional Development has not had the commitment to adequately fund structural road improvement.

During the first period of devolution, the Minister of the Environment ensured that the number of road safety education officers was increased. Unfortunately, the return of direct rule put a brake on road safety initiatives. That attitude in the DOE and the NIO must change.

Over the Christmas period, there were radio and TV reports of fatalities on the roads. Many reasons can be given for those fatalities, but we need to go back to basics and ask why each accident happened. One fact remains: families have been bereaved and have suffered a great sense of loss at a time when they should have been celebrating the birth of hope and expectation, and looking forward to a new year.

On Boxing Day, I visited the mother of one of the young people who sadly was killed over the Christmas period. Her sense of loss was palpable, and she told me that she could not bear to let her son go. Sadly, she had to. I hope that her words will lead us to ensure that something is done about road safety.

Although the number of deaths on our roads has declined over the past number of years, we must give hope to those who have been bereaved. We must urge the incoming Executive and Assembly to guarantee the establishment of a road safety authority, with a wide range of powers and resources, which can co-ordinate with the similar body in the South of Ireland and with the law enforcement agencies on this island. We must give the local population confidence, so that children, young people, adults and the elderly feel safe in their local environment and on the roads. Prioritising such road safety policies and strategies, accompanied with the appropriate resources, will go some way towards that.

If priority were given to road safety, it would provide a cheap and effective insurance policy. If we are serious about establishing a new Executive on 26 March, there is no reason why we cannot make road safety a priority.

Mr McGimpsey: I support the amendment. Little has been said this morning for which I do not have sympathy. Many of the factors that contribute to the carnage on our roads have been mentioned. Speed is a definite factor. Although vehicles are safer now, they are faster. They can brake and accelerate faster, meaning that the margins for error are much less than they were some time ago. Another factor is the huge rise in the number of vehicles on our roads — increased traffic density. As Jeffrey Donaldson said, statistically, the key factor in road accidents is inattention.

Other elements are just as important, and, as Margaret Ritchie said, each death is a personal tragedy for the victim's immediate family and the wider family circle. That, clearly, is of enormous importance to our society.

I agree with something else that has been said repeatedly: devolution is the best arena in which to deal with these matters. Direct rule is remote; devolution and local Ministers offer the best opportunity for further reductions in the number of road tragedies.

I support the amendment, not least because the motion refers to a "National Road Safety Campaign". Such a campaign exists. It is a UK-wide national road safety campaign called 'Tomorrow's roads: safer for everyone'. I am not saying that that campaign is exclusive, but it has been adopted and is operating throughout the UK, including in Northern Ireland. There are mixed views about the campaign's success, but it has been implemented in regions of England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland.

A key part of the strategy is to set targets. Over a 10-year period the targets are a 40% reduction in the number of accidents where there are deaths and serious injuries, and a 50% reduction in deaths and serious injuries among children. Those have been adopted universally — apart, I have to say, from in Northern Ireland, where, unfortunately, we are talking about a 33.3% reduction in accidents that cause deaths and serious injuries and a 50% reduction in the number of children who are killed or seriously injured. Throughout the UK about 3,500 people are killed annually, and around 40,000 are seriously injured. If we get reductions of about 40%, we are talking about a substantial reduction in the number of deaths and serious injuries.

(Madam Speaker in the Chair)

Also, as far as the budget is concerned, this carnage costs about £3 billion nationwide, and in Northern Ireland, as we have heard, large numbers of people are killed. About 125 people died last year, and 1,750 were seriously injured, many of whom were children. Those are the sorts of figures that give us a strong motive to reinforce the current Northern Ireland road safety strategy.

There are a couple of factors that direct rule Ministers are being slow to respond to. For example, Road Safety Scotland has introduced a children's traffic club, which provides free road safety training for three- and four-year olds. It also provides money for full- and part-time 20 mph zones in urban areas to try to reduce the speeds of vehicles. Those are the sorts of measures that an Executive here could look at. There is also, as Billy Armstrong mentioned, a voluntary advanced training course in safe driving called Pass Plus, and that is being taken up universally as well.

While none of us has the answer to this problem or can say that we can get massive reductions, we need an ongoing campaign, not least for an increase in public awareness. There have been steady reductions year by year in the number of people who have been killed or seriously injured on the roads, but public awareness is such that there is no room for complacency. Some measures currently under consideration have merit.

For example, the age group most likely to pass the driving test is young men aged between 18 and 25. However, those same people are 20 times more likely to be killed or seriously injured on the roads than middle-aged men. That indicates a clear need for a fundamental change in the way in which we test people's driving. We appear to be training them to pass a test rather than to drive safely, so tougher extended driving tests, including rigorous training programmes, is one measure that might bear fruit.

Safer driving could be included in the school curriculum. It is another of the measures being considered that also has merit. The Swedes have a system whereby students can begin training on the public roads at the age of 16. They have to do 120 hours of training before they are ready to take the test. Those are the sorts of training and education measures that we need. Cars are very sophisticated pieces of machinery and, while they are safer than ever before, because of their speed, ability to brake quickly and acceleration, the margins for error are smaller, which means that serious training is needed.

As Jeffrey Donaldson said, there is also the new Road Traffic (Northern Ireland) Order 2007. That adds penalty points where we formerly levied fines. There can be penalty points for using a mobile phone or for not wearing seat belts, and the police can seize vehicles that are being driven without insurance.

There are a number of measures being brought in or under consideration. It is important when discussing such a serious subject to understand where we are and the measures that are in place.

There are measures in place. I am not here to argue on behalf of the Department of the Environment's road safety directorate. However, it has had successes in recent years, and, while we are not complacent, it is important that we look carefully at where it has been successful and at the measures that it plans to put into place. That is the way to improve the figures and to ensure that there is a reduction in the carnage on the roads.

It is also important, owing to the nature of the motion, to reflect on the North/South co-operation that is already in place. The Executive instituted that in the days of devolution. It features an annual joint road-safety campaign; joint research on road accidents in border areas; and mutual recognition of endorsements of road traffic offences. It is important to recognise and to acknowledge that, rather than to ignore it or to pretend that there is no strategy in place. No one is saying that road safety stops at the border — far from it. We are part of a wider strategy, and delivery of that strategy by a local Administration with cross-border co-operation is the way forward.

I support the amendment. This is a subject on which we can all work together while looking to reinforce the Northern Ireland road safety strategy that is currently in place and to find other measures to further reduce the number of deaths and serious injuries on the roads.

Mr Molloy: I support the motion. This is a timely debate, coming as it does after the Christmas recess, during which there has been continuing carnage on the roads. Thankfully, however, there has been a reduction across the island of Ireland with 39 fewer deaths last year than in 2005. While we should not become complacent, it is nevertheless important to recognise the work that is being done by various civil agencies. Unfortunately, the World Health Organization estimates that the number of people killed and injured on the roads will increase by 60% between 2000 and 2020. We are halfway there already.

Road deaths and injuries are preventable. My concern is that people think that road deaths are inevitable and a daily occurrence. People often dismiss danger by saying that it would be more dangerous to cross the road. Unfortunately, they are correct, but there does not seem to be a system to rectify that, to reduce the number of deaths and to make the roads safer.

That could be achieved in several different ways — for instance, by making additions to roads and changing road design. Cycle paths are important because cyclists are among the most vulnerable road users, particularly in towns. We want to encourage people to cycle more, so we must provide pathways and encourage cyclists to use them, not only in the urban situation but in rural areas. Safer pathways for pedestrians are also necessary.

Slow lanes for tractors are also required; one of the main frustrations on country roads is the slow pace at which those vehicles move. Some areas have introduced slow carriageways in certain parts and for short distances. Unfortunately, that can create its own problems as traffic moves and pulls back out onto the main road; however, tractors are being used more and more for the transportation of vehicles, diggers and equipment, so we must find a fast-track approach to the issue. We must design roads differently to take account of the changing nature of road users.

My colleague Conor Murphy raised the issue of dual carriageways in reference to the Dromore bypass and the new A1. The same situation arises in other areas — for example, a vehicle crossing a dual carriageway has its tail sticking out onto the fastest lane of the carriageway, or a slow-moving tractor tries to cross both lanes.

More dangers are being created for tractor users, those in slow-moving vehicles and those in oncoming vehicles. The safety of those drivers and their passengers is being compromised. We must find ways in which to deal with all those problems in order to improve road users' health and safety.

The good work done by the Committee on the Environment led to the decision to introduce seat belts and smaller seats for children on school buses. It is important to note, however, that, despite the Committee's efforts, the situation has not improved. School buses in my area still travel with 60 or 70 children on board, perhaps 20 of whom are standing. It is difficult enough when schoolchildren must sit three to a seat, which has long been the situation. However, schoolchildren's safety is increasingly endangered as a result of having to stand on buses, perhaps for a journey of two or three miles. They risk sliding about as they move up and down the bus, carrying large school bags. The Committee's recommendations must be implemented. The issues that I have raised highlight the change that is required.

Road design is also a concern, especially in the many rural areas that are being urbanised. The first requests that people who build mansions in the countryside make is for a kerbed footpath to be built in front of it and for street lighting to be installed. The result is that there is lighting for about 10 or 20 yds, followed by complete darkness. People who wish to keep vehicles off the wee bit of grass outside their home are protecting it by putting large stones or big concrete blocks on it. In doing so, however, they endanger drivers who have to pull onto that grass, and who may not see the stones. In my area, people have been severely injured in accidents that have occurred because of that.

DRD has a responsibility to remove those stones — in fact, it has a legal requirement to do so, but that is not happening. Those stones are obstacles on the road. At least a vehicle will bounce off a kerb, back onto the road; however, the same vehicle will burst a tyre on the stones, go onto the grass verge and over a hedge or into a wall. The urbanisation of rural areas must be addressed, as must road design.

Road traffic accidents result in the deaths of 350 people a day across the World Health Organization region. That figure is very large. If that happened in any other walk of life, there would be a major outcry. The number of deaths each year equates to the number of people who might die in a major catastrophe. The figure is the equivalent of the population of a medium-sized city being killed each year.

At least 2.4 million people are also injured or disabled as a result of road accidents each year. Those figures come up time and time again, but, unfortunately, the injured and the disabled are often forgotten about. Deaths raise road safety's profile; however, the injured, and what they endure in the aftermath of accidents, are often overlooked. Therefore we need a common signage system throughout the island of Ireland.

Many Members, including Mr Poots when speaking to the amendment, have raised the issue of the rigorous driver-testing framework. We need a new driving test, because ours is outdated, and many Members who spoke have accepted that. I am surprised that there is nit-picking over the motion, because the introduction of a new framework is important. If the amendment is made, the resolution will not include our call for its introduction. For that reason, I ask Members to consider supporting the motion as it stands.

The motion calls for the development of a national road safety campaign. We can nit-pick over the issue of the definition of "national", but the reality is that people who travel back and forward across the border daily are encountering different signage, road speeds and markings. We must adopt a common approach. It does not matter that we might have a British national safety campaign and an Irish national safety campaign — the two can combine. The priority is to reduce the number of injuries and deaths on the road and the number of accidents. Therefore it is important that the House unite on the issue of road safety. We should adopt a common approach to road deaths and their impact rather than allow ourselves to get sidetracked by politics.

We are supposed to be two European regions working side by side. We were told that all those differences would be done away with whenever we joined the European Economic Community (EEC). All those things that we were told would unify us — common signage and road speeds — we do not have, unfortunately. I ask Members to examine and deal with that very important element.

12.30 pm

My colleague Francie Brolly pointed out that in the South, insurance and MOT certificates must be displayed along with the tax disc. It is important to know, before drivers go on the road, that the quality of vehicles has been tested and that people are insured. Too often, people are victims of someone who is not insured and find that they have no comeback. The most dangerous person on the road is frequently the one who has no insurance. We should not split hairs on this matter, but should work together to ensure that the number of deaths and accidents on the roads is reduced. There should also be, across the island of Ireland, a common policy and a properly financed and resourced road safety agency.

I ask Members to support the motion.

Lord Morrow: I think that it was Mr McGimpsey who said that the best way of tackling these issues would be to have in place a local Assembly — I could not agree more. Alas, that is not possible at the moment because we cannot reach the stage where Sinn Féin can bring itself to support the agencies of law and order. That is surprising — or perhaps it is not. After all, that party could not bring itself to ask the people of west Belfast to co-operate with the police when a young woman was savagely raped. Even on an issue such as road safety, I have not heard one Sinn Féin Member say that it is a matter for the police. It is, although many other agencies also need to be involved.

That is why my colleague and I tabled the amendment. We want to lift the matter out of the political domain and out of politics altogether. It has nothing to do with politics. The message that has to go out loud and clear from this Assembly today is that we are united in our concern about road safety and the carnage that is happening on our roads. If the signs are anything to go by, that is not going to be the case. That is regrettable. I am sure that those who will vote against the amendment, when they go away and think it over, will conclude that they could have done better. However, I hope that they will stop and consider their ways.

I wish to bring some figures to the attention of the Assembly. While I do not want to go through a long list of statistics, some are important to note. Of course, these are PSNI figures, and the fact that I mention the PSNI may run a cold sweat up some people's backs. What a terrible thing to do in a democratic society. However, I will take that risk. The figures produced by the PSNI cover the period from 1 April 2005 to 31 March 2006. During that time, nearly 5,100 people were injured in road traffic collisions — a quite staggering figure, by any standards. That resulted in more than 8,377 casualties, of which 11% — 895 — were children under 16 years of age. It is important that the Assembly take cognisance of the significance of that statistic.

That brings me to the number of collisions. The figures show that they have dropped from 5,240 in 2004-05 to 5,098 in 2005-06. That represents a small but nevertheless welcome decrease of 2.7%.

We have a responsibility — though not exclusive — to consider young drivers, although that may not run with every Member. The issue of young drivers must be tackled in a way that will make a real impact on the carnage on our roads. It is not true to say that young drivers cause all accidents. However, figures show that a high percentage of young drivers are involved in road accidents. Do people of 17 or 18 years of age have adequate experience to drive a vehicle at 60 or 70 miles an hour? I strongly contend that they do not.

Furthermore, a driver with R plates should not be permitted to carry four passengers. A young person who passes a driving test and displays R plates on a car does not become an experienced driver the next day — only years of driving can only do that. The issue of R-plated drivers carrying four passengers in their cars must be considered. The Government — especially the DOE — have a responsibility to take a long, hard look at the driving test to see if it is adequate. Is it true that a young driver who passes his or her driving test and displays R plates for a year is an experienced driver? I do not believe that it is true. A year is not a long enough time to gain experience in any walk of life.

The volume of traffic on our roads has risen to such a level that our road infrastructure is now under threat and cannot cope adequately with the volume of vehicles, especially heavy goods vehicles. Freight transportation is important in my constituency of Fermanagh and South Tyrone, and the volume of heavy goods vehicles travelling from the west of the Province to the docks and elsewhere is increasing. Our economy is therefore heavily dependent on heavy goods vehicles, and that creates more tension and problems on the roads.

I heard that a Member narrowly avoided a serious accident while travelling to the Assembly this morning. A heavy goods vehicle pulled out into the centre of the carriageway and the tail of the vehicle was hanging over one of the lanes. The Member had to swerve round the heavy goods vehicle to prevent an accident. Such situations continually happen on our roads.

I appeal sincerely to Members who feel the need to score silly political points to desist from doing so. This is not an issue for scoring political points. There will be plenty of opportunities in the future for Members to score political points against their opponents, but they should not use this issue to do that. If the Assembly does not present a united voice on this issue, we will send the wrong message to the public. Our constituents — no matter who they are or where they are from — will not thank us for it.

In Margaret Ritchie's contribution, she mentioned a visit that she had made to a mother who has lost someone near and dear to her. There are too many such homes across the Province. I do not think that that parent or anyone else in that home — no matter their political background — would thank the Assembly for doing a good job of merely highlighting the issue, not uniting on it.

I appeal for unity here today, in order to send a clear message to the Government, the Department of the Environment (DOE) and all those involved in road safety that we care.

I want to bring the attention of the Assembly to the Cool FM road safety roadshow, and to commend it for the work that it is doing. This powerful show brings together all the rescue agencies — the Ambulance Service, the Fire and Rescue Service, the medical service and the police — and travels to various schools and focal points. I commend it to the Assembly and to the general public of Northern Ireland. The show graphically illustrates the real issues of road safety and how important it is that everyone should treat the matter seriously.

My time is up; I commend the amendment to the House and ask for united support.

Ms Gildernew: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I commend the motion. It is unfortunate that although all parties agreed to have a debate on this subject, an amendment has been introduced which, despite Maurice Morrow's words about political point-scoring, leads to division in the House. Yesterday was a good day; everyone agreed on the two motions, and I thought that we would have three in a row today, but unfortunately that is not to be the case.

In proposing the motion, my comrade Raymond McCartney told us that road deaths have no boundary of geography, class or creed, and how, in this Building last year, Ursula Quinn had provided a personal and poignant testimony to the enduring effect of a road death on a family. That event gained all-party support and a pledge to support the work of the "Driving Kills" group. Raymond also warned against complacency about road deaths and how it compounded the suffering of the bereaved.

By and large, Members were united in their comments. Edwin Poots talked about the different road traffic system in the South, and how the current driving test was a nonsense. He said that it needed to test real ability, to bring into consideration dual carriageways and differing road conditions, and to be more practical. That was covered in the motion, so I am not sure why that matter was raised.

Sam Gardiner called on the DOE and the Department for Regional Development to be more proactive; he said that road signs are often obliterated, and that road markings could be improved. He believed that a better use of modern technology could help to warn drivers of excessive speed or difficult road conditions.

Mr P Ramsey: I had intended to speak in the debate, but I just want to say to the Member that a drunk driver killed my brother and his wife in Donegal 10 years ago. He served only weeks in prison for his offence. We later discovered that he had a previous conviction in the North for drunk driving. If we had harmonisation and common policies, as Francie Molloy called for, would that have led to a longer term of imprisonment for a person who, literally, got away with murder? Would there be a higher penalty for someone who killed two people and left two children in intensive care for a long period? Thankfully, they have recovered.

That is the reason for my intervention. I hope that the Member takes my point. I was upset, because of those personal circumstances, at not being able to participate in the debate. I support Raymond McCartney's motion, but as a Member for a border constituency I ask Ms Gildernew to agree that common and collective cross-border policies would help reduce the loss of lives.

Ms Gildernew: I thank the Member for his intervention. We support the harmonisation of road traffic systems and legislation so that offenders with previous convictions have those offences taken into consideration and can be dealt with appropriately.

12.45 pm

Many Members have lost people on the roads, including constituents, and we all have visited the sad houses of those killed on the roads. That is no different in Fermanagh and South Tyrone, where there are heartbreaking circumstances around some of the deaths. The fact that one is more likely to be killed around the border is an indictment that needs to be addressed. John Dallat said that he thought there would be more joint initiatives and more harmonisation of penalty points post-St Andrews. He talked about the "red-flag" Act and how speed and drink-driving contributed to road deaths. He spoke of the need for road traffic education using France and Scandinavia as examples.

Education was a common theme throughout the debate. John Dallat pointed to examples from the Twenty-six Counties, where the Road Safety Authority has 309 full-time staff and many more powers to reduce road deaths. He said that extending those powers throughout the island would help reduce deaths on the roads. He also talked about the driving test and how people can be caught drink-driving the following morning when they think it is safe to drive. He mentioned the need for a new approach to the issue and the need to harness experience across the island and work together. That was a positive contribution. John also talked about the adverts on television and the fact that they encourage young people to drive fast, and that road safety has to be a priority for the new Assembly and Executive.

Kieran McCarthy said that road safety needs to be the number one priority; that there was an increased volume of traffic on the roads; that people need to have respect for cars and other road users and that cars should be treated as lethal weapons. He pointed out that the legislation was out of date and used the drink-driving limit as an example. He also mentioned the reduction in the roads budget and how that had adversely affected the introduction of seat belts on buses.

Jeffrey Donaldson said that although there was a reduction in road deaths, the figure was still too high and that, unfortunately, Lagan Valley topped the league table for fatalities. He said that the statistics are frightening and that more deaths occur in rural areas. He talked about the percentage of young men in the road accident figures and said that 50% of accidents are down to careless driving. He also talked about education, the retraining of driving offenders, the draft Road Traffic (Northern Ireland) Order 2007, and the all-party group on road safety that hopefully will not lead to the same divisiveness that we saw from some Members this morning.

Billy Armstrong spoke about education and the changes to legislation. Conor Murphy talked about the difficulties with border roads. He mentioned the work of CAWT, and that people are much more likely to be involved in an accident in border areas. He talked about speed, road structure and due diligence. He said that education is vital and that young men are more likely to be involved in accidents. He suggested that the education process should be extended to primary schools.

One point Conor made was about detection and appropriate punishment, and how that should concern all agencies on the island. That would impact on what Mr Ramsey just said. Conor talked about road structure in rural areas and highlighted the difficulties and the amount of lobbying that had to be done to get street lighting on the Newry bypass. He talked about people who drive unfit vehicles and how those who sell such vehicles cannot evade their responsibilities.

Margaret Ritchie talked about the strategy, policies and the implementation plan for road safety; that we need robust measures, and that it should be the number one priority as it is in the Twenty-six Counties. She said we should examine the causes of accidents, the equal importance of the driver's state of mind and what had provoked accidents. Margaret highlighted the inadequate resources for road safety and the lack of authority, will and expertise, and pointed out the direct-rule Administration's lack of concern and will to do anything about it. She also highlighted that the sense of loss in accidents occurring during the Christmas period had been palpable.

A lot of the same themes came up. Michael McGimpsey talked about margin of error and the 18 to 25 age group — particularly in Scotland and Sweden.

Francie Molloy referred to World Health Organization statistics and the global number of road deaths. He spoke about changes to roads and stressed that consideration must be given to the fact that road needs are different now to what they were. Francie talked also about the urbanisation of roads in rural areas and the need for common road signage.

Maurice Morrow gave us two or three minutes of vitriol. He deliberately misconstrued Conor Murphy's contribution. I phased out his voice and quit listening after a while. It was a typical political point-scoring exercise from the DUP.

Road safety is a hugely important issue. It would have been good if all parties had united to ensure that we go forward with a commitment to make road safety a priority in the next Assembly. Everyone must work together. We need devolution, a new Executive and a new Minister to ensure that fewer people are killed on the roads.

I support the motion. Go raibh míle maith agat.

Question put, That the Amendment be made.

The Assembly divided: Ayes 36; Noes 26.

AYES

Billy Armstrong, Norah Beare, Roy Beggs, Billy Bell, Paul Berry, Esmond Birnie, Thomas Buchanan, Gregory Campbell, Wilson Clyde, Michael Copeland, Robert Coulter, Leslie Cree, George Dawson, Nigel Dodds, Jeffrey Donaldson, Reg Empey, David Ford, Arlene Foster, Samuel Gardiner, Paul Girvan, William Hay, David Hilditch, Danny Kennedy, Kieran McCarthy, William McCrea, Alan McFarland, Michael McGimpsey, Lord Morrow, Stephen Moutray, Ian Paisley Jnr, Edwin Poots, George Robinson, Iris Robinson, Peter Robinson, Mervyn Storey, Peter Weir.

Tellers for the Ayes: Billy Armstrong and David Hilditch.

NOES

Alex Attwood, Dominic Bradley, Mary Bradley, Francis Brolly, Thomas Burns, Willie Clarke, John Dallat, Tommy Gallagher, Michelle Gildernew, Carmel Hanna, Gerry Kelly, Alban Maginness, Fra McCann, Raymond McCartney, Alasdair McDonnell, Barry McElduff, Philip McGuigan, Francie Molloy, Conor Murphy, John O'Dowd, Tom O'Reilly, Pat Ramsey, Sue Ramsey, Margaret Ritchie, Caitriona Ruane, Kathy Stanton.

Tellers for the Noes: Sue Ramsey and Margaret Ritchie.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly notes the ongoing tragedy of deaths and serious accidents on our roads and calls on an incoming Executive to introduce a wide ranging strategy involving all relevant agencies, including measures reflecting international best practice, to tackle the problem; with particular attention paid to those most likely to be involved in road traffic accidents.

The sitting was suspended at 1.06 pm.

On resuming (Madam Speaker in the Chair) —
2.00 pm

Autism

Madam Speaker: The Business Committee has allowed two hours for the debate. The Member proposing the motion will have 15 minutes to speak, with 15 minutes allowed for the winding-up speech. All other Members will have a maximum of 10 minutes to speak.

Mr D Bradley: I beg to move

That this Assembly recognises the need for, and supports the introduction of, legislation which would guarantee the future security and rights of those on the autistic spectrum and would combat the tragic social injustice being perpetuated through lack of planning and funding, at a time when the number of individuals with autism is increasing dramatically.

Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Tá an-áthas orm an rún seo a mholadh inniu.

I am pleased to propose the motion and am happy to accept the amendment that has been tabled.

Over the past number of years, there has been an awakening in Northern Ireland to the prevalence and challenges of autism, not only in the minds of the health professionals, teachers and parents who deal with autism daily, but in the mind of the wider public. The increase in awareness of autism is largely due to autism advocacy groups and the excellent work that they do in, and for, the community.

My former colleagues John Fee and Joe Byrne sponsored the first debates on autism in the Northern Ireland Assembly, which were held shortly after the Department of Education published the task group's report on autism. Mr Fee's motion called on the then Minister of Education and the then Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety to instigate a comprehensive review of services provided to adults and children with Asperger's syndrome, and the training of professionals specialising in their treatment.

Mr Byrne's motion called on the then Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety to introduce a training programme for health visitors, school nurses, Key Stage 1 teachers and nursery school teachers to facilitate the early detection of autism and to make adequate provision, in collaboration with the Department of Education, to meet the needs of children with autism.

Reviewing previous motions is an interesting exercise because progress has been made in some areas. For example, the Northern Ireland Commissioner for Children and Young People (NICCY) commissioned a review of services for children with Asperger's syndrome, the provision of training has progressed and education services have developed their autistic spectrum disorder (ASD) support services.

However, more must be done. It is now four years since those motions were debated. According to a report published in 'The Lancet', the number of individuals with a form of ASD in Northern Ireland tripled between 2001 to 2004 — and rates are still rising.

Experts assert that early diagnosis and early intervention are the keys to starting to help children and parents to cope with autism. However, as many Members know, diagnosis can take up to three years and more, which means that the window of opportunity that early intervention affords is lost. Those with ASD, their parents and carers and society in general will personally bear the cost of such missed opportunities in years to come.

Early diagnosis and intervention would greatly increase the chances of individuals being able to continue their education, enter employment and live independently in the future.

We are advised that to carry out these diagnoses it is essential to have trained educational psychologists who are experienced in dealing with ASD, yet there are far too few professionals trained or available to carry out these assessments. Often, when one professional retires, that post remains unfilled for an indefinite period.

We understand also that special support in classroom work, through the use of classroom assistants, can be vital to help a child with an ASD adjust to school life and to learn in a progressive manner. However, education budget cuts have ripped the heart out of special needs units and stunted the recruitment of special needs assistants.

Even when assistants are appointed, the level of training often falls short of what is required. According to a survey, 74% of front-line workers in health and education feel that they are poorly trained and do not fully understand ASD. In addition, there is no requirement for trainee or practising teachers to undertake any training, and 70% of schools are not satisfied with the level of training in ASD that their teachers have. Many of the 25% of children with autism who have been excluded from school are excluded due to a lack of understanding and awareness on the part of the school.

There are more appeals to the Special Educational Needs and Disability Tribunal about schooling for children with autism than for children with any other type of special educational need. Of the parents who have appealed to the tribunal, 79% won their case. That shows that provision is far from adequate.

The situation post-school is no better. Only 5% of individuals with ASD are in employment or higher education, and only 3% of adults at the higher end of the autistic spectrum live independently.

Even though some progress has been made, there is no cohesive strategy for ASD in Northern Ireland. Families who move between health and social services boards encounter significant disparities in services. That is ridiculous when one considers the small population and geographical area that those boards operate in. The Western Health and Social Services Board has a cradle-to-grave strategy; the Southern Board has a strategy for those under the age of 18; the Northern Board is working on an initial framework; and the Eastern Board has no strategy. There is little cross-board strategic cohesion.

The recent initiative to create an ASD service framework and service standards is a positive move forward. However, it is not rooted in any strategy. To develop a framework without a strategy could be described as putting the cart before the horse. The negative experience of the Bamford Review of Mental Health and Learning Disability (Northern Ireland) has underlined to the ASD community in Northern Ireland the fact that any changes must be rooted in a cohesive, future-orientated strategy that guides ASD services, rather than services guiding strategy.

The all-Wales autism strategy is to be launched in January or February 2007, and there is a similar aim in Scotland. Autism Northern Ireland has formed a strategic Celtic Nations Autism Partnership with Scotland and Wales. The partnership involves the sharing of good practice and training in ASD, and also seeks to exert political pressure to make legislative changes for ASD in the respective member nations. The official launch of the partnership will take place in Cardiff on 30 January 2007, and I hope that Members of this House will attend.

Worldwide, the United States, Sweden, Canada, New Zealand and Australia have implemented, or are in the process of implementing, legislation relating to ASD. Those countries recognise the complex nature of ASD, and we have a chance to be the first region in the United Kingdom to seize the initiative and make positive changes for people living with ASD.

Despite many initiatives and high-profile awareness-raising activities, the desperate plight of people with ASD remains unresolved. There is a huge demand for consolidated efforts to provide appropriate services for the large number of individuals with an ASD. In the interim, the impact on the economy and on health cannot be estimated, but it is of sufficient magnitude to warrant Government direction and leadership.

The bottom-up strategy has influenced practice, but not policy. The policy shift must come from the top down, and that is why legislation is required that will ensure that, in line with Autism Northern Ireland's blueprint for change, the rights of people with autism and their families are catered for in the areas of health, education, training and criminal justice.

Government ownership of the ASD issue is the unavoidable way forward. We have the capacity to easily create an authoritative strategy for autism, and the four key charities in Northern Ireland, Wales, Scotland and England have considerable expertise and knowledge that could be effectively utilised by the Government to achieve such a strategy. Close co-operation with organisations in the Republic of Ireland would also be to the benefit of all.

The identity in legislation of ASD — as separate from other disorders and disabilities — will be a major step forward. There is also an opportunity to follow the example set by Sweden, where a significant impact on services, health and the economy has been made by the inclusion of ASD in the Swedish 1993 code of statutes, resulting in the practical initiation and implementation of appropriate support.

In the meantime, it would be helpful to have a cross-party group in Stormont that would ensure that today's motion impacts on Government policy. That group could develop links with colleagues in Scotland and Wales through the Celtic Nations Autism Partnership that could be used as a resource and a linkage to the Welsh Assembly and the Scottish Parliament on matters regarding ASD. The group could also liaise with groups in the Republic of Ireland.

I welcome the fact that Autism Northern Ireland is to make a presentation this month to the Dáil Éireann Education and Science Committee. Such co-operation benefits all, North and South.

I agree that we have been waiting too long for the development of the cross-border centre of excellence for autism at Middletown, County Armagh, as stated in the amendment. When up and running, that centre will provide a range of services, including learning support, educational assessment and training, and a training and advisory service for parents, teachers and other professionals, including support staff. Those are necessary and valuable services, and I hope that the Assembly will join me in urging the two Governments to expedite the development of the centre without further delay.

Finally, I pay tribute to the late Michael Ferguson MLA, who was a fellow autism ambassador and a strong advocate of the rights of people with autism. He is missed by those for whom he worked with the utmost diligence and dedication, and we remember his work today.

I commend the motion, as amended, to the House, and I ask Members to give it their full support. Go raibh míle maith agat.

2.15 pm

Mr McElduff: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Tá áthas orm an leasú seo a mholadh don rún, agus ba mhaith liom mo bhuíochas a ghabháil le Dominic as ucht tacaíocht a thabhairt don leasú.

I beg to move the following amendment: at end insert:

“; and further calls for the immediate funding and implementation of the long overdue centre of excellence for autism at Middletown, Co. Armagh.”

I commend the proposer of the motion, and I hope that the amendment in the name of John O'Dowd and myself simply adds value to it.

The amendment highlights the delay in establishing the long awaited and overdue centre of excellence for autism at Middletown, County Armagh. Quite rightly, Dominic Bradley invoked the name of Michael Ferguson, who was a great champion of this project. I welcome reference to him in the debate.

It is worth noting that the decision to establish a national centre of excellence was taken early in the lifetime of the last functioning Assembly. It was a decision that was jointly taken by the two Ministers with responsibility for education on the island at the time: Martin McGuinness in the North and Michael Woods, the Minister for Education and Science in the rest of Ireland. Unfortunately, the project appears to have been bedevilled for some years by legal arguments over land and property acquisition. That resulted in an unacceptable delay for several years. Site refurbishment was necessary as well. Neither the money nor the budget was the issue, as the money was ring-fenced when the decision was taken. The project gave strong expression to education as an area of co-operation, North and South, under the Good Friday Agreement.

Just this morning, I spoke to senior officials in the Department of Education to receive a further update on the all-Ireland centre of excellence for autism at Middletown. I was told that a limited company had been set up to oversee the development of the centre, that the process is under way to appoint a chief executive officer, and that I should expect an early announcement. Let us move speedily towards the development of this project and the setting up of a management board.

We are told that some operations will commence in mid-2007, and the amendment sends an urgent message to both sponsoring Departments to fully implement this centre, which has been talked about for many years now. People want to see it fully operational and offering the necessary support to children, parents, carers and teachers. That must happen without delay.

The motion calls for legislation to guarantee the future security and rights of those on the autistic spectrum. That complements Autism NI's campaign for a specific autism Act and a programme of care in the North for ASD as well as a local autism strategy. Sinn Féin fully supports that.

The motion also pinpoints the lack of planning and funding, or perhaps the absence of a cohesive strategy. Dominic Bradley, the proposer of the motion, highlighted the different approaches among health boards and education and library boards in the North. That does not inspire confidence. Often, parents say that the education and health boards are not working with the necessary collaboration or cohesion.

Of course, there is mention of the increasing prevalence of ASD. I think it was 'The Lancet' report that said that, previously, one child in every 1,000 was affected by autism; now it is one in every 100 — although I have also seen the figure of 166. Whether 100 or 166, there is what can be described as a tidal wave. It requires greater political will, greater investment, joined-up approaches and co-ordination between Departments.

It is also appropriate to highlight the pressure on parents and carers of a child who is on the autistic spectrum. A few years ago, I organised a seminar in the town of Fintona, County Tyrone, in the Ecclesville Centre, called "A forum for carers".

I was struck by a young mother's comment that she used to be mild-mannered but that she was now aggressive, because every day of every week she has to fight agencies and Departments for services. That was her experience of trying to get the necessary support for her son.

Last week, 'The Irish Times' ran a compelling series of articles on autism by Adrienne Murphy. She asked:

"Can there be anything more frustrating than having to stand by while your child disintegrates before your very eyes?"

That is especially frustrating when that child is being denied access to early intervention and diagnosis, and to therapies that could make a difference.

Many parents believe that Governments are deliberately disputing therapies such as applied behavioural analysis (ABA) because of resource implications. In other words, they dispute the validity of those scientifically proven therapies because it costs a great deal of money to provide those therapies. Parents talk about how their children blossom when they undertake intensive one-to-one programmes, such as ABA, but such programmes are often not recognised or resourced, and parents sometimes have to borrow thousands of pounds to pay for the tuition themselves.

About two years ago, I spoke to an educationalist about the development of an ABA unit in a primary school in County Tyrone, and he simply said: "What unit?" until I used the appropriate term, which was, I think: “additionally resourced unit”. He did not like the idea of an autism unit or an ABA unit inside a school, and I had to use correct terminology to even get a response from him.

Furthermore, if an argument is made for resources to be directed towards an individual child, the education providers will have people in court as soon as they open their mouths. The providers say that it may lead to a tribunal and that anything that is said will be taken down in evidence and used against them. Unfortunately, if someone is advocating for resources for a parent or a child, the relationship becomes adversarial almost straight away.

To return to the ‘The Irish Times’ articles, Adrienne Murphy’s son Caoimh attends Achieve ABA, which is based in St Colmcille’s School in Donaghmede in Dublin. He had late-onset autism and, as far as she is concerned, he is now in an appropriate place, and she is immensely relieved about that. She sees a tremendous difference in her son’s behaviour before ABA and after ABA.

I am the first to acknowledge that I am not competent to determine which therapies are appropriate, but an open and honest debate on all the available therapies is needed. If resource implications are the blockage, education providers must be honest and admit that. Adrienne Murphy talked about her memories of her son Caoimh in the time before he:

“pulled the shutters down on the world and retreated deeply and almost unreachably into his own mind.”

There is tremendous pressure on parents and carers, and education and health providers must listen closely to parents. The parental instinct is usually right, and it deserves greater weight when decisions are made on what support should be offered.

I take this opportunity to commend all those groups that are raising awareness, supporting parents, lobbying and campaigning — groups such as Irish Autism Action, the Irish Autism Alliance, Autism NI (PAPA), the Irish Society for Autism, and NAS (The National Autistic Society). I commend the NAS ‘Make School Make Sense’ campaign, which emphasises the need for the right school, the right approach and the right training, and which aims to provide proper education for children — the education that they deserve. It is a matter of ensuring that children with autism have the appropriate opportunities to manage their lives and to lead, if at all possible, independent lives.

Go raibh míle maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

Mrs I Robinson: I rise to support the motion, and I congratulate the proposer for affording us the opportunity to debate this important subject. My party does not support the amendment, as Middletown in County Armagh could not, because of its location, cater for the majority of the population of Northern Ireland who may need to take advantage of a centre of excellence. My party would support a centre at that location without difficulty: however, a regional centre should be located where it advantages the greatest number of autism sufferers. The issue should not be a political football.

As has already been indicated, autistic spectrum disorder is a persistent condition that appears in childhood and affects crucial areas of a person’s development, including communication, social interaction and creativity. Recent studies have estimated that autism affects 3·4 out of every 1,000 children who are aged between three and 10 years. Although autism varies widely in its symptoms and severity, early diagnosis and treatment can help autistic people to live independent and productive lives.

The motion focuses on legislation. Clearly, the Assembly must be mindful of the funding implications of matters to which it would commit itself through any new legislation. It is important to have an accurate idea of the likely resources involved. I will refer to examples of international autism legislation. In the United States, President Bush signed the landmark Combating Autism Act of 2006 just before Christmas. I want to deal with the Swedish situation first, however.

Since 1995, autistic people in Sweden have been protected by the Act concerning Support and Service for Persons with Certain Functional Impairments, known as the LSS law. As well as those who have autistic spectrum disorder, the act also applies to people who are mentally incapacitated, have permanent brain damage sustained through external force or physical illness, and those who have some other lasting impairment that is not due to the normal ageing process.

The law ensures good living conditions for those concerned, assistance in their daily living, and influence over the support and services that they receive. An individual makes a request for support and services, and their needs are then evaluated. Individuals must meet specified criteria. Those who are deemed eligible are entitled to various forms of support, such as advice and personal support from experts such as social workers, psychologists, physiotherapists, pre-school advisers, speech therapists, occupational therapists and dieticians. Advice and support should be complementary to, and not a replacement for, rehabilitation and social services.

Individuals who have serious physical impairments and have not reached the age of 65 may be entitled to help from one or more personal assistants. That includes help with meals, personal hygiene, dressing and undressing, and communicating with others. Those who do not receive personal assistance may be entitled to companion service — a service that is personalised and tailored to meet the individual's needs, so that he or she can have an active social life.

In order to reduce social isolation, assist participation in leisure activities, and provide advice in daily situations, individuals in Sweden can get help from a "contact person" who can make it easier for them to live independently. Sometimes, a "support family" can provide back-up. Respite is provided in the home, both as a regular service and in unexpected situations. Short stays away from home permit individuals to have the opportunity for recreation and a change of environment while providing relief for relatives. A stay can be arranged in a short-term home with another family or in a camp, for example.

Children who are over the age of 12 years are entitled to supervision before and after school, and during holidays. Children and young people who cannot live with their parents may be entitled to live with another family or in a residence that provides special services. That should be a complement to the parental home, both for children who live with their parents part of the time and for those who cannot live at home at all.

Specialised residential accommodation varies, but includes group housing and service housing. An individual may also be entitled to a specially adapted home. Individuals of working age who are not gainfully employed or studying are entitled to assistance with participation in daily activities.

In the US, the ink is barely dry on the Combating Autism Act of 2006, which had the support of all major US autism advocacy groups and authorised more than £1 billion of funding over the next five years to combat autism through research, screening, early detection and early intervention. Spending on autism will increase by at least 50% and will include provisions relating to the diagnosis and treatment of persons with ASD and will intensify biomedical research on autism, including possible environmental causes.

Little is understood about the causes and mechanisms of autism. Many studies have been carried out into researching possible genetic and environmental causes of autism, and scientists are learning more about the disorder and how its effects can be lessened or eliminated. More work must be done to pinpoint the true causes of autism and come up with a cure.

The US legislation also includes provisions designed to improve and co-ordinate the US Government's response to autism. That legislation instructs the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) to expand and update efforts to monitor incidence and prevalence of autism around the country, and to educate parents and healthcare providers about the early warning signs of autism and the need for early and regular screenings.

The US legislation demands extra autism-related research, including investigating possible environmental causes of autism. There remains much that we do not know about the biological pathways and origins of the disorder, and further investigation into all possible causes of autism is needed.

We should leave no stone unturned in our efforts to understand autism, whether that means exploring possible environmental factors; paternal age; genetic factors, or any others that may hold answers. Perhaps further enquiry will show that it is not a single factor but a combination of factors that are responsible. For example, a child may have a genetic predisposition, which is triggered by an external, environmental factor that causes autism.

The Combating Autism Act of 2006 strengthens the Interagency Autism Coordinating Committee (IACC), comprising relevant Government officials; experts; parents and families of those suffering from autism. The committee's far-reaching mandate will be to compose and annually report on a strategic plan for autism provision and how improvements can be made. Public participation, particularly among the parents and families of those affected by autism, was deemed necessary to emphasise the human side of autism research and to ensure that resources are used wisely.

The growing number of people in Northern Ireland who are diagnosed with ASD deserve the same level of provision as others around the world. I am sure that everyone in the Chamber would agree with that. It is important that we learn from the experience of others and are not dragging behind in delivering a first-class service in Northern Ireland.

Every child is precious, but children with special needs require extra attention and services to help with their quality of life. We have much to do in comparison to the US and Sweden, but let us hope that when we get our Executive up and running, we can tackle this matter head on and treat it with the seriousness that it deserves.

Rev Dr Robert Coulter: I begin by declaring an interest as a board member of Dunfane Special School in Ballymena and chairman of the interim board for the amalgamation of the three special schools in Ballymena. I am also the grandfather of an autistic child, of whom I am immensely proud.

Mr Storey: Would the Member join me in commending Dunfane Special School in Ballymena? There are many other examples of good provision, but, having experienced the excellent provision that Dunfane Special School has provided in our constituency, would he join me in wishing it well, especially in light of the difficulties that it faces in dealing with autism?

Rev Dr Robert Coulter: I thank the Member for the intervention and I fully support his sentiments.

Dunfane Special School has done a marvellous job under very difficult circumstances. The school needs all the support that we can give it.

From the point of view of those who are, tragically, affected by autism, I am pleased that today's motion has been tabled. However, I am disappointed that an amendment to it has been accepted so easily, because I think that it takes away from the original motion. It deflects our sentiments away from the people to whom they should be directed; it takes away the humanity of the original motion and leaves us with a political football that should be dealt with at another time.

The issue of autism should be discussed in the context of real people with real names, individualities and identities. It is not simply a matter of statistics or politics, although statistics are important in helping us to focus on the scale of the problem. For instance, more people in Northern Ireland suffer from ASD than the combined total of people who have Parkinson's disease, multiple sclerosis and Down's syndrome.

In Northern Ireland, clarity about autism is required. We need definitive research into the causes and treatment of autism; we need to recognise the need for family respite care; and we need to initiate a policy for the treatment and support of people suffering from autism after they pass the age of 19. I hope that this simple outline will supply the headings of an action plan to deal with what is increasingly being recognised as a widespread problem. In 2006, the medical journal 'The Lancet' estimated that autism affected one in 100 children.

There is no Province-wide approach to the problems posed by autism. Members have already mentioned the difficulties that people face when they move from one board area to another. Families with children suffering from autism who move between education and library board areas encounter significant differences between the services available. That is a ludicrous and unacceptable situation in a Province of some 1.7 million people. We need to move on from this situation to become a leader and an example of best practice in the UK. Members have already mentioned that countries such as the United States of America, Sweden, New Zealand, Canada and Australia are proposing legislation on ASD that recognises the complex nature of the causes and treatment of autism.

The all-Wales autism strategy is due to be published this month or next month. Autism Northern Ireland has already formed a strategic Celtic Nations Autism Partnership with Scotland and Wales, and we compliment it on its initiative. I have the honour of being my party's autism ambassador, and, in March 2006, I joined 50 other people from the Province at the Great Britain launch of a campaign for a Northern Ireland-specific autism Act. This network of party ambassadors was established in 2002 and has initiated strategic partnerships within Northern Ireland and with Wales, Scotland and Sweden. We took our petition for an autism Act directly to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland and for Wales, Peter Hain, at the Welsh Office. Mr Hain was left in no doubt that there was massive cross-party support for this measure.

That meeting was, indeed, a notable first, because representatives of all five main political parties in Northern Ireland met and agreed a strategy. We focused our lobbying on the early diagnosis and treatment of autism. We revealed that, according to figures that my party had obtained from Lord Rooker in 2005, around 700 children in Northern Ireland were waiting for this vital primary assessment.

In the Northern Board area 117 children were waiting; 188 were waiting in the Western Board area; 128 in the Southern Board area; and 253 in the Eastern Board area. The model for legislation for a Northern Ireland PAPA Act — as it has become known — already exists. That model is in the Autism Northern Ireland (PAPA) document 'The Blueprint for Change'.

The Government need to recognise ASD as a complex, lifelong developmental disability in its own right. It is neither a learning problem nor a mental-health disorder. A Northern Ireland policy on the issue, which would be the precursor of an Act, should raise public awareness of autism, create a dedicated programme of care for autism sufferers and create a funding mechanism to underpin a distinct and separate programme of care for them.

It is critical that all staff who work with young children are aware of the features of autism. It is also important that a quick response mechanism is put in place that ensures not only early detection but early treatment. Referral routes need to be established for children and adults, and each diagnosis should result in the appointment of a health professional to supervise and support those cases. Multi-agency and multidisciplinary teams that comprise ASD healthcare specialists who have received specific training are essential. That should result in a needs-led care plan that is based on best practice.

I should reinforce the need for proper clinical and scientific research into ASD. Genetic research is particularly important. I was delighted at last year's announcement that a Bristol-based team is to research the genetic causes of autism and other chronic childhood conditions. It intends to build a biobank — or DNA database — that contains the genetic profile of some 14,000 children. Given that Autism Northern Ireland has estimated that one adult in 86 in Northern Ireland suffers from ASD, Northern Ireland scientists should either establish their own database or aim to participate in the Bristol study.

Finally, I ask that carers be remembered. It is difficult being the parent of an autistic child. Respite care for families of autism sufferers, as well as families of those who have other chronic disorders such as Alzheimer's disease, is a critical part of the overall care package. It is amazing what a difference a week — or even a weekend — away from the responsibility of looking after a child with ASD can make. That can be a relief for siblings, who can find it difficult to communicate with their autistic brothers or sisters.

We should never lose sight of the fact that when a chronic disease affects people it affects more than the patients themselves. It affects their carers and their families. We need a whole-family approach to the problem if we are to create the climate in which to optimise treatment.

I support the motion.

Mr McCarthy: It gives me great pleasure to voice my support for the motion and, indeed, for the future of those in Northern Ireland who live with autism.

You, Madam Speaker, were the Alliance Party's ambassador for autism for a number of years. You supported the efforts of so many people, including parents, to secure better deals for individuals who suffer as a result of autism spectrum disorder. When your talents were required to carry out the duties of Speaker of the Assembly, you very kindly handed over your role of ambassador for autism to me, and I am privileged to carry on the work that you started.

I, like everyone else here today, pledge my support for a better future for all people who have autism. I acknowledge the work that Autism Northern Ireland has done under the dynamic leadership of Arlene Cassidy and her staff. Indeed, other groups are advancing the needs of those who deal with ASD in Northern Ireland.

2.45 pm

The need for advancement for people with ASD has never been greater; we are told that the number of sufferers is increasing at an alarming rate. In Northern Ireland, up to 200 babies born each year are later diagnosed with autism. This is a staggering figure. While this is the case, every help and assistance must be provided to those individuals and their carers.

At present, the Departments relevant to the needs of ASD sufferers are grossly underfunded. It is a shame that families are having to wait for up to three years for their child to be assessed. It is also disgusting that, at the end of 2006, there is no Northern Ireland strategy for autism; there is no ring-fenced funding; and there is no legislative protection for the condition to guard against vested interests.

On 30 June 2006 'The Blueprint for Change' report was launched in the Long Gallery. All Members who attended gave their full support. The report stated that:

"the Blueprint does not seek to replicate existing legislation; but rather addresses the unique issues facing individuals with ASD and their carers that existing legislation did not reach".

Autism NI has found that there is a huge differential between health boards in Northern Ireland for people with ASD. There ought to be the same facilities and provisions for everyone, regardless of the board area in which one lives.

Working with other parts of the UK has led to real progress. The all-Wales autism strategy is shortly to be launched, and Scotland is also working in that direction. Indeed, other parts of the world are in the process of implementing legislation for ASD. We have a chance to be the first in these islands to make positive changes for ASD sufferers.

In conclusion, today while the Transitional Assembly has no power, let us commit our parties to do in the near future what is required to ensure that all ASD sufferers get a better deal. Dominic Bradley has invited me, and I would be delighted to accept, to be part of an all-party group of the Assembly to deal specifically with ASD. Similar groups have dealt with other areas of complaint and we have had some success, so that is an important development on the way forward. I hope that other parties will join in to advance the needs of autism sufferers.

Dr McCrea: For too long, people with ASD have been forgotten citizens. Their unique condition is referred to as a hidden disability. In its mission statement, Autism NI focuses on the need for:

"people within the autistic spectrum and their carers [to] have access to appropriate services, enabling people with autism to be valued members of their community".

Yet it is apparent that despite the many initiatives and the high-profile awareness-raising activities, the desperate plight of a person with ASD remains largely unresolved. Autism NI joined with its Welsh neighbour, Autism Cymru, to produce the report 'Government and Autism: Opportunities and Solutions', which concluded that:

"Ownership by Government of the ASD 'issue' is the unavoidable way forward".

Therein lies the importance of today's motion. We need to move towards a solution where people with autism feel both respected and supported. The report of the education Task Group on Autism published in 2002 recognised that autism was underreported and an underdeveloped aspect of special needs.

Even then the task group found that much progress still had to be made before it would be possible to say that all children and young people with ASD were being identified and their needs being fully met. The report recognised that a demand exists for more prompt access to diagnostic services at an early age and that those services should be followed immediately by effective home- and school-based intervention.

The report also highlighted the fact that there was: "an 'autistic spectrum wave' rising through the school system".

That has led to a large increase in the number of pupils and trainees being diagnosed with ASD, resulting in a large increase in demand for appropriate services and educational provision.

Help and support for people with ASD is a right. It is a way in which to level the playing field and to enable those with autism to make the same choices and lead the same lives as all other citizens. However, in order to ensure that the rights of those on the autistic spectrum are fully recognised, there must be planned development in all service areas. New resources must underpin that development in order to drive up the level of service that every family receives.

Children with autism require services that are provided by members of many different professions, working in a variety of agencies. Autistic children's need for such services continues into their adult life, because autism is not a condition that disappears with maturity.

Although the strategies for catering for the needs of individuals with ASD are primarily educational, there are implications for the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (DHSSPS) and the Department for Employment and Learning (DEL). Our health and social services boards and trusts are at different stages in current provision. The Southern Health and Social Services Board (SHSSB) is well advanced, having released its children's autism strategy 2005-10. I welcome the fact that work on the development of a service framework for ASD by the Northern Health and Social Services Board (NHSSB) continues apace.

There has been significant progress in some areas, and that must be recognised, but a great deal still needs to be done so that people with autism, and their families and carers, can access services to which they should be entitled.

Short-break and respite services are an essential part of family support, representing a major area of unmet need for families that autism affects, yet parents' greatest concern is the lack of reliable respite care. In truth, that service is often not delivered until families are at breaking point. Many have described to me how much more difficult life becomes when, as happens too often, their respite is delayed, curtailed or cancelled because of staff shortages or transport problems. The impact of the Government's failure to improve services is real and present, and the failure to deliver appropriate services consistently and at the right time causes families huge distress and anguish.

Let us be truthful: current funding levels for services for children with autism and their families are set too low. The allocation of resources has not kept pace with the growing numbers of children with autism. Prevalence rates for autism in Northern Ireland have tripled over the past three years, with almost 4,000 school-age children now with ASD. Waiting lists for diagnosis top 35 months. So much for the Government talking about how quickly problems can be diagnosed.

About 20% to 25% of children with ASD have also been diagnosed with epilepsy, and a significant proportion of children diagnosed with ASD also have an associated learning disability. As such, autism must be treated as a common disability with clear implications for health, education and social services. For too long, however, children and their families have struggled to access good-quality, co-ordinated services.

Autism, as a spectrum condition, is different from all other disabilities and does not fit neatly into the existing structures of mental health or learning disability — a point that Autism NI was keen to stress to the Bamford Review of Mental Health and Learning Disability, which concluded that the needs of all those with ASD, and their carers, should be the subject of a separate and overarching autism paper. However, unless new funding is prioritised, the Bamford Review's recommendations in the six key areas for service development may never be fully recognised. There are funding implications for those recommendations for the Assembly today.

As Members know, autism is a complex and stressful condition, not only for those affected, but also for their families and carers. A family left alone to face the stressful challenge of raising a child with autism is, from the very beginning, the victim of despair and exhaustion because of the misconceptions surrounding autism, which include the lack of specialised services available in the local area, but mainly because of the impossibility of planning for the child's future.

Sadly, there is no known cure for autism. However, children with ASD have huge potential. Appropriate services and early years education can greatly improve later functioning and help those affected to live their lives with as much dignity and independence as possible. That is what we should aim for. Each child has the right to a specifically tailored programme of help, and each parent should have the right to sleep at night knowing that the proper provision will be in place quickly for his child.

Much of the awareness in highlighting this condition has been generated by Autism NI. I pay tribute to its members, and, in particular, to the members that I know in the mid Ulster and Ballyclare groups. Their commitment and enthusiasm has been unstinting and acts as a source of active encouragement and support to others.

There are other models of excellence. For example, my colleague from Strangford mentioned Sweden, where ASD has been clearly identified as a condition and afforded appropriate primary and secondary legislation since 1993. In the United States, a five-year programme to support people living with autism has been announced recently, and that should encourage us in Northern Ireland to provide something better for those who need it most.

The significant increase in the number of children identified with ASD will require an improvement in our provision to meet that need. We may even require a spectrum of provision to meet a spectrum of need. While there is no cure, there is always potential for positive progress.

I support the motion.

Mr B Bell: I support the motion. I am aware that the prestigious medical journal 'The Lancet' estimated in 2006 that one in every 100 people suffers from Autism Spectrum Disorder. I am also aware that Autism NI has estimated that the problem in Northern Ireland is significantly worse than that figure of one in 100. It is estimated that 4,000 school-age children suffer from ASD, and the Assembly must address the issue.

Once a disorder is as well defined and documented as ASD, it is unthinkable that in any civilised society legislative provision is not put in place with underpinning public funding available to deal with the problem.

It is also unthinkable that in a Province of 1.7 million people, different regimes for dealing with autism exist across the education and library boards. That situation cannot pertain following the review of public administration, when massive reductions in bureaucracy are envisaged. The situation will be the same regardless of which type of review we agree to.

3.00 pm

I was pleased to hear that there has already been a significant amount of self-help. Dr Coulter demonstrated the ways in which autism ambassadors have been developed in the political parties here, and how a blueprint for change already provides the structure for any future Northern Ireland autism Act. I was moved by the way in which Dr Coulter reminded us that autism is a whole-family disorder, and of the need for respite care for families and carers. I was also moved by the sincerity with which he spoke of his pride in his grandson, whom I know, and who suffers from ASD.

The legislative path that this Assembly needs to follow is already laid out in some detail. I do not propose to revisit the particular aspects of any possible Act, but simply to say that the sooner we can legislate on this matter the better. We should never forget how many measures like this are sitting in the pipeline, waiting for action by this Assembly. It must give a greater sense of urgency to our efforts to find a way forward to a political settlement as soon as possible. Every day without a settlement is another day without an autism Act and another day that ASD sufferers and their families have to do without adequate levels of support.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Molloy] in the Chair)

Regarding the lack of planning and funding for services for those on the autistic spectrum, I want to point out that, according to Dr Larry Martel of Down and Lisburn Trust, a specialist in the field of attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD), some experts have said that 20% of children with Asperger's syndrome, recognised as part of the autistic spectrum, also show aspects of ADHD. In Dr Martel's opinion, around 10% of his patients display Asperger's traits.

There are approximately 1,000 children diagnosed with ADHD in the Down and Lisburn Trust area alone. It is my certain knowledge through personal experience that families of children diagnosed with ADHD are in an identical position with a lack of funding and services for support post-diagnosis. That being the case, I request that any autism legislation should also include planning and funding for the promotion of awareness of ADHD, and support services and research into the social implications and problems surrounding the condition.

In reply to a question for written answer from Lord Maginnis in 2005, Lord Rooker revealed that over 700 children in Northern Ireland were waiting for vital primary assessment of ASD. Those are sobering figures; they are a reproach to this Assembly, and they imply that action should have already been taken.

Autism often involves considerable financial sacrifice for the families affected. That is a primary reason why the disorder requires specific legislation. It is not simply a matter of the disruption of family life; it is also a matter of cost.

Autism costs can include medical treatments and equipment and home adaptation. At present, family carers are subsidising the care budget. Legislation will ensure greater equity in the allocation of resources. There are hidden costs of autism — divorce and family splits can occur because of the enormous pressures that autism can impose on a family. That has cost implications for the state, as carers can be prevented from normal employment, which has an indirect impact through the loss of earnings and tax revenue.

One other cost aspect that needs to be considered is that although early autism intervention — both medical and educational — is expensive, there may be a recruitment factor later because intervention enables those on the autism disorder spectrum to lead a more normal life. Crisis intervention is by its nature more expensive than well-structured, well-planned early intervention that is amenable to unit cost savings. Correct diagnosis of autism at an early age can lead to savings by avoiding misdiagnosis such as schizophrenia and the resulting incorrect treatment that often occurs.

There should be special emphasis on the more able children with autism. The link to autism has given us great individuals in history. Some people reckon that Mozart, Beethoven, and Bartók suffered from autism. Thomas Jefferson, the founding father of the United States and Isaac Newton, who discovered gravity, Al Gore, the former vice-President of the United States, and Bill Gates, the richest man in the world, along with George Bernard Shaw and the painter Van Gogh are among the famous people who are said to have suffered in some degree from autism. History is littered with great men who may have suffered; and great talent could be lost to our society by a failure to identify intelligent sufferers of autism at an early age.

We owe it to the future of humanity to identify intelligent sufferers of autism as early as possible, since society could be immeasurably enriched by their contribution. The fact that so many great men and women have been sufferers should remove all stigma from the disorder. It is important that we treat this subject with the care and attention that it deserves and that the Assembly puts an autism Act on the statute book at the earliest possible opportunity. That is why I strongly support the original motion.

Ms Ruane: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Cuirim fáilte roimh an díospóireacht seo, nó is díospóireacht an-tábhachtach í. Is bunéileamh iad an t-oideachas agus an comhionannas deise, rochtana agus soláthair. Is ceart bunúsach é an cumas a bheith ag foghlaimoirí a lánacmhainneacht a bheith acu trí rochtain a bheith acu ar leibhéal an churaclaim, ar na hinstiúidí agus ar na cineálacha teagaisc agus foghlama is oiriúnaí chun a leithéid a thabhairt i gcrann. Ba chóir do dhaoine aonair a bheith ábalta a leithéid a dhéanamh ag aois ar bith agus ag staid ar bith ina saol. Iarrann a leithéid de sholáthar infheistíocht chuí inbhuanaithe san acmhainn is saibhre againn — ár muintir féin.

Equality of opportunity, access and provision are basic entitlements. Learners have a fundamental right to achieve their full potential by having access to the curriculum levels, institutions, forms of teaching, learning and healthcare best suited to deliver success. Individuals should be able to do so at any age or stage of their lives. Such provision calls for adequately sustained investment in our richest resource — our people.

Over the past few weeks, Barry McElduff and I, along with colleagues from other parties in the Subgroup on Schools Admission Policy, have been discussing the post-primary arrangements to replace the 11-plus. The subgroup invited representatives from various bodies with an interest in education and children to present evidence. They all spoke with such conviction and passion about education and the support that our children need. The majority of witnesses said that the current system is failing a significant number of children. In particular, our education system is failing children with autism and those awaiting diagnosis.

Any educationalist or health expert will say that early intervention is the key to dealing with autism. The diagnostic process in the North of Ireland takes far too long. There are not enough educational psychologists, which severely disadvantages children with special needs and those with ASD.

That is particularly frustrating for parents who know instinctively, long before anyone else, that their child needs specialist help, and that the earlier the intervention, the better. They also live daily with the effects of late intervention: a child crying before going to bed; not wanting to go to school; and, in some cases, being bullied and their self-esteem severely affected. Many Members are also parents and know how heartbreaking it is when our children's self-esteem is affected. We dread them saying that they do not want to go to school.

ASD is a lifelong, complex developmental disability. Adequate funding is needed to ensure a personalised, tailor-made package, so that parents, carers and people with autism can avail themselves of much-needed services. A personalised package would allow people with autism and Asperger's syndrome greater control over their lives and offer them better alternatives. Crucially, it will give children hope and access to support and appropriate intervention.

Like Barry McElduff, I pay tribute to groups that are working to highlight needs and change the services that are currently available throughout the island of Ireland. Sinn Féin believes that there needs to be a joined-up approach, North and South. The all-Ireland centre of excellence for autism, which was mentioned earlier, should have been up and running long before now, offering support and training to people living and working with autism across the island.

Autism recognises no borders. The centre of excellence, which has been hailed as a dynamic concept, will provide exemplars of education intervention; a lead for the training of parents and professionals; a research facility; and an outreach support service complementing current and developing service provision.

Consider the professionals who would potentially be involved in the centre: a learning support and assessment division; an assessment centre with educational psychologists; speech and language therapists; occupational and behavioural therapists; teachers; classroom assistants; and visiting professionals. There would be a learning support centre, with teachers; classroom assistants; educational psychologists; speech and language therapists and music therapists. There would be a training, advisory and research division, with ASD advisers and trainers, and a research and information service. There would also be care staff and administration and other support staff.

When this initiative was advanced by Martin McGuinness and his counterpart in the South, Michael Woods, it was hailed as a ground-breaking initiative, and everyone living and working with autism could see the enormous potential of the facility. Unfortunately, under British direct rule, the project has been caught up in bureaucratic wrangling.

My late colleague, Michael Ferguson, refused to let successive direct-rule Ministers off the hook, and we are now seeing signals that the wait is over. I have no doubt that, in true Tyrone style, my party's education spokesperson, Barry McElduff, will take the ball and run with it. I, as equality spokesperson, will assist him.

3.15 pm

There is much work to be done. In 2005, campaigners and autism support groups from across Ireland travelled to the European Parliament in Brussels at the invitation of Mary Lou McDonald. A total of 24 delegates representing 10 autism non-governmental organisations (NGOs) from all over the island made the trip, and they told stories of state neglect on both sides of the border; lack of support; and woefully inadequate provision of essential services. The Irish Government and the British Government are failing the families who are caring for children and adults with autism. The situation here is not acceptable and needs to be changed.

The British Government has a fundamental responsibility to ensure support and provision of services, yet in this state there is no adequate and specific facility for autism. There is no cohesive strategy. We may sit here, talk and have a wonderful debate, but we all know what needs to be done: sit down, form a power-sharing Government, establish a North/South Ministerial Council and stop making excuses. Let us move forward and get the arrangements up and running, so that we can help those who need help.

This involves us as political parties in the North of Ireland. There should be Ministers from the DUP, my party and all the parties here running health and education, equality, OFMDFM and our justice system — and those are the Departments that must work with families who need support on the whole issue of autism. It is not acceptable that we continue to let the British Government dictate the pace.

Furthermore, we have human rights and equality legislation, and we need to use it. I know from my experience as a human rights worker prior to being a politician that the only way to realise change is by fighting from a rights-based perspective. I commend Disability Action's new centre for human rights and I look forward to the centre taking test cases that will change people's lives for ever.

Finally, I commend the people who deserve our respect the most: those who have had to fight for their children — who should not have had to fight, but whose circumstances dictated that they must. They are men and women, family members, brothers and sisters, but invariably they are mothers. I work with many families whose children have special needs, and nine out of 10 of the people who come to my constituency office are the mothers.

Billy Bell talked about the historic men; I want to talk about the brave and powerful women who have done so much and who have taken on the system and come up against a terrible brick wall that they had to break down. I commend them — and fair play to them. Sinn Féin will join with them in their fight, but the best way that we can do that is to get the institutions up and running, work together and stop this nonsense. Go raibh maith agat.

Mrs Hanna: I welcome the motion from my party colleague, and I support the amendment.

As elected representatives we are becoming more aware of the autistic spectrum disorder, a developmental disability. However, there is still a general lack of understanding on the part of the public. That is by the very fact that it can be a hidden condition and is such a varied condition. However, that is improving through the well-organised campaign mounted by Autism Northern Ireland, which is a charity made up of parents, professionals, other support groups, and friends and acquaintances, as well as constituents.

The dire need for the implementation of a well-co-ordinated strategy has been brought home to me. Furthermore, awareness needs to be raised with regard to the dilemmas and issues facing parents and carers of people with autism. We are learning more about this complex and challenging disorder from other places, particularly regarding legislation and the need for a clear strategic direction; we must continue to learn.

Today is our opportunity to move the issue forward, and so I make a plea, particularly to the DUP and Sinn Féin, to make a move; get on with it and let the rest of us get back to work.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mrs Hanna: Although the number of people with autism has tripled and is still rising, there is no cohesive strategy. Some services are in place, but they are patchy and must be better co-ordinated. The length of the waiting lists for diagnosis is unacceptable. More paediatricians, educational psychologists and many other professionals are needed. A mechanism must then be put in place to enable health and education professionals to respond quickly in order to create a clear referral route for children and adults and to provide straightforward support, direction and service for parents and carers. Together, those measures will form a proper, comprehensive care plan.

It is essential that the diagnostic team receive specialist training in the assessment and diagnosis of autism. Appropriate accredited training must be available to other healthcare providers, particularly so that they can recognise other possible healthcare needs related to autism. Training must also be provided for parents and carers to empower them to do the best for their children.

The education system must provide a service that supports people with ASD to realise their potential and that provides them with the appropriate social skills and life-skills training.

Parents of children with autism experience undeniable stress. All parents want the best for their children, and rightly so. I have met many parents who are at their wits' end as to how to help their children. All parents have experienced a feeling of helplessness when their children have been ill, but most know that a specific treatment will remedy the illness.

However, some parents worry that they may have an autistic child, because, for one reason or another, the child does not respond to affection or appears to be in a world of his or her own — it is hard to imagine how helpless those parents feel. Parents know that there should be help for their child but that professional support is needed to unlock that child's potential. Those parents are all too aware that the days, weeks, months and, sadly, years, waiting for help may represent lost opportunities.

That situation must not be allowed to continue. Let us get the Assembly back, so that we can roll out a strategy — with any necessary legislation — to protect people with autism and to ensure that the structured support is in place through to adulthood. Every person has a right to a comprehensive service.

Mr McGlone: It should be noted, a LeasCheann Comhairle, that 80% to 90% of individuals diagnosed with ASD will develop mental-health problems. Only 5% of people with ASD are in employment or higher education. As a former Minister for Employment and Learning, Carmel has experience in that field and knows that, set in the context of Government initiatives intended to encourage people into the workplace, that is an extremely low figure.

Moreover, as Carmel mentioned earlier, 74% of front-line workers in health and education consider themselves to be poorly trained and not to understand ASD fully. Thank you, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

Mrs Hanna: I thank the Member for his intervention, which highlights that a co-ordinated strategy for autism is essential. Training for health professionals, carers and parents is required so that other conditions related to autism can be recognised. A comprehensive service is not only required but is the right of every person with autism, the parents, carers and extended family.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Berry: I support today's important motion and welcome the debate. However, it is unfortunate that the amendment takes the focus away from the motion and from the message that Members are trying to send out.

We must have a Northern Ireland centre of excellence, rather than one that is cross-border and politically motivated. Such a centre of excellence was hailed by Sinn Féin and others. It was promised but never delivered. Therefore the amendment is politically motivated and for that reason should not have been tabled.

Although autism was first identified in 1943, it is still a relatively unknown disability. Autistic spectrum disorder is estimated to touch the lives of over 500,000 families throughout the beloved United Kingdom. People with autism are not physically disabled as a person with cerebral palsy might be. They do not require wheelchairs, and they look just like those without the disability. Due to the invisible nature of autism, it can be harder to create awareness and understanding of the condition. The motion will help to do that, even at the level of Government.

A carer commented that, because autistic children look normal, others assume that they are naughty or that parents are not controlling them as they should. Strangers refer to that perceived failing frequently, and it causes concern, anxiety and stress for parents when they socialise, and many of us should take that on board.

I support the call for legislation that will ensure that the rights of people with autism, and their families, are upheld, and that services are provided continually to meet their needs. We must combat the disgraceful social injustice that exists due to the lack of funding and planning of services across Northern Ireland.

Local provision for children with autism is often limited. Teacher training in autism is inadequate, and children and their families struggle to access the entitlements that are their right. It is vital that the good practice that exists in some areas in the United Kingdom is extended to schools in all areas so that all children with autism get the education that they deserve. Postcodes must not determine provision.

I, like others, commend Autism NI. They have carried out tremendous work and continue to lobby hard throughout Northern Ireland for their members and for people in general who suffer as a result of autism. Dr McCrea quoted the mission statement for Autism NI. That should be the mission statement for the Assembly. This House must ensure that there is access to the appropriate services for people with autism and carers. Members must help to achieve an autistic spectrum disorder programme of care, an autistic spectrum disorder strategy for Northern Ireland and, as has been mentioned earlier, a Northern Ireland autism Act.

In the United States, the needs of autism sufferers and their carers have been debated on Capitol Hill. Due to the efforts of Cure Autism Now, and other groups, Congress passed legislation six years ago to boost research funding for autism. Last summer, the Senate passed follow-up legislation called the Combating Autism Act of 2006, which not only calls for a doubling of funds for autism research, but also for autism screening, surveillance and early intervention programmes in all 50 States. It is important to state that they still have a long way to go, and some groups are concerned that funding has not yet been provided. However, that is, at least, the first step in the process, and we, in Northern Ireland, must take note of it.

Funding is required to provide support for schools, and it would involve working directly with teachers and classroom assistants. For many years, there have been concerns in this area. Although classroom assistants have been trained in autism, parents feel that teachers, on occasions, brush off children with autism and leave them for the classroom assistants to deal with. That matter must be dealt with.

It is vitally important that teachers work in partnership with classroom assistants in the preparation of materials to support children with autism.

3.30 pm

Individual support for each child is required, and it is imperative that parents, teaching staff and other services are trained in how to support children with autism. One hears so much about joined-up government, but when one looks at the provision of such support services, it seems that joined-up government is far from the agenda. The Southern Education and Library Board provides an autism advisory and intervention service, and I welcome such a partnership approach that helps everyone involved to support and help young people who have autistic spectrum disorder.

It has been said that the earlier an autism diagnosis is made, the better the person's chances are of receiving appropriate help and support. However, we have heard many statistics in the course of the debate that show that there is a long way to go before the needs of the people who are affected by autism are met.

The Government must hear the clear message that more funding and better planning are required to deliver the necessary resources for people who have autistic spectrum disorder and their carers. An urgent joined-up-government approach is needed to tackle the issue. I support the motion.

Mr Dawson: In common with many Members, I have had occasion to meet parents, grandparents and other family members who have gone into great detail in outlining the personal and often heartbreaking reality that an Assembly motion could never express. There are children in all sections of the community who are on the autism spectrum. Therefore, I am disappointed, but not surprised, that some Members have sought to politicise the motion and score political points on the back of children in real need.

All parents, regardless of the community from which they come, want to know that the needs of their children are being adequately met, and that their children will be allowed to perform to the best of their ability. They want to know that their children will not be disadvantaged compared with other children because they are on the autism spectrum.

I will concentrate on autism in the classroom, because it is there that the shortcomings of the system, as summarised in the motion, are graphically demonstrated. I have consulted professionals in the education sector, and some key themes have emerged. First, there is a need for flexibility of approach. As Members know, autism is different from other difficulties that may affect children. It is defined as a spectrum because it differs from child to child, and because it is global and pervasive in relation to the child's experience.

All aspects of the life of the individual are affected, and children with autism are found in every type of school in Northern Ireland. Therefore, there is no one-size-fits-all approach for the education sector. In order to meet the children's needs, boards and schools must be adaptive and flexible in their approach to the situation. The concept of 10 hours of classroom assistance in blocks of time is nonsensical to a child on the autism spectrum. The child requires a minimum of 10 hours of assistance spread across 20 hours of teaching time. Therefore, the classroom assistants should be available throughout the teaching day and teaching week. That flexibility does not exist in any of the boards in Northern Ireland.

Secondly, thorough and specific assessments are essential if we are to allow for the correct planning and package to be made available for the child and the family. Early assessment has already been mentioned, and it will reassure the parents and allow for the specific needs of the child to be met. It is essential that assessment occurs as early as possible so that action can be taken as early as possible. However, that runs counter to established educational practice, which results in up to 18 months lapsing before a statement can be issued for a child.

That 18 months is lost time — it is time during which the child is not receiving appropriate help, could be developing further problems, and could be falling behind in achievement.

The third key theme is the training required for parents and teachers, and support staff in the education board structures. Training delivery needs to be tiered so that it is appropriate in individual cases. Once again, flexibility of approach is important. Without necessary training, relationship issues will inevitably develop within the school.

Like others, I have had to deal with difficult situations in the classroom. One situation involved a young person on the autistic spectrum who was being disciplined by a school for going down a corridor the wrong way to get to the classroom for a lesson at the scheduled time. The child was being disciplined because a teacher felt that it was being disobedient and disrupting school life. However, the child was not being disruptive or disobedient. It was simply that the lesson time created an absolute for the child that the one-way system in the school did not. Training of staff in the school would prevent such an incident. Indeed, perhaps such a child would need a classroom assistant to accompany him or her from class to class to ensure that the difficulty did not arise. That takes us back to the need for flexibility of approach.

The fourth key theme is multidisciplinary working. Children on the spectrum require a wide range of professionals, some of who have been mentioned.

Mr Shannon: Is the Member aware that 50% of carers are in ill health and are being driven to the brink of despair? One supreme example is the case of Alison and Ryan Davies across the water. Alison, who was the mother of Ryan, an autistic child, was driven to take the ultimate step and committed suicide.

Mr Dawson: I thank the Member for that intervention. I am aware of examples of where people have been driven to despair, not only in that case, but in other cases too. Multidisciplinary working can assist families, because this is a complex issue, and a seamless approach and support to the child is needed.

Let me ask the House a very simple and straightforward question. Who in the government system is responsible for the delivery of that seamless provision to the child? The stock answer is that they are all responsible, or, that the organisation itself is responsible — which means that no one is responsible, and the inevitable result is that the child will suffer.

It should not be up to parents to have to pick their way through the maze of bureaucracy, the quagmire of no funding, or the constant argument about the needs of the child. The child's needs should be met as a matter of right.

That takes us to the further key theme of regularity of contact. Professionals are under so much pressure that running for the needs of the child must be done by the school, the parent, or both. That is never in the best interests of the child. There are gaps in service delivery, and that leads to children not receiving a quality education. It can also mean that parents are forced to seek private intervention, which can lead to confusion in delivery, and may not be best practice. However, who could fault parents who see a gap in the delivery to their children and seek a way to plug that gap. Sadly, too often the gaps in service lead to court cases, which develop as parents rightly demand the delivery of existing legal obligations for their children. Perhaps Members will feel that the service I have described this afternoon is a long way from best practice. Sadly, it is.

I have sought to elaborate on the motion using my knowledge of what is going on in education. However, that is but one area of Government. The motion covers a much wider canvas, which, I am sorry to say, is no less shambolic than education.

It is for these reasons that I support the motion.

Mr P Ramsey: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker, for calling me to speak in the debate. I realise that there are time pressures as so many Members wish to speak.

I welcome Dominic Bradley's suggestion to set up an all-party working group to deal with autism. Given the number of parents who have expressed interest in today's debate, we should, at the very least, activate such a group to give some reassurance and comfort to those parents. The working group should focus on the three key priorities that have been identified: to develop a Northern Ireland strategy for autism; to ring-fence funding for autism; and to initiate Northern Ireland legislation on autism.

I commend all Members on their contributions. Like this morning's debate, this afternoon's debate has been good. All Members honourably shared their concerns from their constituency perspectives, describing the work that they regularly do on this issue, particularly with parents of statemented children.

At a recent public meeting in Derry, I listened to testimonials from parents of young adults with autism. As other Members have done, I have supported parents in tribunals and meetings with health boards and trusts. Listening to so many different people describe their experiences of the same underfunded, fragmented service was not nice. I could share with Members the frustrations of all those who have been forced to put up with an inadequate service. Experiences ranged from problems with speech and language therapy to difficulties with education boards. There has been practically no co-operation between health boards and education boards.

After that meeting, I found it hard to look parents in the eye, knowing that they would have to fight for services for their children — services to which their children are entitled. No parent should have to waste time fighting and campaigning for a service that should already be in place. No parent should have to give up their time to meet health and social service council subgroups to ensure that the needs of their child are being met, as is the case in the Sperrin Lakeland Trust.

Destined is a self-advocacy group for young adults with autism in the Foyle area, and it does sterling work for people with autism. Members including Raymond McCartney, Mary Bradley and Willie Hay will be aware of Destined's advocacy work, and I am sure that they have been canvassed by or have met the group.

It is vital that all people with autism, and their families, receive quality services appropriate to their needs. Caring for a child with autism spectrum disorder can be strenuous, and we know that many parents experience great worry and stress. They cannot get peace to sleep because they are so worried, as Dr McCrea mentioned. The quality of the current service for autistic children, from diagnosis to treatment, is below par. As a result, parents are suffering unduly.

With increasing numbers of children being diagnosed with autism, it is important that action be taken to tackle and properly fund the needs of those with autism. Although there has been a great increase in awareness of autism, the Government have failed to implement any meaningful changes to the provision of services and therapies for those with autism.

Direct rule and, in particular, direct-rule Ministers, have failed people with autism and their families. For years, services have been underfunded, badly managed and poorly planned. A devolved Government can provide the opportunity to change that — an opportunity that must not be wasted.

A new Programme for Government could introduce legislation to protect and guarantee a future for those with autism and to give their parents the peace of mind that they want. We can ensure that the needs of everyone with autism are met and that they can access a service that is well resourced, well funded and flexible enough to respond to the needs of each individual.

Parents of children with autism have three demands: first, that every child with autism should have local access to a diverse range of mainstream and specialist educational provision; secondly, that all teachers should expect to teach a child with autism and must receive appropriate training to best support such children's needs; thirdly, that all schools should be autism-friendly and promote and provide a positive environment now and in the future. Those should be target areas for an all-party working group to challenge permanent secretaries of Government Departments to deliver for the parents of autistic children.

3.45 pm

Mrs Foster: Like other Members, I am pleased to take part in the debate, and to wholly endorse and congratulate Autism NI and others who work in the field of autism for the way in which they have promoted and worked on a comprehensive autism strategy for Northern Ireland. I pay tribute to the autism ambassadors in the different political parties, not least in my own party.

When I talk about a comprehensive autism strategy for Northern Ireland, I mean just that: a strategy that takes in all aspects of the condition, is holistic in dealing with all of the service providers, and most importantly for me, coming from the west, is that it covers Northern Ireland in its entirety.

Yesterday's debates highlighted the difficulties faced by rural dwellers. Unfortunately, I must continue with that theme today. Often, where someone lives determines the level of service that he or she receives. I want to stress to the House that that is fundamentally unfair and must be dealt with. Why should someone's address determine the quality of service that he or she receives? Following on from the previous Member's remarks about the Sperrin Lakeland Trust, I must point out that there are major problems in the west of the country with regard to occupational therapy, speech and language therapy, and paediatrics. Those are the basic building blocks of any service and must be improved.

The option has often been presented to access professionals from outside the trust area. However, that is not a solution. It serves only to demoralise the existing staff, who are trying to do whatever they can for people.

Mrs D Kelly: I am sure that the Member, along with many others, has been lobbied by graduates from the physiotherapy service. It is an absolute scandal that young graduates must seek employment not only across the water in England, but as far away as Australia, and that after being educated in our own fine establishments, and despite there being huge waiting lists at child development clinics, there are no jobs for them. Where does the money go that comes from the Department to the boards and trusts?

Mrs Foster: I sincerely thank the Member for her point of information. That is an issue that must be examined soon because money is being put into the trusts and boards. I hope that the autism strategy will be able to identify the gaps in the current service.

There has been a dramatic increase in the number of people who are on the autistic spectrum. Nowhere is that more evident than in my own constituency. When I was growing up and still at school — which, I must say, Mr Deputy Speaker, was not that terribly long ago — autism was a relatively rare phenomenon. It is not so now, however. Indeed, between 2001 and 2004, the number of individuals who were diagnosed as having ASD tripled. The number is now higher than the combined totals of sufferers of multiple sclerosis, Parkinson's disease, and, indeed, Down's syndrome, yet there is still no cohesive autism strategy in Northern Ireland.

Early intervention for ASD sufferers is crucial to giving them the best start in life. Members have heard much about that today. It also helps to identify and address the needs of those who are carers of ASD sufferers. It is no surprise to those of us who have been involved with families of autistic children that the level of stress for those people is highest among all the major disabilities. It must be pointed out that the way that autism has been addressed by Government — or rather not addressed by Government — has been one of the major sources of worry and concern for those carers. Families have told me that the wait for diagnosis, intervention and support is frustrating and soul-destroying.

Parents ask me questions such as, "When will my child be assessed?", "When will my child get meaningful speech and language therapy?", "Will there be a teacher at my chosen primary school who will be able to effectively teach my child?", "Will there be a classroom assistant who is trained to deal with autism?", and, "If I choose a home programme for my child, will I be able to get funding to support me?". Indeed, there are many other questions that families who are living with autism must face every day.

Autism for those families is a way of life. It cannot be designated as either a health or education issue and put into a tidy box, as has heretofore been attempted. That is not the way that people with autism live their lives and is, therefore, not the way that they can be catered for — in some sort of artificial dichotomy.

I am happy to endorse calls for a cross-departmental autism strategy but, as Members know, that is not where it will end; behind every good strategy is the finance to see it implemented, therefore funding must follow the functions.

There are huge gaps in staffing and resourcing for autism services, and we know that different Departments deliver different services. As my colleague George Dawson pointed out, funding gets lost in the muddle.

In June 2006, I tabled a motion to Fermanagh District Council on the autism strategy. The Education Minister, Maria Eagle, wrote to the council about the proposals for a Northern Ireland autism Act, and stated that provision for individuals with autism was covered by the relevant education and health legislation that is already in place. Clearly, that is not so. I implore the Government to listen to organisations such as Autism NI and NAS, who are specialists in that field; to listen to the carers of those with autism, who, by necessity, have become very effective advocates for their children; and to listen to the voice — that I hope will be united — of the political parties today to focus on an autism strategy and to move to a cross-departmental comprehensive strategy for the whole of Northern Ireland. That strategy should bring about effective services in sensible timescales with fully trained staff, so that the growth in the number of people with ASD, or families living with it, is matched with the necessary quality and availability of services. I support the motion.

Mr O'Dowd: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

Sinn Féin welcomes the motion, from which the amendment takes nothing away. I welcome the fact that the proposer of the motion has accepted the amendment, which is simple and non-political — despite the narrow, blinkered views that we have heard from across the Chamber. The amendment simply states that this Assembly:

"further calls for the immediate funding and implementation of the long overdue centre of excellence for autism at Middletown, Co. Armagh."

We cannot be taken seriously by families affected by autism, those with autism, and the lobby groups, if we politicians cannot implement a decision that was taken four years ago. How can they take us seriously when the Assembly, which has no powers, discusses a motion that seeks more funding and a strategy, given that the decision taken four years ago by an Assembly and by a Minister who had power has not been implemented?

I will outline what the centre at Middletown is all about. The Department of Education's brief states:

"The centre will strive to achieve excellence in its provision. It will provide a model of best practice in assessing the educational needs of children and young people with an Autistic Spectrum Disorder and in establishing working partnerships with those involved in providing and operating services at a local level."

Those working partnerships will apply to the support groups, the families, Autism NI and other autism charities.

"The centre will provide:-

- a lead for, and offer exemplars of educational intervention;
- a lead for the training of parents and professionals;
- a research facility; and an outreach support service complementing current and developing service provision.”

If calling for such a centre is being political, then Sinn Féin is being political. However, that centre is needed. Middletown is only the start. No one is saying that if Middletown were established, we would walk away from the autism debate and the need for an autism strategy. Middletown is a centre of excellence, but I would like to see satellites or other centres of excellence across Ireland, from Ballymena to Bandon.

If anyone can object to an outreach support service that complements current provision, or to the development of service provisions, or to a research facility, they have not explained that objection. This is not a political question. Sinn Féin is saying that we must be serious. If the North/South Ministerial Council meeting of April 2002 announced the Middletown centre, and it has not been built, why should we be taken seriously when we debate funding and a strategy for autism in an Assembly that has no powers?

I support the call for an all-party working group that was made by the proposer of the motion. That is an excellent idea. I am sure that he would support the call for the most important all-party working group to be set up in the Assembly, namely the Executive.

If we had an Executive with functioning Ministers for health and education, the demands that we are making could be brought to fruition with greater ease.

Mrs Foster: Same speech, different day.

Mr O'Dowd: Yes, it is a case of “same speech, different day”, unfortunately. It will not be a different day tomorrow for people who have family members with autism — it will be the same day. It is time that we as politicians grasped the nettle and moved forward. Sanctimonious, pompous speeches in this Chamber will not make one iota of difference to people's lives.

The need for an Executive is clear. We can no longer proceed with such demanding debates without putting measures into action. Our party has supported the ongoing campaign for the rights and needs of people with autism. I welcome the kind comments that have been made about my deceased party colleague Mickey Ferguson, who would have revelled in today's debate. He would have enjoyed participating and pushing the matter forward.

As has already been said, we have taken the issue of autism to Europe and facilitated links between autism groups in the North with groups in the Twenty-six counties and in the rest of Europe. That action has allowed autism groups here and in the South to co-ordinate and to seek funding on an all-Ireland basis. The debate has concentrated on education, but we must also refer to health matters. The need for better services and support is not solely the education system's responsibility. Children with ASD need access to the kind of health and community services that can impact positively on their standard of living and allow them as much independence as possible.

Primary healthcare providers must be aware of the impact of ASD and understand the complex communication and social issues that accompany the condition. We must ensure that primary healthcare providers have the right training in, and understanding of, ASD to allow them to provide the full range of necessary care.

Mention was made of a postcode lottery to determine the delivery of autism care in the four health boards. A centre of excellence, as is to be provided at Middletown, will serve as an exemplar of educational intervention and provide a lead for the training of parents and professionals. It will ensure that the future make-up of the health boards, while providing an education, will provide a single, world-class service to people with autism and their families. That is where the thought processes and the new ideas must be crunched down, where the training must be given and where those new ideas must be brought out into the community. A building in Middletown is fair enough, but unless it can provide a service to the whole community it will have failed in its objective. However, the centre at Middletown meets the criteria, and I am sure that its objectives will be achieved.

Reference was made earlier to how autism affects people throughout their lives. For example, training is required for those in the criminal-justice system who are likely to come into contact with those with ASD. Appropriate detention, custody and interview accommodation should be provided, and appropriate intervention strategies must be put in place. I was shocked when I saw the figures for those with ASD who end up in jail as a result of not being properly cared for in their formative years. Intervention should have taken place when they were in primary school but did not. Those people have gone through life and, through no fault of their own, have ended up in conflict with the criminal-justice system. Who has committed the real crime? Did the individual let down society, or did society let down the individual?

We need to change our approach to autism and autism care. We need to implement a strategy and move forward. As I have said, our amendment is not about narrow politics. The criteria for the centre of excellence speak for themselves. Middletown must only be the start — we must have satellite centres or independent centres from Ballymena to Bandon. However, we need to tackle the problem urgently. Go raibh maith agat, a Leas Cheann Comhairle.

4.00 pm

Mr Dallat: Parents, children and carers who are affected by autism have had a slow and tortuous struggle for equality. That struggle has been compounded by disappointment after disappointment. Those disappointments have gone well beyond the tolerance of the most patient people who are affected by the condition.

The gravest disappointments in the delivery of Government services are in the education and health sectors. For children who live with autism, that is a double whammy and is therefore doubly unacceptable in a modern society that claims — indeed, guarantees — equality for all its citizens. Many of the groups that welcomed the Good Friday Agreement were affected by inequality. One of those groups was people affected by autism. One can imagine how disappointed they are that the advances that should have been made have not been made.

In moving the motion, my colleague Dominic Bradley referred to a report in 'The Lancet'. That report stated that the problem has tripled in the past three years. He called for early diagnosis of children who are affected, and he complained, rightly, that diagnosis takes up to three years. He criticised cuts in expenditure, which compound the problem. He also pointed out that only 5% of autistic people are employed once they leave school and only 3% live independently. That is a shame and is therefore a good reason to seek unanimity in the Assembly today. Unfortunately, that is not to be. Sadly, this is the second time today that Members have been divided on serious issues. That does not go down well.

The SDLP accepted the amendment without hesitation, because the all-Ireland centre of excellence for autism in Middletown was always a part of the strategy: simply because it was not included in the motion does not mean that the party excludes it. Earlier, I wondered whether some Members thought that Midleton in County Cork, where the splendid whiskey is made, was being referred to. However, I assure them that the centre is in Middletown in County Armagh, unless, of course, the border has been shifted. [Laughter.]

My colleague also paid tribute to Michael Ferguson, and Barry McElduff acknowledged that. Iris Robinson made a well-informed speech that was particularly enlightening on international developments. She emphasised the progress that has been made in Sweden and in the United States. I wonder why Middletown, which is so much closer to home, is a problem.

I was much impressed by Robert Coulter's speech. Having declared an interest in different organisations, he spoke with great pride about his grandson. Anyone who heard him could not help but be moved and encouraged to do everything humanly possible to help.

Several Members made the same points. Kieran McCarthy made a valuable contribution, emphasising the need to ring-fence funding. However, he underlined the fact that Members have no power, which is all the more reason why a new Assembly should be up and running. Rev McCrea made an excellent contribution; he is obviously well-informed about the problems that are involved. He pointed out that autism does not disappear; it is a lifelong condition. He also stated the need for families to have respite. I know from my own experience that that is a major issue. Families that are affected by autism really do need a break; however, that is not to say that they do not love their autistic children.

Billy Bell, in his usual manner, gave an interesting address in which he emphasised the need for legislation. He pointed out that autism affects the entire family and stressed the need for a greater sense of urgency. He highlighted the fact that there are 700 people on the waiting list for assessment, and, as Dominic Bradley mentioned, that it takes up to three years to get a diagnosis. That is a disgrace. He also referred to other costs associated with autism that are not thought about — family break-ups, divorce, and so forth, brought about by pressures on families.

Caitríona Ruane emphasised the need for equality of opportunity in early intervention. Carmel Hanna rightly pointed out the lack of public understanding of autism and said that any new strategy must have a clear direction. She appealed to the DUP and Sinn Féin — as do I — to ensure that the Assembly delivers on what has been debated today. Mrs Hanna also spoke about the response to clear referral routes, which do not yet exist, and the importance of properly trained diagnostic teams to identify not only autism but other related problems.

Patsy McGlone made a timely and important intervention on the difficulties that must be faced. Unsurprisingly, Paul Berry told Members that he was not happy with the amendment, but he made a positive contribution and emphasised the need for access, a programme of care, the development of a clear strategy, and so forth.

George Dawson spoke about the classroom environment. He emphasised the fact that no size fits all, and he highlighted the lack of flexibility. He also spoke about the need for early assessment.

Pat Ramsey reminded Members of the need to set up an all-party group on autism, which everybody will support. Arlene Foster emphasised the need for a comprehensive strategy. She highlighted an important point, which is the remoteness of rural areas. She emphasised that not so long ago she was at school.

However, Members had no need to hear that — it was quite superfluous.

Mr A Maginness: John is an old flatterer.

[Laughter.]

Mrs Hanna: John might not like so much of the “old”.

[Laughter.]

Mr Dallat: Flattery may get the amendment pushed through.

Mr A Maginness: He has no chance.

Mr Dallat: My learned colleague Alban Maginness says that I have no chance.

Arlene Foster raised important issues about assessment, teaching, classroom assistants and home programmes.

The debate was excellent. I am sorry that the amendment that the SDLP accepted caused problems — it was not intended to do so. John O’Dowd’s summing up for the amendment was largely political, if I may say so. I hope that any new Assembly will not follow that kind of policy and that Members will embrace the needs of people who are less well off than we are, represent them and leave the political baggage behind.

Question, That the amendment be made, put and negatived.

Main Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly recognises the need for, and supports the introduction of, legislation which would guarantee the future security and rights of those on the autistic spectrum and would combat the tragic social injustice being perpetuated through lack of planning and funding, at a time when the number of individuals with autism is increasing dramatically.

THE TRANSITIONAL ASSEMBLY

Monday 15 January 2007

The Assembly met at 12.00 noon (Madam Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

ASSEMBLY BUSINESS

Security Review

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. At last Monday's plenary sitting, I raised the matter of the inquiry into certain happenings in the House after the Assembly recess. I understand that there has been a meeting; can you tell the House when there is likely to be a report? As you know, Madam Speaker, time is running out for this Assembly, and we would like the opportunity to debate the findings in the House.

Madam Speaker: Thank you, Dr Paisley, for raising this matter. I understand your continuing anxiety about this important issue. The Transitional Assembly Commission went to Scotland last week to talk to people there about a number of issues in relation to the security review. However, it is not my intention to make a statement about the security review, which I announced to the House on 27 November, until it is completed. I am sure that you and other Members will understand that it would be inappropriate for me to do so. However, like you, I am aware of the time element, and I will endeavour to get it done as soon as possible.

New Assembly Member: Ms Marietta Farrell

Madam Speaker: I should like to announce to the Assembly that further to the resignation of Ms Patricia Lewsley as a Member for the Lagan Valley constituency, I wrote to the Chief Electoral Officer, as required by the Northern Ireland Act 1998, to inform him of the vacancy. The Chief Electoral Officer has advised that Ms Marietta Farrell has been returned as a Member of the Assembly for the Lagan Valley constituency. I invite Ms Farrell to take her seat by signing the Roll of Membership.

The following Member signed the Roll of Membership:
Farrell, Marietta Nationalist

Madam Speaker: I am satisfied that the Member has signed the Roll and has confirmed her designation. Ms Marietta Farrell has now officially taken her seat.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

Affordable Housing

Madam Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow two and a half hours for each of today's debates: the Member moving each motion will have 15 minutes, with a further 15 minutes for the winding-up speech. All other Members who wish to speak will have a maximum of 10 minutes.

Mr McGlone: I beg to move

That this Assembly expresses serious concerns about the affordable housing crisis; notes the deliberations by the committee chaired by Sir John Semple; and demands that any new Executive make affordable housing an urgent Government priority.

Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Gabhaim mo bhuíochas leat as ucht an seans a thabhairt domh labhairt ar an ábhar seo, nó is ábhar an-tábhachtach é.

Thank you for the opportunity to speak on the issue of affordable housing, which is crucially important to me and to many homeowners, tenants and prospective buyers.

On 11 January 2007, the 'Belfast Telegraph' informed us that:

"First-time buyers in Northern Ireland now have to save more than 80% of their take-home pay to cover the upfront costs of buying a house".

That is one aspect of a worsening problem that faces many people on our streets.

I note the amendment to the motion, but first I wish to define affordable housing. The widely accepted definition is social-rented accommodation; lower-cost housing that is for sale; and some private-sector rented accommodation. Unfortunately, through a lack of provision, the situation has been allowed to deteriorate to the point where Northern Ireland faces a housing crisis. Last year, 40,453 people were on housing waiting lists, with 20,121 households presented as homeless. In the past three years, including 2006, social new-build housing starts fell behind the Government's projected figure by almost 2,000 houses. Therefore, Government-led projected new-build figures have fallen far short of what is needed. In the districts of Magherafelt and Cookstown in my constituency, which have 972 people on housing waiting lists, six — yes, six — houses were built in two years.

Members are aware of people who are offered private rentals as their only alternative. Housing benefit accounts for only part of the rent, with the deficit sought from disability living allowance, attendance allowance, income support, or worse, from loan sharks. That is a downward spiral to deeper poverty, all because not enough housing is being built for public-sector social renting.

Earlier, I referred to first-time buyers. Last year, in mid-Ulster, the average house price before the now notorious Draft Planning Policy Statement 14, 'Sustainable Development in the Countryside' (PPS 14), was £177,000. Since Draft PPS 14, £30,000 to £40,000 can be added to that figure. PPS 14 is the deliberate action of a Government that are, allegedly, committed to social and affordable housing.

House prices have trebled in my constituency, with a growth of 30·6% in one year alone. As Northern Ireland's housing costs are the highest and its wages among the lowest in these regions, it is little wonder that the Nationwide reports that people are borrowing up to 5·2 times their annual income. The average in Scotland is 3·6 times the annual income. The median advance for first-time buyers in 2001 was £50,000. By 2005, however, that median had increased by 55% to £77,480.

There have also been human costs. In 2005-06, 2,614 actions for mortgage repossession were recorded — an increase of 19·5% from the previous year. I am sure that we elected representatives could share tales of rural constituents who simply cannot build or buy a house because of the consequences of social engineering via the political project known as Draft PPS 14. It is a political project by an urban adviser to a Labour Government with absolutely no idea of the needs of our rural society. Indeed, the role of that particular adviser beggars description. Will the real Secretary of State please stand up?

As for all problems, there must be a solution. Those of us who have met Sir John Semple and made submissions to his committee have identified many issues. Those issues can be prioritised under three headings: land; planning; and investment. Land priorities include the slowness of approvals for area plans that are tied to restrictive capped figures — the housing growth indicators — which have driven land costs to an artificially inflated level and have had a knock-on effect on new builds.

I have already referred to the negative effects of Draft PPS 14 on rural areas. We need to revise zones and zone more land to help to reduce basic land costs. We must also introduce measures to de-zone land that is not used or likely to be used, or that in some instances has been land-banked, because it is also contributing to knock-on inflationary costs.

We must introduce a proper sustainable planning policy — rather than the artificial one that has driven costs exorbitantly though the roof — that meets the real needs of rural communities. There must be a complete review of the planning process, including resources, in order to speed it up; currently, applicants endure entirely unacceptable waiting times. By the time that some planning offices deal with an application and issue an approval, the construction costs of a dwelling may have increased by 20% to 30%. Section 106 of England's Town and Country Planning Act 1990, Part V of the Planning and Development Act, 2000 in the South of Ireland and section 75 of the Town and Country Planning (Scotland) Act 1997 contain provisions for similar measures that assist the planning system to develop affordable housing. Those measures must be seen in action in Northern Ireland. Importantly, there must be substantial investment in the social-housing new-build programme.

A major housing crisis is welling up. We hope that the details that are contained in the Semple Report will be listened to; that the Assembly will be listened to; and that it will soon be in a position to prioritise that most basic of human rights, the right to a decent home, through the establishment of an Executive in Northern Ireland. Those measures are not major or undeliverable. Many could be brought about at the stroke of a pen but for the inhumanity of indifference that is displayed by the Government.

There are too many reasons why there must not be indifference. We owe it to the people who are on waiting lists, and those who cannot afford a decent home, to demand that a new Executive make affordable housing an urgent Government priority.

Arís, a Cheann Comhairle, gabhaim mo bhuíochas leat agus cuirim an rún os comhair an Tionóil.

Mr McCann: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I beg to move the following amendment: Delete all after "crisis;" and insert

"and the serious under-provision of social housing due to lack of investment and the absence of any strategy; note the deliberations by the committee chaired by Sir John Semple; and calls on an incoming Executive to make social and affordable housing an urgent priority, and for the development of a strategic response, including action to end homelessness by 2010, and to bring vacant properties back into use to address the unmet need in the provision of social and affordable housing."

A Cheann Comhairle, I commend the Member for bringing this important issue to the Floor of the Chamber. Without the amendment, the motion misses an important element of housing — the provision of social housing, a sector that for many years has been totally neglected and that has suffered from serious and sustained underinvestment. In today's housing market, affordable housing, social housing and the other elements that make up the housing mix should run hand in glove. Mixed-tenure housing, developed as part of a strategic framework, is the way forward. I hope that the building of vast housing estates without any infrastructure is a thing of the past.

The question of creating an affordable-housing sector has been to the fore of many people's thoughts for some time. However, the fact that the only offering from the Government is co-ownership shows how bankrupt of ideas they are. Again, it shows what advice David Hanson has been given by his advisers.

At many meetings, Sinn Féin has raised the issue of creating an affordable-housing sector. It has been painted up for successive Ministers that, unless action was taken to at least begin the debate, we would find ourselves in crisis. I have warned British direct-rule Ministers that the inability of the Department for Social Development to manage the social new-build housing programme, if not acted on, would lead to major problems in the supply of social housing. I take no pleasure in saying that both warnings have come to pass. The crisis could have been avoided.

The refusal to respond to intense lobbying from many housing groups, political parties and individuals has left us in a position where in the last recorded quarter — April to June 2006 — 98.3% of all housing starts were for the private sector. That is part of the reason for the crisis in the provision of social housing. We are simply not building enough new homes in the social sector. Current targets are not being met — and those targets were not ambitious enough in the first place. The social-housing sector is virtually non-existent. When annual new-build figures are released, they are manufactured to give the impression that more houses have been built than were actually constructed.

In 1995-96, 2,403 new social houses were built; in 2005-06, only 782 were completed. That is a huge decline over 10 years. Only a third as many houses are being built than was the case 10 years ago. If those figures are matched against the number of people declaring themselves homeless, it puts the crisis into perspective. In 1995-96, 10,468 people were declared homeless. Ten years later that figure had risen to over 20,000; for the first two quarters of 2006 the figure was 10,460. The trend is still upwards. That is an indictment of the way in which housing has been mishandled.

Sinn Féin hopes that the appointment of John Semple to produce a report on affordability and social housing development will prove to be a new beginning in the development of a strategy to pull us out of the crisis. Sinn Féin had serious reservations about John Semple's appointment to oversee the exercise, given his former connection to Government, and we told him so at our meeting. He assured us that he was his own person and would not bend to anyone's wishes in the pursuance of producing an honest report. His interim recommendations are interesting and thought provoking; we await the final package. The Government initiated the review, but are they committed to fully resourcing its findings?

Will the Government find the finance required to implement a housing revolution: the eradication of homelessness; the building of high-quality affordable houses; and the creation of mixed-tenure estates with the infrastructure to allow them to thrive? We need an incoming Executive to make affordable and social housing a priority. We need a future housing Minister to promote sustainable communities and ensure that everyone has the opportunity of a house at a price they can afford in a place where they want to live and work. Members need to recognise that housing is a right, and I hope that work on a bill of rights will take a broad approach to social and economic rights.

The British Government have made a huge investment in social housing in England. The same cannot be said in the Six Counties. We need to ensure that the concept of sustainability in housing estates is realised. The British Government's definition of sustainable communities is:

"places where people want to live and work, now and in the future. They meet the diverse needs of existing and future residents, are sensitive to their environment, and contribute to a high quality of life. They are safe and inclusive, well planned, built and run, and offer equality of opportunity and good services for all."

That is a British Government priority; they have embarked on a massive programme of building social and affordable housing and have heavily resourced its sustainability. That is the situation in England, but over the next number of years in the North, there will be cuts to the housing budget.

The approach to affordability in the Twenty-six Counties has been to bring in legislation to ensure that contractors set aside 20% of each private-housing development for social and affordable housing. That was done under Part V of the Planning and Development Act, 2000. The Twenty-six-County Government have recently tightened that Act to ensure that non-compliance is a thing of the past. Sinn Féin TDs have been at the forefront of the campaign to ensure progress, because there were serious concerns that policy was being driven by the demands of speculators rather than by people's housing needs.

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCann: I have limited time left, so I will not give way.

Councils in the South bank land to use in negotiations with contractors to ensure the continuous supply of social and affordable housing. Several years ago, the British Deputy Prime Minister challenged the construction industry in Britain to build an affordable house for £60,000, and thousands of new, high-quality houses were built there. Changes to the planning legislation in England speeded up the process.

We must be proactive in our approach to affordable and social housing. Those in society who are most in need must have a roof over their heads, and we must ensure that those who wish to buy their own home are able to do so at an affordable price. Speculators must not be in a position to freeze young first-time buyers out of the market — a situation that is presently the norm. Legislation must be put in place to protect low earners who bought their properties in a super-inflated housing market, only to struggle with mortgages beyond their financial means and find their homes being repossessed. We await the impact of the latest increase in the cost of borrowing. Statistics show that there were 1,540 actions for mortgage repossessions in 2001-02 — an 11·5% decrease on the previous year. However, there were 2,614 such actions in 2005-06 — an increase of 19·5% on the previous year. That shows the extent of the problem.

Sinn Féin wishes John Semple fair wind in his endeavours, because he has a difficult task. His recommendations may well form the basis of a future housing strategy. That is why we should be at the helm to guide, push and resource the strategy, deal with affordability and social housing, and eradicate homelessness. The only people who are committed to making the necessary decisions are in this Chamber. Therefore, it is imperative that the Assembly get up and running. We owe it to the 30,000 people who are awaiting social housing and the thousands who are waiting for affordable homes.

The number of vacant properties in the North of Ireland is a scandal. Out of a total housing stock of 702,000, 36,200 are vacant. They are in various states of repair, and many have been left empty by investors as their profits accumulate. One house in every 20 is empty. By tackling that problem — and without building a single house for the affordable or social sectors — we could go a long way to providing homes for thousands of people and families and meeting the commitment to eradicate homelessness.

All aspects of housing policy are in a mess and need urgent attention. A key element in life is a place to live — a home. That is a fundamental right, but it has been diminished by the incompetent management of the Department for Social Development. Those who have overseen the crisis and made excuse after excuse should consider their positions.

This motion is timely, coming just before the Semple deadline for responses to the consultation, 26 January. It is also a reminder of the obligations that we, as elected Members, have to show leadership on crucial issues such as housing affordability and social-housing supply. Let us hope that, when the time comes, we are up to the challenge required to make the difference.

Mr Poots: I welcome Sinn Féin's concluding remarks about everyone being entitled to a home and trust that that also applies to those who were ethnically cleansed from the border areas, banished from their homes and sent over to England, because they were not allowed to live in republican areas.

The motion has two elements to it: public- and private-sector housing. I will address the public-sector housing issue briefly. The Housing Executive has failed miserably to supply houses over the past years. That failure has taken place particularly in unionist areas. I think in particular of east Belfast and Lisburn, two areas where there is high demand for housing, but where the Housing Executive has not met, and cannot meet, the demand with its current policies.

The Antrim Street Housing Executive office in Lisburn has 1,200 people on the waiting list, half of whom are in housing stress. Over the past number of years, people have not been able to get houses, yet each year the Housing Executive is selling off more houses than are being built in the area. Our party raised the issue a number of years ago, and due to the pressure that the DUP applied, 180 houses are now to be developed there over a three-year period. However, that will neither address the problem nor meet the needs there.

It appears that the Housing Executive is to some extent relying on the article 40, of The Planning (Northern Ireland) Order 1991, agreements with private developers, but the problem with that is that the developers have already got planning permission for dwellings, and there is no prospect of their actually building social housing. We are going to have a continued social housing problem in Lisburn and other parts of Northern Ireland unless the Housing Executive amends its ways and goes out of its way to provide housing for people.

One of the issues that has arisen is the inability of the housing associations to proceed with new building and to exercise their powers to procure land for new developments.

That leads me to my other point, which is the private-sector issue of the price of houses — a continual topic of conversation among people now. In my area, the average price of a house is £236,000, and, additionally, there were rises in the last year of 36% — that is unsustainable.

Mr Campbell: One issue that has not been raised in the debate is precisely the one that the Member is about to talk about, which is the private sector. Given that house prices in Northern Ireland have more than doubled while the level at which stamp duty begins has remained static, could the Chancellor not put several thousand pounds into stamp duty for first-time buyers to make housing much more affordable in Northern Ireland?

Mr Poots: Mr Campbell is in danger of setting me off on a rant by raising that topic. It is a grievous tax to impose on individuals who are buying property, and particularly on first-time buyers. Our deaths, wages, even our fish suppers are taxed; it is wholly illegitimate to have any tax on people.

Mr Simpson: Fish suppers?

Mr Poots: Yes, Mr Simpson, we are even taxed on our fish suppers, not that it seems to have applied too much to you. It is grievous that we get taxed when buying our homes.

However, what it comes down to is a simple issue of supply and demand. If supply cannot meet demand, prices are driven up; that is the logic of it. It does not seem to have got through to the Planning Service yet given its area plans. In Ards, for example, land was de-zoned and taken out. In that instance, the Planning Service implied that there was too much housing land available. It did not need to develop as many houses as was proposed in the former area plans, so it took de-zoned land, and the new area plan reflected that.

In the area plan for Newry and Banbridge, no significant additional land was zoned. Newry has the highest house growth prices anywhere in the UK. Newry does not need more land, yet people are saying that it does because the house prices there are rising consistently; indeed the Belfast Metropolitan Area Plan (BMAP) is crawling along, failing miserably to meet local needs.

There is nothing over and above the Lisburn area plan in that element of BMAP; in fact, land that was anticipated to have come forward in BMAP in Lisburn for development was excluded from it. This was land that would have delivered the critical road linking Knockmore and Sprucefield in the Lisburn area, and it has clearly failed to deliver that.

12.30 pm

I note that the regional development strategy identified that the housing growth indicators could not be adjusted upwards. However, it is now acknowledged that the figure of 51,000 new houses in the original estimate should be adjusted upwards to 66,500, but BMAP still has not met that figure and gives no indication that it will do so.

The critical problem is land supply. Mr McGlone was correct to say that more land must be zoned. We also need to be able to de-zone land, because developers are causing further problems by land-banking. One of the leading accountancy companies in Northern Ireland has advised developers to slow down and to build fewer houses, thereby making greater profits. If people are told that they should work less and that they will get more money for it, most will take up that option. If developers can make more money by building less, that is what they will do, and who could blame them?

There must be a requirement that forces developers to continue with developments once work has begun and that allows land to be de-zoned if the work is not started. Developers must play ball with the community. There is no point in identifying land that is suitable for development and allowing it to sit and stagnate while our young people cannot get into the housing market. It is essential that that issue be addressed.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Wells] in the Chair)

Ten years ago there were many vacant houses in the Old Warren estate in Lisburn and a lot of deprivation in that area. Now houses that were bought by their occupants and are up for sale again are reaching prices of £150,000. That is incredible, given the circumstances that existed in that area in the past. It is an indication that the present market is, to some extent, a false market, although I suspect that it will not be a falling market, given the environmental constraints that are imposed by the Planning Service.

We in Northern Ireland need to address this issue, and the clearest and easiest way to do that is to make more development land available. In conjunction with that, we must ensure that developers make significant contributions to the provision of roads and sewerage systems in those areas, so that no environmental damage results from those new developments. However, the policy of sustainable development that was put on us in Northern Ireland does not lead to sustainable development; the prices of new homes and the rate at which they are rising is unsustainable. Young people cannot afford new dwellings, and the only people who benefit are those who have multiple houses and those who own development land.

Therefore, it is incumbent on any new Executive that might exist after Sinn Féin clearly and definitively supports the police, in deeds as well as words, to deal with this issue. They must ensure that those who push up the price of houses purely out of greed, and drive young people out of the prospect of acquiring new homes, do not get their way all the time and that young people have the opportunity to get onto the property ladder.

Mr Cobain: It could be said that the more things change, the more they stay the same. When I first read Sir John Semple's interim report, I thought that I was in a time warp. The report is written as if the issue of affordability is something new that has somehow sneaked up on us without warning. Much of what has been written in the report has already been written, and much of what has been said today has already been said.

As Chairman of the Committee for Social Development during the Assembly's previous mandate, I, and several Members from other sides of the House, expressed concern about the importance of maintaining a sensible level of social housing. That was back in 2002. I contend that direct-rule Ministers pursued their own agendas and paid no regard whatsoever to what local politicians had to say.

The people of Northern Ireland are suffering, and there are several ways to tackle the issue. People must have access to affordable housing; there should be an aggressive social-housing building programme; co-ownership should continue to be part of the solution; and there is, of course, a role for the private-rented sector. To rely on one or two of those solutions would be a folly. The outcome will inevitably lead to a rise in the already unacceptable levels of homelessness. In 2005, almost 16,000 houses were built in the Province, which is a 10% increase on the previous year's figure. Fewer than 5% of those were available to the social-rented sector.

There is undeniable evidence that there is a need for a programme of social housing of the order of 2,000 units per year. What is happening is that 30,000 people are on the waiting list for housing. Last year, only 700 new builds were completed. This year, funding is available for only 800 new builds. That is not the fault of the housing associations. There is a lack of investment and impetus.

Many people in the private-rented sector are on low incomes. Housing benefit rates do not keep pace with prices. An interest rate rise has already been announced, with a further rise predicted for February or March, which will lead to landlords seeking to pass on the costs to their tenants. Many people will not be able to afford their rent, and even if there were an increase in housing benefit, people in Northern Ireland face water bills and an increased regional rate. Therefore, the demand for social housing can only increase, and the planned response is inadequate. The 30,000 people on the waiting list will not diminish.

We are all diminished by the experiences endured by homeless families, children and young people. We all lose when the barrier of homelessness prevents them from fully sharing in, and contributing to, our society. Surely this underlines the need to develop affordable housing for low-income families.

Although the housing market here has benefited somewhat, spiralling house prices are causing massive problems. Exceptional growth potential has resulted in landlords and private investors contesting a market traditionally associated with first-time buyers. We must disentangle the competing interests of investors and first-time buyers.

Over the past 10 years, average house prices in Northern Ireland have tripled. Last year, house prices rose by a third, and they now stand at an average of £153,000. How can young people compete with that? Usually, deposits for mortgages are around 5% of the house value. Therefore, to buy an averagely priced house in Northern Ireland, young people must come up with a deposit of over £7,000. That is far beyond the means of many.

In 2005, the Ulster Bank found that two thirds of potential first-time buyers were unable to finance a deposit. Not only that, £1,500 has to be handed over for stamp duty, and, with solicitors charging around 1% for conveyancing, a buyer must come up with another £1,500. In Northern Ireland, it takes an extraordinary amount of money to make the dream of buying an averagely priced house happen, and first-time buyers just cannot keep up.

On a pan-UK basis, Northern Ireland first-time buyers are suffering the most. In the space of five years, the number of first-time buyers here has dropped by 25%. This is at a time when the overall number in the UK has decreased by just 7%.

In 2004, the University of Ulster's housing market survey warned that:

"first-time buyers are finding it increasingly difficult to raise the deposit needed to get into the market."

The Ulster Bank said that:

"Strong house price growth in Northern Ireland has outstripped wage increases, resulting in many potential home-owners being unable to buy a property".

The Government saw that coming: in July 2006, Labour Minister Yvette Cooper told the House of Commons that:

"We have simply not been building enough homes to meet rising demand and changing social trends".

She went on to say:

"If housing supply is not increased, affordability will continue to worsen."

Nevertheless, the rise in house prices has been good for the Treasury. The Halifax discovered that £5.5 billion was paid in stamp duty in 2005 — an increase of £1.8 billion from 1999. It is time for the Treasury to respond with some good news for first-time buyers across the United Kingdom.

The UK's £3 trillion housing market had undergone major changes at the time of the Chancellor's last Budget, but he missed a major opportunity to move with it. In his tenth Budget, Gordon Brown pegged stamp duty at £125,000, which simply does not reflect the reality of the housing market — the average house price for first-time buyers in Northern Ireland is higher than that. A sustainable and affordable market must be created for young people, and there are options to take a more imaginative UK-wide approach.

What are the options for young people? It is anticipated that co-ownership will help to support about 2,500 applicants up to 2008. Although I welcome the recent announcement of £23 million of funding for the scheme, co-ownership should be extended by abolishing or modifying the house-value limits to which it applies.

Too many families do not have the security of a decent home. The early years of too many of our children are blighted by exclusion, instead of being full of promise. Government should be about making a difference and providing leadership. Under direct rule, however, Northern Ireland lags behind the devolved Administrations of Scotland and Wales. The Scottish Executive have said that, in areas of need, up to 25% of houses in new developments should be for rent or low-cost ownership, and they have moved forward with plans to invest £1.2 billion to deliver 21,500 low-cost and social-rented homes by 2008. Devolved Administrations have shown imagination in dealing with the issue. The core aim of any future local Administration must be to help to build fair and decent communities for all.

In the face of direct rule's failure, the best people to understand and reflect the concerns in society are Northern Ireland's locally elected representatives, operating in a devolved Assembly. It is time to act. The Housing Executive was responsible for a highly successful building programme that was well regarded and seems to have solved a housing crisis.

However, there is a different sort of housing crisis now, and the Housing Executive should be financed to intervene again. I stress, however, that the Housing Executive cannot solve the problem alone: housing associations and the private sector must also play their part. Without an urgent investment of public funds, the crisis will become a nightmare.

Mr McCarthy: As Members have said, there is undoubtedly a crisis in relation to the availability of affordable housing. Unless the Government act quickly to help first-time buyers, the majority of our young citizens will find it impossible to buy a home, and that could result in increased levels of homelessness and associated problems.

I welcome, as a first step, the Government's initiative to ask Sir John Semple to compile a report on the causes, reasons and, I hope, remedies for affordable social housing throughout Northern Ireland. Despite being in interim form, the report demonstrates that there are many and varied reasons why the provision of social housing and affordable housing is difficult. A major problem is that developers buy land and leave it for a long time until its value increases. The land is then sold on again and again.

That can happen many times over before any houses appear on such land. In those circumstances, the Government might have to introduce a compulsory purchase order. There is also the matter of land acquisition and the call for a land register to identify all surplus public-sector land, which should be aimed at providing all forms of affordable housing.

I know that housing associations simply cannot afford to buy land on the open market, so we continue with the shortage of new social housing. In his interim report, Sir John Semple highlighted the number of vacant properties in the private sector. The report states that there are up to 39,000 empty private-sector homes throughout Northern Ireland. Surely there are grants or other incentives to encourage private owners to get their houses up to standard and offer them to housing associations or let them to tenants.

The report contains many good ideas that need to be worked on. In supporting Patsy McGlone's motion, I hope that an incoming Executive will make affordable housing an urgent priority. Time is of the essence or this housing problem will worsen. The Assembly must be seen to be working to enable young people to get onto the housing ladder as soon as possible. I support the motion.

Mr Simpson: I promise not to take too long; I know that a number of my esteemed colleagues want to have their say, despite the fact that one of them talked about ranting and raving and named me when it came to the tax added onto the price of fish suppers. I do not know why he picked on me; perhaps it was something to do with my slim physique.

There is no doubt that a major affordability crisis exists in the Province's housing market. There have been many changes in recent years, and we have witnessed a continuous rise in house prices, rising private-sector rents, increases in the number of buy-to-lets and second-home ownerships, increased land and labour costs, increasing evictions and mortgage repossessions and late entry by age onto the housing ladder by first-time buyers.

It is also worrying to note the increase in the number of homeless applications across the Province. In 2003-04, a total of 17,150 applicants presented themselves as homeless to the Housing Executive, 8,954 of whom were accepted. By 2005-06, the number of applicants had risen to 20,121, of whom 9,749 were accepted. In 2004, 2,579 people were homeless for well over a year, but by 2006, that figure had risen to 4,252. The Government should intervene to address the problem.

There is a need not only for more social housing but for more private rental accommodation of various housing types to meet the changing demographics of the country. There is also a need for more affordable homes for first-time buyers.

The Government must ensure that the Planning Service brings forward sites for social housing. Turnaround periods in the Planning Service are considerable. In my constituency of Upper Bann, in the borough of Craigavon, as Members who sit on that council know, the average turnaround period is 33.5 weeks. In Banbridge District Council area, which is also in my constituency, the turnaround period is 55.7 weeks. Turnaround periods must be speeded up. Last year, in the Banbridge District Council area, growth in housing was 16%; in the previous year, that figure was the same. In the borough of Craigavon, it was 14%; and, in the year before, the figure was slightly smaller.

Mrs D Kelly: Whereas housing growth in both of those council areas has increased, the figures for new-build starts in social housing remain dismal. In the Banbridge District Council area, 680 people are in need of social housing, and in the Craigavon district, the figure is 1,687. Despite those startling figures, in the past two years, only 30 new houses were built by the Housing Executive, through the housing associations. Those statistics are appalling.

Mr Simpson: I believe that Mrs Kelly has stolen a copy of my speech. [Laughter.]

I thought that only the DUP had information such as that forwarded to it. Obviously, Mrs Kelly has seen it, and she is quite correct. She sits on Craigavon Borough Council just as I do, so she has a limited knowledge of what goes on. [Laughter.]

There is a major difficulty in the whole Upper Bann constituency with respect to social housing. Land should be released for development more quickly. The Government should look again at Draft PPS 14 and address the demand for social housing in rural areas, where people have a strong sense of belonging and attachment.

Mr Hussey: Will the Member give way again?

Mr Simpson: I will. Have you also stolen my speech?

Mr Hussey: I have not. [Laughter.]

Does the Member agree that the obvious social engineering in Draft PPS 14 prevents maintenance of extended families on family land in rural areas and results in the enforced corralling of rural dwellers into settlements? Does he agree that it assists private developers in effecting rampant increases in house prices and, as such, is to be condemned?

Mr Simpson: I agree with the Member. There is a sense of corralling, which is a major issue.

Another point is the co-ownership scheme. Craigavon Borough Council recently had a presentation from the Northern Ireland Co-Ownership Housing Association. Councillors believe that the scheme could be developed further by revision of the price limit that applies to property eligible for purchase through co-ownership to make the limit reflect more accurately the rise in house prices. The upper limit for co-ownership is £130,000, yet, as Members have heard today already, the average price of houses across the Province is £186,000. In my constituency, terrace houses are selling at £160,000 or £170,000.

It is a very difficult situation. The co-ownership scheme helped 1,500 applicants last year, but that does not put much of a dint in the overall social housing problem.

I welcome the recommendation in Sir John Semple's report that 2,000 homes should be built for social housing purposes. Last week, I spoke to a developer in my constituency during a meeting with Invest Northern Ireland. He is contracted to build 12,000 homes right across the Province, yet not one of those houses will be used for social housing.

There is a major problem in the Province. Young people are finding it more difficult to buy houses and are opting for 40-year mortgages. That puts massive pressure on young married couples and those who wish to set up home. I call on the Government to intervene and try to make the housing issue easier for young people, who must get help from their families to invest in their homes. The Government should concentrate on that issue.

As my council colleague Mrs Kelly said, we must deal with the number of houses in different areas. The housing situation in the Banbridge area is especially horrendous. Social housing is one of the biggest issues dealt with by my constituency office. The Government should move on this issue and assist first-time buyers.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The next Member to speak is Mr Tom Elliott. Before calling Mr Elliott, I must emphasise that, when a Member wishes to speak, it is normal protocol that he or she is present throughout the previous Member's contribution. However, Madam Speaker has taken a generous view of that protocol in the past, and I will therefore call Mr Elliott. However, I emphasise that it is important that Members are present in the Chamber for the previous Member's speech if they expect to be called.

Mr Elliott: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. I was not aware that I would be called so early to speak in the debate, which is why I was not in the Chamber for the previous Member's contribution. I apologise to you, Mr Deputy Speaker, and to the Member concerned.

It is clear from the debate that there is a serious housing shortage. I have often asked myself why that is so, despite the massive increase in the number of houses being built and developed in the Province over the last number of years.

I have researched the reasons for the housing shortage. There is clearly better and improved healthcare in the Province, which has meant that, in general, people are living longer and therefore need more housing. Younger people are moving away from home earlier in life and living alone. That has also contributed to the increasing number of houses that are required.

With increased wealth in the Province, more people are purchasing second, or holiday, homes. That trend is most noticeable on the north coast and in tourist areas such as the Mourne and County Fermanagh. Large-scale immigration into Northern Ireland, which is particularly prevalent in south Tyrone and the Dungannon area, has created a new demand for privately rented accommodation in that area, and private landlords have bought houses to meet demand.

Last week, the Bank of England caused considerable surprise and concern in the property sector by increasing the base rate of interest from 5% to 5.25%. I fear that continued increases in interest rates could result in the burden of mortgage repayments tipping many householders into a situation where their financial obligations cannot be met. Nowadays, we often hear of people being advised to take out 50-year mortgages, as opposed to 20- and 25-year mortgages, which were the norm in the past.

1.00 pm

Just getting onto the property ladder has become increasingly difficult. Last week, a local newspaper revealed the findings of the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors' study, which found that young couples who wish to get on the property ladder in the UK need to save 81.2% of their joint take-home pay. In fact, the situation is likely to be worse in Northern Ireland; in this part of the United Kingdom, wages are lower and property prices are rising faster than on the mainland. The study showed also that affordability in the UK is at its worst for 16 years.

The interim report of the housing affordability review, headed by Sir John Semple, makes several proposals for tackling the lack of affordable housing in the Province and for increasing the provision of social housing. The proposals include: a social-housing building programme of 2,000 properties a year; changes to the Northern Ireland Co-Ownership Housing Association; increasing the threshold for stamp duty and making low-cost homes purchased by first-time buyers exempt; providing the Planning Service with increased resources; and, perhaps most importantly to me, the need to examine the reasons for the current area-plan system's failure to deliver.

The report quantifies yet again the problem facing many first-time buyers, as huge property price increases continue to outstrip paltry wage rises. It is staggering that between 2001 and 2005 — a four-year period — seven district council areas witnessed an average house price increase of over 81%. Indeed, five of those councils, in the north and west of the Province — Fermanagh District Council, Omagh District Council, Strabane District Council, Limavady Borough Council and Coleraine Borough Council — had increases of between almost 90% and 116%. Some might suggest that those figures represent the market here catching up with the rest of the UK; however, such increases, in this part of the world, are unsustainable.

My own council area of Fermanagh is quoted as having an average house price of between £148,000 and just over £161,000. Those figures are on a par with the figures for many eastern areas of the Province that, in the past, have been far above those in the west. Incomes in the Province as a whole, especially in areas such as my constituency, are not able to sustain either those property prices or the rises.

Many reports of a similar nature have preceded Sir John Semple's. However, only limited action has been taken to remedy the situation, even though the warnings have been around for some time. In 2004, HM Treasury published a review of the housing supply in the United Kingdom, conducted by the economist Kate Barker. The Barker Review highlights an average yearly UK house price increase, in real terms, of 2.5% over the past 30 years. That contrasts with France, Sweden and Germany, where prices have remained constant or, indeed, have fallen. One of the main reasons cited for this phenomenon is the lack of responsiveness in housing supply in the UK. In other words, there is not sufficient housing to satisfy the demand, leading to large price increases.

In Northern Ireland, the supply of housing has been stifled further by the moratorium placed on single rural dwellings by Draft Planning Policy Statement 14. I am concerned to note from the interim report that Sir John Semple supports that policy.

In December 2006, a report on the situation in Great Britain entitled 'The Geography of Affordable and Unaffordable Housing', which was published by the Joseph Rowntree Foundation, suggested improving mobility to allow people to purchase dwellings in more affordable areas. That is not acceptable either. People should be allowed to purchase affordable dwellings in their own areas. The report also expressed concern about the ratio of high prices and mortgage costs to incomes and called for the introduction of policies to assist working families who are being priced out of the market.

High levels of unaffordability, therefore, are a problem across the UK and not just in Northern Ireland. The problem has been gaining momentum in recent years, with little indication of a willingness to tackle the issue on the part of the Government. Nobody can deny that it has become difficult for first-time buyers to purchase a home, or that those on the Housing Executive waiting list have a long wait for accommodation. Efforts must be made to help these groups.

House prices and demand have increased — particularly in the Dungannon area, among others, and Fermanagh and South Tyrone, which I am focusing on — due to factors such as the number of foreign workers. Also, businesspeople are buying up large numbers of houses — which is not against the law, I must add — and filling them to capacity with multiple occupants. That is not helpful.

There needs to be some protection for first-time buyers and the socially disadvantaged. There is an urgent requirement for the Government to secure development land and ring-fence it for social housing and low-cost starter homes. Otherwise, young individuals and couples will not be able to access social housing or enter the property market. That could and should be done through local area plans. Sir John Semple's report acknowledges that.

Where there is land available in the Government estate, it should be protected and kept for social housing, rather than being sold at the current market value, which in some cases is over £1 million per acre. The Government should look seriously and quickly at protecting some of their land for such purposes.

As many Members do, I regularly wade through the planning quagmire. There is little doubt that the Planning Service has a continual backlog. It needs more staff and more flexibility. A strategy needs to be formulated and implemented to ensure a supply of affordable housing that will allow first-time buyers to get into the property market.

I support the motion.

Ms S Ramsey: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. As other Members have done, I want to congratulate Patsy McGlone for moving this motion and giving us the opportunity to debate affordable housing, Housing Executive waiting lists, etc. However, I support the amendment, which enhances the motion. I have not heard anyone say that he or she does not support the amendment, so I assume that we are going to have agreement at the end of the debate.

I am struck by the number of young people in the Gallery. Statistics have been thrown around this morning about the length of time that people spend on waiting lists for housing. How many of these young people in the Gallery — I hope that they are not thinking of buying houses now — will be able to afford a new house in a few years' time? We have talked about how much first-time buyers have to pay. Equally, how many years will those young people have to spend on a waiting list before they can get social housing? We have a duty to invest in their future and ensure that the Executive starts working as quickly as possible, not only for young people but for everybody's future.

We all know that good housing is essential to the maintenance of a healthy population, and we know that there is a crisis with the provision of affordable and social housing. I do not want to go over all the statistics that have been highlighted. People need space to live in and facilities that are adequate for looking after themselves. We need to ensure that the housing stock is there and up to the proper standard.

The level of home ownership in deprived areas is low. It is common for people to be forced to rely on public-housing programmes for accommodation for themselves and their families at an affordable cost. There is a huge under-provision of affordable and social housing. The housing market is dominated by private landlords and property speculators.

I support my colleague's amendment. I wish also to congratulate Patsy McGlone for bringing the subject to the Floor of the House. In 2004-05, approximately 17,000 households presented as homeless. Some 6,000 of those households had dependent children. The vast majority of those households without dependent children were made up of single people rather than couples. In 1995-96, the comparable figures were 11,000 and 4,500. Over that period of fewer than 10 years, the numbers have grown substantially, with most growth occurring in households that do not have dependent children. More specifically, almost all the growth took place during the four years from 1999-2000 to 2003-04.

Behind each of those statistics are stories of great stress and the hidden reality of people struggling to achieve the housing stability and security that they need to live healthy lives. Recently, the Assembly discussed mental-health issues. I assume that the added stress of housing worries adds to that experienced by families and individuals. The breakdown of relationships contributes to the figures for single people. There are long-term waiting lists for single people, never mind families.

Across the four Belfast constituencies, 55% of people live in flats or terraced housing. That is well above the average for the North, which is 35%. This situation must be remedied. The growing waiting list for public or social housing must be targeted. We must recognise that the problem is made worse by the fact that housing stock is diminishing before our eyes. There is severe pressure on first-time buyers.

I agree with the last two Members who spoke that there is a need for major investment in social-housing programmes in targeted areas. Fra McCann mentioned that one in 20 houses is empty. To target the issue of waiting lists and affordability, those empty homes must be put to good use. He mentioned also that Sinn Féin raises the issues of social housing and affordable housing at every opportunity. The party had reservations about the appointment of John Semple. However, we will hold back and wait to see the report.

We need to get an Executive up and running and make affordable and social housing one of their priorities. Every Member agrees that every person should have access to health, education and housing.

I support the amendment.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The next Member to speak is Ms Marietta Farrell. On this occasion, Ms Farrell will speak for the first time. As this is her maiden speech, convention dictates that it be heard without interruption.

Ms Farrell: I am very pleased to speak to the House for the first time, particularly today, as it is Martin Luther King Day. Martin Luther King is a hero of mine. He was an inspiration to me and to the civil rights movement in Northern Ireland, from which my party, the SDLP, was born.

I am pleased to support the motion, especially as my constituency of Lagan Valley has the highest house prices in Northern Ireland. According to the University of Ulster's quarterly house price index, in the second quarter of 2006, the average price of a house in Lisburn was over £195,000, which is roughly £34,000 higher than the average Belfast house price, and £32,000 higher than the Northern Ireland average. House prices in Northern Ireland are rising by approximately £600 a week. Those statistics are most certainly out of date now. Recently, I looked at advertisements in estate agents' windows in Lisburn. A former Housing Executive-owned terraced house was selling for £165,000.

A quarter-acre building site with outline planning permission for one house in the city had an asking price of £235,000. A local estate agent told me that it was not uncommon for a house price to jump £20,000 or £30,000 in one afternoon between her showing a house to a client and returning to the office. She also told me that there used to be around one mortgage default every two months; now, there are four to five every month, with most defaulters being young couples.

1.15 pm

As stated earlier, statistics from the Nationwide show that first-time buyers in the North are borrowing over five times their annual income. That is well above the UK average, especially in comparison with Scotland, where the average sum borrowed is 3.6 times a person's annual salary.

Unlike in England and Wales, the Government have no clear strategy to tackle the problem of the lack of affordable housing in Northern Ireland. Unless a clear strategy is put in place and followed through, the lack of affordable housing will be an increasing problem for young families and low-income households and will become a barrier to their accessing jobs and participating in communities.

Although the Semple Review examined the obstacles and identified a series of recommendations, which have already been mentioned by other Members, immediate action from a new Northern Ireland Assembly is needed in order to develop a strategy for improved access to affordable housing and to make a commitment to the proper provision of social housing.

I am very concerned about the current inadequate levels of social housing, the corresponding high waiting lists and the number of homeless people in Northern Ireland.

According to statistics published by the Department for Social Development in 2006, second to Belfast, Lisburn City Council has the highest social-rented housing waiting list, with a figure of 3,344 people. Only 1,229 new dwelling starts were undertaken by housing associations in Northern Ireland in the last financial year, 144 of which were in the Lisburn City Council area. In Northern Ireland as a whole, a further 69 dwelling starts were commenced during the first quarter of the current financial year. It is a cause for great concern that the figure for new dwelling-house completions is much lower, with only 782 completed in the year 2005-06. That figure is down by 46 from the previous period.

Demand for social housing has increased greatly since 2002. In the year 2002-03, over 40,000 people in Northern Ireland were on social-housing waiting lists. That figure increased to over 47,000 by 2005-06. Those figures illustrate that provision of new-build social housing is, indeed, inadequate and has greatly increased the demand for privately rented accommodation, which has led to a significant increase in rental prices.

On taking over the constituency office in Lagan Valley recently, I asked the staff to compile a list of problems most often presented by constituents. Social housing was high up on that list, particularly issues concerning the notorious Draft PPS 14, which has already been mentioned. As in other parts of the North, rural housing prices in Lagan Valley have rocketed, making it impossible for young people to buy houses in their communities. Having to move away from extended family and deep community ties causes its own problems.

In a statement in September 2006, David Hanson said that the availability of:

“good housing can help improve people's health and well-being. It can influence children's educational attainment and help individuals to take part in normal social activities. It also contributes to the stability and economic well-being of our communities.”

The reverse is also true: bad housing can lead to ill health and stress; it can have a significant influence on poor educational attainment and lead to unhappiness, isolation and disaffection from community and society.

The motion uses the term “housing crisis”. As I, and other Members, have illustrated, that term means a great deal more than the constant discussions about, and our frequent obsession with, house prices.

Northern Ireland, with its strong community and family ties, has not experienced the same level of homelessness as some parts of the UK, but that is changing. In 2005–06, there were 9,749 “unintentionally homeless” people in Northern Ireland. Although not the only reason, house prices are, increasingly, a contributing factor. There is a growing strain on resources, both for the Housing Executive and for the voluntary agencies that deal with homelessness. Currently, the Simon Community Northern Ireland — to name just one organisation — provides emergency accommodation in Belfast, Bangor, Coleraine, Derry, Downpatrick, Lisburn and Newry.

In the past few years, we have seen some tragic examples of people, especially those from the migrant communities, who have fallen through the net of support with dire consequences. I am thinking of 46-year-old Anika White from Slovakia who was found dead in Ballymena and of Oksana Sukhanova from the Ukraine who was found in a Coleraine street in January 2005 and, subsequently, almost died from frostbite. Last night, as happens most nights, homeless people were sleeping on the streets of Northern Ireland. There is no doubt that some of them are victims of our growing house prices.

Forty years ago, the BBC televised a docudrama called ‘Cathy Come Home’. It told the story of a family’s disintegration and spiralling descent into homelessness due to unaffordable housing, with a mother and her children ending up sleeping on the streets. That play was set in London. However, if the new Executive do not tackle the affordable housing crisis as a priority, we may have a Northern Irish Cathy, more Anikas and Oksanas and a growing number of men and women who have to sleep rough on the streets of Northern Ireland.

I support the motion.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Storey: I pay my compliments to the previous Member who spoke. If, as we have heard today, she delivers her addresses in the Assembly and represents her constituency in the manner in which she has today, there is no doubt that she will be a capable advocate for the constituents of Lagan Valley.

At the outset, I wish to pay tribute to the Members who proposed the amendment — sorry, not the amendment, the motion — [Laughter:] I do not want to give any credence to a Member whose party cannot even deliver. Therefore, I pay tribute to the Members who moved the motion, and, in particular, I commend Mr McGlone, who has ably chaired the rural planning subgroup. For those who cannot get onto the property ladder, rural planning is not unrelated to affordable housing.

The DUP wholeheartedly supports the endeavour to provide, as a matter of urgency, affordable, social-rented and intermediate housing. Several Members have referred to the problem of affordable housing. When we debate issues in the Assembly, the same difficulty arises: although Members can easily identify the problems, we must formulate realistic solutions to those problems. It is not enough to say that an incoming Executive will tackle the issues. Indeed, given what happened at the weekend, no one knows when there will be a new Executive. It seems as though the republican movement cannot bring itself to say simple words such as “delivery, delivery, delivery”. Therefore, it is quite possible that there will not be a new Executive for some considerable time. Rather than utter the words that we need to hear, we are given ambiguity and four pages of republican spin. However, we must not allow ourselves to be trapped in this position for ever. Members should come to the House with recommendations that can give leadership to how we address the problems facing first-time buyers.

In particular, in the light of the planning policies, I want to focus on an issue concerning affordable housing, which is raised in Sir John Semple’s report. I commend Sir John Semple on the interim report. Members must remember that it is an interim report, which is subject to consultation.

I urge Members to respond to that report in the same manner in which they have articulated their concerns during this debate. There is to be further consultation and a final report, which I understand is to be presented in March. Sir John raises the use of article 40 of The Planning (Northern Ireland) Order 1991. However, that is not a viable tool for providing a significant number of affordable houses in the private/developer sector, which is more likely to deliver new developments that meet the aims of mixed tenure, community balance and citizens’ well-being. The main reason for the problem is the steep rise — particularly in the past three years — in the cost of land for building. A horrendous figure is contained in chapter 5 of Sir John’s report, which states that:

“Land prices have risen dramatically in the past three years with the average cost of housing land rising by 300% since 2003”.

All Members, particularly those who represent rural constituencies, know about the pressure that that situation has created.

Mrs D Kelly: In my constituency, which the Deputy Speaker knows well, a 0·2-acre site on former bogland was sold for £138,000 due to Draft PPS 14. That site might normally have fetched only between £25,000 and £40,000. In Banbridge, a plot of housing development land fetched £1·1 million three weeks ago, which equates to £100,000 per housing unit. That is unsustainable in any society.

Mr Storey: I am grateful to the Member for bringing that to our attention; I am sure that all Members could provide examples of similar situations from their constituencies. Those price rises are a fundamental consequence of the planning limbo that exists in Northern Ireland, particularly in my constituency, which I cite because it is the one that I know best.

A draft northern area plan has been published, which is subject to a judicial review. That plan should be operational, or should at least be at the stage of a public inquiry. However, that is still a very long way off, and 2011 looks a likely time for a public inquiry rather than for the implementation of that plan.

The draft northern area plan has crucial and unpredictable implications for issues of major concern, which the Planning Service is not currently addressing, thereby contributing to the problems. The most crucial of those unpredictable implications concerns whether existing town boundaries will be extended. Mrs Kelly referred to the price of rural land; let us look at the situation that has now developed in urban settings because of Draft PPS 14. There has been an unacceptable rise in the prices of those properties because a ban or moratorium has been placed on development in the countryside.

Towns have become constrained in their ability to deliver affordable housing within the urban boundaries. Arguably, as a result of the aforementioned continuing uncertainty, certain speculative development land — which makes up the majority of unused building land in my home town and its urban footprint — including brownfield and redevelopment sites, has been bought and is being financed at prices that are beyond the level of a developer in the building industry who wishes to provide affordable housing within the existing town boundaries.

1.30 pm

In the past 12 months, the prices of the lowest-rung housing in my constituency have increased hugely, creating a situation in which many aspiring first-time buyers are unable to access home ownership. Instead they are driven to what can only be described as spending dead money on renting houses or apartments from investors, which, ironically, are the very same properties that they would have bought had it not been for the greed-driven building prices that have been created by this situation.

A typical property on one of the lower rungs of the ladder in my town, a house with two or three bedrooms, costs some £170,000, of which the land element accounts for an astounding £100,000. Unfortunately, the average first-time-buyer household income can only support a mortgage on attractive terms of £120,000, which will be less if interest rates continue their recent upward trend. Accordingly, we have a shortfall of some £55,000 to £60,000 — more than half the land element cost — which, under article 40 of The Planning (Northern Ireland) Order 1991, a developer could be obliged to fund in respect of the 20% of all dwelling units on a major mixed-tenure development.

Since the publication of the article 40 affordable housing obligations, building land prices could be driven down by the release of additional lands for an extension of boundaries and by the consequent market forces, which would enable developers to provide affordable housing. The immediate introduction of arbitrary measures or set targets under article 40 would be ill-advised. It would be preferable to introduce certain targets incrementally.

To speed this matter up we also need to look —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member draw his remarks to a close?

Mr Storey: We also need to look at the rural community, landowners and farmers, and relieve the pressure that developers put on them. They need an opportunity to develop their own land.

Dr Birnie: This is a timely debate on an issue that is vital to those who are finding themselves hard-pressed to get a home, particularly a first home.

As has been noted, it is striking that, during the five-year period after 2000, the number of first-time buyers in Northern Ireland decreased by almost a quarter, whereas the figure for GB was a reduction of only 7%. That indicates a problem. It is obvious that the situation is being driven by the very rapid increase in house prices, as several Members noted. Indeed, the increase has been much higher than recent average UK growth. The very rapid growth in house prices, and the consequent difficulties for house buyers, is almost certainly produced by the demand for housing being much greater than the supply to meet it. We should bear that analysis of the problem in mind as we consider the correct policy response, and particularly — the motion refers to this — the interim report on housing affordability by Sir John Semple.

We need to note, in particular, some of the recommendations in the Semple Report, especially the recommendation that the Department for Regional Development should look again at its housing growth indicators for the period 1998 to 2015, which are set at 208,000 new houses. That figure, even though it was revised upwards in the past, is still almost certainly too low. As my party colleague Mr Cobain said, we support the recommendation in the interim report that the number of newly built social houses be increased substantially to 2,000 a year. Other Members mentioned the serious impact — perhaps at the margin but nonetheless significant — of stamp duty on the expenses of house buyers, particularly first-time buyers. The Chancellor should examine stamp-duty levels and the house-price threshold at which they first apply.

Land will be needed for an aggregate supply of houses to be built. We should note that Sir John Semple's interim report recommends: that the Department of the Environment should undertake an annual housing and land availability study; that selective de-zoning should be considered; and that the Department for Social Development should examine the scope for stronger, increased vesting of land for house building.

(Madam Speaker in the Chair)

Any policies should be sensitive to the different types of household that seek accommodation. For example, there is a demand for family housing, and that is not often provided in the market; that is the case in my constituency of South Belfast. There is also an increasing demand for dwellings for single people. That may reflect an increase in the number of families breaking up, or the growth, over the past three years, in the number of migrant workers in Northern Ireland. The supply of housing must therefore reflect diversity of demand. There is a need for urgent action.

Mr N Dodds: Like Dr Birnie, I think that this debate on affordable housing is important to many of our constituents.

The work that has been undertaken so far by the affordability review team, under Sir John Semple, has been extremely worthwhile. The interim report is a thorough and commendable piece of work. The production of an interim report is a good move, as it allows time for feedback before proceeding to a final report. A few weeks ago, I met Sir John and his team, and I was impressed with the seriousness and dedication with which they approached the issue. This is a timely debate that will make an important contribution to Sir John's work.

Several Members have already mentioned the current high prices of housing and land, and they have referred to the fact that there has been a period of sustained low interest rates. There was a slight rise in interest rates last week, but continuing, substantial increases in house prices have been forecast. It may comfort some people to hear that the market will readjust, or will self-adjust, and that the situation will even out. Unfortunately, many people — first-time buyers and those wanting to enter the housing market — will be unable to catch up with last week's increase in interest rates.

I do not intend to quote many statistics, but figures in the interim report compare the current proportion of income that is needed to buy a house with past statistics, and the figures are staggering. In 2002, when I was Minister for Social Development, I discussed this issue with officials. Here we are in 2007, and escalating and exorbitant costs are much more severe. Something must be done.

Members have referred to land prices, which have gone up threefold in three years. There is much land speculation, and many private investors are buying up land or holding on to land in the hope that the price will increase. Similarly, many properties are being bought for investment purposes. That is adding to the problem.

Sir John suggested some solutions that are worth considering. I am particularly intrigued with the suggestion to set up a land assembly agency; however, Sir John has said that more work needs to be done on that proposal. It is an interesting argument, and such an agency would mirror similar bodies that have been set up in England. He has also suggested that the period for which planning consent applies should be reduced to prevent land-banking and proposes greater powers of vesting.

The review referred to open spaces, particularly those that are in many of our Housing Executive estates. For example, in the lower Shankill, which is in the West Belfast constituency of my hon colleague, there are enormous swathes of vacant, open land that are not being used for housing; there are also other estates like that. There is a case for saying to the Housing Executive that it should be more proactive in identifying land in such estates for housing use. More and more often, residents of those estates tell us that they want areas to be used for housing rather than left lying derelict or being used for antisocial behaviour, as is often the case. Clearly, it is fair enough for land to be needed for recreational, open-space purposes. However, in many cases, such land is simply not being used for any particular purpose. As Sir John recommends, the Housing Executive:

“should adopt a proactive approach to making use of appropriate open space for affordable housing and should start a number of pilot projects as soon as possible.”

That idea should be pursued.

Sir John also suggested that community land trusts be established. Under such schemes, people would effectively buy the house or property — but not the underlying land. Examples of that model across the water have proved to be reasonably successful. Anything that increases people's ability to get into the housing market is worth considering.

Since its inception, the co-ownership scheme has been most worthwhile: 19,000 to 20,000 households have benefited from it. Recently, however, it has suffered in that the uptake has not been the same as in previous years. That has a lot to do with the rise in house prices; massive increases make it difficult for people who want to get into the property market through co-ownership to compete. The Member for Lagan Valley Ms Farrell mentioned the speed of price increases; they can rise by £10,000 or £20,000 in an afternoon. Therefore more flexibility needs to be introduced into the co-ownership scheme.

Low current-value limits need to be reviewed, and a reduction in rent levels should be considered. The co-ownership scheme still has the potential to help a lot of people get into the property market, and it should therefore be sustained.

Sir John also referred to stamp duty and the effect that it can have. Given that it can add a substantial cost to the price of a property, it can significantly affect people's ability to get into the housing market. Although stamp duty is part of the wider fiscal and taxation arrangements that are decided at a higher level than this Assembly, it should be impressed on the Chancellor that changes to the stamp duty system should be encouraged strongly. That is because some areas suffer as a result of high levels of deprivation and a great deal of social exclusion and need.

I add my voice of support to those who want new-build social housing to be increased year on year. Currently, 1,500 new houses a year are being built. I agree with those who say that that figure should be increased, even though a cost will be attached. I remember fighting battles with two Ministers of Finance and Personnel about getting money for the DSD for new social build. Back then, the view was always taken that compared with the rest of the United Kingdom, Northern Ireland did rather well in allocating money for housing and that consideration had to be given to paring back expenditure in that sector. However, given that John Prescott announced massive investment in housing in England, that argument is no longer sustainable. In any case, the need for housing exists. If we are serious about putting TSN and combating poverty at the top of the agenda, Government here — whether direct rule or devolved — should make new housing a priority.

1.45 pm

I could deal with many areas, but I do not have much time left. I want to mention voids in the private-rented sector. Many areas are blighted by houses and properties that lie void for extended periods, but getting something done about them involves a lot of red tape: the process is slow and cumbersome, and articles are served. It becomes a whole rigmarole; the owner sometimes does not want to know, and the matter has to go back and forward, and so on. People who live in areas that are affected by those voids feel that they blight those areas. I very much believe that action should be taken to address that.

Sir John mentions the empty dwelling management orders that have been introduced in England. When we met as part of the review, I urged him to consider recommending their introduction here. Such orders allow a local authority — in this case, probably the Housing Executive — to step in, take control of a house that is void or derelict and bring it up to standard. The problem is thus proactively addressed, and houses are not left derelict and void for years.

The private-rented sector is increasingly dominating some estates and housing developments. There is a strong case for greater regulation, not just of houses in multiple occupation (HMOs) but of all privately rented houses. There must be stronger controls to deter landlords who buy houses and then neglect their upkeep or who do not care terribly to whom they let the house. Stronger regulation is needed as this is one of the biggest areas of complaint raised with me.

We could spend all day discussing the many issues that this debate raises. However, I want to make one final point. Much work needs to be done to ensure the availability of low-cost housing in urban renewal areas, and people must be incentivised to stay in such areas. Often they are bought out at a certain price, but because the new houses are sold at such a high price, they cannot afford to buy them. I am pushing the Department to do something about that.

Mrs D Kelly: I am late in joining the debate, so it is difficult to add anything new.

I want to lend my support to Mr Dodds's comments on regulation of the private-rented sector. The highest number of complaints that public representatives hear concerns antisocial behaviour and the lack of care of rented houses — overgrown hedges or overhanging trees or whatever.

Some parties have been concerned about whether or not their members support Draft PPS 14 — both the DUP and Sinn Féin have had problems with that. However, I can assure the House that, from the outset, the SDLP realised the dilemma that Draft PPS 14 poses for rural dwellers. I too welcome Sir John Semple's report, but, like Mr Elliott, I do not support Draft PPS 14.

I have young daughters at university, one of whom is now studying for a postgraduate degree. Under the student loans scheme, she will leave university with loans and debts potentially amounting to £30,000. That is appalling. How on earth will she ever be able to afford a house? As soon as she gets a job — and I hope that she will — she will have to start repaying her student loans. Contrary to what many of us thought, student loans do incur interest, so long repayment periods result in additional costs. Thus many young people and first-time buyers will find it increasingly difficult to buy a home. That is a great concern and must be one of the key challenges for any new Assembly and restored institutions. Some Members talked about the need to show leadership and the need for a restored Assembly. The onus is not just on one party; as we all know, there are two parties in this dance. They need to get their act together because the community is crying out for decisions.

There are solutions to the affordable housing crisis. A lot of land is in public ownership. Some weeks ago, my party colleague for East Derry, Mr Dallat, talked about the amount of land that is owned by the Water Service. In Craigavon, a lot of land was taken and kept aside by the old commission. It is still there and is still unused, yet over 2,000 people are on housing waiting lists in the Upper Bann constituency, many of whom are in dire circumstances.

The issues of affordable housing and home ownership are easily within the gift of direct-rule Ministers. We do not have to wait any longer. Members of Parliament have raised and debated at Westminster a range of measures that could be implemented soon.

Many Members have referred to homelessness, and I share their concerns. Recently, someone in my parish died, and six people suddenly became homeless. The Northern Ireland Housing Executive must address, as a matter of urgency, the test for homelessness and how waiting lists for the homeless are handled, because there are peaks of homelessness when a house becomes vacant.

The message has not yet been conveyed to the public, and in particular to young people, about how houses are built for social need and how areas are determined. It is not a matter of waiting for someone to die. My constituency office now receives calls to say: "So-and-so is on their last legs. Will you see what you can do for me?" It is a dire situation that reflects the tension and stress in the community. Members are aware of the link between housing and ill health.

Affordable housing is a key challenge, and I wait eagerly to see whether Sir John Semple has taken the views of the parties on board. Some Members have reservations about Sir John Semple but have taken as their own the appointment of Lord Carlile as the overseer of MI5. I find that surprising.

I will finish, because a number of other Members wish to speak. I support the motion.

Mr Copeland: I join in the congratulations to the proposers of the motion and of the amendment.

Housing is the largest single issue in my constituency office, which deals with approximately 1,000 citizens. Some of them are one-person households, some two-, some three- or more.

Members must not forget that behind all of the statistics, research and views that have been put forward, there are citizens — people. I will cite two cases that sum up the core issue that Members are attempting to address.

My wife and I were married 27 years ago and enjoyed regular and fairly well-remunerated employment. My wife was a police officer, and I was in the construction industry and a part-time officer in the UDR. In other words, we were not short of a shilling. We purchased our first house for £12,500, and I remember sitting with my wife to work out how we could afford the mortgage. That property is now valued in excess of £200,000. Today, with our combined income, we could not raise a mortgage to purchase the property that we bought 27 years ago. What hope is there for young people who do not command enormous salaries to get a foot on the housing ladder?

The second case is more interesting and more tragic. It is the case of a young couple whom I will call Mr and Mrs T. He was employed in security work in entertainment establishments in Belfast and earned a few pence above the minimum wage. His partner, the mother of their two children, secured work at just above the minimum wage for 16 hours a week in a local hotel. He lost his job; they fell behind in their rent and were evicted from their privately rented property — which had been consuming in excess of 70% of their combined income — rendering them homeless.

The Housing Executive, bound by legislation, adjudicated that they were intentionally homeless. Mrs T, the couple's three-year-old child and three-month-old baby are now living with her mother. Mr T is living with his parents.

If the motion has any failing, it is that it concentrates on affordable housing and does not mention social housing. It is not rocket science to work out that affordable —

Mr McGlone: It is pretty widely accepted that the definition of "affordable housing" not only embraces privately owned or privately rented property but social housing. That is accepted widely, including by Sir John Semple.

Mr Copeland: I accept the Member's point.

There is a difference between what people can afford to pay and what they are being asked to pay. Housing could only be affordable if there were a swing in the balance in order to bring the cost of houses down or raise the wages of the people who want to buy those houses. Neither is likely to happen to such a degree that it will restore the equilibrium. Ways can be sought to address the issue. However, for an increasing number of people — be they people who were brought up in housing estates or in small streets, or people who attended grammar schools and lived in nicer houses — renting a property may be the first way to find a place to call home. There has been a focus on houses in the debate. For many, there is a difference between a house and a home, and in the social circumstances that surround them. There are many houses in east Belfast, but not enough has been done to ensure that its citizens can transform those houses into homes.

The Housing Executive was once charged with improving the awful housing conditions that pertained in the Province. Over time, great steps were taken to ensure that there was a supply of good-quality rented houses. However, the Housing Executive is now required to make annual efficiency savings of 2.5%, which amount to around £15 million of the Housing Executive's entire budget each year, or an average of around £4,405 from each office. The effects of that are such that, in some offices, senior housing managers do not even have someone to type a letter for them. Thought must be given to that matter.

Mr S Wilson: Given that house sales are around 4,000 each year, which is the equivalent to the housing stock of one Housing Executive district office, does the Member accept that the Housing Executive could make considerable efficiency savings in order to meet the Gershon requirement of 2.5%?

Mr Copeland: I do not doubt that it could do so through reorganisation. My contention is that the Housing Executive should address housing need. Increasingly, because of house sales, it must deal with a diminishing stock that is of diminishing quality, and it cannot discharge its statutory responsibility. That is done by housing associations. However, in my experience, housing associations do not build sufficient houses for the need.

The Member for Upper Bann Mr Simpson referred to "applicants" to the Northern Ireland Housing Executive. I confirmed with him that the term "applicants" was inappropriate. There are approximately 2,500 applications in the East Belfast constituency. In the part of south Belfast that most people believe is part of east Belfast, there are a further 1,000 applications. In the greater Castlereagh district, which most people also assume to be part of east Belfast, there are 2,700 applications. The total number of applications is around 6,200. Each of those applications may cover three, four or five people. It is not, therefore, a matter of the number of applicants, but of the number of citizens; that is important. In east Belfast, I am confronted with around 10,000 to 15,000 people who do not have appropriate accommodation.

2.00 pm

The basic building block of society is the home, which should be in close proximity to places of education, medical treatment and places to shop. Something has gone terribly wrong. I note the calls from the Member for Upper Bann Mr Simpson for the Government to intervene to address the problem. I am sick, sore and tired of calling on the Government, because the Government do not stand to gain or lose one single vote cast in an election by any citizen in the Province. I hope that sooner or later all of us in the House can create the circumstances whereby Members discharge the responsibilities placed on us at the time of election and deal with problems as they ought to be dealt with.

Mr Shannon: I rise to support the motion. Each year in Northern Ireland, 30,000 people make enquires about housing issues. There are 2,500 enquiries a month. That is a huge number of people with housing problems, when one considers the small population of the Province. In March 2006, approximately 32,000 people needed affordable housing, and of those 17,500 were considered urgent cases. There is need for change, and the Assembly has a vital part to play in the process.

In my constituency of Strangford, the average price of a house this year is in the region of £179,000, and that continues to rise by between £4,000 and £5,000 a month. The Halifax states that there has been a 43% growth in house prices in that area. The average income of my constituents is £13,500, so it is not difficult to work out the mathematics. Even a two-income household would find it impossible to get onto the first rung of the property ladder. People renting properties are faced with huge rent bills as they pay the increase that the landlord has laid out to buy the property. Those mounting bills are the reason that so many have no option but to put their names on the waiting list for Housing Executive flats and houses.

That is not taking the easy option; there are no other options for many to take. It is part of the reason that the number of first-time buyers has halved since 2001. There has been, on average, a £30,000 increase in the price of houses, yet in the same period there has been only a minimum increase in wages. That loss cannot be borne by first-time buyers and low-income renters, and could well explain why 30% of those who apply to the Housing Executive are living in poverty. It is becoming increasingly impossible for people to try to manage rent and the ever-surging utility and basic living costs on their own, particularly if they are one of the thousands of hard workers who earn the minimum wage. It is no small wonder that the waiting list is beyond the means of many.

The average person who has worked hard to buy his or her own small house is now working equally hard to pay the bills, let alone buy the property. Many semi-professionals, instead of studying for a degree and getting a job and house, are now clubbing together to buy small terraced houses, praying that the current trend continues so that they can all make enough money to start out on their own.

The Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors fears that 50 families a day will lose their homes due to defaulting on their loans and mortgages this year. The mortgage should not exceed 30% of the income of the home; when it is larger than that, people are faced with making a choice between defaulting on their mortgage or providing food and heating for the household. The number of reposessions in 2006 increased by 76% on the same period in 2005 — a startling figure. Subsequently, the Housing Executive is being presented with over 20,000 homeless people, half of whom are accepted as genuine. That is an increase of over 1,000 from the same time in the previous year. That cannot be allowed to continue. The fact that the Bank of England has increased interest rates for the third time in five months means greater hardship for mortgage payers. Rates have gone up from 3.5% to 5.25% in the last three years. That is a significant figure. When added up, that will mean an extra £100 a month in mortgage costs for many households in my constituency.

House prices in the Strangford area are the fourth highest in the United Kingdom, and the 0.25% increase in the lending rate has, for many, pushed an average of £50 for this month up to, perhaps, £100.

Not many years ago, one could have bought a terraced house in Ards for about £60,000 or £70,000. Today it will cost £130,000. Developers from all over the United Kingdom and, especially, the Republic of Ireland are coming here with seemingly bottomless pockets of money to invest, and they are buying houses everywhere. There is the real fear and threat of a 40-year mortgage and a mortgage that will be passed on to a borrower's children.

Those are the clear and bare facts that illustrate how much the situation has got out of hand and how it requires drastic change. In rereading the reports and figures, one will find a lot more figures that challenge the system, and we must look at those. One might ask what our options are or what the Assembly should take on board and implement when the time comes? The Semple Review's recommendations concerning vacant properties would be most effective when coupled with the proposals to convert into apartments the first floors of shops in our towns. The living over the shop (LOTS) scheme has been piloted in my area, but more could be done in Strangford and the rest of the Province with that. It is an excellent scheme that affords a grant of £25,000 or 75% of the value of the upper level refurbishment to a property owner. Not only will that provide more long-term, valuable, cost-effective housing but it will rejuvenate our towns and villages.

Some Members mentioned the valuable co-ownership scheme. My colleague Nigel Dodds from North Belfast mentioned it earlier. Many people in North Belfast, Strangford and across the Province have taken advantage of it. It should be promoted more widely, so that more people know to take advantage of it. Anyone who buys a £150,000 house through the co-ownership scheme will require a mortgage for only £75,000. The scheme gives the house buyer an opportunity to get on the first rung of the property ladder, and it should be widely promoted.

There is a number of unoccupied — or void — Housing Executive houses in the Ards area. My colleague from Lisburn said that there are 1,200 to 1,500 people on the waiting list for a house in Lisburn and east Belfast, but there are between 2,500 and 3,000 people on the waiting list in the Ards area. If that is not the longest waiting list in the Province, I would like to know where there is one longer. I am sure that it is a Province-wide problem.

Over 4% of the properties in the private rental scheme in Ards are vacant, and those houses could be reintroduced into the property market. The increased turnover of those would mean a wider market place, and the less desperate the need was for housing, the less money that investors and property developers would be able to squeeze out of consumers. One way of further aiding the refurbishment process is to lower the VAT on materials for such work to the lower figure of 5%. That clear aid would assist those who need a house.

The theory of turnover is mentioned often in the Semple Report, and it is one that is perhaps a basis of finding more affordable housing. Other initiatives such as an increase in the threshold for stamp duty in line with the substantial hike in house prices should be implemented as soon as the Assembly has the power to do so. It is unfair to expect first-time buyers to pay those costs as well as everything else, so I support the recommendation to exempt first-time buyers from that.

It is also imperative that local authorities release unused land for building; that would give a twofold benefit. First, there is the obvious benefit of making affordable housing available as requested in the motion. Those houses should be affordable and designed for first-time buyers and not for property magnates who are one of the major causes of the current problem. Secondly, the release of the land would enable local authorities to put the money to much better use and to where it belongs — in the community.

Perhaps Mr McGlone will consider the "kinship clause", as it is referred to in planning, whereby people who live in the countryside and rural communities can have an input into staying on the land. Many people would benefit if such a kinship clause were put into planning.

As an MLA, I want to be able to tell those who come to me in desperate need of a home that the waiting list is short and that they will soon be accommodated. I do not want to have to tell them that they will be forced to split up their family and live in hostel accommodation. Instead, it should be my duty as an elected representative to inform a young couple searching for a new house that there are tax breaks and grants to help them take that first step.

Furthermore, it should be my commission to ensure that the property developers, with their seemingly bottomless pockets, do not have the wherewithal to buy up — and thus inflate the prices of — houses in Strangford and, indeed, the rest of the Province.

A developer from the Republic came to Portavogie, a village in my constituency, and offered to buy nine houses for cash from a local builder. The builder said that he was not interested in the offer because he wanted to preserve the area and ensure that the houses were sold to people who lived in the village — first-time buyers — to give them an opportunity. I admire that builder because he took a clear stand: he wanted to ensure that local people got an opportunity to buy houses in the area. That attitude is to be welcomed.

The responsibility for ensuring that people can buy houses in their local areas should lie with a devolved Government, whose priority would be to improve the quality of life for our constituents. For that reason, I support the motion. The Government should take into account the report's findings and make the resolution of the housing crisis a top priority for the elected Executive.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. As Mr Shannon said, statistics illustrate the crisis mentioned in the text of the motion. In March 2006, 32,215 people were on the common waiting list for social housing. Of those people, 17,433 were in housing stress. In 2005-06, over 20,000 people presented themselves as homeless, of which 48% were accepted as such. That was an increase of over 1,000 people compared with the previous year.

In Northern Ireland, fewer than 50% of housing benefit recipients have their full rent paid compared with 30% to 40% of the recipients in GB. The proportion of houses being bought by first-time buyers is declining. In 2001, 60% of house sales went to first-time buyers. By 2005, however, that figure had fallen to 36% and has, no doubt, fallen further since then.

The Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors said recently that those seeking to get onto the property ladder must now save an average of 81.2% of their joint take-home pay. That figure covers the upfront costs of buying a typical home, including stamp duty and a deposit. The average two-person household spends about 22% of take-home pay on their mortgage. It is clear that, unless more affordable housing is built, and the Government raise the stamp duty threshold, more and more households will struggle to access the housing market.

First-time buyers in Northern Ireland face a tougher challenge than their counterparts in the UK. Average salaries in Northern Ireland are lower, yet average house prices are much higher than in other UK regions and are continuing to rise quickly. It is expected that affordability conditions will worsen during 2007, with a predicted growth in house prices of between 8% and 10%. In addition, there is the potential for a further interest rate rise next month.

Affordability is, without doubt, the biggest issue facing the housing market. Earlier this month, a survey of regional house prices in the last three months of 2006 showed that the fastest growth was in Northern Ireland. House prices in Northern Ireland jumped by 44.1% compared with the same period a year earlier. That rate of growth was three times higher than in Scotland, where prices rose by 16%. The biggest increases were in Northern Ireland, where prices rose by 53%.

In my constituency of Newry and Armagh, 2,667 people are on the waiting list for public housing, yet only 90 new units have been built in the last two years. More and more people on benefits are being forced into private rental accommodation, where there is a growing differential between rental allowance and private rents. Private rents are currently running at around £500 per month, thus plunging people into a further downward spiral of poverty, with its own associated problems.

2.15 pm

House prices in Newry have rocketed. Three-bedroom semis have increased in price by 30% to 40% over the past year; prices have broken the £200,000 barrier, the average being £230,000. Those three-bedroom semis have in some instances become second-buyer homes.

The situation for first-time buyers in the Newry area is extremely difficult. For a first-time buyer to purchase a £180,000 house, they require a minimum 5% deposit of about £9,000; they pay stamp duty of about 1%, which is a further £1,800; they pay solicitor's fees of £1,800; and surveyor's fees of around £1,000. In total, they will need savings of about £13,600. That is a year's salary for many first-time buyers. Their mortgage payments on a loan of £180,000 will be on a repayment basis, probably over 30 years, at £1,100 a month.

In Newry, development-land prices are usually a good indicator of future market expectations. Due to a very conservative and restrictive area plan and the introduction of Draft PPS 14, development opportunities for builders have become scarce. The present dearth of development land, coupled with the stifling effects of Draft PPS 14, is pushing house prices sky-high.

Development land in Newry costs about £1 million an acre, with individual sites making more than £200,000. As the price of houses increases, the builder pays more for the land. The only way to alleviate that is to release more land for the development of both public and private housing and to undo the stringent curtailments of Draft PPS 14. I support the motion.

Mr McCann: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

Most Members who spoke this morning had their fingers on the pulse, regardless of which party they belong to. People are well tuned in to the crisis that we face and how it should be dealt with, so I will be fairly brief in support of the amendment.

Patsy McGlone said that affordability covers social housing, but many people see a clear separation between affordability and the supply of social housing from either housing associations or the Housing Executive. That is why the amendment deals with that issue separately.

I included vacant properties in the amendment because they are such a problem. John Semple said that 5% of all housing stock is lying vacant and that something must be done about it. We can also widen the debate because there is more to the housing mix than the issues that I identify in my amendment or that Patsy McGlone identifies in his motion: problems such as the allocation system and homelessness. In my constituency, young people stay in hostels for three or four years before they can even get a house. We have all heard the figures on the rise of house prices. In my constituency, former social housing is selling for between £200,000 and £210,000. We need to get to grips with a wide range of housing issues. However, I thought that to include them in the motion would offer us a way of looking at affordable housing, social provision and vacant properties.

Mr S Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCann: No, Sammy. Most Members spoke about housing, but Edwin Poots tried to sectarianise the issue, which was very sad. We could have argued with one unified voice and not had a sectarian argument. A review into how housing need came about would come to a different conclusion from the one that Edwin Poots put forward. I commend the amendment; it is important that Members support its three elements. It does much more than Patsy McGlone's motion, and it will be more widely accepted by the community.

Mr Burns: Madam Speaker, I thank you for the time allowed for this very important debate, which has united the House. Members really do understand the seriousness of the housing crisis. The difficulty that people face in getting housing is a major talking point in all our constituency offices. Young people simply cannot afford housing. Others can get onto the Housing Executive list, but they cannot get a house.

Patsy McGlone kicked off today's interesting debate. He emphasised the huge lack of new affordable and social housing. Fra McCann came in with his amendment, and also brought to our attention the fact that if a large amount of social housing is built, it is vital that amenities follow in that area. Along with housing, the infrastructure needs to be put in place.

Mr S Wilson: Does the Member accept that, given that the report clearly defines social housing as including housing rented from the Housing Executive or a housing association, as well as housing rented from a private landlord, that part of the amendment really was not necessary?

Mr Burns: I very much agree with that. Perhaps it was not really an amendment but a different way of putting our motion forward.

Edwin Poots was very concerned about the huge sell-off of Housing Executive houses and the fact that more are being sold than built. He brought to our attention the stamp duty on housing and the fact that many builders are now land-banking housing land because the cost of the land is rising at such an alarming rate.

Fred Cobain spoke of his support for John Semple and the need for more housing in three categories — more social housing, more affordable housing and more private housing. He told us that it was essential that 2,000 homes be built every year; that was a very important point to get across. Kieran McCarthy from the Alliance Party talked about how difficult it is for young couples to get into the housing market.

That brought us to David Simpson of the DUP, whose first remark was that he would not be long. That reminded me of the minister who says that his sermon today will not be long, but David went the full distance of 10 minutes. He did allow two interventions, and then accused those people of stealing his speech. In fact, the whole tone of the debate has been one of unity.

Tom Elliott talked about the increase in the Bank of England base rate this week and how that put more pressure on the ability of first-time buyers to afford houses.

Sue Ramsey highlighted the social side of housing and how private landlords dominate the private rental market. She told Members that one in 20 houses in her constituency lies empty and that bringing those houses back into the private rental market would significantly ease the housing situation.

In a brilliant maiden speech, Marietta Farrell reminded Members that today is Martin Luther King Day.

Mr S Wilson: There was no bias in that remark.

Mr Burns: No, none at all.

Ms Farrell expressed her alarm at the high prices of houses in her Lagan Valley constituency and spoke of her fear of many more people becoming homeless.

Mervyn Storey of the DUP spoke about rural planning and how article 40 of The Planning (Northern Ireland) Order 1991, if implemented, would alleviate the situation.

Mrs D Kelly: Mr Storey mentioned the requirement of a political party to show leadership. However, the DUP requires leadership as much as Sinn Féin.

Mr Burns: For the Ulster Unionist Party, Dr Esmond Birnie highlighted the great difficulties experienced by first-time buyers. The SDLP will ask the Department of Regional Development to re-examine the figures relating to the land that will be released for new builds. He also talked about how stamp duty affects first-time buyers.

Nigel Dodds spoke of his support for Sir John Simple — [Laughter.] — Or rather, Sir John Semple. That was some slip of the tongue — [Laughter.]

Mrs D Kelly: It was right the first time.

Mr Burns: Mr Dodds covered all areas of the debate, including co-ownership and stamp duty. He referred to housing voids and acknowledged the great need for housing across the Province.

Dolores Kelly spoke about Draft PPS14 and the need for a homelessness test for those who join waiting lists for houses.

Michael Copeland gave a great speech on his history of buying houses. Some 27 years ago, when he bought his first house for £12,500, he wondered how on earth he would be able to pay that mortgage.

Mr McNarry: By joining the Assembly. [Laughter.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr Burns: Mr Copeland reminded Members that at today's valuation, that home would now be worth over £200,000 and, based on his and his wife's income 27 years ago, it would have been impossible to pay the mortgage. Today, that is the situation facing many young couples, who simply cannot afford to buy new homes.

The DUP's Mr Jim Shannon spoke proudly about a builder in his area who was not prepared to sell to the highest bidder but was interested in providing houses for his local community.

Dominic Bradley told us of the difficulties faced by first-time buyers in getting into the housing market.

This debate has united the House; we are all aware of the seriousness of the affordability issue, and of the great need for social housing.

2.30 pm

Mr McGlone: I agree with Mr Burns that the debate has been an important one. Will he accept that the situation requires a response that is not only strategic, but comprehensive in all its aspects? I note that the amendment ties us into one particular strategic approach to the unmet need, which is the renewal of vacant properties. Many of us who represent rural areas could argue that there are other important aspects, such as additional investment in new housing stock; in housing replacement and renovation; and home repair assistance grants, etc. The strategic response must be a comprehensive one that embraces many other facets as well as vacant properties, important as that is.

Mr Burns: I thank my colleague Patsy McGlone for his timely intervention. I support the motion.

Question, That the amendment be made, put and negatived.

Main Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly expresses serious concerns about the affordable housing crisis; notes the deliberations by the committee chaired by Sir John Semple; and demands that any new Executive make affordable housing an urgent Government priority.

Madam Speaker: I shall give Members a few moments, after which we will move to the motion on rural schools.

Rural Schools

Madam Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow two and a half hours for this debate, the Member proposing the motion having 15 minutes to propose, with 15 minutes for the winding-up speech. All other Members who wish to speak will have a maximum of 10 minutes.

Mrs Foster: I beg to move

That this Assembly notes the threat to rural schools in Northern Ireland; calls upon the Government to recognise the vital role that such schools play in the community; and urges the Government to put in place a strategy, where possible, to protect the viability of these schools.

The motion is intended to place on record the high value that Members place on rural schools and the value they have both for the communities that they serve and for the children who attend them. Members want the Government to recognise their worth and protect their viability. Instead of allowing schools to run down, the Government should be trying to sustain and maintain them.

Yesterday, I attended the funeral of a man who, at 64 years of age, had succumbed to cancer. The archdeacon who gave the address at the service of thanksgiving for his life, reminded us that that good man had attended Moybane Primary School. Moybane is a townland near Letterbreen in west Fermanagh. I mention it because there was a time, some 60 years ago, when one would encounter a small primary school in the country at every couple of miles or so. Times change, and the situation is now almost reversed. Few rural schools remain, and those in my own constituency are under constant threat of closure. I do not suggest that every townland needs a school, only that those who live in rural communities should not be forced to have their young children transported long distances to primary school.

When I was four years old, I travelled daily the one mile from my home near Rosslea to Aghadrumsee Primary School, where I had a most enjoyable time. Unfortunately, after the IRA tried to murder my father, I was moved, at the age of eight, to Lisnaskea Primary School, as the family was forced, for its own safety, to move out of its home. Newly arrived from little Aghadrumsee, Lisnaskea Primary School seemed huge to me. It was virtually a town school, yet now, with only 100 pupils, it would barely survive the cull. The Bain Report has set a new minimum enrolment for a functioning rural school.

Before passing on to other matters, I pay tribute to all the teachers who teach, or have taught, in rural schools. They say that one never forgets teachers. I have fond memories of most, if not all, of my teachers, but I can say that unreservedly of all my teachers at primary school. I hope that they can say the same of me, but one can never be sure about that.

The Bain Report envisages that the minimum enrolment for rural primary schools should be 105. It would be hard in any rural constituency — but particularly in my own — to find a rural school with such an enrolment. However, the Minister with responsibility for education, Maria Eagle, has said that:

“this is not an agenda to close small schools.”

I say to the Minister that, if it looks like an agenda for closing small schools, and it results in the closing of small schools, it is an agenda for closing small schools. When my colleagues and I have visited the Department of Education on behalf of small schools, it is always stressed that the Department puts children at the heart of all of its decisions. If that is so, why does the Department not listen to the voice of parents whose children are at small schools? Surely parents want what is best for their children. I know that I do.

My two eldest children attend a small primary school in Brookeborough, at primary 1 and 3. I would not have them attend any other. Each teacher at that school knows all the children, and all the children know one another. There is a positive atmosphere of goodwill and, because I see the benefits at first hand, I will continue to fight for small rural schools. Pupils are content; there is no bullying; and worries and problems are quickly identified and dealt with. That is also true of small secondary schools. Last year, the former Duke of Westminster High School, now Devenish College at Kesh, was closed, and the children were bused from north Fermanagh to Enniskillen. When the parents were fighting closure, they were concerned about the loss of individual attention to pupils that they had come to expect at the school at Kesh; large class sizes; and the impact that it would have on children who were perhaps not as quick as their peers.

They were also very worried about the long journey — over 20 miles — that some of their children now have to make on an overcrowded bus to Enniskillen. Apart from the obvious worries about safety on the roads, parents told me about the incidents of bullying that take place on buses and around the bus stops. Those parents were told that it would all be worthwhile as a new Devenish College was being built in Enniskillen. Needless to say, we are still waiting for that new school to be built, and, with the moratorium on building after the Bain Report, we will be waiting for quite some time.

I will be watching the costs of transporting those children to Enniskillen from Kesh and beyond. Due to the rural nature of the Western Education and Library Board area, transport costs take a huge part of the budget. Surely, with more thought, some of the transport budget could be put to better use in maintaining those schools under threat of closure.

No one wishes to retain schools that are falling apart — no matter what their size. However, policy-makers and administrators appear to have ignored evidence that refutes many of the claims that small schools are deficient and instead highlights the positive learning environments created in those schools.

One argument often put against small schools is that they limit children's learning experiences. However, education needs to serve the requirements of the individual, and if parents and children choose a small school — for whatever reason — why should the Government interfere with that choice?

Mr Mervyn Benford, a spokesperson for the National Association for Small Schools (NASS) in England, pointed out that small schools in England, with a smaller intake than has been proposed by the Bain Report, are getting the best results. He said:

"there is enormous long-term significance in the worth of keeping early education close to home and enriched by access to the local neighbourhood."

That certainly confirms what I have long thought. As long as there are good-quality schools — big or small — serving the community, and children to attend them, then surely it is worthwhile.

It is a truism that many rural communities in this country have suffered long and hard in the past 40 years. During those tough times, it was often the small rural school that provided continuity of normality — a happy, relaxed place for children who may have been living in a climate of fear. For some families, including my own, terrorism led to an enforced exit from the home, school and community. There is no doubt that the IRA's ethnic cleansing campaign along the border added to the fall in the number of children attending rural schools. My colleague Lord Morrow and I know all about Minterburn Primary School near Caledon, which has had to deal with such events and is now under severe threat of closure. The chairperson of the board of governors told us that the school had been a safe haven for children throughout the Troubles, and now they felt that the Government were dumping them.

If the Government are going to look at education merely in terms of numbers, they are missing out on all of the added value that rural schools provide for our children. The extra resources required to run small schools are a legitimate investment in rural communities, which otherwise benefit little from Government expenditure.

Statutory guidance for school adjudicators in one part of England says that the presumption should be against the closure of rural primary schools. However, it does not rule out school closures if a strong case can be made. That would be a good starting point for the Department of Education: the presumption should be for, not against, rural schools. However, numbers have a part to play in that decision, and in some cases it becomes very stark. That is why I regret that I am unable to accept the amendment. The motion is about the viability of schools, and I want to see the Government putting in place a strategy to make existing rural schools viable.

As far as my party is concerned, Government should move away from the policy of setting up schools in some sectors with as few as 12 pupils. Those new schools have an impact on the existing rural schools, be they controlled or maintained — as happened very recently in Fivemiletown — and they remain a threat to the viability of those existing rural schools.

Another small school in my constituency — at Carnall, near Clogher — is a fine example of what a good rural primary school should be. The only problem is that it is full to capacity. Last year, that school had to turn away a number of children because the Southern Education and Library Board would not allow it to admit any more. It is completely bizarre that, although that small rural school is bucking the trend and increasing numbers, the pen-pushers in the Department of Education have decided on an arbitrary number of pupils that the school can take, and that is that. One size does not fit all. I plead with the Department to consider flexibility in the way that it handles all schools. The Department needs to recognise that small can be beautiful.

2.45 pm

The local rural school is much more than bricks and mortar; it can have many functions if its potential is used to the full. In many areas, the school is the heart of the community and can act as a focal point for the development and attractiveness of an area as it attempts to become self-sustaining. It has long been recognised that school buildings represent a potential community resource. It is absurd that they are closed throughout the summer months and, indeed, most evenings.

The Government are withdrawing services from rural areas at will. The debates in the House over the past months have reflected that with regard to post offices, police stations, libraries, acute health provision, rural planning or education. Frankly, rural proofing has become a complete joke.

No doubt there are those in the House who will say that if a fully functioning Executive were up and running, it all would be different. I have two answers to that. First, I am not naive enough to think that if an Executive were up and running in the morning, there would not be tough choices to be made — of course there would. However, I like to think that there would be an acknowledgement of the individual needs of Northern Ireland as a country. That is what this motion seeks, and it is why my party is devolutionist.

Secondly, once those who have been wedded to the policy of an Armalite in one hand and a ballot box in the other finally put aside their violent ways for good, by word and deed, and support the police, the courts and the rule of law, we will be able to get on with securing our children's futures. What Sinn Féin says and, more importantly, does over the coming months can open the door to devolution. That is not up to anyone on this side of the House; we have already signed on in word and deed. Get on with it, so that we can get on with saving rural schools.

Mr D Bradley: I beg to move the following amendment: Leave out "where possible" and insert:

"based on quality of educational provision rather than pupil numbers".

Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Tá áthas orm an leasú don rún a mholadh. I commend the Members opposite for bringing the motion to the House. The amendment seeks to draw attention to the need for the provision of quality education rather than a simple numbers game, to be behind any Government strategy to protect the viability of rural schools. As Mrs Foster said, greater numbers do not necessarily mean better education. Many smaller schools provide a first-class education for their pupils.

We have already debated the threatened closure of post offices, both urban and rural, and now we must turn our attention to rural schools, which are already threatened by Draft PPS 14, as I have said before. The Bain Report has raised anxieties about the future of small rural schools and, indeed, some urban schools. It states that a third of schools — a total of 440 — do not have the minimum number of pupils that are required in order to be viable in its terms. People fear that, when the Department of Education gets round to publishing its sustainable schools policy, it will use the recommendations of the Bain Report to cut a swathe through the smaller schools and to cut the heart out of many communities. They fear that Bain has broken the ice for the Department to act, if not axe.

Of all of the civic institutions in the countryside, the school serves the youngest constituency. The capacity to maintain a school is a continuing indicator of a community's future well-being. For many rural areas, the school is not only the hub of the community, but it contributes to a community's sense of survival. The rural school is a unique feature of country life and an integral part of a local community. Schools in rural communities play many roles; they are part of communities' shared histories and traditions and are hubs for many community activities.

The report recommends that the minimum enrolment for primary schools in rural areas should be 105 pupils; the current minimum is 60 pupils. That quota is to be applied regardless of the type of education that a school provides to its local community. It is a game of numbers rather than an educational assessment.

Raising the numerical threshold could sound the death knell for many schools, which, in addition to providing basic education, serve as social and cultural centres, as I said. They are places for sport, amateur drama, music and other civic activities. Local schools are essential to the survival of our rural communities. Quite often, schools carry the name of the community and serve as symbols of community autonomy, vitality and identity.

Schools do not only meet a community's educational needs; they are often a source of employment for village residents, from teachers to cleaners, dinner ladies to caretakers. The local school is a valuable source of employment in many areas where jobs are usually extremely scarce.

If the Bain proposals become part of the sustainable schools policy, teachers' unions estimate that between 1,200 and 1,900 teaching jobs will no longer be needed. Sir George Bain has not said what lies in store for those teachers. Will they be thrown on the scrap heap? Will they be redeployed to reduce pupil-teacher ratios? Will they be employed to improve special-needs provisions? Will they be employed to implement the Curran Report in order to allow teachers preparation, planning and assessment time? Will they be employed to allow school principals to carry out onerous administrative duties? We do not know the answers to those questions, and we need to find out.

The local school is a place where generations come together and where community identity and lifelong friendships are forged. A school is part of the history of a local area and part of the personal history of each pupil who receives his or her education there, whether at primary or secondary level. To close a country school is to destroy an institution that holds a rural community together; it is to deal a body blow to communities in the smallest rural areas, which have the least resources, and it damages the social and economic well-being of a community.

Sir George Bain has offered several options that may help to maintain local provision. I expect any Government strategy to help small schools. Furthermore, I expect that any future strategy will revolve around those options, which include confederation, federation, co-location, shared campuses and extended schools. The Bain Report also provides a set of indicators against which each of those options could be assessed locally.

Mr S Wilson: Does the Member accept that, given the recent rumours of the Catholic Church organising against the review of public administration, the idea of confederation and co-operation among schools becomes more difficult if the Church, through the Council for Catholic Maintained Schools (CCMS), is seeking to keep its iron grip on schools in the maintained sector?

Mr D Bradley: It is my understanding that CCMS is quite prepared to engage in those arrangements in the future.

If we are to protect our rural schools, the Department of Education must formulate the suggested arrangements into a coherent and effective strategy, with much greater available detail on the implications of each model. The key element in the implementation of any forthcoming strategy must be full consultation with all community interests, including local people, parents and the trades unions of teachers and other staff. Solutions must be arrived at locally, not imposed from on high or from outside. I support the amendment.

Mr McNarry: I support the motion, and I compliment its sponsors for bringing the matter to the attention of the House. Although I am sympathetic to the motion, I am disappointed in its tone. Something more robust than “noting” seems appropriate in the circumstances. Of course, noting is about all that Members can do because of the current status of this House. However, the noting of a threat does not convey how serious that threat really is. One can note a report, but rather than limply note the threat to rural schools, I believe that, given the opportunity, Members would recoil from it, recognise the seriousness of it and, put bluntly, would reject it outright.

Another part of the motion:

“urges the Government to put in place a strategy, where possible”.

“Where possible”? Surely if a new strategy were put in place, it would by necessity be based on coherent and sustainable policies and therefore entirely possible to implement. In that respect, I recognise the intention behind the amendment, but the cull of rural schools stems from the strategy that is currently in operation. That is the problem.

In the light of the Government’s determination, I wonder how effective the amendment would be in removing the threat that rural schools face. Rural schools are suffering from years of ineffective and incompetent ministerial direction. The Department of Education has stumbled along from one crisis to another without a sustainable schools policy, and rural schools have been bounced into instability caused by the threat of closure. That is behind the chaos in education today.

The plight facing rural schools — and there are none that can be complacent — is not a flight of fancy. The threat to their future existence is real and faces many of them now. We debate this matter under the cloud of moves, by way of a strategy that is already in place, to close more than 50% of our rural schools within the next five years. That will result in the dismantling of not only our rural education provision but rural communities. That will be the inherent result of the current strategy, which is unemotional, mercenary, driven by money and part of a wider social agenda.

There is, of course, a financial argument for closures, but that case might be better appreciated if it were backed up with proper audited costs and if previous financial assessments were not replete with poor accountancy reports, mismanagement of money — some of which was not even printed, but it still seemed to go astray — and paper trails that were laid to cause confusion. If that happened, I am sure that the resulting valid costs could be extrapolated to secure the future of more rural schools that the Department of Education is assessing for closure.

3.00 pm

In my constituency of Strangford, rural schools are reeling under the pressure of recent correspondence from the South Eastern Education and Library Board. There has been word from the top down telling many of them that their future school days are numbered. News travels fast in rural communities, and, in too many cases, the threats issued are seen as virtual notices of closures.

When parents and teachers talk of a departmental strategy, they view it as a strategy driven against their school and their local community environment. These rural folks are not foolish. They can read into the wider agenda an intention to wipe out local identities by forcing people into larger, less attractive, newly created, wider social settlements.

This issue involves our future stakeholders — young families and young children, primary 1 to primary 7 schoolchildren caught up in the chicanery of manipulative strategies and falling foul of the creative accountancy behind optimum number crunching. That simply cannot continue. Without intervention, and our objection to the lasting damage that this will cause to local communities and their environment, it would appear that nothing will be done to reverse the situation.

In the name of preserving rural communities and their schools, the Transitional Assembly deserves to be heard, as a representative collective advising the direct rulers of the disastrous ramifications that will follow in the wake of their current strategy. Pending the outcome of a satisfactory election, it is crucial that the significance of the motion is not lost on an incoming devolved Minister of Education. Today we call for the viability of rural schools to be protected, and a new devolved Minister cannot be found wanting in addressing this important issue.

However, when the Department of Education makes presentations to any Minister, it will — surprise, surprise — run behind the cover of the recent Bain Report. The timing of the publication of the report is a huge coincidence. Madam Speaker, when might we expect to debate the Bain Report fully? I would welcome that opportunity, and most Members of this place share concerns about further critical developments in education. This is an appropriate time for such a debate, given that mandates could soon be sought and that education is a priority for the public.

I look forward to reading the party manifestos on rural schools. I look forward to seeing that what is said in the House today — I have yet to hear it — may, in fact, find its way into print in those party manifestos. I look forward to one party in particular addressing the issue of school closures; it is blessed with having presented our communities with the only devolved Education Minister in recent times. How will that party explain what its Minister did in his term in office to bring about this situation? How, employing its new charm offensive that means it is sweetness and light to all people, will it put that down in its manifesto? How will it explain to the children who are suffering from the consequences —

Mr McElduff: Will the Member give way?

Mr McNarry: No, I will not give way. Sit down.

Mr Kennedy: He is sitting down.

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr McNarry: When we debate your motion tomorrow, it will be interesting to hear how you explain that situation.

Madam Speaker: Mr McNarry, please speak through the Chair.

Mr McNarry: I do not wish to detract from the importance of the motion; I have complimented and congratulated those who tabled it. That is why it will be important to debate the Bain Report. However, that is not to dilute the importance of today's motion, which I endorse fully.

Mr McElduff: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Ba mhaith liom labhairt i bhfabhar an rúin agus i bhfabhar an leasaithe don rún chomh maith.

At the outset, I declare an interest: I am a governor of St Patrick's Primary School, Garvallah — which, as you know, is near Seskinore — and of St Patrick's Primary School, Eskragh, which is this side of Fintona.

Madam Speaker: I do know that.

Mr McElduff: The motion refers to a threat to rural schools — because there is a threat to rural schools — from the Bain Report and many reports that preceded it. The terms of reference of the Bain Report were to examine the funding, strategic planning and organisation of the schools estate while taking into account curriculum changes and demographic trends. Not to be unduly repetitive, the figure of 105 pupils as the minimum enrolment quota in new rural primary schools jumps out at us, as does the recommendation of 140 pupils as the minimum in urban areas. I do not think that a distinction has been made between rural and urban schools in the discussion about the post-primary minimum enrolment figure of 500. Those figures will be applied if schools are to be deemed viable in the future. The Bain Report recommends that all provisions be reviewed if enrolment falls below viable levels in existing schools.

In many ways, rural schools have always been under threat. A report that the Rural Community Network commissioned referred to the tunnel vision of the Department of Education, suggesting that it historically saw the typical primary school as being in an urban area and having a relatively large enrolment. In a way, policy-makers have always worked on the assumption that small schools may need to be rationalised into larger units. There is a presumption against the existence of small rural schools, and policy-makers have always sought to list the supposed disadvantages and place the onus on rural school communities to demonstrate that it is necessary to retain small schools.

Mr Elliott: Will the Member give way?

Mr McElduff: I am happy to do so.

Mr Elliott: I thank the Member for his generosity.

Does the Member agree that he is talking about a policy of the former Minister of Education, who came from his own party?

Mr McElduff: I am delighted with Tom Elliott's intervention. I shall deal later with the four commitments that Martin McGuinness made to rural communities when he was the Minister of Education. Sinn Féin would be happy to take that Ministry again, should the opportunity present itself. We would be happy to accept responsibility for the Department of Education instead of criticising it and talking about it. Sinn Féin is happy to take responsibility, not just to criticise, as Maurice Morrow knows.

Mr Kennedy: That is Lord Morrow to you.
[Laughter.]

Madam Speaker: Order. Please continue, Mr McElduff.

Mr McElduff: Thank you. "Maurice" will do rightly for me, Madam Speaker.

Other presumptions have been made. For example, it has been presumed that having one teacher for each age group and a non-teaching principal is the only proper approach to running a school.

Other Members have stated the value of rural schools. Some time ago, I was conscious of the value of a particular rural school in West Tyrone. I asked Dr Eddie Rooney of the Department of Education whether he had visited a school like that recently. He said that he had not.

Thankfully, he took up the invitation to visit that school. I thought that it would be useful to try to impress on senior departmental officials the value of rural schools, and, on that occasion, the rural school in question demonstrated that value. I am grateful to Dr Rooney for taking up that invitation.

There must be a greater appreciation of the serious implications of school closures for children and for the wider community. Last week, Derek Hussey and Francie Brolly in particular detailed anti-rural bias and the effect that the closure of a post office can have on a rural community. Likewise, a school is not merely a building; it is very much at the heart of the rural community.

I now refer to my esteemed friend and colleague, Martin McGuinness, who offered rural communities four commitments when he held the education portfolio. In my judgement, and in the judgement of the wider population, he did an extremely good job as Minister of Education. In an article published in 'Rural Network News' in 2001, Martin McGuinness offered rural communities the following four commitments:

"First, I will be flexible in dealing with this issue and I will not impose rigid or inappropriate models of provision. Second, I will look at every individual case on its own merits and I will listen to all the views expressed. Third, I will encourage and support creative solutions" — and solutions are what we are about here —

"to the educational needs of rural communities, including options such as clustering and federation. And fourth, I will not approve any proposals for closure of schools unless I am completely satisfied that there has been full and open consultation with local communities and that every effort has been made to address their concerns."

I commend Martin McGuinness on his very enlightened approach. For the benefit of David McNarry's knowledge base, when the party's manifesto is published, as it will be soon, it will be in two languages — Irish and English — and it will repeat such solid commitments to rural communities.

We are looking for creative solutions: hopefully, we will start off with the will, and then together we can devise a mechanism. Rural schools are already under pressure; consider the cuts in front-line services, the centralised catering facilities, the lack of funding allocation and the recent end of concessionary transport in education and library board areas.

I call on the Department of Education to change its outlook. The educational interests of the child, not financial or administrative criteria, must be paramount. Small schools offer positive learning environments. A solution-oriented approach must be taken. To lose a community school in a rural area is to weaken the community life, often irretrievably, as the Rural Community Network has concluded; and that sets in train a spiral of rural decline. We must all do everything in our power to address this problem, and any solution must involve full consultation with rural communities. Martin McGuinness's four commitments are a good foundation for moving forward on this issue.

Arlene Foster made interesting points about rural proofing. The Department of Education and other Government Departments charged with rural proofing must examine rural proofing in the context of Bain's proposals as we await the sustainable schools policy.

A Member from the Ulster Unionist Party — I think that it was Mr Armstrong — said earlier that a local Administration would offer the best chance for rural schools. I take this opportunity to say to the DUP that people are waiting for its positive response to recent political developments. It should come away from the drawing board where it has long invented excuses and more excuses to avoid responsibility — such as taking important educational decisions. Thank you, a Cheann Comhairle.

3.15 pm

Mr McCarthy: Madam Speaker, I will be brief. I support any effort that will help us to retain our rural schools, which have always been at the heart of a country area.

First, I should say that I am a member of the board of governors at a couple of schools: Portaferry Integrated Primary School and St Patrick's Primary School, Ballygalget.

As a product of a rural school, based in the townland — [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Are you asking for a point of order, Mr McElduff?

Mr McElduff: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Do previous contributors to the debate have interests, in relation to governorships of schools, which they have not declared?

Madam Speaker: Including you, Mr McElduff?

Mr McElduff: I have done that.

Madam Speaker: I will check Hansard to see whether that is the case.

Mr McCarthy: I am a product of a rural school based in the townland of Ballycran Beg, outside Kircubbin in County Down — for those who may not know where Kircubbin is, let alone Ballycran Beg. That rural school provided a sound, basic primary education for generations until 20 years ago, when the powers that be decided to build a new school in the village of Kircubbin that is one of the present-day seats of primary education for that area.

I was delighted to hear Arlene Foster speak this morning of townland schools in her constituency.

Undoubtedly, the closure of rural schools has contributed to the loss of townland names in Northern Ireland, and that is to the detriment of rural culture. Although it closed as an educational establishment 20 years ago, my school in Ballycran Beg is still there and is used as a social venue by people in that locality.

I am fearful for the future of the rural schools that are left. It appears that this Government are hell-bent on eradicating rural schools in favour of bigger, amalgamated schools, as happened 20 years ago at Ballycran Beg. In the Strangford constituency, we had to suffer a planning directive — a ministerial statement — that effectively banned new houses in rural areas. On top of that, we have Draft PPS14, which has been discussed and debated in the Chamber many times. It does the same thing, and will inevitably lead to the further closure of rural schools — all to the detriment of the rural community. The Bain Report will support a further reduction in the number of rural schools.

We all huff and puff hot air in this Chamber and blame the Government for all of our ills. I challenge the boys and girls of the DUP and Sinn Féin to get off their high horses and help to manage and run this place that we call Northern Ireland — then we will save the rural schools.

Mr G Robinson: As a person who was born and bred in a rural area of Northern Ireland and educated in a rural school outside Limavady, which is part of the East Londonderry constituency, I support Arlene Foster's motion for the retention of the much-needed rural schools that have played a vital role in the education of our children. All people who live in Northern Ireland must have a choice about where they live, work and are educated.

Over the years, rural schools have competed well, despite threats of closure and numbers that have dwindled for various reasons. One prominent reason for the fall in numbers has been inflexibility and red tape on the part of the Planning Service, a large Government Department that over the years, and now through the implementation of Draft PPS14, has ensured that rural communities have been, and will continue to be, ethnically cleansed. That is exemplified by the story of a farmer's family: for medical reasons, he needs his family nearby to help on the farm, but due to Planning Service red tape they are not allowed to build a home there.

In some cases, therefore, farmers' families must move to an urban area, thereby depriving a nearby rural school of much-needed pupil numbers. That is just one example of the reasons that some rural schools must close, which is music to the ears of the Government. I support the motion.

Mr K Robinson: In the first instance, I want to thank the hon Members for bringing this important matter before the House. I also want to declare an interest as a governor of both Whiteabbey Primary School and Hollybank Primary School in Newtownabbey. Although I am an unrepentant townie, I want to declare a further interest, because my first principalship was in a charming little two-teacher school in County Tyrone. Indeed, it was in the same constituency that is represented by the two hon Members that brought the timely motion before the House. It may also be of particular importance for certain Members of certain parties to note that, geographically, it was, therefore, west of the Bann. I hope that they take that point.

During my period in charge, I was constantly impressed not only by the loyalty of that community to their wee school but by the high degree of its interest in, and support for, the work of the school. The school was at the centre of that community and was its core. Every school event received enthusiastic support, whether it was the sports day, the nativity play or school visits to places such as the Armagh Planetarium.

Most importantly, the attendance at meetings to discuss pupils' progress was also first class — perhaps our urban brethren could take note of that. Another positive aspect of life there was the total commitment of the staff to the task in hand and their willingness to take on a host of extra burdens without complaint, some of which our urban colleagues would not even recognise. That all added to the quality of the educational experience provided to the children there.

Even during my tenure, it became clear that the steady increase in administration was beginning to eat into valuable teaching time. A small rural school needs support in order to deal with the current excessive demands of the curriculum and the requirements for endless record keeping and form filling. As a teaching principal in those days, it was hard enough. It must be impossible for principals who teach nowadays.

I must pay tribute to the much-maligned education and library boards that have, down the years, despite other problems, recognised those problems and have attempted, in a variety of ways, to ease the strain on principals and staff in schools. In the interests of all, it is vital that children are taught in a safe, modern environment by caring, skilful teachers who identify with the challenges that are faced by rural communities. That may require some inventive management structures, some of which have already been mentioned. For example, a "confederation" is a cluster of schools that operates under the guidance of one principal, while staff may provide wider curriculum expertise by moving between schools or having children move in the opposite direction. Perhaps that is not desirable. It may, however, be a way forward.

In other instances, school buildings that have served their purpose well for previous generations, and which may not be able to be adapted to modern standards, may need to be replaced or put to a new use by the community, so that, at least, the building remains at the centre of the community.

In the coming years, population movement within rural areas for a variety of reasons, some of which were mentioned by the Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone Mrs Foster, may also begin to dictate that brand-new, state-of-the-art schools should be built to satisfy current demand. Flexible approaches are vital if the confidence of rural communities is to be bolstered and renewed.

I noticed that the Member for West Tyrone made much comment about the four commitments given by the previous Minister of Education to be flexible, to look at individual cases, to seek creative solutions and to have open consultations. Those commitments must be built upon. I do not ascribe them to the previous Minister, however; I believe that they were already embedded in the Department before he arrived. The wonder is that they survived his tenure.

Population movements may cause us to look at more flexible situations. It is vital that that is done if the confidence of the rural community is to be bolstered and renewed. The turmoil that the agriculture industry is going through has forced many changes on rural communities, causing alarming suffering. Those communities deserve to be spared the double whammy of suffering as a result of those changes and as a result of insensitive school closures.

Perhaps the Assembly needs to take a careful, considerate and sympathetic look at our rural schools provision, and, in doing so, it must realise that the bums-on-seats approach that has been prevalent up to now needs to be replaced. How can we accept a proposal in which 105 school pupils on a roll become the touchstone? That would decimate 312 of our 510 rural schools, and it is absolute nonsense.

We need to recognise that good-quality educational provision already exists in rural schools. We require the Department of Education to speedily identify that good practice, support it where it exists, broadcast its benefits to a wider audience and enable other schools to adapt it to their individual uses. In that way, we can simultaneously begin to provide an excellent, modern educational experience for our rural children and inject a much-needed sense of confidence into the whole community. I support the motion.

Mr Gallagher: I welcome the motion. It is clear that the Government need to change their thinking on small schools. Everyone here is aware that the rate of closure of small schools is accelerating. I represent a western constituency, which undoubtedly has the highest proportion of small schools. As has been mentioned, those schools are at the centre of community life, and their closure will be a blow to their communities. I have no doubt that both traditions share those concerns; indeed, that has been articulated in the Chamber today.

I take issue with Mr Sammy Wilson, a Member for East Antrim. He interjected during Dominic Bradley's contribution and referred to the iron grip of the bishops. He said that that would be a hindrance to co-operation and collaboration between small schools. Nobody need fear that the Catholic Church will have control of schools, which was what that Member suggested. That would be a barrier to co-operation and collaboration. However, the rather offensive remark about the iron grip that bishops have over Catholic schools must be corrected.

I do not wish to rake over history, but most Members will be aware that when Northern Ireland was set up, the control of teachers' appointments was an issue for the Catholic Church. The Catholic community paid a price for that until the 1990s because it had to contribute to the cost of its schools.

Mr Hussey: Will the Member give way?

Mr Gallagher: No.

However, a particular ethos on Catholic education has grown from that situation. I am not here to claim that all or only Catholic schools are good; however, the ethos of Catholic schools is good for education. Anybody who doubts that has only to look at research that educationalists conducted, school inspectors' reports and the work that other parties that are interested in education have done over the years.

3.30 pm

The Government, which put financial expediency before children's educational needs, frequently tell us that small schools are too expensive to run and that the ability range in their classes is too wide. However, many educationalists and teachers tell us that the disadvantages — for the teachers and, in particular, the pupils — are outweighed by the advantages. Those advantages include: a sense of community; the close contact that the families have with the school principal and schoolteachers; the support that parents give to the school; and the important sense of place and identity that those schools foster in their pupils. Why do Governments in other European countries such as Portugal and Spain not have a problem in accepting, and providing for, the needs of small rural schools?

We understand that the education system must adapt to the twenty-first century. We are not saying that all schools should remain open for ever, but there is a duty to retain what is best in our education system. Our small schools have an excellent record, and Members must take steps to ensure that they are not hurriedly dismantled.

Assemblyman Ken Robinson, a Member for East Antrim, referred to financial constraints. Although falling pupil numbers at small rural schools are a particular constraint, one must remember that small schools are working under financial arrangements that were imposed on them some years ago; those arrangements favour large schools while simultaneously weakening small schools. The educational needs of our children, whether they live in urban or rural areas, should be treated equally, and they must take precedence over the financial considerations of the Government of the day. I support the amendment.

Mr Buchanan: I support the motion. The threat of the closure of rural schools in Northern Ireland is a significant cause for concern and anxiety to many in the rural community. It is a further attack on the rural way of life. In the Chamber, in recent weeks, there have been debates on the closure of rural post offices; on the threats posed by the removal of fire appliances from rural fire stations; and on the closure of rural police stations. The threat to rural schools is another attack on the rural way of life, which the House must continue to oppose.

Rural schools play a vital role in rural communities, not only in their educational excellence but in helping to sustain a strong sense of place, culture and identity. Rural schools are also an important element of any thriving village or community. Children are educated closer to their homes, and they are normally more content and have a closer relationship with their teachers. Not only do rural schools provide easy accessibility for pupils and teachers, but they play an important role in the social and educational life of communities by providing a rich cultural resource and a focus for a wide range of activities.

Children living in rural areas account for the bulk of mainstream home-to-school transport in the primary sector. The closure of rural schools will result in many children having to travel many more miles to reach their schools, and, given the tragedies that occur on our roads network, that is another major issue of concern for rural communities.

Therefore, local authorities must have a clear vision for what constitutes a reasonable maximum journey time for pupils. That is preferable to defining a maximum distance, because that distance may vary according to the route chosen, for logistical reasons. Transport costs are a significant factor in calculating the projected financial benefits of any proposed reorganisation in rural areas. Transport implications must therefore play a critical role in determining whether the closure of a rural primary school can be justified.

Some small schools are finding it difficult to survive due to the declining birth rate in their area, coupled with a tightening-up of school budgets. The Government must put a strategy in place to ensure that rural children benefit from the opportunities of any new planned investment. The Government have already laid the axe at the root of many small rural schools. Future proposals to increase pupil enrolment requirements from 60 to 105, tougher budget constraints, and a wider curriculum must be reversed, and a sustainable schools policy implemented. Bigger is not better; such an approach creates many more problems and difficulties for teachers and staff, and it diminishes the one-to-one teaching relationship between teacher and pupil.

The local community and rural schools play an important part in the overall nurturing of our children and young people. We must ensure that that is taken into account in any future development of education in our rural areas. I support the motion.

Mr Beggs: I declare an interest as a governor of Glynn Primary School, which is considered a small rural school. I express my disbelief — even shock — at the minimum school roll figures that were contained in the Bain Report: 140 for urban primary schools and 105 for rural primary schools. We must consider the implications of minimum school rolls, both generally and for specific schools.

In its submission to the independent strategic review of education, the Rural Development Council indicated that, in rural areas, 28 schools had fewer than 28 pupils; 90 schools had between 29 and 50 pupils; 194 schools had between 51 and 100 pupils; 159 schools had between 100 and 200 pupils; and 55 schools had 200 or more pupils. The recommendations of the Bain Report would put at risk almost 60% of our rural schools. That is unbelievable and unacceptable. I believe that the amendment has much merit, and it is clear that the quality of education is more important than an arbitrary number.

Schools, post offices, local shops and churches are at the heart of rural communities. As we heard during recent debates, the post offices and possibly the retail outlets in our rural communities are at risk. If the Bain Report were adopted, schools would be at risk — what then would be left in many rural villages?

In the absence of the community's focal points from which a positive community spirit flows, there is a danger that a level of poor community spirit and antisocial activity will emerge. We will then spend additional money on policing and on trying to correct the ills that may occur. It is much better to maintain rural communities as they are presently constituted.

I am an active member of the Glynn Community Association, which tries to improve the local environment and community spirit by organising local events and tidy-ups. We receive some valued support from the Rural Development Council and the North Antrim Community Network. I believe that if 60% of our rural schools were to close, the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development's objectives would be unattainable. We need joined-up thinking between Departments.

I would like to turn to Glynn Primary School, of which I am a governor and at which my three children were fortunate enough to be educated. They experienced a happy, family, educational environment where they were encouraged to learn. Happiness and security are essential requirements if children are to do their best. Glynn has an excellent record on those requirements and on parental and community support. Those are important issues.

Glynn offers an incredible range of extra-curricular activities because of community and parental support: volunteers take football, hockey and rugby coaching in a school of some 50 pupils — fortunately, it is a growing school. The school participates in Irish dancing competitions and music festivals; there are Spanish lessons and a wide range of events. Many schools twice its size do not provide such a wide range of extra-curricular activities.

Glynn Primary School was at the advanced stage of gaining approval for an extension. Two mobiles have been in use for a long time — in fact, I used one of them myself more than 40 years ago. That is how long Glynn has had temporary classrooms.

However, as a result of this report, the extension, which was one of the priorities of the North Eastern Education and Library Board, has been put on hold. Such a delay in a school that is excelling, which provides quality education and which is well thought of in the local community, is intolerable.

Interestingly, large patches of ground around the village were recently sold to developers for significant amounts of money. I expect substantial housing development and an increase in the size of the village before too long, which would undoubtedly result in additional need for schooling in the area.

That does not apply just to Glynn Primary School: I could be talking about Carnalbanagh Primary School, Carnlough Controlled Integrated Primary School, Ballyboley Primary School or Toreagh Primary School. All are small rural schools with fewer than 105 pupils, and all are being put at risk by this report. The report must not be accepted.

I wish to highlight the issue of Islandmagee Primary School. The Island Magee Peninsula had three rural primary schools, which, five years ago, agreed to amalgamate on a new school site. The community was led to believe that a new school site would be purchased in August 2003, but that did not happen until November 2006. The Minister, the Department and the education authority must look carefully at the procedure for amalgamation where local communities agree that that is the best way forward. It is intolerable that it has taken so long. Delays in planning and in economic appraisal have added considerably to the time that it should have taken to complete the change. I ask the Minister to look carefully at the process and not only grant money to purchase the school but tell us when we will hear that the amalgamation, which was agreed more than five years ago, will receive money for the new build. It is intolerable that it is taking so long.

While I was researching this, I came across some interesting information from America. Dr Wenfan Yan carried out a study in Pennsylvania entitled 'Is Bigger Better? A Comparison of Rural School Districts'. He concludes:

"This study, like many others, did not find consistent evidence to support the idea that bigger is better or, conversely, that smaller is better."

He also states:

"The results indicate that school district size might not be the direct reason for lower or higher academic performance of students."

3.45 pm

Therefore, bigger schools are not necessarily better. There is a wide range of schools in Northern Ireland. Given the correct support and high-quality teaching, small rural schools can provide a broad curriculum and successful educational environment for their pupils. Size must not be the sole determination of whether a school continues to exist. I was struck by the amendment's emphasis on quality, which ought to be an important element in determining the future of schools. If it is recognised that successful schools are providing quality education, that should be taken into consideration when providing quality education for all students in the future.

Many small rural schools continue to operate within budget. If a school provides quality education within budget, why on earth would anyone change it? I hope that all Members will join me in supporting the amendment.

Mr Brolly: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I was not in the original starting line-up for Sinn Féin today, so my contribution is a hastily adapted version of another Member's speech. I thought that I should at least change the first paragraph in which my colleague describes herself as a mother of young children.

[Laughter.]

Madam Speaker: I congratulate Mr Brolly on his honesty.

Mr Brolly: I, and many other Members from rural constituencies, continue to spend considerable time working with rural schools, and particularly with primary schools that face closure — be they in our constituencies or schools in other constituencies that have asked for our support.

The debate on the threat facing rural schools underlines — as has every debate in the Transitional Assembly — the importance of ending British direct rule and having locally elected and, therefore, locally empowered and accountable Ministers. All parties must rise to that challenge, particularly the party opposite that brought the issue of rural schools to the Floor. In the real world, people are tired of hot-air debates. Although serious issues are discussed, the debates serve only to highlight that the parties are powerless to effect any change. A local, enlightened Education Minister is urgently required — someone like Martin McGuinness. [Laughter.]

During his period in office, Mr McGuinness demonstrated a genuine commitment to rural schools and had the power to make things happen. The four bullet points outlined by my hon Friend from West Tyrone Mr McElduff marked his reasonable approach. In December 2000, Mr McGuinness intervened to protect small rural schools such as Churchtown and Toberlane, two co-educational primary schools just north of Cookstown with enrolments of 25 and 24 pupils respectively.

A good example of the Minister's innovative thinking was his creation of a federation of two primary schools at Glenullin and Tirkeeran, which are located, as I am sure all Members know, just outside Garvagh in my constituency. The federation involved the children from primary 1 to primary 4 being taught in Glenullin and the senior pupils being taught in Tirkeeran, and the principal of the latter was appointed principal of the federation.

The Department of Education and CCMS opposed Mr McGuinness's idea, but he persuaded them to try it for a year. The federation has now been in place for five years and has been incredibly successful in every regard. I do not believe that direct-rule Minister Eagle would have been similarly motivated or determined.

An example of the serious ill effects that the closure of a rural school can have is the experience of St Mary's Primary School in Aghadowey. After a long struggle, in which all the area's elected representatives fought for two years to keep the school open with 20 pupils, it was closed. Five pupils went to St John's Primary School in Coleraine; five went to one of the schools that I mentioned; and another five went to a school in Ballerin. The children were separated from one another, as well as being taken out of their own community. That is a stark example of what can happen when a rural school closes.

The Bain Report, and Maria Eagle's immediate response to it, has caused deep concern in many rural schools. In the future, we need to work together as political leaders to ensure that we get the balance right. The threat facing rural schools is part of a broader threat to rural communities, which has been mentioned regularly. We should be aiming for statutory guidance that includes a presumption against the closure of rural primary schools. I share my Sinn Féin colleagues' belief that the best educational and social interests of the child must be our primary consideration in considering a strategic response to threats to the viability of rural schools.

Other key factors must also be recognised. Like other Members, I believe that school policies, and those concerning small rural schools in particular, must recognise the valuable role that schools play in sustaining rural communities. We must also recognise that small rural schools with a good teacher-pupil ratio can bring out the very best in children. Collaborative working arrangements between neighbouring schools that are struggling for numbers should be considered an essential option.

It is also essential that a strong network of rural schools be preserved as part of the infrastructure required to reinforce rural communities and to ensure equality of opportunity and accessibility to education. At the same time, however, I am aware of the difficulties and challenges faced by small secondary schools in delivering good-quality education. Often, small schools must rely to an unreasonable degree on the commitment and dedication of too few teachers and cannot provide the same breadth of curriculum, teaching skills and opportunities for social interaction for pupils as larger schools. Such schools should be given additional support over a sustained period in order to minimise any educational disadvantages faced by their pupils.

Like other colleagues, I wish to pay tribute to the dedication and commitment of teachers over the years. They and their predecessors have put in enormous efforts to provide a firm educational foundation for children. Often, those schools were attended by the parents, grandparents and even great-grandparents of current pupils. The entire community knows and identifies with their local school and understandably cherishes and supports it.

All the research shows that partnerships between parents, schools and the wider community are the key to a successful education for our children. The aim must be to build on those relationships.

Members must also accept that in some circumstances, where schools are in a poor physical condition, the burden on teachers to deliver the curriculum — across a wide range of age groups and abilities — is excessive. Sometimes, change is needed, perhaps through amalgamation, as has been described or — sadly — through closure.

I refer once more to the approach of Martin McGuinness. We need flexibility, and we must consider each case on its own merits to ensure that schools are not closed without full engagement with the local community and without having explored fully every possibility of keeping them open.

I support the motion.

Mr S Wilson: Like the Member who spoke before me, I have not written a speech. However, I congratulate and thank the Members opposite for raising points that have given me the basis of one.

For many members of the public, debates in this place seem to involve a lot of tired hot air, because we have no responsibility to take decisions on the basis of the resolutions that we make at the end of each plenary sitting. The obligation, therefore, is on the party opposite to do what it has to do to ensure that the Assembly can get up and running. All other Members are united in the belief that there cannot be an Executive and a functioning Assembly while one party refuses to support the courts, the police and the functions of law and order. If Members want to get away from tired old debates, we must ask the party opposite, which has said that it is time to do the right thing on policing, to do precisely that. That is all that I want to say about that.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Molloy] in the Chair)

I will not rehearse all the arguments in favour of small rural primary schools. Members have done that well already. I want to speak about what can be done to ensure the survival of at least some rural schools. Members know what the issues are: the costs; the quality of the educational experience; and the width of that experience. If schools were to share principals, or principals were appointed to look after a number of schools, the burden of management could be shared. Similarly, through sharing teachers — and employing peripatetic teachers — the educational experience could be widened. Of course, facilities should be shared between schools.

Recently, I attended the opening of the University of Ulster Sports Academy. There I met many youngsters from small primary schools. The only physical education that they received was through university students visiting their schools and training them in football, basketball, and so on. The students were able to give that additional help in schools to widen the youngsters' educational experience.

However, even when we have done all that, there will still be the problem of surplus places and additional costs. Mr Gallagher implied that we should not have to worry about finance. Were they not having hot-air debates but making real decisions, Members would have to worry about finance. Whether they like it or not, per pupil, the smallest primary school costs three times — about £6,000 — the amount of schools that have over 150 pupils. In still larger schools, the costs even out. That is not a case for closing down all the small schools, but, since there are additional costs involved in keeping them open, we must consider how the extra finance can be raised. That is exactly what the motion says. Many of these policies should be subject to rural proofing to ensure that small rural primary schools are kept open.

Consider some of the solutions proposed in this debate and the attitudes adopted by the parties opposite. Rather than engaging on the issues of how money may be saved and how the communities may be encouraged to share schools and facilities and to co-operate, there is, among those parties, resistance to those policies.

4.00 pm

I intervened when a Member opposite referred to co-operation among schools. One of the difficulties with co-operation among schools, and one of the problems with not co-operating, is the cost involved. The Bain Report states that supporting five sectors of education — controlled, maintained, voluntary, grammar, integrated and Irish medium — incurs significant costs. However, when it comes to addressing that problem, no value is added by having five separate administrative structures. If we want to keep schools open, we must accept that money should not be spent on expensive administrative structures. That must be faced up to, and Members should not forget that the boards will have to go.

There is, however, the suggestion that that would impact on CCMS, and, according to 'The Irish News' last Friday, the Church is ready to go to battle on the issue. It does not want to lose control of its schools. The Church would prefer to keep CCMS, with the control of teachers, schools and the cost of that administration, rather than face up to the financial consequences.

That also has a second impact, and it is not just the cost of administration. There will be painful choices for every Member. People in the North Eastern Education and Library Board are already lobbying me and asking if I realise the impact that the closure of the boards will have on jobs. Members in the Chamber will have to face hard decisions about the boards, and, if that is the case, Members opposite will have to face up to the consequences that that may have for CCMS and for the Northern Ireland Council for Integrated Education (NICIE). We cannot have it one way for one set of administrators and a different way for another set of administrators.

Another consequence of not facing up to those issues is that the solution suggested by Dominic Bradley — to have greater collaboration, co-operation and sharing of premises to try to keep a local school — would be made much more difficult. People in the unionist community would be unhappy and hard to convince that their children should be educated in some kind of shared educational facility, half of which would be in the grip of the Church. CCMS and the Church must realise that, and they may realise it too late. Having embraced the Costello Report, the Burns Report and the idea of local collaboration, they are now beginning to realise the consequences. If Members opposite are so enthusiastic about that kind of model of co-operation, they must realise the consequences for the structures that will administer that model.

I noticed that Sinn Féin supports — as one would expect — locally elected “enlightened” Ministers such as Martin McGuinness, and I suspect that that is part of the reason for the amendment. Look at one of the policies that the “enlightened” Minister, Martin McGuinness, instigated. Against the background of falling rolls, surplus places and rising costs, the enlightened Minister introduced a policy under which Irish-medium schools and integrated schools with an intake as low as 12 pupils could be opened and financed by the state. The Bain Report states:

“The establishment of new Integrated and Irish-medium schools ... increases the number of schools at a time of falling pupil numbers and, therefore, contributes to the incidence of small schools and the level of surplus capacity.”

Save us from enlightened Ministers like that is all that I can say. [Interruption.]

I am nearly finished.

If we persist with a policy of opening new, small integrated or Irish-medium schools because it happens to be the political flavour of the month for a particular party, there will be knock-on consequences for other schools. That is another issue that this Assembly has to face up to. In this debate there has been no evidence of that. We have heard Members saying that they want all the rural schools to be kept open, but they have not been prepared to look at the hard consequences of such a policy.

(Madam Speaker in the Chair)

Mr Armstrong: I am the chairman of the board of governors at Stewartstown Primary School and a governor of Coagh Primary School.

This issue is close to the heart of many of us in Mid Ulster. There are numerous small rural schools in the constituency that achieve excellent educational results, but they face the threat of closure as yet another Minister or professor produces a report or continues to roll out the Labour Government's policies. It seems that the current policy is to concentrate on cities and towns, moving people's homes out of the countryside by imposing the implementation of Draft PPS 14, and forcing people out of jobs in the countryside, whether in farming, rural post offices or rural schools, as proposed by Sir George Bain.

It is obvious that the Government are out of touch with realities in Northern Ireland, a predominantly rural region of the United Kingdom whose character is defined by precisely the things that the Government are trying to remove from our rural way of life. This is yet another issue that would benefit from the restoration of a devolved Assembly, which is essential for the future of Northern Ireland. It is time that we progressed to a fully democratic Assembly without delay.

There has been a lot of hot air today, but it has all fallen on deaf ears. Many policy-makers seem to work on the assumption that the typical primary school is urban, with a relatively large enrolment. This tunnel vision has encouraged the view that small primary schools are somehow deficient and should be rationalised into larger units. Northern Ireland has always had many small schools, mostly because of the rural character of the area. If we continue to lose these schools, there is great danger of weakening rural communities.

The Bain Report, published in December 2006, dealt a further blow to rural communities in Northern Ireland and created further doubt and uncertainty for parents, pupils and teachers. Sir George Bain recommended that rural primary schools with fewer than 105 pupils, and post-primary schools with fewer than 500 pupils should be considered for closure.

He also called for a radical reform of the school planning system to find ways of dealing with the problem of more than 53,000 empty desks in schools across Northern Ireland. There is no doubt that changes in the provision of education are required as that number continues to rise. However, a one-size-fits-all approach will not work across the Province, as it fails to take into account the particular characteristics of the area.

The difficulties faced by small schools as pupil numbers decline are not only a rural problem. Small urban schools are faced with similar problems. Demographic changes are having a strong impact on the long-term viability, both financial and educational, of schools across the board. The greatest impact of these recommendations will be felt in rural areas. The region could soon be facing the sort of depopulation of the countryside that has scarred central France.

We have seen time and again that the closing of the village primary school is the death knell of the community. It makes it more difficult for people to live in those areas; they are forced to transport their children considerable distances, and many are not prepared to do it.

A school that parents can trust to educate their children keeps people from moving away from villages, farms and rural businesses, of which there are many in Northern Ireland. Those schools can offer vital development and maintenance of rural communities. If a school disappears, along with other services, so eventually will the inhabitants.

The Rural Development Council has reported that there are at least 312 rural primary schools in Northern Ireland with fewer than 105 pupils, and 37 post-primary schools with fewer than 300 pupils. In my constituency of Mid Ulster, 13 of the 25 primary schools in the Cookstown District Council area and 15 of the 30 primary schools in the Magherafelt District Council area will face review under the Bain criteria.

Seven primary schools in Mid Ulster have fewer than 40 pupils, but they each form the bedrock of the community in their respective areas. Recently, I have been working in support of the Queen Elizabeth II Primary School in Pomeroy, which is fighting against closure. In October, I received a recommendation from the Southern Education and Library Board that closure was not an acceptable option and that the board would consider how it could find financial support so that the school could continue to operate in that isolated area. Should that school close, the result would be unacceptable travelling times to other schools. Likewise, schools in areas such as Stewartstown and Donaghmore face uncertainty and are working continuously to ward off the threat of closure.

There is enormous long-term significance in the worth of keeping early education close to home. It enhances the connection between rural schools and the community, creating a curriculum that is locally relevant and that links education in the school with the surrounding area. That, in turn, helps pupils to appreciate their local community and makes them more likely to settle there when they grow up.

A village school is not only a place to impart knowledge to pupils; it is a place for all of the community to learn, to act and to participate in local life. It has been assumed that bigger is always better, but that is not sustained by the hard evidence, and the case for the quality of education that is provided by small schools is indisputable.

The 2006 report of the chief inspector of the Education and Training Inspectorate shows that many schools with 60 or 70 pupils performed outstandingly for successive years — better than many larger schools. Small schools can offer a warm, family-like atmosphere within which there are better opportunities than in large schools to address individual needs, experience mixed-age classes, and give opportunities to enhance individual learning, co-operation and group work.

We should examine the experiences of other European countries, such as Finland, which is a large country with only 5 million people but is the country with the most rural area in Europe. There are about 3,400 primary schools in Finland, more than half of which are considered to be small rural schools. Most of those schools have two or three teachers and between 11 and 60 pupils.

I wish to place on record my appreciation of the excellent work of the principals and teachers in all of the rural schools in Mid Ulster and across Northern Ireland. They continue to face doubts over their future, yet strive to provide education and guidance to our children and grandchildren that is second to none. They work very hard to transform barriers into opportunities. I urge the Government to put in place a strategy to protect the viability of those schools, similar to that in countries such as Finland and Sweden.

Mr Hussey: I declare an interest as a member of the Western Education and Library Board's controlled schools working group, which was once called the small schools working group; as a member of the boards of governors of Gortin Primary School and Erganagh Primary School — both small rural schools; and as a former teacher in a rural secondary school, namely, Castlederg High School.

We have held some very interesting debates recently on agriculture, the Fire Service and post offices. I have welcomed those debates.

4.15 pm

Surely it is obvious to everyone in the House that our Civil Service mandarins do not understand the reality of rurality. That is because they are financially driven and think about what is economically viable rather than about what is right and good for our people.

I see that Mr McElduff and Mr O'Reilly have joined us. They may realise that in the Western Education and Library Board area, for example, the main impact of rural-school closures will be on the maintained sector. They cannot deny that that is a fact. The demographics of the west mean that falling numbers are having an impact on that sector, particularly on primary schools. We have seen the impact that falling numbers have had on the secondary sector. For example, when a major school in Strabane was created, a secondary school in Plumbridge felt the impact.

Mr Gallagher would not take an intervention earlier when he was lauding CCMS — or the maintained sector, which is how he described the Catholic sector. I was planning to challenge him on the dictatorial nature of CCMS, particularly at diocesan level, and on the way in which it acted on the closure of a Plumbridge secondary school. The people of that area were not properly consulted, even though they fought bravely and sincerely to retain their secondary school.

As I have said, we are not necessarily referring only to primary schools: the proposals will have an impact on the secondary sector in many areas. As many Members have said, those schools are essential elements of hamlets, villages and parishes in the rural community: they are part of the rural hub.

I think that it was Mr Buchanan who talked about the lengths of time that our young kids spend on buses getting to and from school. Our schools are spread over a wide area. If we thin that number, imagine the amount of time that we will expect young primary-school kids and those who are going to secondary school for the first time to spend travelling to and from school. I am sure that some children in my area spend as long waiting for, getting into and transferring onto school buses as I do driving to get here. Kids might spend an hour and a half or perhaps two hours on school buses in the morning and again after school. Think of the impact that that has on extra-curricular activities. School is not just a 9.00 am to 3.00 pm operation; there are after-school activities. If we thin out the number of our schools even further, the distances mean that children cannot benefit from those additions to the curriculum that are available to many others.

Staffing is a major issue in the school budget. Many people forget that our small rural schools have loyal staff who remain there for a long time. In some cases, staff remain in those schools for their entire teaching life. Many of the staff are on the higher rate of pay. Think of the impact that that has on the school budget. Surely the sensible thing to do is to pay all teachers centrally. That would mean that teachers' salaries would be removed from the school budget, which would then be properly distributed among the kids who attend that school.

To conclude, I will attempt to paraphrase Voltaire — I cannot translate directly from the French. He said that success does not necessarily go to the big battalions, rather to the best shots. Let us give our rural children the best shot that we can at a good educational start in their own rural communities and in their own local schools. Small, with imagination, can be best.

Mr Dallat: This has been a useful debate, which has been pitched at the right level. Arlene Foster began the debate by making the very important point that rural schools that continue to be successful are capped in numbers. That situation is like a two-sided coin: heads, I lose; tails, I lose. A school in Kilrea at which I taught is an example of one such school. That school had excellent examination results and full enrolment but was not allowed to increase its pupil numbers.

As a former teacher, I admit to a certain amount of nostalgia about the teaching profession. I began my teaching career in a school in north Donegal, which was surrounded by the mountains, the lakes, the sea and lovely places such as Malin Head, Culdaff, Gleneely, Moville, Clonmany and Ballyliffin. Madam Speaker, I cannot leave out the area that you frequent, which is Fahan.

Dominic Bradley told us that schools are part of the history of a place and that the closure of a school destroys the history of that place. That is true. I thank David McNarry for pointing out that the purpose of our amendment is not to rubbish the motion but to add to it. Barry McElduff told us that he is a school governor, and there will now be a demand for new road maps to that area. No doubt, one of those seeking a map will be the Duchess of Abercorn.

Kieran McCarthy asked the DUP and Sinn Féin to get off their high horses. I am pleased that he did not bring back the pantomime horse. Ken Robinson upstaged Barry McElduff by saying that he is a governor of two schools. He made very important points and acknowledged the contribution made by the education and library boards.

Sammy Wilson — if he is still listening to the debate — attacked the Catholic Church for its support of Catholic education. Tommy Gallagher pointed out that in every other part of the civilised world, that is not a problem. I was disappointed that Sammy Wilson later said that if the Catholic Church were in charge of schools, people from the Protestant community would have difficulty. That is absolute rubbish. The vast majority of Protestants are not bigots and they would have no difficulty with that. In my area, the involvement of the Catholic Church in education is an enhancement and an enrichment of children's lives, and the Church has been involved for a very long time.

As a young father, Roy Beggs pointed out the difficulties that have arisen in his part of the North, and he mentioned research in the United States. Francie Brolly immediately admitted that he was cogging his speech. That is always a very dangerous practice, because if the speech contains mistakes, one has to take the rap for it. The small school in Aghadowey that was closed is called St Mary's Primary School, not St John's, which is still open.

Billy Armstrong talked about the rural part of his constituency, and Derek Hussey told us about Plumbridge, although he has probably heard just one side of the story.

The argument that small rural schools are not viable made its appearance in an Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) report in 1991. However, within two years, it was withdrawn because it was fatally flawed. Most of us were surprised that the same old findings reappeared in the Bain Report.

Several Members have accepted that there is always a need for some rationalisation. That is part of life. However, that should not entail turning the whole education system upside down. A cull on the scale that is proposed is outright madness and a direct attack on every rural community. In my constituency, that would undo all the good work that has been done to regenerate towns and villages that almost died during the long, dark years of the Troubles. For that to happen to them during peacetime when we are supposed to be progressive, thoughtful and committed to equality for all, would make a complete mockery of democracy.

The debate has relied on much research from England. I hope that I do not offend anyone by mentioning a recent report that was published in the Republic, which shows that small rural schools still take in 50% of pupils and a similar percentage of teachers. I know that some Assembly Members do not like to talk about our neighbours. However, the reality of life, North and South, is that we are still largely a rural people with similar needs and, of course, similar threats. As several Members have pointed out, that was true of post offices, schools and many other facets of life.

The report also recognises that smaller schools have several positive features and few of the drawbacks that have been traditionally attributed to them. I should, of course, mention studies in the UK, which show that curriculum provision in smaller schools is similar to that which emerged in studies of larger schools. There is no indication of greater social cohesiveness among children in larger schools. I should point out that, frequently, children of different ages work and play together and that the differentiation between those groups is not as pronounced as it is in large schools. Most importantly, research on the effects of class size has shown that pupils become more engaged academically and socially when class size is reduced and that increased engagement in the classroom is likely to lead to increased learning.

Teachers tend to find management easier in smaller classes, with fewer behavioural problems. They also feel more proactive and less reactive in their approach to managing student behaviour in smaller classes. Several Members raised that point. The research carried out by Veenman in 1996 suggests that multi-grade, consecutive-grade settings provide teachers with opportunities to use innovative teaching approaches that are associated with enhanced pupil learning.

Mr S Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Mr Dallat: I will give way, even though I am making my winding-up speech.

Mr S Wilson: I appreciate that, and I thank the Member for giving way. Does the Member accept that although youngsters are more engaged in smaller classes — provided that they are not too small — one of the difficulties in some small rural schools is that problems can arise in classes where children of three or four different levels, perhaps primary 1 to primary 4, are being taught together?

Mr Dallat: I am glad that Sammy Wilson has raised that point. There are many devices and support mechanisms that can be used to overcome difficulties in small rural schools. Simply to cull rural schools is not the answer. Quite frankly, if a fraction of the energy that has recently been expended on some of those issues was channelled into the future of small rural primary schools and, indeed, small secondary schools — to which other Members have referred — threats to schools would not be gaining credibility but would be on the rubbish heap where they belong. Children are not battery hens. They do not have to be forced into large schools.

I want to finish on a positive note. I have absolutely no doubt that a new Assembly will be elected on 26 March. No one can be sure which parties will be biggest. I hope that the public uses its common sense when voting, because that crisis and others cannot continue.

It is wrong to allow the direct rulers to systematically strip this part of the island of its greatest asset — its children and its rural schools, whether they be primary or secondary.

4.30 pm

Lord Morrow: It has been said many times that the rural primary school is the heartbeat of a rural community; when the rural school is taken away, that community starts to die. My colleague Tom Buchanan said that the Government seem to want to attack everything rural: post offices; planning; police stations; stores; churches; and now schools. It seems that the Government are making a determined effort to take on everything that is rural, decimate it and leave it a desolate place.

Some interesting comments were made around the Chamber today, particularly by Mr McElduff. He eulogised the former Minister of Education — I think that he had him at sainthood status at one stage. He said that Mr McGuinness, when he was Minister, listened to what everybody had to say before he made a decision. I am sure that the House will note how attentive and deliberate Mr McGuinness was when it came to abolishing the 11-plus. On the last day that the Northern Ireland Assembly was in place, he walked into the Chamber and, with a fell stroke of his dictatorial pen, he stroked out the 11-plus. Whether Members are in favour of the 11-plus or against it is not the argument or debate — the dictatorial attitude adopted by the Minister got many people annoyed. Mr McElduff, you should put that in your pipe and smoke it.

Madam Speaker: Please speak through the Chair, Lord Morrow.

Lord Morrow: Madam Speaker, I was not aware that you smoked a pipe. That is why I did not address the comment through you.

I have some interesting matters to bring to the attention of the House. Six days before Christmas, the NIO Minister David Hanson made an interesting comment to my party colleagues in the House of Commons. I will quote what he said so that we can put it up his nose too:

“Government recognise the important role that rural schools play both in children’s education and in the cohesion of rural communities.”

I am sure that many Members will forgive me if I am a bit cynical about those comments. It is not in my make-up to be cynical, as most people know. However, when I read such remarks, my cynicism begins to take over. Mr Hanson will be kept in mind of what he has said, because the DUP intends to hold the Government to that commitment.

I will proceed with my speech now that I have made the introduction — those were merely remarks. It is important that rural children are not disadvantaged by the Department's plans for post-primary transfer. The needs of rural schoolchildren should not be overlooked when tie-breakers are being determined to resolve the allocation of pupils to oversubscribed schools.

Ronan Gorman is the chief executive of Countryside Alliance Ireland (CAI), the organisation that does such wonderful work for our countryside, rural sports and the rural way of life. I place on record my appreciation — and, I suspect, that of the whole House, with perhaps one exception, and he is not here — for what the Countryside Alliance does for the rural community. It was no less a person than Mr Gorman who said that the Education (Northern Ireland) Order 2006:

“has major implications for local children and their education. We welcome many of the proposals aimed at ensuring that all pupils must have the opportunity to acquire and develop specific cross-curricular skills and approve of the Department's requirements for schools to provide access to a wider range of courses for older pupils.

However, the key for many rural children will be the criteria used to select pupils for particular schools.”

Mr Gorman continues and, as I found his remarks interesting, I want to quote him accurately:

“CAI is fundamentally opposed to selection criteria based primarily on the distance that rural pupils live from particular schools. This would unfairly discriminate against rural pupils who may live considerable distances from any school. We intend to ... ensure every pupil has equitable access to appropriate education facilities.”

That is a true and timely remark, and such a situation must not be allowed to develop.

Children who live in rural areas and travel to schools in local market towns enrich and bring added value to those schools. The closure of rural schools is not a phenomenon peculiar to Northern Ireland. Members should consider what happens in other parts of the world. Mr Armstrong mentioned Finland, and I want Members to consider what has been said in America about the threat to rural schools that, believe it or not, is also faced there. A study of rural schools in all 50 US states was conducted, and they face the same challenges as here: students with disabilities, students who cannot speak English particularly well and students from ethnic minorities.

Those problems are all relevant in Northern Ireland, and there are many students from ethnic minorities in the town from which I come — probably the largest ethnic community in Northern Ireland resides in Dungannon. In the American study, rural schools in Nebraska, South Dakota, Montana and Wyoming all proved — relative to poverty levels and other challenges that they face — to be doing well. Rural education in those states is characterised by a smaller organisational scale, including a lower student-teacher ratio, smaller schools and smaller districts. Nonetheless, rural schools are still at risk.

My colleague Arlene Foster referred to an example of the risk to rural schools in Northern Ireland. In one district electoral area in South Tyrone, six rural or village primary schools are under threat. The decision has already been taken to close two of them, and the remaining four are equally vulnerable. Can anyone imagine the devastating impact that the closure of six village or rural primary schools will have on that community, which is part of a small district electoral area in Northern Ireland? If the Government proceed with closing down those schools, the impact will be devastating.

If the Northern Ireland Assembly is restored, difficult decisions will have to be taken. Not every single rural or village primary school will survive. No one on this side of the House, or anyone who supports the motion, says that that should happen. Realistically, a different approach must be taken to rural schools. My colleague Sammy Wilson said that other matters must be considered and that there should be closer co-operation in some cases. Why can that not happen?

I was amazed that the SDLP went off on a tangent and tried to say that that represented an irresponsible attack on its ethos and the Catholic education system — it is anything but. It was an attempt to bring a degree of realism into the education debate and particularly the future of rural primary schools.

I hope that the House will unite in agreeing the DUP's motion and that parties will clearly say to the Government, and particularly to Mr Hanson, whose remarks I have quoted, that they will no longer put up with the decimation and closure of rural primary schools. The DUP intends to make a stand and will not allow that to continue month in, month out, year in, year out.

Mr Hanson does not pick up a single vote in Northern Ireland, yet he thinks that he can step in with impunity and, with the stroke of a pen, abolish rural schools that have provided some of the best students who could ever be expected of any education system. I appeal to the House to forget its pettiness and unite behind the motion to save and maintain the future of rural primary schools, and, vitally, rural communities.

Question, That the amendment be made, put and negatived.

Main Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly notes the threat to rural schools in Northern Ireland; calls upon the Government to recognise the vital role that such schools play in the community; and urges the Government to put in place a strategy, where possible, to protect the viability of these schools.

Adjourned at 4.41 pm.

THE TRANSITIONAL ASSEMBLY

Tuesday 16 January 2007

The Assembly met at 10.30 am (Madam Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

Social Disadvantage and Educational Attainment

Madam Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow two hours for each of today's debates: the Member moving each motion will have 15 minutes, with a further 15 minutes for the winding-up speech. All other Members who wish to speak will have a maximum of 10 minutes.

Two amendments have been selected and published on the Marshalled List. They will be moved in the order in which they appear on the list. When the debate is concluded, I shall put the Question in turn that each amendment be made. If that is clear, I shall proceed.

Mr McElduff: I beg to move

That this Assembly recognises the link between social disadvantage and educational attainment and recognises the sterling work of educationalists in addressing this situation; and further calls on an incoming Executive to develop a strategic approach to raising the attainment levels for the most disadvantaged in our society.

Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Ba mhaith liom an rún seo a mholadh, agus tá áthas orm é a chur os comhair an Tionóil.

I note that two separate amendments have been tabled; I am happy to accept both, because they add substance to the original motion.

First and foremost, I call on the Assembly to acknowledge the direct link between social disadvantage and educational attainment. The Department of Education's business plan for 2006-07 concedes that those from disadvantaged backgrounds do not gain the full benefits of education. The anti-poverty and social exclusion strategy 'Lifetime Opportunities' concurs, stating that:

"Research shows that chances of escaping from poverty are greatly improved by educational attainment. Therefore the focus is and will remain on breaking the link between poverty and educational underperformance."

An interesting point was raised at a seminar organised by the Association of Teachers and Lecturers (ATL) in Grosvenor House on Friday last. There was a debate on whether there was such a thing as a good school or a bad school.

Would it be in order to regulate the clock in order to guide me through my 15 minutes?

Mr Brolly: Your time is up.

Mr McElduff: My time is up, according to Francie Brolly.

A spokesperson for NASUWT (The National Association of Schoolmasters Union of Women Teachers) said that there was no such thing as a bad school but that there was such a thing as a school with large numbers of children from socially disadvantaged backgrounds. That was a very interesting statement.

Educational disadvantage starts from an early age — often by the time children reach primary school. The strongest predictors of an individual's educational attainment level — class background, parental income levels and social and economic background as a key barrier to social mobility — have long been recognised.

Social disadvantage, as experienced by children in education, operates at many different levels. Household income, presently represented in the North by entitlement to free school meals, has been shown consistently to be a significant determinant of educational outcomes. There is a direct correlation between free school meal entitlement and average GCSE score, according to research carried out by Ian Shuttleworth and Peter Daly. In one particular survey, it was found that those entitled to free school meals achieved an average GCSE score of 34.8%, while those not entitled to free school meals achieved an average GCSE score of 52.5%.

At school, disadvantage is shown by the percentage of children from lower-income families and socially deprived areas. I draw the attention of Members to an answer given by Maria Eagle on 11 January to my colleague Sammy Wilson, a Member for East Antrim. He had asked how many children from Protestant and Catholic family backgrounds left school with fewer than five GCSE qualifications at grades A to C in the last year for which figures were available. The answer was as follows:

"The requested information relates to the 2004-05 school year and is as follows: (a) 4,232 (39.3 per cent of Protestant school leavers) (b) 4,566 (35.9 per cent of Roman Catholic school leavers)."

In the North, then, almost 9,000 children left school without five GCSEs.

There is the famous example of the small percentage — despite the very best efforts of the teachers — of children from controlled schools in the Shankill area of Belfast who tend to pass the transfer test and progress to third-level education. I emphasise that there is no such thing as a bad school. Unionist political leaders should show more leadership in helping to address the issue. That is the message that we consistently pick up from educationalists in that area.

In September 2000, a report by Tony Gallagher and Alan Smith — ‘The Effects of the Selective System of Secondary Education in Northern Ireland’ — investigated the 11-plus and the link between social disadvantage and educational attainment, and it showed that children of parents who could afford coaching and home tuition, in a pleasant home environment conducive to study, were better placed to do well in the transfer test.

Gallagher and Smith’s report stated that:

“Our evidence suggests that parents pay up to £15 per coaching session.”

It further stated that teachers feel that there is an unfairness in the procedure —

“... compounded by the fact that not all parents are able to afford out-of-school coaching.”

Inequality is therefore present at the personal level, at school level and at the third level. Research from Patrick Clancy of University College Dublin, written in 2001 and entitled ‘College Entry in Focus: A Fourth National Survey of Access to Higher Education’, confirms that there is a huge gap between access levels to third-level education in the Twenty-six Counties. He found that while 70% of students in fee-paying schools went on to third level, only 38% of vocational school students did so. It is also clear that that situation did not improve greatly during the recent economic boom and, in some respects, even worsened. Participation rates within third level in some working-class areas of Dublin, such as Dublin 11, which is Finglass and Ballymun, and Dublin 22, which is Clondalkin, already among the lowest in the state, fell by 3% between 1992 and 1998, when participation rates in third-level institutions were generally rising by 6%.

Educationalists are working hard at all of that, but they need support and help. I want Members to note that education takes place not only in formal settings, but at home and in the community. Educationalists involved in early childhood education have described as “a mental wasteland” the early developmental and educational experiences of some very young children in disadvantaged circumstances.

The great problem in all of that is that the consequences in later life of low educational attainment are significant and central to maintaining the cycle of deprivation and poverty. Low attainment can lead to unemployment and worklessness; and the cycle continues. To reinforce the point that there is a direct link between educational attainment and social deprivation, I draw Members’ attention to a study undertaken by the New Policy Institute, produced with support from the Joseph Rowntree Foundation, which draws on the latest available data to monitor indicators of poverty and social exclusion. It highlights many statistics regarding educational attainment. I will not cite those statistics now, but I direct the attention of Members to that study.

Educationalists, as I have said, work extremely hard to help disadvantaged pupils to achieve. I know this to be the case, for it was brought home to me at a seminar in Dundalk, where there were representatives present from Sinn Féin, the SDLP, the Ulster Unionist Party, the DUP, the Alliance Party, Fianna Fáil, Fine Gael and the Labour Party. It was an excellent initiative, taken by a number of school principals under the auspices of the Primary Principals’ Association. It addressed the link between educational attainment and social disadvantage. There I discovered that teachers deserve every support because they themselves are highly motivated in very difficult circumstances. I heard a story from a school in inner-city Dublin: a female teacher had occasion to open the schoolbag of a pupil and found a syringe in the schoolbag. I also heard stories from loyalist areas of Belfast of how, in recent times, feuding between loyalist groups impacted hugely on schools. It is difficult in such environments for educationalists to do their work.

In rural communities too, distance from essential services is an indicator of poverty, and I acknowledge the great work that educationalists do in these circumstances.

The Executive — no, I will be an optimist and say the “incoming” Executive — must develop a strategic approach to raising attainment levels for the most disadvantaged in society. That should be a constant theme and an identified priority. There must be a demonstrable and real determination to tackle inequality and place that at the centre of education policy and planning. The Department of Education and the incoming Executive must focus on that.

10.45 am

There must be significant increases in funding. Concerted, targeted action will be needed to impact positively on the quality of the education experience in the areas of greatest social need and in traditionally marginalised groups such as Irish Travellers, people with disabilities and those from ethnic minorities. That money must be targeted. It is not a matter of making a few million pounds available to trickle down as £5,000 here and £5,000 there: there must be real investment.

The Department of Education must be directed to consult beyond the normal suspects, such as education and library boards and sectoral providers. We should seek to include individuals from trade union backgrounds and non-governmental organisations.

Not every Member is a supporter of the civic forum concept, as I am. Provision was made in the Good Friday Agreement for an all-Ireland consultative civic authority or body. The Civic Forum produced a good report on social disadvantage and educational attainment that would be worth revisiting, even for those Members who might be sceptical about the value of hearing what civic society has to say.

There must be creative thinking. It will be the Executive's business to ensure that there is cross-cutting relevance of departmental responsibility.

Mr Storey: Will the Member give way?

Mr McElduff: I normally would, Mervyn, but I have only two minutes left. I have a substantial conclusion to make, so, in this instance, I will not give way.

I call for an integrated approach to address the environmental and social factors impacting on children's ability. Sure Start is an excellent initiative and needs to be resourced properly. It is making a difference, and it must be expanded in the crucial area of earliest possible intervention and strategies, so that children can gain the full benefit of the initiative as they move forward into formal education.

We need improved working arrangements between education — both the voluntary and statutory sectors — social services, health and housing. How, otherwise, will we reduce illiteracy and innumeracy, which are so prevalent? Do Members need reminding of the Public Accounts Committee (PAC) report at Westminster on improving the levels of numeracy and literacy and how it should be tackled?

How will we lift up the expectations of communities blighted by deprivation without an integrated approach? We should be serving the educational interests of the child — every child, not just those from more advantaged backgrounds. There is a direct link between social disadvantage and educational attainment. Our educationalists are doing a great job and doing their best, but they need support. That support will come in the form of political will and major investment. Although the Department of Education has a list of reform initiatives aimed at addressing this issue, the Executive and all of the relevant Departments must work together. Go raibh míle maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

Mr D Bradley: I beg to move amendment No 1: At end insert

“, including an investigation of the reasons why this link exists, and to implement effective existing and new measures to address this problem.”

Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Is ceist ollmhór é seo, agus is é an dúshlán is mó, b'fhéidir, atá romhainn i gcúrsaí oideachais sa taobh seo tíre. Molaim an Comhalta ó Iarthar Thír Eoghain agus fáiltímh roimh an chinneadh s'aige glacadh leis an dá leasú, nó ceapaim go gcuireann siad tuilleadh nirt leis an rún.

This issue is perhaps the biggest challenge facing education in Northern Ireland. I congratulate the Member for West Tyrone on moving the motion, and welcome the fact that he has agreed to the two amendments, as they both add strength to the motion.

Research clearly shows that there is a link between social disadvantage and educational underachievement. Low educational attainment is a result of social deprivation. Therefore, if we are to address the problem of low educational achievement, we must also address social deprivation. Attempting to address educational attainment without taking cognisance of, and addressing, social deprivation could be likened to addressing the symptoms without trying to address the root cause.

Only 37% of school-leavers from the most deprived areas leave with five or more GCSEs; the Northern Ireland average is 61%. The skills base in neighbourhood renewal areas also compares unfavourably when measured against the rest of Northern Ireland, with only 28% of people from age 16 to pensionable age qualified to level 2. The Northern Ireland average is 45%.

Social deprivation is a complex problem with many different elements. Several key background variables are associated with the impact of social deprivation on educational attainment. These include: pupils' personal characteristics; prior attainment; gender; health; low income; parental unemployment; housing conditions; family size; fluency in English; availability of stimulating reading materials in the home; parental interest; and involvement in, and encouragement of, literacy and numeracy. There are also local factors such as the attitude of the local community and peer groups to education and its value, and the feelings of alienation and social exclusion felt by many.

A report into the Northern Ireland literacy strategy, which was carried out on behalf of the Northern Ireland literacy steering group and published in October 2006, illustrated substantial research on the neighbourhood effects on educational attainment.

Tests for the existence of the effects on educational attainment of 2,500 young people in Scotland found significant negative effects linked to deprivation in the home and neighbourhood and educational attainment. The study concluded that policies to alleviate educational disadvantage cannot focus on schooling alone but must form part of a broader initiative to tackle social deprivation in society at large.

It is now generally accepted that the children who face the greatest obstacles to raising attainment are those who come from a disadvantaged family, live in a disadvantaged neighbourhood or attend a school with many disadvantaged children. Over 102,000 children in Northern Ireland live in poverty. That gives an idea of the scale of the problem.

If social deprivation, as one of the major causes of educational underachievement, is not addressed as part of a coherent strategy, it will simply ensure that the vicious circle of underachievement continues unabated into the next generation. The Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister's anti-poverty strategy makes that point about poverty itself.

Reviewing the factors that account for the variance in educational attainment, it is evident that combinations of social disadvantage powerfully affect performance, with a variation of up to 75% among schools in attainment by 16-year-olds at GCSE associated with pupil intake factors. It is important that we research the influence that those, and other factors, have on educational attainment. We must formulate policy and strategy to change attitudes and raise awareness about the role and value of education to the individual and to provide parents and communities with the resources and skills to change attitudes locally and to support the efforts of teachers and other educationalists in tackling the problem.

Tackling the multiple deprivation factors that have persisted in many areas for decades is a priority of the anti-poverty strategy. Education has a major role to play in that process, not only through the formal education system, but in the home and community. The Department of Education's role should be taken forward in conjunction with the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, the Department for Social Development and the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure.

Academic selection has further compounded the problem. Research by Gallagher and Smith highlights that academic selection tends to produce:

"a disproportionate number of schools which combine low ability and social disadvantage in their enrolments, thereby compounding the educational disadvantages of both factors."

School factors can raise the levels of educational attainment, sometimes by as many as 14 GCSE points for average pupils. Hence, schools are a good place to improve children's skills. However, a strategy that focuses solely on the improvement of average school performance is likely to be a less effective means of reducing educational underachievement than one that additionally includes communities, families, teachers and educationalists in a cross-cutting departmental approach that also addresses the causes of social deprivation.

There is a broad consensus that intervention in the early years is among the most effective means of improving educational performance and outcomes. Such interventions are likely to be an important facet of strategies that help to lift children out of cycles of deprivation and on to positive pathways. Promising evidence suggests that well-designed programmes are successful in raising levels of educational attainment and creating further positive outcomes in later adult life. The most successful programmes are defined by early and intensive intervention and include a follow-through component in the later stages of the child's development.

The Nobel laureate in economic sciences, Dr James J Heckman states that:

"Investments in social policies that intervene in the early years have very high rates of return while social policies that intervene at later stages in the life cycle have low economic returns. A large body of scientific evidence shows a "persistent pattern of strong effects" derived from early interventions. Significantly, these substantial, long-term benefits are not necessarily limited to intellectual gains, but are most clearly seen by measures of "social performance" and "lifetime achievement". In other words, people who participate in enriched early childhood programmes are more likely to complete school and much less likely to require welfare benefits, become teen parents or participate in criminal activities. Rather, they become productive adults."

In general, research studies suggest that, in comparison to having no pre-school experience, all forms of pre-school experience have a positive impact on the levels of attainment in national assessment tests taken at age seven. In addition, pre-school attendance has been found to improve school commitment, reducing the risk of disaffection and delinquency during later schooling. However, the quality of that provision is a significant determinant of the effects on educational attainment. High-quality provision involves small groups of children, high adult-child ratios, a balanced curriculum and well-trained staff.

As the Member for West Tyrone Mr McElduff mentioned, all Members are aware that the Northern Ireland Audit Office (NIAO) report 'Improving Literacy and Numeracy in Schools' and the House of Commons Committee of Public Accounts report 'Improving literacy and numeracy in schools (Northern Ireland)' —

Madam Speaker: Will the Member draw his remarks to a close, please?

Mr D Bradley: — show that there are serious problems with the current literacy and numeracy strategy. I will not go through all the points made in that report but conclude by saying that the Department of Education has undertaken to carry out a review of the strategy. The opportunity should be taken to include any new strategy —

Madam Speaker: Mr Bradley, I must ask you to finish.

Mr D Bradley: — and any strategy that attempts to address educational attainment without tackling the underlying social deprivation at the same time will be doomed to failure. Thank you, a Cheann Comhairle.

11.00 am

Mr McCausland: I beg to move amendment No 2:
At end insert

"The Assembly also notes the recent report on 'Improving literacy and numeracy in schools' in Northern Ireland by the House of Commons Committee of Public Accounts; and calls on the Department of Education to fully fund and implement an effective literacy and numeracy strategy; and further calls for the setting up of Education Action Zones in areas of high educational disadvantage."

Across much of Northern Ireland our educational performance is high. Our system produces some of the best-qualified and educated young people in the United Kingdom. However, it is also true that there are significant areas of low educational attainment and disadvantage. It is imperative that special attention be given to the children and schools in communities where low educational attainment exists.

The Member for West Tyrone, Mr McElduff, referred specifically to the levels of disadvantage in the Shankill area and called for the area's politicians to give leadership. In response, I point out that those of us who represent that area have been giving leadership, and my colleague from West Belfast will speak presently on that.

In fact, with regard to education, it is an area that I am particularly interested in having spent my teaching career in the Shankill area during the 70s and early 80s. Furthermore, having sat for many years on various schools' boards of governors in those areas, I am familiar with the situation.

Therefore, when it comes to advising people, perhaps the Member for West Tyrone should give advice to colleagues from his own party on the Belfast Education and Library Board, so that when we propose that there be a more equitable allocation of resources so that areas such as the Shankill get their fair share, his colleagues will not vote against that.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr McElduff: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCausland: No, because my time is quite limited.

When one realises that the Belfast Educational and Library Board spends only a few hundred pounds on youth services in areas such as lower Shankill, where there are large numbers of young people, and greater Ballysillan, where several thousand young people live, while approximately £80,000 is spent on an adjacent community, one realises that this is not a matter of objective need, but rather of disadvantage and discrimination.

It is right to highlight the commitment and dedication of the teachers in the schools, but often their task is made more difficult by decisions that are taken elsewhere. Having spoken to teachers in many schools and visited them on a regular basis, I cannot adequately express the appreciation that they deserve for their commitment and dedication. However, their task is often made more difficult by decisions made elsewhere, particularly in the Department of Education.

Quite often, decisions are made without properly consulting those who are actually teaching and working in the communities; they are the people who have a better insight into what is needed. The task of teachers and especially of principals in areas of educational disadvantage is often made harder by an ad hoc approach to tackling educational disadvantage.

For example, instead of a coherent approach to funding schools, principals are faced with a plethora of extra funding packages outside their core funding, with different criteria, mechanisms, timescales and accounting rules to draw down the money. The end result is that, while the resources are welcome, they may not be as effectively used as they might be. The system increases the administrative demands on principals already overstretched and under pressure, so if the Department of Education simply carried out its work in a more effective and systematic way, it could relieve some of the pressures on the principals and teachers in those schools, thereby freeing up more time for principals to deal with educational issues instead.

All children deserve a good start in life, and we have a responsibility to ensure that everything possible is done towards that objective. However, 20% of children leave school in Northern Ireland without achieving the required standard in numeracy and literacy. We talk about educational disadvantage and underachievement, but numeric and literary skills are essential for life. We need to understand why the problems arise and the factors that contribute to them.

The SDLP's amendment is, therefore, valuable; it proposes that there should be a full investigation into the core issue of why the link exists. Unless the problem is known, there is no chance of solving it. It is important to identify the factors.

This is about more than simply financial disadvantage; it is about community and family issues, aspirations, ambitions, role models and the value that communities and societies place on education. All those factors feed into the difficulties that arise in these communities. Identifying the problems is, therefore, an initial and important step.

We also need a coherent and comprehensive strategy to address the situation and resolve the problems. That must be a sustained strategy, rather than one that lasts for 18 months or two years. To turn a community or a problem around is often a 10-year process.

There is a link between social disadvantage and educational disadvantage. My amendment proposes that:

"The Assembly also notes the recent report on 'Improving literacy and numeracy in schools' in Northern Ireland by the House of Commons Committee of Public Accounts".

That report was published in November 2006. The amendment calls on the Department of Education to address this issue and to:

"fully fund and implement an effective literacy and numeracy strategy; and ... for the setting up of Education Action Zones in areas of high educational disadvantage."

The Public Accounts Committee (PAC) report notes that literacy and numeracy are key skills and that children who do not acquire an appropriate level of competence in those skills are seriously disadvantaged, possibly for the rest of their lives. The report highlights underachievement among boys, which constitutes a cultural challenge. It urges the Department to give particular attention to the worrying performance of boys in the Belfast Education and Library Board area. Educational underachievement is a widespread problem. However, it is particularly acute among boys in inner-city areas. There is a higher level of achievement among girls. The reasons for that disparity must be identified and tackled.

The report also highlights the evidence it received that:

"among socially deprived communities in Belfast, significant differences between Protestant and Roman Catholic children exist in GCSE English and Mathematics ... This raises a concern that children in Protestant working-class areas may not be enjoying equal educational opportunities."

This issue comes through strongly in the report. The problem is across the board; it is more acute among boys than girls; and it is particularly acute in Protestant areas — especially among boys in working-class Protestant areas.

The differential in educational disadvantage between Protestant and Roman Catholic communities, even where there are similar levels of social disadvantage, was also highlighted in the report of the Government's Taskforce on Protestant Working Class Communities. At the time of its publication, much attention was focused on the actions that were to follow from it. It was remiss of society not to pick up on the core problem of educational disadvantage in those areas, as highlighted in that report and in the PAC report.

The differential is influenced by more than the deprivation that is measured by the Noble indices. There are social factors that are almost impossible to measure, such as the value that a community or society places on education and the nature of the relationship between communities and schools. Those are complex problems that demand a comprehensive approach.

The PAC report goes on to say that the Department of Education is the lead body for education and, therefore, has a responsibility to ensure that an effective literacy and numeracy strategy is properly resourced and implemented. We must acknowledge the report because it is strong and specific in its criticisms and recommendations. When it appeared in November 2006, it did not receive the publicity that it should have. It would be remiss of the Assembly not to take this opportunity to draw attention to the report and to call on the Department of Education to respond to it in a meaningful and effective way.

Mr McNarry: The link between social disadvantage and poor educational attainment is, regrettably, clear and unambiguous. However, the failure of society to reverse the extent of social disadvantage — which, in turn, contributes to poor levels of educational attainment — is not a problem that is unique to Northern Ireland, nor should it be used as an excuse. That problem is common throughout the United Kingdom, and some people, therefore, do not believe that it is a priority that must be dealt with. Correspondingly, it should be acknowledged that the problem of poor educational achievement cannot and should not be laid at the feet of academic selection, which is used in Northern Ireland, or blamed on the non-selective system used in other parts of the United Kingdom.

I wonder whether the motion, which quite rightly commends the work of teachers, is entirely fair in calling for a strategic educational approach as the central means for raising academic achievement. Are we part of an enabling process? Are we more likely to get closer to the solution by seeking strategic approaches and investigations on the causes of social disadvantage and the impact that social deprivation has on children who are preparing for the first day when they enter a learning environment? Without such an enabling process, there is no doubt that children will — and do — suffer.

I believe that a child's preparation for school begins at home, under parental influence. That influence endures through partnership between parents and teaching professionals during the child's school life. I do not accept any rule of thumb or social measure that states that, because a child is not from an upwardly mobile background, or has unemployed parents, or has a single parent, or receives free school dinners, that young person should automatically be branded as socially disadvantaged and therefore expected to fail academically.

The solution to this problem cannot rest entirely within an education system or in its application. It is alarming that so many young people are leaving school without basic qualifications and remain dependent on the state for income support. The savings to be made by getting people off the unemployed list and into gainful employment would make it worthwhile to carefully examine expenditure aimed at dealing with numeracy and literacy failings at the youngest possible age — not long afterwards when young people are about to leave school. We make a mistake by addressing the issue only when children are about to leave school with no qualifications, rather than when they are beginning school. Putting additional resources into early-years learning would make sense. The rewards would be priceless, and society would benefit in real terms.

Members will recall with concern and disappointment the 2006 House of Commons Public Accounts Committee report on improving literacy and numeracy in our schools. I believe that one comment in that report stands out:

“The Department’s record on literacy and numeracy suggests to us that it has lacked commitment to and confidence in its target setting.”

The report also stated:

“We also expect the Department to maintain a consistent approach to targets rather than adjust them when results are falling short.”

Moreover, the report spells out the depth of the problem and where educational responsibility ultimately lies:

“The Committee expects the Department for Education to take urgent steps to improve the teaching of literacy and numeracy within schools. This is essential if we are to ensure that deficiencies in literacy and numeracy do not continue to be a major handicap for future generations of young adults after they leave school.”

Is that not it? That is the core element of the strategic approach required to ensure that future generations do not leave school deficient in numeracy and literacy skills.

11.15 am

The Department’s response to the House of Commons Public Accounts Committee was that work is under way to address the plethora of challenges issued by the Committee. If Members are to believe that, how long do we have to wait for ideas, suggestions and reasons — or even excuses — that can explain how children in Protestant working-class areas may not be enjoying equal educational opportunities? How will the facts that more Protestant 19 to 24 year olds than Roman Catholic 19 to 24 year olds lack basic qualifications and that Protestant males make up the highest proportion in that age group be explained?

I do not ask these questions to suggest that Roman Catholic children are subjected any less to social deprivation and the resultant deficiency in numeracy and literacy skills; that is not the case. Rather I wonder why the evidence shows that marked difference between Protestants and Roman Catholics. For the problem to be resolved, the approach simply must acknowledge that and concentrate on dealing with the problem cutting across our community. There is no sectarian or religious divide in this issue.

The motion draws attention to the issue, and both amendments go some way towards seeking out further matters that need to be addressed urgently. However, what is missing — and perhaps we will hear it later — is a firm indication that this House more than cares about young people who live in socially disadvantaged conditions and young people who leave school educationally disadvantaged. Those are two distinct issues, but they are linked by shared consequences for some — although not all — young people.

If we can explore that commonality and resolve those dual issues that result in disadvantage at home and at school, we will be able to devise strategies for implementation. If we just sit back and talk about the issue, we simply add to the growing list of young people without basic qualifications. The motion and the amendments are a start. I hope that this is the beginning of the end of the talking, and I support the motion accordingly.

Mr Campbell: This topic is important, and I wish to address my brief remarks to elements of both amendments, which were tabled in the names of SDLP Members and my colleague Mr McCausland.

There is no doubt that much research has been carried out on underachievement, and the underachievement of urban working-class Protestant children has become part of folklore, with the children on the Shankill Road being singled out for particular attention. Efforts have been made to establish why that is the case and to consider what improvements can be made.

I particularly support both amendments, the first of which calls for an investigation into the reasons why social disadvantage is linked to educational underachievement.

Mr O’Dowd: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. On behalf of my party, it is my duty to wind on the motion. However, if Members are not prepared to say whether they support the substantive motion, it is difficult to ascertain whether they are supporting it or are speaking against it. Is it in order for Members to state their position at the start of their address?

Madam Speaker: Mr O’Dowd, my understanding is that Members do not necessarily have to comment on the motion at the start of their speech — they can do so at any time during the speech. The content of Members’ speeches is obviously a matter for Members, but usual convention is that they comment on the motion at some stage during their address.

Mr Campbell: Thank you for that freedom, Madam Speaker. I am glad that we have the liberty to speak and elaborate on the subject matter. If there was some concern among Sinn Féin circles at the start of my speech, I am sure that there will be even more as I reach the end.

The links are there and are well documented. The Department of Education must produce a full report that establishes how literacy and numeracy skills can be increased in those sections of the community where the problem is greatest.

In these few minutes, I will dwell on an issue that to date has not been brought to the fore, namely a parental issue in Protestant working-class areas. It has been suggested in recent years that due to the loss of the heavy-engineering capacity of the 1960s and 1970s and the employment opportunities that arose from it, some parents do not assist and persevere with their children through education. Many urban working-class parents do not take that line.

Those employment opportunities have not been available in Northern Ireland for 15 or 20 years. However, the public sector in Northern Ireland has continued to employ around 60% of the workforce. If children are to get employment, promotion and all that is best for them, most parents know that that is statistically more likely in the public sector. There is a perception among many parents in urban working-class Protestant areas that that is a closed shop for their children. Therefore there is no incentive for them to get the qualifications required for employment in an area that statistics have shown to be more difficult for them. I applaud the SDLP amendment for that reason and because it is necessary to establish the links that exist between social disadvantage and educational attainment.

I have tabled a motion with regard to the public sector workforce that, hopefully, will come up in the weeks ahead. Effectively, this would enable us to reassure parents in working-class areas that there are openings and incentives for their children and that if the education establishment can ensure that children attain the numeracy and literacy skills and qualifications to go on to higher education and then into the public sector, there would be no closed door. Currently, there is a closed door to many from Protestant working-class communities in agencies such as the Housing Executive and the Child Support Agency. When that door is seen to be opened, parents from those areas will ensure that their children are incentivised to get the education they need. However, the Department for Education must draw out the links that exist between under-attainment and socially disadvantaged areas.

That is why I support the motion, and why, if the amendments are accepted, the entire House should be able to support the motion. If so, we can make progress. If the reasons for these links are established, it will open up not just educational attainment but the prospects for better employment across the community. That will be advantageous and positive for the entire community. Given that, I am delighted to add my name not just to the motion, but also to the motion as amended.

Mr K Robinson: I congratulate the Members who brought the timely motion and the amendments to the attention of the House. I will begin by declaring an interest: I am a governor in two primary schools in Newtownabbey. One is set in a leafy suburban avenue, and the other is in the middle of a public housing estate. Both schools are served by dedicated teaching staff, are led by energetic and visionary principals, are supported by interested parents and have the confidence of their communities. However, there the similarities begin to disappear.

One of the schools has a stable budget, an enrolment figure of almost 100% and a settled and experienced teaching staff. It does not have any composite classes. The other has composite classes, an unpredictable and inadequate budget, and it is forced to shed a member of staff annually. In many cases, the most experienced staff offer themselves since, in budgetary terms, they are the most expensive, and, by emulating Captain Oates, they sacrifice themselves to save the school the greatest amount of money.

Therefore the system, as currently operated by the Department, increases the risk of failure for some children and adds to the educational disadvantage of an entire community. It is little wonder that sections of society undervalue education when the educational establishment so obviously undervalues them.

The link between social disadvantage and educational attainment is clearly seen on examination of two wards in greater Belfast. The Hillfoot ward is apparently the least deprived in Belfast. In that ward, some 75% of school leavers achieve five or more GCSEs at grade C or above, 75% enter further or higher education, and fewer than 2% are entitled to free school meals. By contrast, the Shankill ward is the most deprived. In that ward, 26% of school leavers achieve five or more GCSEs at grade C or above, and fewer than 20% go on to third-level education. It is also worth noting that a massive 54% of post-primary pupils are entitled to free school meals in the most deprived of wards.

At primary level, 37% of 11-year-olds in the more deprived wards failed to reach level 4 English, and the comparable figure for Northern Ireland is 23% overall. Thirty three per cent of 11-year-olds in those wards failed to reach level 4 maths, compared with 21% across Northern Ireland. Those children were failing before they reached the age of 11; they were not failed by a selective system. Rather, there are inherent weaknesses in the system from its earliest years and before formal schooling even begins.

There are community influences that cause one in every five women to have no formal qualifications and one in every four men to be without basic qualifications. There are also stark differences between the two communities. In the 19 to 24 age cohort, 27% of Protestant males lack qualifications and 19% of Roman Catholic females are without basic qualifications. Gender, community and location have a bearing and influence on the potential outcomes of our young people and what they can expect to experience.

The House of Commons Public Accounts Committee published a report in December 2006 entitled 'Improving literacy and numeracy in schools (Northern Ireland)', and it makes many observations. Most of them question the role of the Department of Education, and rightly so. If any school had received such a scathing report from the inspectorate, the principal would have been replaced, the staff retrained and the governors retired. The report found "disturbing differences" in achievement between pupils of different religious backgrounds in the Belfast area. Among the socially deprived, the report found that there were "significant differences" between the attainment of Protestant and Roman Catholic children in GCSE English and Maths. The report further noted that the Committee "expects" the Department of Education to take urgent steps to improve the teaching of literacy and numeracy in schools, and that:

"The Department has a pressing responsibility to take the lead in identifying and championing best practice in literacy and numeracy teaching in schools."

The report also stated that the Department needs to provide "a clear direction and impetus" in the promotion of literacy and numeracy performance.

The Public Accounts Committee report states:

"The Committee will be interested to learn what steps the Department takes to address the issue."

The report further notes that the Committee was extremely disappointed that targets had been frequently adjusted.

11.30 am

As Members of the House, we also expect the Department to maintain targets rather than to adjust them when results are falling short. Does that not suggest a Department that was so busy focusing time, effort and funding on tilting at the windmill of selection that it failed to address its most basic function? That function is to ensure that all pupils complete their primary education armed with the two essential skills on which the rest of their educational progress depends — adequate levels of literacy and numeracy.

The failure of the Department to grasp that fact is as startling as it is inexcusable. It must now seriously address the factors that inhibit progress in deprived areas rather than galloping off on a crusade of social engineering. The Department should examine current pupil-teacher ratios in the areas that the report highlighted. The Department could do that by forming a task force from the current high number of unemployed young teachers whose enthusiasm could be merged with the expertise of staff already in schools who understand the needs of deprived communities.

Let the Department expand and properly fund initiatives such as the Sure Start and Reading Recovery programmes. Reading Recovery programmes have proved to improve a child's reading ability by 20 months within a calendar year; if that is not available in a school, a child's reading ability may only improve by five months, and the child may thereby fall further behind. What happens in Northern Ireland? The funding is cut. What happens in England? They seek to expand such initiatives. Such schemes are designed to raise standards in schools; instead of being stop-start, they should be mainstreamed where the need to raise standards is obvious rather than the current crazy system, where expertise is pushed back into a classroom and financial support is removed.

If a school succeeds, how is it rewarded? The money is taken away. Teachers are trained to teach these fairly skilled operations, but what happens? The school cannot afford to have teachers out there and pushes them back into a classroom. That inexplicable process infuriates the school principal and staff, and who knows what danger it causes a child or parent whose expectations have been raised only to be dashed?

Finally, Madam Speaker, I wish to repeat — and I am sure that you will object — my plea for 50:50 recruitment among the teaching force. Since 1998, male applicants to the primary-school-teacher course at Stranmillis University College have dropped from 23% to 17%. At the same time, male intake to the post-primary teaching course has slumped from 41% to 28%. That is a serious reflection on how men view the teaching profession and the career structure that it provides.

In modern society, especially in many deprived areas, the one-parent family is becoming more prevalent. Young boys growing up in such a situation are denied the opportunity of finding a positive male role model in the home. Increasingly, they are also failing to find a positive male role model in school, especially during the formative early years of primary education. That situation must be addressed if we are to interest boys in education.

If the Government can manipulate the recruitment of policing and attempt to justify it as being in the interests of the community, they can introduce the same principle into teacher training in the interests of society. Failure to do so will reinforce other socially undesirable routes to status that are, unfortunately, available in marginalised communities. However, such routes ultimately lead not only to ruin for an individual but ruin for the area concerned.

As you will know, Madam Speaker, the Committee for Education discussed this issue when this body functioned properly in the past. We brought the issue to the attention of previous Ministers and sought advice from across the United Kingdom. Eight years later, I cannot understand why decisive steps have still not been taken to ensure that those children who are most marginalised and deprived, who, time and again, have been readily identified as such, cannot be served by a decent education system.

Mr Brolly: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I support the motion and the amendments tabled to it. Poverty is one of the greatest issues that British direct rule has failed to tackle.

All the evidence demonstrates that child poverty must be addressed through early intervention. However, the loss of both teaching and support staff, particularly from schools that operate in areas of multiple deprivation, only further undermines support for those most at risk from poverty. That is why I support the motion and the proposed amendments.

In November 2006, the Joseph Rowntree Foundation launched a report that monitored poverty and social exclusion in the North. In chapter 8, which considered education, the findings on outcomes for younger children were:

“On average, the higher the level of deprivation in a school, the less likely it is that its children will have reached level 4 at age 11.”

In the most deprived fifth of schools, however, about one third of children do not reach that level.

The findings also revealed:

“In English, 37 per cent of 11-year-olds in the most deprived fifth of primary schools failed to reach level 4 in 2005. This compares with an average of 23 per cent for all schools. In maths, the figures were similar but slightly lower: 33 per cent in the most deprived fifth of primary schools failing to reach level 4 compared to 21 per cent for all schools.”

The findings on 16-year-olds lacking reasonable GCSEs showed:

“In 2004/05, 5 per cent of 16-year-olds obtained no GCSEs, 9 per cent obtained some but fewer than five GCSEs and a further 23 per cent obtained five GCSEs but not all at grade C.”

The findings continued:

“As a whole, this headline measure has come down, from 47 per cent in 1994/95 to 37 per cent in 2004/05. But almost all of this fall has been in the group getting five GCSEs but not at grades A-C. By contrast, there has been no fall in the numbers getting no GCSEs and no fall since 1997/98 in the numbers getting fewer than five. Rather, as the headline measure has gradually improved, the proportion getting few or no GCSEs at all has remained largely unchanged at around 15 per cent, or one in seven of all 16-year-olds.”

Of those children who are entitled to free school meals, the report states:

“the proportion getting few or no GCSEs has remained at around 30 per cent over the decade, double the rate for all 16-year-olds on average.”

The report highlights young people who have been in care as a particularly disadvantaged group. It states:

“In 2003, 50 per cent of those young people who leave care had no qualifications at all on leaving school — 10 times the national average — and only 10 per cent got 5 or more GCSEs grades A-C compared to a national average of 60 per cent.”

The findings on the destination of school-leavers revealed:

“On average, the higher a local area’s level of deprivation, the lower will be the proportion of its school leavers going on to further or higher education. For example, over the four years to 2001/02, some 45 per cent of school leavers living in the most deprived fifth of wards went on to further or higher education compared with 65 per cent in wards with average levels of deprivation.”

The report states that about 10% of 16-year-olds to 18-year-olds in the North — some 10,000 people — are not in education, employment or training. Among 19-year-olds to 24-year-olds, more young men than young women — 24% compared with 20% — lack basic qualifications.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Molloy] in the Chair)

Among young men and young women, more Protestants than Catholics lack basic qualifications. The group with the highest proportion lacking basic qualifications is young Protestant men, at 27%, and the group with the smallest proportion lacking such qualifications is young Catholic women, at 19%.

It is a matter of regret that some politicians refuse to support change to a system that has not served our children, particularly the most needy, well. I again commend my colleague Martin McGuinness for having relieved us of the embarrassment of the 11-plus, a system that condemns 75% of 11-year-olds to the educational and social scrap heap, demoralising many who are already deeply demoralised.

Twenty-two per cent of the working-age population in the North lack any qualifications. That proportion is far higher than anywhere else in Britain or Ireland. The anti-poverty strategy Lifetime Opportunities has proposed four cross-cutting themes in relation to children, sustainability and a shared future. The goal for early-years, which covers the ages of 0 to 4 years is:

“to ensure that every child should have a chance to develop their full potential in infancy regardless of social background.”

The goal for children aged between 5 and 16 is:

“to allow all children and young people to experience a happy and fulfilling childhood, while equipping them with the education, skills and experience to achieve their potential to be citizens of tomorrow.”

Again, unless we truly recognise the link between social disadvantage and educational attainment, and are radical and brave enough to change the old status quo, we will be failing our children.

The anti-poverty strategy’s goal for people of working age is:

“to ensure that everyone has the opportunity to fully participate in economic, social and cultural life.”

Tell that to children in care who leave school with no qualifications or to many of the North's citizens who see employment as the route out of poverty. However, employment is not an option for those with disabilities, for example, or for people caring for young children or older relatives. We must consider all our people.

Through its skills strategy, the Department for Employment and Learning is committed to ensuring that the workforce is literate and numerate by 2015. However, many will not achieve that or reach an acceptable level of competence unless this Assembly recognises the link between social disadvantage and educational attainment and sets itself to do something about it. Go raibh míle maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

Ms Farrell: Other Members have highlighted the links between social disadvantage and educational achievement in children. I shall take this opportunity to briefly consider how the situation applies to adults and 16- to 19-year-olds — the people whom the education system has failed.

I have spent all my working life in education. Until the Christmas holidays just past, I was involved in the implementation of the Department for Employment and Learning's essential skills programme. That programme was introduced by my colleague Carmel Hanna when she was Minister for that Department.

The United Kingdom has the highest rate of literacy problems in Europe, and Northern Ireland has the highest such rate in the United Kingdom.

It is estimated that one in four of the adult population of Northern Ireland lacks the basic skills essential to function fully in our society — they cannot read a bus or train timetable; they cannot complete everyday forms; they cannot read to their children or help them with their homework; and, in some instances, they cannot read the instructions on prescription medicines.

We are all familiar with the “gremlins” advertisement on television, which encourages adults to take advantage of the excellent provision available under the essential skills programme. The Department for Employment and Learning is to be congratulated on this initiative and on the funding that has been made available through it; however, it was long overdue.

Fifteen years ago, I was seconded from my further education college to the Southern Education and Library Board in order to develop its paltry adult education provision. At that time, adult literacy classes were totally underfunded. They were generally held in cold, leaky mobile classrooms at the edge of college campuses using volunteer tutors and learning material that was designed for young children. There was a stigma attached to attending those classes. Many adults spent years trying to pluck up the courage to take the first step across the door. Where transport was available, they would often travel to another town for fear of being spotted attending literacy classes by someone they knew.

Although there was little or no money, dedicated staff throughout the North dreamed up innovative ways of addressing the problem and removing the stigma. I think of the exciting “cook the books” project in Whiterock adult education centre, where women learned literacy and numeracy skills through the medium of cookery classes, thereby removing the stigma of going to learn to read and count. There are other examples throughout the country. Eventually, the introduction of computers lent dignity to the situation, with adult learners able to say that they were going to computer classes rather than to adult literacy classes.

This motion recognises the sterling work of educationalists, and there are many unsung heroes and heroines out there who have worked to help adults overcome social disadvantage through basic education. Tribute must be paid to the Educational Guidance Service for Adults, to the adult provision in the further education colleges and to the many voluntary organisations in the field.

Throughout the North there are groups and centres battling away daily to address the issue of overcoming social deprivation through adult education. That can be seen particularly in the area of women's education. Again, tribute must be paid to the Training for Women Network, which, through EU funding mechanisms, has supported a wide range of women's education programmes throughout the North. We see them in our cities, towns and villages. In my own constituency of Lagan Valley, wonderful work is being done by the Footprints Women's Centre in Poleglass and the Atlas project in Lisburn.

I could relate countless tales of adults', particularly women's, journeys through education and of how they have grown, gained confidence, found fulfilment and ended their cycle of poverty. Unfortunately, I do not have the time, but local newspapers regularly carry photographs of mature students on graduation day proudly holding the degrees that they have obtained, having worked their way through the adult progression route, through access provision and finally to a degree.

Amendment No 1 calls for an investigation into the reasons for the link between social disadvantage and educational attainment. Of particular concern to educationalists in the field of adult education is the difficulty in attracting men into the provision. That is not peculiar to Northern Ireland and is probably linked to the fact that girls are, as some Members mentioned earlier, outperforming boys throughout the education system. However, some research into the lack of male participation in adult education would be welcomed.

I started by saying that one aspect of my recent work involved the embedding of essential skills in further education. Specifically, this work was with young men in the construction trades — boys who, under the new guidelines, have to attain level 2 in literacy and numeracy, the equivalent of grade C at GCSE. Many of them are reluctant learners in further education. They have joined the construction industry and do not quite understand why they still have to do mathematics and English; they thought that they had left all that behind them at the school gate. However, they give examples, from their work experience on building sites, of mature men in their communities who carry the burden of illiteracy and are prevented from achieving their full potential in a society where the basic skills are so necessary in this day and age.

Although sterling work has been done, some people in Northern Ireland are still caught in the trap of social disadvantage. That trap has been brought about through lack of education. Let us investigate the links, highlight the good practice and develop measures to address the issue.

I support the motion.

Mr Copeland: As I have done previously, I am speaking to a motion for which there is an absence of muscle that can transmit the thoughts of the House into legislation. At this stage, there is little point in doing anything else. We are involved in a process that could be described as political speed-dating: we are not quite sure of the outcome, but its function will be to meet interesting people in the hope that something else in the future might occur.

I must declare an interest based on the fact that a substantial number of the citizens of my constituency fall into those categories that are bandied about: the “socially deprived” and the “disadvantaged”. I am not comfortable with apportioning those titles to any of our citizens, but I must do so because of the way in which statistical information on this matter is gathered.

It is probably patently obvious to all Members that I did not receive the benefit of a grammar-school or a third-level education. A few days ago, the Speaker of the House and I shared what I can only describe as a wonderful and moving experience in the Senate Chamber. Two groups of children, one from Holy Cross Boys' Primary School in North Belfast and the other from Beechfield Primary School on the interface of my own constituency, came together for a debate. They had prepared an Order Paper, apportioned speakers, the Speaker presided over the debate and Hansard reported it. They had their speeches prepared, and their points and arguments were well made. They eventually resolved that, in future, children would not be required to wear school uniforms.

Members might think that that is a minor event, but those children come from two areas that have similar housing, aspirational and unemployment circumstances. They are also similar in that those terms that we use, “disadvantage” and “underachievement”, can be applied to them. They are identical in every respect apart from where they choose or choose not to go to church on Sundays. They put their points forcefully, eloquently and intelligently, and I found it humbling. At the end of the debate, I explained to them that if any of them had been MLAs, what they had proposed and agreed on would in a few short weeks be a matter of law. I hope that somewhere, in some of those kids, a seed was planted that will convince them that change can be occasioned by words.

My son is an interesting case. When he was nine years old, we were told that he would never be able to read and write. Consequently, we did not subject him to the vagaries of the transfer procedure, and he went instead to Lagan College. He entered the lowest academic stream of that school. Although the alphabet that described his class was constructed in such a way that he was not supposed to know about the stream that he was in, he did know. By work, by luck and by growing older, he managed to move up through the school's system to such a degree that he got four As, two Bs and a C. He wants to be a doctor, and he is on course to be so. However, it will take him until he is 27 to achieve that because he did single- instead of double-award science.

The truth is that the brightest gems are found in the darkest mines, the richest coal in the deepest seas, and the most precious metals are the hardest and most expensive to extract. We must not permit the postcode area in which a child is born to affect his or her entire life. Education makes people free, but there is a cost.

I am a simple person. At one stage, I concluded that the primary responsibilities of education boards were to ensure that everyone had access to the possibility of change that could be brought about through education.

Imagine my shock and horror when I discovered that the primary legislative requirement on education boards is to live within their budgets.

The answer to all of the questions that have been raised during this debate can be summed up in just a few words: the funding of need. This House and this society must value education and believe in our heart of hearts that education can create change. We must take steps to ensure that those at one end of the spectrum — those who enjoy the benefits of grammar schools; who go to universities; and who go to London and elsewhere in England, Wales, Scotland, or around the world — return to this Province the investment that we have made in them.

Mrs D Dodds: There is no doubt that there are distinct connections between social deprivation and poor educational attainment. However, it is very important that we do not automatically place all children from socially disadvantaged backgrounds in one category. Some schools with pupils from such backgrounds prove that excellence in education is possible for all.

Although there is much good work being done in individual schools, there is a growing recognition that the Department of Education has not served our children well. I agree with the Member for Strangford David McNarry, who cited the failure of the Department's 1998 literacy and numeracy strategy. Instead of implementing targets, the Department simply shifted the goalposts and allowed targets to slip. That type of leadership is partly responsible for the lack of success that has led us to where we are today.

The 2006 report of the Westminster Public Accounts Committee on improving literacy and numeracy in schools draws serious conclusions that are of specific concern to those of us who represent socially deprived areas, particularly in the greater Belfast area. The report states that:

"among socially deprived communities in Belfast, significant differences between Protestant and Roman Catholic children exist in GCSE English and Mathematics. This raises a concern that children in Protestant working-class areas may not be enjoying equal educational opportunities."

That conclusion mirrors the findings presented in the Department for Social Development's 'Renewing Communities' document, which stated that a lack of educational attainment is a serious concern for Protestant communities.

Wards in my constituency, such as Shankill, Crumlin, Woodvale, Highfield and Glencairn, show high levels of deprivation and are among the most deprived areas in terms of education and skills. By focusing on these areas, I am neither denying nor condoning the existence of educational deprivation in other areas. However, these areas of my constituency are often cited as examples of deprivation, and perhaps it will be useful for this House to examine how the Department of Education has let children down in those communities.

In October 2003, the then Education Minister, Jane Kennedy, visited the Shankill area. She subsequently announced that £2.7 million would be made available for education action zones, which, she claimed, would be:

"child-centred, multi-agency responses based in local schools and working with the local community to improve services [that will] complement existing successful structures, such as the North-West and West Belfast & Greater Shankill Task Forces ... I would see the first Education Action Zone coming on stream by September 2004."

That sounded good, but by the autumn of 2004, with no education action zone in sight, I made further representations to that very forgettable Education

Minister, Barry Gardiner. He wrote back to say that the goalposts had been moved and that there was no requirement for an education action zone to be based in a particular area, but that it could be thematic, and that education and library boards would be invited to submit bids for such funding.

It is to the shame of the Department of Education and a series of Education Ministers that no such education action zone has materialised in that educationally disadvantaged area of Northern Ireland.

12.00 noon

At a recent meeting with the current Minister a couple of weeks ago, she admitted that education action zones in her own constituency have proved to have a positive effect, when managed well and working to specific targets for improvement. Here, however, it seems that such specific, targeted action is well beyond the capabilities of the Department of Education.

Today, I demand that the Minister take immediate steps to introduce an education action zone in the greater Shankill area. She must ensure that there is sufficient funding to improve teacher-pupil ratios and to provide extra special-needs teachers. She must also take steps to improve access to healthcare professionals such as speech and language therapists, who are in such short supply.

With no progress on an education action zone, local teachers and community workers in the Shankill area got together with the Belfast Education and Library Board and the North and West Belfast Health Action Zone to submit a bid to the Integrated Development Fund, which administers a pot of money generated by the West Belfast and Greater Shankill Task Forces. Almost four years later, that has not resulted in any funding being made available to hard-pressed teachers and communities in the greater Shankill and west Belfast areas.

Perhaps we should consider recent statements and initiatives. Following consultation with school principals in the greater Shankill and in north Belfast, several initiatives that could aid the education sector were identified in the renewing communities action plan. Recent meetings that my colleague for North Belfast and I attended with school principals from north Belfast showed that they are experiencing a slow, backlogged system that finds it almost impossible to release funding to schools on time, leaving principals with too much bureaucracy and the additional burden of finding alternative finance for schemes until the necessary funding is released.

Last year, the Secretary of State announced the children and young people's fund, with money becoming available for extended schools. To date, the Belfast Education and Library Board has released only 25% of the funds for this year, and it is almost the end of January. How can school principals deliver a service when such action clogs the system?

Children with special educational needs are particularly affected in areas of social disadvantage. The complicated system of obtaining adequate healthcare and education provision often means that parents find it difficult to access services. Parents find the statementing system complicated and intimidating. I fear that it disadvantages children from deprived backgrounds whose parents do not have the support or clout to demand extra provision for their children.

The current system of funding for special needs disadvantages children in Belfast. The city has a disproportionately high number of children with educational and emotional needs but does not receive extra funding to support them. The difference in approach from one education and library board to another means a difference in the service provided to children. A common approach should be a priority for the new single education authority, and there should be strong criteria for funding to ensure that provision for special needs is applied to all areas equitably.

Another aspect of educational disadvantage that particularly affects children with special needs is the shortage of educational psychologists. Last year, the Belfast Education and Library Board had the equivalent of 26 full-time educational psychologists, servicing a growing list of demands from children in the area.

This year it is 23, and, because of difficulties with offering long-term contracts, they are finding it very difficult to recruit extra educational psychologists into the system. If a child does not see an educational psychologist, he will not get a statement of needs and his rights will be infringed. That also needs to be urgently addressed.

I have confined myself to my own constituency for a very important reason: too often Education Ministers, the Secretary of State and every other politician have used the Shankill for a cheap headline about the lack of educational attainment or, indeed, the fuzzy feel-good picture that announces some initiative. Today I have tried to explain to the House why these areas continue to fail. They continue to fail because in spite of plenty of announcements, we have little sustained follow-up action. If we are to break the cycle of deprivation in these communities, we need to pay attention to that action and ensure that it is sustained over a long and specific period of time.

I support the amendment in the name of my party colleague and urge the House to do likewise.

Mr Dallat: I am delighted with the debate that we have had here this morning. I hope that every new Member who turns up to the Assembly on 26 March is given a copy of the Hansard report of this debate, because it will hold all the solutions to the problems that afflict so many people in society. I do not want to be repetitive, but 25% of people between the ages of 16 and 64 suffer from serious levels of illiteracy and innumeracy. My new colleague, Marietta Farrell, spoke very well about that.

Barry McElduff opened the debate and ventured into the heartlands of unionism. Of course, he got a response to that, but the issues we are addressing this morning do not know any political boundaries. They exist everywhere, and I will touch on that later.

Dominic Bradley highlighted the neighbourhood effects of social deprivation and urged us to focus on a broader initiative. He also talked about multiple deprivation. Nelson McCausland, who represents North Belfast, has spoken in the past about this. I certainly think that he made a convincing argument for greater equality. Norman McNarry made a very valuable contribution —

Mr Kennedy: His name is David.

Mr Dallat: My apologies. He was the first to mention the most recent Public Accounts Committee report.

Gregory Campbell ventured into the old sectarian issues and mentioned the closed door on public jobs. I should like to remind him that the door for public jobs in Coleraine is open at the moment, but it is open outwards, whether you are Siobhan or Sammy, Silvia or Sean. That is the door to County Hall, to HM Revenue and Customs and, shortly, to the Social Security Agency. Those people who will be losing their jobs in the public service will have nowhere to go because Coleraine has an extremely narrow industrial base. That is very sad; it is not something to laugh about.

Francie Brolly pointed out that while the number of children leaving school with five or more GCSEs is rising, the number leaving with none has not changed; that is a matter for regret.

I listened carefully to Michael Copeland, who spoke about his son; all of us could learn something from that. If all children were given the right support, they could achieve the best.

Diane Dodds confined her contribution to issues that affect north Belfast, and other Members have also covered that area. She rightly pointed out that the £2.7 million that was promised for the action zone was not delivered. Since the introduction of direct rule, that is the type of diet on which we have been fed.

Mr Adams: Will the Member give way?

Mr Dallat: I will not give way while I am making my winding-up speech. On second thoughts, since it is yourself, Gerry, I will give way.

Mr Adams: Maith thú. Tá mé buíoch den Chomhalta. Tá brón orm nach raibh mé anseo ar maidin nuair a bhí an Teach ag plé an ábhair thábhachtaigh seo.

I thank the Member for giving way, and I apologise that I was not here earlier for the debate.

By the way, I was late in arriving to the Chamber because I was meeting the direct-rule Minister with responsibility for education; we met specifically on the need to establish an educational initiative for the Shankill. Does the Member agree that all our young people have a right to equality of opportunity, based on objective need, including the best educational standards for the Shankill as well as for the Falls, and for all places in between?

Mr Dallat: I could not agree more, which is why I was somewhat disappointed when, on two occasions during the mandate of the Northern Ireland Assembly, the then Minister of Education lowered the attainment targets for Key Stage 2 and Key Stage 3; on a third occasion, he extended the time limit. Manipulating, and tampering with, targets is not the way to achieve the kind of success about which Gerry Adams has just spoken.

A previous Public Accounts Committee quizzed representatives from the Education and Training Inspectorate. I asked them why they were not screaming from the roof tops about the lack of support that there is for teachers in many schools in socially deprived areas. The officials wrote up glossy reports and persecuted good teachers, forcing them out of the profession early, but they did not address the issues.

This issue was discussed in previous Assemblies. One of the most influential contributions was made by our deceased colleague David Ervine, who, time and again, spoke passionately about educational poverty in loyalist areas of Belfast. He also spoke about the low number of children who pass the 11-plus in those districts and about the absolute need to tackle social disadvantage by ensuring that every child has an equal chance of maximising his or her educational potential.

I have no doubt that David Ervine understood that education is the greatest weapon to give to any child; my mother, God rest her, repeatedly told me that. Education is a far more powerful weapon than a gun or anything else that may have been used in the past to change our society. It remains so, and I am glad that everyone accepts that fact.

Social disadvantage is not confined to those areas about which David Ervine spoke; it is everywhere in Northern Ireland. Today, the threat is not about being sucked into paramilitarism but into drugs, crime and the other evils that compound the very social disadvantage that we are discussing. Social disadvantage is regional, as is illustrated by the various indicators that are used by the Government and their agencies. In Coleraine, the most affluent wards sit cheek by jowl with the most socially deprived wards. The same applies elsewhere, but it applies particularly in the north-west and in other border regions. Recent announcements that have been made by various Departments to centralise Civil Service jobs, either in Belfast or in marginal constituencies across the water, do nothing to address social disadvantage. I suspect that the jobs that are being lost in Coleraine and other places are being relocated for the wrong reasons.

I worry about the capacity of any future Assembly to address those — and other — issues that have arisen for historical reasons or as a result of neglect by direct-rule Ministers who have been here for 30 years too long.

I am no longer certain that all political parties are committed to decentralisation. I hope that I am not giving away any secrets by saying that the Subgroup on Workplace 2010 and Public Sector Job Location had considerable trouble finding a form of words that suited the DUP. However, I hope that decentralisation becomes a major issue in the new Assembly.

We need to move on and get the Assembly up and running. It needs to be not a piece of window dressing to stabilise democracy but a vehicle that will, without difference, introduce policies that will address genuinely the inequalities, injustices and discrimination that affect the lives of so many people in both communities and, indeed, in ethnic minority communities.

For too long, the twin evils of poor education and social disadvantage have been used not to fix, but to exploit, the problem. That has been unhelpful and, dare I say it, disgraceful. I hope that the time has come when our only reason to talk about the crisis is to fix it. The best way that we can reach that point is to tell the world that we are no longer sitting on the fence playing funny wee games; we are going after the real issues that affect people who have suffered grievously and who have borne the worst brunt of the instability and violence that I hope is part of history. I hope that the Assembly exists on 26 March so that we can take action as a result of today's debate.

Mr O'Dowd: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

In making my winding-up speech, I commend my party colleague for tabling the motion. I support the amendments, both of which he has accepted. That shows political maturity on his part and on the part of my party. It has been disappointing that recently in the Chamber, regardless of the value of amendments, they are opposed because they have been tabled by Sinn Féin. There is no need for Members to go into their safe zones just because a political party to which they may be politically or diametrically opposed tables a motion or amendment.

Many interesting contributions have been made today. The debate has been good, given the extent to which any debate in this Assembly can be useful. However, it has been interesting to hear the various views from around the Chamber on social disadvantage and educational underachievement. I listened carefully to Nelson McCausland's contribution. It was interesting because he quoted from various reports that have identified underachievement in Protestant areas. That underachievement clearly exists. To paraphrase him, he said that a report is needed on the reasons for that underachievement. I could not agree with him more. As has been said, if 27% of young Protestant males leave school with no qualifications, that means that we as a society have collectively failed them. We must identify the reasons for that.

(Madam Speaker in the Chair)

There are many interesting reasons for that. John Dallat spoke about David Ervine, whose contribution is missed today. David Ervine spoke at length on this matter and on the attitudes in the Protestant/loyalist community to itself, to education and to its sense of a lack of pride. Far be it from me to discuss a report that has not been written, but as an outsider looking in, I see that the influence of role models is one reason for those attitudes. As politicians, we are all role models. If a politician continues to tell his or her community that there is no confidence, that we are on the road to rack and ruin and that there is no future, generations coming after him or her will listen and garner no hope from that message. However, if that politician tells his or her community that there is a future, that we can work our way through those difficulties and that we can collectively build a new future on this island, surely hope and optimism will be instilled in that community. That will then filter down to the young people, who will see education as the way out of poverty.

It is remarkable that those on the Benches opposite continue to support the 11-plus, despite all the evidence that we have heard —

Mr McNarry: The Member is misrepresenting it. Withdraw that.

Mr O'Dowd: David, with respect, I will come to your comments in a moment.

The Members opposite continue to support the 11-plus, which has clearly been shown to discriminate against those in disadvantaged areas. However, the system has to be approved —

Mr Kennedy: I thank the Member for giving way, but he needs to do more research. It is clear that the 11-plus no longer enjoys widespread political support, but that is separate, and entirely different, from academic selection. The Member had better understand the difference between the two.

Mr O'Dowd: The UUP once told us that we need more than words. Changing the words does not alter the fact that there is still a selection process.

Michael Copeland, who spoke well this morning, told us about his son who was told at nine years of age that he was a failure. His son is now training to be a doctor, and I wish him success for his future. Will we tell our children at 11 or 14 that they are failures? No. We should ensure that all children — regardless of their social background — are given the same opportunities as everyone else and that we can educate our way out of poverty and social disadvantage.

Mr McElduff: Would the Member be surprised if I informed the House that, in the Subgroup on Schools Admission Policy, my proposal that the subgroup oppose the 11-plus received the following response: Sinn Féin and the SDLP supported the proposal; the DUP and UUP opposed it?

Mr O'Dowd: I thank my colleague for that piece of research; he has saved me the bother of having to look it up.

In relation to deprivation and social attainment —

Mr McNarry: Will the Member ask his colleague — who is giving out information from a closed subgroup, the minutes of which have not yet been approved and which he should not disclose, even to the Assembly — to tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth of his story?

Mr McElduff: Will the Member give way?

Mr O'Dowd: Certainly.

Mr McNarry: There is a subgroup meeting at 12.30.

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr McElduff: I will join David in the afternoon for further discussion on the matter.

Mr O'Dowd: I thank Members for those interesting contributions.

I represent a constituency that has areas of high deprivation, one of which is an estate called Ardowen. Three years ago, Ardowen had been practically demolished by hoods — a small minority came into the estate and almost destroyed it. The local people said, "Enough is enough; we have had all we can take" and they stood up to the hoods. The hoods left and the estate was rebuilt. However, the most amazing thing that came from that project was that people set up a homework club in a derelict house, for which they received small amounts of funding. That small homework club includes people from all communities: the travelling community, ethnic minorities, and the Protestant and Catholic communities.

For the first time in that area there is a possibility that children will leave secondary school to go to university. Up until now, only one person from that area graduated from university. Due to the work of the local community, other children in the area have a future.

My colleague Barry McElduff spoke about the need for civic society to be involved in educational attainment. That is a classic example of communities coming together, facing their difficulties and noting that the way out of the poverty and disadvantage that we face is through education. They did it themselves, and I congratulate them for it.

If we are to achieve anything in relation to the motion and the amendments — I have been accused of making the same speech on a different day, and I will do that again today — we need a local Minister who is accountable to the Assembly to make decisions. As Michael Copeland told us, when he was at the debate in the Senate Chamber — [Interruption.]

Is that confirmation on power sharing? Sorry, I missed that. Is that a yes to power sharing?

Mr Weir: Will you tell that to your Ard-Fheis?

Mr O'Dowd: Sorry, I thought that that was a yes to power sharing; I picked it up wrong.

Mr Weir: Are you supporting policing?

Mr O'Dowd: Was that a yes to power sharing?

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr O'Dowd: I will check Hansard to see what the Member said.

As Michael Copeland told us, he attended a debate in the Senate Chamber between two north Belfast primary schools. It was a brilliant debate, from which both schools emerged empowered. They had decided against the wearing of school uniforms; unfortunately for them, however, debating the issue was all that they were able to do. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr O'Dowd: We are similar in that we are having an excellent debate with worthwhile contributions from both sides of the House, but we cannot make decisions. I hope that Mr Dallat is right, and that we return on 26 March. When I check Hansard, I hope to find that my colleague Mr Weir said yes to power sharing; that we can ensure that we are the decision-makers on education; and that this Assembly can hold to account the former education Ministers who let down Diane Dodds and the Shankill community.

Mr McNarry: That includes yours.

Mr Kennedy: He is here.

Mr O'Dowd: I do not believe that our Minister of Education let anyone down. If an education Minister is not doing his or her job or any party is not doing its job, the electorate will deselect them.

Some Members: Oh!

Mr O'Dowd: On that note, I will end my remarks. Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

Question, That amendment No 1 be made, put and agreed to.

Question, That amendment No 2 be made, put and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly recognises the link between social disadvantage and educational attainment and recognises the sterling work of educationalists in addressing this situation; and further calls on an incoming Executive to develop a strategic approach to raising the attainment levels for the most disadvantaged in our society, including an investigation of the reasons why this link exists, and to implement effective existing and new measures to address this problem. The Assembly also notes the recent report on 'Improving literacy and numeracy in schools' in Northern Ireland by the House of Commons Committee of Public Accounts; and calls on the Department of Education to fully fund and implement an effective literacy and numeracy strategy; and further calls for the setting up of Education Action Zones in areas of high educational disadvantage.

Madam Speaker: Members will know that the Business Committee has arranged to meet as usual at lunchtime today. I propose therefore, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the sitting until 2.00 pm.

The sitting was suspended at 12.27 pm.

On resuming (Madam Speaker in the Chair) —
2.00 pm

Sudan

Madam Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow two hours for the debate. The Member proposing the motion has 15 minutes to speak, with 15 minutes for the winding-up speech. All other Members who wish to speak will have a maximum of 10 minutes.

Mrs Hanna: I beg to move

Bearing in mind the appalling human tragedy in Darfur, this Assembly calls on all democratic governments, especially the Irish and British Governments with which this Assembly has particular interaction, to use all their influence on the Government of Sudan to accept immediate deployment of the United Nations force in Darfur, as mandated by the United Nations Security Council.

This is the first motion dealing with matters outside Northern Ireland to be tabled in the Transitional Assembly. I will explain briefly why I have tabled it even though the Assembly has no power over matters in Northern Ireland, let alone thousands of miles away in east Africa. International development is a reserved matter, but international development and awareness-raising are functions of a devolved Assembly.

The International Development All Party Assembly Group, set up in the Assembly in late 1998, was one of the most successful of all-party groups, and it continued to meet during suspension. It has hosted many functions, such as the Make Poverty History campaign and the report of the Commission for Africa. It has held meetings with the Secretary of State for International Development, Hilary Benn; the Republic of Ireland Minister of State with special responsibility for Overseas Development and Human Rights, Conor Lenihan; and Patricia Ferguson in the Scottish Executive. The group has had several meetings with the all-party groups in Scotland and Wales. It was made clear to the group at its meetings with Mr Benn and Mr Lenihan that the door is ajar for it to become much more involved. At the meeting with Patricia Ferguson, we learned how much the Scottish Parliament is doing for international development and how much Members could achieve in that respect, if only progress could be made in restoring the Assembly.

Most Members will be aware of the response of our Lord when he was asked: "Who is my neighbour?" He told the parable of the good Samaritan, the lesson of which is that none of us can walk past on the other side of the road. Members cannot ignore what is happening in the rest of the world. The Assembly should use whatever influence it has with the British and Irish Governments, both of which — in fairness to them — have been active in relation to the crisis in Darfur.

On their own, the people of Northern Ireland were unable to solve their political problems until the issues were internationalised. At that point, not only did the Irish and British Governments become involved, but so too did the European Union and the United States. We have benefited enormously from the hundreds of millions of pounds contributed by the International Fund for Ireland, by Jacques Delors's Special Support Programme for Peace and Reconciliation and by EU structural funds. Northern Ireland has also benefited immensely from the time, energy and commitment of people such as Senator George Mitchell and many others. They did not walk by on the other side of the road; rather, they gave us significant chunks of their lives to help us sort ourselves out.

I am grateful to Dr James Uhomoibhi of the African Development Centre in Northern Ireland for information. We know of more than 100 Sudanese families living here, many of whom have been displaced. The human fallout from what is happening in Darfur has already reached our shores.

Darfur, along with Iraq, Burma and the Democratic Republic of Congo, has some of the worst examples of starvation and mass abuse of human rights taking place in the world today. Sudan, of which Darfur is a western province, is broadly divided between the Muslim north and the Christian and animist south. The Government in Khartoum have been waging ferocious warfare for four years against rebels from black African tribes who took up arms, accusing the Khartoum Government of discrimination and oppression. That conflict has now spilled over into Darfur, and the cost of that warfare is immense.

Darfur is approximately two thirds of the size of France, with a population of around 7.5 million people, most of whom are engaged in subsistence agriculture. Between 200,000 and 300,000 people have been killed — people who, even in the best of times, were among the poorest on the earth. It can be very hard to get our heads around those numbers and imagine that they are people like us. Imagine the number of bodies that are piled up dead in that place.

Around 2.5 million people have been displaced and forced to keep continually on the move in a very harsh equatorial, arid climate. Even worse, the combatants in the conflict have been using human rights abuses and violations of the worst kind as weapons of war: systematic targeting of individuals; the deliberate destruction of homes, grain stores and water sources; abductions; mutilations; and the systematic use of rape in ethnic cleansing of the worst kind, with the aim of driving out the non-Arab ethnic groups from their villages.

I welcome the role that the UK Government have played at the United Nations in supporting the special session of the Human Rights Council on Darfur and in securing United Nations Security Council Resolution 1706, which has extended the UN mission in Sudan, mandating it to cover Darfur and calling for 22,500 UN troops and police officers to support the 7,000 members of the African Union Mission already in Sudan.

All that work done at the United Nations is right and good. The problem is that the Sudanese Government have delayed and prevaricated on the deployment of an effective UN peacekeeping force in Darfur and imposed preposterous demands, such as limiting the UN force to African participants only, not wearing the blue UN helmets, etc.

It should be accepted that the African Union force is too small to deal effectively with the situation in Darfur on its own. The only effective force would be a United Nations force. If and when that force is deployed — and I hope to God that it happens soon — its priorities must include effective human rights protection and security for those who are most at risk in the camps, towns and villages; ensuring the safe and voluntary assisted return for the very many displaced people and refugees; and the disarmament of the Janjaweed Arab militia.

The Irish Government do not have the same influence as the British Government; nonetheless they have used all their influence, particularly in the European Union. The work of Irish-based agencies such as Concern has been exceptional.

Darfur, as Members probably know, borders on Chad and the Central African Republic. One of the grave dangers of Darfur's conflict is the destabilisation of other countries in the region. We have already seen some conflict in Ethiopia and Somalia. A second danger — hopefully less likely — is that the international community will turn a blind eye, as happened in Rwanda. I hope that that will not happen.

We in Northern Ireland have to be aware that the scale of what has happened and is happening in Darfur far exceeds anything that we can imagine. The sheer numbers of people and deaths make the situation difficult to understand.

I want to mention the humanitarian work and the courage of the Northern Ireland-based aid agencies, which I know are represented here today. Banded together they are known as the Coalition of Aid and Development Agencies (CADA). I am talking about the development and human rights agencies. I will list them alphabetically: Amnesty International, Christian Aid, Concern, Oxfam, Save the Children, the Red Cross, Trócaire and War on Want. I apologise if I have left any out.

Most of those agencies, which engage in humanitarian relief work, have been forced out of Darfur by the sheer ferocity of the conflict and, indeed, by the Government. Some of them have now returned, and I hope that we can achieve more stability so that they can all go back. They are desperately needed. Nearly three million people depend on international aid for food, shelter and medicine. All we can do is support the work of the agencies through our own financial contributions.

In conclusion, I hope that the parties in this Assembly will back the motion. The people of Northern Ireland are not lacking in compassion and sympathy for those worse off than themselves. This was evident in our response to the tsunami disaster two years ago. We are consistently among the highest contributors to charitable and international development relief work. The role played by the agencies, by faith-based missionaries and by those without any faith, over generations, is a magnificent story that has yet to be told.

We, the elected representatives of the people of Northern Ireland, can express what is best in our community by supporting this motion today. To paraphrase the poet, no community is an island. We all walk in each other's shadows, whether it is the farmer, the worker, the businessman, the student, the child, the homemaker or the homeless. We share our common humanity with the wretched of the earth in Darfur, where completely helpless people are being destroyed by a conflict that is not of their making. Please support this motion.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Moutray: The Republic of Sudan is the largest country by area in Africa, and is bordered by nine other African nations. It has had a troubled relationship with many of its neighbours due to what is viewed as its aggressive Islamic stance.

Omar al-Bashir led a military coup in 1989, and since then has controlled the country, aligning himself with Islamists and others, including Saddam Hussein and the Taliban. Sudan has an authoritarian Government, with all effective power in the hands of Bashir. For 20 years, until 2005, he waged a civil war with Christians in the south of the country that displaced more than four million people and killed an estimated two million. A peace treaty was eventually signed in 2005, when it became clear that the south could not be overrun.

Sadly, as this conflict abated, another was brewing in the neglected western region of Darfur, where Arab Janjaweed militia have attempted to ethnically cleanse the region of its native inhabitants.

On 9 September 2004, US Secretary of State Colin Powell called the Darfur conflict "genocide", acknowledging it as one of the worst humanitarian crises of the twenty-first century. To date, two million people have been displaced and possibly up to 400,000 killed. Despite a peace agreement, brokered by the African Union and signed in May 2006, the Sudanese Government and Government-sponsored militias have continued to launch attacks on the citizens of Darfur.

I had the privilege of visiting Sudan in 2004 as part of a delegation of politicians. We met many of the Government and opposition groups, including the Democratic Unionist Party of Sudan. Any similarity was in name only. [Laughter.]

I found Sudan to be a country rich in mineral resources. However, Sudan is ruled by an authoritarian, fundamentalist Islamic Government that is content to inflict Sharia law on the entire population to the extent of executing juveniles for non-capital crimes. As recently as last New Year's Eve, police fired tear gas into the Anglican cathedral in Khartoum and proceeded to attack worshippers with whips and sticks and to damage cathedral property — that is indicative of the levels of tolerance and religious freedom in Sudan.

2.15 pm

A small contingent of African Union peacekeeping troops is in Darfur but is largely ineffective. A deployment of United Nations troops is needed, as advocated by the former United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan. As recently as last weekend, there were reports of the Sudanese Government unleashing aerial bombing raids on refugee camps in the Darfur region. Time is of the essence. I call upon the UK Government, and all democratically elected Governments, to bring their entire combined influence to bear on the Government of Sudan to accept a deployment of United Nations troops now. I support the motion.

Dr Birnie: I welcome the debate and congratulate my colleague from South Belfast Carmel Hanna on introducing the motion.

Western Governments, and perhaps other Governments, should intervene in Sudan. The UK Government have a particular responsibility for two reasons: first, the United Kingdom is a permanent member of the UN Security Council; and, secondly, because of the UK's significant historical links with Sudan. It must be remembered that, for much of the last century, Sudan was, in effect, a protectorate of the British Empire.

Mr Kennedy: Hear, hear. At the time of General Gordon.

Dr Birnie: That is going back even further. [Laughter.]

Mrs Hanna and Mr Moutray have outlined much of the strong moral argument for intervention. The statistics are frightening: between 200,000 and 400,000 people have died in Darfur, and over two million have been displaced from their homes. An enormous population has moved into refugee camps.

As outlined by the proposer of the motion, non-governmental organisations (NGOs), including charities such as Oxfam, Save the Children, and many others, have been doing good work in bringing humanitarian relief to those people living that extremely precarious existence. However, their work is seriously hindered by the extent of the ongoing violence in the area. It is a complex triangular conflict involving the Sudanese Government, as mentioned by Mr Moutray, the Janjaweed militia and a fragmented series of rebel groups. Some peace arrangements are in place, but they have proved patchy so far. As Mrs Hanna noted, Darfur is an enormous tract of land — almost the size of a large European country.

The continued failure to co-ordinate an adequate international intervention to support the stabilisation of Darfur and allow humanitarian efforts to proceed unhindered represents a failure to learn from history. The record of the twentieth century in that regard is dismal. The international community was silent as Turkey launched what many regard as the first genocide of modern times against the Armenian population during the First World War. In 1945, as everyone should know, the discovery of Nazi death camps produced the very understandable reaction of “never again.”

Yet by 1994, in the space of barely 100 days, 800,000 people were massacred in Rwanda, largely along tribal lines. That has already been referred to this afternoon. It is significant that a UN stabilisation force was deployed to deal with that, but, numerically, that force was tiny and was hobbled by inadequate support and equipment. Indeed, some might say that it was hobbled deliberately. Its remit, as given by the UN Security Council, was always going to be extremely limited.

The difficulties that were faced at that time have been movingly described in a book called ‘Shake Hands with the Devil: The Failure of Humanity in Rwanda’ by the Canadian General Dallaire, who was the commander of the UN peacekeeping force in Rwanda. It is worth reading that book to ponder the implications that that situation has for places such as Darfur.

We could say, as some people might when they hear about today's motion, that the part of Sudan that we are debating is a faraway land of which we know nothing. Of course, those words should be familiar: Neville Chamberlain said the same of Czechoslovakia in 1938. We all know what that subsequently led to.

On 17 September last year, representatives of various international aid charities and some Churches in Ireland — and, indeed others — said in Belfast that adequate and timely intervention in the region is necessary. We should take note of that and remember that it was said on the designated day for Darfur.

Furthermore, we should ponder the pledge that the United Nations made on 17 September 2005. That said that the international community has a responsibility to protect people. That applies even to Governments that menace the lives and liberties of their own citizens.

The UK Government secured the passing of UN Security Council Resolution 1706, which proposed sending a UN stabilisation force of roughly 22,500 people to that part of Sudan. That resolution should be implemented as a matter of urgency because, although Members have referred to the African Union, which comprises the roughly 7,000 troops who are already in the region, those numbers are clearly not adequate to perform the task that is in hand.

In recent years, Prime Minister Blair referred to Africa as a:

“scar on the conscience of the world.”

It is time to heal that scar, and by supporting the motion we at least make a contribution to that, however small.

Ms Ruane: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I welcome today's motion, and I thank Carmel for tabling it. I also welcome the fact that we are debating such a serious issue.

Cuirim fáilte roimh an rún, nó is ábhar an-tábhachtach é seo.

Sinn Féin is deeply concerned about the grave situation in the Darfur region of Sudan. It is particularly concerned about the continued attacks of the Janjaweed militia against the civilian population. That militia group is supported by the Sudanese Government. Sinn Féin is also concerned about other human rights abuses and about the humanitarian crisis.

Sinn Féin supports the central role played by the African Union and the United Nations in seeking to resolve the Darfur crisis. As Esmond said, to date 7,000 African Union troops have been deployed, but, despite their best efforts, they have not been able to prevent the conflict worsening. The conflict in Sudan needs a political, not a military, solution.

The conflict began in 1955, the year before Sudan gained its independence. It has been going on for all but 11 of the 48 years that Sudan has been independent. To date, the Sudanese Government have failed to protect their people. Until the signing of the comprehensive peace agreement, the Sudanese Government and the Janjaweed — that Government's militia — and the Sudan People's Liberation Movement, spent the previous 21 years fighting a bloody war. Over two million people died, four million were displaced and over 600,000 people fled the country as refugees.

The United Nations has supported a peace process to try to ensure that there is a political solution and to protect the people of Sudan, particularly the civilian population. In August 2006, the UN Security Council passed a resolution to support the deployment of a UN peacekeeping force to protect the civilian population and to implement the peace agreement.

Sinn Féin welcomes the announcement in December that the Sudanese Government accept a UN force, although my party is concerned that they appear to be pulling back from commitments given. Given the gravity of the situation, it is essential that the international community continues to exert pressure on the Sudanese Government to disarm the Janjaweed militia immediately and create the conditions in which there can be a peaceful resolution to the conflict.

The UN programme is dynamic and includes a comprehensive human rights programme, which includes the establishment of 12 human rights institutions and a national human rights centre, monitoring the police and visiting detention centres to prevent torture and ill-treatment. It also includes specific training for the police, promotion of the rule of law and an independent judiciary.

The international community must act decisively and ensure that the humanitarian programme is facilitated and reaches the poorest, most affected people. It is essential that aid agencies are supported and their work facilitated. Along with other Members, I commend the work that Irish aid agencies have done in Sudan and urge them to continue their efforts. It is worth noting that despite its being a small country, Ireland contributed more than €16 million in support of Darfur during 2004-06.

In the 1980s, I worked for three and a half years in El Salvador, Guatemala and Nicaragua. I saw the suffering that people endure during conflict, particularly women and children. I saw sights that I never want to see again. When I came home from central America, I worked with Trócaire and met some amazing Irish and British people who were totally committed to alleviating the suffering of people in various countries throughout the world. I want to pay tribute to people from across these islands who work abroad for peace and justice, international development, human rights and conflict resolution.

The UN has an essential role in resolving the Sudanese conflict. During the 1990s, I was proud to be part of the UN-led observer mission in South Africa when the first free and fair elections were held and Nelson Mandela was elected President. I remember feeling proud to wear the blue and white colours of the UN, knowing that on that occasion, the international community had played an important role.

I also want to pay tribute to Mary Robinson, who has done tremendous work throughout the world as President of Ireland and as UN High Commissioner for Human Rights. She was so effective that some more powerful Governments did not support her continued role. I know from experience in many of those countries that she had tremendous support among the men, women and children who were suffering from conflict and whose human rights she actively supported.

One of the most important things that the Assembly can do as part of the international community is support aid agencies and create awareness of the root causes of conflict. There is no point in ending a war and not dealing with its causes and finding ways to resolve it. The international community must shine a light on the suffering people in Sudan and help create the conditions for rebuilding, rather than destruction and death, during the next 50 years.

Go gcuirtear deireadh leis an chogadh seo sula bhfaigheann níos mó daoine bás. Tá sé uafásach go bhfuil a leithéid seo ag titim amach agus sinn inár seasamh thart gan rud ar bith á dhéanamh againn.

My party supports the motion. It looks forward to when the new Assembly and all-Ireland institutions are restored and able to play their part in the international community. Go raibh maith agat.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Wells] in the Chair)

2.30 pm

Mr McCarthy: I support this important motion and commend Carmel Hanna for bringing it to the House today. Anyone who has witnessed the appalling scenes in this desperate region of the world cannot be anything but horrified at the suffering of so many people. These are human beings, God's creatures the same as ourselves. They are inhabitants of our world, and it is important that we try to help in whatever small way we can.

In our own country we have many disagreements and arguments. However, the misery of Darfur and other places makes our squabble seem almost obscene. I pay tribute to the organisations based throughout these islands that are working flat out to make things better for those people in Darfur and in other dark areas of the world.

I know that the British and Irish Governments are working to aid this region. However, there needs to be more pressure for the deployment of a United Nations force in Darfur. What is happening there is an affront to the rest of the human race, and immediate action is required. The Alliance Party fully supports the motion.

Mr Dawson: Throughout human history there are countless cases of the unimaginable horrors that man can inflict upon his fellow man. The Holocaust, Cambodia, the former Yugoslavia, Rwanda — the list is as endless as it is horrific. The Africa Inland Mission — a missionary organisation well known to, and supported by, many people in Northern Ireland — has said that the situation in Darfur is the world's greatest humanitarian crisis, that the situation in the region is one of genocide, and that the insecurity orchestrated by Khartoum impedes the delivery of aid. That view is supported by a House of Commons research paper which states that:

"no independent observer disputes that war crimes or crimes against humanity took place."

I was struck by the words of the 'New York Times' journalist Nicholas Kristof:

"In my years as a journalist, I thought I had seen a full kaleidoscope of horrors, from babies dying of malaria to Chinese troops shooting students to Indonesian mobs beheading people. But nothing prepared me for Darfur, where systematic murder, rape, and mutilation are taking place on a vast scale, based simply on the tribe of the victim. What I saw reminded me why people say that genocide is the worst evil of which human beings are capable."

The little that we know about death and destruction in this country is too much. However, our experiences cannot compare to the pure terror that the people of Darfur are enduring, or match the sheer scale of the situation in Sudan. The number of deaths in Darfur has been impossible to accurately estimate. The United Nations estimated in September 2006 that 400,000 people had lost their lives. In a region of six million souls, that represents 7% of the population. Translated into a Northern Ireland context, that would mean the death of nearly 120,000 people.

The horror stretches far beyond that butchery. Some two million people are believed to have been driven from their homes and forced to live as displaced persons in camps in Sudan or across the border in Chad. More than 3.5 million people are completely dependent on international assistance for their survival. The misery of millions forced to live in the squalid conditions of a refugee camp is compounded by the fact that there is no peace or security there either. Reports are rife of people being killed, raped and attacked in and around refugee camps, yet that horror is preferable to returning home, where starvation and slaughter await.

It was statistics such as those that prompted the United Nations resolution of 31 August 2006. However, it is an indictment of the United Nations, and its member states, that almost five months later, this African region has had neither the peacekeepers nor the adequate humanitarian aid that it requires. Sadly, the record of the global community in instances of genocide is poor, and Darfur is no different.

What is it about the African continent that puts it beyond the limits of the international community? We have witnessed the troubles in Rwanda, Zimbabwe and now the Sudan, and the international community has signally failed the peoples of those regions by failing to act for their protection.

Why are the people of that continent — and their rights — of less importance than the people of Kosovo, Afghanistan or Iraq? The international community has had no difficulty taking action, up to and including military action, in those areas, but in Africa, and in the Sudan in particular, no effective action has been taken.

This is in spite of the UN's own legal construct — namely its "responsibility to protect". This responsibility was described in the resolution adopted by the UN General Assembly in September 2005, which indicated that states are:

"prepared to take collective action, in a timely and decisive manner, through the Security Council, in accordance with the Charter, including Chapter VII, on a case-by-case basis and in cooperation with relevant regional organizations as appropriate, should peaceful means be inadequate and national authorities are manifestly failing to protect their populations from genocide, war crimes, ethnic cleansing and crimes against humanity....and its implications, bearing in mind the principles of the Charter and international law.”

I realise that there are nearly as many caveats in that statement as in the recent Ard-Fheis motion published by Sinn Féin, albeit that the UN statement is shorter. However, if ever there was a case for international collective action, Darfur is it.

The situation in Darfur is all the more hopeless given that, thanks to its oil reserves, Sudan is potentially one of Africa's richest countries. That it continues to have some of the worst development indicators is a disgrace. However, we need to take note that the Joint Assessment Mission for the Sudan has warned that:

“Unless the absorptive capacity of the GoSS to handle reserves is quickly increased, and unless accountable and transparent governance is developed, oil revenues could — as happened in Angola and other post-conflict states — result in corruption and the entrenchment of unaccountable elites.”

Currently, much of the oil is traded with China. Some see that as one of the reasons why the UN has been unwilling to act. If that is the case, it is a further indictment of the international community's inability to take action.

It seems that while Africa is incapable of being helped, China is incapable of being touched: it can continue with human rights abuses, destruction of the environment and the obstruction of an end to genocide while the international community simply stands idly by. In Sudan, China takes the oil and pays lip service to UN involvement, but it stands by the Sudanese Government in resisting the UN peacekeeping force.

In Darfur, the failure to implement properly the will of the world community is undermining the excellent humanitarian effort, to which Members have referred. Humanitarian organisations have been constructing shelters, building and restoring schools, constructing clinics and hospitals and providing people with life's essentials, and that work is in constant jeopardy. Those relief efforts will undoubtedly collapse if security cannot be established. As the Africa Inland Mission reminded us, the Government in Khartoum is impeding that work.

In conclusion, although I am always reluctant to encourage foreign states to involve themselves in the affairs of other states, the world cannot simply turn a blind eye to the plight of the people in Darfur. Immediate international action is required. The deployment of the UN peacekeeping force, the support of the African Union's troops in the meantime and the enforcement of a no-fly zone can, and will, improve security.

The pursuit of a diplomatic solution to the conflict must step up a gear, and the international community must back up its security commitment with aid that can help the people of the Darfur region to build some semblance of a normal life.

I support the motion.

Ms Gildernew: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I welcome this motion and hope that it receives unanimous support from the parties in this House.

For a number of years, Sinn Féin has called for the Dublin and British Governments to use whatever influence they have in whatever forums they participate, whether that be the United Nations or the European Parliament, to help bring to an end the tragedy that is Darfur.

In 2005 and 2006, the Sinn Féin Ard-Fheiseanna passed motions that called on the Sudanese Government and all other combatants to comply with the Humanitarian Cease Fire Agreement on the Conflict in Darfur of 8 April 2004. Sinn Féin TDs signed an all-party motion in Leinster House that called for the support for peacekeeping and humanitarian efforts in the region, and Sinn Féin MEPs, Bairbre de Brún and Mary Lou McDonald, co-sponsored a similar motion in the European Parliament. It goes without saying that Sinn Féin will wholeheartedly support the motion before the House today.

I repeat that call for the Sudanese Government to honour their promises to facilitate the access of humanitarian relief organisations to the affected populations; to support the work of the African Union to provide security to internally displaced peoples; and to allow ceasefire monitors.

In addition, the international community must continue to provide humanitarian assistance to the region and support demands for the establishment of a pan-African criminal and human rights commission. The purpose of that commission would be to investigate and prosecute the forces, Government-supported militias and officials that were responsible for the Darfur massacre.

I call for the Dublin and London Governments and all Governments worldwide to act decisively to support the people of that region. There must be an end to the genocide, and the Sudanese Government must not be allowed to prevent humanitarian efforts to assist the people of the region.

The conflict between Government forces, pro-Government militias and rebels in the Darfur region of Sudan has led to more than 200,000 casualties and over two million internally displaced persons and refugees, despite the Darfur Peace Agreement of 5 May 2006.

The huge political and media interest in the occupation of Iraq and Afghanistan has overshadowed the ongoing humanitarian tragedy in Darfur. Attacks on humanitarian workers have meant that in many areas their work has ground to a halt, ensuring that the civilian population continues to suffer. It is imperative that all Governments impress on the Sudanese Government that they must accommodate and not hinder peacekeeping and humanitarian efforts in the region.

Every effort must be made to ensure that Sudan does not slip back into full-scale conflict. I wish to commend the work that has taken place in an attempt to bring an end to this conflict, and I particularly commend the efforts of the African Union. It is essential that that work continues and is built upon and bolstered by the United Nations.

The international community must focus on assisting a political resolution to the conflict. As with our own conflict, that is crucial if a sustainable peace is to be built, and every effort should be made to realise the power-sharing provisions of the Darfur Peace Agreement in a meaningful way.

The United Nations Security Council Report of the Secretary-General on children and armed conflict in the Sudan, covering May to July 2006, details incidents of human rights abuses against children. It focuses on:

“the killing and maiming of children, their recruitment and use as soldiers, grave sexual violence, abductions and denial of humanitarian access to children, and indicates that these violations continue in the Sudan largely unabated.”

The international community must make every appropriate effort to protect all vulnerable children in areas of conflict such as this and bring an end to these serious abuses. It should also use every opportunity to remind the Sudanese Government of their responsibility to protect their citizens from violence and to guarantee respect for human rights.

In recognition of that responsibility, members of the international community should support UN Security Council resolution 1706 (2006) of 31 August 2006 and its implementation; support the deployment of a United Nations peacekeeping force to ensure the protection of the civilian population; and support the implementation of the Darfur Peace Agreement.

I encourage those Governments that have influence over the Sudanese regime to persuade it to meet its humanitarian obligations and to respond to the wishes of the international community by committing itself to taking all appropriate measures to advance the Darfur Peace Agreement. The violation of children, women and other people in Sudan must stop. Go raibh míle maith agat.

2.45 pm

Dr Farren: Almost 60 years ago, just three years after the most genocidal conflict in human history, the United Nations General Assembly adopted the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide by declaring genocide to be a crime under international law that the civilised world must seek to prevent.

Today's motion directs Members' attention to an instance of ongoing genocide of tragic proportions. As other Members have said, it is good for us to raise our horizons above our own sordid squabble from time to time, and to direct our attention to the tragedies that are happening in places such as Darfur and other parts of Africa, where the scale of human suffering is way beyond anything that has been experienced here.

Members know that the Darfur region of Sudan is but one example of where that has been most evident. Tragically, there is a long list of instances, particularly in Africa, in which similar atrocities have recently occurred. In countries such as the Congo, Rwanda, Angola, Sierra Leone, Liberia and Somalia, the plight of ordinary people has been ignored by those who are determined to dominate politically and to exploit and plunder their natural resources.

The Darfur region of Sudan has been embroiled in a deadly conflict that has been at its most intense over the last few years, but it has stretched back over several decades. The stated political aim of the rebels is to compel the Sudanese Government to address the underdevelopment and political marginalisation of their region and to allow it to share in the considerable wealth that the country is capable of generating. In response, the Sudanese Government, through its regular armed forces and, as mentioned by several Members, the Janjaweed, have targeted civilian populations and ethnic groups from which the rebels principally draw their support.

Article 3 of the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights — itself almost 60 years old — promises that:

“Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person.”

However, hundreds of thousands of civilians have been murdered, and more than 2.5 million people have been displaced into unprotected camps throughout Sudan and into neighbouring Chad. Article 5 of the declaration also states that:

“No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment”.

However, hundreds of women are raped or sexually assaulted every week with no force to protect them. Not since the Rwandan genocide of 1994 has the world seen such a calculated campaign of displacement, starvation, rape and mass slaughter.

The international community has recognised those atrocities as genocide. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees has described the situation in Sudan and Chad as:

“the largest and most complex humanitarian problem on the globe.”

The Darfur Peace Agreement, which was brokered in May 2006 between the Government of Sudan and one faction of Darfur rebels, has not been implemented.

Deadlines have been ignored, and violence has escalated. Infighting between rebel groups and factions has dramatically increased, adding a new layer of complexity to the conflict.

As other Members have said, the violence has made it dangerous, if not impossible, for most of the millions of displaced people to return to their homes. Humanitarian aid agencies face growing obstacles to their attempts to bring widespread relief to the region. In August 2006, the United Nations' top humanitarian official described the situation in Darfur as "catastrophic". As a consequence, some of the aid agencies have been compelled to withdraw, from parts of the region at least. Only the most courageous remain.

More than two years ago, the UN Security Council adopted resolution 1556, which demanded that the Government of Sudan disarm the Janjaweed. The same demand is also an important part of the 2006 Darfur Peace Agreement. In August 2006, the UN Security Council took the further step, as others have said, of authorising a strong UN peacekeeping force for Darfur. Despite those actions, the Janjaweed is still active and free to commit the same genocidal crimes against civilians in Darfur, aided by — indeed, complicit with — the Sudanese Government.

International experts agree that the UN Security Council must deploy a peacekeeping force with a mandate to protect civilians immediately. Until it arrives, however, the underfunded and almost overwhelmed African Union Mission in Sudan must be bolstered. At present, it is almost incapable of offering any real and sustained forms of protection. Governments and international institutions must provide and ensure access to sufficient humanitarian aid for all those in need.

Despite the grand talk and all the calls for it, we are still seeing insufficient action. That lack of international action has allowed the Sudanese Government to continue with what USAID and the United Nations have called "ethnic cleaning" in the region. It is obvious that the Sudanese Government have no intention of stopping their indiscriminate massacre of the Darfuri people.

Although the UN regards the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide as major statements of principles to which its member states claim to be committed, those principles ring hollow and offer no consolation to the people of Darfur if they remain only on paper and are ignored by the world's major powers.

We have very little influence; we have no direct responsibility. We should, however, try to ensure that the British and Irish Governments at least heed what is being said here. We call on them, particularly through the European Union, to put economic pressure on the Sudanese by placing travel restrictions on individuals who are strongly suspected of involvement in genocide in Darfur. Revenue flows from the petroleum sector in Sudan should be specifically targeted, and a proportion of them redirected to provide relief in the Darfur region.

Furthermore, the International Criminal Court (ICC) should pursue and extend its present investigations into crimes against humanity that have already been committed, and should threaten that robust action will be taken against anyone who commits atrocity crimes in future, in order to maintain legal pressure on the Khartoum regime. On the military front, the UN Security Council should back demands that the Sudanese Government cease offensive military flights over Darfur, with the immediate establishment of a no-fly zone to deter aerial attacks on civilians.

It is time to champion the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, not by words, but, insofar as we can, by actions. We are compelled by the conscience of the world at least to highlight this humanitarian disaster and so help restore dignity and hope to the suffering people of Darfur. If we do not, we betray our commitment to human rights and risk compromising the very nature of our own conscience.

A child is sent to the pump for water. He carries his tin can, as he walks with his sister. They hear a noise, and, looking into the distance, they see a man on a horse. The boy turns to his sister and shouts for her to run. He watches helplessly as the man with a mask lifts his sister. The boy is knocked to the ground and lies in the dirt while his sobbing sister is carried away. Planted in his heart, the first seeds of hatred, which will blossom as he grows, threaten to consume him as he returns to his mother empty-handed, without the water and without his sister, and so the cycle of hatred continues in this war-torn country.

The UN has said that the war in Sudan is the worst humanitarian crisis in the world. Darfur is a region the size of France and has seen, since 2003, the deaths of more than 200,000 people and the displacement of four million refugees to other regions and other countries such as Chad and the Central African Republic, which cannot take the strain or the attacks from the Sudanese Government-assisted arm of terrorism — the Janjaweed — who are now beyond the control of that Government.

Sudan is in real danger of exploding and destroying bordering nations, as refugees flood into countries that have neither the resources nor structure to support them. They flee up to 300 miles on foot. They walk and run while dragging their children along with them. They have no food and only whatever water they can scoop up as they go along, while all the time they are in fear of soldiers from both sides of the divide. They arrive at the refugee camps exhausted and ill to the point of death, only to find that there is not enough food, water or medicine.

In the past week alone, it has been reported that there have been 200 deaths in Darfur; however, anyone who knows the reality of the situation there will be aware that the figure is probably closer to 1,000. For every one skirmish reported, another five take place. That cannot continue. As the nation focuses on the glaringly obvious catastrophe in Darfur, it must also be remembered that the rest of Sudan is in crisis. There is little food and a shortage of medical supplies. The only education that children receive comes from what they see around them: their mothers and sisters taken and raped; their food and clothing stolen; and the rampant spread of disease. What kind of graduates does such an education produce? It produces graduates filled with hatred, anger and resentment. It produces a new and even more embittered generation of men and women who understand only violence and degradation, who know no other way, who have no hope, and who feel little other than rage and anguish. That is the future of Sudan — north, south, east and west — if something drastic is not done to end what has been referred to as genocide.

A former Sudanese slave, abducted as a child, spoke recently at a rally outside the United Nations headquarters in New York. She said:

“Immediate action must be taken to end the genocide in Darfur. The international community cannot allow another Rwanda to take place.”

3.00 pm

Members have spoken of other countries where similar problems have arisen, such as Uganda and Rwanda. This is as relevant to us in the Province and in the UK as a whole as it was to the Americans at that rally. There is a duty upon the right-thinking people of the strong nations to ensure that no people is made extinct and that no children are made to see, much less suffer, the atrocities that are rife in Africa.

We should have learned that standing by, wringing our hands and tutting, will not induce dictators and evil men to repent. We must take a stand for those who have no voices, speak out for the rights of the oppressed, seek truth and justice, defend the poor and needy, lift up the weak and do what is right. Sudan is full of needy people, not just in Darfur but in the poverty-stricken south, which is in desperate need of structure and stability, and grossly affected by the crippling events in Darfur.

There has been a peace accord since 2005 uniting the north and south of Sudan. This made provisions in which the rich north made commitments to share the oil profits and bring the south out of poverty and disease, but the leadership has since continued to ignore the needs of the south. The UN has a responsibility to enforce the commitments made.

The crisis in Darfur has distracted attention from the fact that the whole of Sudan is suffering. Christians in the south are being persecuted by Muslims, their churches burnt and their clergy arrested. No infrastructure has been created, and the people are continuing to die of starvation and disease, exacerbated by the problem of refugees from the west and escapees from war-torn Darfur.

The African Union has deployed 7,000 soldiers in an attempt to curb the process, but it has sent them out in smatterings of 100 here and 100 there, with the result that they can make no impact whatsoever on what is happening in this huge region. The rebels remain determined to fight against the Government, and the Government seem powerless to dissuade their terrorist army from rape and pillage. That further inflames anger until there can be no hope of the nation repairing itself. There can be no hope of the southern province having a more secure future or a chance of regeneration as long as this level of conflict is maintained. The monster has gone far beyond the control of those who created it.

An estimated one million people in Darfur have no access to clean, disease-free water, food, medication and education. A further one million have only limited access, and that number will continue to grow as more and more aid agencies are forced to withdraw from the area. Concern has recently announced that it has been forced to pull out its aid workers due to uncertainty over their future, and other organisations have also been removing their workers. That means that less food, medication and clothing is getting in than ever before. There is also no one to distribute it. Conflict between rioting factions arises over control of the food, and no one is there to ensure that those in need receive help. The strong use their weapons to take from the weak what was sent especially for them. That cannot continue; aid must be allowed in, and the UN must be allowed to step up and fulfil its obligations to these needy people.

The UN has stated its wish to send approximately 20,000 peacekeepers into Sudan, but the Government of Sudan have refused. The British and Irish Governments cannot and must not accept this. The Assembly too has a responsibility to do all in its power to ensure that this is not just taken lying down. We must push to do the right thing and send in the peacekeepers to ensure that vital aid is delivered to the critical areas to begin the process of rebuilding the nation and to enforce the commitments of the 2005 peace accord.

The southern and western parts of Darfur are entitled to the food, medication and education that have been promised to them. For far too long they have lived with the stench of death in every corner. The time has come for the UN to proactively ensure that the people of Darfur — and Sudan as a whole — have that little bit of security that the force can bring.

The time of waiting to see whether the Government in Khartoum will fulfil their obligations is long past. We have seen how they turned a blind eye and gave backhanders to a terrorist organisation as it carried out countless atrocities. We understand that the terrorists are now a complete law unto themselves, doing whatever they please and accountable to no one — especially not those in Government who once supported them. Now is the time for the UN to do what it was formed to do; to step up to the mark and stand firm against evil men, no matter what form they take.

As an Assembly, it is our duty to do so, and we cannot, and must not, shirk that responsibility. The lessons of the past must be learnt well. We must ensure that the 70% of the people of Sudan who do not have the medication that they need receive it; that the children receive the education that they need to rebuild the country; that the whole of Sudan benefits from its rich oil reserves; that focus is placed on the nation as a whole; and that the full horrors of Rwanda, and other genocides, do not occur in Sudan.

I support the motion, but we must keep in mind the valid saying:

“Evil triumphs when good men do nothing”.

The Assembly must do something and ensure that something is done.

Ms Ritchie: We have heard much about the genocide, horror and human rights abuses that continue to be perpetrated against the people of Sudan. Continued urgent action is required by the British and Irish Governments to ensure immediate international political action through the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights, the European Union and the United Nations. They must address the ongoing conflict, death and destruction in Darfur and the crises caused through the displacement of families, creating extreme poverty, denying people access to scarce water supplies, and continuing famine and malnutrition.

More than 200,000 people have died, and over two million people have been forced to flee their homes and are living in makeshift shelters in crowded camps or massed on the edges of towns and villages in Darfur and eastern Chad.

The current crisis started in 2003, when ethnic African rebels took up arms against the central Khartoum Government, charging them with neglect. In Sudan, the Government have been accused of unleashing the Janjaweed paramilitary group of Arab nomads, which has been blamed for the worst atrocities in the conflict. Several other tribal militias also plague this vast arid region of Sudan, where scarce resources regularly pit nomadic tribes against sedentary ones. Many more people have been affected by the conflict and are now extremely dependent on humanitarian assistance, as traditional means of livelihoods have been destroyed by the war, which has been raging for over four years.

Only last week, the crisis deepened when more than 200 people died in clashes between ethnic African farmers and nomadic Arabs in southern Darfur. That led the Sudanese Government to send emissaries to try to reconcile the tribes involved.

Survival remains difficult and dangerous for the displaced people of Darfur. The same Government that funded, supported and participated with the Janjaweed militias to drive the displaced people out of their villages and lands now refuse to allow the transition from the current African Union Mission in Sudan peacekeeping force to a larger and better equipped United Nations peacekeeping mission in Darfur, which has been mandated by the United Nations Security Council to protect civilians. The very Government whose obligation should be to protect their people are denying them protection.

Since 2004, after several African Union Mission in Sudan-brokered agreements, the Government in Sudan have failed to take effective steps to disarm the Janjaweed. Worse still, the Janjaweed militias are not only being incorporated into paramilitary organisations, such as the Sudanese Popular Defence Forces and the Border Intelligence Guard, but it is alleged that they are being brought into the regular army. Instead of being disarmed, they are being rearmed. Some observers, such as the victims of the attacks in Jebel Moon, have described those who attacked them as being armed with brand new weapons and wearing new Sudanese army uniforms. It has been suggested that the African Union forces now face mistrust on the part of the internally displaced people of Darfur.

What can the international community do to assist the beleaguered people of Darfur? First, all Members of the Transitional Assembly should unite to condemn attacks that various parties to the conflict have perpetrated against the civilian population, the personnel of the African Union Mission in the Sudan, and humanitarian agencies.

Secondly, we must urge those parties to the conflict that have not done so to sign the Darfur Peace Agreement and cease the armed conflict. Thirdly, we must press the Government of the Republic of Sudan to implement without further delay the terms agreed to in Addis Ababa on 16 November 2006 for the deployment of a joint United Nations and African Union peacekeeping force in Darfur.

We commend the African Union Mission in Sudan for its work in the Darfur region and recommend that it continue with its efforts to resolve the conflict. We urge the Government of Sudan to acknowledge the report of the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights 2004 fact-finding mission to Darfur and submit its response to the commission.

If Members believe in challenging human-rights abuses in Ireland and Britain, in upholding the principles of equality and social justice, and in upholding the rights of those who are oppressed, marginalised, attacked or assaulted in our own country, we must urge the international community and the British and Irish Governments to ensure that action is taken in Darfur to protect those who are being maimed, pilloried, raped and displaced daily in Sudan.

Without a Government to protect them, the displaced people of Darfur must look to regional and international organisations to help them. The Irish and British Governments, the American Administration and the European Union must not be found wanting. The African Union and the United Nations must help. At its thirty-eighth ordinary session, the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights adopted a very important resolution that called on the Government of Sudan to comply with their obligations under the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights. I am conscious that the Minister for Foreign Affairs, Dermot Ahern, said last year that Ireland would continue to do all that it could at an international level to bring the violations to an end. The United Kingdom Government are committed to the Darfur Peace Agreement and maintain that Sudan should accept a UN peacekeeping force.

I suggest that the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights should continue to exert its authority by urging the Government of Sudan to ensure the effective protection of civilians in Darfur and to consent to the deployment of a UN peacekeeping mission. That is now required, and both the British and Irish Governments must continue to press for that.

My colleague Carmel Hanna referred to meetings that my party has had with the Scottish Executive, the Irish Government and with the Secretary of State for International Development, Hilary Benn. When restoration of the Assembly is achieved, we must ensure that we can use some of the money that is given to us to assist projects in Africa, particularly those in Sudan. We must be able to demonstrate practical and pragmatic assistance to those people, albeit in a small way. That would be our commitment.

I commend the work of the non-governmental organisations and Third World agencies on the island of Ireland for their work in Africa, particularly in Sudan. It has been an uphill struggle for those organisations, but they have shone a beacon of light on the displacement and abuses that have been perpetrated against the ordinary people.

3.15 pm

Mr Donaldson: I commend the Member for South Belfast Carmel Hanna for tabling the motion. As a Transitional Assembly, it is important that we give thought to the issues that confront Northern Ireland, which will be priorities for Members and any incoming Executive. Nonetheless, it is good that we take time out from that to consider the needs of people in other parts of the world, where clearly there is suffering. The level of their deprivation as a result of conflict is so much greater and more pressing than our needs in Northern Ireland.

It is a human tragedy, and I will not repeat the many incidents and atrocities that have already been catalogued by other Members during the debate. In another place, I am a member of the executive of the all-party group on Africa. We have considered conflict situations in Africa, the impacts that they have on the economies of countries and the manner in which they undermine democracy. In Sudan, we have also seen how tribal and regional interests deteriorate into very dangerous conflict situations, with tragic loss of life.

I recently read a book about the siege of Khartoum. It was interesting to reflect that even then, when the Sudanese appeared to be united in some respects against the colonial forces, there were tribal and regional tensions, and that is evident today. In Africa, it is so often the case that although democratic countries have emerged from the colonial past, those democracies are fragile. They are coalitions of various tribal and political interests that in ordinary situations would be resolvable by dialogue. Sadly, they deteriorate into violence and conflict, possibly for historical, tribal reasons.

So it is with the tragic situation in Darfur, which we have heard so much about this afternoon. At times — I am sure that many Members feel likewise — I am left wondering why it is that in such conflict situations, the international community at times seems to be powerless to do anything to prevent them. When such situations do occur, it is powerless to prevent their escalation. Tragically, we have seen that in Rwanda and in other parts of Africa, and the situation in Darfur has again highlighted the inadequacies of the international community and the deficiencies of the international institutions to cope with conflict situations. We should be in the business of conflict prevention and not just conflict resolution. As part of an international community, we should also try to identify where there is potential for conflict and do what we can to resolve problems before any situation deteriorates into the sad state that we see today in Sudan.

We must re-examine those international institutions that have been tested, time after time, in eastern Europe, the Balkans, Kosovo and Rwanda, and have been found seriously wanting. Some argue that there are limits within which the international community must work and that there is a limit to how much involvement it can have. However, we need to re-examine those institutions and find out where there is a need to create or enhance conflict-prevention mechanisms, which ought to be designed to identify regional and international conflicts, or the potential for them. Systems, procedures and resources must be available to help those regions and countries to try to overcome their difficulties without having to resort to conflict.

The debate should not only be concerned with what we should do in Darfur to try to resolve a situation that has got out of hand and become a human tragedy but with the lessons that we should have learnt after Rwanda and Kosovo. In reality, however, we have not learnt that much at all about conflict prevention.

In the years ahead, we, as an Assembly, would do well to consider what contribution we can make. As a region, our influence is limited, but we have had our own conflict. Slowly but surely, we are creating the institutions that we hope will not only lead us beyond the transition from that conflict, but will help to prevent conflict in the future. If that is the case, and those mechanisms prove to be successful, we surely have a duty to share our experiences with other parts of the world in promoting conflict prevention as well as resolution.

Northern Ireland has its part to play, as does this Assembly. In due course, I would like an all-party Assembly group to be formed to consider these issues. There is no doubt that there is consensus in the Chamber on this issue, and the hon Member for South Belfast Mrs Hanna should know that this side of the House would be happy to co-operate in forming an all-party group that could examine such issues and consider how our experiences might be shared with other regions in potential conflict situations.

I hope that the Darfur Peace Agreement will result in a peaceful outcome, but I suspect that there is some way to go before the problems are resolved. We have heard of instances of the agreement being breached and how factions are still engaged in dreadful acts of violence and atrocities against men, women and children. In time, I hope that those atrocities will be documented. If war crimes have been committed, I hope that those responsible will be brought before the international courts and dealt with in the proper way that helps to resolve conflict, not to exacerbate or repeat it. That is not retribution; it is about establishing the mechanisms and agreements that will prevent the conflict in Darfur from resuming.

I hope that the lessons learnt from Sudan can be replicated in other areas. There is a need for stronger international institutions — not to interfere, necessarily, but to offer, help, guidance and support in resolving and preventing conflict.

This debate is a valuable opportunity for us to show that, in tune with the spirit of the people of Northern Ireland, we have an interest in what happens in other parts of the world. The generosity of our people never ceases to amaze me when it comes to giving money, resources and time to help those in need. Many Members have mentioned the humanitarian aid agencies from this island and within these islands, especially those in Northern Ireland, which have made a major contribution in conflict situations to bring aid and humanitarian care to those in need.

We in the political realm ought to follow that spirit and example and consider what we can do to make a contribution in the international community towards conflict prevention in the future. That would be the best legacy that we could offer to the embattled and beleaguered people of Darfur.

Mr Dallat: I am honoured to take part in this debate. It is more important than we realise. I hope that the people of Darfur, and their families in Northern Ireland, will know that it is taking place. Given the speed at which the modern media send messages across the world, I believe that those people will know.

On a lighter note, I remember that 10 minutes after the little incident that is known as the “brawl in the Hall” — in which I had no part — I received a text message that read:

“Saw you on TV in Cambodia.”

Therefore, people will find out about the debate.

Mr Kennedy: What were you doing in Cambodia?
[Laughter.]

Mr Dallat: I hope one day to go there. It is a beautiful country that has been through terrible conflict. However, it is now one of the most popular tourist destinations in the world.

I take the opportunity to thank the International Development All Party Assembly Group, which was the only Assembly group to meet during suspension. I pay tribute to Carmel Hanna, not because she is a party colleague, but because she rose above party politics and co-operated on that group with other political parties. I pay the same tribute to the Speaker, Eileen Bell, who was a tremendous support and who was most helpful in trying to keep it functioning. Indeed, she was also a member of the group.

Mrs Hanna: The Deputy Speaker was also a member.

Mr Dallat: I am told that the Deputy Speaker was also a member. That is the last that prompt I am taking. [Laughter.]

One of the most important things to come out of today's debate is not simply the call for action on Darfur but the need to plan ahead for a new Assembly and to ensure, as Jeffrey Donaldson suggested, that a properly resourced international development group is established. That group must be allowed to project the high level of humanity that exists on these islands.

Other parts of the world suffer as a result of conflict. Every day I receive messages from Zimbabwe, which was mentioned earlier. I hope that the people who are responsible for atrocities there are made answerable for their war crimes.

My own experience of Africa is centred on Malawi. As Members of the previous Assembly, David McClarty of the Ulster Unionist Party and I had the opportunity to go to Malawi and sign an agreement in the former capital of that country, Zomba. Arising out of that visit, the University of Ulster, the University of Malawi, local fire brigades, schools, churches and farming groups came together to identify projects and parallel committees in their respective parts of the world. I tell that story to encourage others to promote similar activities.

My wife spent six weeks last year in Blantyre in Malawi working as a classroom assistant, and her experience shows that all that work was beneficial. The local schoolchildren had no pens, no desks, no chairs and no running water: they had nothing but a desire to be educated. They benefited from that arrangement. I am sure that a future Assembly would encourage Northern Ireland's local councils and other organisations to establish a similar arrangement. That was a model for perfection, and I hope that it is emulated.

Next week Members will have the honour of inviting the Chief Executive of the Zomba Municipal Assembly to this House. That shows that Members should not underestimate the influence that they have in other parts of the world.

Once again I pay tribute to those who, in difficult times, have managed to retain an international dimension. Referring to Jeffrey Donaldson's speech once more, while in Malawi I was asked: "What's in this for you?" That was one of the hardest questions that I have ever been asked. I had to think carefully about it, but Jeffrey Donaldson has perhaps provided an answer: Northern Ireland has had its conflicts and its own problems in the past, but we can learn from other parts of the world, for example, about their respect for the environment and the way in which they go about treating scarce resources — we can learn a lot from that.

3.30 pm

We must not forget our young people. Linkages of the kind I have already mentioned create opportunities for our young people to engage with the wider world. Increasingly, many of them go to Africa, and other developing countries, to build hospitals and schools, and to work on other community projects. It allows people to get beyond the old mite box, where one simply gave the money and forgot about it. The world is now a smaller place. We cannot escape what is happening in Darfur, Zimbabwe, Malawi and the other countries, and we can play a very useful role. Hopefully, after today, we will have laid the foundation stone, not only for acknowledging the inhumanity that exists in Sudan, but also for making firm resolutions for a future Assembly and ensuring that, as in the past, it does everything humanly possible to narrow the division between the haves and the have-nots.

This morning we spoke about the correlation between social deprivation and education here at home. The same principles apply in every other part of the world. I know from experience that in Malawi and Zomba, in particular, where schools have been supported financially to buy textbooks, school equipment and to bore holes for water, children have the tools to allow them to go on to further education, to begin to address the problems for themselves and to share their experiences with us. I cannot think of a more honourable role in life than to be engaged in that. Once again I congratulate Carmel Hanna, who kept this subject alive through thick and thin.

Mr A Maginness: There is not very much more that can be said in this debate. I am reminded of the words of Einstein, who said:

"A sure sign of madness was doing the same thing over and over again and expecting a different result."

That has been the history of mankind. We have resorted to war, violence, tribalism and sectarianism over and over again, and we have looked for a different result. However, we are simply mad to expect a different result. Violence and sectarian division — whether here or in Africa — will end up in tragedy. We have heard a lot about the tragedies of Darfur and Sudan, which have impeded the growth of that great country for many decades.

This debate has shed a lot of light on the situation. It has been tremendously well informed, and Members who have listened to the debate have learned a lot. The contributions from all sides of the House have been outstanding, and all parties have created a consensus to try to do something to assist the people of Darfur in their plight.

I congratulate my colleague Carmel Hanna for moving the motion, as have colleagues in different parties. She has done a tremendous service to the House, and reminded Members of the International Development

All-Party Assembly Group, which has remained intact despite suspension. As Jeffrey Donaldson said, whenever we get back to a full working Assembly, that group must be encouraged to reform and make a contribution to the work of the House.

Through local government and the Administration that we will establish, we can make a contribution to all parts of the developing world, as John Dallat has pointed out. This is particularly relevant to areas such as Darfur and its regions, because they need practical assistance. We can give that because we have good people, in all different walks of life, who are interested in assisting the people in the developing world. We have expertise in the Water Service, housing, education and medical services, and we can make contributions on such matters to certain parts of the developing world. We can contribute in this way to Darfur. We can help to rebuild the infrastructure in that part of Sudan. Just handing over money is not good enough.

Many people throughout the world have been very generous towards us here in Northern Ireland. The European Union, Canada, New Zealand, Australia and the United States have all been generous to us. We should repay their generosity.

A genuine consensus of concern for the developing world, and Darfur in particular, is evident today right across the House. There is a generosity of spirit, which is renowned amongst Irish people, whether they come from the North or the South. That spirit can be seen in the missionary work that Irish people have embarked upon throughout the world for many decades, for example. That missionary work, not just confined to evangelising, brought about great benefits in education, medical and other services, which uplifted people. The contribution was not simply about religion or proselytization. It tried to contribute something to many different parts of the world and in particular to Africa.

As George Dawson has said, why is it that the world has failed Africa? I cannot give an answer to that, but he is right to highlight that failure. We have not mentioned the Congo today, which witnessed the loss of four million people in a short period of time. The complexity of the problem there makes it potentially a worse situation than that in Darfur, although some progress has been made in restoring some form of normality to that particular country.

We do owe our help to the people of Africa, because it is our duty as citizens of the world, and as Christians, to assist those in need. We cannot walk on the other side of the road. We must help our brothers and sisters throughout the world, as Carmel Hanna has said.

Caitríona Ruane pointed out the importance of the United Nations and how important it is that we support its work. We must support the creation of a stable and secure region in Sudan, where people can live in peace.

Military and security must be established in that region. It is also important, and I must emphasise this, to remember that the International Commission of Enquiry pointed out in 2005 that there were many violations of human rights and humanitarian law in this conflict. Indeed, the General Secretary of the United Nations has a select list of suspects who could well be charged with crimes against humanity, perhaps even genocide. That select list has been given to the International Criminal Court. This is an important process.

If worldwide legal and humanitarian standards are to be established, those who have committed crimes against humanity or against the laws of war — particularly those responsible for genocide — must be pursued. As Carmel Hanna said, turning a blind eye to genocide, or to any crimes against humanity, would be a disservice to humanity. Such crimes cannot be tolerated. Therefore if, as I hope, prosecutions are brought in the International Criminal Court, that process must be supported. There must be no horse-trading between the United Nations and the Sudanese Government or anyone else involved in such crimes. The UN must not go easy on offenders or withdraw charges that it has brought before the International Criminal Court.

Any political solution must include the prosecution of those who have committed the foulest of offences — and some horrible offences have been committed. Seán Farren mentioned the systematic rape of women in Darfur. That is an act of mass terrorism. It is not simply incidental to a battle or the aftermath of a battle: it is a deliberate policy of terrorism that cannot be tolerated. Therefore it is important that where there is sufficient evidence against individuals, prosecutions are brought.

The International Commission of Inquiry on Darfur discovered violations of law not only by the regular Sudanese army but also by Arab militias associated with the central Government, the army and the rebel forces. No group that is part of the highly complex conflict in Darfur is innocent of crimes against humanity; therefore it is important to take a balanced approach. Everyone supports a political settlement in Darfur and will work to bring that about. However, justice for those who have been so victimised by the conflict must not be jettisoned. It is important that that message come from the House. Parties must play their part in trying to bring about a resolution to the problems in Darfur.

As Jim Shannon said, the situation in Darfur is the worst humanitarian crisis in the world today. If so, Members have a solemn duty to try, in our own small way, to assist. We will not change the situation overnight. However, if we, as part of the political process, albeit a small part, make some small contribution, we can achieve a good result. I agree with Jim Shannon that evil triumphs when good men do nothing.

As good men, we must not do nothing; we must work to achieve a just and proper settlement to the problem in Darfur. I was alarmed when Margaret Ritchie said that the Sudanese Government are in the process of integrating the Arab militia, the Janjaweed, into the regular army. That sinister development must be highlighted and opposed.

It is important to bear in mind the substance of the motion, which is support for the United Nations Security Council resolution that UN and African Union forces be deployed in Darfur. That is the only guarantee of the peace and stability necessary to allow a political solution to be devised.

We must remember the lessons of Rwanda and of the former Yugoslavia, and we must remember in dealing with the situation that the people who committed crimes in those countries are being brought to justice.

I commend the motion to the House on behalf of its proposer, and I commend the House for its patience and generosity of spirit in dealing with the motion and for creating and developing a consensus around the issue. I am sure that those who have suffered deeply in Darfur will appreciate it.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

Bearing in mind the appalling human tragedy in Darfur, this Assembly calls on all democratic governments, especially the Irish and British Governments with which this Assembly has particular interaction, to use all their influence on the Government of Sudan to accept immediate deployment of the United Nations force in Darfur, as mandated by the United Nations Security Council.

Adjourned at 3.46 pm.

THE TRANSITIONAL ASSEMBLY

Monday 22 January 2007

The Assembly met at 12.00 noon (Madam Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

ASSEMBLY BUSINESS

Additional Debating Time (Muckamore Abbey Hospital)

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. What arrangements are you prepared to make to allow the House to discuss some matters that should be debated before this Assembly is dissolved next week? I refer to the serious problems at Muckamore Abbey Hospital. When people are locked away because there is no accommodation elsewhere to allow them to be at liberty, the House should have an opportunity to discuss the matter.

Is there any reason why we cannot take more time next week to debate a motion on the situation? That would allow any Members who wished to speak 10 minutes in which to make their case.

Extra Sitting (Police Ombudsman's Report)

Mr McElduff: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. I support Dr Paisley's request for a debate on Muckamore Abbey Hospital. Will the Business Committee consider holding an extra sitting this week — perhaps on Wednesday — to discuss Nuala O'Loan's latest report, which is on the murder of Raymond McCord and others as a result of state collusion between the RUC and loyalist paramilitaries?

Madam Speaker: If I may answer Dr Paisley first, we are all extremely concerned about the situation at Muckamore Abbey Hospital. As he knows, for the House to debate the issue, a motion must be tabled in the Business Office so that the Business Committee, which will meet on Wednesday, can consider it for inclusion in next week's business.

I remind Members that Monday 29 January is the only day next week on which we may have a sitting. I hope that Lord Morrow, or another DUP Member, will bring a motion to the Business Committee on Wednesday, so that we can consider the matter seriously.

Mr McElduff's point will also be discussed by the Whips at the Business Committee meeting. If he wishes to inform his party Whip of the matter, we will discuss it on Wednesday as well.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. Would you be in favour of having an extra sitting some day this week?

Madam Speaker: Thank you, Dr Paisley. As you know, it would be wrong for me to express a view on that. I will take what comes. The Business Office will consider any proposals put to it. We will discuss the matter tomorrow and bring it to the Business Committee on Wednesday for full discussion. If the Business Committee decides that a sitting should be held on Wednesday, we will do that. I thank the Member for his interest.

Declaration of Interests

Madam Speaker: Before we move to today's business, I will deal with a point of order that was raised by Mr McElduff on Monday 15 January 2007 about the declaration of interests relevant to the debate on rural schools that took place that day.

I take this opportunity to remind Members of their obligation to declare relevant interests when they are participating in debates or proceedings of this Assembly. In accordance with the Standing Orders of the 2006 Assembly, all Members were required to inform the Clerk to the Assembly of the particulars of their registrable interests for inclusion in the Register of Members' Interests. The register has been published and copied to Members. A copy containing subsequent and up-to-date revisions is available for inspection in room 244 and on the Assembly website. [Interruption.]

I cannot hear myself speak, which is perhaps one of the reasons why I did not pronounce the word "registrable" correctly. I ask Members to please listen to what I am saying.

Standing Order 29(e) of this Transitional Assembly requires every Member to inform the Clerk to the Assembly of any alterations to his or her registrable interests within four weeks of each change occurring. However, in addition, Members are required, by virtue of Standing Order 29(f), before taking part in any debate or proceeding of the Assembly, to declare any interest, financial or otherwise, which is relevant to that debate or proceeding, where such interest is held by the Member or an immediate relative. I believe that that is the point to which Mr McElduff referred last Monday.

It is important that Members understand the distinction between the declaration of interests and the registration of interests. This distinction is set out in general terms in paragraphs 38 to 42 of the 'Guide to the Rules Relating to the Conduct of Members'. The guide is clear that Members are required to declare relevant current, past and future interests.

I am grateful to Mr McElduff for raising this point, as it provides me with an opportunity to assist Members. I remind Members that, as always, the Clerks will offer advice on any queries that Members may have about the registration or declaration of interests. Therefore, if Members have any doubts, I recommend that they check with the Clerks.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

The Bain Report

Madam Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow two and a half hours for each of today's debates. The Member moving each motion will have 15 minutes to speak, with 15 minutes for the winding-up speech. All other Members who wish to speak will have a maximum of 10 minutes.

Mr McNarry: I beg to move

That this Assembly notes the recommendations made by Professor Sir George Bain in the Report of the Independent Strategic Review of Education and calls on the Minister for Education to defer any decisions on the Report until the Northern Ireland Assembly is restored.

I have no vested interest in this matter, except as a constituent living under direct rule.

Regrettably, there is evidence that the Government are not listening to the Transitional Assembly's voice on any issue that we have debated and agreed on recently.

Perhaps that can be altered today. If this is a legally constitutional Transitional Assembly, it is, therefore, a legitimate point that the direct-rule Minister for education must also be transitional. If she was able to suspend a decision on academic selection pending the restoration of a devolved Executive, why should not all of her decisions be suspended awaiting the restoration of devolution? She has recently legislated for a new devolved Assembly to continue with a form of academic selection, yet she has responded to the Bain Report as though the selection issue has been resolved, which Members know is not the case.

Is she confused? I want to illustrate just how confused the transitional Minister is. I refer to her statement of 12 December 2006, which was accompanied by a letter addressed to Members of the Legislative Assembly. In that letter, the Minister welcomed the review without hesitation and firmly signalled the Government's endorsement of the report's recommendations. If, as she says, her endorsement of the review was not intended to launch a drive on school rationalisation, then she is confused again. The review's chairman, Sir George Bain, states categorically in his foreword that:

"as the work advanced, the economic case for rationalisation remained important".

The crux of the matter is whether the Transitional Assembly is justified in calling for the Bain Report to be deferred until a devolved Assembly decides upon its implementation or otherwise. I believe that it is justified. We must not rush to endorse the report. By tabling this motion, and by asking colleagues to support a deferment, my party is seeking time for all parties to consider the impact that the report will have and, essentially, what difference it will bring to at least eight priority education issues that are the current policy benchmarks facing children who are at school and those who are soon to commence school. Those priorities are under-achievement; equality of opportunity; special needs provision; parental preference; admissions policy; a sustainable schools policy; an alternative to the 11-plus test; and transfer procedure.

Let me return to the vexed question of rationalisation. My party will not argue with Bain if he plans to rationalise the five main school sectors. Sooner rather than later, survival will dictate that those five sectors will be reduced to three or even two. My party's argument is not that Northern Ireland has too many schools or too many small schools but that its system is congested by too many players.

That brings me to the transfer process and admissions criteria. Unfortunately, the review has not fully considered, strategically or otherwise, the effect of moving the transfer age from 11 to 14. Had it done so, I suspect that its findings on sustainability, the schools' estate and collaboration, budget requirements and, in particular, area-based planning could have been extremely significant in moving people away from the fears of selection at age 11 to age 14.

I hope that all will not be lost. Now that its minutes have been signed off, I am at liberty to advise the House of the advanced thinking that emanates from the Subgroup to Consider the Schools Admission Policy, which concluded its report last Tuesday. Despite its difficulties and the obvious differences on the selection issue, the subgroup reached agreement on 21 recommendations, including one important practical issue. It agreed that further research should be commissioned urgently on the experience of transfer at age 14, including the Dickson plan in Craigavon and other systems elsewhere in Europe. This should include an assessment of the resource implications of restructuring schools to accommodate such a system as an area-based solution.

My party — and I am sure that I can also speak for the DUP on this occasion — is extremely grateful to the subgroup's representatives from the SDLP and Sinn Féin for their helpful consideration of the practicalities, and their agreement to make the proposals unanimous recommendations. We, in turn, recognised that their actions did not imply their consent to the continuation of academic selection.

If this recommendation were to be actioned by an incoming Executive, and work initiated to consider school transfers at the age of 14, the desired effect would be to make the Government sit up and pay attention to the business of this House today. Therefore, to proceed on the basis that the report gives a balanced and authoritative account of the need to change Northern Ireland's school system for educational, economic and social reasons would be an unwise decision by the direct-rule Minister.

There are many anxieties about the report. The UUP is concerned about the impact on schools that fall through the numerical safety net and face either closure or constant review. Figures from the 2005-06 Northern Ireland school census, cross-referenced with what the report dictates as the minimum — not optimal — enrolment numbers for primary, post-primary and sixth-form situations, are revealing. For primary schools in urban areas with fewer than 140 pupils, 84 out of 391, or 21.5%, would be for the chop; 385 out of 512 primary schools in rural areas with fewer than 105 pupils, or a whopping 60%, would be knocked out; in the category of post-primary schools with fewer than 500 pupils, 92 secondary schools, of which 34 are rural and 58 are urban, or 57%, face a threat; and 14 grammar schools, four rural and 10 urban, representing over 20% of grammar schools, would be under review. To round off the depression, over 66% of secondary schools are likely to be under the strain of review because they have sixth forms with fewer than 100 pupils. As yet, there are no grammar schools with fewer than 100 pupils in the sixth form.

Those figures are staggering, and they expose the extent of the cull that the Bain Report will impose on schools — a massive blitz that will hit secondary and primary schools. The schools involved know the fate that awaits them if the direct-rulers follow up on their enthusiasm to endorse the action demanded by the report's recommendations.

I am glad that, over the summer and autumn, I pressed colleagues on the Subgroup on the Economic Challenges Facing Northern Ireland to argue for an extra £20 million for schools, with some to be allocated to special-needs provision. I am also pleased to report that the four main parties on the subgroup genuinely backed me on that request. I know that we have not got that money, but it is there as a marker to be argued for with the Chancellor. If the will is there to go and get it, it is there to be got.

Apart from special needs, I had it in mind that a sizeable cut of the £20 million should be used to resource a speciality approach to reducing underachievement — a dedicated resource strategy that aims to catch children who show signs of learning difficulties as early as possible. That is why the UUP is keen to see support for resources that are directed at that speciality approach to guide and develop underachievers through primary and secondary school, and to give credence to an opportunity to dramatically reduce the number of pupils who leave school without basic qualifications.

If the intention of the Bain Report was to stimulate, encourage and quality-assure the school environment, then it has failed. On the other hand, if the desired effect was to shock, threaten and destabilise the school environment, then it has succeeded with distinction. Somehow, Transitional or not, this House must positively signal to those in the school environment that, in asking for a deferment, its intention is to take time in a new devolved Executive to fully consider the implications and ramifications of this report and, in so doing, to prevent the Department of Education under the direct-rule Minister Maria Eagle from carrying out what she set out in her letter and public statement of 12 December 2006.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Wells] in the Chair)

Mr Deputy Speaker, if the motion is passed, will you ask the Speaker to inform the Secretary of State of its success and to convey to him the feelings of Assembly Members? I commend the motion to the House, along with the SDLP amendment, which we are happy to incorporate.

Mr D Bradley: I beg to move the following amendment: At end insert

“; and in the meantime, to work with all of the education providers to develop a draft sustainable schools’ policy for consideration by the restored Assembly.”

Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Tá áthas orm seans a fháil chun an tuairisc seo a phlé, nó ceapaim go bhfuil an-tábhacht léi i dtaobh thodhchaí an oideachais sa chuid seo den tír.

I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in this debate, as the Bain Report has serious implications for the future of education in Northern Ireland. At the outset, I declare an interest as a member of staff at St Paul’s High School, Bessbrook and a member of the board of governors at Bunscoil an Iúir. I commend Mr McNarry for tabling the motion, and I am pleased that he has accepted the SDLP amendment.

The reorganisation of the schools’ estate is one of the biggest challenges facing the education authorities in this part of the country. It presents the opportunity to co-ordinate planning on such issues as the new entitlement framework, extended schools, special educational needs and school transport. We must face up to the challenge, and the final decisions relating to it must be made by a local education Minister and restored Assembly.

In the meantime, the Department and the education providers can do much to develop a sustainable schools policy. For instance, the concept of area-based planning for education can be worked on as a key element of that. General agreement exists on that approach, and there is no reason why that work cannot begin immediately with the aim of reaching agreement in those areas.

In carrying out that work, it is important that existing sectors work in collaboration with one another while continuing to represent the needs, expectations and ethos of their respective sectors. It is also important that the sectors consider options for cross-community collaboration and sharing, while ensuring that the principle of parental choice is preserved in any new arrangements. Care must be taken to ensure that the areas are delineated in such a way that they are equally balanced and one planning area does not detrimentally impact upon another.

The Bain Report proposes that future education planning should be co-ordinated with planning in other areas, such as health, social services, adult education, youth provision, sports, arts and recreation, and community regeneration and development. The potential exists to extend core school functions, develop learning communities, foster increased parental interest in education — particularly in areas of social deprivation — and encourage such communities to value education more highly.

The extended schools initiative can also be integrated into that area; it is a proposal that reflects some of the themes that emerged from the debate in the Assembly last week. I said then that educational underachievement cannot be tackled solely on an educational basis but must be part of a broader strategy that tackles the underlying causes of social deprivation.

It will be evident to anyone who has read the Bain Report that the closure of small schools is one of its major themes, despite the fact that the report states that most surplus places are not found in small schools, but in larger schools. I do not wish to rehearse the arguments and points that I raised last week during the debate on the threat to rural schools, but the core issue of the report is the future of smaller schools in Northern Ireland.

The viability quotas set by Bain for rural and urban schools will, if acted upon, lead to a large number of closures. I thank Mr McNarry for outlining the salient statistics. Education providers regard the quotas set by Bain as unsuitable. That issue must be addressed in any draft sustainable schools policy. We must ensure that smaller schools do not become the scapegoat for mass rationalisation.

The Bain Report proposes ways in which smaller schools can work together, including confederation, federation, co-location, shared campuses, and extended schools. A draft sustainable schools policy must fully explore those options and include better modelling of the possibilities that each option offers, and how each option might work in particular circumstances.

A strategic forum that is representative of all educational providers should explore models of association in a non-threatening environment that does not prejudice any interests. Such a forum would be helpful to the Department of Education. It may be that the traditional image of the local school — based on one site, with one principal and one board of governors — needs to be modified to accommodate a new view that may be based on several sites, more than one principal, and more than one board of governors.

Several examples of that type of association already exist and operate successfully to the benefit of pupils and to the satisfaction of parents and the community. Those arrangements have been more cost effective than the closure of existing schools and their replacement by amalgamated new builds. Rather than act on the raw proposals of the Bain Report, the Department of Education must encourage creative and innovative thinking that will aid the rationalisation of the schools' estate, without the mass closures that the Bain Report implies.

The Department of Education should reward creative and innovative solutions that address the situation effectively, and it should provide the necessary resources to allow measures to be implemented and bed down over a reasonable period. If the Department, in co-operation with education providers, begins to work on those issues with a view to developing realistic and viable forms of association, there is every possibility that the raw proposals of the Bain Report can be fashioned into a sustainable schools policy. Such a policy would address the future of the schools' estate in a way that would ensure its future and guarantee that each pupil continued high quality of education, rather than threatening the mass closure of smaller schools. Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

Mr S Wilson: I am somewhat surprised at the wording of the motion because the Bain Report does not actually demand any immediate action by Ministers. Whether we like it or not, the report highlights many issues that the Assembly, direct-rule Ministers, or some other bodies in the future, must address. The report does not only highlight those issues, it suggests some solutions.

12.30 pm

I understand where the proposer of the motion is coming from, because the focus of attention has been on the Bain Report's rather strange conclusion at the end of chapter 7. It specifies minimum enrolment figures for new primary schools, sixth-form colleges and secondary schools. However, the report hardly substantiates the fact that the specified minimum could be adhered to in every case. The report cites many qualifications, such as how it is impossible to make long-term projections for a school without knowing the impact of new leadership or whether economic development or immigration may lead to radical changes. Therefore those numbers, in practice, must be flexible.

The Bain Report may have put forward those numbers to provoke thought. Nevertheless, the issue is more blurred than the specification of those absolute numbers suggests. It also contradicts the report's continual references to sustainable schools, the criteria for which include not only enrolment figures but also the:

“finances, school leadership and management, accessibility, and ... the quality of the educational experience”, and so forth. Enrolment figures must be flexible because those criteria vary from one school to another.

The report highlights several educational facts of life from which no policy-maker or public representative can run away. The huge surplus of school places is a drain on resources. During Assembly debates, parties have always held out their hands for more money — and rightly so, because that is the job of public representatives. However, at some stage, parties must make a case for that money.

As the Bain Report points out, education in Northern Ireland is not under-resourced compared with other parts of the United Kingdom. The problem simply is that resources are not used as efficiently as they should be. I hark back to what I said last week, when some Members opposite jumped up and down: one reason that the report offers for the inefficient use of resources is that there is a plethora of education providers and:

“supporting five sectors ... incurs significant costs.” — [Official Report, Bound Volume 21, p317, col 2].

Money goes to administration rather than the classroom. Parties must address that issue, which means making hard choices. In last week's debate, I pointed out the impact that the report may have on the Council for Catholic Maintained Schools (CCMS). Suddenly it has dawned on CCMS what that means, and people are jumping up and down saying that they will organise a massive petition across the Province.

The report also points out that money is being spent unnecessarily because the Sinn Féin Minister in the Northern Ireland Assembly established two new educational sectors, on favourable terms. The Minister permitted integrated schools and Irish-medium schools to start up with as few as 12 pupils. The report states that that has led to a significant dissipation of resources and a resulting decrease in efficiencies. The report is right to highlight those issues, and they must be addressed.

I agree with some aspects of the Bain Report. The DUP will not oppose the motion because, although it was not reflected in the tone of the proposer's speech, change should not happen too quickly.

The Bain Report points out that its recommendations do not need to be implemented suddenly or in one fell swoop. In fact, the report states:

“The change cannot, and should not, be achieved hastily.”

Prof Bain recognises, as the previous contributor said, that his recommendations must be implemented against a background of a sustainable schools policy and long-term investment. Some changes will require investment over a long period of time and changes in educational administration if they are to be effective. I welcome the Bain Report's recognition that we are dealing with issues that cannot be immediately resolved at the stroke of a Minister's pen.

I also support the report's view of area-based planning, which cannot work under current structures. Members opposite may have some difficulty with that because, without education and library boards, which are to be done away with, area-based structures in the controlled sector will be easier to set up. Education and library boards will no longer control particular areas. One cannot have area-based planning if, simultaneously, an Irish-medium sector, an integrated sector and the CCMS are all planning for their areas of responsibility.

Area-based planning will require as much autonomy as possible for individual schools in setting budgets, planning, and co-operation with other schools. The DUP has advocated that policy for a long time. That alone will present a challenge to many of the existing education structures. If schools that are largely responsible for their own budgets are faced with a £200,000 or £500,000 deficit — and if they cannot fall back on someone else to bail them out — better local decisions may be made.

Agreement is more likely when decisions are made by local boards of governors and local schools that interface with communities as part of holistic community planning, which will, I hope, be devolved to the new councils. That will create much greater local input. The recommendation of the Bain Report for area-based structures is important.

Although he does not quite have the courage to say it explicitly, I welcome Prof Bain's hint that we must do away with the current policy of allowing new small schools to open because they happen to be the political favourite of the day, whether they are Irish-medium or integrated schools. I am glad to see that the Minister has already taken that matter into account. She has annoyed the Irish-medium and integrated sectors, but I believe that she took necessary steps to ensure that we do not see a plethora of new schools as we examine long-term needs.

The Bain Report highlights the facts of life. We must take some of its recommendations with a pinch of salt, but it includes some good solutions. This matter will be the bane of our lives for the next number of years. [Laughter.]

Mr McElduff: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Cuirim fáilte roimh an díospóireacht seo, nó táimid ag plé tuairisic thar a bheith tábhachtach ó thaobh oideachais de. Tá sé ceart agus fóirsteanach dúinn, i mo bharúil féin, an díospóireacht seo a bheith againn ag an am seo.

I wish to declare an interest as a governor of St Patrick's Primary School in Eskra, as a governor of St Patrick's Primary School in Garvally, and as a member of the Western Education and Library Board.

I welcome the debate on the Report of the Independent Strategic Review of Education conducted by Prof Bain and supported by his colleague Matthew Murray and two consultants. Page 3 of the report details the terms of reference.

The motion moved by David McNarry calls for decision-making and the implementation of the Bain Report to await the restoration of the Assembly. David McNarry says that a local Minister would be best placed to take the report forward, and I agree. I tabled an amendment that was not accepted by the Business Committee. However, if it had been accepted it would have read that:

"This Assembly further calls on the British and Irish Governments and all of the local political parties to work to ensure that the Assembly is restored by 26th March, so that necessary decisions can be taken in the best educational interests of our children without undue delay."

That amendment would have helped, because it would have injected the necessary urgency into the debate and not just suspended decision-making indefinitely.

Mr Kennedy: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. The Speaker's Office declined to take Mr McElduff's amendment. However, Mr McElduff is now rehearsing the amendment and is clearly intent on speaking to it. Are you, Mr Deputy Speaker, able to make a ruling on that? It seems unsatisfactory that when an amendment is rejected, a Member can ignore that and proceed effectively to propose — or at least talk to — it.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member can refer to those issues. However, he does not have an amendment before the House, so he is technically in order, although I suspect that he is about to raise issues that he should not raise, and, therefore, I ask Mr McElduff to be careful.

Mr McElduff: I am grateful that the clock stopped when Mr Kennedy began to speak, and I hope that he is keeping well.

My comments mirror my party's view on education. Education is central to Sinn Féin's vision of a society of equals. Everybody has a basic entitlement to equality of opportunity, access and educational provision. We should be addressing and redressing generational and educational disadvantage and community networks of learning, and the report looks closely at them. Education should also be about liberating the potential of every young person, child or learner.

The best educational interests of a child, young person or learner must underpin this and every other educational decision. As everyone knows, a lot is happening in education at this time with new policy developments, often referred to as the context of change. A friend of mine referred to it as the perfect

100-year storm, where everything is happening now in education. Some of the changes include curriculum reform, "Entitled to Succeed" arrangements for post-primary education, specialist schools, the development of the pupil profile concept alongside parental preference and greater collaboration in and across sectors. [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker, it is hard to hear myself speak with Gregory Campbell and Maurice Morrow conducting a full-scale conversation.

Mr Kennedy: Lord Morrow to you.

Mr McElduff: I heard that. I will focus directly on the Bain Report and the strategic context of demographic change.

Everyone knows that there has been a major reduction in the pupil population and that falling school enrolments present major challenges. Prof Bain reckons that there are 50,000 surplus places in the North, and that is expected to rise to 80,000. There are various arguments about the accuracy of those statistics, but there is universal acceptance that there is overprovision. There is merit to the argument that unused teaching spaces amount to an inefficient use of resources. Change lies ahead, and nobody is arguing for the status quo.

Other Members have stated that Prof Bain courts controversy. He specifies 105 pupils as the minimum enrolment threshold — or viability quota as referred to by Dominic Bradley; 105 pupils for new rural primary schools; 140 for new urban primary schools; 500 for new post-primary schools — no distinction between rural and urban there — and 100 pupils for sixth-form enrolment.

Of course, that is said by Bain not to be the optimal but rather the minimum threshold, and it provides as many questions as it does answers. Will that be mirrored by the Department of Education and ministerial thinking? I call on Maria Eagle to make very clear the statement that is expected in the near future on sustainable schools. That statement is anxiously awaited and should be made now. People are looking on from the rest of Ireland, where there is also a small-school culture, and the policy must be developed with children's best educational interests at heart.

Another question is this: what is to happen when a school's population falls below the numbers specified? Bain argues that small schools do not provide the best education given curriculum breadth and quality, specialist teacher provision, modern facilities and social interaction. He makes it clear that future composite classes should be made up of no more than two year groups. That is one aspect of the argument, but there is another aspect, which is underdeveloped in George

Bain's Report, and it is a complete absence to the advantages — [Interruption.]

I must say, Mr Deputy Speaker, that it is extremely difficult to make a statement here.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order, order. I am sure, Lord Morrow, that you are hanging onto every word that Mr McElduff is saying, but perhaps it would be best to give the Member a chance to be heard.

Mr McElduff: Mr Deputy Speaker, I must say that there is a high degree of disrespect and even contempt emanating from Maurice Morrow. I have to say that that is the bottom line.

The advantages of small schools have not been spelled out in the report given pupil-teacher ratio, school ethos and community involvement. I point to a very good article in last Tuesday's 'Belfast Telegraph' in which Colin Berry, the new principal of Aughnacloy College, spelled out the benefits of a small post-primary school in his experience.

Any informed debate will look closely at the merits and demerits of the argument, and there has to be some rural proofing of a sustainable schools policy, so that properly balanced decisions are made in the future.

The section of the report on collaboration between schools and further education, recommendations 43 to 51, contains much creative thinking. It reminds us all of our commitment to a shared future and of the fact that all schools have a role to play, not in what is called integrated schools, but in integrating education.

I note that NICIE (Northern Ireland Council for Integrated Education) has said that this should not become a tick-box exercise with mere contact between schools, but that some accreditation should be given to schools that enter into the spirit properly.

There is talk of area-based planning and closer links between post-primary schools and further education colleges as well as with other training providers, so that 14 to 19 year olds can enjoy the broadest possible curriculum and the best education experience possible. At this point I commend those forward-looking communities in Limavady, Ballycastle, Omagh and other places that are already involved in this type of collaborative working partnership.

Furthermore, Bain points us towards new models of clustering, sharing, school management and governance between primary schools, which contain merit and require further exploration. One size does not fit all with area-based planning. An extreme example of that is Rathlin Island, where there is a very small number of children attending a primary school; I certainly am not arguing for that to discontinue. The children on Rathlin Island deserve a small rural school in a small rural setting, which will last into the future; that is why flexibility is needed.

I note the concerns voiced by church leaders about the need to protect the religious ethos of individual schools within the context of sharing and collaboration. It will be interesting to see how the Minister deals with that, as well as with concerns that private finance will limit the school estate.

I will now conclude my speech; Maurice Morrow will be delighted at that. The amendment, a leas Cheann Comhairle, attracts my party's favour and support. Go raibh míle maith agat.

Mrs Long: I welcome the opportunity to discuss the report of the Independent Strategic Review of Education. However, I share Sammy Wilson's view that, in its current form, the motion is pointless.

Mr McNarry voiced his disgust that the Assembly is often not listened to. Mr Bradley reinforced that, and said that this report was one of the greatest challenges facing education. It is therefore bizarre to find, at the end of the report, that the only political party that responded to the review was the Alliance Party. No other party in the Chamber managed — despite huge resources for research and policy development, supplemented by Government at the expense of the taxpayer — to respond to what they see as a fundamental and important review. By contrast, with a limited staff and budget, the Alliance Party managed to do so.

A Member: Will the Member give way?

Mrs Long: No, thank you.

It is important to act on the report. I have called consistently for a coherent and strategic approach to the education problems that face society. I have criticised the current Minister for taking decisions based purely on financial considerations in a strategic vacuum. Such decisions could prejudice the viability of future education strategy and provision.

At present, school closures are driven entirely and exclusively by budgetary considerations. That is wrong. We must not decide the future of education on the basis of end-of-year deficits. That is not a good system. People may be uncomfortable with the alternatives being suggested in the Assembly, but making decisions purely and simply on the basis of end-of-year deficits is not the way forward. I will develop that argument further.

Simply asking the Government to defer decisions on the report will not stop the process of rationalisation. It will merely allow the process to proceed in an ad hoc and unstructured way, which would be to the detriment of education provision and of young people. The danger is that schools will continue to be rationalised through death by a thousand cuts, which schools in my constituency and across Northern Ireland are already suffering. That is unfair on parents, pupils and staff. The agony of slow decline that many schools currently are experiencing, driven purely by budgets, is unfair and detrimental to education.

Mr S Wilson: I accept that strategy should not be driven purely by budgets. However, does the Member agree that when a school runs into massive deficits — sometimes as much as 45% of its total budget — then inevitably, because of the decisions that the school has to make, there will be death by a thousand cuts, as classroom assistants and key teachers are lost?

Mrs Long: That is the case. However, if there is a proper strategy for review of education provision, decisions can be taken on the basis of information more substantive than end-of-year deficits. Decisions should be taken on the basis of quality of provision and access to good-quality education. Those should be the drivers that determine where schools should be located and how they should be managed.

There is a further issue. Rationalisation is an ongoing process; it has not halted until the Assembly gets up and running. Rather, it will continue on a sectoral basis, rather than along geographical lines, and will further damage the coherence and cohesion of local communities and increase, rather than decrease, the degree of segregation in the community. That is not helpful.

David McNarry read a partial quotation from the report. The full quotation lends more to the debate. Partial quotations and half-truths always make it difficult to get a feel for the situation.

In the foreword to the report, Sir George Bain states:

“At the beginning of the Review's work, I thought it would be mainly concerned with the issue of ‘surplus places’ and the economic case — cost-effective provision that gives good value for money — for rationalising the schools' estate. As the work advanced, the economic case for rationalisation remained important, but two other arguments for rationalisation became even more important”.

Sir George goes on to outline the educational and social cases, which encompassed:

“access for pupils to the full range of the curriculum, to high quality teaching, and to modern facilities ... and ... societal well-being by promoting a culture of tolerance, mutual understanding, and inter-relationship”.

To use a partial quote and to maintain that the report is economically driven is most unfair on what actually emerged during its formulation.

Mr McNarry: Will the Member give way?

Mrs Long: No, I will not give way.

The figures highlighted by Mr McNarry simply indicate the depth of the current crisis for schools provision. The figures do not suggest a solution, and neither does Mr McNarry. We may not agree that a purely numbers-based formula is an appropriate way to determine the outcomes for schools. However, in fairness, neither does the Bain Report. Its list of recommendations states that when a school's enrolment falls below the relevant level, it should be reviewed; it does not say that the school should be closed.

Mr McNarry: Will the Member give way?

Mrs Long: No, I will not give way. Mr McNarry had adequate time to put his case when he moved the motion. I want to put my case.

Mr McNarry: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. I will probably not get away with this —

Mr Kennedy: Try us.

Mr McNarry: It is misinformation. The Member is accusing me of misquoting and not going the whole hog. However, her last point concerned post-primary schools, not primary schools, which is what I was talking about.

Mr Deputy Speaker : That is not a point of order.

Mrs Long: The figures that have been highlighted simply point to the depth of the crisis that must be addressed. We must establish a bottom line for any future review. At the moment, end-of-year deficits are driving the education boards and the Department of Education; we must have a more structured method. A numbers-only method is not appropriate either; that is referred to in the report, which further contends that elements such as management and social issues should be considered only in addition to the numbers argument. If we do not look at the complete picture, we are in danger of whipping up hysteria where none need exist.

The overarching message of the report is the need to move away from a fragmented system towards a single, shared, fit-for-purpose education arrangement that is open to everyone and is flexible and inclusive enough to accommodate the religious, social, cultural and, most importantly, educational needs of all pupils.

I welcome Sammy Wilson's assertion that this issue will be the bane of his life as well as ours. I suspect that his assertion is built on a confidence that we will be back here, not in a Transitional Assembly but, as the result of a positive turn of events, in a more stable form. That is to be welcomed. However, to delay progress on this issue until there is a functioning Assembly is not realistic. Despite Sammy Wilson's confidence, there is no certainty in the public consciousness that devolution is a matter of weeks away. Rather, there is a great deal of deliberate ambiguity and obfuscation on the issue.

I am a committed devolutionist; I believe that the best kind of governance is local governance. However, until such time as the parties in the Chamber are willing to step up to the plate, take responsibility for their decisions and do the job, the direct-rule Administration does not simply have the right to govern, but it has the responsibility and the obligation to do so and to do it well.

Last week, the Northern Ireland Council for Voluntary Action (NICVA) highlighted the damage done to Northern Ireland by the years of the direct-rule Administration's caretaker mentality. The policy vacuums created by that mentality led to unresponsive government and, at times, punishment government, where policy was used as a stick to beat local parties.

1.00 pm

That cannot continue. It is a matter for the parties in the Chamber whether a devolved Administration is established. However, the need to deal with education is in the hands of the direct-rule Ministers, and they must act. I hope that, one day, education will be in the hands of people in the Chamber and that they will act on it. Education has already been made a hostage to political progress — carrots in the shape of academic selection have been dangled in front of various parties. That must stop: it is no way to develop an education system.

We need to move from analysis towards proper engagement so that at some point, and, I hope, under a local Administration, firm, strategic decisions on education issues are made. That is better than allowing our current mess to continue.

Mrs D Dodds: In line with the warnings that Madam Speaker gave at the commencement of the debate, I declare that I am a member of the Belfast Education and Library Board.

Mr S Wilson: I would not declare that, if it were me. [Laughter.]

Mrs D Dodds: I do so for my sins, whether for good or for ill.

I welcome the debate. It is valuable, and it is important for our children's future and education. The Bain Report raises questions, but it does not answer them all. It sets out difficulties and suggests possible solutions. Some parts of the document are unsatisfactory because they are not particularly clear and do not grasp the nettle of the difficulties sufficiently to give us clear guidance on possible solutions.

(Madam Speaker in the Chair)

For those of us who have taken an interest in education, some parts of the Bain Report are extremely thought provoking. One is its suggestion to establish an area plan for schools in a particular geographical area. However, the report is unsatisfactory because it is unclear what that plan will mean. Will it include all schools in a given area, or will we simply have a continuation of the current system, allowing the different sectors in that area to draw up their own plans for their own sectors? Interestingly — and I do not think that many Members have mentioned this point — we need to know how that area plan would engage with local communities and how it would provide for their sustainability. Population movements, particularly in Belfast, have led to the formation of highly polarised communities. How will the Bain Report's area-plan concept help sustain those communities and provide educational services for them? Given that schools are the hub and lifeblood of communities, we need to know how area plans will engage with those polarised communities. That problem is particularly relevant to urban areas and to small rural schools.

The Bain Report has the potential to be helpful, but, as I have already said, in many cases it has not grasped the nettle of the problems and has not offered specific solutions. Reorganisation of the system needs to be set alongside the reorganisation of local government, the new education authority and the need for local government to engage in the development of communities and to help them move into the future.

The Bain Report has considered overcapacity in schools. Nowhere else in the United Kingdom or the world can match the number of different types of school management that there are in Northern Ireland. In other parts of the world there are private, faith and specialist schools. However, they are not all state funded: that is the difference between those schools and ours. Different management schemes inevitably mean extra costs. Education and training costs in Northern Ireland are 30% more per capita than anywhere else in the United Kingdom. Although we spend more, the existence of multiple sectors means that less money reaches pupils in Northern Ireland.

Despite education spending representing 10% of GDP compared with 5% for the rest of the UK, the actual spend per pupil is 14.5% less for primary schools and 2.5% less for post-primary schools here than in England and Wales.

The dramatic fall in numbers across all sectors must also be considered. In Belfast, the most significant drop has been in the maintained sector, although there is also a gradual decline in numbers in the controlled sector.

Surplus places in education in Northern Ireland rose by 14% over the past decade, and we now have 47,000 surplus places. The Department of Education, in its doomsday scenario, has predicted that there will be 80,000 surplus places in 10 years' time.

Northern Ireland has a higher proportion of small schools. Nineteen per cent of schools have 60 pupils or fewer, compared with 12% in Great Britain. The level of single-sex schools here is also higher — 31% of secondary schools, compared with 11.5% in England and 2.5% in Wales.

The persistence of large numbers of different education systems, with their multiple sets of bureaucracy, is no longer acceptable, particularly given the severely restricted education budgets. There have been two parallel systems, enshrined since 1922, educating pupils in the controlled and maintained sectors. Since then, we have added the integrated and Irish-medium sectors. The costs of the different sectors are being felt, and I would like to illustrate that: recent figures for transport costs put before the Belfast Education and Library Board (BELB) showed that schools such as St Gemma's High School, the Belfast Boys' Model School and the Belfast Model School for Girls had no transport costs, while the transport costs for integrated education were £191,330.

That is only one aspect of the cost of different sectors in the education system. The Member for East Belfast Mrs Long talked about rationalisation being driven by end-of-year deficits. In the BELB area, because of traditional methods for making payments to schools, the biggest deficit for a post-primary school is held by a Catholic maintained school. BELB has no control over the rationalisation policy of the CCMS, although there are plans for a meeting this week. The cuts that will be used to service that deficit are being borne by children in the controlled sector. We are seeing a situation in which the education system is actively discriminating against one particular sector.

Schools from different sectors work effectively at local level through collaboration, joint planning and joint working to meet the needs of the pupils around the Province. Many examples have been quoted in the debate. However, we need to grasp the issue. We need to decide how best to service the education of an individual child. Maintaining different sectors in the education system, and the high and disproportionate costs of the bureaucracy connected with those sectors, does not help an individual child in pursuit of educational excellence.

Thankfully, under the new provisions, an unaccountable Sinn Féin Minister will never again be able, because of a political decision, to give a disproportionate advantage to a system in which a school can be opened with as few as 12 pupils. Again, pupils in the controlled sector are bearing the burden of the deficits of schools in the Irish-medium sector. Many of those newly set up already have significant deficits and surplus places.

The Bain Report has identified a number of issues that will not go away. The report will ensure that those who are in charge of education must make hard choices. Education authorities and local communities must decide their priorities for the future provision of education.

Mr K Robinson: I declare an interest as a governor of two primary schools in Newtownabbey.

I am grateful to my colleague —

Mrs Long: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Mr Robinson has reminded me that, when I made my contribution, I failed to declare any interests. I am a member of the Belfast Education and Library Board and of the board of governors of Sydenham Infants' School. I apologise for my oversight.

Madam Speaker: It is sometimes difficult for Members to remember whether they need to declare certain interests but, at the beginning of the debate, I did say that they should do so. I thank Mr Robinson for his reminder.

Mr K Robinson: I am sorry that I embarrassed my colleagues. [Laughter.]

I am grateful to my colleague Mr McNarry for bringing this issue before the Assembly. The Bain Report has immense implications, not only for our educational system, but for the future well-being of our entire society. Unless it is carefully analysed in a coherent manner, it has the potential to destabilise our rural community while simultaneously speeding up the educational retreat from the most marginalised communities in urban areas.

The Bain Report includes 61 recommendations, each worthy of intense scrutiny. However, due to the time constraints of this debate, the House will be relieved to hear that it is not my intention to go through them, line by line.

Mr S Wilson: Aw, go on.

Mr K Robinson: I know that you are disappointed, Sammy. [Laughter.]

During recent debates on rural schools and the links between poor educational attainment and social disadvantage, many Members highlighted the problems that beset rural communities. The common denominator between poor educational achievement and social disadvantage is the need to ensure that our schools deliver on the basics of literacy and numeracy. The recent Westminster Public Accounts Committee's report on the Department of Education's performance did not inspire confidence in that body's ability to deliver that core function effectively. Therefore, I do not share the report's confidence in either the Department of Education or in the proposed education and skills authority, which sounds suspiciously like another quango, to effectively address this issue rather than tilting at the windmills of social engineering.

Recommendations 6 and 7, under the heading 'Effectiveness and Efficiency', focus on school sustainability. The minimum enrolment stipulation of 105 pupils for new primary schools raises some issues for pupil-teacher ratios. If we assume that there would be seven class levels, from primary 1 to primary 7, comprising 105 pupils, are we to envisage seven classes, with 15 children in each — which would represent progress — or would there be a non-teaching principal, with six staff and some composite classes, or would there continue to be a 30:1 pupil-teacher ratio, allowing for three to four teachers? The basic staff entitlement for such a new school would need to be clarified by the teachers' unions to ensure that a proper and effective staff is in place.

We must also consider the social and psychological impact on small primary 1 pupils who would have to face a bigger, more distant school, with unknown teachers and children from outside their circles, who may display different values and behaviour patterns from those of their parents and host communities. How would that situation impact on their attitudes and development? In time and distance, how great would be the acceptable norm to transport those impressionable children on school buses where, daily, they could observe behaviour from their fellow travellers that would not, in many instances, be tolerated in their homes?

In urban settings, the continuing denudation of marginalised areas will, no doubt, increase, leaving large swathes of our cities and towns with no local schools with which communities can identify.

How many teaching staff would be required, as of right, for a school that is subject to a minimum of 140 pupils? Will there be seven classes, each of 20 pupils? That might begin to address the major problems. What special educational provision will be available to those pupils? I somehow doubt that their educational opportunities will be enhanced.

1.15 pm

Recommendation 1 of the Bain Report, on allocating the education budget, caught my attention, particularly the following phrase:

"The degree to which schools have control of their own budgets should be maximised".

As a former school principal, the phrase "free at last" ran through my mind. However, I then noted recommendation 2, which states that:

"schools should receive financial and other incentives to share resources and deliver improved provision in collaboration with other schools."

Principals will be free to control more — but not all — of their budgets. There is a continuing myth that principals and governors can manage their schools locally. In fact — as you and I know well, Madam Speaker — most of our schools have a minimal amount under their control from inadequate budgets after staff costs, which sometimes amount to more than 90% of the budget, are taken out. Perhaps recommendation 4 might offer some hope for the future. It states that:

"the Common Funding Formula should be reviewed to ensure that delegations under the formula reflect the costs of the main needs of schools."

Recommendation 9 states that surplus should be no more than 10% of the schools' estate's total capacity. However, that may be outside the control of the school. For example, when I was a school principal on the Shankill, streets of family homes were demolished and their population dispersed. The result was that, when school numbers declined, the Housing Executive responded by building bungalows for pensioners. The displaced families were rehoused in out-of-town estates. New schools were built in the centre of those estates, and mobile classrooms were often required to cope with the numbers of pupils. Those estates have all matured at the same time: the young people have left; the populations are aging; and school numbers have declined. What a way to plan.

Currently, planners are giving permission for private developments without any corresponding infrastructure being in place. The result is that existing schools are swamped, mobile classrooms are brought back into service, and children are sometimes turned away, while nearby estate schools have many empty places. I have, therefore, limited faith in the Department of Education, the new education and skills authority, or the planners to get it right this time.

A new Administration in Northern Ireland must ensure that joined-up government is a reality, no longer simply a convenient catchphrase. Recommendation 13 urges the Department of Education, before the new education and skills authority acquires estate-planning capacity, to:

“act quickly and decisively to take forward area-based planning as soon as possible in the year 2007”.

Are we in for another mad rush to get it wrong? I contend that the Department of Education should not act in haste, lest it is required, yet again, by a future Public Accounts Committee (PAC) report to repent at leisure. It would be much more satisfactory if the existing education and library boards were to review the current information in a coherent manner. That would provide a sounder basis for identifying what constitutes a local area, identify local provision, identify proposals that would lead to a comprehensive understanding of the possibilities and the provisos, and ensure that a realistic and achievable timeframe could be put in place.

I have grave misgivings about the motivation that underpins the various moves towards the sharing of resources and staff. There are excellent examples of practical co-operation and sharing of resources and staff in many areas, including my constituency. Those measures are based on a genuine awareness of the need to maximise educational opportunities for all our children. I commend those projects and encourage them. However, I am concerned about the carrot-and-stick approach that is designed to cause schools — which may, in many cases, face local difficulties — to move in a particular direction in order to acquire extra funding or extra staff. That reminds me of how the education for mutual understanding (EMU) scheme was promoted in the past and how many schools became involved merely to access funding, while other natural schemes to involve children from different education sectors received no official recognition at all.

Schools and the Department of Education are charged with ensuring that all our children succeed in numeracy, literacy and those other basic skills that will enable them to become self-confident and self-sustaining members of society.

All evidence up to now indicates that that core objective has not been reached. The policy on special educational needs is also clearly failing to deal with the problems faced by pupils, parents and schools. The planning of the schools' estate, mentioned in recommendation 42 of the report, may be helpful in developing that policy, but only if the school base supports specialist staff, is properly funded and staffing levels are adequate to tackle the task in hand.

Although my contribution has dwelt on the primary-school sector, I welcome recommendations 43 to 51, which concern collaboration between schools and the further education sector. As a former governor of a further education college, I feel that such co-operation is long overdue. It was, however, delayed by the introduction by Government of the competitive, rather than the co-operative, environment between colleges and schools. If our economy is to get up and running to its full potential, colleges need flexibility to promote courses, to respond to the needs of industry and, in the secondary and grammar sectors, to benefit from fair and factual careers advice on future employment prospects.

I note that the integrated education sector and the Irish-medium sector are specifically mentioned in the report.

Madam Speaker: Can the Member draw his remarks to a close?

Mr K Robinson: Yet again, that reinforces in the maintained and controlled sectors — which represent the overwhelming majority of pupils, teachers and staff — a continuing sense of being second-class citizens. I support the motion and the amendment.

Mrs O'Rawe: Thank you, a Cheann Comhairle. I support the amendment. As quite a lot of figures and statistics have been mentioned in the debate, rather than being repetitive, I intend to be brief.

As we all know, the education of all our children and young people is of the utmost importance. It is therefore crucial that sufficient budgets reflect the changing nature of schools provision in an environment that supports sharing and collaboration. Quite a few Members have mentioned that.

We all know that working partnerships are the way forward. However, it is essential that parental choice is not undermined. Our children and young people must be given the opportunities to enable them to reach their full potential in order to equip them with the necessary skills for their futures. Although it is crucial that criteria exist to protect learners' needs, there must also be criteria that safeguard teachers' needs.

Community educational networks have already been mentioned. Schools and their resources, especially in rural communities, should be used by the entire community. There are two good examples of community engagement in the Armagh area. In St Patrick's High School in Keady, the council, the school and the community work in partnership, whereby both sections of the community use the school's sporting and gym facilities because there are no other facilities of that nature in the area. A similar project is nearing completion in the Richhill area in County Armagh. That is another good example of community involvement and shared partnership. That is the obvious way forward to ensure that communities as a whole benefit from the resources in their areas.

Diane Dodds mentioned area plans and how they would engage with the community. Engagement with the community is crucial to any community plan and should be carried out through a community planning process. A good example of community planning is the 'Planning for Real' model. I am sure that other Members will have heard of that, and how, by using a large-scale model of their area made by pupils in their local schools, communities can identify the area's needs.

I wanted to mention those projects in addition to what had already been said. In conclusion, a Cheann Comhairle, I welcome the debate on the Bain Report and commend David McNarry for tabling the motion and Dominic Bradley for tabling the amendment.

Ms Farrell: I wish to concentrate on the section of the Bain Report that deals with collaboration between schools and the further education sector, to which reference has already been made by Barry McElduff and Ken Robinson. I must declare that I have been a further education teacher for more than 20 years in Newry Institute.

The Bain Report states that collaboration between schools and the further education sector, and a more flexible and less prescriptive curriculum, are the key components in educational arrangements for 14- to 19-year-olds. That will be vital in order to avoid school closures in the post-primary sector, particularly schools that do not have a viable sixth form. Even if a school has a healthy sixth form, collaboration can offer a depth and range of subjects and programmes that a traditional stand-alone school may be unable to offer.

The Bain Report emphasises that collaborative, co-operative arrangements cannot be seen as an alternative to avoiding decisions that must be taken to reorganise Northern Ireland's post-primary system of sustainable schools. However, the mutual benefits of partnership may militate against some school closures and enhance the opportunities available to students and teachers.

The post-primary review working group, which published the Costello Report, introduced the concept of the "entitlement framework". That framework was developed to give pupils a broader and more flexible curriculum, so that a blend of courses, including academic and vocational courses, can be offered to meet pupils' needs, aptitudes and interests. It is anticipated that the entitlement framework will be implemented by September 2009. By that time, pupils at Key Stage 4 should have had at least one third academic provision and one third vocational/technical/professional provision available to them. All courses must be accredited in the national qualifications framework.

The introduction of the entitlement framework is intended to address inequalities of access to educational opportunities, an issue that was debated in the House last week. As was stated across the Chamber, the current educational provision and choices available depend largely on where pupils live and the type and size of the school that they attend. The choices available to pupils after the age of 16, and their access to curriculum entitlement, depend on whether schools have a viable sixth form. Therefore, it is clear that the proper implementation of the entitlement framework will require co-operation and collaboration among schools, and among schools, further education colleges and approved training organisations. That is reinforced by the requirement that at least one third of courses must be of an applied nature and one third must be of an academic nature.

Any collaborative arrangements will require engagement and commitment at a local level. Strong leadership and co-ordination will also be required. The Costello Report urges that, from the outset, all parties involved be equal partners. That has not always been the case; post-primary providers, in particular, are often in competition for numbers rather than putting the individual needs of the child as the central concern.

The Bain Report endorses the Costello Report in calling for a strategic dimension to local planning for curriculum provision and institutional roles. The Bain Report states that it would not be acceptable to have a series of loosely coupled arrangements between individual schools and colleges of further education.

The Bain Report stresses that the quality of courses depends on the quality of teaching, the suitability and use of resources, and the viability of the teaching group. All courses require suitably qualified and experienced teachers, including, for some courses, teachers with appropriate industrial experience.

At this point, I wish to highlight the discrepancy in salaries between schoolteachers and further education lecturers, who are currently taking action in their demand for pay parity with schoolteachers. Although the Bain Report calls for collaboration, co-operation and the sharing of resources, why is it that the best resources that we have — namely, our teachers — are treated differently and unequally? I know of several lecturers in further education who are “lent” from their institute to local grammar schools, teaching A-level subjects that otherwise would not be financially viable for schools to offer. Those lecturers often have industrial backgrounds and, in their own institutions, teach their subjects to Higher National Diploma (HND) or degree level.

1.30 pm

They bring their experience and knowledge of their subjects and professional working lives to the classrooms, which can only be of benefit to pupils. Nevertheless, on average, they receive £3,000 a year less — and I stress that that is on average — than the grammar-school teachers in the classrooms next door. Recently, the Secretary of State met further education (FE) lecturers' representatives. I appeal to Minister Eagle to ensure that, in the interests of fairness and equity, FE employers address this anomaly immediately.

As the House proposes new and innovative arrangements for post-primary education, and urges collaboration and equity among providers, the injustice of the pay gap between schoolteachers and FE teachers must be addressed as a priority. If — and I hope that this is not the case — the matter is not resolved before a devolved Government is established, I call on the incoming Assembly to deal urgently with this unfair anomaly.

Some of the courses proposed under the new arrangements require specialist equipment and facilities, meaning that there will be a need to share accommodation and facilities across schools, particularly in further education, and between training providers.

Following the Government's acceptance of the Costello recommendations, the Department of Education and the Department for Employment and Learning launched a pilot vocational enhancement programme (VEP). VEP involves all the FE colleges working with approximately 190 schools, providing professional and technical courses for more than 14,000 pupils. The pilot is entering its fourth year, and, to date, the evidence shows that there very positive aspects to the collaboration. There are also several obstacles, such as timetabling, pastoral care, and problems with the funding systems across the two sectors.

In preparation for today's debate, I talked to the head of vocational education in a school involved in the VEP pilot. She told me that seven local schools, from both the maintained and controlled sectors, one FE institute, local employers offering work experience, a training provider and the Youth Service are all involved in her programme. Before the introduction of the programme over three years ago, her pupils studied traditional academic GCSE subjects, with many failing to receive at least a grade C. Pupils were disaffected and underachieving, and this manifested itself in behavioural problems and an increase in school dropout numbers. The teacher told me that several years ago, those pupils would have felt alienated and excluded, even though they were of mixed ability, and that they were often seen as disruptive, problem pupils by teachers and fellow pupils. They were not being offered the educational provision that was right for them.

In Northern Ireland, we have a certain amount of academic snobbery, valuing the academic child and academic courses. Although we should maintain high academic standards, we must begin to value vocational courses and vocational excellence and welcome the opportunity to mix and match the vocational and the academic. My teacher friend told me that there was a great deal of work involved in getting VEP established and that it had had teething problems. However, in her professional judgement, it is proving to be a huge success. It gives pupils excellent CCEA qualifications, a sense of worth, a sense of achievement, and a sense of direction.

Each pupil has an individually tailored learning programme, which can include work experience, time in school, time at an FE institute or a training organisation, and time on educational visits.

The VEP to which I am referring covers a wide variety of areas, including retail, business, travel and tourism, media studies, catering, beauty therapy, hairdressing, childcare, ICT, and the building trades — a number of which the Department for Employment and Learning's Northern Ireland skills monitoring service has identified as areas in which there is a skills shortage. The motivated students are now working hard, with concrete progression routes in sight, and the school is amazed at the turnaround in pupils' attitudes and goals, with large numbers going on to further education, valuing themselves and their vocational choices.

My friend told me an interesting story about a particular student whom she saw working with Flash animation during an occupational studies programme. I do not know what that is, and I am sure that many Members do not know either. When she returned to school and asked her colleagues about it, the only teacher who recognised Flash animation was completing a Masters degree in computers.

Bain says that the Education and Training Inspectorate believes that collaboration works best when organisations are not in competition and provision in an area is strategically planned.

Madam Speaker: Your time is up.

Ms Farrell: I commend the motion and the amendment to the House.

Madam Speaker: Before I call the next Member, I remind Members that the use of electronic devices in the Chamber is not permitted, as it interferes with the acoustics. This has been said in the Business Committee, but it does not seem to be getting through.

Mr Shannon: I declare that I am a member of the board of governors at Glashury College.

George Bain's report makes some 60 recommendations, some obvious, some complex and some cautious. Each region will find both positives and negatives in the report. Consequently, different sections will be highlighted. I would like to highlight a few that relate to my own area, and perhaps to show where the Bain Report has fallen down in that regard.

In the Strangford constituency, there are 39 primary schools, eight secondary schools and one grammar school. Of the primary schools, 12 fall below Bain's suggested minimum enrolment; eight in rural areas and four Catholic maintained primaries in urban areas. Under the Bain Report, these schools will automatically be reviewed, taking into account the quality of education being delivered, the cost of running the schools and their viability. The wording of the report makes it obvious that the schools should not be closed merely because of their low enrolments; that should serve only as a flag to show whether the school is performing.

I have to say that beneath the surface I fear that the Labour policy of disintegrating the rural community and rural way of life could flourish under the pretext of financial inefficiency and ineffective teaching and learning, rather than the real reason, which is the dislike of the rural community that has been shown so decisively, determinedly and disturbingly by the current Government at any and — almost — every opportunity.

On page seven of the report, Bain refers to demographic trends. Rather than show declining figures for the whole Province, he should be looking at areas such as Strangford, where pupil numbers have risen and levelled off. Why should the area that I represent be subject to the Bain Report when the report's rationale does not seem to apply to that area?

This is clearly an attack on rural life. Will our small schools, full of character and heritage as well as the provision of sound education, be sacrificed in favour of larger, more impersonal schools in towns and cities? Will the teachers who knew each pupil — and their parents — be a thing of the past as we move full steam ahead into a cosmopolitan way of life where we live mutually exclusive of others, our children not knowing their neighbours?

Will children have the same chances as we did to go to school and university with the friends whom they grew up around the corner from, or will they have acquaintances whom they do not have the time to truly mesh with as they cannot spend time together outside the classroom? These friendships, formed at primary schools and retained through the adolescent years, are an important part of the education process that every child goes through. They should not be sacrificed because children live huge distances apart and their parents are consequently unable to bring them together regularly.

Members will wholeheartedly agree with me that much more worrying and, indeed, costlier in terms of a child's health is the 25-minute drive to school that will be required if the Bain Report is implemented and the schools are all centralised in cities and towns. We should also take into account the prevalence of childminders and how this is going to affect them. Is it one journey to school or two? Is it different times for different children? All these issues have to be considered.

The combination of after-school activities and quality education cannot be disregarded because children live in the country, and it should not be so easily sacrificed. After-school activities and the formation of friendships are part of growth and development and must be taken into account when assessing the quality of education that a school provides. As vital as basic good teaching and the three Rs are, we cannot forgo the social aspects that define a child as much as academic abilities. The Bain Report takes away a lot of the social interests of children at school.

This is why it must be part of the decision-making process when it comes to the potential closures of rural primary schools. Secondary-school children should be able to stay behind for after-school activities, yet this is not an option for younger primary-school children. Children in rural areas deserve no less a chance to enjoy after-school activities than those in urban areas and should not be discriminated against because of where they live.

We must also ensure that when taking the sizes of schools into account, we take on board the possibility of growth in areas. I refer to demographic trends. With 7,500 houses being earmarked for the Ards Borough Council and Strangford areas, there is potential for growth and for more children, and that has to be taken into account. According to the Bain Report, that is not being considered at the moment.

Some smaller schools in my constituency are located in Killyleagh and Derryboy. Has any consideration been given to Derryboy? What about Killyleagh, where the numbers are almost at the magical 105 and 110?

Derryboy Primary School has just had a large extension completed, and parents want to send their children there, so it must be considered. The Bain Report has not done that, and it concerns me, as it could be replicated throughout the Strangford area — indeed, I suspect, throughout the Ards borough — and I am sure that other Members could give other instances of where it is happening as well. Clearly, where there is a good progressive school with good teaching and potential for growth, it must become part of the decision-making process. In Derryboy, there is a potential development for 30 family homes in the pipeline. They will not be bungalows, which Ken Robinson mentioned as an example of where things went wrong before. They will be family homes, with families living there, and there will be the potential for more children to attend the school.

That small school provides quality education in the academic, practical and sporting areas, and the fact that the enrolment figure is below that in the Bain Report must not be allowed to be used as the deciding factor determining its future. Indeed, a meeting has been arranged for later this week to discuss this with Irene Knox, and that is something that we want to do as well.

Lack of funding should never be a reason for closing a school that is doing its job and giving a superior education to the children who attend it — no matter the size of the school. The Bain Report has made it abundantly clear that there must be radical change to the schooling system with less money being wasted, more use being made of existing facilities, and under-performing schools being changed, but the focus must not be on that aspect alone: we must be able to make decisions.

A while ago, we met with the teachers and members of the board of governors of Dundonald High School. They emphasised the fact that the feeder primary schools are there to ensure that the school attracts the Bain number of about 500 pupils. We must have a policy that enables us to respond quickly, and unfortunately that is not happening in many cases.

Recently, I wrote a letter in relation to Glastry College. I was told that there was going to be new building there. However, we have since been told in a letter from Tom Walsh at the education and library board that there has been a complication since the release of the Bain Report. The Department of Education has said that even projects that had been announced — and Glastry College is one such project — will have to be reviewed. There is something wrong when the future of a school of that size, with over 600 pupils, has to be reviewed because of the Bain Report. The decision has been taken, and surely it is time to move ahead. The land has been identified, and school numbers ensure its long-term viability.

It seems to me that it is clearly the task of the Assembly to decide on the implementation of this report and its recommendations. It has been said that only those who understand the workings of an engine should ever lift the hood of a car never mind fiddle with it. Similarly, only those who understand the rural community and its needs, or those who want to learn about them, should be involved with their workings. The Bain Report has fallen short. There are many things in it that should be done, but it is clearly a matter for the Assembly, and for those who have been elected to it, to implement something, which has the potential to affect drastically the future lives of our children.

1.45 pm

Mr Weir: I wish to declare two interests. First, I am a governor of Ballyholme Primary School and of Bloomfield Primary School in Bangor, both of which's pupil numbers, I hasten to add, are well above the required minimum that is suggested in the Bain Report. I hope, therefore, that I can bring a degree of objectivity to the debate.

Secondly, I am a member — that may be an odd way in which to put it — of the South Eastern Education and Library Board (SEELB), which is currently in suspension.

Mr Shannon: It is in limbo.

Mr Weir: Yes, it is in limbo. A principal reason why the SEELB is suspended is because its political members refused to put up with the draconian cuts that the Department of Education was planning to impose on the board. I am proud to say that we would not accept the level of cutbacks that was being proposed for the most vulnerable in our society. As a result, the board was suspended.

However, the issue is not simply about how that financial situation arose; we must accept a degree of responsibility for what has been happening overall. Although the Department of Education's failure to support the board led to the crisis, another factor that led to the financial situation in which the board found itself was the falling surpluses and increasing deficits of pupil numbers. That has been the case in all our education and library boards. We must realise that a real problem exists with spare capacity.

Many of the points that have been raised have highlighted that we must treat the issue with a degree of sensitivity. To preserve the status quo is not an option — it is certainly not a cost-free option. The SEELB found that the money that it was losing — for which the board had to pick up the tab — was having a heavy impact on central board budgets.

I assume that the percentages for other boards were similar, but we were spending about 55% to 60% of our budget on special-needs education; therefore, our spending tended to be slightly higher than that of some of the other boards. When money is taken away from a board because of increased deficits in pupil numbers, which happen because of existing problems, the people who will inevitably suffer from budget cutbacks are those with special needs — perhaps the most vulnerable in our society. We must bear that in mind whenever we are examining the report's findings.

Although I have reservations about the Bain Report, I welcome the fact that we can have this debate. At least we have a report at which to look. Other Members have raised that point. The Department of Education and the boards knew for years that there was a problem with the sustainability of schools, but — to a degree — a blind eye was turned to that problem on many occasions. We are in crisis at present partly because there was failure at a central level to grasp the severity of the problem much earlier. Therefore the opportunity to have a report that looks at sustainability is at least a step forward to some degree.

As my colleague Sammy Wilson said, much in the report highlights some of the problems. My problem with the Bain Report is that it failed to grasp a number of issues. At times, its findings were contradictory. One obvious example of that relates to the level of sustainability of schools, which several Members have mentioned. The report fudges that issue a bit, even though it refers to specific numbers. A key paragraph in the report appears to contradict itself. Paragraph 27 in the executive summary of chapter 7 on effectiveness and efficiency states:

“A clear policy on school sustainability needs to be developed. School sustainability means a number of things but its governing principle should be educational sustainability.”

To put educational sustainability at the heart of school sustainability, only to tie that in later to an arbitrary minimum enrolment figure of 105 pupils for rural primary schools, 140 for non-rural primary schools and 500 for secondary schools, appears to contradict the report's ethos. As other Members have indicated, when examining the impact that the Bain Report will have, we cannot simply single out the level of draconian cuts that would be applied to communities if the report's recommendations were implemented. Indeed, we must examine the local circumstances and be imaginative in how we look forward.

A Member who spoke earlier indicated that, in doing so, we must take into account the impact of new leadership when considering educational sustainability. Conlig Primary School in my constituency — one of the schools that is under threat — has been experiencing a decline in pupil numbers for many years. It should have a large catchment area, yet because there has been ineffectual leadership at times — for a long period it had no headmaster — it has witnessed a long-term decline. In the past year, however, a new headmistress has taken over at the school. New proposals have been put forward, and a very proactive group in Conlig is looking to expand the school's boundaries. According to the Bain Report, if one looked purely at school numbers, the school would not meet the required level of sustainability. However, it is clearly benefiting from the input of new leadership, new thinking and wider reach-out.

Kilcooley Primary School, which will be close to your heart, Madam Speaker, would also be under threat, according to the Bain Report. Based on pupil numbers, it is in decline, yet that school, in addition to its educational position, plays a key role in the community and, in partnership with other organisations, is very much at the heart of the community. Therefore a wider examination of the whole issue must take place.

As has been indicated, several things need to happen to prevent closures. We must concentrate on the idea of area-based planning to ensure that there is proper collaboration between schools. However, that must be done on the basis of all the sectors working together. I must express a particular degree of concern that, faced with the threat of the Bain Report, rather than looking at a much wider level of involvement, CCMS has pulled up the drawbridge in order to protect its sector.

The Bain Report highlights the low numbers in the integrated and Irish-medium sectors but fails to grasp the nettle to take the next step forward and say that, at the very least, all schools should be treated on the basis of equality of opportunity. I was struck by Mr McElduff's reference to the fact that Sinn Féin is very keen on equality of opportunity. If that is the case, I presume that it will no longer support the policy that allowed Irish-medium schools to be set up with a minimum enrolment of 12 pupils, when other sectors had to adhere to a different policy. Unfortunately, since 1998 —

Mr McElduff: Will the Member give way?

Mr Weir: As time is short, I will not give way.

There must be equality of opportunity — the false favouring of the integrated and Irish-medium sectors should be removed from the system. All schools must be treated equally. I have no objection if any existing school wishes to seek transformation to integrated status, provided that that is the desire of the parents. However, I have a problem with, for example, the integrated sector putting forward a proposal for a new build, which the Minister then takes the politically courageous step of saying no to, only to find out that NICIE has provided funding for it. If we are to tackle the problem of too many schools and too many sectors chasing too few pupils, we should not add to the problem by opening additional schools where the numbers do not demand them.

As Jim Shannon pointed out, we must also provide people with a degree of certainty about the way forward. I have spoken to headmasters from across the sectors who tell me that too often when a ministerial announcement about capital build has been made, they find themselves waiting for additional funds to reach their schools three, four or five years down the line. There must be certainty. The future lies in adopting a more imaginative approach, in having a more locally-based system and in having a schools policy that is properly sustainable. Having criticised the Department for waiting around for this report, which goes only so far, I must say that local input is needed.

Consequently, having not dealt with the problem for many years, we can at least ensure that democratically elected politicians deal with the issue. We should not seek implementation now, but the next Assembly must grasp the issue. I support the motion and the amendment.

Mr D Bradley: We have had a constructive and unified debate today. It helped that all parties agreed with the motion and the amendment. I welcome that unity, because this is an important issue and the House must speak on it with one voice.

I have already commended Mr McNarry for bringing the motion before the House. He spoke of some of the findings of the Subgroup on Schools Admission Policy, one of which was to initiate research around transfer at 14 and to explore the implications of a system such as the Dickson plan and how it might be applied to other areas. Mr McNarry regretted that that research had not been fed into the Bain mix, as it were. If the Department were to set up a group involving various education providers to formulate a sustainable schools policy, it might want to consider adding that research to the mix.

Mr McNarry gave us a detailed statistical analysis of the effects that the Bain proposals might have on schools based on the viability quotas mentioned in the report. He described those effects as staggering. Most Members, especially those from rural areas, would agree with him; there is huge anxiety about quotas.

Sammy Wilson tried to alleviate that anxiety when he called for flexibility in the quotas, and he suggested that they should be adjustable to suit certain local circumstances. He also said that sustainability does not depend on numbers alone, but also on the quality of education provided and the quality of educational leadership in a school. He saw a conflict between the Bain Report's emphasis on quotas even though it underlined quality of education and leadership as important elements of sustainability.

Mr Wilson also mentioned the huge number of surplus places, which are currently estimated at 50,000 — although there are various interpretations of their accuracy and how they were arrived at — and which are predicted to rise to 80,000 in 10 years' time. He said that that was an issue that no public representative or administrator could run away from. He agreed with Bain that change must take place slowly rather than be rushed into immediately.

Mr McElduff regretted that his amendment was not accepted. He outlined briefly Sinn Féin's policy on education, which I will not repeat, and he will forgive me for that. He also mentioned the need to address overprovision in the system. He too was anxious about quotas, and he questioned how they were arrived at.

He also called on the Minister of Education to make a statement on sustainable schools as soon as possible. He outlined the advantages of smaller schools, and he commented that the report is slightly biased in that it does not deal with the positive aspects of smaller schools. He also underlined the need for the rural proofing of any policies arising from the report, and he commended attempts at collaboration in such places as Ballymoney, Omagh and Limavady.

2.00 pm

Mrs Long informed us that the Alliance Party was the only party to respond to the consultation on the Bain Report. However, according to my information, parties were not invited to respond, so I hope that she will stand corrected on that issue. I know that my party was very eager to take part in the consultation, as I am sure other parties were.

Mrs Long was concerned that budgetary issues are driving rationalisation and that other important considerations, including the quality of education, are not being given due consideration. She expressed her lack of confidence in the possibility of an early return to devolution, and she said that, in the absence of devolution, direct-rule Ministers have a duty to rule. She disagreed with the Government's policy of dangling carrots in front of certain political parties — as happened, for example, over academic selection — in order to make progress politically.

Mrs Dodds wanted further information on what was meant by area planning and how it would engage with local communities. She wondered how the proposals in the Bain Report would help to sustain education in local communities.

Mr Ken Robinson said that the report had immense implications and could severely affect rural and urban communities. He referred to the failure of literacy and numeracy policies, and he said that that did not inspire confidence in the ability of the Department or the new skills body to deal with the major issues that will confront us in the future. He was concerned that large swathes of rural and urban areas could be left without local schools.

Mrs O'Rawe supported the amendment, and she called for budgets to support collaboration between schools, but she underlined her belief that parental choice must not be undermined. She talked about community networks that were beneficial to schools and local communities, and she mentioned the case of St Patrick's High School in Keady.

Ms Farrell concentrated on the implications of the report for further education, and she said that collaboration could offer a breadth of choice that a normal stand-alone school cannot. She also told us that the entitlement framework could not be delivered without engagement and commitment to co-operation between schools and further education colleges. She also mentioned the need for quality teaching courses and resources, and she unselfishly highlighted the disparity in pay between further education lecturers and the general teaching population. She said that this disparity is, on average, around £3,000 per annum. She called on an incoming Assembly to deal with that issue.

She also mentioned positive aspects of the vocational enhancement programme and quoted the experience of one co-ordinator who witnessed how the programme engaged pupils who might have felt alienated in a more academic setting. She outlined the range of courses involved and how those courses can help to address the skills deficit in Northern Ireland.

Mr Shannon maintains that many Government policies have demonstrated an anti-rural bias. He sees the Bain proposals as a threat to rural schools and, indeed, to the rural way of life. He expressed his concern that rural children will have to be bussed into towns in order to get an education, and pointed out that that militates against after-school activities for those children. He called for decisions on the future of education to be left to those who are elected to take them.

Peter Weir reminded the House that the status quo is not an option. He mentioned the vulnerability of children with special educational needs.

In conclusion, I underline the sentiments of the amendment and the motion that the matter be deferred until the Assembly is restored and that, in the meantime, the educational providers, in co-operation with the Department of Education, draft a sustainable schools policy to be considered by a restored Assembly. Go raibh míle maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

Mr Kennedy: Thank you, Madam Speaker, for the opportunity to conclude this important debate. I feel that I am at a huge disadvantage as Mr Bradley has provided a summary of Members' speeches. It is rather like being a spectator or eyewitness at an important event — if one assumes that Assembly debates are important events — and discovering through the Hansard report whose speech was the most accurate, who believed what they heard, and what their interpretations were.

The debate was useful. I thank all Members who contributed to it. I thank my colleague Mr McNarry for bringing this important matter to the notice of the House. One of the first questions that he posed was whether the Government would listen to the debate and to the contributions of political parties and individual Members.

One hopes that they will, although Assembly Members' history and experience tells us that we are largely ignored — certainly by the Government if not by the general public. We, therefore, start at a serious disadvantage.

Nonetheless, it is important that the Assembly's views on the Bain Report are put on record. The motion simply seeks that the Assembly note the recommendations. That is an important clarification. The Assembly will simply examine the report as a work in progress — work that, it is hoped, will be undertaken by a future Assembly and Executive.

Mr McNarry said that there are too many education sectors, which are all competing for a limited share of available finance. More work is required to ensure that the limited amount of money is more equally and fairly spread. That may mean that the number of sectors will be reduced, which is a serious issue for those who are affected. The potential impact on both urban and rural schools of the review that has been advocated by Sir George Bain, and on the long-term sustainability of those schools, must be highlighted as a matter of concern.

I welcome Dominic Bradley's comments on behalf of the SDLP that the future work of the Assembly or, indeed, any draft sustainable schools initiative should include careful examination of the Dickson plan as a means of progress and, perhaps, of solving the issues of transfer and selection.

Mr Sammy Wilson, who, unfortunately, is not in the Chamber, was careful not to reject the proposals made by Prof Sir George Bain, but simply indicated that these issues must be addressed, that they will require careful consideration, and that things will not happen quickly. Prof Bain has outlined a timetable for the report to be considered. The report will challenge existing structures.

Mr McElduff, who is still in the Chamber, made a contribution that reminded me of what King Charles I is alleged to have said about a person who made a long speech in either the Long or the Rump Parliament; that his speech, like the love of God, was beyond all human understanding. I could not make head or tail of Mr McElduff's contribution — perhaps that was the design of it. He spoke of changes in education, and said that Prof Bain's report asked as many questions as it answered. That is also the conclusion that I came to regarding Mr McElduff's contribution.

Naomi Long took the opportunity to lecture the larger parties — a trait beloved by Alliance Party representatives — and berated us for all manner of failures. At one stage, she even became clairvoyant. That was in the presence of the Assembly's chief clairvoyant, Lord Morrow, who has considerable achievements in that field. He is the undisputed champion of this Assembly, in my view. Mystic Maurice has yet to pronounce on current events, but no doubt we will hear, as Miss Long of the Alliance Party —

Mr Ford: Mrs Long.

Mr Kennedy: Mrs Long, on behalf of the Alliance Party, seeks to become a worthy successor, or partner perhaps, of the clairvoyant in this House. We wait with interest to see how that will happen. I am reminded of the old music-hall joke: I used to be a clairvoyant, but I gave it up because I could not see any future in it. [Interruption.] They do not get any better.

Diane Dodds made an important contribution. She said that the significance of the Bain recommendations would be in how they impacted on the review of public administration and the creation of the new education authority. In particular, she highlighted the travel costs associated with one sector in one education and library board. The cost of funding the smaller integrated and Irish-language sectors in education made an interesting comparison and raised concerns.

My party colleague, Mr Ken Robinson, made a careful analysis of the situation and rightly highlighted the myth of locally managed schools when staff costs amount to 90% of the budget and allow no flexibility to boards of governors. As I mention boards of governors, it would be unwise, lest the Speaker take action against me, not to indicate my membership of the boards of governors of Bessbrook Primary School and Newry High School — I am trying to avoid the Tower of London.

2.15 pm

Ken Robinson said that people's confidence in the Department of Education was limited, and that there was increased frustration at the lack of joined-up government. Those issues must be addressed in any new Assembly.

Pat O'Rawe is one of the few Sinn Féin Members who, having been deselected by her party, still wants to be associated with party policy, and she may wish to be commended for that. However, it seems that the jury on selection is still out, so that is possibly why she made her contribution today.

Marietta Farrell spoke of the deserving issue of the wage claim and the differentials between schoolteachers and lecturers in further education colleges. She also made some important points about the Costello Report and collaborative arrangements. Barry McElduff mentioned collaboration earlier in the debate, but I am unsure whether he was referring to educational or political collaboration.

Jim Shannon said that Prof George Bain's report amounted to a curate's egg: it was good in parts. One suspects that Prof George Bain will produce further leaflets and pamphlets in his future career; perhaps his next will deal with the rural communities that it is no longer safe for him to visit. Jim Shannon seemed to recommend that the best way of addressing any shortfall in school numbers, particularly in the Ards and Strangford area, was to go on an accelerated breeding campaign. The local constituency can look forward to —

Mr S Wilson: All by himself?

Mr Kennedy: How Mr Shannon will seek to achieve that remains unanswered. [Laughter.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr Kennedy: Members will want to read Mr Shannon's election manifesto with careful interest to see how he will bring this forward. However, a breeding campaign seemed to be the solution that he was most fondly advocating. Mr Weir mentioned the changing patterns in school numbers, and stated that the status quo was not an option. He also said that educational sustainability was the most important issue to consider.

That is a brief summary of what I heard this morning in what was an important debate. Prof Bain made important points, and they are worthy of consideration in the longer term. It is likely that it will be a lengthy transition, and political considerations will impact on whether the recommendations of the Bain Report are looked at by a new Assembly and re-formed Executive or by direct rule Ministers under RPA and the new educational arrangements. The issues at stake are the future management of schools, the potential pooling and sharing of resources, and issues in the urban and rural communities.

The Bain Report is, at best, a starting point, but it will require full and careful consideration and consultation, and I hope that parties here will make a full input to that. In the event that the Assembly survives and we have the opportunity to do the work that we have been elected to do, it will be a mark of Members' maturity and the maturity of any new Assembly to give practical expression to the report and also retain public support from parents, teachers and pupils.

That is a challenge that faces us all. I hope that Members can rise to it, and I commend the motion to the House.

Question, That the amendment be made, put and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly notes the recommendations made by Professor Sir George Bain in the Report of the Independent Strategic Review of Education and calls on the Minister for Education to defer any decisions on the Report until the Northern Ireland Assembly is restored; and in the meantime, to work with all of the education providers to develop a draft sustainable schools' policy for consideration by the restored Assembly.

Madam Speaker: I shall give Members a few moments, after which we will move on to the next item of business.

Equality Commission

Madam Speaker: Order. The Business Committee has agreed to allow two and a half hours for this debate. The Member moving the motion will have 15 minutes to speak and there will be 15 minutes for the winding-up speech. All other Members who wish to speak will have a maximum of 10 minutes.

Three amendments have been selected and published on the Marshalled List. The amendments will be moved in the order in which they appear on the Marshalled List, which reflects the order in which, if they were agreed to, they would stand in the resolution. When the debate has concluded, I shall put the Question on amendment No 1. If amendment No 1 is made, amendments No 2 and No 3 will fall. If amendment No 1 is not made, I shall put the Question on amendment No 2. If amendment No 2 is made, amendment No 3 will fall. If amendment No 2 is not made, I shall put the Question on amendment No 3.

If that is clear — [Laughter.] Members will understand as we go on. I shall proceed.

Mr Campbell: I beg to move

That this Assembly notes the recent publication by the Equality Commission of its Annual Monitoring Report on the Northern Ireland workforce, and calls on the Commission to investigate trends in recruitment, particularly in the public sector, in order to ensure that the workforce being recruited is a reasonable reflection of the working age population in Northern Ireland.

This debate is on one of the most relevant and important of all aspects of life in Northern Ireland today. The reason that the motion mentions the public sector specifically is that over 60% of our entire workforce is employed in the sector, making it far and away the largest employer in the country. I hope that this debate does not turn into various declarations of under-representation in one part of Northern Ireland being countered by another.

The essence of the motion relates to trends in recruitment, particularly in the public sector. I hope that that will mean that we can avoid repetitive worn out clichés regarding past alleged disparities when there were no equality or fair employment guidelines or legislation — now we have one of the most tightly regulated and monitored workforces in Europe.

If there is under-representation in such a highly regulated regime — and I will demonstrate that there is — serious questions must be asked and changes made to resolve the problem. The Equality Commission is the statutory agency responsible for overseeing that. The Fair Employment (Northern Ireland) Act 1989 introduced compulsory workforce monitoring, which means that the Equality Commission publishes the annual returns of all public and private sector firms in a document.

The current one is entitled ‘Monitoring Report No. 16 A Profile of the Northern Ireland Workforce’.

Some Members have quoted figures for the numbers employed by a particular firm to deflect attention from under-representation — and I note that at least one amendment does so. However, the DUP’s motion draws attention to current recruitment practice.

The SDLP’s amendment also avoids issues relating to recent recruitment. Therefore, the DUP will oppose that amendment, but will support the Ulster Unionist Party’s amendment. The overall workforce includes those who were recruited decades ago, many of whom are about to retire. The Equality Commission keeps defending its abysmal record by using the changing patterns of the working-age population and of the workforce to counter the charges made by those of us who represent a community that feels badly let down by current recruitment practices. The Equality Commission frequently mentions that those who have retired from the public sector are predominantly Protestant, whereas the breakdown of those being recruited is more of a mix between Protestants and Catholics. However, that misses the point. No one disputes the religious breakdown of those who are retiring, and no allegations have been made about why that is the case. The core of the matter is what is happening at the entrance to, not the exit from, employment.

Slightly more than 50% of the working-age population in Northern Ireland is Protestant. If there is equality of opportunity and an absence of chill factors, there should be a broadly similar ratio of Protestants being recruited to the public sector across Northern Ireland. That brings me to the security-related sector, which employs more than 17,000 people. There was, and remains, a chill factor that was not created by anything that the employers did, but by what the terrorists did. Intimidation of those who want to join the police is the ultimate chill factor.

The DUP looks forward to when those who used to carry out the intimidation, and much worse, hand over those who are now carrying out acts of intimidation and committing other illegal acts. The number of Roman Catholics who are joining the police force is increasing. However, there would be some such increase even if the state did not discriminate against Protestants to achieve it. The under-representation in the security-related field is the fault of violent republicans, not the State.

Despite intimidation, the recruitment picture for Catholics in the security-related field is improving. On the other hand, the recruitment picture for Protestants in the Northern Ireland Housing Executive (NIHE) is worsening. The figures that I obtained through Parliament several months ago show that only 34.7% of those recruited to NIHE in the past year were Protestants, which is less than the figure for five years ago. That makes the Equality Commission guilty in the eyes of many Protestants. It, and the agencies that preceded it, have concentrated on addressing areas in which Catholics have been under-represented, but where the figures have been steadily improving. They have not done likewise in areas where Protestants have been under-represented.

That under-representation is getting worse. Republican and nationalist public representatives are also guilty of that charge. They have consistently complained that there is an imbalance in the ranks of the Senior Civil Service. They are right: there is. However, recruitment to the Senior Civil Service is rapidly improving, with more Catholics being employed in that small sector of 200 staff.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Molloy] in the Chair)

2.30 pm

However, in the general grades in that same Civil Service, there is an under-representation of Protestants that is not improving. That is in a sector of 20,000 employees. Those who build a political platform under the banner of equality draw attention to a section of the Civil Service where 200 people are employed and Catholic under-representation is improving, yet studiously ignore another part that employs 100 times more people and where Protestant under-representation is getting worse. Those people still maintain the banner of equality over their platform. The word "hypocrisy" is best used to describe that platform.

There are a number of other areas, such as the Child Support Agency and a plethora of localised problem areas, where similar situations prevail. Of course, the ineffective and inactive Equality Commission hovers in the background. I do not wish to pursue localised problems at this juncture, although I hope that there will be another opportunity for us to do so in a future debate, if the matter is not resolved in the interim.

The Equality Commission must begin to establish the trends that are occurring in recruitment, report them to Government and put them in the public domain. The commission must then outline an ongoing plan to deal with any significant under-representation that it has uncovered. I hope that all democrats agree that, if there are varying degrees of under-representation, the area where under-representation is getting worse should be tackled before concentrating on the area where under-representation is improving. Logic would seem to drive us to that conclusion.

The facts, and the Equality Commission's plans to finally deal with those problem areas, should be put in the public domain. Some of us have been highlighting the problems for more than 20 years. The situation has not arisen overnight; it has been in the public domain since the late 1970s, yet the Equality Commission does not seem to want to deal with the facts as it finds them as much as some of us who elaborate on them.

Once the facts and the Equality Commission's plans to deal with the problems are in the public domain, the wider community can begin to have confidence that the merit principle and equity will be the guiding lights to careers, particularly in the public sector — not the officially sponsored discrimination that currently exists in the police and the unofficial disadvantage in the areas that I have outlined. Those guiding lights will provide the basis on which a public sector in which everyone can have confidence can be built, and to which people in every section of our community believe that they can apply and be confident that they will be recruited on merit.

Mrs D Kelly: I beg to move amendment No 1: Leave out from "calls" to "order" and insert:

"welcomes its continuing analysis of trends in recruitment and its work".

Complaints of religious discrimination in employment, alongside issues such as housing, electoral arrangements and policing, were a recurring theme during the devolved Government at Stormont from 1921 to 1972. It was on many of those issues, and the principles therein, that the SDLP was formed and on which it has fought for equality to be embedded in society over the past 30 years. The SDLP is not embarrassed by equality, but believes in equality for all.

The SDLP welcomes the work of the Equality Commission. Its 2005 monitoring report showed the extent of progress since effective fair employment laws were introduced in the North in 1989 — 21 years after the civil rights movement highlighted systemic discrimination. Thanks to effective fair employment laws and many other reforms, the Catholic share of the monitored workforce is 43%, but a gap still remains, with the Catholic share of the economically active estimated at 45.4% in 2004.

The work of our fair employment laws is not yet finished. Despite progress, we have still not closed the gap between what is and what ought to be. Catholics are still more likely to experience unemployment, with the 2001 census putting that figure at 1.7 times more likely. However, that is an improvement on 1971, when Catholics were 2.5 times more likely to be unemployed. Thankfully, unemployment is reaching record lows. However, that differential must be taken seriously, and the commitment made in the Good Friday Agreement to its elimination must be honoured.

There are serious differentials in economic inactivity, as well as unemployment. Catholics are more likely to be economically inactive — a particular concern when one considers the findings of an excellent report by the Committee on the Administration of Justice that found that there were far more people who were economically inactive, but who would like to work, than there were people who were unemployed.

The gap between what is and what ought to be has not yet been closed. We should not pretend that equality laws alone can close that gap. Tackling differentials in unemployment and economic inactivity requires clear and coherent socio-economic strategies, of which the direct-rule Administration has none.

TSN was the Government's policy for explicitly reducing differentials, and New TSN retained a heavy emphasis on that effort. However, the Government's new anti-poverty strategy barely touches on that matter. The Government have no strategy papers on how they intend to realise their commitment to eliminate differentials, as set out in the agreement, and that is another reason for ending direct rule.

Thankfully, the Equality Commission is not so lax and has done good work in its area of responsibility, which is ensuring fair participation in the workforce. The public and private sectors have changed remarkably since the 1980s; both are now far more reflective of the community as a whole in the North. However, more must be done.

Catholics comprise over 30% of the Senior Civil Service — not 5%, as it was in 1985 — but that figure is a long way from where it should be. The same problem appears at higher levels in the Civil Service, excluding the Senior Civil Service, even in areas where Catholics are over-represented at lower levels, such as health and education. Catholics remain seriously under-represented in security occupations — at only 12.5%. While the PSNI is making fast progress, other areas such as the Prison Service, which remains almost 90% Protestant, have made none at all.

Mr Campbell referred to the Police Service and the impact of terrorist activity in the past. Nuala O'Loan's report on the investigation into the death of Raymond McCord was published today, and I did not see any unionist representation at its launch. That shows why many Catholics did not join the police.

Lord Morrow: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker, what is the relevance of Mrs Kelly's last point to today's discussion? That goes over my head. The Member should keep to the motion.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I do not accept that that was a point of order. However, I am sure that Mrs Kelly will elaborate.

Mrs D Kelly: I did not introduce the issue of why Catholics did not join the RUC. That was the Member who spoke previously, Mr Campbell.

There is an emerging under-representation of Protestants in some parts of the public sector — especially in health and education — and that must also be tackled. The DUP's motion singles out the public sector. However, future growth will be in the private sector, where Catholics are less well represented. People working in areas such as health and education face voluntary redundancies and are threatened with potential lay-offs as a result of the review of public administration.

That is not to say that under-representation of Protestants in those areas is not serious. However, it would be wrong to single out the public sector and to exclude under-representation of Catholics in many private sector areas.

It is also wrong to suggest that the Equality Commission is not already working on fair participation in the public sector. That is why the SDLP is proposing the amendment; I hope that the DUP will accept it and realise the good work being done by the Equality Commission, instead of occasionally bashing them. Mr Deputy Speaker, I move the amendment.

Mr Nesbitt: I beg to move amendment No 2: Leave out all after "recruitment" and insert:

"... both for a substantial period in the public sector and recently in the private sector, in order to establish if appointments have favoured one section of the community and, if necessary, to take and/or recommend appropriate action."

Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. I also thank Mr Campbell for accepting the amendment as a composite motion. He complements much of what I have to say.

Page 1, paragraph 3 of the Agreement reached at St Andrews between the two Governments states a commitment:

"for equality and human rights at the heart of the new dispensation in Northern Ireland."

I often hear Sinn Féin, SDLP and those from the nationalist community referring to the importance of equality. Well, there is a little bit of history surrounding today's topic of monitoring. One has to go back to the Fair Employment (Northern Ireland) Act 1989 to see where the monitoring came from. It came from the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights (SACHR) report of 1987, which said that if there were a belief that there was discrimination, there should be monitoring of applicants or people seeking jobs and monitoring of the overall employment proportion.

That is where the monitoring actually came from: a belief in discrimination. Indeed, not satisfied that discrimination was gone in a sense, the SACHR report of 1997 further proposed more strenuous measures, indeed the strongest in Europe, for any legislative basis for equality.

Indeed, the SACHR report charged the then Fair Employment Commission to draw up benchmarks for the reduction in the unemployment differential to be dealt with. Dolores has mentioned the unemployment differential; that was brought up eight years ago.

So there is the derivation of all the law — 1989 and 1997. When we look at the Equality Commission in the context of those monitoring reports, we see that it has a clear legislative obligation to do what it has not done. It has ducked and weaved and avoided certain responsibilities, as Mr Campbell said.

Schedule 8 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 makes it very clear that the Commission is to have accounts. Those accounts are to include a financial memorandum, which is to include a corporate plan containing measures of performance in achieving its objectives.

Furthermore, schedule 9 of the 1998 Act said that it should be effectively reviewing section 75 of that Act. Article 8 of the Fair Employment and Treatment (Northern Ireland) Order 1998, said that it should, as it were, disseminate information about what it was about.

There is a clear legislative responsibility for the Equality Commission to address what is viewed as the central concerns: combating discrimination and providing equality of opportunity. That should be measured by the Equality Commission. The fundamental question is: has it been addressing those concerns? One looks at the monitoring returns, and that narrative really gives the facts in another guise. We get the overall position, but the issues that are seemingly pointed up as a problem are not addressed.

Even the unemployment differential that the SDLP person has just mentioned: eight years ago benchmarks were to be drawn up — none have been drawn up. I note that in the return he forwarded to the latest monitoring round, the Chief Commissioner said that the unemployment differential “is or could be” a measure of the lack of equality of opportunity. He is raising the old chestnut again about the unemployment differential, which we may come back to.

Then there was a fair employment report in May 2004; again the Equality Commission ducked the issue on certain aspects that are in the motion. A group of Scottish economists, DTZ Piedad Consulting, was paid £110,000 to deal with issues of equality of opportunity.

On behalf of my party, I made a strong representation to that group. We met for five hours. However, I noticed that in their report the issue addressed by Mr Campbell's motion had been avoided again. I was misled by the Government on that issue.

2.45 pm

Look at the annual report of the Equality Commission for 2004-05, released in February 2006. One reads on page 28 that one of the key strategic objectives of the commission is:

“to combat discrimination and to promote equality of opportunity”.

However, in the body of the report there is no indication as to whether discrimination has been combated. The statistics that are available are not used to assess that issue.

The commission's latest report was produced in November 2006. It might be called the “traffic light” report. It is good; I commend it. Against each performance measure it has a green, amber or red light: green if the target has been met, amber if it has been partially met and red if it has not been met at all. Where does the first red light come up as you flick through the book? It comes up at the statement that the Equality Commission has not been able to establish new performance measures to determine whether there has been discrimination or equality of opportunity.

That brings me to the commission's annual monitoring report. It is important to take note of the data. The report states that the proportion of Roman Catholic appointees is greater than the Roman Catholic proportion of the employee workforce — as it should be. However, it is cautious about the fundamental point that I wish to address: comparing the proportion of applicants with the proportion of appointees. The Equality Commission, the Government, the research agencies and anything else that I have had contact with resolutely refuse to address that. It is the elephant in the room that is being ignored.

The commission says that caution is required because there is overlap between applicants and appointees. One might apply for a job this year, but not be appointed until next year. However, even if that applies to a large amount of people, the point is not statistically relevant.

The problem is that we have a lot of legislation and much rhetoric as to whether there is equality of opportunity or discrimination. In the debate last week there was much talk of disadvantage. Research shows that a key indicator of disadvantage is whether the subject has a job. An important way of getting work is to apply for a job and be successful. However, if you apply, are you appointed?

Comparing the number of applicants with the number of appointments is fundamental to determining whether there is equality of opportunity, yet it is not done. Members who sat on the Committee on the Preparation for Government know that I have put before the SDLP and Sinn Féin a document that explains that. I have asked to meet them, but I have still to receive a response.

The data shows that, generally speaking, for eight out of the past 10 years, a greater proportion of Roman Catholics were appointed in the public sector than one might expect from the number of applicants. That can be demonstrated statistically, using a model provided by the Civil Service. Even more striking and important is the fact that, in the past two years, the private sector has also seen a greater proportion of Catholics appointed than one might expect. In other words there is a clear trend.

I do not say that there is discrimination. Indeed, the answer might be that the Catholics are better qualified than the Protestants and should, therefore, get the jobs. However, where trends are identified in data, they should be examined. Over eight of the past 10 years in the public sector, and over the past two years in the private sector, the trends show that more Catholics have been appointed than would have been expected. In other words, there is a favourable disposition towards one side of the community as compared with another. My amendment seeks to address that situation — and nothing more than that.

Ms Ruane: I beg to move amendment No 3: Leave out from “particularity” to “sector” and insert:

“and overall composition across all levels and grades in both the public and private sectors”

Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Tá mé ag dul a labhairt ar son an leasaithe.

Ar dtús báire, gabhaim buíochas leis an DUP as ucht an díospóireacht thábhachtach seo a thabhairt chun tosaigh: déileálann sí ní amháin leis an chomhionannas ach leis an Choimisiún Comhionannais.

B'fhéidir go gcloisfimid ón DUP i rith dhíospóireacht an lae inniu tiomantas — nó rún fiú amháin — cumhacht a roinnt le náisiúnaithe agus le poblachtanaigh ar bhonn comhionannais. B'fhéidir go gcloisfimid aontachtaíthe ag admháil gur cuireadh na sé Chontae ar bun mar stát Prostastúnach do mhuintir Phrotastúnach agus gur cothaíodh an stát sin trí leatrom córasch i gcoinne Caitliceach, agus go háirithe i gcoinne náisiúnaithe.

I thank the Members opposite for the equality that they have shown to the native language of Ireland.
[Interruption.] Does the Member wish to make a point?

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: It is already made.

Ms Ruane: I thank the DUP for tabling the motion on equality and the Equality Commission. Perhaps during the course of the debate we will hear a commitment and an intention from the DUP to share power with nationalists and republicans on the basis of equality. Perhaps we will hear an acceptance and an acknowledgement from unionists that the Six Counties were developed as a Protestant state for a Protestant people; that they were built and maintained by systematic discrimination against Catholics —

Mr Nesbitt: May I make a point of order?

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. A number of requests have been made to Madam Speaker in relation to order in the Chamber when Members are speaking, and particularly when female Members are speaking. Everyone will have an opportunity to contribute to the debate, and all are entitled to be listened to. I ask

Members to listen to the speeches and make their comments while maintaining good order in the Chamber.

Ms Ruane: Perhaps we will reach agreement on a comprehensive anti-poverty strategy that targets resources and intervenes positively and proactively for the most vulnerable in society, based on objective need, and objective need alone. Then again, perhaps anti-agreement unionism is still unable and unwilling to accept responsibility for discrimination.

We all need to show political leadership, and that means empowering communities — all communities, whether they are working-class communities on the Shankill, the Falls, Derry, Downpatrick or Kilkeel. However, my concern about the narrowness of the DUP's motion is not that they have been converted to the equality agenda, or, indeed, to any belief in the need for greater resources and powers for the Equality Commission. My concern is that the motivation for the narrowness of the motion is sectarian in itself.

Mr Storey: If the party opposite is so concerned about equality and has become converted to it, will the Member tell the House what equality there was in the murderous campaign that the IRA, in its 2005 statement, said was entirely legitimate? A Member from her party said that the murder of Jean McConville was not a criminal act. Where was the equality in those instances?

Ms Ruane: I was going to say that we had started a direct dialogue, but I will continue with the debate.
[Interruption.]

Mr Hay: Answer the question.

Ms Ruane: It is part of a broader attempt to turn the situation on its head.

It is also a rejection of the unemployment differential, which highlights the deep-seated and ongoing employment differences that exist between the communities. That statistic has remained pretty much unchanged, despite decades of fair employment legislation.

However, in order to ensure equality, it is necessary that a fuller investigation takes place, not just of all levels and grades of the public sector, but of the overall composition of the private-sector workforce. That should include an investigation of its recruitment process, promotions and salaries. It is important that we investigate and analyse more deeply all sectors instead of concentrating on recruitment. That will enable us to identify the problems clearly, and, hopefully, we can respond proactively to tackle them.

Child poverty was mentioned earlier, but I thank Sammy Wilson for giving us some particularly important information on it — go raibh maith agat, a Shammy; maith thú. A parliamentary question that Sammy Wilson asked revealed that, in the North, in the year ending 2005, 40,800 Protestant children, 60,600 Catholic children and 5,900 children from other religious backgrounds were experiencing poverty. Those figures add up to over 100,000 children. It is interesting to note that in 2004, comparable statistics revealed that 41,300 Protestant children, 58,500 Catholic children and 5,100 children from other religious backgrounds were experiencing poverty. Therefore in 2004-05 the number of Protestant children who were experiencing poverty decreased while there was an increase in the number of Catholic children and those from other religious backgrounds who were living with poverty. No one should want to play politics with poverty, not least with child poverty. That is the reason that it is valid to argue for a wider, proper and non-sectarian investigation into the composition of the workforce.

Sinn Féin welcomes the reduction in poverty that Protestant children have experienced. No child should live in poverty. Our job is to eradicate it from this island for good. We need to eradicate poverty from the life of every child, not just some children. Indeed, if the Members on the opposite Benches reject this amendment, on some level that is tantamount to their saying that, as unionists, they are afraid to share power that is based on equality. Sinn Féin has been at the forefront of the challenge to eradicate all forms of discrimination since the foundation of the Northern statelet. The days when Catholics were denied the right to vote, to housing and to employment are over. There can be no more second-class citizens. I know that some unionists in the Chamber want to use the politics of fear against their own people. However, I make it clear that Sinn Féin and republicans have no desire to do to unionists what the unionist establishment did to us.

Although people's lives have changed —
[Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order.

Ms Ruane: Although people's lives have changed as a result of the peace process, there is still a considerable distance to travel and a number of barriers to overcome before equality can be achieved. At the heart of Sinn Féin's commitment to equality is the belief that poverty, discrimination and marginalisation must be challenged and eradicated. That is why we put an effective anti-poverty strategy that is based on objective need at the heart of our recent negotiations in St Andrews. The problem of discrimination against Irish nationalists and Catholics in the North of Ireland has not gone away. It demands affirmative action. Disadvantage must be identified, and resources must be directed to reduce it so that people experience equality. There must also be recognition of the fact that particular groups suffer as a result of structural and endemic inequalities that arise as a result of the nature of their society.

The benchmark of the success of anti-discrimination legislation is the difference that it makes to people's lives. We are a long way from achieving an end to the discrimination from which many sectors of our society suffer; we are a long way from achieving equality of opportunity and outcome. In essence, the problem still remains: the Northern state was founded on and maintained by inequality and discrimination. More than 35 years after the civil rights movement launched its campaign to highlight the nature of the state's structural discrimination in housing, voting and jobs, those issues remain at the core of sustained inequalities, which, in the main, continue to detrimentally affect the nationalist community.

3.00 pm

Thirty-five years on, according to the latest statistics, nationalists are more likely to suffer from poverty; less likely to be in employment; more likely to be unemployed; more likely to be among the long-term unemployed; at greater risk of living in lower-income households; and at greater risk of experiencing multiple deprivation. There are a greater number of Catholics on housing waiting lists, and Catholics —
[Interruption.]

There is no need to be a misogynist. Equality for women is part of the equality agenda; perhaps it would be good for the DUP to learn that.

Catholics will also spend on average one and a half times as long on the housing list as Protestants.

We just need to look at high-level strategies and inward investment. In key areas of Government policy, the failure to make equality the benchmark means that inequality continues. There is a great imbalance in assistance within Belfast, west of the Bann and in border areas.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Please draw your remarks to a close.

Ms Ruane: Over the past few months, I have listened to excuse after excuse about how high-level policies cannot be equality-impact assessed and been told in the most patronising way that the programmes that come out of the strategies are equality-impact assessed. Frankly, we find that insulting. Let us test the DUP's new-found selective concern about equality.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Time is up. I am sorry about all of those interruptions, but that is the situation.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. I was rather surprised at the remarks you made about the House not giving fair play to females. As the leader of the largest party in the House, I would like to know who made that objection and where the evidence is for it.

Mr Deputy Speaker: A number of the Whips, including from the Member's party, put forward objections to the Speaker about order in the Chamber.

Madam Speaker asked for co-operation from the Whips to ensure that there would be good order and proper decorum in relation to Members speaking in the Chamber.

Lord Morrow: Further to that point of order. When I brought this matter to the attention of the House, I was referring to the fact that Members opposite were on their feet when Madam Speaker was addressing the House. As a matter of fact, the point raised this morning related to Mr McElduff — who was never a female Member. I repudiate the idea that there are constant attacks whenever female Members are speaking.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The matter discussed by the Business Committee related to all Members, and to female Members in particular, who tend to come under particular attack from some Members in the Chamber. Good order in the Chamber applies to all Members.

Mr Campbell: Further to that point of order. Is it not the case in this debate that the only Members who have spoken against the motion have been female? No male Members have been speaking against the motion so far.

Ms Ruane: That does not make it right.

Mr Campbell: So it is OK to barrack males and not females?

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. Members from all parties will be speaking in the debate. I ask for respect for all Members, regardless of which party they come from or whether they are male or female.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Further to that point of order. As the matter was discussed outside the House, will the Deputy Speaker talk to Madam Speaker and ask her to inform Members as to what took place? Members are entitled to be informed about the matter in the House, not when some other Member does not like the asides that are being made to her.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The matter will be discussed through the usual channels. The Business Committee will discuss the matter further tomorrow or on Wednesday.

Mrs Foster: I look forward to having the same protection that you afforded to the Member who has just finished her speech, Mr Deputy Speaker. I find it very difficult to take lectures from Sinn Féin about equality, when, at the age of eight, I was forced out of my home by republican terrorism. We have heard a lot today about a Protestant state for a Protestant people. Of course, that is contextualised by the fact that at the same time there was a Catholic state for a Catholic people in the Republic of Ireland, and we know from our Protestant colleagues across the border what they suffered throughout the years.

I want to respond to a point that was made by the SDLP Member for Upper Bann. She told the House that 45% of the workforce is Roman Catholic, and I take her word for that. However, perhaps she could explain why, in the past year, 51·8% of those appointed to the Northern Ireland Civil Service were Roman Catholics, along with 49·3% to the Child Support Agency and 55·3% to the Housing Executive? Those are startling figures, which indicate to me that there are huge difficulties in this area, especially in relation to the Equality Commission.

Although this is a separate issue, this point must go on record: the Equality Commission takes on cases and drops them at the last hurdle. Many people who come to our offices have had cases taken up by the Equality Commission and have been left hanging at the end of the process.

Some Members have referred to public sector bodies west of the Bann. I only wish that they would look at the statistics for Protestants in those bodies. They would see that the numbers are at a low ebb, especially in the health sector.

Recently, a number of my constituents have come to me for advice on systematic harassment and bullying in a public body west of the Bann. If they take their concerns through the appropriate channels, the bully boys in that organisation target them even more on a sectarian basis. Several of my colleagues have been approached by their constituents also. Indeed, some of those who have come to us have suffered ill health, and, unfortunately, in one case, a gentleman endured a breakdown.

Where should these people go? They are not listened to internally by the public body or, indeed, by the Equality Commission, and the reason given is that they need witnesses. Often, however, discrimination is insidious and hidden and carried out purposely when no one else is around. When one person complains, I take notice. When two people come to me from the same public authority, I wonder whether something is going on. However, when 10 people come to my office, with complaints of harassment and bullying about one Government agency based in one area, I have to say: “res ipsa loquitur” — the facts speak for themselves.

In cases such as this, the composite nature of the complaints should start alarm bells ringing in Government and, especially, in the Equality Commission, which has a statutory duty to promote good relations. Even if the Equality Commission does not accept the cases that I have mentioned as being discrimination, it has a statutory function to promote good relations and it is not doing so. In addition, the monitoring returns that go to the Equality Commission do not show why people leave employment. Quite a few people, I would say, leave employment because they are pushed out.

Over the past year, while looking into this issue, I have seen many equality strategies. However, if they are not implemented throughout that organisation, they are not worth the paper on which they are written. Indeed, many cases that have been brought to me state that the job criteria were written to favour one person in particular, and there is nothing that Protestants can do about that when they do not get the jobs.

I want to end by referring to the comments — and I have a right to respond to comments — that the SDLP Member for Upper Bann made about “the former RUC”, as she called it. She made sweeping remarks about collusion. Of course, the SDLP would say that collusion took place: Nuala O’Loan has said that it did, and anything that she has to say is all right.

The SDLP Member for Upper Bann has perpetuated the nationalist myth of systemic collusion. If there is evidence about individual officers committing illegal acts, let us have their names; let us have them prosecuted. Members should be certain that the RUC officers who worked tirelessly over the years do not wish the name of the RUC to be brought down to the gutter by the actions of a couple of officers. If their names are known, let us have them. However, she does not have an evidential basis for making those remarks. They are allegations, and she should acknowledge that.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Ms Stanton: A LeasCheann Comhairle, I support amendment No 3. Its purpose is to ensure, first, that investigation into employment trends is not restricted to the public sector but includes the private sector, and, secondly, that monitoring considers overall staff composition not only at recruitment stage but takes account of promotions and salaries.

The sixteenth Fair Employment Monitoring Report’s analysis of monitoring returns submitted by 121 public bodies and 4,117 private-sector employers found that the monitored workforce totalled almost 518,000 in 2005. That is an increase of 22,000 from 2004. The composition of the monitored workforce was 57% Protestant and 43% Catholic. The number of Protestant and Catholic employees increased overall, with an increase of 0·7% in the Roman Catholic share of the monitored workforce. Private-sector employment levels rose by 5·2% during 2005.

From statistical evidence that has been produced over the years, we all know that the continuing decline in the manufacturing industry has affected Protestants notably. Evidence also shows that public-sector employment rose by 3·2% and that the Catholic share in that sector grew by 0·7%. The part-time workforce increased by 7·2%, and females accounted for 51·8% of all monitored employees. A comparison of the same sections of the monitored workforce in 1990 and 2005 shows that the Catholic share has increased by a mere 7·3%.
