Looking at the public sector alone, its recruitment stage is working reasonably well, but many problems remain with its composition, largely as a result of the legacy of previous practices. For example, the latest monitoring report shows that only 9·5% of staff in Castlereagh Borough Council are Catholic.

It is strange that the DUP focuses on recruitment in the public sector, given that, of 24,557 public-sector appointments that were made in 2005, there was a fall of 5·5% on the figures for 2004. The number of Protestant appointees dropped by 6%, while the number of Catholic appointees dropped by 6·7%. Those factors led to an increase of 0·1% in the Protestant share of public-sector appointments to 50·2% overall.

Between 2004 and 2005, overall full-time public-sector employment rose by 2·5% from 156,841 to 160,737, which is an increase of 3,896 employees. That new total consists of 86,669 Protestants, 66,273 Catholics and 7,795 employees of non-determined community. The community composition of full-time public-sector employees, excluding those who were non-determined, was 56·7% Protestant and 43·3% Roman Catholic. In 1990, Roman Catholic full-time representation was 35·3%.

The public sector comprises five main sectors: health, which employs 34·9% of all public-sector full-time employees; the Civil Service, which employs 25·6%; the education sector employs 14%; security-related employment accounts for 10·2%; and district councils employ 5·7%. Sinn Féin wants a broader investigation that will consider all sectors, not only the public sector and recruitment. Such an overall investigation should include promotions, for example.

In the private sector, only those companies with 251 or more employees are monitored for promotion statistics. A total of 3,530 monitored employees were promoted in 2005, representing an increase of 13·7% on 2004. Of those, 57·2% were Protestant and 42·8% were Catholic. In the overall workforce, there was a net rise of 2·4% in the number of monitored Protestant employees; among Roman Catholics, the net increase was 5·5%. Combined, those factors produce a 0·7% increase in the Roman Catholic share from 42·3% in 2004 to 43% in 2005.

I support amendment No 3, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

3.15 pm

Mr O’Dowd: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

I was expecting a few more contributions before my own, but I accept that as there are several amendments, three or four people will be making winding-up speeches, so time is short.

The proposer of the motion started his contribution to the debate by saying — and I paraphrase — that he hoped that the debate would not turn into a counter-argument on discrimination, that parties would not fight their own corners or throw figures back and forth at one another about who was discriminated against. Lo and behold, he then entered into a raft of allegations of discrimination against the Protestant community.

Lord Morrow: Are they not true?

Mr O'Dowd: I am not denying that any of the allegations are true. I am saying that perhaps the debate today should be about whether we can agree that discrimination is wrong, regardless of what quarter it comes from. The DUP and the Ulster Unionist Party will have to remember that they opposed every piece of legislation that was fought for down the years, largely by the nationalist community.

At one stage, youse claimed that discrimination did not take place in this part of Ireland — but you meant that discrimination against the nationalist community did not take place. Now you have realised that there may be some discrimination against the Protestant community, and you are demanding that that be rectified. Youse are absolutely right, but where youse miss out on your argument is —

Mr N Dodds: On a point of order. Every time that the Member refers to “you” and, as he puts it, “youse”, he is of course referring to the Chair. I do not know whether the Chair agrees with his allegations. Certainly, however, the Member should be corrected.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I remind the Member to address his remarks through the Chair.

Mr O'Dowd: I am always keen to learn something from Nigel Dodds. His opinion is always of value to me, as I am sure it is to the DUP executive.

Those on the Benches opposite, and their forefathers etc, opposed all anti-discrimination legislation and continued to do so right up until this summer in the Preparation for Government Committee. When that Committee was discussing equality, discrimination, etc, Sinn Féin put forward several proposals to enhance the powers of the Equality Commission, which may have actually helped in relation to the cases Arlene Foster mentioned earlier. Each proposal was met with a resounding no from the DUP. How does the DUP propose to ensure that discrimination, no matter by whom, and upon whom, it is inflicted, is eradicated? As each demand comes forward from those involved in equality and anti-discrimination work, the DUP says no. I know that it is the party's favourite word, but if it wants to end discrimination, it must adopt those measures. Sinn Féin — [Interruption.]

I am coming to policing, trust me. [Laughter.] I would not have risen, a LeasCheann Comhairle, if I was not going to speak about it. Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

Last week, in the Chamber, we debated under-attainment in education, and some Members opposite referred to statistics, such as 27% of young Protestant males leaving school without any qualifications — or perhaps with only one. If Gregory Campbell's figures are correct for people entering the public sector, they speak volumes about why we cannot ensure that young Protestant people are coming up through public organisations. That day, some Members from the Benches opposite referred to the need for an independent report into why that was the case. Surely this is again an example of why we need an independent report.

Sinn Féin is prepared to work with the DUP and the other parties in the Chamber to eradicate discrimination from the face of society. Everyone should have the right to go forward and earn a living in their respective places of work. There is no point in simply saying no to every amendment or proposal that a political party makes to enhance the powers of the Equality Commission, the setting up of which the DUP also opposed. It opposed section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 too.

No matter how many times we have explained that section 75 and the equality legislation is a double-edged sword and that the DUP should promote its use by its own community, that party still opposes it.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: The Member is going back into history. During a debate in this House in the old Stormont, it was the Democratic Unionist Party that fought for the Mater Hospital. To come more up to date, in this Assembly, it was the DUP that got a special debate in order that we might put the view that there must be fairness for all and not just for one section of the community. The Member, however, has condemned that and said that we have never done anything of the sort.

Mr O'Dowd: I welcome the contribution from Dr Paisley. I have not at any stage in this debate accused any of the unionist parties of blanket discrimination. What I am saying is that they have always opposed any anti-discrimination measures that have been introduced, from the civil rights movement onwards. I have no doubt that in certain cases there is discrimination against the Protestant and unionist community, and I condemn that. However, if the legislation is not in place to correct that, how do the Members opposite propose that we remove discrimination from society? Proposals put forward by Sinn Féin in the Preparation for Government Committee last summer were met with a resounding no.

In earlier remarks, a LeasCheann Comhairle — and, as this is a winding-up speech, I would like some time to address these points — about policing and the reasons that Catholics did not join the old RUC, the adage came up that they did not join because of armed actions by the IRA. It would be more the case that they did not join the RUC because they had no wish to be associated with their oppressors. If that were taken on board, the reality of the situation would become clear. Nuala O'Loan's report today outlines why young nationalists and republicans would not wish to be involved.

We have heard from the Benches opposite, a LeasCheann Comhairle, about the need for Sinn Féin to support the structures of law and order. To the best of my knowledge, the Ombudsman's Office is such a structure, but today every unionist politician who mentioned the publication of the report condemned it as a vindictive campaign by Mrs O'Loan. I would have thought that it would have been the duty of the defenders of law and order on the opposite Benches to demand that the truth of the allegations contained in Nuala O'Loan's report be brought before a judicial system and that those guilty of the heinous crimes referred to in the report be dealt with properly. [Interruption.]

A LeasCheann Comhairle, I hope that they do ask for it. I have been listening to the radio all morning as I was preparing other work, and I have yet to hear any unionist politicians say that. That is why it is so difficult for republicans to take lectures from them on law and order; they are not qualified to give the lecture.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: The Ombudsman admits that she does not have the evidence, yet the hon Gentleman is trying to say that we should be blamed for that. That is not fair play; that is pure acceptance of one person's statement. Does the hon Gentleman not believe that people who make allegations should be asked to prove them?

Mrs D Kelly: The reason that Mrs O'Loan does not have the full evidence available to her is that the evidence against those who committed crimes was systematically destroyed.

Mr O'Dowd: I am grateful to both Members for their contributions. I hope that Dr Paisley remembers the remarks that he has directed at me in the Chamber. Many allegations have been levelled at Sinn Féin without any evidence. What about those in the RUC and the PSNI who have destroyed evidence and obstructed the course of justice? I am not a lawyer, but I know that there are a number of barristers on the opposite Benches, and, as far as I am aware, obstruction of justice is a crime.

Ms Ruane: Does Dr Paisley support Raymond McCord's call for an independent inquiry, given the shameful way that he has been treated?

Mr O'Dowd: If we can come out of the Chamber today agreeing on one thing — that we are all opposed to discrimination — the next move is to go forward collectively and put in place proper legislation to remove discrimination.

Mr Nesbitt: I try to base my comments on evidence rather than emotion — on what the data say or do not say. I will comment on what Members have said, primarily those from Sinn Féin and the SDLP.

Mrs Kelly said that the gap between those available to work and those in work is greater than ever. I ask the SDLP spokesperson to read the footnote on page 3 of the Equality Commission's 'Fair Employment Monitoring Report No. 16 - A Profile of the Northern Ireland Workforce', which states clearly that such comparisons cannot be made. They are not made on the same basis. If one is to make any comparison at all, it is between long-term trends, and we find that Government policy has had no effect on those gaps.

Mrs Kelly said, as did Ms Ruane, that we are singling out the public sector. However, my amendment to the DUP motion includes both the private and public sectors.

Caitríona Ruane spoke about a Protestant Parliament for a Protestant People. I noted Arlene Foster's remark on the issue, but let me be precise about that quotation. The comment was initially made in Southern Ireland, and when it was made in Northern Ireland it did not include the word "for". The comment was that just as there was a Catholic Parliament and a Catholic people, there was also a Protestant Parliament and a Protestant people in Northern Ireland.

It should be quoted verbatim in context and not used tritely, misquoted and misrepresented to imply somehow a slight that was not made at the time.

Ms Ruane spoke also about the non-acceptance of discrimination, and she said that we had a long way to go. I have never denied that there was discrimination. Evidence shows that there was discrimination on both sides in Northern Ireland; however, I look for evidence of whether it is still present. Ms Ruane said that we are a long way from achieving an end to discrimination. She should look at the Equality Commission's book 'Fair Employment in Northern Ireland: A Generation On', especially the chapter on social mobility. When the figures were subjected to critical path analysis the conclusion was — and the book describes it as one of the most significant conclusions — that there was no direct reference to religion as a factor.

In other words, in 1996-97, religion had no direct bearing on appointments and promotions. Indirect factors could include a person's father, mother, grandfather, grandmother and number of siblings. The number of siblings affects the years of education, which affects qualifications, which in turn affects whether or not a person can get a job.

Proper analysis does not show that there was discrimination in 1996-97, at the very time when the Secretary of State was talking about combating discrimination. In 1998, legislation was introduced that was stricter than any in Europe.

I do not demur from the legislation; there is a benefit to it in that it ensures that discrimination does not occur. However, let our arguments be based on evidence. Where is the evidence that endemic or systemic discrimination existed when that legislation was introduced in the 1990s? It does not exist.

3.30 pm

In the same breath, I do not deny that individual cases of discrimination occur. On average, four to six such cases are brought to tribunal every year on religious grounds by Catholics and Protestants and on grounds of gender. However, those figures should be put in context and the actual evidence of proven discrimination upheld by tribunals should be considered. Members must therefore be careful when saying that achieving the elimination of discrimination is a long way off.

I must also add that, yes, disadvantage exists. I do not doubt that; nor do I doubt that unemployment is a measure of disadvantage. Disadvantage can occur for many reasons. However, disadvantage and discrimination are two entirely different elements in the labour market and should not be confused.

I note Ms Stanton's points about the fall in the numbers of Protestant applicants and how numbers of Catholic applicants fell further, resulting in a change of 0.7% in the Catholic share of the workforce. That may be true, but it is not the comparison to make. Instead, we should consider that if 40% of applicants are from one section of the community, with other things being equal, one would expect a similar proportion of appointees from that side of the community. However, agencies have refused to examine that issue.

Mr O'Dowd said that unionists opposed every piece of legislation. I do not oppose equality legislation. Mr O'Dowd also said that there was a whole raft of allegations about discrimination against the Protestant community. I assure Mr O'Dowd that I did not use the word "discrimination". In fact, I was careful to say that the difference between the proportion of applicants and the proportion of appointees does not mean that there is discrimination. The Hansard report will show that I also said that it may be that Catholics are better qualified than Protestants, perhaps because Protestants go abroad for their university education and do not come back.

There are many reasons to explain the disparity between the proportion of applicants and the proportion of appointees. However, I have never said in this Chamber, or in anything that I have written, that this is discrimination, so do not lambaste unionists and say that we go on about discrimination against the Protestant community.

Mr O'Dowd: I certainly would not lambaste any elected representative for going on about discrimination against anyone. My closing remark was that if discrimination exists, let us work together to eradicate it.

Mr Nesbitt: I shall quote the Member's remarks verbatim. He said that there has been:

"a raft of allegations of discrimination against the Protestant community". — [Official Report, Bound Volume 21, p383, col 1].

That was the accusation that he levelled at those from this side of the House. I rebut that accusation because there is no evidence that I have ever made such an allegation.

All that we have done, and all that I have tried to do, has been based on evidence. I produced documentation on this issue and invited the SDLP and Sinn Féin to discuss it with me during the summer. My invitation was genuine, but no one responded. I note — and the Hansard report will show — that Sinn Féin said that its representatives were on holiday at the time, but that they would respond on their return. I understand that Caitríona Ruane was on holiday at the time; she has obviously returned, but I have not yet had that dialogue in order to explain my comments on this matter. No response came from either of the two parties sitting to my right.

I make a genuine request: all that I ask is that the apparent disparity between applicants and appointees be examined, so that we can understand why it exists and the Equality Commission can make recommendations or take action to address any disparity. That is not an unreasonable request.

My final comment — and it is very contemporaneous — is that Saturday 20 January 2007 was the closing date for responses to the Council of Europe document on minorities.

The Council of Europe is a body to which we all pay respect. It is the home of the European Convention on Human Rights. The United Kingdom Government were asked for their comments on fair employment in the report, to which they are legally obliged to respond. However, they said that the report has no relevance — yet another example of ducking out of a response. That is my main concern. I ask that the amendment be accepted because I seek a response from the Equality Commission to a genuine trend that must be addressed. Until that happens, the answers to the questions that I have posed will not be known.

Mr Dallat: Mr Deputy Speaker, I have been sitting here for some time trying to get something positive from the debate. Perhaps the fact that the DUP and Sinn Féin talked to each other directly across the Floor was good news, even if it was at some disrespect to you. I am glad that you gave them the latitude to do that. Perhaps that is as much as can be said.

I want to take the opportunity in making my winding-up speech to pay tribute to the Equality Commission.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I want to clarify that a Member had asked another Member to give way, and that caused an altercation to ensue between the two parties.

Lord Morrow: I did not intend to show you any disrespect, Mr Deputy Speaker.

Mr Dallat: I am sure that Lord Morrow will forgive me and that behaviour is better in the upper House than it has been here this afternoon. — [Interruption.]

Another Member is showing disrespect to the Deputy Speaker, and he must stop.

I want to pay tribute to the Equality Commission. I will divulge a little personal business. One aspect of the Equality Commission's work relates to land and property. It is three years since I tried to acquire a constituency office in Limavady. The Equality Commission had to go to court last Thursday in order to get the names of the objectors. On a personal basis, therefore, I know a little about what happens. Indeed, while I was sitting here during the crescendos I had flashbacks to my childhood when my father found it extremely difficult to get steady employment. If it had not been for the building of the M2, which went towards Ballymena rather than Derry, he would not have had any long-term employment at all.

Thanks must be given to those people in the Equality Commission who are responsible for monitoring statistics. That is important. It is true that the number of Catholics who are appointed is slightly higher than the percentage of those who apply. That also takes me back. I have had loads of opportunities to reminisce this afternoon. I bought my first new car with great pride. I bought it on the basis that sales had gone up 300% in the previous year. I then discovered that the number of sales the previous year had been 24, which meant that it had gone up to 72. If there are higher percentages of Catholics achieving employment, it is because they are starting from a low base.

Unemployment differentials can be dealt with by targeting areas of high unemployment. Contrary to some theories, the differential is not some magic constant. It has fallen since 1971. However, it has not fallen quickly enough. If Members are to leave the Chamber next week, I hope that they will go into an election that is based not on naked sectarianism but on a desire and a will to lead this part of Ireland out of the dark ages of the last three decades, and to focus on and promote equality not just between Catholics and Protestants, but between male and female and all other categories.

When the new Assembly is restored on 26 March, I hope that it makes full use of the Equality Commission to ensure that all its decisions are based on the principle of equality. I do not believe that there is anyone out there who would complain about that.

Chill factors that dissuade applications remain, and that may explain why some people are under-represented. From personal experience, that is true in local government, where unionist-controlled councils have been reluctant to carry welcoming statements where there is an under-representation of Catholics. That is disappointing.

Looking positively to the future, each Member has a role to ensure that equality in all its forms is paramount. To do that effectively, we need the Equality Commission. It is needed to monitor trends, identify issues and offer advice and solutions. That poses no threat to anyone. The Equality Commission helps to underpin democracy and is one of the cornerstones of a new society that all sensible people have been crying out for during the past, dark ages.

I make a personal appeal to our unionist colleagues opposite. For God's sake, stop trying to undermine your own people and telling them that they have failed. Encourage them to stay at home, because that is one way to ensure that representation of the Protestant community becomes higher than it is. The best brains have left. Sensing hopelessness, they have gone to university across the water and have not returned. We need those people to come back to join their Catholic counterparts, and others, to ensure that, once the next couple of weeks are over, we have a new image and a new era in which the tribal remarks that were heard today are a thing of the past. I have confidence that we can do that, and I hope that we are successful.

(Madam Speaker in the Chair)

Mr McCausland: This is a useful debate because equality is an important issue. I am glad that Members have 'Monitoring Report No. 16: A Profile of the Northern Ireland Workforce (2006)' from the Equality Commission. The Equality Commission for Northern Ireland's 'Annual Report 2005-06' has also been received. It is only when one has the facts that a situation can be analysed sensibly.

My colleague Gregory Campbell mentioned the public sector. It is important that some time is spent on that. One of the best examples of the public sector is the Housing Executive, which, with 3,532 staff, is a major employer in Northern Ireland. In its workforce, not only are people from the Protestant community under-represented, but when the number of recruits that have been appointed in the past year is examined, the situation is exacerbated. Mr Campbell stated that 34.7% of recruits were Protestant. That is lower than the 47.7% in the current staff. Therefore, over the past year, the situation in the Housing Executive has deteriorated. That is also true for a number of other bodies in the public sector.

Mrs Kelly and Mr John O'Dowd commented on the under-representation of Catholics in the security forces. It is true that there is an under-representation, although that does not seem to have prevented members of Sinn Féin from seeking employment with MI5.

Mr Storey: Spooks, spooks.

Mr McCausland: Yes, they are well qualified for that sort of thing.

Several Members have referred to the main reason for that under-representation. For years, the party that is represented across the Chamber had a military wing that carried out a terrorist campaign against members of those security forces. It is no wonder that people from the community that they represent did not want to join: if they had, they would probably have been murdered.

3.45 pm

I am grateful to Dermot Nesbitt for the points that he made about some of the more technical aspects of the equality legislation, how it is implemented and its failures and shortcomings. He is right to say that it is not sufficient to produce reports and facts; we need action.

I am grateful also for his comments about Caitríona Ruane's repetition. Once again, she talked about a Protestant Parliament for a Protestant people, and she continued by saying that this was a state that was founded on discrimination. I must say that Caitríona Ruane does not disappoint. She will always resort to type and rehearse the traditional republican rhetoric.

I think that I am right to say that Ms Ruane comes from Mayo. If one were to think about discrimination, what county would come more to mind than County Mayo? The Mayo library case has gone down in the history of this island. The case was taken because the entire Mayo community — with the exception of the Protestants — deemed it to be totally inappropriate and impossible to have a member of the Protestant community employed as a librarian there, because she might give out books that would corrupt the good, upright, properly reared Catholic people of County Mayo. In the end, the poor woman had to be removed from her job in Mayo and given a job in a back room somewhere in Dublin, well away from the good people of County Mayo.

I remember listening to Ms Ruane on the radio telling us that she had never known discrimination until she came to Northern Ireland. Obviously, the events in County Mayo, where the political and public communities agreed with the council's decision not to appoint a Protestant librarian, have slipped her mind. The people in County Mayo even went so far as to say that it would be inappropriate for them to have a Protestant doctor, because he or she might do things and provide services that were inappropriate for the good Catholic people of County Mayo.

Mr Shannon: Do you mean heal people?

Mr Kennedy: Do what things?

Mr McCausland: That would be too much information, I think.

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr McCausland: It is time that Sinn Féin, nationalists and republicans woke up to the fact that there were serious flaws in the Republic of Ireland.

Some Members: There still are.

Mr McCausland: Indeed there are. However, Sinn Féin, nationalists and republicans can focus only on the constant justification that they seek for their allegations of discrimination in Northern Ireland.

Mr Storey: It seems that the Members opposite are insinuating that discrimination in the Irish Republic is a thing of the past. The Special EU Programmes Body (SEUPB) recently published a study entitled 'Border Protestant Perspectives'. It states that somewhere in the region of 30% to 35% of Protestants in the border counties of the Irish Republic were discriminated against or felt intimidated, and that remains the case.

Mr McCausland: I am grateful to my colleague for those comments. A couple of years ago, I attended a conference in Monaghan where a person from a Catholic background, who is prominent in peace and reconciliation work in that area, told me that closet sectarianism was a big problem down there. He said that it was not out in the open and that it was not necessarily talked about, but he acknowledged that there continued to be closet sectarianism at the heart of that community. Interestingly, it was not I or someone from the Protestant community in the Republic who said that; it was somebody from a Catholic, nationalist background who endorsed what Mr Storey just mentioned.

Arlene Foster mentioned the situation west of the Bann, and rightly so. That is an important issue that should not be ignored. However, in my remaining time, I want to consider sectors other than the public sector, because we have spent some time on that already.

It is always good to start at home, so I want to refer to the Equality Commission in particular.

Its 2005-06 annual report states:

"The Commission completed its own Article 55 report this year. Although the report demonstrated some improvement in applicant numbers from the Protestant community, the representation of Protestants in our workplace fell over the review period."

If Members look in detail at the Equality Commission's figures, one report states that 40.7% of its workforce is Protestant and almost 60% is Roman Catholic. However, if one looks at the 2005-06 annual report, the table in appendix 2 on page 59 tells us that 35% of its staff is Protestant.

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCausland: I will give way as soon as I complete the figures. According to the report, out of a staff of 140, 57.1% is Roman Catholic and the religion of 7.9% cannot be determined. It is a serious issue that Protestants are under-represented in the very organisation that is tasked with dealing with equality in recruitment. The Equality Commission is an organisation that is supposed to promote affirmative action and work to eliminate discrimination, yet it cannot get it right in its own house.

Mrs D Kelly: None of us disputes the Equality Commission's staffing figures — it has been up front about them.

Can the Member tell me how the DUP plans to encourage people from its community to apply for jobs in the Equality Commission?

Mr McCausland: I am happy to respond that I had folk in my office recently who were querying the fact that, having applied for a job in the Equality Commission, they found that their applications had been turned down.

Members should look at the sector to which the Equality Commission belongs — I tend to include it with other organisations that come from what we term "the voluntary sector". NICVA represents community organisations across Northern Ireland. Figures show that 38% of its staff is drawn from the Protestant community and 61·4% comes from the Roman Catholic community. That organisation does not represent people in a particular area, locality or community — it is the "Northern Ireland" Council for Voluntary Action. Therefore it should reflect the general community in Northern Ireland. It should not be an organisation in which people from the Protestant community are seriously under-represented.

If NICVA were the only voluntary-sector organisation that had such Protestant under-representation, one might look for another reason for it. However, look at the Rural Community Network (RCN). The RCN has a total of 33 staff, yet it reports that it has fewer than 10 Protestants working for it. It does not tell us exactly how many; however, if it is fewer than 10, arithmetic tells us that it is nine or fewer. At best, it works out that about 25% of the RCN's staff is drawn from the Protestant community.

I looked at reports from the past three or four years and found that that under-representation is not a one-off blip or an accident with the figures. Year after year, that has been the staffing pattern for those organisations. Where is affirmative action being taken to put right those figures?

Let us consider a few more organisations: the Community Relations Council (CRC), an organisation with which I am involved as a member of its board, has an under-representation of Protestants on its staff. I have raised that issue with the CRC. Protestant employees of the Community Foundation for Northern Ireland total only 41%. Protestants are under-represented across the voluntary sector.

Is that persistent pattern due to discrimination? In some cases, I would say that I do not know, because I do not know the organisation. I suggest that it is not necessarily down to discrimination but to a differential in the strength of the community sector in the nationalist and unionist communities. In other words, when those large voluntary umbrella organisations recruit, fewer Protestant people are available for them to recruit, but a plethora is available in the nationalist community.

Therefore they probably draw from employment pools that differ in Protestant and Catholic areas but that reflect the differential in community-sector infrastructure in those communities. The figures that I have quoted strengthen the case for greater investment in community and cultural development in Protestant areas, because the outworking of the differential is there for all to see.

However, it cannot be left at that, because those Province-wide voluntary organisations play a prominent role in policy-making, have a consultative role with Government and are even trying to play a part in community planning. Until those organisations get their own houses in order, those roles must be seriously challenged. I welcome the debate and the report, which have enabled Members to speak about the large organisations in the public and voluntary sectors.

Mr Campbell: As a résumé of the debate, does the hon Member agree that, as other Members have said, the under-representation of nationalists, or Catholics, in the voluntary or public sectors has generally been diminishing in recent years? That is true almost everywhere. The converse is equally true: where there is unionist, or Protestant, under-representation, under-representation is getting worse. The Equality Commission must address that situation, yet it has failed to do so.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Madam Speaker: Will you draw your remarks to a close, please, Mr McCausland?

Mr McCausland: Yes. I thank my colleague for making that point, because it is at the core of the matter. Under-representation of the Protestant community may be being ignored, whitewashed or forgotten, but it is certainly not being dealt with. The Equality Commission's report provides strong evidence as to why that under-representation must be addressed.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Madam Speaker: I remind Members that if amendment No 1 is made, amendments No 2 and No 3 will fall.

Question, That amendment No 1 be made, put and negatived.

Question, That amendment No 2 be made, put and agreed to.

Mr Kennedy: When the business is concluded, Madam Speaker, may I raise a point of order on a separate matter?

Madam Speaker: I am about to put the Question on the motion as amended.

Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly notes the recent publication by the Equality Commission of its Annual Monitoring Report on the Northern Ireland workforce, and calls on the Commission to investigate trends in recruitment, both for a substantial period in the public sector and recently in the private sector, in order to establish if appointments have favoured one section of the community and, if necessary, to take and/or recommend appropriate action.

Mr Kennedy: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Given recent speculation, will you confirm to the Assembly, at the earliest opportunity, the status of the political affiliation of the Member for Mid Ulster Mrs Geraldine Dougan? Has the Speaker's Office received any confirmation that Mrs Dougan now wishes to be considered an independent Member of the House, and, if so, can that information be relayed to Members?

Madam Speaker: Rather than allow you to continue, Mr Kennedy, I inform you that the political affiliation of a Member is not a matter to be raised in the House. However, I will inform Members of any change to Mrs Dougan's designation as soon as possible.

Adjourned at 3.59 pm.

THE TRANSITIONAL ASSEMBLY

Tuesday 23 January 2007

The Assembly met at 10.30 am (Madam Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

ASSEMBLY BUSINESS

Madam Speaker: At the start of yesterday's sitting, Members expressed an interest in debating the situation at Muckamore Abbey Hospital and the recent report by the Police Ombudsman. Motions on those issues have now been tabled in the Business Office. The Business Committee will meet today at 12.30 pm to discuss the scheduling of debates on those motions.

COMMITTEE BUSINESS

Report on Workplace 2010 and Public Sector Jobs Location

Madam Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow two hours for each of today's debates. The Member moving each motion will have 15 minutes in which to speak, with 15 minutes being allowed for the winding-up speech. All other Members who wish to speak will be allowed a maximum of 10 minutes.

The Chairperson of the Committee on the Programme for Government (Mr Molloy): I beg to move

That this Assembly notes the report from the Committee on the Programme for Government on Workplace 2010 and Public Sector Jobs Location and endorses the findings and conclusions set out in the Report.

In proposing the motion, I do so not as a member of the Committee on the Programme for Government but as one of the two Chairpersons appointed to the Committee to enable it to conduct its business.

Members should know that the Secretary of State wrote to me yesterday evening about the report that is the subject of this debate, and I understand that copies of that letter are available in the Rotunda. For the benefit of Members, however, I will outline the letter's key messages later in my remarks.

On 24 November 2006, following a direction from the Secretary of State, the Business Committee of the Assembly established a Committee on the Programme for Government to consider priorities for a new Executive and to make preparations for restoration. The Committee on the Programme for Government recognised that there was much to be done, and, although it was extremely busy examining some specific matters, it determined to set up six subgroups to consider a range of other issues. One subgroup was formed to review the progress of the Workplace 2010 initiative, which is part of the reform programme aimed at addressing the urgent accommodation problems of the Northern Ireland Civil Service office estate. Importantly, the subgroup was also required to consider key issues in relation to public-sector jobs location.

It is appropriate to declare that I chaired the first meeting of the subgroup on 7 December 2006, but not as a member of the subgroup. Alternative arrangements for chairing each of the subgroups were agreed on 11 December 2006 and introduced immediately thereafter. When the Committee on the Programme for Government considered the findings and conclusions of the subgroup, there was consensus among the parties that not only should its report be printed, but that it should also be debated in the Assembly. The report is a Committee report, but its substance is, largely, the fruit of the subgroup's labours. I acknowledge the efforts of the members from the four main parties who served on the subgroup. I am sure that they will participate in the debate.

It is also important to record that the Committee on the Programme for Government was careful to consider the findings and conclusions of the subgroup and added its own value to the report. I have no doubt that some of the Committee members will want to have their say. The members of the subgroup would also want me to acknowledge the support of Assembly staff. It is to their credit that the report was completed over the Christmas period in time for the Committee's consideration. I know how dedicated the Committee office staff were in providing support to the Committee and to all the subgroups, and I thank them for the hard work and long hours that they put in to produce the report.

It is worth reminding the Assembly that the Committee on the Programme for Government agreed the terms of reference for the subgroup as recently as 4 December 2006. The Committee called for a report by 3 January 2007. It is to the credit of the subgroup that it rose to the challenge and reported by the due date. In so doing it called for, and received, written submissions and also heard evidence from witnesses. Having acknowledged the efforts of members, it is also right to recognise the valued contributions made by those who provided written responses and those who appeared, willingly and at short notice, before the subgroup to ensure that members were well informed on the issues.

I shall now highlight some of the key areas in the report. The issues raised proved to be complex and, dare I say it, somewhat controversial; they are recorded on pages 5, 6, 7 and 8 of the report.

Workplace 2010 is a private finance initiative (PFI). I know from experience that the PFI concept can provoke a range of reactions, not all of them positive. It is no surprise therefore that this matter came up as early as the subgroup's first meeting, given the advanced stage of the procurement process, and the fact that the terms of reference required the subgroup to review the progress of the Workplace 2010 initiative.

Members of the subgroup felt somewhat constrained, and they were also concerned about the risks of having direct contact with any of the preferred bidders in relation to a commercially sensitive matter. Nevertheless, it is clear from the report that members have been diligent in their investigations.

The most striking feature of Workplace 2010 is the sheer scale of the initiative, which is a matter of some concern, especially to the members of the subgroup. This large and complex programme will affect about three quarters of the office estate and is expected to impact on some 18,000 civil servants. In return for an upfront capital payment, there will be an asset transfer to the successful private-sector partner of some 77 buildings out of a total of 202. About half of those 77 buildings are in the greater Belfast area. The remainder are in regional towns and include the jobs and benefits offices.

However, according to my reading of the report, the impact on staff was also given due consideration, particularly the issue of transferring staff from the public to the private sector and the quality of the environment in which civil servants might be expected to work to allow them to provide a much needed range of services to the public. The equality impacts and social and economic effects are also highlighted in the report.

The report also reflects on the importance attached to safeguarding the interests of the taxpayer and the local economy. In this regard, there are associated references to sustainability.

Many Members will want to focus on what the report says in relation to the important issue of the location of public-sector jobs in Northern Ireland. I look forward to hearing what other Members have to say on this issue.

In my opening remarks, I mentioned that the Committee added its own value to the report that the subgroup produced. That value is captured not only in the body of the report, but in summary on the second page of the report, where three specific additions and an amendment are recorded.

The Committee agreed to write to the Secretary of State setting out its views, namely:

"no decision should be made on advancing the Workplace 2010 contract until the concerns expressed by the Committee in its report had been considered;

it does not accept that the proposed consultation on Guiding Principles for the Location of Public Sector Jobs should be confined to the Review of Public Administration consequentials or that Workplace 2010 should be excluded from this consultation; and the approach being taken to the implementation of Workplace 2010 has the potential to lead to the closure of government offices in non-urban areas, which might in effect result in the centralisation of public sector jobs."

I want to confirm that the Committee sent a letter to the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State has responded, and copies of his reply are available in the Rotunda.

I am encouraged by the Secretary of State's reply, which appears to recognise the validity of the Committee's concerns. On Workplace 2010, he has given an assurance that officials will carefully consider, and will seek to take account of, the concerns expressed by the Committee. He has also indicated that the outcome of those considerations will be conveyed to him before final decisions are taken.

In relation to the proposed consultation on the guiding principles for the location of public-sector jobs, the Secretary of State has indicated that the scope of the consultation will be widened to allow for comment on the broad, overall policy relating to dispersal, including Workplace 2010 and decisions around the review of public administration. The Secretary of State also wrote that the consultation paper would be published next week.

On the question of whether Workplace 2010 has the potential to lead to the closure of Government offices in non-urban areas, with a resultant centralisation of public-sector jobs, the Secretary of State is most insistent that the Workplace 2010 contract will improve the flexibility to accommodate any future decisions on the dispersal of jobs and will allow the Civil Service to respond quickly as and when those decisions are taken.

10.45 am

Having brought Members up to date with the latest developments, I want to draw my remarks to a close.

Without dismissing the many papers, documents and reports that we read, there is no doubt that the devil is in the detail. This report acknowledges the virtue of making things easy for the reader by providing an executive summary.

Given that the remit of the Committee on the Programme for Government is to consider priorities for the new Executive, Members will want to pay particular attention to paragraphs 7, 8 and 9 on page 2 of the report. There they will see clearly in bold type, three actions, which I wish to commend to the Assembly.

The first shows regard to local businesses. It calls on a restored Executive:

“to monitor the position and consider what interventions might be possible”, in circumstances where local businesses might suffer as a result of awarding Workplace 2010 to any particular bidder.

The second action appeals, to a greater or lesser extent, to us as politicians. It calls on a restored Executive:

“to undertake an urgent examination of policies, which appear to favour PFI Solutions.”

The third action says much about the challenge of securing benefits for all the people of Northern Ireland, but not at inconsiderate expense to the taxpayer. It calls for the development and implementation of policy for the dispersal of public-sector jobs, which would take account of existing strategies for equality, rural development, sustainable development and targeting social need subject to careful consideration of cost.

I look forward to the rest of the debate, including what Members have to say about the Secretary of State's letter. Thank you.

Mr Buchanan: There is real concern that all the work carried out by the Committee may be rendered worthless, because the process toward the implementation of Workplace 2010 is so far down the route to completion that no meaningful changes can be made.

There is always a concern that direct-rule Ministers will disregard the views of Northern Ireland politicians; but that concern is more acute in this situation, and it seems to be reinforced by the views given by the Secretary of State in his letter to the subgroup early in its investigations. Obviously, the recent press coverage surrounding some PFI contracts in Northern Ireland has not been positive, and that must inform our views when it comes to examining the proposals at hand.

The press coverage of Balmoral High School highlights the worst possible scenario regarding this kind of arrangement. Although reassurances were given that lessons have been learned from every bad example, we must always guard against the bad practice that has occurred in Northern Ireland and in all other parts of the United Kingdom.

However, there is no doubt that much of the Civil Service estate is in a very poor state of repair. There is an urgent need to ensure that the conditions in which civil servants work are of the best possible standard, and that they allow for efficiency and productivity. To that end, if Workplace 2010 is to go ahead on the current basis, it is vital that there are safeguards to prevent companies making so-called super profits on the back of the purchase and leasing back of the buildings.

There must also be protection for staff across Northern Ireland who are concerned that they will be forced to transfer from the public sector to the private sector, with the accompanying pension, and other, changes that could entail.

If Workplace 2010 is to proceed, there is little doubt that a large multi-national company will win the contract to provide services to the buildings.

Whereas reassurance was given that local companies may be involved in service provision, I am concerned that current local providers of these buildings may be pushed aside in the name of increased profits that will ultimately go to a company based outside Northern Ireland and probably outside the United Kingdom altogether.

With respect to the proposals for decentralisation, no one in the Chamber opposes the redistribution of jobs across Northern Ireland. However, Members must remember that it could not be carried out without cost to the taxpayer. The process must be carried out in such a way that jobs are relocated at appropriate times rather than simply to meet artificial quotas or targets. The relocation of jobs must be on a sustainable basis. The Scottish experience provides a model appropriate for Northern Ireland, should that proposal be acted upon.

Unfortunately, the Committee may be trying to shut stable doors long after the horses have bolted. However, I hope that the Government will take the Committee's concerns on board, since many of the proposals are well on the way to implementation and others have already been completed.

It is important that the voices of Members, as local representatives, are heard by those implementing the proposals and that they take heed of our valid concerns.

Dr Birnie: All Members will be familiar with problems that arose over the past 15 years because of how electricity generation was privatised in the early 1990s. A long-term contract was entered into, which, in the eyes of customers, was too generous to suppliers. That continues to be a problem.

Is history about to repeat itself? I ask that because Workplace 2010 was a part of the Committee's remit. I do not ask solely because, as some Members will have noticed, a former Government Minister, who was around in the early 1990s, has reappeared as part of one of the four companies bidding for the Workplace 2010 contract.

At the heart of the Workplace 2010 initiative lies a 20- or 25-year contract for transferring public assets to private ownership. If, in that process, the financial variables are miscalculated, Members, and Northern Ireland as a whole, will regret it for a very long time.

Mr Buchanan referred to the worst case encountered to date: Balmoral High School. In that instance, the public sector and the taxpayer will have to pay for years for a building that is no longer necessary because of PFI arrangements.

On the basis of evidence reviewed by the Committee, Members cannot be entirely confident that, with respect to Workplace 2010, the financial variables have been correctly calculated.

There are three such variables. The first is initial asset valuation, which, if correctly calculated, will ensure that buildings are sold off at the right price. It is worrying to inspect the websites of various agencies and discover that markedly different figures are quoted. The second variable is the unitary charge, which determines whether the public sector is charged a fair rate to lease back the buildings and use them or an exorbitant rate. What happens if, as is very likely in future, there is a need to change conditions of use? Will the private operator exploit his position? Thirdly, there are clawback arrangements. What if the private operator — or owner — of the Civil Service building chooses to sell it to another private company at a profit? Will a percentage of that profit be clawed back to the taxpayer?

Some will say that all the financial details have been correctly calculated, because the so-called outline business case demonstrates that the so-called net present value of the Workplace 2010 contract represents a lower-cost way of carrying out necessary repairs and maintenance of the Civil Service estate. That seems to be the official line that was given to the Committee and cited in the evidence submitted; that line is also taken by the Strategic Investment Board (SIB).

However, there are difficulties in evaluating that outline business case. First, having been published in May 2005, it is almost two years out of date. Secondly, the figures in the outline business case cannot be discussed in the public domain because of alleged commercial information sensitivities, thus handicapping any open and transparent debate about their implications. Thirdly, and most importantly when determining how much credence — or otherwise — should be given to the business case, a cost-benefit analysis for a projected 25-year period will always be a hazardous exercise. It is vulnerable to the assumptions that are made, such as the interest and inflation rates that will apply over the 25 years. Therefore, I am not convinced that the outline business case provides a knock-down argument that Workplace 2010 is truly superior to the more traditional methods of operating the Civil Service estate.

The other half of the report's subject matter concerns decentralisation, to which the UUP takes a pragmatic approach. Decentralisation is beneficial in so far as it is consistent with reasonable value for money. It should be remembered that Northern Ireland has extensive experience of decentralisation policies in the 1990s and at the instigation of the 1999-2002 devolved Executive. Several consultancy studies on decentralisation have been carried out by, for example, Pricewaterhouse-Coopers. One estimate is that to move 4,400 Civil Service jobs from the Belfast area to elsewhere in the Province would cost about £40,000 per job in current and capital costs — in other words, a considerable sum of money.

It is also worth examining the experience that other jurisdictions and Administrations have had of decentralisation policies, as the subgroup did when taking evidence and in its consideration. We examined the experiences of Scotland and the Republic of Ireland. Notably, the Scottish Executive adopted a pragmatic approach to ensure that any decentralisation was done in a cost-managed way. The Republic of Ireland has introduced a policy of moving as many as 8,000 jobs out of the Dublin area. So far, the number of civil servants who have moved is in the hundreds, largely because they themselves have been resisting such movements. These examples are worth pondering.

One point about the statistics that were presented to the subgroup is worth noting. They showed that roughly 60% of Northern Ireland's population live in the greater Belfast area. The percentage of Civil Service employees who work in that area is also 60%.

In other words, the two figures more or less match, which hardly indicates any gross inequity in the existing distribution of jobs.

I thank the staff for their work on the report, which was done under great time pressure and even straddled the traditional Christmas holiday. I also thank those who gave evidence, both from the Department of Finance and Personnel and the Northern Ireland Public Service Alliance (NIPSA). I support the motion.

11.00 am

Mr Dallat: I welcome the publication of the report, and I would like to return to the key issue for the SDLP — the decentralisation of public service jobs, which would be in the interests of Northern Ireland as a whole. Esmond Birnie referred to previous attempts to decentralise jobs; however, those were not very successful. The Department of Education generously offered to move jobs from Bangor to Belfast, while the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety did not respond at all.

The contract for the provision of Civil Service accommodation is nearing a conclusion, and that creates a new set of circumstances that will enable the disappointments of the past to become the successes of the future. However, that will happen only if there is a concerted effort on many fronts to tackle the problem. It cannot be left to happen in a haphazard way; any new Assembly must have the enthusiasm and commitment to overrule the stubborn attitudes of senior civil servants who create the impression that they cannot see beyond Glengormley when it comes to the location of Civil Service jobs.

In Coleraine, for example, 261 jobs are going to be lost in Driver and Vehicle Licensing Northern Ireland, and there are worries that more will follow. Some 84 jobs have already been lost in HM Revenue and Customs, and a review is ongoing in the Social Security Agency — all in the one town, where the industrial base is extremely narrow. There are further worries about Limavady and Derry, where many of my constituents find work.

No one can tell me that that set of circumstances does not require the intervention of a new Assembly with the power and the commitment to deal with the crisis that is developing, not just in Coleraine but across the North, with the potential to cause particularly nasty destruction in areas that are already experiencing high levels of social deprivation.

Mr McMenamin: Does the Member agree that special emphasis must be placed on decentralisation of jobs to the west? I am talking about west Tyrone, Omagh and Strabane. Hundreds of civil servants — many of them young married women — leave their homes at six in the morning and do not get home until seven in the evening, leaving their children behind. That has been the story in the west for too long; surely there should be a fair share of jobs, and more jobs should be decentralised.

Mr Dallat: Madam Speaker, I could not agree more. I met civil servants in Coleraine last Friday. It is not just young mothers; many civil servants are also carers, and they cannot afford to be away from home for 16 hours a day. That is another factor that Members need to take into account when calculating the cost of decentralising Civil Service jobs.

There is a mood afoot that there is little opportunity at this late stage to build something into the contract to allow a new focus on decentralisation. I do not accept that. I listened to the figures given by Esmond Birnie — £40,000 to move one job. There has to be flexibility in the new contract to look at new ways in which decentralisation could be done without incurring massive costs.

I am sure that many Members came here today via the M1, the M2 or other arterial routes. One cannot fail to notice the horrendous damage that is done to the environment by sending thousands of civil servants into the greater Belfast area each day. That causes mental strain and adds to the never-ending parking problems.

Some Members have mentioned the defects in the Republic's decentralisation programme, but it seems that people do not want to focus on its successes. Towns in the west of Ireland that could expect only minor improvements in their economic prospects prior to decentralisation are now vibrant and prosperous. That was brought about not only by the decentralisation of central Government jobs; many county council jobs were also decentralised, and the benefits of that are enormous.

More importantly, people have a new confidence in the future. The economies are more stable, and the new wealth has created many more jobs in the private sector, and, God knows, we need them. New industry and commerce are developing in areas that struggled for survival in the past. The emigration buses have stopped running. There is a new focus on education and training, new infrastructures for roads and railways — more about which Members will hear later — and the other support services that make up a prosperous society.

There is no reason for not replicating that in Northern Ireland, but it needs a new dynamism and commitment that have not been present in the past, and that gives one good reason for having a local Assembly. In the months ahead, people across the North will be looking to a new Assembly to bring about real change. That will not happen if decentralisation is not a cornerstone of change, or if senior civil servants continue to dictate where jobs will be located. Now is the time to ensure that winds of change sweep through the corridors of power, bringing new hope to many socially disadvantaged areas where Civil Service jobs are disappearing like snow off a ditch.

Changes must be made to bring hope where there is despair, happiness where there is gloom, and confidence where insecurity has been the order of the day. That has already happened in Wales and in Scotland. What is good for Aberystwyth and Aberdeen is good for towns outside the greater Belfast area, and, as my esteemed colleague Eugene McMenamin reminded me, that is particularly true of the north-west and the west.

Mr Neeson: I was not a member of the Committee on the Programme for Government, and neither were any members of my party. My colleagues and I gave up most of our summer to serve on the Committee on the Preparation for Government and the Subgroup on the Economic Challenges facing Northern Ireland, and I deeply regret Peter Hain's despicable decision to exclude the Alliance Party from the Committee on the Programme for Government. In many ways, that exclusion was a disservice to the people of Northern Ireland and to the Alliance Party.

The main aim of the report is to create an efficient and effective workforce. Any working environment must be conducive to creating the necessary productivity. The fact that the main concentration of Civil Service jobs is in the south-east corner of the Stormont estate shows how centralised the Civil Service has become, although Civil Service jobs are based in 70 properties in the greater Belfast area. The existing properties leave a lot to be desired.

In the past, too many ad hoc decisions were taken on where to locate jobs in the Civil Service. From 1996-98, when the talks were being held in Castle Buildings, I saw for myself the conditions that Northern Ireland's civil servants had to experience. I thought that it felt like a prison. Therefore there is an urgent need to modernise the buildings and facilities for our civil servants. The new Invest Northern Ireland building on Bedford Street is a good example of modernisation, and it shows what modern facilities can be achieved for our workforce.

I am in favour of decentralisation. I am on record as having stated that one major Government Department should be located in the city of Derry. In many ways, decentralisation provides greater opportunities to develop a more efficient and effective workforce. I agree with Eugene McMenamin that the time that many civil servants spend travelling to and from work should be taken on board. It is important that lessons should be learned from experiences in other areas, such as Scotland, Wales and particularly the Republic of Ireland, where decentralisation has clearly been proven to be successful.

One of my main concerns about the sell-off of properties, particularly in the Stormont estate, is that we must take rising property prices in Northern Ireland into account. Who will benefit most? Will it be the Government or the private sector? I contend that the private sector stands to make most from the sell-offs. We must also consider whether the refurbishment of existing buildings would be preferable to constructing new buildings.

Like many people, I am not convinced by the PFI argument. Does it provide value for money in the long term, and how can it be guaranteed that there will be good competing bids? One advantage with PFI is the opportunity for decentralisation, and I can think of many excellent sites in east Antrim that would provide facilities for new Civil Service offices.

As regards the review of public administration (RPA), I have said in the Chamber that 10 Government Departments in Northern Ireland is too many and does not provide for efficient and effective government and administration. If devolution is restored, will the Executive be prepared to take the necessary decisions to provide an effective and efficient Government? If that does happen, there will be an impact on staffing, other resources, and on building needs for the future.

A radical approach will be required to cater for the necessary public administration needs in the twenty-first century, and I pose a question that is not addressed by Workplace 2010. What provisions are being made for the provision of e-government? Undoubtedly, that will have major implications for staffing, buildings and other resources.

The restored Assembly will face major challenges, and I hope that it will meet them.

Mr Doherty: A Cheann Comhairle, I welcome today's debate on the Workplace 2010 report produced by the Programme for Government Committee.

I wish to place on record several serious concerns about the current approach by British direct-rule Ministers, particularly on decentralisation. Workplace 2010 is a three-year to five-year programme of work to transform the Civil Service office estate. It involves the introduction of new accommodation standards, including open-plan working, rationalisation of the existing estate and the disposal of surplus accommodation to the private sector.

The Department of Finance and Personnel and the Strategic Investment Board are working together on that. The programme is likely to be delivered through a total property PFI solution, meaning that a private company would own and manage the Civil Service estate.

11.15 am

Civil Service accommodation is substantial, with a value of some £280 million and running costs of around £75 million per annum. The plan is to halve the current number of office buildings — around 70 in the greater Belfast area — over five to seven years as leases expire and larger buildings are refurbished. Thus some 35 buildings, along with several regional offices, will be included in the first phase of procurement.

Although Sinn Féin has no difficulty with a modernising and reforming agenda that leads to better work practices and accommodation, it has a number of serious concerns. The privatisation agenda — the selling off of public assets to the private sector — is one such issue. It is clear that the entire thrust of British direct-rule Ministers, the British Labour Party and the Treasury in London will have profound and far-reaching consequences. The Strategic Investment Board and the Department of Finance and Personnel both claim that the chosen PFI method will save £200 million. There is absolutely no proof for that claim.

There are also implications for employees, given that private companies will be managing the estate. There are proposals to outsource — privatise — work that is currently being done by the Civil Service. Over 500 jobs will be handed to private-sector contractors. Clearly, that will have implications for conditions of employment and pensions.

Another danger is that this will adversely affect smaller, locally based companies, which will be frozen out. They will find it difficult to compete for such big contracts, which will most likely be won by single suppliers. Local economies will lose that revenue.

Sinn Féin's central concern is about the impact of the policy on decentralisation. Workplace 2010 claims to have addressed the issue by holding some of the Civil Service estate back, while balancing it with the need to deal with pressing accommodation requirements in the Belfast area in phase one.

The second phase will address the regional estate. There is no time frame on that. There are concerns that this actually militates against decentralisation, because the core administrative work of Departments will be consolidated in new offices in the Belfast area. That is particularly pertinent in the context of the review of public administration and the breakdown of councils. This is the rationale for the infrastructure and investment patterns that are clearly benefiting the greater Belfast area to the detriment of other areas. As regards the RPA announcements, it means that although councils in border areas will have increased powers, they will not benefit from Workplace 2010.

Senior civil servants, as the senior policy-makers, have a vested interest in ensuring that little or limited decentralisation takes place. Long-term rent agreements on privatised buildings will ensure that the core work of Departments continues to be done in the Belfast area.

Decentralisation would also have an immediate and long-term economic benefit in that it would bring jobs to the border counties. Decentralisation is one way to help to develop a better economy and to benefit rural regeneration; the rural population would be better sustained, and there would be an increase in income in many rural towns that would impact on schools, shops, post offices and other facets of rural life.

However, Sinn Féin believes that an opportunity has been lost to truly decentralise the Civil Service; to help to create balanced regional development throughout the North; and to help to kick-start regional economies in line with equality and new targeting social need obligations. It is not enough to say that moving from east Belfast and north Down into Belfast city centre satisfies equality and New TSN criteria.

Sinn Féin is concerned that Workplace 2010 as presently constituted, notwithstanding the flexibility for movement built into the programme, will merely copper-fasten the status quo and replicate current patterns of investment and disadvantage. That is unacceptable.

Although, as an Irish republican party, Sinn Féin has no political or emotional attachment to the Stormont estate, it is nevertheless opposed to the concept of public property being sold to the private sector, and it is opposed to plans to privatise aspects of the work currently being carried out by the public sector. The party remains unconvinced that PFI offers the best option and value for money, and it believes that a privatisation agenda is being rushed through too quickly.

Mr Weir: Will the Member give way?

Mr Doherty: I have concluded my remarks, so the Member has the Floor.

Mr Newton: I support the report. Like some of the Members who have spoken already, I pay tribute to the staff and the civil servants who went out of their way over the Christmas period — a difficult time in the calendar — to produce a balanced report.

As has already been mentioned, the circumstances under which the subgroup met were such that much work had already been carried out on Workplace 2010, and the letting of the Workplace 2010 contract was at an advanced stage. That placed constraints on the subgroup members, and it could be argued that the brief was very narrow and the timescale for the task extremely short.

The subgroup also met at a time when there was much need for investment in public-sector buildings and a recognition that modern and efficient offices were needed to deliver public-sector services effectively. Members have referred to when they were incarcerated — although I do not think that they used that exact word — in Government office buildings during the talks process; they felt as if they were in jail. If they felt that way for that short but intensive period, one can only wonder how the civil servants who spend year after year working in those offices must feel.

However, the Government have taken advice, with the result that the PFI option has been chosen. The subgroup members expressed concern that officials appearing before them were allowed to speak only in support of current ministerial policy.

In supporting the report, I want to consider two distinct areas. The first area is the equality, social and economic effects on the companies and employees who are currently engaged in carrying out maintenance work on the buildings that are listed. The second area is the policy of dispersal and whether employees might be forced to move home if an affirmative policy were put in place. During the subgroup's meetings, I expressed great concerns about the small businesses that are currently undertaking work on behalf of the Civil Service and that will be affected by this initiative. Over the years, small to medium-sized businesses (SMEs) have tendered for business and have built their reputations on offering a service to the Civil Service; those businesses may be the major losers when the maintenance contract is awarded. Local firms employ local people, and I can only assume that they are performing their tasks to the satisfaction of the Departments.

To some extent, I am relieved that, as I understand it, the "big four" multinationals that have tendered for the project have indicated that, should one of them win the contract, they are willing to employ local labour and to involve local companies. I queried how tightly that commitment could be tied down; I was assured that it could be tied down to a limited extent, but whichever company won the contract would have the right to use any labour firm that it wished. However, it is useful to know that those companies are willing to consider the use of local labour. The use of local labour and the economic benefits for Northern Ireland should taken into account when the applications are being considered. I hope that the people who make the final decision will keep those factors uppermost in their minds. The people who are most likely to be hit are those who undertake what are regarded as "lower" jobs — those engaged in cleaning, canteen services and minor maintenance work.

When previous contracts of this nature were awarded to large multinationals, those companies went on to establish themselves in offshore low-tax regimes, thereby minimising the local economy's tax take. That issue concerns me, and it was discussed during the subgroup's deliberations. That factor should also be taken into consideration when the final contract is awarded.

I come now to the policy of dispersal. At one stage in my career, I spent two years being told by my employer that, due to reorganisation, I would be given certain options and would be absorbed into another area of work. However, it was not made clear where that work might be or what type of work I might be expected to do. Therefore, I can understand how some civil servants might be feeling about the Workplace 2010 initiative.

Mr Weir: Does my Friend share my concern about Rathgael House in Bangor? For some reason — the motivation of Government could be questioned on this issue — Rathgael House has been categorised as a "Belfast" building; no other building outside Belfast has been categorised in that way. Many staff in Rathgael House transferred from Belfast to Bangor because of family commitments, so the potential for dispersal is causing many of them great stress.

11.30 am

Mr Newton: I concur with the Member's comments. I had intended to deal with that matter.

The experience of the Republic of Ireland Government has been mentioned. In their attempts to decentralise jobs, they have met with massive resistance from civil servants. As I understand it from press reports, the decentralisation of Civil Service jobs will become an election issue. Imagine what it must be like for the core of Civil Service employees at present. There must be dissatisfaction and concern among them and also among those small companies that help to service Government buildings.

The Scottish experience has been referred to, and we should learn from the experience of those who have previously engaged in decentralisation. The Scottish Executive, having been around the block once, are now starting to add to their thinking on decentralisation. Indeed, there is revised guidance on the relocation process, which seeks real and tangible benefits for the relocation, provides a rationale for it and is clear about the standards and processes for staff consultation. Information is made available to individuals and to Departments, and the real and total case for rationalisation is put.

We in Northern Ireland must learn from experiences elsewhere in order to ensure that we get cost-effective delivery in all situations. The report notes that 60% of the population live in the Belfast travel-to-work area and that 59% of civil servants are based in that area. To dismiss those figures would be unfair and, indeed, discriminatory.

Mr Elliott: I also wish to express my thanks to the Committee for the work that it has done on this report.

It is no major surprise that some Members have indicated that the Northern Ireland Civil Service estate has been under-resourced in the past few decades, resulting in a limited maintenance of buildings and a general decline in the overall estate. Modern and efficient offices are required to aid the delivery of modern public services, whether in the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development (DARD), in the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (DETI) or in the areas of health, the arts and education. Whatever the Department or agency, antiquated offices will have a negative impact on efficiency.

The need for vast levels of investment in the estate is given as the reason for the PFI known as Workplace 2010, a scheme that is similar to others in Great Britain. It is somewhat encouraging to hear a Sinn Féin Member express concern at the prospect of Her Majesty's Government selling off some of their buildings.

Mr Weir: Does the Member take encouragement, as I do, from the fact that some progress has been made today? It used to be "no return to Stormont", yet now it is "no sell-off of Stormont".

Mr Elliott: I thank the Member for his comments; I cannot disagree with them. Perhaps the situation is moving on, in spite of what others may think.

Workplace 2010 is not simply about buildings. It is about employees; it involves real people. That is the crux of the matter. The terms used to sell the PFI often belie the very real fears of those that the organisation employs. The most anxious employees are often those in the lowest-paid jobs — those who earn little above the minimum wage.

We often hear consultants and others come out with phrases such as "improve the working environment" or "introduce more efficient arrangements". Those phrases sound good to management and Government, but the fears of those further down the ladder are often deep-rooted.

Last summer, I was contacted by Civil Service support-level employees who were deeply concerned by Workplace 2010's proposals and the pace at which changes were being implemented. They were deeply anxious that there was no supporting business case for making those changes, which looked set to be rolled out even before the two pilot schemes had been completed and analysed.

Those essential staff were worried about how the outworking of Workplace 2010 would affect their status. They were especially worried that they would be forced to move to the private sector. I welcome the fact that the Committee on the Programme for Government has addressed that concern.

Another bone of contention was that pensions were to be "comparable" after the changeover to the private sector. Note that pensions were to be comparable, not the same. Those staff to whom I spoke were worried not only about their own positions but about the impact that those changes could have on the way in which Departments are able to perform their duties to the Northern Ireland public effectively. For example, the influx of agency staff, of which there is potentially a high turnover, could mean no continuity of staffing.

That could lead to a lack of ownership of tasks and, ultimately, to an unsatisfactory outcome for everyone.

Few of us are comfortable with change, particularly when that change is outside of our influence and when it can result in major changes, such as our status as an employee. Outsourcing does not have a good reputation in the Northern Ireland public sector. Many millions were wasted on the Child Support Agency (CSA), which failed to realise any improvement, and there are examples of agencies neither properly staffing their organisations nor training those staff. There is little wonder that the public lack enthusiasm for such a move when the employment of agency cleaning staff in some hospital wards has resulted in poor standards of cleanliness.

The fear of continued centralisation and the relocation of public-sector offices into our towns and cities cannot be allowed to continue to disadvantage those in rural communities, particularly those in the west of the Province. I thank other Members for their contributions on that point.

Representatives from the Public and Commercial Services Union (PCS) recently briefed some of my colleagues on Fermanagh District Council and me on the proposed restructuring of HM Revenue and Customs. That restructuring threatens more than half of the 82 jobs in its Enniskillen offices. The proposed centralisation of those jobs is on top of last year's proposal to remove Northern Ireland Housing Executive (NIHE) staff from the Enniskillen office.

The west is suffering as a result of such proposals, and the agencies concerned appear to show little interest in catering for the needs of employees outside of our main towns and cities. We heard in earlier contributions about employees having to travel long distances to work and about the problems that they have encountered. Public-sector staff in Enniskillen cannot feasibly travel to other sites in Northern Ireland. They will also find it extremely difficult to find alternative roles in their locality.

Moreover, the Workplace 2010 proposals disadvantage the public by removing staff who usually provide face-to-face, front-line services and advice to vulnerable members of our society, such as those on low income and those who find the complex taxation system difficult and intimidating. The loss of those jobs will mean that more than £500,000 will be lost to the local economy, resulting in numerous families struggling to cope financially. Indeed, it will be a major loss to the entire community.

There has been an historical problem of under-investment in the estates, to which a pragmatic approach is certainly required. However, consideration must be given to the loyal staff members in the communities that I have mentioned. I do not want Northern Ireland to arrive at a situation whereby some areas are almost totally reliant on the public sector for employment. We have local council areas in the Province in which somewhere in the region of 50% of the workforce is employed in the public sector. That is not healthy; we want a fair and reasonable balance.

The success or failure of a major initiative such as Workplace 2010 in large organisations that are similar to the Civil Service invariably lies in the hands of the often overlooked but essential roles that security, catering or cleaning staff play. Employees at all levels must be kept informed and on board if the full potential of any change — particularly those that are outlined in Workplace 2010 — is to be realised.

The need for value for money must be addressed at every stage of the PFI. If the taxpayer is not receiving a good deal from the private firms, that problem will need to be addressed. I am glad that the Committee on the Programme for Government recognised that fact in its conclusions. However, the PFI cannot be allowed to focus solely on upfront costs, and service standards must not be compromised in order to remove the possibility of costly mistakes being made down the line.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Wells] in the Chair)

I am a strong advocate for decentralising public-sector jobs and taking them away from many of the main settlements. Earlier, someone said that there should be one major Department that focuses on Londonderry. It should not just focus on Londonderry; it should focus as well on areas such as Omagh, Dungannon, Strabane and Enniskillen.

The recent centralisation trend is disadvantaging the west of the Province. The final outcome of the review of public administration will result in the largest public-sector change that will have been experienced here, but, pending that outcome, rationalisation is premature. I support the conclusions of the report.

Ms Ritchie: Like the Members who have spoken before me, I commend all those who are associated with the report — the members of the subgroup and the staff who work alongside them.

The location of public-sector jobs must be addressed with respect to the relevant need of a particular community. A remoulded Workplace 2010 strategy should be the driving force for doing that. That means that a mechanism for the centralisation of Government jobs in the greater Belfast area should not be propelled through. However, that seems to be happening at present.

One of the central points that is advocated in the report of the Committee on the Programme for Government is the need for:

“an affirmative policy for the dispersal of public sector jobs which would take account of existing strategies for equality, rural development, sustainable development and targeting social need.”

I concur with that view, and I strongly support the recommendation that a restored Executive needs to proceed to:

“develop and implement such a policy, for the benefit of the whole of Northern Ireland as a matter of priority.”

Families in rural areas and regional towns need existing public-sector jobs to be sustained and secured. Local residents rightly demand the relocation of new jobs to places in which administrative expertise and skills exist in abundance.

Take the Workplace 2010 strategy as an example: it involves a review of current Civil Service office accommodation in Belfast and in regional towns. I am aware that the strategy group has already earmarked some public-service offices in South Down to be part of that review. Those include Rathkeltair House in Downpatrick and the local social security office. Rathkeltair House provides Planning Service and Roads Service functions as well as housing the driver and vehicle licensing office, the county agricultural office and the jobcentre. The building is relatively new — 16 years old — and is considered to be a development opportunity, but no sound reason has been offered for its inclusion in the contract. Many public-sector staff work there and wish to remain there; indeed, the majority of local residents access services there.

Public-sector staff must be provided with working conditions that reflect best practice in health-and-safety requirements.

Why sell a building that is only 16 years old? What is the real rationale for such a proposal? Was it made in the interests of people, the requirements of the local area, the best service delivery, or cost? Clarification is urgently required on that matter. I note the commitment made by Minister Hanson in a recent letter to me, dated 7 November 2006, that:

“the staff providing public services currently within the building would be relocated to another location within the town.”

I welcome that ministerial commitment to sustain existing jobs. I hope that that remains the position and that further opportunities will be created for the decentralisation of new public-sector jobs through the construction of the new Social Security Agency office in Downpatrick and substantial associated offices in other towns in the area. I believe that that task must be fulfilled at an early opportunity in order to provide public and local confidence. I hope that that will be one of the priorities of a restored Assembly and Executive.

Job dispersal and the relocation of new public-sector jobs to regional towns must be an integral part of the Workplace 2010 initiative. The needs of families, the young and the elderly must motivate, propel, and be the driving force of Government policy for the location of jobs. Furthermore, there is a compelling imperative for a revised Workplace 2010 strategy to ensure the sustainability of existing public-sector jobs and the relocation of new jobs to regional towns in order to fulfil the requirements of the regional development strategy. The Workplace 2010 strategy must quell the current contradictions in Government policy.

My colleague John Dallat, who represents the east Derry constituency, referred to the relocation of motor vehicle testing to Swansea from Coleraine. If that decision were implemented, it would also have an impact on the local vehicle testing offices that are dotted throughout Northern Ireland. If Workplace 2010 is to mean anything for the decentralisation of local jobs to local towns, the relocation of the Coleraine office must be stopped immediately.

In 2000-01, the regional development strategy stated that Downpatrick should develop as a hub town. For that to happen, there must be: a centre of public administration that provides substantial, high-level, public-sector jobs; a thriving retail commercial base; inward investment opportunities; support for local indigenous business, including the tourist centre; and a significant land zone for social and private-sector housing.

I therefore look forward to positive approval for Down District Council's request for the location of a new council headquarters in Downpatrick. Such an administrative centre, with the capacity to accommodate other public-sector and Civil Service jobs, could be the centre of public administration excellence, alongside the divisional police headquarters, the Social Security Agency, the proposed midwifery unit, the new hospital, and the ambulance and emergency services centre. Expertise and skills in medical, health and social services provision and public-sector administration must be sustained and developed.

Moreover, the growing problems of travel to and through the greater Belfast area would suggest that it makes economic and social sense to secure existing jobs and relocate new public-sector jobs to places such as Downpatrick. The Assembly must resist any residual attempts in Workplace 2010 to rob regional towns and rural communities of existing jobs or new employment opportunities.

Economic opportunities in regional towns must be developed and sustained. We must continue to ensure that our children are able to seek employment and career opportunities in towns such as those in my constituency of South Down. We must continue to ensure that public-sector jobs in Northern Ireland are dispersed effectively and equitably. Provision of new public-sector jobs, combined with the development of all possible economic opportunities, investment in roads and transport infrastructure and the enhancement of the agricultural, fishing and tourism sectors will help to ensure more equitable benefits for families, young people and the elderly.

Workplace 2010 must be a determined strategy to decentralise Government jobs to rural areas. If not, it should be scrapped. It should protect and secure existing jobs, and it should secure the relocation and creation of new jobs in our regional towns so that a positive contribution can be made to the local economy.

It is significant that the Taoiseach is launching the National Development Plan (NDP) today. That is the first such plan with an all-island dimension, and, hopefully, it will provide the necessary funds to give regional towns the infrastructure that will ensure that new jobs can be located in them. If those towns have the links, why can they not have new jobs? That is what balanced regional development is all about.

Mr Beggs: I share the concerns that other Members have about the contract and the huge dangers that exist. Ultimately, those could cost local taxpayers and any devolved Administration dearly for decades. We should remember past mistakes, particularly those made with the electricity contracts, which we are only getting out of now. There is a huge danger that we will repeat those past mistakes.

I wish to concentrate on the effect that the proposed change will have on my constituency of East Antrim. I wish also to highlight the lack of Civil Service job opportunities in that constituency. My points will be relevant, given that I have heard many Members argue that Civil Service jobs should move west. That argument suggests that constituencies in the east are better served. I wish to draw relevant and objective material to the attention of Members and senior civil servants.

According to the claimant-count figures of December 2006, the job density figure for the East Antrim constituency is 0.48. That is the lowest figure for any constituency in Northern Ireland. Essentially, people in East Antrim have relatively few job opportunities. Unemployment levels in East Antrim are listed in the claimant count as being at the Northern Ireland average of 2.4%. What does that mean? It means that to travel to where jobs are located, constituents of mine in places such as Larne, Carrickfergus and Newtownabbey must get on their bikes, in their cars or onto buses or trains. They must travel to other places at a cost to themselves.

Mr Elliott: Does the Member agree that it would be difficult for someone who lives in Enniskillen to cycle to a job in Belfast?

Mr Beggs: I hope that the Member accepts that it would be equally difficult for someone who lives in Carnlough to travel to work in Belfast. Other areas of East Antrim, in the east of the Province, have relatively few Civil Service job opportunities.

Annex 1 of the 'Report on Workplace 2010 and Public Sector Jobs Location' illustrates civil servants' work locations and from where they travel. It shows that of the constituencies in the east, East Antrim has the second-lowest number of Civil Service jobs in the devolved Departments. It has 215 employees from a total Civil Service workforce of over 27,000; that means that less than 1% of the workforce is employed in the constituency. That translates to only 78 jobs in Carrickfergus, 136 in Larne and 148 in Newtownabbey.

The Carrickfergus Borough Council area has the second lowest number of Civil Service jobs of any Northern Ireland council area. My constituents must travel elsewhere for jobs in the Civil Service. The opportunities do not exist in parts of the east of the Province, just as they do not exist in parts of the west. East Antrim fares badly in terms of job opportunities.

What of the future? We are all aware that the RPA is at a fairly advanced stage, and that other Civil Service reforms are to occur as well. I have noticed changes under way that will adversely affect my constituents' already low level of employment. It is clear that there will be fewer council employees in my constituency. I share the concerns of my constituents that, with Carrickfergus and Newtownabbey being grouped with Lisburn and Antrim, local jobs will be relocated to those towns, where the councils have large, plush new headquarters.

Similarly, Larne has been grouped with Ballymena, Ballymoney, Moyle and Coleraine. Jobs in Larne are likely to be transferred to Ballymena or Coleraine. The Larne offices of the Roads Service and the Water Service have closed in recent years, and I am concerned that other areas that are under review may suffer similarly, especially since the area already has one of the lowest numbers of Civil Service jobs in Northern Ireland.

The Social Security Agency is currently reviewing back-office operations in Carrickfergus and Larne. It has been hinted that these operations will be discontinued, and there is consultation ongoing at present, so what few jobs remain are also at risk. I have also had informal conversations with a relatively senior member of staff of the Housing Executive, and I was asked whether Larne leaned more towards Ballymena or towards other towns in East Antrim. Obviously there is some discussion within the Housing Executive about the possibility of downgrading its office in Larne — perhaps it will become some sort of sub-office, at more cost to local jobs.

There is not just a dearth of jobs in the west; there are areas in the east that need job opportunities to be created, and this is particularly so in my East Antrim constituency. Jobs are at risk in the councils, in the Housing Executive and in the social security offices, and the constituency could end up with a complete dearth of Civil Service job opportunities.

I ask the Government and any future Administration here to examine areas in the east of Northern Ireland that have not been faring well. I support my colleague from Fermanagh and South Tyrone Mr Elliott in asking for a fair and reasonable balance in any relocation plan for Civil Service jobs. I ask for a fair and reasonable number of jobs to be relocated to East Antrim, so that the large number of civil servants who live there do not have to travel to Belfast or other areas at a cost to the environment and at a personal cost, given the extra travelling distance, to themselves.

Mrs O'Rawe: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

I welcome the opportunity to speak on the report from the Programme for Government Committee on Workplace 2010. I support the comments that others have made about the timescale involved and about how advanced the project already is. As my party colleague Mr Doherty said earlier, Sinn Féin has no difficulty with a modernising and reforming agenda that leads to better work practices and accommodation. However, we do have concerns on a number of issues around Workplace 2010 and the location of jobs in the public sector, most of which have already been mentioned. Workplace 2010 has implications for employees, given that private-sector companies will be managing the estate.

There are proposals to outsource work currently done by the Civil Service, and NIPSA (Northern Ireland Public Service Alliance) has stated that more than 500 jobs will be handed over to private-sector contractors. Such action would have huge implications for conditions of employment and pensions. Over 300 of those 500 jobs involve the lowest-paid staff in areas such as security provision and mail and messenger services.

Sinn Féin is concerned that that decision will have an adverse impact on certain groups on whom section 75 will have an effect, including those for whom gender and community background are issues. Although women and Catholics are under-represented in Senior Civil Service grades, they are over-represented in the lower grades, which are the grades most likely to be affected by privatisation.

Sinn Féin is concerned that Workplace 2010 will have an adverse impact on workers who will have to move from the public sector to the private sector, and it shares the concerns of others that The Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 2006 (TUPE) will not provide adequate protection. It is not enough for the initial consultation document to state that TUPE should be sufficient to prevent adverse impacts. That is too vague and does nothing to allay the fears of the workers who would be affected by the transfer. Sinn Féin notes that Britain has experienced difficulties with the transfer of undertakings, and my party is concerned that those are not adequately addressed in Workplace 2010.

Sinn Féin's concerns around dispersal or decentralisation remain, and the equality impact assessment has not addressed them. A LeasCheann Comhairle, I hope that all the concerns raised by the subgroup are given due consideration. I thank the staff from the subgroup and the witnesses who gave evidence. Go raibh maith agat.

The Chairman of the Subgroup on Workplace 2010 and Public Sector Jobs Location (Mr Poots): Although I was not a member of the subgroup, as its nominated Chairman, it falls on me to wind up the debate.

As a result of decisions taken at a meeting of the Committee on the Programme for Government on 11 December 2006, my party was invited to nominate a member to facilitate the work of the subgroup. I was honoured to assume that role, and although I was unable to attend the subgroup's final meeting, at which my party colleague Paul Girvan ably deputised, I was present when the subgroup heard its oral evidence, considered the written submissions and discussed the issues in some detail.

Many of the points that have been made in the debate have therefore come as no surprise, as they referred to issues that exercised the minds of the members of the subgroup. Neither has it surprised me to hear contributions from Members who represent urban, suburban and rural constituencies. The question of where public-sector jobs — or, for that matter, any jobs — might be located is often the subject of discussion, and the prospect of employment opportunities in one's constituency is always attractive.

Thus far, my assessment is that some more Departments will have to be created, because we have had proposals for new offices in the city of Londonderry and in Strabane, Omagh, Dungannon and Enniskillen. Indeed, when she referred to hub towns, Margaret Ritchie appeared to want several Departments to be located in Downpatrick; not in Ballynahinch, Newcastle or Saintfield, but very clearly in Downpatrick.

I found it interesting that officials from the Department appeared reluctant to enter into detailed discussions with the subgroup about the location of public-sector jobs, preferring instead to extol the virtues of Workplace 2010. However, the Hansard report shows that one witness said that:

"The issue has economic, political, staff and public service elements". — [Official Report, Bound Volume 21, pSG146, col 1].

In that sense, the location of public-sector jobs is absolutely no different to Workplace 2010, which is a massive project that will impact on the delivery of public services, as well as affecting civil servants' well-being.

Thomas Buchanan rightly pointed out that local businesses should not lose out as a result of Workplace 2010. Esmond Birnie cautioned against the risk of awarding long-term financial contracts and getting the financial variables wrong.

He identified three key issues: getting the right price, ensuring that the leaseback charges are reasonable, and the risk of additional charges if there is a need to adjust the contract. He also referred to the failure of the PFI project at Balmoral High School and the resulting closure of that building.

John Dallat, like Dr Birnie, pointed to the difficulty of diversifying public-sector jobs. Others said that many people from the north-west of the Province have to leave home in the early hours of the morning to travel to work, and that this results in congestion on the motorways and added stress on the drivers.

Mr Dallat seems to suffer from the deluded misconception that a devolved Executive would be a panacea for all the problems that exist in Northern Ireland. A mantra that has been expressed by many on the opposite side of the House in recent weeks when we come up against a problem of any kind is that if we just had a devolved Executive, everything would be well — there would be sunshine whenever we required it, it would rain only at night when people were sleeping, the grass would be greener and everything would be so much better. Unfortunately, that is not the reality; any new Executive that there might be at some future date would face many of these problems and would not have all the answers that people seem to expect them to have.

Sean Neeson rightly criticised the Secretary of State's decision to exclude the Alliance Party from the Programme for Government Committee. He said that that was a disservice. I was more strongly in agreement with him at the outset of his speech than I was at the conclusion, particularly when he mentioned relocating jobs to Londonderry. I wonder what his colleague the mayor of Lisburn — Northern Ireland's second city — would have to say about the former leader of the Alliance Party's being so keen to take more jobs to Londonderry when there are so few public-sector jobs in Lisburn, which is a larger city. He also criticised the conditions that some civil servants are expected to work in; I think that that criticism was fair.

Mr Neeson also called for modern and efficient public offices. Giving evidence to the subgroup, the Northern Ireland Public Service Alliance made several references to the difficulties that it was having with Clare House. Subsequently I visited Clare House, and the working conditions in that building are much better than in many of the buildings where civil servants currently work. There is certainly potential to provide better buildings for civil servants under these proposals.

Pat Doherty, of Sinn Féin, broadly supported a programme of modernisation. He was critical of privatisation, especially with regard to employment conditions and pensions. He thought that the proposals that we have militate against decentralisation and that there is a lack of will on the part of senior civil servants to pursue a decentralisation policy. I suspect that that may be correct; civil servants may not necessarily be that inclined to decentralise from their current locations.

Robin Newton spoke of a need for investment in public-sector buildings and a modernisation programme. He expressed concern about the small and medium-sized businesses that are providing services at the moment, but took some comfort from the fact that, even though the four bidders are multinational companies, they have all indicated that they will use local labour and local companies in carrying out their operations.

There were a number of references to the uncertainty in the minds of civil servants about the possibility of relocation and the disruption that it would entail. Tom Elliott said that Workplace 2010 is not just about buildings but about people. He was concerned that not enough time had been taken to consider the lessons from the two pilot projects, and that local economies would suffer. He was also in favour of decentralisation and was one of the individuals who proposed that two Departments should go to Fermanagh and South Tyrone.

Margaret Ritchie called for public-sector job location to take account of the needs and economic states of local communities. She mentioned Downpatrick on several occasions during her speech. Ms Ritchie said that existing jobs should be sustained in local areas and called for an affirmative policy of job dispersal. She also believes that Government policy should be consistent. The regional development strategy promotes hub towns, of which public-sector jobs are an important aspect. While others wish to constrain the growth of the public sector and encourage the growth of the private sector, Margaret Ritchie seeks new public-sector jobs in Downpatrick. She wants a bigger public sector, with more administrators and civil servants, and less money for front-line services, such as doctors, nurses and teachers.

Roy Beggs recalled the privatisation of Northern Ireland Electricity and how the company was undervalued. He is worried that history might repeat itself. Unlike his East Antrim colleague Mr Neeson, he pointed out that it is not only the west that suffers from a dearth of jobs. He also pointed out that the effect of RPA, and the reduction in the number of councils, has the potential for further job reductions in smaller towns, such as Larne and Carrickfergus. If Lisburn City Council and Carrickfergus Borough Council are to be amalgamated — and who knows what councils will be amalgamated — I think that the folks of Lisburn will be happy to give the folks of Carrick a fair crack of the whip in deciding what might happen.

Mrs O’Rawe was the last Member who spoke for Sinn Féin — perhaps not for Sinn Féin, but she was certainly the last Member to speak. She feels that there will be difficulties in dealing with the section 75 issues in Workplace 2010.

I have my own concerns about the proposals. The logic of selling property only to rent it back is flawed. If people in the private sector who have acquired property in recent years were asked whether they regretted it, remarkably few would say that they do. Indeed, more people want to buy property in order to rent it out because it is a profitable exercise, as opposed to what the Government are doing, which is selling property and renting it back. Usually, property grows in value, as has been reflected over the past number of years.

I am deeply concerned that anyone could propose renovating Dundonald House to current building standards. Dundonald House, which was developed in the 1960s, is well past its sell-by date. One problem with the design and structural quality of that building is that it is a copycat development of something from the Marxist eastern bloc. The original problems with the design and structure of Dundonald House, as highlighted in a report in the 1990s, are the reason that the building now has problems with crumbling concrete and secondary glazing in the structure, and why there is a complete absence of air conditioning.

The cost of the renovation work would far exceed that of a new building. In terms of a building, and a Department, that is ripe for relocation, the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development, which is tasked with dealing with rural issues but is based in a crumbling building in east Belfast, should be the number-one target for any constituency. Members from quite a number of constituencies have said where they think that Department should be relocated.

Arguments can be made for the relocation of DARD, which could be achieved at a reduced cost to the public rather than renovating the existing building. I have been told by people involved in Workplace 2010 that there should not be a problem with that. If it is identified that it would cost more to bring Dundonald House up to acceptable standards than to acquire a new building, the Department could be relocated to another site.

I thank all Members who participated in the debate. It has been useful, and I trust that the contributions will assist the Civil Service in reaching its conclusions. Some people suggest that the proposals represent a fait accompli and that nothing more can be done. Nonetheless, the report has been produced, and I trust that due consideration will be given to what is contained therein.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly notes the report from the Committee on the Programme for Government on Workplace 2010 and Public Sector Jobs Location and endorses the findings and conclusions set out in the Report.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to meet at lunchtime today. I therefore propose, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the House until 2.00 pm.

The sitting was suspended at 12.15 pm.

*On resuming (Madam Speaker in the Chair) —
2.00 pm*

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

Welfare Reform Bill

Madam Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow two hours for the debate. The Member who is proposing the motion has 15 minutes to speak, with 15 minutes for the winding-up speech. All other Members who wish to speak will have a maximum of 10 minutes.

Mr O'Dowd: I beg to move

That this Assembly expresses deep concern about the implications of the Welfare Reform Bill, particularly the introduction of a new coercive regime into benefit administration, and its impact on a number of vulnerable groups, including neurological patients.

I will speak in favour of the motion, but as the day goes on, I may speak in favour of the amendment. Given that the amendment is in the flavour of the motion, I will not speak against it. However, the difference between the motion and the amendment is a technicality that we might clear up as the debate proceeds.

The Welfare Reform Bill was introduced in the British House of Commons in July 2006 and has been carried into the 2006-07 session. The British Government intend to extend the Bill to the North by way of a welfare reform Order — that is, government by undemocratic direction.

The Bill has five main components, but the provisions that we will debate attract the most public attention. First is the introduction of a new style of benefit — the employment and support allowance (ESA) — that is to replace incapacity benefit. The main tenets of that benefit are that during the 13 weeks after first making a claim, claimants will be assessed and placed in one of two groups. Group one, which is the work-related activity group, is for those who are capable of participating in work-focused interviews and activities. Group two, which is the support group, is for those who have been assessed as severely functionally limited — that is a rather regrettable term. People who are in that group will not have to participate in such work-focused activities, but they can choose to do so.

During those first 13 weeks, all new claimants will receive a basic award while their assessment is completed. It is unclear how that assessment will be carried out in the North. In England, private companies are to be used. However, lobby groups in England are uncovering already some disquieting revelations about those very companies. Claimants in the support group will be entitled to an additional support component payment, which is likely to be higher than that that is given to those who are in the work-related activity group.

Each claimant in the work-related activity group — this is a bit technical, but we will get through it — will have to agree an action plan with their personal adviser. It is not clear what qualifications, if any, are required of personal advisers. In fact, a personal adviser to someone who has severe and complex medical needs may have no medical background whatever.

If a claimant is unable to attend an interview without good cause, a sanction will be imposed. “Good cause” has not been defined, but it appears that the caseworker will determine what is “good cause”. However, as I have said, that caseworker may not have any knowledge of neurological, mental or physical health conditions.

Although today’s debate focuses on the provisions that relate to changes in incapacity benefit, the Bill also proposes changes to several other areas, including housing benefit and council-tax relief in England.

When translated to here, it will mean that when new Labour refers to welfare reform, it means possible cuts in housing benefit and rates relief and a possible increase in taxation.

We are debating the implications of the Bill on vulnerable groups, including neurological patients, people with multiple sclerosis (MS), brain injuries, epilepsy and many other complaints. It will also include people with mental-health issues and those restricted by a physical disability. The Bill will force, coerce and bully such people into compulsory participation in a practice that might see unqualified civil servants making medical decisions about people with complex health and medical issues.

The practice of compulsory participation for such claimants with complex health problems in work-related activity groups is inappropriate in principle, given the fluctuating, and at times unpredictable, nature of some of those health problems. The Bill attempts to cover up the practice of forcing people with complex health and medical needs back to work as an alternative therapy — a crude form of the “work-never-killed-anyone” analysis. The Department for Work and Pensions (DWP) in Britain, which administers the Pathways to Work pilot scheme, admits that its therapists are unfamiliar with neurological conditions.

Are we being told that the section of the local Social Security Agency that deals with incapacity benefit, which will undoubtedly enact the Welfare Reform Bill here, is bursting at the seams with neurological experts? I think not. The Social Security Agency is not qualified in that regard.

Mr S Wilson: The Minister in England has made it clear that there will be extensive training for staff and that he is happy for voluntary groups with expertise in identifying mental-health problems to be involved in that training. Does that not assure the Member that at least some people with expertise from interested groups will be helping the staff who will be making the decisions?

Mr O’Dowd: The Member is correct; the Minister made such a statement. However, are we to say that civil servants working in the Social Security Agency or other Departments that administer benefits will be trained to be psychologists or neurologists?

Mr McCann: Does Mr O’Dowd recall a similar exercise that was carried out four or five years ago? People on long-term benefits, including those who were severely disabled, mentally ill and those with a whole range of medical disabilities, were asked to come to a benefit office only to find that the staff were unqualified. Many of those people found that their benefits were suspended through no fault of their own. Does the Member agree that there is a very strong possibility that, regardless of the level of training, lay people will be working in a medical environment, which will have a knock-on effect right across the community?

Mr O’Dowd: I do agree. It is also clear that there is no regulatory body for therapists. Any voluntary group can set itself up with therapists and be introduced into the system, and that is unfair. Indeed, the Bill refers to “alternative medical treatments”. The Department for Work and Pensions in England is not the Department of Health; the Department for Social Development (DSD) is not the Department of Health here. The DSD is not qualified to hand out treatment. Treatment is not offered by GPs or consultants or by the Department of Health, but by someone appointed by a Department with no medical or health knowledge. Patients are told that, if they do not adhere to advice given by unqualified individuals, their benefits will be cut.

Vulnerable people in our society have been placed in an impossible position, and those with mental-health issues are being put under added pressure. Proposals of conditionality may result in undue pressure being put on claimants to sign up to inappropriate or unachievable action plans rather than risk a reduction in their benefits.

Pilot schemes in Britain have already thrown up cases of vulnerable people being forced into jobs and scenarios that they were not ready for, and, more importantly, for which they were not given any form of proper support and guidance.

The British Government tell us that the main principle of the Welfare Reform Bill is to support and encourage more people in receipt of incapacity benefits to move into employment, where they are able to do so. No one can argue with that; unfortunately, the Bill's remaining 264 clauses are more to do with reducing the cost of incapacity benefit than a structured and properly managed plan for a return to work.

The Bill does not address the reluctance of employers to accept potential new employees whose records show long-term receipt of incapacity benefit. It does nothing to remove the physical and mental obstacles placed in the way of people who wish to come off incapacity benefits and return to work. Recent statistics confirm that fewer than 40% of employers would hire someone with a mental illness, with 70% stating that to employ someone with schizophrenia would either be impossible or very difficult.

There is little point in encouraging people towards work if employers are unwilling to employ them. Furthermore, encountering such prejudice or discrimination can have a devastating effect on the mental health of an individual who has successfully come off benefits only to have to return to those benefits in a worse state of health. The vast majority of people with disabilities, mental-health issues and neurological conditions want to play their part in the workforce. Some, due to their conditions, may not be able to do so. We should recognise that and legislate for those circumstances in a compassionate manner.

The Government must take further action to reduce the stigma and discrimination faced by people with mental-health problems. Only last week, Rethink (NI) launched a campaign on the steps of Stormont, calling on people to rethink their attitudes to mental health. However, the Government have not played their role, particularly in eradicating prejudices among employers.

People with the conditions that I have described have been to the forefront of campaigning against the discriminatory employment practices that excluded them. They want to remove the barriers to employment; the Government have a duty to act. The Welfare Reform Bill is not about ensuring that those people can play their part in the workforce in a properly structured and managed fashion: it is about forcing people into jobs that may well have a detrimental effect on their health and well-being.

What is required? For a start, we need an Assembly and an Executive to prevent the Welfare Reform Bill becoming reality. Another good starting point would be the enactment of legislation based on the desire to help people back to work, not simply to save money. We must remove the barriers to employment for people with mental-health difficulties and physical and neurological conditions, and make proper provision for those who — we must accept — may not be able to return to work.

Any review of individual cases should be carried out by properly qualified doctors and medical teams — not civil servants or private companies, as is proposed in the English Bill. Most of all, people should be treated with dignity. Rather than brand them as spongers, any review of the welfare system should ensure that people with mental-health difficulties, disabilities or neurological conditions are made to feel valued. I ask the House to support the motion.

Mrs D Kelly: I beg to move the following amendment: Leave out all after “groups” and insert “, especially those people with mental ill health.”

The SDLP's amendment is not intended to dilute the motion, but to clarify the impact that the Welfare Reform Bill will have on people with mental ill health. The original motion, in specifying neurological patients, was somewhat confusing, as the definition of a neurological patient is wide-ranging in its medical interpretation. However, I thank the Member for Upper Bann Mr O'Dowd for expanding on that in his contribution.

The Welfare Reform Bill introduces the employment and support allowance, which will replace incapacity benefit. The vast majority of ESA claimants will have to take part in work-focused and work-related activities in order to obtain the full rate of benefit. People assessed as severely functionally limited will not have to attend interviews or engage in specified activities to receive the full rate of benefit. This latter group is known as a support group. However, there are concerns that this mechanism will deny people with severe and enduring mental-health conditions opportunities for supported employment.

Mr S Wilson: Does the Member not accept that the current system does just that? It stigmatises people by implying that those on incapacity benefit are incapable of work. Even though nine out of 10 people go on to incapacity benefit hoping to get back to work, of those who stay on it for two years or more, most stay on it until they retire or die. The real stigma is being presented by the current system, not the one proposed.

Mrs D Kelly: I thank the Member for his point. The SDLP is not opposed to welfare reform. We share the view of many leading charities and others that people who abuse the system must be rooted out. They deprive our society of much needed funding for schools and hospitals and give genuine claimants a bad name.

In setting out the case for reform, the Green Paper states that:

“Ensuring citizens have the right to enter the world of work is a fundamental responsibility of any modern government.”

The SDLP has long recognised the social injustice that is inflicted by the poverty trap of benefit dependency. The fact that one child in three continues to live in poverty must be a key challenge for a restored Assembly to tackle.

The SDLP welcomes the opportunities for employment in the North presented by the Irish Government in its National Development Plan, much of which mirrors ideas and strategies of the SDLP's 'North South Makes Sense' campaign. However, the motion rightly calls on the House to express deep concern at the implications of the Welfare Reform Bill, a view shared by many leading non-governmental organisations which advocate on behalf of those with disabilities and mental ill-health, including the Royal College of Psychiatrists.

People with mental-health problems are one of the most excluded groups in society. According to the social exclusion unit, only 24% of adults with mental-health problems are in work, which is the lowest employment rate of any of the main groups of disabled people. Added to that, fewer than four in 10 employers say that they would recruit someone with a mental-health problem. Employers are key to the success of welfare reform, but there is nothing in the Bill to encourage them, or ensure that they play as full a role as possible in helping people to move from benefit to work and remain there. Tax incentives could provide such encouragement.

The SDLP is also concerned that staff assessing an individual's capability to work do not have appropriate training in mental health to assess people for employment and support allowance, and for supporting people into work. The Bill has no proposals to increase training for support staff who will have to make important decisions on a person's suitability, nor is there any cross-reference to the role that allied health professionals, especially occupational therapists, could play in making such assessments.

Members know about the current inadequate provision of staff and the long waiting lists. Given the key role of occupational therapists in the rehabilitation of people with mental ill health, this will place increased demands on an already overstretched resource. There is no sign of Government joined-up thinking here.

The use of sanctions is a major cause for concern. If claimants do not comply with the conditionality criteria, which are: attend work-focused interviews; attend work-focused health-related assessments; and engage in work-related activities, they risk losing up to 25% of their benefit right away. Unemployment, and the ensuing financial hardship, is a contributing factor to mental ill health, with increased stress and anxiety, loss of self-esteem and depression.

Mr P Ramsey: Currently, there is no the right of appeal in respect of ESA in the Bill. The Member referred to the support groups who are concerned about the fear and anxiety that people, particularly those with mental-health problems, will have as a result of these customer-unfriendly forms that they will have to complete. Will the Member support the call for the retention of the independent appeals service?

Mrs D Kelly: I thank the Member for his intervention, and I support his call. The right of appeal is a fundamental concern that many organisations have expressed about the Bill.

The threat to remove benefit without putting proper support in place can only be seen as punitive. There are insufficient guarantees that the right support will be available, and there are not enough vocational training rehabilitation facilities available at accessible locations in Northern Ireland. The community and voluntary sector fights the good fight to fill the gaps, but it has to continuously chase European funding or seek the crumbs from the table of health and social services.

The Welfare Reform Bill is long on regulation but short on evidence-based approaches. There are no guarantees that the staff who will be the decision-makers have the appropriate training and skills, or that the doctors who conduct the medical reviews have the time or even the specialist mental-health training to do so. In the past, doctors were put under pressure to put people onto incapacity benefit in order to reduce the unemployment statistics; now there is a new form of social definition of medical incapacity in order to push doctors the other way.

More needs to be done to seek the support and co-operation of potential employers as the key, and the right of appeal is limited.

Madam Speaker, I support the amendment to the motion and will take advice later on how neurological patients can also be included in it.

Mr N Dodds: This is an important piece of legislation, which has already gone through the legislative process in the House of Commons.

First, the Northern Ireland Assembly decided that there would be parity between Northern Ireland and the rest of the United Kingdom in welfare, benefits and social security legislation. It took that very sensible decision on a consensual basis because the consequences of not implementing parity would be too awful to contemplate. It would create a financial black hole, and the resources of the Department of Finance and Personnel would be taken up almost exclusively in trying to deal with differences between here and the rest of the United Kingdom.

It would cause considerable inconvenience and disadvantage to all communities here in trying to access entitlements compared to the rest of the country. It would have a devastating impact on the ability and ease of people to move freely between different parts of the United Kingdom and to move, live and work elsewhere. Northern Ireland would have to have new and different computer systems and different administrative arrangements, which would cost a fortune.

Parity was the right thing to do then, and it is the right thing to do now. Any future devolved Administration that does not go down that path would be playing into the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and Her Majesty's Treasury, who would be delighted if Northern Ireland were to go its own way on benefits and social security. Breaking parity would give them the opportunity to consider a great many other issues for a financial package for Northern Ireland.

Mr S Wilson: Does the Member see any irony in the fact that Members opposite, especially Sinn Féin Members, suggest that we should go our own way? Those same Members would violently and vehemently oppose the regionalisation of public-sector pay, for example, but have no difficulty with the regionalisation of public benefits.

Mr N Dodds: The Member is quite right to point out that dichotomy.

In a debate in the Northern Ireland Assembly, an Alliance Party Member proposed that we should increase pensions by £5 per pensioner. We do not need a debate in the House to get consensus that £5 is not enough and that we need to increase it by far more. However, when it was pointed out that the cost would have to come out of our own resources, no one could say where the hundreds of millions of pounds should come from.

The principle of parity is well established; it has been in existence for the social security arrangements between Great Britain and Northern Ireland for decades, and it should continue.

However, it is right and proper that, as the legislation proceeds, Northern Ireland Ministers, whether direct rule or devolved, should express their views to their colleagues about the arrangements that should apply to all our citizens for social security benefits. The same applies to provision in the Bill for incapacity benefit claimants.

The principle has been enunciated that there should be support for those who cannot work and encouragement for those who can and wish to return to work. No artificial barriers should be put in their way, and the system should try to make it worthwhile for those who can work to do so.

Statistics show that the difficulty with the current system is that many of those who go onto incapacity benefit stay on it for many years. At first, claimants do not believe that they will be on benefit for an extended period, but circumstances force them to stay on it. Throughout the country, over half of those on incapacity benefit have been on it for over five years. That compares to 43% in 1997; so the number on long-term incapacity benefit is rising. The number of under-25-year-olds on incapacity benefit has risen by 71%, almost three quarters, since 1997.

I talk about these and other issues in my constituency advice surgery with many people. I am sure that other Members do likewise. What many people want is to have support when it is needed, but to be able to move forward when they feel they can. The present system does not provide that flexibility.

Mr P Ramsey: Does the Member not accept that support groups are genuinely concerned that the main focus of the Welfare Reform Bill is on a reduction of benefit costs rather than on helping those with chronic medical problems?

Mr N Dodds: I will come to that point. I have already said that while the DUP generally supports the principle of parity, there are issues to be addressed. People are concerned. The issue mentioned is the capacity of advisers to recognise those suffering from mental illness. That point, raised by organisations and charities, is important and needs to be firmly addressed. Over 40% of benefit claimants suffer from mental-health problems. If secondary mental-health effects are included, that number rises to two out of every three claimants. That is very important. It is essential that advisers are properly trained and equipped, and that they get the input and assistance that my hon Friend Mr Wilson, the Member for East Antrim, referred to. My party will push strongly for that.

I am concerned about other aspects of the Bill too. It is unnecessarily complicated. The new employment and support allowance will create six levels or categories into which claimants will fall. Trying to explain to claimants how the benefit system works is already complicated. However, under this proposed legislation, distinction will be made between non-contributory claimants who fail to go to work-focused interviews; contributory claimants who fail to go to work-focused interviews; non-contributory claimants who receive the work-related activity component; contributory claimants who receive that component; those deemed to have limited capability to work who will receive the support component; and severely disabled who currently receive the disablement allowance. It is extremely complicated. One can predict a rise in the number of complaints to constituency offices and other agencies because of that.

These concerns are well-founded, and there needs to be much more information provided. The Bill should have been streamlined. The intent behind it is good, but it is unnecessarily complex, and there are potential pitfalls. I could have made many other points.

The approach of simply sitting back and doing nothing fails the people who are most in need of support and help. I am concerned about parties that simply take the attitude that the Welfare Reform Bill is no good and that the Assembly should ditch it. Parties must be extremely careful — I have not heard the proposal of a single alternative that would not cost millions of pounds by breaking the parity principle and thereby taking money away from those who need it, namely claimants and others who need that support. Parties must focus on the work that needs to be done, particularly on training and information. Some of the proposals that have been made today concern me.

2.30 pm

Mr Kennedy: This is an important debate — and obviously many of my party colleagues share that view. [Laughter.] At least the Marie-Céleste was staffed.

I have no doubt that my colleagues are elsewhere in the Building or in their constituencies, undermining the efforts of those Members who are here. It is —

[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr Kennedy: If Members want more time to interrupt me further, that is fine.

The Welfare Reform Bill that is currently going through Parliament will not apply to Northern Ireland. I understand that a separate Order in Council will be made for Northern Ireland, which will be based on the provisions of that Bill. Although the Ulster Unionist Party is concerned that Northern Ireland has the highest rates of economic inactivity in the UK, those rates are comparable with some regions in Great Britain. It is doubtful that the Welfare Reform Bill will address that problem, and pilot schemes in Great Britain have had little impact on the levels of economic inactivity.

A range of mental-health charities and interest groups have criticised the Bill. However, the charities, and the Ulster Unionist Party, are more supportive of those elements of the Bill that seek to empower claimants to return to work. In February 2006, some 112,996 people were claiming incapacity benefits, and 169,691 were claiming disability living allowance in Northern Ireland. Therefore, the Bill affects a considerable number of people.

Rethink, a leading national mental-health charity, has welcomed the provision of more support for people on incapacity benefit because many people with severe mental illness want to work, but have been left without the necessary help and support to do so.

However, Rethink is concerned about the Bill's proposals to disqualify people from benefit or reduce their benefit on certain grounds. Claimants' benefits could be reduced if they do not attend a work-focused interview or undertake work-related activity without good cause. Jobcentre Plus staff do not know enough about severe mental illness to make judgements about whether someone fails to attend for no good reason or because of a serious deterioration in their condition. That could lead to those on low incomes having their benefits cut unfairly.

Rethink is also concerned about proposals that would effectively disqualify from entitlement to benefit anyone who behaves in an improper fashion or fails to take medical advice for no good reason. The treatment of severe mental illness is often a case of trial and error, and medication often causes severe side effects. If someone stopped or reduced their medication because of such severe side effects, would that be considered a good reason? What would happen if someone disagreed with a psychiatrist's diagnosis or tried complementary therapy instead? Those are the aspects of concern to Rethink.

Under the Pathways to Work rollout many people may require support to work that they have never been offered before. The provision of cognitive behavioural therapy, which is woefully inadequate throughout the NHS, is particularly welcome. However, Rethink is concerned by early research findings commissioned by the Department for Work and Pensions, which states that:

“there is no statistically significant evidence that the policy has any impact on those who report having one health problem that is mental illness.”

The Department for Work and Pensions needs to think more widely about the sort of support that could work for people with mental illness and should consult with service users and carers.

The Government have not taken enough action to reduce the prejudice and real discrimination of employers. There is little point in pushing people towards work if employers are prejudiced against giving jobs to people with severe mental illness. Fewer than 40% of employers say that they would employ someone with mental illness. Some 75% of employers have said that employing someone with schizophrenia would be impossible or very difficult. The Work and Pensions Committee said that the Government's action on employers was “wholly inadequate”. It still is. New Zealand spends 25 times more per head of population than the UK Government on anti-stigma campaigns. We need to challenge the stigma of mental illness if we are going to help people get back to work.

Overall the Welfare Reform Bill focuses on supporting more people into work, and that is a welcome aim. Thirty-five percent of people with long-term mental-health issues, who are economically inactive, would like to get back to work, as compared to 28% of people with other health problems. People with mental-health issues are often keen and willing to return to work but lack the support to be able to achieve that goal. Many proposals in the Bill demonstrate a greater awareness of the needs of people with mental-health issues. However, additional thought needs to be given to the practical outworking of the Bill and the allocation of resources for appropriate training as necessary. That is to ensure that those with mental-health issues are not stigmatised or penalised by lack of understanding on the part of personal advisers or other professionals involved in the assessment of their ability to participate in compulsory activities. With those brief observations, provided helpfully by someone else, I give broad assent to the motion. [Laughter.]

Madam Speaker: I commend the Member for his honesty.

Mr McCarthy: I support the motion. The Bill, although containing many real concerns for a lot of people, aims to support more people back into work, and that has to be welcomed. Members recognise the wishes of many people — particularly those with mental-health issues — to get back into work, but they lack the support to be able to achieve that. Many proposals in the Bill demonstrate a greater awareness of the needs of people with mental-health issues. More thought is required on the practical outworking of the Bill and the allocation of funds for the necessary training. That will ensure that those with mental-health issues are not stigmatised or penalised — as has already been mentioned by other Members — by a lack of understanding on the part of the professionals involved in the assessment of their ability to participate in compulsory activities.

As the Alliance Party's health spokesperson, I have worries that the people already burdened by ill health will find the contents of the Welfare Reform Bill to be an added concern and possibly a disincentive for them to offer themselves once again for employment.

It appears that the Bill will introduce a new coercive benefit-administration regime. I am apprehensive that vulnerable neurological patients will be forced either into work when they are still unfit or they will find themselves on lower benefits.

I am also concerned about the proposed large-scale involvement of private-sector companies, some of which have an established record of incompetence in respect of patients who have long-term mental-health problems. The proposals in the Bill are underpinned by the new ESA, which will replace incapacity benefit and income support that is paid on the grounds of incapacity for new claimants.

Mr P Ramsey: There is a worry that those private companies will be more interested in profits than in the welfare of the customers whom they are supposed to be looking after. Does the Member agree that if private companies are to be involved in any part of the proposed welfare reform, that involvement should be in education and training only?

Mr McCarthy: I agree with Mr Ramsey. That is a concern, and, as I said earlier, the private companies' record of incompetence in relation to patients who have long-term mental illness is clear.

It is likely that the majority of claimants will have to take part in work-focused interviews and work-related activities in order to qualify for the full benefit rate. The Bill also obliges a claimant to show good cause for having failed to attend a work-focused interview. The explanation for that failure must be given within five days of the day on which the interview was to take place. That timescale is too short and should be increased.

Other aspects of the Bill must also be addressed. The Alliance Party supports the motion and the amendment, and I hope that the powers that be reconsider the real effects that the Welfare Reform Bill may have on many of our constituents.

Mr S Wilson: As the Member for North Belfast Nigel Dodds stated, the DUP supports the Welfare Reform Bill. It does so for good reason: the Bill aims to move people away from benefits and into opportunities for work. When many people who get incapacity benefit first receive it, they state that they do not wish to remain on it.

Economic prosperity in Northern Ireland has been rising over the past number of years, but certain groups have been left behind. I am sure that Members will have witnessed that in their advice centres. Such groups may comprise those people who find themselves on benefits because they have been deemed incapable of working. The situation is black and white: either one can work, or one is incapable of working. There is no recognition or help for the people who want to work, would like the opportunity to work or would like support to get them back to work, but who, due to their incapacity, have been deemed incapable of working. Those people either qualify for benefit and live in poverty — because the benefit is insufficient to give them a decent standard of living, as I am sure all Members accept — or they have to work. There is no in-between.

One important benefit of the Welfare Reform Bill is that it opens up opportunities for those people. However, when the term "welfare reform" is used or when there is an indication that there might be a change in how benefits are assessed, Sinn Féin and, to a lesser extent, the SDLP have a knee-jerk reaction that implies that change must be bad in some way.

Mrs D Kelly: I said that the SDLP welcomes and supports welfare reform. That was not a knee-jerk reaction. The SDLP has stated its concerns about the impact and implications of some of the measures in the Bill, and about some of the glaring gaps. The SDLP is supported in those observations by many leading charities, including such a strong advocate as the Royal College of Psychiatrists.

2.45 pm

Mr S Wilson: When the Member's support for the Bill is hedged about with so many qualifications, one must ask whether she really supports the Bill or wants the best of both worlds. On one hand, she supports it because she wants to see disabled people lifted out of poverty; on the other, she finds a thousand reasons to oppose it. She cannot have it both ways. As the hon Member for North Belfast Mr Dodds said, there are concerns, but the general principle should be supported if Members genuinely wish those who are regarded as disadvantaged to be lifted out of poverty.

There will always be this sort of left-wing, knee-jerk reaction from Sinn Féin. One can only hope that Sinn Féin's rhetoric will be diluted when it is faced with real choices. The former Minister of Education embraced wholeheartedly the private finance initiatives and PPP schemes that he had ranted and raved and railed against before becoming Minister.

If Members do not go down the road of parity as outlined by Mr Dodds, benefit claimants and others in Northern Ireland will arrive at a position of inequality with the rest of the United Kingdom. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, Gordon Brown, would love that, because it would reduce the subvention to Northern Ireland.

It is clear from surveys that many people on incapacity benefit would love the opportunity to go back to work. Some would not be able to go back immediately, and would need support and advice on what work would be available to them: hence the personal capability assessments, the work-focused interviews and the support that would be required once they were employed. Members are right to be concerned that that underpinning support must be of good quality and do the job that it is designed for. I have no difficulty with questions being asked about that or with seeking to ensure that if that is what is promised in the Bill, then that is what is delivered on the ground. Those issues should be the focus of Members' concerns. We should not dismiss the Bill as something that will hurt or disadvantage people who currently receive incapacity benefit.

The other big issue that must be addressed has not been mentioned so far. It is one thing to say that we should support people and put them back into work. That is the supply side of the equation. However, the demand side of the equation must also be addressed. Will there be sufficient demand from employers to facilitate those people? I have checked with officials, and I understand that the Pathways to Work programme in Northern Ireland concentrates on public-sector employers. It is important that there be a variety of options, and Members must find a way to encourage the voluntary and private sectors to provide places for people to move from receiving benefits into work.

Some of the arguments that have been advanced in the debate are illogical. The logic of what the Member for Strangford Mr McCarthy said escapes me: a Bill that is designed to encourage and, indeed, force people to present themselves for a personal capability assessment, go for work-focused interviews and, if they are not in a support group, eventually go into work, would be a disincentive for people to offer themselves for work. It is not a case of people offering themselves for work; the case is that those who should and could be in a position to help people back into work must do so. People will simply not have the option of whether to do that or not.

According to surveys, nine out of 10 people who are on long-term benefits do not want or intend to stay in that position. They want to get back to work. However, they become stigmatised and end up being victims of the system. Their doctors, who may not make an assessment of their capabilities, simply keep on writing lines for them. Therefore, those people stay in a position where they eventually become dependent and hooked on the benefits system. As a result, 90% of those people are still on benefits when they reach retirement age or death. Apart from the waste of economic potential, that is also a waste of people's lives.

It is also a disadvantage to those people because it keeps them on benefits, on low incomes and in poverty rather than opening the door to productive employment and opportunities for better-paid work. For that reason, I support the Bill. Rather than focusing on people's incapacity and inability to work, and thereby stigmatising them, the Bill allows their capabilities to be assessed and offers them opportunities. That is a much better deal than the current system. Although there may be issues about how that might be administered, it is a good principle that, in the long term, will benefit those who are disadvantaged.

Ms Stanton: Go raibh maith agat. I support the motion, which was tabled by my colleague. I want to reassure Nigel Dodds and Sammy Wilson that the motion is not a knee-jerk reaction. Mr O'Dowd has explained that it does not seek to abolish the Welfare Reform Bill but, rather, questions whether the right structures and mechanisms are in place to ensure that when party offices are inundated, Members can do more than just empathise with people: they can give them a better quality of life.

The Bill does not recognise the major problem of employers' attitudes towards people with long-term health problems or impairments. One of the main barriers to returning to work for people who have a history of mental illness is the attitude of potential employers. Last year, NICVA's (Northern Ireland Council for Voluntary Action) proposals for an anti-poverty strategy urged the Government to tackle the problem of economic inactivity, which is when people are not working and are defined as being unemployed. Few people realise that there are 500,000 people in that category in the North. The issue is far removed from whether people who have a history of mental distress are unwilling to work: it is of greater concern that employers do not want to employ those people who do want to work. It is a concern that there is nothing in the Bill to oblige or, at least, to encourage employers to play as full a role as possible to assist citizens to move from benefits to work with built-in safeguards, flexible measures and policies to ensure that when people make that move, they will not lose out on benefits and other provisions during periods when they are unable to work.

It is right to give people every help and encouragement to return to work. Many people need advice and assistance, particularly those who have mental health problems.

In my constituency of North Belfast I have had to deal with vulnerable families who were not advised that once they received compensation following the murder or killing of a loved one, they would no longer be entitled to benefits. Many of those constituents had been on prescribed medication or other substances — [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Will Members please listen to what is being said or at least conduct their conversations outside the Chamber?

Ms Stanton: Many of those constituents were on prescribed medication or other substances to deal with their pain and suffering, and many have no memory of where and on what the compensation was spent. Those constituents did not receive the adequate services or professional help that they should have after experiencing trauma. The lack of available expertise has meant that, years down the line, their mental health has deteriorated and they now face the further distress of having their benefits cut because they received compensation some years earlier.

At the same time, employers have been reluctant to employ people who have been unable to work for extended periods through sickness. It is in employers' interests to recognise that such people have many talents that employers can use. Sinn Féin believes that employers should welcome people with disabilities rather than discriminate against them. The party also believes that the Bill should provide safeguards and flexible policies to ensure that the most vulnerable will not be discriminated against.

I wrote to the Minister about part III of the Bill, which deals with benefit fraud. People are frightened and being placed under unnecessary stress because of the terminology used in the threatening letters that they receive. Issuing such letters contradicts Government policy, which is to ensure benefit take-up, particularly among the elderly. However, it is the elderly who are most intimidated by those campaigns, which are probably adding to the number of deaths of older people over the winter.

We must get the process right in the first place. However, Sinn Féin does not believe that this Bill is the right approach — vulnerable people should not be left with what may be an inadequate process. We must ensure that flexibility is key in any policy: measures must be in place so that those with serious illnesses who want to return to work can do so without fearing that their benefits will be stopped or docked should their health deteriorate.

Go raibh míle maith agat.

Mrs M Bradley: Although the Bill may be a welcome progression for some people with mental-health problems, it could be the cause of yet more difficulties and uphill struggles for many others. For many genuine mental-health patients, the prospect of a day's work or of simply re-entering a working environment is an additional stress that could be detrimental to whatever balance they have achieved through their medication.

The mental-health sufferer who is willing to try to re-enter the workplace may feel obliged to return to work in order to comply with the Department's regulations — no matter whether or not that is the intention of the regulations — rather than face interviews with staff who have no knowledge, training or experience in working with people who suffer from mental-health issues.

Once in the workplace, those suffering from mental health problems can find themselves unable to cope with the daily pressures, but, by that stage, it is too late. Only appropriate and suitably qualified personnel should decide whether patients are ready and able to re-enter the workforce — those decisions cannot be left to administrators. We cannot, and should not, allow another crisis similar to that created by the disability living allowance (DLA) system, whereby pen-pushers make decisions while ignoring medical and professional opinions. Patients are left to flounder and the decisions are reviewed, appealed and, occasionally, justly reinstated. All the relevant management and staff in the workforce must be suitably trained to facilitate and encourage the mental-health sufferer in order to build a firm foundation that can be improved upon.

It is time for the Government to channel their energies into improving the delivery of services and programmes for mental-health sufferers. I have worked in the mental-health field for more than 20 years, and I have witnessed at first hand how resources, funding and staffing have always been at the bottom of the scale when it comes to budget allocation.

3.00 pm

Mr P Ramsey: The Member will be aware that the personal capability assessment (PCA) — formerly known as the all-work test — uses a points system and asks questions under the heading of mental health. One question specifically asks people whether they are:

“scared or anxious that work would bring back or worsen ... illness.”

If people answer yes, that will contribute to the number of points that they receive. I agree with what the hon Member has said, and claimants and support groups are worried about the circumstances that she describes, where people's respect and dignity will be lost. The Welfare Reform Bill does not inform people that they will be dealing primarily with mental illness and trying to help that. We know the number of people who have been killed during the Troubles, and we also know that many people suffered physical injuries. However, we do not know the level of psychological damage and trauma that has been suffered by many thousands of people. Those people are caught in a trap. I suggest to the Member, and to my unionist colleagues, that we support welfare reform but not if it strips the customer of respect and dignity.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mrs M Bradley: I thank the Member for his intervention.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Wells] in the Chair)

I do not want to think that we are now being forced into finding a quick fix for a problem that has been largely ignored for many years. Unfortunately for the Government, we can no longer use drugs to deal with the issue of mental health, as has been the case in the past. Therein lies the problem that we face.

Today, Members did not oppose the Bill; rather, we all shared our concerns about its contents. The sharing of concerns can only be good for this place.

Lord Morrow: I welcome the aims and objectives of the Bill. I congratulate Danny Kennedy on being able to marshal some UUP Members. At one stage, he was very lonely and looked a wee bit forlorn.

Mr S Wilson: The Members found the debate so significant that they were not here for his speech.
[Laughter.]

Mr Kennedy: I am happy to confirm that, at the end of my speech, all other Members looked unhappy and forlorn.

Mr N Dodds: Can Mr Kennedy confirm that it was not his speech, anyway?

Lord Morrow: At least the Member can console himself that he did not have Back-Benchers sniping behind his back.

Mr Dodds has injected a dose of reality into the debate. Mr O'Dowd came out with that phrase that we hear ad infinitum, that if the Assembly were back, we could all do wonderful things. Mr Dodds reminded us that this is a parity issue about which the Assembly could do precious little. It is the responsibility of any Assembly to highlight issues and to speak on behalf of people, especially those who live on the margins. I have spent the best years of my life as a public representative, trying to improve the lot of those who live on the margins. Therefore, I consider the Welfare Reform Bill to be essential, and I welcome its aims and objectives. I hope that the Bill is enacted, because simply talking about its objectives is not enough.

I am glad that Mr McCarthy, a gentleman whom I hold in very high regard, is in the Chamber. When I was Minister for Social Development, I remember vividly taking some flak when I turned down the Alliance Party's suggestion that all pensions be increased by £5. That was a laudable suggestion, but Mr McCarthy came to agree with me that it was a ridiculous suggestion because it could never be achieved. Northern Ireland has a block grant and that fell outside our allotment; it was a parity issue and could not be done. I was pleased to learn that Mr McCarthy now accepts that fact.

Incidentally, that has nothing to do with what I wish to say. I shall move on to more substantive matters.

According to paragraph 9 of the executive summary of the Green Paper on welfare reform from the Department for Work and Pensions, 'A new deal for welfare: Empowering people to work', the Bill's objectives are to:

“reduce by 1 million the number on incapacity benefits; help 300,000 lone parents into work; and increase by 1 million the number of older workers.”

I am sure that Members have already noticed it, but it is worth recording that paragraph 1 of chapter 4, which is titled “Helping older workers”, states:

“By 2024, an estimated 50 per cent of the adult population will be over the age of 50, due to the combination of increased life expectancy and low birth rates. But although people are living longer than ever before, they are spending a relatively lower proportion of their lives in work than previous generations. Unemployment among people over 50 is low, but inactivity is high and many people leave work early due to ill health.”

That is important to note. As I look around the Chamber, I suspect that we will all be considered older workers by 2024. Mr Shannon is nodding in approval; it includes him, anyway.

All political parties should be seeking to get more adults into employment. The number of people not working represents a huge problem for the local economy. While the Government have been pursuing Pathways to Work and seeking to reform the welfare system, the Conservative Party has suggested the so-called “payment by results” method. It is claimed that that policy could transform the benefits system by getting one million people who are on incapacity benefit back to work.

The Government have already called in private providers to help such people find work. At present, the providers get a payment up front, plus a larger sum when a person has been in work for 13 weeks. However, that only applies to new claimants. More than 2.6 million people who are already on incapacity benefit — an estimated one million of whom want to get off it and into work — have been sadly ignored. The Government have overspent elsewhere, and those people are low on the priority list.

The Tories’ “payment by results” approach would remove the up-front payment to the provider and increase the amount payable once the claimant is in sustained work. The cash cost would be matched to the benefit savings, so no net outlay would be involved and the benefit savings would be so great that an increased payout would be worth it. Not only would shifting one million people or more back into work provide social and economic benefits, but it would institute a model of risk transfer to the private, community or voluntary sectors that could be used elsewhere in the benefits system.

The problems surrounding benefit fraud have already been highlighted. There can be no better illustration of benefit fraud than the case last week of Paul Appleby from Nottinghamshire, who was sentenced to 10 months in prison at Nottingham Crown Court after being found guilty of benefit fraud in December. What had he done? He claimed to have been crippled for some 13 years, before being pictured participating in marathons. He even completed the 2005 London marathon in a time of three hours and 37 minutes.

Mr Shannon: Maurice could not do it in that time.

Lord Morrow: I could not, and I am not on any benefits.

Mr S Wilson: He is on the lower rate of disability living allowance.

Lord Morrow: That is where the Member is wrong.

At the same time, Mr Appleby was claiming that he needed round-the-clock care, a wheelchair, two walking sticks and a walking frame. Since March 1994, that gentleman had been granted the highest rate of DLA for life, yet he could run marathons and do many other things besides.

Mr Kennedy: He is reflecting on that now.

Lord Morrow: Investigators were stunned to find video coverage of that claimant taking part in road races. He was so fit that he joined an athletics club in 2001, after his back condition improved, illegally pocketing more than £22,300 over the following five years.

I raise that case because it is imperative that people who are genuinely entitled to benefits receive them. That £22,300 should have been directed to those in need who truly deserved it. I welcome the drive to catch benefit fraudsters and to ensure that the money that they have been claiming is directed to those who really need it. The unfortunate gentleman to whom I referred is going to have some time for reflection, as Mr Kennedy said. I suspect that there may be other such cases of abuse of the benefits system in this country and on the mainland. That abuse must be tackled.

One element of the Government’s proposals that should be broadly welcomed is the commitment that repeat benefit-fraud offenders will lose their entitlement to assistance. I believe that they should lose that entitlement for ever. Stringent steps should be taken to ensure that an example is made of those who abuse the system — that will be the best deterrent to those who might be encouraged to go down the road of benefit fraud. There is much more that could and should be said, but my time is up. I agree with the principles behind the Welfare Reform Bill.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member who was due to speak next is Mr Copeland. However, because he was not present in the Chamber throughout Lord Morrow’s speech, he is not entitled to speak at this time. Mr Copeland will be permitted to speak later. I therefore call Mr Francie Brolly.

Mr Brolly: Go raibh míle maith agat. I assume that my job is to sum up the debate thus far, at least on behalf of my party. We are somewhat short-staffed.

Sinn Féin cannot support the amendment — not because we are opposed to it in principle, but because we believe that it would have been better as an addition at the end of the original motion. As presented, the amendment would, in effect, delete reference to neurological patients. The proposer of the motion, Mr O’Dowd, said in his speech that vulnerable groups include people with mental-health issues. Fundamentally, we are not in disagreement on that matter.

Mr O’Dowd provided a rundown on the replacing of the old system of disability benefit with the new two-pronged work-related activity and support-group method of classifying those who are, more or less, incapacitated. He mentioned the fact that, for the first 13 weeks, claimants will receive a basic allowance to sustain them until their cases are assessed. Mr O’Dowd also expressed some concern about the qualifications of personal advisers to do the job that is expected of them, particularly in the care of people who suffer from mental-health difficulties. It has been claimed that money would be set aside to train those advisers, but their job is still very difficult for a layperson, however well trained. If any of us had such difficulties, we would expect to see a qualified doctor.

Sanctions are a difficult issue, but Sinn Féin certainly does not regard them as appropriate at times. The imposition of sanctions is a way of forcing people back to work. The concept of compulsion was mentioned during the debate; however, people who are weak due to health difficulties might find it difficult to stand up against being compelled to go to work. I think that we would describe that as slightly indiscriminate.

3.15 pm

Mr McCann intervened to express concern about laypeople or civil servants having the kinds of responsibilities that this Bill will give them. Dolores Kelly talked about parts of the Bill and about the historic dependence on benefits that there is in this part of Ireland due mainly, of course, to the lack of employment that, for historic reasons, there has been in certain areas. The reluctance of employers to employ mentally ill people was also mentioned. It is difficult for these people to integrate themselves into the workforce because of stigma, discrimination and sometimes even fear.

Sanctions have been mentioned repeatedly. One of the points that was made was that they do not take account of the fluctuating, unsteady nature of mental illness. On one day a person can be quite happy to go to work or attend a tribunal, yet on another they would just not be mentally fit to do so. It appears that there may be a presumption against incapacity benefit, rather than the presumption in favour of it that we had before.

Mr Dodds spoke about the difficulty that there would be if the Bill going through Parliament at Westminster was not accepted here — there would be problems with cost and difficulties with the system here. He also mentioned the important statistic that the number of people over the age of 25 who are receiving incapacity benefit has risen dramatically, for whatever reason.

Mr Ramsey intervened to say that while the stated aim of this Bill is to get people back to work, there is a strong element of penny-pinching. Mr Kennedy spoke again about the provisions of the British Parliament applying here, and he mentioned the names of a good number of mental-health charities and support groups that have expressed concern about this legislation, not least about non-attendance at work-focused interviews resulting in the reduction of benefits. Again, that does not take into account how the condition of a mentally ill person can change from day to day.

A question was also raised about whether, in fact, getting mentally ill people back to work is necessarily beneficial to their condition, and there is no evidence to show that it is. Perhaps at times it is anything but beneficial. Mr McCarthy welcomed getting ill people back to work. That is what we would like to see, all things being equal. He also mentioned the importance of promoting understanding of mental illness among the general population. We are much better at that than we used to be. We accept and deal with people in a much more politically correct way than we used to. These people should obviously be helped to assimilate into workplaces as well as into society in general. Mr McCarthy also warned about the possibility of this rather stern system forcing people back to work who are not fit for it, and that is likely to happen.

There was general concern about certain aspects of the Bill. Mr Sammy Wilson was very concerned about Sinn Féin's attitude to the Bill, although he was probably more concerned about Sinn Féin than about its Members' remarks. However, he commented that we can either take it or leave. If it is going to be made legislation for this part of Ireland, we either take it or leave it and we really should not express any opinions critical of it. He may have a point.

I am afraid that I ran out of paper at that stage, so I must apologise for giving short shrift to the Members who spoke later in the debate. I must, of course, give Kathy Stanton some time. She raised the interesting point that people who receive compensation in tragic circumstances are precluded from accessing benefits. Perhaps that should be looked at: should such insurance payments interfere with people's entitlements in the normal course of events? She also pointed out that the condition of people who are ill can change from day to day.

Mary Bradley, a former mental-health worker, was critical of funding for the mentally ill, whether it is hospital funding, care funding or, as in this case, benefit funding. She felt that, over the years, mentally ill people and those with chronic health problems have not received the attention that they were due. Mr Morrow was not convinced that a local Assembly would do any better than the very clever people in England who know more about these things than we do.

That is about all that I have to say, except that —

Mr Deputy Speaker: I have to ask the Member to sit down.

Mr Brolly: If I could just, before I finish —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. There seems to have been some confusion. The Member's party indicated that Mr O'Dowd was going to make the winding-up speech, and therefore 15 minutes was allocated to him. We are not at that stage yet; there are other Members who have still to speak. Mr Brolly, unfortunately, will have to be restricted to 10 minutes. I propose to call several other Members to speak, and then Mr Alban Maginness, who will have 10 minutes to wind up on the amendment. After that, Mr O'Dowd can formally wind up the debate — he does not have to take 15 minutes. The indication that we received was that Mr O'Dowd was going to make the winding-up speech, and therefore we put Mr Brolly ahead of other Members. There is no way around this; we have to go by Standing Orders. Therefore, Mr Brolly's time is up.

Mr Brolly: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. I just want to assure the House that the best was yet to come.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I suggest that you hand the rest of your speech to Mr O'Dowd and let him conclude your remarks.

Mr Shannon: As of February 2006, there were 113,000 people in the Province claiming incapacity benefit, 170,000 claiming disability living allowance, just over 100,000 on income support, and some 63,000 claiming attendance allowance. Unemployment in the Province has fallen by 2% in the past quarter, with a decrease over a year of just under 1,000 people claiming jobseeker's allowance. Northern Ireland has the lowest unemployment rate in the UK and a decline in the rate of those being awarded certain benefits. Why are we being presented with a Welfare Reform Bill that would scrap the old system, and bring in new terms and conditions that are dubious, to say the least?

There's nae point in lettin oan that tha sistam we hae noo is perfect, an that ther er naen whau disnae tak guid o' tha provishun o' tha benefits. But iver aw we er seein deep doon checks an far mare stronger missures tae complete afore tha award.

Tha Weelfaer Refoarm Bill maks — amangst mony ither changes — provishun fer new benefit, tha employment an suppoart allooance fer the tak iver fae tha incapacity benefit. This wull bring tha gither baith allooances an will meen as weel a means tested allooance, which is a mixtur o' incum suppoart, an incapacity benefits. This is missured by a person haein a capability fer woark but is limited by ther fisical er mental conditshun that it wudnae be reasonable fer tae expect them tae woark.

There is no point in pretending that the current system is perfect and that no one is taking advantage of the benefits system. There are now more in-depth checks and more stringent criteria to fulfil before benefits are received. The Welfare Reform Bill makes — among many other changes — provision for a new benefit, the employment and support allowance, to replace incapacity benefit. ESA will incorporate a contributory and a means-tested allowance — a mixture of income support and incapacity benefit — which is assessed by a person's physical or mental position, and it is not reasonable to require him to work.

The assessment of a person's capability to work will take place over an initial 13-week assessment phase and will include an assessment as to whether that person has the ability to work in work-related activity, thereby making him more useful to society as a whole. Such people will then claim benefits depending on whether they have been assessed as entitled to the "support component" or "limited capacity for work-related activity". If those who are assessing such people find that they have the ability to return to employment, their benefits can be topped up by attending training, trials and interviews and agreeing action plans. Claimants who refuse to take part in such assessments can have their benefits sanctioned and reduced to the basic level.

What happens to a man, with three children, suffering severe depression after an accident? His wounds have healed, but he is left with crippling depression. Getting out of bed to take a test judged by strangers is nearly impossible. His body has healed, but his mind still reels. That man will be penalised by having his benefits reduced. He is still in the same situation and still has three children to feed, but he cannot do that on lower benefits and so the ruthless cycle continues.

It is a fact kent personally by maesel that in tha caes o' heed injury, its a lang process o' rehabilitation, a process which is frustratin an lang drawn oot, an cannae be rushed.

A maun whau hiss' abilities yin dae, caun loas them tha nixt, an laek a waen hiss' tae larn ivery step an actshun agin.

This process shud nae be rushed in a effirt tae git benefits, which is whut is scarinly an in aw proability sumthin that is used as a carrut tae push sumyin awa abin ther capabilities, tae ther detriment in tha lang rin.

People who suffer head injuries face a long process of rehabilitation, and I have personal experience of this. That process is frustrating and drawn out, but it cannot be rushed. A man can possess abilities one day and can lose them the next in a split second, and, like a child, has to learn every step and action again. That learning process should not be rushed just to gain a top-up in benefits. Frighteningly, and in all probability, a top-up in benefits is something that could be used as a carrot to push people beyond their capabilities, which would be to their detriment in the long run.

Pathways to Work was piloted in 2003 in an attempt to help those claiming incapacity benefit to return to work. It is a laudable idea if it is used merely as a tool aimed to assist those who have the desire and ability to get back to work. However, there is a fear that it could be a way of forcing those physically or mentally unable to return to work into the position in which they must work to feed their children, even if their health is weak.

The area of mental health is precarious in any society, but it is especially so in the Province and other places bombarded by terrorism — as we have been for the past 30 years. There are those among us who have witnessed unspeakable horrors, been traumatised, lost loved ones and never recovered, and there are those who still mourn. Northern Ireland has a high rate of mental-health problems, and all of those issues make it a lot more understandable to those who try to understand. However, given that there are some who only see figures, there is a fear that the people who suffer will be disregarded and overlooked.

It is feared that there will never be a test that could adequately and accurately determine someone's ability to be involved in the working world.

The Northern Ireland Neurological Charities Alliance (NINCA), a coalition of groups that support people with MS, Alzheimer's disease, Parkinson's disease, epilepsy, muscular dystrophy and many other conditions, has stated its fear of the impact that the legislation will have on the groups it represents, and rightly so.

3.30 pm

We have a duty to protect the vulnerable, not to put them through more heartache than they already suffer. Employment is an important factor. What businessman would employ someone whom they knew to have been seriously unwell and who, in all likelihood, is not fully recovered from their illness? Who would employ someone who is being pushed into work before they are able to do a job adequately or who may be unreliable because of a medical problem? Not many businesses can take such risks on such uncertainties. What happens when no one can employ that person? Will that affect the benefit top-up system?

There are too many uncertainties in the proposed legislation. How can a person's mental ability or capability to work be accurately tested? How can we assess whether a person cannot face the workplace or is merely avoiding employment? How do we find the perfect placements that help someone along rather than trail them backwards? How can it be ensured that a workplace environment is suitable for the delicacies of a particular individual? It can never be fair to force a person with mental-health problems back into society when he or she is not ready.

In no way do I accept that people cannot ever recover from mental illness or brain injuries. I am all too aware of the steep road that must be climbed, step by excruciating step. For the state to strong-arm their way in this matter will only load more stress and unhappiness onto sufferers and their families. As it stands, the Province's neurological and mental health care provision is inadequate. There are no centres of excellence, no real aftercare system, and little help for the wounded and their families. We cannot heap yet more stress and tension on them by exposing them to yet more pressure.

This attempt to integrate people into society is, indeed, noble and will be worthwhile, if enacted in the right spirit and at the right time. However, I do not believe that the Welfare Reform Bill provides an adequate framework for that task. Such a sensitive issue should not be tackled in this manner, and we must do all that we can to protect not only the vulnerable, but their husbands, wives and children.

We want people to be working and doing their bit, and we want fewer families to be dependent on the state. We want to get people on benefits who are capable of work into satisfying jobs, but not at the sacrifice of the health of those who are truly unable to work again yet who are being pushed into doing so. As Members of this Assembly, we must make it very clear that that is unacceptable.

Mr Copeland: Mr Deputy Speaker, I apologise for my absence for Mr Shannon's contribution. As you may be aware, there were several bomb scares in Belfast and in my constituency this afternoon. I was called away from the House, but I am pleased to say that the bomb scares were hoaxes. Nevertheless, this afternoon's events serve a salutary warning to Members of what happened in our past and what, God forbid, our future may hold.

I must admit that, before I became an elected representative, I held certain views about those in receipt of what are euphemistically called benefits. Those views were based on little knowledge and a degree of social prejudice. However, working in my constituency office over the past few years has put faces to what I previously judged as mere statistics. For a family to be required to get — in some people's views — something for nothing is a difficult and bitter pill to swallow.

I have had difficulty in completing disability living allowance forms on behalf of constituents because the forms run to 30 or 40 pages.

I have seen cases where two people are ostensibly in the same circumstances, but whose entitlement to the benefit appears to be based, not on their circumstances, but on their ability to fill in the form. I have seen, as have most Members, what I consider to be borderline cases, or people who should not be entitled to the benefit, in receipt of it, while genuine cases are denied it.

A society is judged properly not on how it treats the majority of its citizens, but on how it deals with those who are least able to look after themselves.

Mr Dallat: Does the Member agree that, while there has been much emphasis on fraud in today's debate, precious little has been said about the millions of pounds that go unclaimed every year? That is money to which people at the lowest end of the social spectrum are entitled. Given that the Government have Big Brother computers to catch people who commit the most minor offences, they seem still to have no capability to discover people who are missing out on millions of pounds of benefits every year.

Mr Copeland: I agree with the Member, and that leads me to a specific case that came to my attention on Saturday. A young man — he is 25; that is young compared to me — earns £85 a week from part-time work. He acquired his home of 14 years through living with his grandfather — the tenancy was transferred to him on his grandfather's death. His income of £85 a week caused him difficulty with paying his rent, and he fell into arrears of £347. He was taken to court by the Housing Executive and appears to be facing eviction. He has received a bill for about 90% of the rent that he owed. However, owing to the cost of his court case, the bill may as well be for £1 million, because he does not have the wherewithal to pay it. Unless I can intervene, it is likely that he will be forced from his home. He will become another statistic, another blip and another difficulty for another Department.

All legislation, whether it has its root here or in Westminster, is designed to deal with the norm, or standard, of the greater number of cases, but it impacts on individual people and families. The Welfare Reform Bill that is making its way through Parliament in Westminster will not apply to Northern Ireland. Fair enough. However, a separate Order in Council will be made for Northern Ireland based on the provisions of the GB Bill. I am not sure that all the heart-rending, tears and angst that we display today will account for anything, because the decision will be made in another place.

The benefits system was designed when children in this country had no shoes, little food and died from cholera because of unclean water. Society has moved on, and some people see benefits as a replacement for work and income. That cannot be sustained. Any legislation must strike a balance between satisfying the needs of those who are able to provide from their taxes to develop a society in which they are proud to live and assisting those who cannot look after themselves.

Specific mention has been made of those who suffer from what is described as mental illness. That encompasses many conditions, some of which, such as extreme tiredness or depression, are thought by some not to exist. I have seen people who are depressed, and those conditions exist. The system is so complex and convoluted that even those who are entitled to benefits sometimes give up their claim.

The young man whom I referred to earns £85 a week — only just the minimum wage. Substantial numbers of people in my constituency earn less than the minimum wage.

I have no doubt that the man on £85 a week may be entitled to support from the state. However, access to it, and the ability to enquire without being fobbed off, is not available to him.

An enormous number of people view the receipt of state benefits as charity. They live in fear of what they call the “workhouse”, something that is long gone. There is a pride that comes from work and being able to pay your own way.

If legislation does not level out the humps and hollows, give access and entitlement to those who are entitled and take whatever steps are possible to prevent abuse of the system, it is not worth the paper it is written on. I appeal to those who are bringing forward this legislation, particularly those who represent Northern Ireland in the House of Commons and in the House of Lords, to consider all legislation in terms of the citizens it will affect, rather than its impact on the state or its bottom-line cost.

The building blocks of all of this, that each and every one of us in this Chamber should accept and fight for as equals, are the rights of the people who sent us here — whether they voted for us or not.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr A Maginness: One of the greatest achievements in the post-war era, certainly in western Europe, was the establishment of what is now called the European social model. It is based on social democratic principles, so that everyone in society is protected, and there is social security so that those who are vulnerable, or disadvantaged, are given an opportunity at least to maintain their existence and to live as full a life as possible.

The creation of the welfare state, in particular in Britain by the Labour Government in 1945, was an amazing achievement and should be precious to us all. It is certainly precious to us in the SDLP. We will rightly defend that achievement, because it has given the whole of our community some sense of social security when otherwise they would be undermined. Therefore, it is important for the SDLP as a political party to emphasise that.

That does not mean that the SDLP is opposed to the reform of the social security system or the welfare state. We accept the need for reform. All processes and systems need to be reviewed from time to time. However, the basic principle of protecting people, especially vulnerable people, must be affirmed. This House should affirm it.

The SDLP amendment simply emphasises the need to protect sufferers of mental illness. Forty-one per cent of incapacity benefit claimants in Northern Ireland suffer from mental illness. The SDLP has put forward this amendment to safeguard their interests. It is not incompatible with Mr O'Dowd's motion. Members are all grateful to him for bringing it to the attention of this House today, and are supportive of the motion, which expresses deep concern for the implications of the Welfare Reform Bill. The SDLP is not opposed to that Bill, but the party certainly has deep concerns about some aspects of it.

Mr Dodds, in a clear and forensic contribution, emphasised the importance of parity. My party accepts that there should be parity as a sensible concomitant of the social security system in Northern Ireland. There is consensus in the House that parity should be maintained to protect the integrity of that system. It will help and protect everyone in our society. The SDLP is against neither parity nor welfare reform.

Mr Wilson came into the House today with his verbal shotgun and fired a few rounds across these Benches. He is an expert marksman; of that there is no doubt. Unfortunately, he hit the wrong targets. He expected the SDLP and Sinn Féin to be opposed to the Welfare Reform Bill, but we are not opposed to the Bill or to reform.

I was slightly concerned by some of the comments made by Members on the Benches opposite, particularly the DUP Benches. They overemphasised welfare fraud, made scapegoats of people, and stressed scrounging and exploitation of the system. The vast majority of claimants are decent and in need, and they must be supported. As Mr Dallat emphasised, many who are entitled do not claim. Those unclaimed benefits substantially outweigh the claims that fraudulently exploit the system. Members on this side of the House emphasise the importance of need; we certainly do not approve of greedy people exploiting the system. There is human weakness everywhere in society; greed is one aspect of that, and from time to time it will manifest itself.

Jim Shannon was right, in his compassionate speech, to emphasise the needs of those suffering from mental illness. Recovery from that condition is a steep hill to climb, and we must be compassionate. My colleague Mrs Kelly stressed that those who suffer from such illnesses will become concerned, anxious and fearful if a new system seeks to coerce them into employment at a time when they are unable to enjoy work or be productive.

It is important that Members take note of what has been said by the various charities and organisations. The Royal College of Psychiatrists has warned that, in certain circumstances, those suffering from mental illness can become fearful and anxious; they are easily put under great pressure. It has emphasised to Parliament the importance of protecting the mentally ill, and it speaks with real authority. It acknowledges the benefit of reform, but also sees the downside of forcing people into employment in circumstances where they cannot cope. Members should heed that timely warning from such an authoritative body.

MIND, the organisation for those suffering from mental health, has emphasised that the conditionality requirements under the new legislation could be too onerous. It is important to emphasise that point in the House today. MIND and the Mental Health Foundation also highlight the fact that employers discriminate against people who suffer from mental illness. A survey indicated that 18% of employers would not employ anyone suffering, or recovering from, mental-health illnesses. That statistic serves as a timely warning to every Member, because if those people are to return to employment, a market in which they are welcome must be created.

It has been a good debate in which Members from all sides of the House have stressed important points: we should be caring and considerate; we are not against change; and compassion is an important element of any new welfare system. The system must not be bureaucratic and complex; rather, it must meet people's needs. By applying common sense instead of bureaucracy, the noble goals of bringing people back into the workplace and meeting the needs of the vulnerable in society can be achieved.

Mr O'Dowd: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I am reminded of another occasion in the Assembly: did I, or did I not, indicate that mine was to be the winding-up speech? I do not think that there should be any further statements from the 12 apostles of the DUP. However, we never know what they will do: they may release a statement on something.

The debate is important, because Sinn Féin is trying to ensure that a system is in place to enable those who are currently on incapacity benefit, and capable of returning to work, to do so. Some Members on the Benches opposite said that they agreed with the principle of the Welfare Reform Bill. However, at this stage, simply agreeing with the principle of the Bill is not enough. The question now is whether Members agree with all the Bill's 264 clauses, many of which lobbying and advocate groups for the most vulnerable in society have described as coercive. Many of the clauses would force people back to work.

Mr Morrow spoke at length about a case of benefit fraud in which the guy involved was an athlete, and so on, and so forth. I left the Chamber to find my notes, because I too can cite a case — of a young, single mother of two young children, who has severe mental-health problems. She took part in a pilot scheme in England, under which she was left with the impression that she had to return to work. She duly did so and lasted a week. She lost her job, left home, abandoning her two children, and became homeless — all because she was under the impression that she had failed and had to find work. That case represents the opposite extreme of the misuse of so-called welfare reform.

The Bill is wrong, because it is not concerned with encouraging people to return to work: it is a money-saving exercise designed to slash the number of people on incapacity benefit. Had the Bill been properly thought out, there would be adequately resourced systems and professionally trained and qualified client advisers — as opposed to civil servants being trained to do the jobs of professional medics — and cases such as the one that I have just outlined would not have happened.

Lord Morrow: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. I am slightly confused: is the Member deeply concerned about the implications of the Bill or opposed to it?

Mr McElduff: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Was that a point of order? [Laughter.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Lord Morrow's point of order was certainly not a point of order.

Mr McElduff: I am grateful for that ruling, Mr Deputy Speaker.

Mr O'Dowd: I will not respond to a point of order if it is not a point of order. As Mr Morrow keeps telling Members, the ruling of the Speaker is final.

Everybody agrees that we need a system that encourages and allows people to return to work. However, that system should not penalise people for being mentally ill, for suffering from a disability or for having a neurological condition. The Welfare Reform Bill that is now passing through the British House of Lords does not have that scope. I welcome the comments of Jim Shannon, who also raised deep concerns about the Bill.

The amendment is, without doubt, well intentioned. There was a mix-up that could have been resolved if we had had a chance to talk to the SDLP beforehand. However, were my party to support the amendment, the words "including neurological patients" would be eradicated from the motion, to be replaced with "especially those people with mental ill health".

The mental ill-health lobby's voice has been well heard through the lobbying that has been done this afternoon. Members could include those suffering from mental ill health under "vulnerable groups" in the text of the motion, as we could those with neurological illnesses. I accept that the amendment was made in good faith. However, history will not record it that way. This is one of those cases in which we are damned if we do and damned if we do not. Members will have to see how the vote goes.

THE TRANSITIONAL ASSEMBLY

Monday 29 January 2007

The Assembly met at 10.30 am (Madam Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

Additional Debating Time (Muckamore Abbey Hospital) and Extra Sitting (Police Ombudsman's Report)

Mr O'Dowd: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Can you confirm that, last Monday in this Chamber, Dr Paisley placed a request with you for a debate on Muckamore Abbey Hospital and that Barry McElduff placed a request for a debate on collusion? Can you further confirm that a debate on collusion was blocked by both unionist parties at the Business Committee meeting?

Madam Speaker: Thank you, Mr O'Dowd. You are quite right; both debates were requested last Monday morning, and I subsequently took the two motions to the Business Committee. The Committee debated the motions, and the agreement at the end of the meeting was that the motion on Muckamore Abbey Hospital would be debated but that the motion on the Police Ombudsman's report would not. That was the decision of the Business Committee.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. Are you willing to confirm that Sinn Féin was unable to convince the Business Committee of the merits of having a debate on its proposed motion, and that the motion that was chosen for debate today was chosen because people were able to convince the Business Committee of its merits?

Madam Speaker: It is not for me to say what the parties debated in the Business Committee or what their decisions were. All I can say is that I believe that at the end of a thorough debate, it was clear that the two unionist parties did not want the motion to go forward and that the rest of the parties did.

Mr O'Dowd: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. Does the fact that Sinn Féin was unable to convince the unionist parties to debate collusion not say much more about the DUP than it does about Sinn Féin?

Madam Speaker: As I said to Mr Paisley, that is not a matter for me or for the House; it is a matter for the Business Committee. I hope that we will get through the business today as agreed. Thank you.

Security Review

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. On several occasions, I have raised with you the matter of Members' security in this Chamber. This is the last meeting of this particular Assembly, but will Members be notified of what investigations have been made and will they be given exact information so that they can know where we now stand with regard to security in this Assembly?

Madam Speaker: Thank you, Dr Paisley, for your continued interest in the matter of House security. The review of security is now at an advanced stage. The Commission looked at the draft report last week. As I have said before, I intend to make a statement on the review when it has been completed. In addition, the Commission has agreed that parties will be fully briefed on its outcome at that time. Unfortunately, the report was not ready for today, but you will agree with me, I am sure, that the procedure is correct in that we need to be absolutely sure that the review is comprehensive and efficient.

With regard to current procedures, they are as we have agreed. I explained to the House on 27 November 2006 that we have a party of PSNI officers here to help the Doorkeepers with security. As far as I am aware, it has been adequately dealt with up to now.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. Given that today is the last day of the Assembly, is it in order that we congratulate the members of the PSNI who have provided the service as a stopgap? The PSNI — and, indeed, the House — faced an incredibly awful threat, and we are delighted that the police have been able to step in. We should congratulate the PSNI unanimously.

Madam Speaker: Thank you very much for that point of order, Mr Paisley. It is not for me to do that without discussion at the Business Committee, but I am sure that individual parties and Members will be able to do it in a personal way.

Mr O'Dowd: Further to Dr Paisley's original point of order, Madam Speaker. Is it not somewhat ironic that the DUP wishes to speak about the security of Members in the House but is not prepared to have a debate about the security and well-being of the general public?

Madam Speaker: Thank you, Mr O'Dowd, for that point of order. As I have said, Dr Paisley has been asking me about the review of security for several weeks, and quite rightly I have answered him. The Madam Speaker: I should like to announce to the Assembly that I have been informed by the Chief Electoral Officer that Ms Dawn Purvis has been returned as a Member of the Assembly for the East Belfast constituency to fill the vacancy resulting from the death of Mr David Ervine. I now invite Ms Purvis to take her seat by signing the Roll of Membership.

Madam Speaker: I am satisfied that the Member has signed the Roll and has confirmed her designation. Ms Dawn Purvis has now taken her seat.

Report on Comprehensive Spending Review and Programme for Government; Rates Charges and Water Reform

The Chairperson of the Committee on the Programme for Government (Mr Molloy): I beg to move

I propose this motion not as a member of the Committee but as one of the two Chairpersons appointed to the Committee to enable it to conduct its business. On 24 November 2006, following a direction from the Secretary of State, the Assembly's Business Committee established the Committee on the Programme for Government to consider priorities for the new Executive and make preparations for restoration.

The report under consideration is the work of the Subgroup on the Comprehensive Spending Review and Programme for Government; Rates Charges; and Water Reform — three separate and substantive issues. The high level of consensus and common cause evident from this report and those of the economic issues subgroup is testimony to the high level of agreement between all the parties. It is not a lowest-common-denominator report; it reflects the collective and determined wishes of all the parties to see a new economic vision realised for Northern Ireland. The Committee on the Programme for Government, which shares this consensus, ordered that the report should be printed and debated in the Assembly.

I acknowledge the efforts of the members of the four main parties who served on the subgroup, and I hope that as many of them as possible will participate in today's debate. I thank all the staff who worked long hours over the holiday period and beyond to produce the report on time. As with the other subgroups, this report was undertaken according to a tight timescale. The subgroup invited written submissions from several organisations and took oral evidence from key organisations in relation to each topic.

I will highlight some of the main findings on each of the three subjects. The 2007 comprehensive spending review is an in-depth examination of Government spending priorities to establish long-term aims and objectives for each Department and to set firm and fixed spending plans for a three-year period starting in April 2008. Northern Ireland's share of the public expenditure allocations arising from the comprehensive spending review will be determined under the Barnett formula. The outcome of the comprehensive spending review is, therefore, particularly important for Northern Ireland and will determine, to a large extent, the resources available to a restored Executive to spend on devolved responsibilities.

The allocation from the comprehensive spending review makes up 90% of the total Northern Ireland budget. The other two main sources of funding for Northern Ireland are the regional rates collected from businesses and households, which contribute about 6% of the total, and the borrowing for capital investment under the reinvestment and reform initiative, which makes up 2%.

The comprehensive spending review process began in July 2005, and the outcome will not be known until the Barnett consequentials for Northern Ireland are announced in July of this year. All the indications are that the comprehensive spending review period will be challenging for Northern Ireland and that the slower economic growth rate in the UK will place increased pressure on budgets here.

The Department of Finance and Personnel told the subgroup that any additional funding from the comprehensive spending review, together with additions from the Chancellor's package, will be required simply to meet pay and price inflation.

The financial outlook suggests that the prospect of the Executive meeting economic challenges, closing the permanent wealth and productivity gaps and catching up with the growing Irish economy, which increasingly leaves us behind, is limited.

10.45 am

The report recognises the economic constraints that the new Executive will face as a result of the comprehensive spending review and concludes that to make resources available for additional spending on priority areas identified by the restored Executive will depend on factors such as more efficient provision of existing services; better use of resources through the disposal of surplus assets; the reduction of annual underspend; increased local revenue efforts; and renegotiation of the Chancellor's package.

Some organisations have been critical of the amount of publicly available information for the comprehensive spending review process and of the limited extent of local engagement with the community and the voluntary sector.

The report concludes that a major priority for the restored Executive must be to prepare for the outcome of the comprehensive spending review, due in summer 2007, and to develop draft Priorities and Budget proposals through a transparent process of consultation.

The scope for additional spending on priority areas depends to an unacceptable degree on the release of resources through efficiencies. The report notes the efficiency targets set by the Secretary of State and supports the ongoing work by Departments on value-for-money reviews and developing efficiency plans. Efficiency savings of approximately £770 million must be achieved by 2010, and the restored Executive should continue to drive for greater efficiency. However, the report warns that such efficiencies must not be achieved at the expense of cuts in vital front-line services.

On the better use of existing resources, I wish to make a couple of points that others will elaborate on. First, on the disposal of surplus assets, the Department of Finance and Personnel has a target of £1 billion for asset sales over three years and is working with the other Departments to identify those assets. The report cautions that that must be achieved in a joined-up manner, with proper regard for the impact on services and the resource implications of new investment decisions. In its evidence, the Northern Ireland Council for Voluntary Action (NICVA) complained that, too often in the past, departmental spending cuts happened without proper resource allocation to voluntary sector organisations to make the delivery of services more efficient.

My second point is about the problem of underspend, particularly in relation to capital investment. The report highlights that in 2005-06 there was a massive underspend in the capital budget of just over £227 million — more than 18% of the total. At the same time, the Northern Ireland Audit Office's report identified that the Department of Finance and Personnel had borrowed £411 million under the reinvestment and reform initiative (RRI). That wasteful use of public resources must be tackled by Members. Needless loans taken under the RRI incur interest that must be paid for through increased rate bills.

The report identifies several issues that should feature as priorities in a draft Programme for Government. These include investment for economic growth, investment in skills and training, improvement on internal and external transport links and further improvements in the planning process that deals with the financial implications of the review of public administration. The report also identifies the need to take account of equality provisions and the anti-poverty strategy when a draft Programme for Government is developed. The subgroup concurred with many of the recommendations made by the Subgroup on the Economic Challenges facing Northern Ireland on future investment priorities and supports the investment areas highlighted by that subgroup in its report on an alternative economic package.

The subgroup was conscious of the importance of rates to the Northern Ireland budget and of the revenue from industrial and domestic rates. The burden of rates must be shared in a fair and open manner.

The ability of householders to pay should be considered, and adequate relief must be provided for those over pension age or on low incomes.

The report recognises the importance of a strong manufacturing base in Northern Ireland and the impact that the removal of industrial derating could have on that sector. The report, therefore, calls on the Secretary of State to freeze industrial rates at 25% for a further year, until a planned major review has been carried out.

The report looks at the range of assistance that is available to help domestic householders with their rates bills. It welcomes the further £4 million committed to enhanced relief for pensioners following the discussions by the political parties at St Andrews. The report calls for more study of such issues as transitional relief and discounts for disabled people and single-person households, and it supports the policy of providing assistance for student householders. However, it is concerned that the proposed system will benefit landlords rather than students, and it calls for urgent work to be done to find a better way to deliver that assistance.

The subgroup was asked to consider the capping of domestic rates. The organisations that gave evidence were divided on the issue, as were the parties represented on the subgroup. Nevertheless, there was agreement that something had to be done to help those householders on low incomes who live in high-value homes and who are faced with extremely high rates bills — the so-called asset rich and cash poor. The report recommends a detailed study of the cost and impact of introducing a cap at various levels, including consideration of other ways of helping the asset rich and cash poor.

The report also highlights the serious matter of the uptake of relief schemes for vulnerable and low-income households, which applies to rates and water charges. It matters little how generous the relief schemes are if people do not claim them. The report found that up to 24,000 people who may be entitled to housing benefit — a passport benefit for help towards rates payments — are not claiming it. The report makes clear that the low uptake of passport benefits must be tackled as a priority.

The third substantive issue that the subgroup was asked to address was the introduction of water charges. Members will recall that water charges were debated in the Chamber on 18 December 2006 and that the motion was passed unanimously. The report reaffirms the strong opposition of all parties to water reform and supports the principle that the provision of water services should remain permanently in the public sector. That view was reflected in the written and oral evidence to the subgroup. The report calls for the deferment of the scheme until the restored Assembly is able to consider it. Despite almost universal opposition to the scheme, the Secretary of State has steadfastly set his face against any deferment of water charges, which are to be imposed from April. The subgroup would want me to reaffirm the need for the Assembly to send a clear message to the Government that it rejects their approach.

The report's main conclusion on water reform is that if water charges are to be imposed — as now seems inevitable — the restored Executive must use the planned phasing-in period of three years to undertake a fundamental review of the whole water reform process and examine all available models and options with a view to making any necessary legislative, structural, or other changes from April 2010.

The subgroup also considered the detail of the proposals and had serious concerns about many aspects of the proposals, not least openness and transparency, particularly with regard to the elderly and those who are unable to pay.

Madam Speaker, I know that I am running out of time. A major concern highlighted in the executive summary of the report is the worrying and alarming — and very public — breakdown in relations and trust between the Consumer Council and the Government, in the guise of the Department for Regional Development and the Water Service. The Consumer Council is a statutory body that was set up to promote and safeguard the interests of consumers, and the extent of the frustration and obstruction felt by the council was clearly evident in its oral and written evidence to the subgroup.

I am sure that Members will all agree that this is a situation that cannot be allowed to continue and must be reformed.

I commend the report.

Mr Shannon: I thank all the staff for their help. They certainly give us a lot of guidance and support and answered a lot of questions that we had on the issues.

As a member of the Subgroup on the Comprehensive Spending Review and Programme for Government; Rates Charges and Water Reform, I listened to and read carefully the evidence presented, and considered the policy that I believe to be in the best interests of my constituents and Northern Ireland as a whole.

The report and its recommendations have been well researched, and there are many worthy recommendations that must be implemented as a matter of urgency. Of the 33 recommendations made, I will highlight a select few that have been brought to my attention, especially by my constituents, which I feel must be urgently addressed.

One of these is the rates review, which is the most important one, and the issue that was raised with me by the most people. It is linked to manufacturing and small business in the Province. The Federation of Small Businesses has over 6,000 members in Northern Ireland. These Members do not enjoy the rates relief that their counterparts on the mainland enjoy, never mind the further burdens that will be imposed by the new rates review.

As has been stated in the review, manufacturing provides over 90,000 jobs in the Province, with a further 45,000 jobs supplementing the industry. The fact of the matter is that with no relief, and with business being judged on the size of the building as opposed to the profit size of the company — for example, a warehouse for plastic boxes will take up more space than somewhere that makes computer chips — the ability to pay huge charges is not the same. This is the reason relief for manufacturing and small businesses must be a priority.

As found in the reports for the Preparation for Government Committee on economic development for Northern Ireland, businesses must be encouraged if the Province is to flourish and achieve its potential. The recommendation to freeze industrial rates at 25% is a step on the road of encouraging business growth instead of being a factor which makes companies decide to relocate to overseas destinations that do not tax the life out of businesses that set up there — they recognise that to encourage businesses is to encourage growth and development. It is a sad fact that we must learn from so-called Third World countries that small relief can bring a great deal of change.

I have had many elderly constituents in my advice centre over the past few months who have genuinely been shocked and frightened at the proposed cost of the new rates bills, never mind the added burden of water rates on top of this. I have had widowed pensioners coming in to me who bought their homes 50 years ago in Newtownards for as little as £7,000, according to them and according to a study carried out by the University of Ulster. One pensioner in particular paid off the mortgage when she retired and now lives alone in the house since her husband passed away. She is managing on her state pension of around £80 per week. One morning she got a letter from the Valuation and Lands Agency saying that her property has now been valued at £200,000 and that she will have to pay a rates bill of over £2,500 per year. The maths do not work out.

This is why charities such as Age Concern have campaigned and lobbied for a rates relief enhancement, not only for pensioners as a right, but also a further enhancement for those living alone, recognising that they are under more financial pressure than those living together. To expect them to pay based on the size and area of their home is not a possibility, and the subsequent recommendation that resources be made available is essential.

Our elderly are already living in a poverty trap in the Province, and to thrust them further down this trail cannot be accepted. The Assembly must ensure that something is done sooner rather than later.

The same must be highlighted for other vulnerable people in our society — the disabled, those in low-income homes and students. Although there is a duty to ensure that the best possible service is provided, this cannot be done at the expense of someone choosing between heating and paying a rates bill for services that they alone could not possibly be generating. This is also the reason that the recommendation for a single-person's discount is valid, as such people do not generate the same amount of service provision, or water and sewerage use, as the six-person household next door.

Much publicity has been given to the fact that there will be relief for low-income families in receipt of housing benefit and other benefits. However, it is estimated that over 200,000 households in the Province are entitled to housing benefit but do not claim it. It follows that those households will be unaware that relief is available for rates and water bills. The Government have found that too many people who should not have to pay the full amount are in fact paying the full amount, to the detriment of their families.

An addendum was added to the report concerning the valuation of homes with agricultural clauses attached. Rates are charged in accordance with the valuation of houses; yet the position is not that simple. Consider the case of a house in the countryside, worth £300,000 but saddled with an agricultural clause. Due to the planning condition that accompanies that clause, while the valuation is calculated at £300,000, the market value of that house is half that. My party tried to highlight such cases in Committee.

I have looked into that matter and taken advice on it. I consulted three estate agents in my constituency, and they confirm that a house with an agricultural clause and a planning condition attached has a market price only 50% of its valuation. Only two organisations in Northern Ireland — one a building society, the other a bank — are prepared to lend on the strength of such houses. That must be promptly addressed.

The Government maintain that the 20% discount due to all farmers' dwellings in the countryside is sufficient. However, houses with agricultural clauses should be in a class of their own. I do not wish to be trite. Those homes should be considered on their own merits. Application of a 20% discount means that a £300,000 house will be valued at £240,000, yet, as I pointed out earlier, the real value of such a house is £150,000.

Dwellings with agricultural clauses and planning permission restrictions have lost value as a result of legislation; yet for the purposes of rating they are valued at a much higher figure. Why should salt be rubbed in the wound by charging at the higher value for rating? It is neither right nor fair. That must be addressed, as the Committee recommends.

In the Province house prices rise by £1,000 per month, yet incomes do not rise at the same rate. A house worth £200,000 five years ago is now worth vastly more. Northern Ireland is second only to London in terms of rising property prices, and that makes the case for rates to be capped — as they are in Scotland, England and Wales. A great many house buyers in the Province, especially first-time buyers, are aware of the problems of trying to buy at such very high values. I read in the newspaper yesterday that the Halifax Building Society has predicted that, this year, more people than ever before will take a chance with their mortgage payments, as a result of the rises in domestic and water rates. They will either be only just able to meet their mortgage payments, or they will find themselves in financial difficulties. It is atrocious that in Northern Ireland the cap on rates is set at £500,000, while wages are 20% lower than on the mainland.

I could highlight other issues, but I will leave them to other Members. The report's recommendations provide sufficient reasons for action either by the Secretary of State or by the Assembly. I make one other point in support of the worried and groaning middle classes. To buy their houses, they have gone out on a limb; they are now contemplating rising water, domestic and mortgage rates. Members must take a stand on their behalf. People used to be faced with terrorism by the gun; now they face terrorism by taxation. Members must ensure that the necessary reform comes at an affordable price and that there is greater focus on efficiency than on throwing people's hard-earned money like bread on the water. I support the Committee's recommendations.

Mr Cree: I support the report and congratulate the staff who carried out such extensive work in such a short time.

The report falls into three parts; I would like to highlight a few points on water reform. Water charging is something that concerns everyone and, from the outset, the water reform unit and the Water Service have been generally unhelpful in providing the necessary information about what was planned with respect to water charges. This weekend Members will have read further revelations about what is happening with Northern Ireland Water, the new company set up to drive the whole issue forward.

The subgroup was firmly of the opinion that the whole process of water reform should be referred back to the devolved Assembly for consideration — that is the most important thing. This is the only issue that has united all the political parties; they are all totally opposed to the introduction of water charges. When the industry was privatised across the water, it received a green dowry to update the water and sewerage services. That has yet to happen here. After the comprehensive spending review there was a figure of £50 million dedicated to Northern Ireland, but that money was put into the general pot and not ring-fenced for water charges. Now we face the consequences of 30 years of Government underinvestment in these services and we have been asked to pay to bring them up to standard. We believe that there are better ways to modernise water and sewerage services and other models that would be more acceptable than one based on the rateable value of property. That makes no sense whatsoever.

There are many concerns about the details. The subgroup was concerned about the powers of the regulator. That is an issue that needs to be underscored:

“the Regulator must be given full authority and enforcement powers from 1 April 2007, on all matters including issues relating to the setting of charges and the disposal of land or assets.”

Mr Molloy has already referred to the assets and the 130-odd properties that are surplus to requirements. That would be a good dowry for any private company, and it needs to be controlled.

There is also the issue of the operation of the company. Members know that the capital value of the company has been written down from the Water Service's £5.4 billion to £1 billion — there is no particular reason for that. We know that the rate of return has been agreed at 5.8%, which is above what is obtained on the market generally. There is no reason for the £1 billion figure; simple arithmetic suggests that if we reduce it to £500 million there would be half that amount in savings to those who use the water. We also believe that the 5.8% figure should be reduced to something more realistic — 3.5% has been suggested.

The bad-debt provision in this new company is another major concern for anyone involved in business. We know that the figure has been set at 5% and that the figures across the water are many times greater than that. Companies have been operating across the water for some time, and one in four cases coming before the courts are for the non-payment of water charges. There is a red alert on the debt provision for companies. At the end of the day, those who are going to pay the charges are going to pay for the inefficiencies in the company.

The most important factor in deciding the value of the company was how it would do its business. The subgroup pushed for a long time to have sight of a business plan. The strategic business plan is now at a fairly advanced stage, but the Department and the Minister have refused to make it available. We are told that it is commercially sensitive. I do not see how a Department and a Government-owned company can be commercially sensitive. That is the main building block of Northern Ireland Water. We are heading towards the implementation of water charges from 1 April, and we do not know whether that company will be successful. Remember that the safety net for inefficiencies and additional costs is the poor consumer.

The Consumer Council did not get full co-operation from the water reform unit — the first time that that has happened — and that was a major concern for many members of the subgroup. Northern Ireland Water should have a duty to consult the Consumer Council on all matters that may impact on consumers, including the assessment of policies, which should be subjected to an equality impact assessment.

Mr Molloy referred to the vulnerable in society. We have the assurance of a limited affordability tariff for those claiming benefits. However, we have no guarantee that that will continue after 2010. We need an assurance that that will happen and that it will be funded by HM Treasury.

Unfortunately, it looks increasingly likely that we will not be able to do anything by 1 April. The three-year phasing-in period anticipated by the Government is inadequate. The subgroup and the Committee on the Programme for Government have agreed that the phasing-in period should be extended from three years to five. I would like to see the first year water charges capped until a new Assembly can take the matter forward logically and soundly.

Ms Ritchie: I thank the Chairmen of the Committee for their assistance, kindness and courtesy over the five- to six-week period, and also the staff for their endurance, assistance, support and guidance.

The report should be commended to the Assembly for the work and in-depth research that have gone into three substantial subjects. The comprehensive spending review, the Programme for Government, rates charges and water reform are fundamental priority issues that will provide strategic directions for a future Executive to build and work on. The SDLP believes that for such work to continue and be built on there is a compelling political imperative to restore the political institutions so that the areas and priorities identified in the report can become the bedrock on which a future Executive builds policies and develops, grows and nurtures them for the betterment of everybody who lives here.

The SDLP wants to take Northern Ireland, as an integral part of the island, in a slightly different direction from that steered by the current direct-rule Administration.

Mr Kennedy: No, thank you.

Ms Ritchie: The SDLP wants to ensure the equitable delivery of services that conform to good equality standards, and to make those services accessible to all, whether one lives in an urban or a rural community. I am sure — despite the catcalls from across the Chamber — that everybody believes in setting those standards and wants the best for their constituents. The SDLP wants to ensure that the fruits of a future restored Executive are enjoyed by all, irrespective of where one lives. We must strive to eradicate regional disparities and uphold the principle of equality for all at every opportunity.

11.15 am

We must ensure that a more robust package from the Chancellor, together with North/South funds, will create the necessary mechanisms to fund the major infrastructure improvements that we have so earnestly sought and that all investment opportunities are investigated and developed. We must rebuild the economy and ensure that young people are equipped with the educational qualifications, skills and training that will enable them to remain here, avoid the brain drain and make their contribution to the development of this place.

Those are the principles on which we must build our future. Urgent political progress is required, which will hopefully be achieved by the end of March. To appreciate fully the real extent of the work of the Committee for the Programme for Government and the nature of the submissions and evidence taken, we must consider the recommendations of its report, some of which are highly technically complicated.

First, in relation to the comprehensive spending review, my party supports the recommendations of the subgroup on economic issues. The Committee on the Programme for Government must present the Chancellor with a robust set of counter-proposals. I regret that we have not been given the opportunity to do so prior to tonight's deadline. I hope that that opportunity will arise following the elections on 7 March.

One of the first priorities of a restored Executive must be to engage in the preparation of the comprehensive spending review by the summer of this year and the urgent development of the draft priorities and Budget documents for consultation. Various issues have been identified as spending priorities, including the need to expand the private-sector economy by attracting more foreign investment and supporting local businesses. Skills and training should be a priority for future investment, as should internal and external transport links and investment in public transport. The comprehensive spending review should be part of a strategic approach to tackling poverty on a holistic basis.

Direct parallels can be drawn with the previous reports published by the Subgroup on Economic Challenges; however, our economy's problems have been defined in this document. Urgent solutions must be applied, requiring political impetus and support from a restored Executive to ensure that they are carried through and that all investment opportunities are developed.

The report of the Committee on the Programme for Government also dealt with the two contentious issues of rate charges and water reform. The SDLP believe that rates should be based on the ability to pay. We agree with the Committee that the proposed water reform agenda must be deferred. In the debate in this Assembly on 18 December, all parties declared their opposition to the imposition of water charges. However, the Secretary of State stubbornly refused to listen to the wishes of the Assembly. So much for the British direct-rule Administration that refused to listen to the people of Northern Ireland. They have sent the clear message that only the restoration of our own political destiny will allow us to take control.

The SDLP supports the report's recommendations, which press the Government to defer the water reforms until they can be considered by a devolved Administration. We must remember that rating reform and water reform are being used by the direct-rule Administration as mechanisms for the collection of money from the local population in order to invest in the upgrading of a weak infrastructure, which was allowed to crumble over many years. In a very punitive way, working families and people on low incomes are being forced to pay for the deficits of previous direct-rule Administrations that failed to live up to the requirements of the people.

That is a serious matter, because it impacts on many people throughout Northern Ireland. If water charges are introduced without the Assembly being restored, the role of the regulator must be visibly strengthened, the capital valuation of the Government-owned company (Go-co) must be reduced from £1 billion to £500 million and the required rate of return must be lowered from 5.8% to 3.5%.

The subgroup did a considerable amount of work and took a great deal of oral and written evidence — in fact, it heard an entire day of evidence on water reform alone. The subgroup was extremely concerned about the breakdown of the relationship between the Consumer Council and the Government. However, that was the Government's fault, because they obdurately refused to provide the Consumer Council with detailed information for fear of strengthening its wish to protect the consumer. The Government have no interest in the consumer, and parties must challenge that.

To ensure that the report's recommendations are implemented and that the views of political parties are heard, each party must subscribe fully to the principles of power sharing and policing. That requires the full implementation of power sharing and support for policing, and the restoration of the Executive by 26 March 2007. Restoration would create a pathway that would enable the Assembly later this year to develop further our economy, our infrastructure, and our education, skills and training programme. It would also ensure that investment opportunities, not only on the island of Ireland and in Great Britain but further afield in the global economy, were fully explored for the benefit of all. To do so would create a better life for all the people who live here and for future generations, and it is within the parties' grasp today. Let us seize that opportunity to lead the people to a better future.

Mr Neeson: I received the 582-page report at 9.45 am — that is unacceptable. By the same token, Peter Hain decided to exclude the Alliance Party from the subgroup. If he believes that the political drivelling between the DUP and Sinn Féin is the way forward, I must tell him that a sectarian, political carve-up is not the way forward. Despite receiving the report so late, I intend to make a few comments on its contents.

Several MLAs went to Downing Street to receive the Chancellor's response on the so-called peace dividend. The main peace dividend is based on the £1 billion sale of public-sector assets. To base any economy on the sale of public-sector assets is not the way in which to progress. Recommendation 5 in the report states:

"The sub-group notes the progress in relation to Efficiency Development Plans and the need to achieve efficiency savings of around £770m by 2010/11 for investment in frontline services and recommends that a restored Executive engages in early consultation on the full range and implications of these plans."

I accept that. I also agree with recommendation 6, which states:

"The sub-group recommends that continuing the drive for greater efficiency must be a priority for a restored Executive but that such efficiencies must not be achieved at the cost of cuts to vital frontline services."

If restoration happens, one of the first decisions for an Executive to take will be to reduce the artificially created 10 Departments to a more acceptable and efficient number.

I suggest, as the Secretary of State has suggested, that we return to the six-Department set-up. We have had a radical review of public administration and local government; the same must now happen to central Government.

I agree with Francie Molloy that, when it comes to rates charges, the interests of vulnerable groups, particularly the elderly and the less well off, must be looked after. That should be a priority.

I spoke in the debate on water reform. I repeat that what is happening at the moment is privatisation of the Water Service through the back door. What is being proposed is not a utility tax but a property tax. That must be a priority.

It has been interesting to listen to various Members this morning. Six months ago they were all saying that there was no way that we were going to have water charges. Everyone that I have listened to this morning seems to have done a U-turn and accepted the whole prospect of water charges being forced upon the people of Northern Ireland this year. That is a convenient way for them to avoid having to make the decision that should have been made by a devolved Government. We all know that certain parties did not want to take on the responsibility of deciding on water charges. It seems that most of the political parties represented here this morning have accepted the principle.

In relation to the priorities that have been identified, there is no doubt that health must be given the necessary resources. This afternoon's debate on Muckamore Abbey Hospital will show the serious shortcomings of the Health Service.

I commend the work of the Committee in relation to the Bain Report and recognise that if education is to move forward, there must be some form of compromise. That was identified in last week's debate.

The economic subgroup met during the summer of last year. One of the big issues that came up time after time was the shortage of skills in the workforce. It must be a priority of a restored Executive to develop the skills that are necessary in a twenty-first century economy. One of the things that the subgroup recognised was that the emergence of the Celtic tiger was based on the development of skills. I welcome that.

Infrastructure is a vital issue in relation not only to the economy, but to the development of society in Northern Ireland as a whole. One thing that can be said about the period of devolution is that it was the Assembly that took the decision to develop the rail infrastructure and purchase new rolling stock. That would not have happened if we had not had devolution. It is desperately important that we see the restoration of devolution.

As for the other priorities, the reduction in EU funding is going to have a major impact on public spending.

When we had Objective 1 status, we wasted the opportunity. The Republic of Ireland also had Objective 1 status and used that to develop its infrastructure. In many ways we are now playing catch-up in the development of infrastructure, and that is why I welcome last week's decision by the Irish Government to provide funds for improving North/South infrastructure.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Wells] in the Chair)

11.30 am

The final priority is to recognise the pressures on social housing. The Housing Executive no longer builds new houses; that is left to housing associations. This must become a priority to be urgently addressed, given the growing population in Northern Ireland.

I am sorry that I have had so little time to go through the report and do it the justice that it deserves. Like other Members, I pay tribute to the staff who worked along with Committee members to produce this substantial report in a very short time.

Mr Weir: I join with others in thanking the staff and the many witnesses who gave oral and written evidence.

As other Members have said, the report does not stand in isolation. It should be read in conjunction with the economic issues report. Some Members, including Mr Neeson, did not have very long to read the report, but I should like to correct one point that he made: he accused parties — and I am speaking particularly for my party — of not being opposed to water charges. We have been consistently opposed to water charges, and I suspect that a number of the other parties also take that view. Had Mr Neeson taken time to read the terms of reference of the report, he would have seen that, because we were dealing with three issues in such a short time, our scope was very limited, particularly with regard to water reform.

We were to consider the arrangements for water reform as set out in the draft Water and Sewerage Services (Northern Ireland) Order 2006, the strategic business plan, the governance of the Go-co, the issue of licence, and the billing and collection of water charges. Whether or not the Committee supported water charges was not within its terms of reference, and it is unfortunate that Mr Neeson did not realise that. The recommendations that we made on that topic were restricted to those areas.

Mr P Robinson: Would it be worth pointing out to the Member from the Alliance Party that the Democratic Unionist Party — not alone on the Committee — believed that the Alliance Party should have had membership? Miracles can happen. It could get enough Members elected to enable it to be represented in a future Executive. It should have had membership, and the Committee asked the Secretary of State to reconsider that.

Mr Weir: Obviously the Secretary of State hardened his heart against that. Unfortunately, he did not share our level of optimism about the Alliance Party.

A wide range of issues was put to the Committee, and there were three themes: the comprehensive spending review, the rates issue, and water charges. I will deal briefly with each in turn. The comprehensive spending review, as was indicated by a number of people who gave evidence, showed the voodoo economics of the Chancellor's statement. The so-called massive bonus that was supposed to be coming to Northern Ireland — the £50 billion that was trailed when the parties met — when analysed, amounted to almost nothing. The Economic Research Institute of Northern Ireland (ERINI) said that when economic pressures such as inflation and others are taken into account, the money announced by the Chancellor will, at best, only enable us to stand still. Our party has a grave worry that unless the Government put a proper economic package in place, any new institutions will be strangled at birth.

The DUP has said consistently that not only is a proper economic package a requirement — among other requirements, including full support for policing and justice — but that the issue must be properly resolved if we are to have a firm foundation for a way forward for Northern Ireland.

The welcome that we have given to value-for-money studies has been mentioned. The reviews that are to be put in place to identify and deliver efficiency savings are to be welcomed. However, as another Member indicated, a question mark must be put over those efficiency savings. Some £770 million of efficiency savings will supposedly be achieved, but efficiency savings must not become a code word for the removal of front-line services.

During a meeting of the subgroup, it arose that discussions on proposals to reduce the number of pension credit advisers throughout Northern Ireland are taking place. That will be presented as an efficiency saving, but it will impact on front-line services by reducing the level of advice available to pensioners. That, in turn, will lead to fewer pensioners taking up benefits. We must send out a strong warning that the introduction of the most efficient system to Northern Ireland should not come about at the expense of front-line services.

Moreover, unless the Government provide proper investment to restructure the economy in the way in which we all want, movement must be made towards more reliance on the private sector. That will require a certain level of initial investment. An innovation fund was identified, and the subgroup accepted that it was important that we focus on skills and training. However, if the Government are not prepared to put their money where their mouth is initially, we will not be able to rely more on the private sector.

As Members have stated, we must get away from the ridiculous situation of massive departmental underspend. Reference was made to the amount that Departments have for resources and, in particular, to the failure to spend on capital investment. In the past year, we have borrowed £411 million under the reinvestment and reform initiative, yet there has been a capital underspend of £227 million. To pay interest on a borrowed amount as high as £411 million while not spending £227 million is absolute nonsense. There must be a major examination of the impact of that underspend.

A freeze must be put on the end to industrial derating — the manufacturing base cannot be attacked further. There must be joined-up thinking on the subject. We are constantly lectured on the need for the Northern Ireland economy to be restructured, and we accept that, but the private sector needs to grow substantially. That cannot happen, however, if manufacturing jobs here are attacked. Clear evidence exists that if industrial derating is phased out, rather than developed, the 90,000 manufacturing jobs in Northern Ireland, as well as the 45,000 jobs that depend on manufacturing, will be under threat. Capital is much more fluid than it used to be, and therefore it is relatively easy for businesses simply to leave Northern Ireland and go elsewhere. As such, it is vital that the manufacturing base be protected.

The subgroup was also struck by the manufacturing sector's acceptance of the need to invest in skills and training. The manufacturing sector proposed that there be a 5% compulsory surcharge on industrial rates, provided it is part of an overall freeze. That money would be ring-fenced to promote skills and training. The subgroup welcomed that very helpful suggestion.

The issue of a rates cap divided the subgroup, but my party and one other party indicated that it would be utterly inappropriate if people in Northern Ireland were to end up paying more rates than the richest person with the largest property in any other part of the United Kingdom. The appropriate level of rates cap must be examined to ensure that it properly protects people. Furthermore, at whatever level that cap is set, we must take a greater degree of cognisance of those people who fall below it. We must ensure that the proposed rates hikes are not simply imposed at the level that has been suggested.

I welcome the subgroup's support for a longer phasing-in period for such people. The announcement of rate relief for pensioners is also welcome, although that should go much further.

Members have highlighted the lack of clarity on the issue of water reform. The Consumer Council indicated that there are between 20% and 50% of gross inefficiencies in the system. Surely the Government should tackle those before considering any water reform. We might find that, were those inefficiencies properly tackled, a large amount of the necessary capital for investment would be raised.

The subgroup expressed concern in the report at the circumscribed powers of the regulator, and that matter must be tackled.

Finally, the report indicated the level of bad debt that is expected, even in the absence of an organised campaign to urge people not to pay water charges. There is concern that the additional whammy of the burden of others' bad debt will be placed on those who do their best to pay their rates bills.

The report covers a range of issues, and I commend it to the House.

Mr O'Dowd: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. All the political parties on the subgroup have gone over the report. I attended the last three meetings of the subgroup, and I found its work on several factors productive and interesting. The co-operative manner in which it worked has resulted in the report that we now discuss.

I shall be brief, a LeasCheann Comhairle, because the subgroup covered the issues in detail, and most of those issues have also been dealt with today. However, I have a few points to make.

On the economic package that has been discussed with the British Exchequer, it has been agreed that the British Government have failed to produce any new moneys for a peace dividend or for a new start for a Government in this part of Ireland. That continues to be a priority for all political parties. The subgroup's example of a united voice could — and should — be of benefit.

Sinn Féin is concerned that "efficiency savings" is a code for cuts, and cuts made for no other reason than to save money. Every Department must be run efficiently — no one can argue with that. Whether civil servant or politician, there is a duty to ensure that public money is spent efficiently. However, there are deep concerns that the efficiencies mentioned in the CSR are in order to make financial savings rather than to ensure an efficient public service.

Recommendation 10 states that the CSR should be:

"part of a strategic approach to tackle poverty on the basis of objective need as envisaged in the new Anti-Poverty Strategy."

That is important to Sinn Féin. A real opportunity for joined-up thinking and government exists. The CSR can be integral to tackling poverty through the anti-poverty strategy, and it would be a loss if that did not happen.

Sinn Féin supports the report's recommendations on industrial derating. An incoming Executive must review the matter, and measures must be introduced to ensure that manufacturing operates on a level playing field.

Sinn Féin cannot support domestic capping, and that is outlined in the report. It is not fair and transparent that those who live in the more expensive properties should pay less in rates and be subsidised by those on lower incomes.

Some people who own and live in their properties need assistance. That situation has been referred to as being property rich and income poor. However, Sinn Féin cannot agree with a blanket cap.

Despite the comments of some Members from the Alliance Party, the political parties agreed that the Government's plans to introduce water charging are not the way forward. Although members of the subgroup had a tight remit within which to work, and although there were varying views on how to move forward on water charging, local political parties do not favour the process that direct-rule Ministers outlined. As a result, several possible ways forward are suggested in the report, and any incoming Executive will need to examine them.

However, the report is valuable only if its recommendations are implemented. All the political parties that were involved in producing the report did good work. They managed to reach agreement on the majority of the issues that are discussed in the report. Of course, there was some disagreement: we all come to politics with different views, but difference is not always a bad thing. However, we need an Executive if the report's recommendations are to be implemented. I am sure that all the political parties that are in the Chamber agree that the last thing that we want is for the report to lie on a desk somewhere gathering dust for another two, five or 10 years or for a political lifetime. If that happens, the opportunity that we have been given will have been wasted. Therefore I hope that, in the coming months, we have an Executive and an Assembly that can implement the recommendations that the four main political parties set out. The Committee showed one thing: we can work together and reach agreement on socio-economic issues for the betterment of all. Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The next Member to speak is Ms Dawn Purvis. As she is making her maiden speech, this will be the first occasion on which the Assembly will have heard from her. I am sure that Members are by now aware that the convention is that such speeches are heard without interruption.

Ms Purvis: It is an honour and a privilege to serve as a Member for East Belfast. However, it would be remiss of me to not refer to the previous holder of that seat, David Ervine. As you know, he was an Assembly Member from 1998 until his death. He spoke in many debates, and I am sure that a lot of banter went on between him and his colleagues.

Many of the motions to which he spoke concerned those in our community who are underprivileged, vulnerable and disadvantaged. The tributes that poured in after his death came from many of those socially excluded groups. However, David was about much more than that. He was a man who took great risks for peace; I remember that on several occasions he was called a traitor, a Lundy and a sell-out merchant. However, that did not deter him from pursuing his vision of creating a better society for all our citizens.

One particular occasion springs to mind: 14 September 1997 in Block B in Castle Buildings. The usual calls of Lundy and traitor were heard, but on that day, political parties both encouraged and showed courage to break the ground, walk the walk and fight, argue and debate for their corners. Many of us would not be sitting in the Chamber today had those courageous steps not been taken.

Many tributes have been paid to David Ervine over the past couple of weeks, particularly from his colleagues and from East Belfast Members. I feel that I should quote one such tribute, which said that David Ervine was:

“an able, energetic and committed representative eager to improve the lives of his constituents”.

That is a fitting tribute to a dedicated east Belfast man who broke the ground on which others walk.

However, East Belfast is a changing constituency. While there is plenty, there is poverty among that plenty. There is an inner city, which is becoming marginalised and apathetic, with demographic changes and declining industries. It is a time of massive change. In such times, as we have seen over the past 10 years, people feel insecure and vulnerable, and it is up to community leaders and politicians, in particular, to manage that change. Managing change is about empowering people and encouraging communities to embrace all that is positive in that change. There are new investments, new developments and new jobs, but there is an increasingly marginalised community that does not have access to them. We need increasing investment in education and skills to empower people to gain that access.

As an Assembly Member for East Belfast, I am duty bound to improve the quality of people's lives. I will continue to provide a service, as David did, to the constituents in East Belfast, especially as regards housing. We have a depleted social housing stock, and people cannot access the adequate housing that they need; year after year we have increasing numbers of people presenting themselves as homeless; and we have those who cannot afford to buy their own homes, and those who are living in the private rental sector. All of those issues need to be considered.

There is also the matter of welfare benefits. Some Members referred to passport benefits with respect to water rates and domestic rates. As long as there are thousands of people who cannot access those benefits, there is a need for help and advice to be given.

As long as there is poverty, and as long as there is inequality in education, health and gender, it will be my duty to articulate the needs of the working and workless classes in East Belfast. I am delighted that we have a Programme for Government — it is through that programme that people in impoverished areas and those in the voluntary and community sectors can see the policies that the Government intend to implement. However, although words are good, we need action plans. Anti-poverty strategies are fantastic, but we need action plans. We need to be able to measure them to ensure that they reach those who are most in need.

I appeal to all our political leaders, who have it in their gift to give us accountable democracy, to do just that. It is something that we all crave. There have been debates on the Programme for Government and on implementation, but I appeal to those people because we are tantalisingly close to giving our society what it needs — peace and stability. I appeal to everyone to hold their nerve and to leave us a legacy, and to remember those who have gone before.

The Chairperson of the Subgroup on the Comprehensive Spending Review and Programme for Government; Rates Charges and Water Reform (Dr Birnie): I am very pleased to be winding up the debate. It has all moved a little bit faster than had been anticipated.

There were three parts to the remit of the subgroup, and they are reflected in the report: the comprehensive spending review, rates reform, and the water supply and sewerage industry. As Mr Neeson pointed out, the report is lengthy, running to around 580 pages. It is worth reminding ourselves of the terms of reference. The subgroup was to look at a number of things: major pressures on spending, efficiency possibilities, and investment needs during the comprehensive spending review period.

Additionally, we were to consider any financial or economic package coming from the Treasury. We were assisted on that point by the work of one of the other subgroups, which concentrated largely on the subject. You will see cross-references between our report and the report coming from that subgroup. Ms Purvis referred to some of the social priorities that might be included in such a financial package, as did other Members during this morning's debate.

The subgroup rapidly ran into the limitations of the timetable within which the CSR is being developed for Northern Ireland. It was too early to identify departmental priorities in detail. In addition, one of the witnesses, Mr Victor Hewitt, Director of ERINI pointed out the "paucity of paper" on the process in Northern Ireland. This created further difficulties for the work of the subgroup.

Sean Neeson has already referred to the importance of efficiency savings. The subgroup was very impressed by evidence from witnesses of the dangers of these and of the past reality that efficiency savings gained in practice were simply cuts in front-line spending.

In a sense, considering CSR is like gazing into a crystal ball. We were looking at various public-spending scenarios for the next three to four years. Subgroup members were struck and concerned by one such scenario. Even if — and this may be optimistic — the final settlement through the Barnett formula and the CSR is that spending over the next three years in Northern Ireland grows at 3.5% nominally every year, all of that and more could be swallowed up and more by cost pressures. That would put even more pressure on gaining efficiency savings and making as much as possible through the sale of assets.

Certainly, the bottom line emerging from the subgroup's consideration was that whereas the previous CSR period, 2004 to the present, saw growth in public spending of the order of 3% in Northern Ireland in real terms — that is, over and above the RPI (retail price index) inflation rate — that will not happen this time. Northern Ireland will be doing well to get 1% above RPI every year. That creates great stringency on what can be done in terms of identifying departmental spending priorities. Mr Weir referred to that point.

Therefore, if the terms of reference implied that the subgroup had to draft the Budget for Northern Ireland and the priorities to go into the Programme for Government, which will appear in December 2007, it did not carry them out. Of course, that was an almost impossible task to complete in a handful of meetings. It is left to a future Assembly to identify some means of judging the merits of the levels of spending within and between the 10 Northern Ireland Departments.

It is worth pointing out that the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (DHSSPS) takes up roughly 45% of the £8 billion or so of block grant for public expenditure. Theoretically, if the level of health spending continued to grow at the rate at which it grew in some recent years — namely 7% to 10% nominal growth per annum — Northern Ireland would eventually get to the ludicrous and absurd position at which almost 100% of the Northern Ireland block grant was being spent on health and nothing was being spent on schools, roads, industrial development or the environment. That is not to deny the great need for health spending that will be the subject of debate later today.

That illustrates some of the fundamental dilemmas with which, it is to be hoped, a future Executive and Assembly will get to struggle.

12.00 noon

The second area of the subgroup's remit was the reform of domestic and industrial rates. The subgroup's terms of reference refer to its considering possible caps on domestic and industrial rates and how best to increase relief for low-income groups, especially pensioners.

The issue of a possible cap is twofold: whether to impose a cap and, if so, at what level. Following the so-called St Andrews Agreement, the official line from Government seems to be that they might favour a cap on the rateable value of each house set at £500,000. The highest rate currently being paid in Great Britain — £2,950 — is for a band H house in the Sedgefield area, interestingly enough. That is, I believe, the Prime Minister's constituency. However, some members of the subgroup were impressed by witness arguments that Northern Ireland is not the same as England, Scotland and Wales. Some witnesses maintained that, compared to many GB regions, Northern Ireland's citizens have lower levels of disposable income and, in many cases, experience higher costs of living.

The subgroup considered a possible extension of the proposed relief for people with disabilities. Members looked favourably on the possibility of using some proportion, perhaps the highest category, of disability living allowance (DLA) recipients. We were obviously aware that the number of DLA recipients in Northern Ireland — 171,000 — is considerable, but one quarter are in the highest band.

After the St Andrews Agreement proposals, the subgroup considered also the findings of the Government's pensioner rates relief working group, which reported just before Christmas. The subgroup was struck by the fact that, to some degree, that group had worked backwards from a somewhat arbitrary sum of money — £4 million — to determine the maximum possible increase in the allowance figure that could be made to provide pensioners with domestic rates relief.

With respect to the industrial rates, the subgroup noted that if the rating level on manufacturing were to increase from 25% to 35% in the financial year 2007-08, the increase in revenue received by Government would be £7.9 million. Of course, we now see that, as the rate has been frozen at 30%, that will not happen. That example gives Members some feel for the possible cost implications of various proposals in that area.

The subgroup was struck by the argument that whereas, in the past, the Government may have claimed that revenue of up to £80 million could be raised by introducing rating in the manufacturing sector, that would not happen, because companies would adjust either by moving their production entirely out of Northern Ireland if they had the capability, scale and multinational ability to do so, or if they were stuck, as it were, in a Northern Ireland location, by downsizing the physical scale of their factories and plant facilities. By implication, they would not, therefore, have to pay the full £80 million. The Government have been over-optimistic in that projection. Indeed, it was striking also that the Department had made little allowance for the fact that manufacturing employment and scale of production could be reduced because of the impact of industrial rating on its cost competitiveness.

As Jim Shannon said earlier, the subgroup was struck by the argument that the use of rateable value — by implication, floor space — may not have been a particularly fair way to assess the rating liability of various manufacturing enterprises.

The third matter that the subgroup considered was water reform. Peter Weir referred to the subgroup's terms of reference. The subgroup had to examine The Water and Sewerage Services (Northern Ireland) Order 2006 and consider matters such as the strategic business plan, the governance and licensing of the Go-co, billing and the collection of water charges.

As has already been mentioned during the debate, there is, to some degree, a hierarchy of responses in the subgroup's report. We all implicitly agreed that, ideally, water charging should be stopped — full stop. If, however, that does not happen, the second line of response, the default position, is to defer any action until a new Executive is in place and can give careful consideration to the matter. If that is not possible, our report considers how the system currently proposed — if, regrettably, there is charging — could be improved.

As other Members have said, we were greatly hindered by the lack of available information. We did not see any draft business plan for Northern Ireland Water Ltd. We were told that such a draft might be available in April, but we shall wait and see. Leslie Cree referred to that lack of information during his speech. I am tempted to say that we were annoyed by the drip feed of such information — this subject has plenty of scope for appalling puns.

Mr Neeson referred to the possibility that the current policy simply represents privatisation through the back door. I am sure that many Members regard that as more than a possibility. We were concerned by the rate-of-return figure of 5.8% compared to 5.1% for England. That figure seems to be higher here, but some evidence from the Department for Regional Development suggests that, when one takes into account tax differences in some way that is pretty much incomprehensible to most of us, there is actually equality in the real rate of return. That is another matter that bears careful investigation.

It is not clear, as Leslie Cree mentioned, why the figure of £1 billion was selected as the asset value of Northern Ireland Water Ltd. The subgroup endorsed the Consumer Council's assertion that it is more important to get water reform right than to get it done. We are concerned that, if things go ahead as planned, by 2009-10 — which will represent the end of the tying of charges to England and Wales levels — water consumers and bill payers will be very much tied to whether adequate improvements in efficiency have been made and what has happened to the bad-debt problem, as Peter Weir said.

In conclusion, I again thank the subgroup staff for their massive and admirable efforts at a difficult time of year. I thank my colleague Mr McNarry, who took the Chair on two occasions. There was an impressive level of consensus in the subgroup, as John O'Dowd said. Four parties were represented, but I appreciate the argument of Sean Neeson that it could have been five. There were some differences among the parties, but I stress that the report's proposals are carefully thought out and can inform any future Executive. I support the motion.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly takes note of the Report from the Committee on the Programme for Government on the Comprehensive Spending Review and Programme for Government; Rates Charges and Water Reform, and calls on the Secretary of State and / or the incoming Executive to take action to implement the recommendations in the Report.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Owing to the debate ending somewhat earlier than expected, I shall allow a few moments for those Members who wish to leave to do so and for arriving Members to take their seats.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

North/South Co-Operation

Mr Deputy Speaker: Two amendments to the motion have been selected and published on the Marshalled List; the amendments will be proposed in the order in which they appear on that list. When the debate has concluded, I shall put the Question on amendment No 1; if amendment No 1 is made, amendment No 2 will fall. If amendment No 1 is not made, I shall put the Question on amendment No 2. I hope that that is clear.

Dr Farren: I beg to move

That this Assembly recognises the increasing significance of North-South co-operation in a range of sectors such as health, agriculture, education, research and development, and on a range of infrastructure projects such as roads and public transport, energy and tourism; and calls for an intensification of such co-operation to maximise the mutual benefit to the people of the whole island.

I am pleased to have the opportunity to move the motion on all-Ireland co-operation, especially since today is the last chance that I shall have to contribute to debates in the Chamber. As a Southerner — or at least a Southerner for the first 30 years of my life; I am not terribly sure how to classify myself now — who received a warm, perhaps sometimes too warm, welcome wherever I went in Northern Ireland, I have always been anxious for relationships throughout our island to develop in a mutually harmonious and beneficial way. In recent years, particularly since the Good Friday Agreement, the pace of the intensification of North/South co-operation has pleased me. We now speak of an all-island economy in a mutually beneficial, not threatening, way, and there is evidence of that in certain investments and initiatives.

Mr Campbell: It may have been a slip of the tongue, but the Member said:

“We now speak of an all-island economy”.

Whom does he mean by “we”?

Dr Farren: Members can define “we” for themselves. However, many Members on Mr Campbell’s side of the Chamber — perhaps not all Members — are willing to react positively to certain proposals and initiatives. Those Members could be included in the “we” to whom I have referred.

As I was saying, there is evidence of the intensification of North/South co-operation in certain investments and initiatives: the upgrading of the Belfast to Dublin road is almost complete; a single energy market for the entire island will be in place before the end of the year; an integrated North/South gas supply has been created; there is an increasing number of cross-border hospital service contracts; joint research and development projects are being conducted by the island’s universities; the South has invested in City of Derry Airport; and there have been many smaller, but nonetheless significant, North/South initiatives by voluntary and community groups in both parts of the country.

All those initiatives highlight what can be described as the “normalisation” of practical co-operation with mutually beneficial outcomes.

Indeed, such is the success of the North/South co-operation in recent years that there is no longer a question over its capacity to deliver economic and social benefits to both sides of the border. Rather, we are now recognising the current scale of North/South co-operation to be only a fraction of its full potential.

Achieving the full potential of the Good Friday Agreement in that respect has been hindered by suspension, and I trust that the days of suspension are rapidly drawing to a close. That is why the SDLP has been determined to ensure that all-Ireland initiatives should not be a hostage to political stalemate. Furthermore, it is why, in the years since suspension, my party developed its ‘North South Makes Sense’ campaign, which is aimed at putting a clear focus on the opportunities that lie in joint initiatives across the entire island.

As we approach devolution, we want North/South co-operation to rise to an even greater level of development, and we want it to be achieved under the auspices of restored political institutions. That is why we particularly, and very warmly, welcome the proposals for enhanced North/South co-operation contained in the Irish Government’s new national development plan, which was published last week.

The plan invites the Assembly and its Executive to engage with their Southern counterparts in realising the potential in those proposals. However, the national development plan is not a set of proposals offered on a take-it-or-leave-it basis; instead, it is a set of proposals to be negotiated and jointly developed. The plan contains proposals for significant Irish Government investment in North/South projects and initiatives for mutual benefit, which must be agreed with a restored Northern Ireland Executive and which will cover the period from 2007 to 2013.

The proposed package includes two quite innovative elements: first, joint investment in new strategic projects to benefit North and South; secondly, to open access to existing development funding on an all-island basis. A further element is the introduction of new agreed joint-funding measures with the Northern Ireland Executive following restoration.

The strategic projects and services highlighted in the Irish Government’s national development plan encompass such familiar matters as roads; rail; energy; tourism; health; education; telecommunications and so on. However, it is the scale and comprehensiveness of the proposed investments, and the opportunity for an agreed approach to developing and implementing the projects, that are most significant. In other words, it is an approach that should mark the end of back-to-back planning.

The second proposal to open up all-island funding opportunities is one that the SDLP has long urged. That proposal is modelled on the European Union example of funding that transcends political boundaries. The purposes envisaged for the proposed all-island funds could be in the following areas: education; skills; science and innovation; regional development; tourism development; poverty; social inclusion and community infrastructure.

Those funds would address the long-term challenges that the Irish and British Governments, as well as most Members in this House, agree must be faced in the modern global economy. Such funds would be awarded on a competitive basis, thereby rewarding innovation and collaboration and ensuring that funds are allocated to the best projects.

This is the very first time that all-island economic and social dimensions have been so prominently represented in an Irish Government national development plan. The proposals represent a massive opportunity to boost the economy and develop services, taking account of the needs and resources of the whole island. I trust that our restored Executive and Assembly will lose no time in entering negotiations in order to ensure that those proposals are realised.

There can only be a resounding yes to, for example, an integrated road network North and South, as well as east and west, that links Dublin, Belfast, Derry, Letterkenny, Sligo, Armagh and back to Newry; a resounding yes to the further development of all-island business opportunities under the auspices of InterTradeIreland, a North/South body that has already provided support for over 4,000 enterprises North and South; a resounding yes to enhanced developments of hospital, health and emergency services for communities along the border as well as on an all-island basis; a resounding yes to greater North/South investment in research and development in our universities and other centres of research in order to assist economic development in both parts of the country; and a resounding yes to additional funds being made available through the North/South Ministerial Council for projects intended to assist innovation, to help border communities and to promote all-island reconciliation initiatives.

We can do more together, in order to get more together. Our economies, North and South, face common challenges, so it makes sense to find common solutions. That is what the North/South agenda is, and must be, all about. Beyond the political and practical case for broad-based North/South co-operation there is growing acknowledgement of its importance in building trust and good relations between our communities in the North and across the island. The head of Co-operation Ireland — one of the organisations with the most experience in the area of North/South co-operation — has said that the promotion of effective North/South co-operation is an integral part of building peace on the island of Ireland.

The Good Friday Agreement not only created a framework for political co-operation and partnership in Northern Ireland, but widened and extended the basis for co-operation and partnership to the whole island of Ireland and included a new framework for policy development with partners in a new British-Irish relationship.

I am conscious of the concerns and apprehensions that underlie the two amendments. Those concerns and apprehensions are unwarranted and do not need to be highlighted. There is an opportunity for debate on east-west issues; it was open to the Members opposite to table a motion on that subject. If they had done so, they might have found a positive response to some of their proposals from this side of the Chamber. However, this motion is about the significance of, and the potential for, North/South development.

As we develop the potential of the island as a whole, we must do so in the full knowledge that we are part of a global village in which we must play our proper role. We must be forward-looking in that respect. For far too long our tendencies, particularly here in the North, have been to look inward and to ignore the wider world and its opportunities and challenges, except, I suppose, whenever funds were dangled before us.

Tá seans iontach againn anois comhoibriú agus comhinfeistíocht ar son cómhaitheas ár ndaoine uilig a chur chun cinn. Sin an ghuí a fhágaim agaibh.

We have a wonderful opportunity to promote co-operation through a programme of joint investments and initiatives to the mutual benefit of all our people.

Ní heart go cur le chéile.

Our strength will grow the more we co-operate. The SDLP believes that in taking the opportunities, and in facing the challenges posed by co-operation on an all-island basis, we shall be even better able to face those in the wider world.

I beg to move the motion.

Lord Morrow: I beg to move amendment No 1: Leave out all after “recognises” and insert

“the potential of North-South co-operation in a range of sectors; and calls upon Government to ensure that such co-operation is based upon practical, economic considerations, not politics; and, that in entering into any co-operative arrangements, the interests of the people of Northern Ireland are the primary consideration; and further notes that the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006 ensures that all North-South structures will be fully accountable to the Northern Ireland Assembly."

I want to say at the outset that it is quite understandable that, down the years, unionists have eyed cross-border co-operation with suspicion. So far today, we have not heard anything that makes us any less suspicious. In fact, the remarks in the opening speech make us even more suspicious, and our suspicions are well founded.

However, our suspicions may be down to the legacy of living with terror and the ever-present threat that bombers and gunmen are trying to force us out of our homes and our heritage. They try to take away the places where people were born and live. That might have something to do with it.

Those suspicions may also be down to the fact that, over the past 35 years — indeed, from the inception of the state of Northern Ireland — the Irish Republic has allowed its territory to be a safe haven for wanted terrorists. That might have something to do with it.

Those suspicions may also be because unionists view the Irish Republic as being hostile to their existence. As a unionist, I believe that that has a lot to do with it. Through the years, when this country was under the cosh of a Sinn Féin/IRA onslaught, we did not get much support or sympathy from the Irish Republic. Any co-operation that existed between the security forces involved the lowest common denominator rather than the highest. All those reasons account for the apprehension, fear and terror that existed in unionism, in particular among those living along the border who were driven from their homes.

Of course, Northern Ireland has much to gain from good relations with the Irish Republic, if they are on a pragmatic and appropriate basis. We are happy to work with, and alongside, our colleagues in the Irish Republic where it is to our mutual benefit and interest.

The work carried out by the elected representatives on behalf of the constituents on both sides of the border is often similar. I suspect that the bread-and-butter issues are similar North and South: roads, housing, hospitals and good schooling.

There is potential, with the future of Northern Ireland secure and all parties working in the interests of Northern Ireland, for a more relaxed, wholehearted co-operation. Such co-operation is possible in a stable environment in which unionists would not be looking over their shoulders, as they have had to do for the past 40 years. However, for that to occur, there must be a responsibility on nationalists not to politicise, or seek to politicise, for narrow party advantage, any sensible low-level co-operation that may go on.

Undoubtedly, on account of our small population, there are matters for which it is not possible for us in Northern Ireland to have all the answers — likewise, for the relatively small population in the Irish Republic.

I note with interest what the Northern Ireland Office Minister of State, Mr Hanson, said in the House of Commons on 21 November, during the debate on the St Andrews legislation. He said:

"The hon. Gentleman also asked the Secretary of State to confirm that, by virtue of the arrangements put in place by the Bill, details relating to the North/South Ministerial Council or any matter involving relationships with the Republic of Ireland will require Executive approval. I can confirm that such matters will be referred to under the ministerial code that applied until suspension, and will require Executive agreement. Under the arrangements provided for in the Bill, decisions taken without Executive agreement would not be legitimate and would be open to legal challenge."

Nothing could be clearer than that, and I note that the SDLP leader, in remarks made later that evening, criticised the Government for allowing the DUP to hollow out the provisions of the 1998 Belfast Agreement to such an extent.

I want to comment on Tourism Ireland Ltd, one of the cross-border bodies that was established under the Belfast Agreement. If there were no argument against cross-border bodies, Tourism Ireland would certainly provide one. It spends £40 million a year, one third of which comes from Northern Ireland, yet it has a history of failing to promote routes to Northern Ireland and failing to promote the distinctiveness of Northern Ireland's tourism product.

Reading the Tourism Ireland brochures and website and watching its advertisements in the years since its establishment, one could be forgiven for concluding that the only access point to this island is Dublin. As far as Tourism Ireland is concerned, Dublin is the only access point to Ireland. Tourism Ireland may need a little tourism experience itself. That view is borne out by the figures: the number of tourists coming from Great Britain to Northern Ireland was down in 2006, but, in the same period, the figures for the Republic of Ireland were up by 10%.

Mr Shannon: Does the Member accept there is east-west tourism potential? Some 250,000 people travel to Larne and Belfast from Scotland every year.

Lord Morrow: I thank the Member for making that salient and sound point.

Market research that Tourism Ireland conducted also reveals that almost 50% of people in Great Britain view its marketing campaigns as relating only to the Republic of Ireland. Surveys also indicate that Northern Ireland is seen as having less to offer than the Republic of Ireland.

Initially, the brief that was given to Tourism Ireland was to “bridge the gap” in tourism between Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland. That was subsequently changed to:

“helping Northern Ireland achieve its tourism potential”, whatever that means. Tourism in Northern Ireland contributes approximately 2% of its GDP. In the Republic of Ireland the figure is 9%, and in Wales the equivalent figure is 11%. Northern Ireland lags far behind. In such circumstances, it might be expected that the priority would be given to spending on, promoting and developing the underperforming and underdeveloped region. Is that the case? Alas, it is not.

An analysis of the promotional photographs on the Tourism Ireland website reveals that, although it provides 33% of Tourism Ireland’s funding, Northern Ireland has only 23% of the promotional photographs on the website. Indeed, some of those photographs are stretching the point. How does Tourism Ireland promote Fermanagh, for example? The website simply shows a photograph of a swan. Superb stuff. Furthermore, there is a photograph of the Lammis Fair, but it could be a photograph of any fair in Ireland, or, indeed, the world. That is Tourism Ireland’s way of promoting Northern Ireland.

One may wonder why Tourism Ireland has the responsibility for leading promotion in the rest of the United Kingdom. The originators of Tourism Ireland allow Great Britain to be regarded as an overseas market — brilliant. At one sweep, Tourism Ireland was allowed to remove Northern Ireland from the United Kingdom. Tourism Ireland was effectively given charge of what, up until then, was Northern Ireland’s best market, yet, in 2006, it managed to reduce the number of tourists coming here from Great Britain.

If we look at the specifics of the tourism promotion of Northern Ireland, there are some surprising results. For example, in the 2007 holiday planner from Tourism Ireland — its key promotional document for the year — the events and festivals section does not list the North West 200, which is one of the biggest events in the whole of the United Kingdom. It is not mentioned.

Only 11 of the 40 events listed are in Northern Ireland, and guess what one of them is — the West Belfast Festival. It is listed, yet it hardly needs to be said that the Twelfth of July and Maiden City festivals are never mentioned.

It is as if they do not exist — that is the impartiality of Tourism Ireland in operation.

Northern Ireland needs to be sure that its tourism product is locally resourced and being promoted in a manner that will ensure that the current economic inequalities are addressed. All this highlights further the importance of North/South structures having been made wholly accountable to this Assembly. In such circumstances, none of us from any background should have anything to fear from straightforward relations — that are not politically driven — with those in the Irish Republic.

Mr McClarty: First of all, I pay tribute to the SDLP Member for North Antrim, Dr Farren. I understand that he may have made his final contribution to the House, and I wish him all the very best on his retirement from public life.

I beg to move amendment No 2: Insert after the first “of”

“East-West and”; and leave out all after “benefit” and insert

“to the peoples of the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland.”

We have no problem with North/South co-operation on matters that are of mutual benefit to the citizens of both Northern Ireland and the Irish Republic, and there are obvious fields in which that co-operation can take place. However, the political history of the island of Ireland means that unionists will inevitably, and understandably, be wary that measures, which are sold as being of mutual benefit, are in fact part of a wider political agenda designed to threaten the sovereignty of Northern Ireland and its place in the United Kingdom.

We do not deny that co-operation has brought, or could bring, benefits, but these are likely to have been, or will be, small — not about even 1% of the GDP and probably much less. People may talk of promoting more cross-border trade. There is already more cross-border trade per head of population than there is between Northern Ireland and Great Britain. The extent of all-island trading is not unusual when compared with trade levels, for example, between Norway, Sweden and Denmark. There is already an extensive Northern Ireland-Republic market in company takeovers. Many Northern Ireland business names have been bought by Southern concerns. By and large, we accept this as the working of the corporate market, although we would like to see more Northern Ireland companies make acquisitions south of the border.

Rhetoric favouring all-island solutions is often based on misconceptions about Northern Ireland’s economy. It is not an economic basket case; it has the UK’s highest rates of GDP, manufacturing output and employment growth since 1990. It has a big subvention from the Treasury, but so do many UK regions, for example, much of Wales — perhaps the Secretary of State should take note of that. Transfers occur normally within a national single monetary and economic union, so it is less than clear what the Secretary of State means when he says that we should become less dependent.

Sometimes the issues involved are not really all-island issues but are more appropriately relevant to the British Isles as a whole or to Europe — for example, mobile-phone roaming charges, as raised by the Ulster Unionist MEP Jim Nicholson in the European Parliament, or a single European electricity market, as recently proposed by the German Chancellor, Angela Merkel.

We must be realistic that often the Republic of Ireland is not our ally but our competitor. For example, it has tax advantages, such as more favourable corporation tax, vehicle fuel excise duty and the lower rate of value added tax (VAT) on tourism.

Some commentators point to the European Union (EU) as a model that Northern Ireland and the Republic should copy. The comparison is not relevant; in reality other European countries, for example, France, Germany and Italy, have managed their border regions without the institutional apparatus, such as the implementation bodies, which exists in Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland.

What about the European single currency, the euro? It looks less and less likely that the UK will join this arrangement, which in so many of the continental economies has proved more of a straitjacket than a boost to trade. Even the Republic has problems with the imposition of policy directives from the European Central Bank in Frankfurt. It seems likely, as Milton Friedman argued in 2001, that the Republic of Ireland's membership of the single European currency club was always more about politics than sound economics.

Since 1993, trade between Northern Ireland and the Republic has grown by leaps and bounds — as much as 10% annually, in many years. The existence of two currencies on the island has hardly been an insuperable problem. Members should note that the success of the North American Free Trade Agreement between the United States and Canada has not required the two North American economies to adopt a single currency or, indeed, cross-border bodies.

Secretary of State Peter Hain may have taken up the all-island economic agenda in recent speeches, but is that not about politics rather than a sound business case? The Government's economic policy documents are instructive: in February 2005 the 'Economic Vision for Northern Ireland', a sort of economic strategy document, devoted only a few sentences to the subject of cross-border co-operation. Similarly, the Republic's recent enterprise strategy, 'Ahead of the Curve, Ireland's Place in the Global Economy', hardly mentions Northern Ireland. When it comes to hard, competitive business reality, cross-border froth does not figure much.

Dr Farren: Will the Member give way?

Mr McClarty: No, I am sorry. I have limited time, and I have already thanked you for making your last speech. [Laughter.]

It is to be hoped that a more mature and responsible relationship will emerge from the political advances that have been made over the past decade, with the end of the terror campaign that sought to push this Province and its people out of the Union and into a united Ireland against their will. The defeat of the IRA's campaign provides us with an opportunity to ensure that everyone in Northern Ireland has a stake in this Province and its future. That future will clearly be within the United Kingdom.

The United Kingdom is the fifth largest economy on the planet. It is a multicultural society, the destination of choice for many thousands of immigrants seeking a better life for themselves and their families. At a time when so many people appear desperate to enter the United Kingdom, by fair means or foul, we would have to be crazy to voluntarily cut our ties with the British mainland. Britain is where Northern Ireland does much of its trade. Many citizens work for companies that are based on the UK mainland, and many of our young people attend universities in Great Britain and go on to play a crucial role in the life of the nation.

The development of the Republic of Ireland's economy is a recent phenomenon. For most of the twentieth century, the Republic's economy limped along in a depressed state, and it was only saved from horrendous levels of unemployment by the fact that hundreds of thousands of its citizens were able to travel to Great Britain to seek a better life. The presence of large and thriving expatriate communities in cities such as London, Birmingham, Manchester, Liverpool and Glasgow is testament to how well those emigrants did. The Republic of Ireland has had great cause to be grateful for its east-west links throughout the twentieth century. Northern Ireland is no different.

We wish the Irish Republic well. It is our neighbour. It is to be hoped that as this century progresses, links in areas such as trade and tourism will be developed that will benefit the people of Northern Ireland. However, care must also be taken to ensure that relations continue to be maintained and developed with fellow British citizens in the United Kingdom. The people of Northern Ireland endured a 30-year campaign of terror that sought to break that link, and they suffered grievously, as did many fellow citizens on the mainland. That link could not be broken in times of strife. It will, undoubtedly, be strengthened in times of peace.

Ms Ruane: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I wish to echo the sentiments directed towards Seán Farren.

Go n-éirí an t-ádh leat, a Sheáin, agus le do theaghlach go léir.

Rachaidh athaontú na hÉireann go mór chun leas gach duine ar an oileán seo. Ar fud phróiseas na síochána, thug Sinn Féin tacaíocht i dtólamh do chur chuige uile-oileáin do réimsí tabhachtacha polasaí, lena n-áirítear an eacnamaíocht, an tsláinte, an t-oidéachas, an fhostaíocht, an talmhaíocht agus turasóireacht.

Gabh mo leithscéal.

Irish unification would greatly benefit all the people on the island of Ireland. Throughout the peace process, Sinn Féin has consistently urged an island-wide approach in key policy areas such as the economy, health, education, employment, agriculture and tourism.

Sinn Féin has given practical expression to that through the work of its Ministers in the Executive, the all-Ireland Ministerial Council and the Assembly, and its representation in Leinster House and the European Parliament. Sinn Féin representatives have continuously pressed the need to sustain and develop the all-Ireland approach enshrined in the Good Friday Agreement.

Since partition, social and economic development has been characterised by a back-to-back approach, which has resulted in poor service delivery and economic underdevelopment, particularly in places in the border counties and west of the Bann where the artificial border has impacted on normal socio-economic development. A common development plan is required for Ireland and, considering that the new National Development Plan is set to run until 2013, it is vital that the plan approaches expansion and growth on an all-island basis.

In order to achieve an all-Ireland economy, we must work towards tax harmonisation. A single VAT system and the abolishment of excise would greatly simplify businesses trading on the island and bring about taxes that are fairer to workers. We should be encouraging small-business and worker development. Relatively simple measures, such as standardising bank holidays, would address an anomaly that has a negative impact on those who live, work, or go to school on both sides of the border. Without a single currency and tax regime and with the lack of joined-up infrastructure, we are left with the same old uncompetitive banking and retail sectors. The banking sector, North and South, is under investigation for its lack of genuine competition.

There is also the need for the establishment of an all-Ireland Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) and an all-island electricity network, which must be nuclear free and committed to renewable energy, as was agreed by the all-party Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment in the previous Assembly.

Sinn Féin has been to the fore in lobbying the Irish and British Governments to ensure that people in the border region have access to health services at the nearest geographical location, regardless of which side of the border they live. That is why substantial funding is required for an upgrade of, among others, Daisy Hill Hospital in Newry city, and the issue of the out-of-hours services on both sides of the border must be resolved. Sinn Féin welcomes the two pilot projects; however, they must be extended.

One of Sinn Féin's key goals is to build a strong, stable, all-Ireland economy in which everyone will have a dignified and productive working life, a fair income and a good quality of life — an economy characterised by the positive redistribution of its resources to eradicate poverty and social exclusion. A small island with a population of just over five million people cannot develop successful economic strategies on the basis of economic division.

The devastating economic consequences of partition are most obvious in border counties, but the impact is broader because the North has been excluded from the economic advances of the Twenty-six Counties. The only way to truly transform the economy in the North of Ireland is to set it in the context of an island-wide strategy for development and regeneration. To succeed, any economic development strategy must, at a minimum, remove the barriers to North/South business development and trade and to cross-border working mobility. Equality and human rights must be at the heart of that.

Sinn Féin is committed to the elimination of poverty and deprivation on the island of Ireland, and we feel that a meaningful approach to eliminating poverty will have to adopt a human rights approach and draw all sectors of Irish society closer together. Had the whole island been able to benefit from the extremely high growth rates experienced in the Twenty-six Counties during the period of the Celtic tiger economy, all-Ireland economic growth and development would have far exceeded current levels of gross national product (GNP) in the Six Counties and the Twenty-six Counties.

Sinn Féin has been arguing for some time that our best interests would be served in putting forward a united, all-Ireland voice in Europe, particularly on fishing and agriculture. I have spoken to fishing industry personnel in places such as Kilkeel and Ardglass, and I know that those industries in the North of Ireland have been damaged because they have been tied to British fishing and agriculture.

The Ulster Farmers' Union (UFU) and the Irish Farmers' Union (IFU) have recognised the potential of working together to challenge the way in which the EU nitrates directive is being implemented, and Sinn Féin has consistently argued that getting the best out of the common agricultural policy (CAP) reform is dependent on developing a coherent single approach on the island of Ireland. If we are to ensure better and more effective representation for our fishing and agriculture industries, all of the political parties — including the DUP — should challenge their own politically motivated shortsightedness and begin to examine the potential of creating a single united agenda for our fishing and agriculture communities.

I welcome last week's historic announcement of a National Development Plan by the Irish Government, which is expected to provide €1 billion for strategic projects in the North as well as cross-border links. This is the first time that the national plan has included the Six Counties, and the spending of €1 billion is part of the peace dividend. We hope that it is only a small part.

Of course, it is equally important that we have in place a new power-sharing Executive to administer this funding, which is badly needed to improve road infrastructure throughout the North of Ireland and, indeed, in my own constituency of South Down.

Part of the package is to be spent on improving links between south Down and north Louth. Sinn Féin has been to the fore in lobbying for a link bridge to be built at Narrow Water, near Warrenpoint.

When the project was dead in the water, parties like the SDLP were divided on whether to support it or not and John Fee came out against it, Sinn Féin was united behind the need for a bridge. Sinn Féin kept its eye on the prize. Arthur Morgan TD raised it in Leinster House, Sinn Féin co-ordinated meetings between Louth County Council and Newry and Mourne District Council, Sinn Féin organised meetings with INTERREG, the European Union's Programme —

Dr Farren: Will the Member give way?

Ms Ruane: No, I will not. I will continue, because I have very little time.

Sinn Féin worked with the Roads Services on both sides of the border. This type of flagship development is essential if we are to develop a co-operative approach to both trade and tourism.

Mr Kennedy: Will the Member give way?

Ms Ruane: No. I said that I would not.

A bridge would open up tourism from Newgrange to the Mournes. We need to capitalise on the visitors who are visiting Newgrange and ensure that their visit to Ireland includes a visit to Counties Down and Armagh as well. If this were any other country in the world, there would be a bridge there now. There is a need to continue to fight for this project.

Investment in Warrenpoint harbour has the potential to create jobs and ensure that the town's docks are one of the main gateways for trade in and out of the northern half of the country. Its expansion should be a key consideration and part of any development plan.

Funding is also needed to develop agriculture and fishery in the Carlingford Lough area, as it is vital that opportunities are in place so that the hard-pressed fishing industry has an opportunity to diversify.

A ring road is needed around Newry city. The good roads should not stop at the border as they do at the moment. I welcome the proposed development of the Belfast to Dublin line and argue that an integrated rail network that is able to serve the other areas of the northern half of the country must accompany this.

Daisy Hill Hospital is ideally placed to serve the cross-border community, and its services, if expanded and enhanced, would ensure greater access to services for a significant population in Down, Armagh and Louth.

The National Development Plan has the potential to act as a catalyst for economic regeneration and is yet another good reason why it is important that we have a fully functioning, power-sharing Executive in place after the 7 March elections.

Enhanced North/South co-operation must be seen as a prerequisite for all-Ireland strategic development plans in health and social services, education and training, public transport, the environment, agriculture and fisheries, road safety, the arts and culture, tourism and the Irish language.

Maurice Morrow needs to learn that suspicions do not build economies. Hard work and strategic thinking do. Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

Mr McCarthy: There is no question that recent economic progress in the Republic and political progress in Northern Ireland have allowed more meaningful cross-border co-operation than ever before. Long may that continue.

The Alliance Party has a proud record on cross-border issues. We have frequently been the only non-nationalist party to participate in forums, consultations and boards that promote co-operation for mutual benefit — from promotion of an all-island energy market to participation in the proposals to reform the Seanad Éireann.

There is also little question that cross-border initiatives can, and should, go beyond the issues dealt with by cross-border bodies. Energy, tourism and aspects of transport bring with them a natural cross-border dimension. We must find better ways to co-operate in those areas.

However, Members should be cautious on two counts. The system by which the Northern Ireland Assembly dealt with cross-border matters was cumbersome, to say the least. It stalled moves towards beneficial co-operation. Like so much else, political cross-border co-operation was limited by the institutionalised sectarianism under which the Assembly operated.

Northern Ireland was represented in the North/South Ministerial Council by two Ministers who spent much of the time arguing with each other, rather than in providing a united front to secure the best outcome for Northern Ireland and for the island as a whole.

Dr Farren: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCarthy: Seán, you are having difficulty with others. I will give way. Let us hear what you have to say.

Dr Farren: I will reply to what Mr McCarthy has just said, since I was the Minister responsible, and I attended almost 60 meetings of the North/South Ministerial Council, some in the company of the leader of the Ulster Unionist Party, Sir Reg Empey. I cannot recall a single meeting that we spent arguing with each other. If we argued at all, we argued together against our Southern counterparts.

Mr McCarthy: That is not the information that I have received. I can only accept what the Member says as a former Minister.

Mrs Hanna: Will the Member give way again?

Mr McCarthy: I will, Carmel. Do you want to take over?

Mrs Hanna: In my short time as a Minister, I too attended some of those meetings, and I cannot recall any contention at them.

Lord Morrow: Will the Member give way again?

Mr McCarthy: All right, Maurice.

Lord Morrow: I can also say, as a former Minister, that I never had any arguments at all, because I was never there.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr McCarthy: You did not attend the North/South Ministerial Council. May I be allowed to continue?

Rarely has Northern Ireland had Ministers who are able to think and feel for the whole community, and able to do what is best for the whole of Northern Ireland without reference to which camp they belong. Only when that is overcome will efficient cross-border co-operation become a reality.

My second note of concern is that cross-border issues are pursued at the expense of projects more beneficial to Northern Ireland. For example, expenditure on a road bridge across Carlingford Lough could hardly be considered good value for money, given that many other areas in Northern Ireland — and no doubt in the Republic too — could derive greater benefit from such expenditure. I would like to see a vast programme of road improvement carried out in my constituency of Strangford, for instance in the Ards Peninsula, which would bring comparatively greater benefit to residents.

Ms Ritchie: Does the Member agree that provision of a bridge at Narrow Water would enhance tourism facilities in the Strangford constituency? Would it not be to the benefit of his constituents?

Mr McCarthy: That might well be so, but I suggest that it is not good value for money. However, I welcome anything that promotes the Strangford constituency.

There is also a need for caution with respect to an Act of Parliament on the Irish language, desired by some parties, which would be specific to Northern Ireland and would divide language policy, rather than link it with policy in the Republic. Such issues are best dealt with on an all-island basis. The Assembly should not pursue objectives that seem to serve — but that will divide — people on either side of the border or on different sides of the community in Northern Ireland.

Recent progress has led to more cross-border co-operation, and more such co-operation is possible. That which exists could be made still more mutually beneficial. Not for the first time, however, maximum benefit will come about only when we have overcome our sectarian divisions and have abolished a political system that serves only to reinforce them.

1.00 pm

I shall comment on one further aspect of cross-border co-operation. Free travel will, I hope, come into effect in April 2007 and will benefit senior citizens, aged over 65, throughout the island. People from Fair Head in Antrim to Mizen Head in Cork will be able to avail of that service. My only regret is that the measure contains age discrimination against women. Although they are senior citizens from the age of 60, they must wait until they are 65 to benefit from free travel.

We have made progress in cross-border co-operation. There is further progress to be made, and I hope it continues.

Mr Hay: I support the amendments in the names of Lord Morrow and David McClarty. When Members talk about North/South co-operation, it can mean different things to different people. Some believe that it is bringing them closer to an all-Ireland economy or a united Ireland. Others raise the issue only for political reasons.

Listening to Seán Farren this morning, one would have to ask if he was raising the issue for good economic or for political reasons? It is difficult to find out what the SDLP and Sinn Féin really mean when they talk about North/South co-operation. On many occasions, when nationalist representatives raise the issue of the all-Ireland economy or North/South co-operation they get to a point where they have to get the tricolour so wrapped around some of the issues that is difficult for unionists to agree to them, especially when it comes to economic development and inward investment in the South of Ireland and Northern Ireland.

I have often said that good cross-border co-operation should not threaten anyone in the House provided it is done only for good economic and business reasons. I know many businesspeople in my own city of Londonderry who co-operate across the border on a daily basis. On the naming of Londonderry, I was glad to welcome the decision of the High Court, which I hope will put the issue of the city's name to rest once and for all.

Returning to the main theme of the discussion, most business leaders and people in the business community co-operate with the South of Ireland for good economic and business reasons. Many of them do not bring politics into the equation at all, and that is the way it should be. I disagree with Southern Ministers trotting across the border, standing up and announcing economic packages that other public representatives, including myself, have not been consulted about.

Dr Farren: If the Member had listened carefully to what I said and to what the Ministers who came to make announcements about the National Development Plan 2007-2013 said, the word "agreement" and the phrase "to mutual benefit" were repeated throughout their remarks on any of the proposed projects. Does the Member accept that it will be up to the restored institutions to enter into negotiations and to agree the projects before anything can happen? That is given. We should honestly acknowledge and accept the integrity of those who put forward plans on that basis.

Mr Hay: I have no problem with Ministers from the South of Ireland coming across the border and doing what they have to do. However, there must be protocol. There was an announcement of £800 million for several projects in Northern Ireland, including roads infrastructure, education, health and many others, affecting the lives of those who live in the border regions. I know of no unionist representative who was either consulted or told about that package; however, I know of other public representatives who had a heads-up on it, and that is where the system is wrong. If we are to have good co-operation on both sides of the border there must be proper protocol, and that does not exist at the minute.

I welcome the £14 million investment in the City of Derry Airport. That investment is even more important as the whole east Donegal region gets £11 million a year into its economy as a result. It is only right and proper that the Southern Government should invest in the airport. I represent the Foyle constituency, and I welcome the proposal to extend the airport.

It is important for unionists to say that there must be total control over cross-border co-operation. However, there cannot be total control on only one side of the border; there must be mutual control in equal measure on both sides. Lord Morrow's amendment makes it absolutely clear that all future cross-border bodies and institutions should be accountable to the Assembly and a future Executive. That must be our starting point. However — and I keep saying it — unionists cannot accept that, for many years, Ministers from the South have trotted in and out of Northern Ireland, almost giving the impression that they were also Ministers in the North. That must be brought to a halt.

Good co-operation is vitally important for the business community, the vast majority of which operates purely for economic reasons, whether inward investment, job creation or whatever. David McClarty said that on many issues the businessmen in the South are our competitors. That is good for healthy debate on co-operation between Northern Ireland and the South. I hope that nationalist representatives and parties will learn that when they raise the issue of co-operation they drive fear into the unionist community and fear into the business community.

There is sometimes mistrust when nationalist representatives raise the issue of North/South co-operation.

Mr D Bradley: Will the Member give way?

Mr Hay: I will not give way; I am almost finished. We can have good co-operation between North and South, but it can only work on a sound economic and business basis.

Mr McGuigan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I wish to speak in favour of the motion. There is no doubt that much good work exists on several issues on an island-wide basis, nor that increased harmonisation and North/South co-operation is the way to ensure increased practical benefits in the future for all who live on this island.

Strand two of the Good Friday Agreement details the structures and functions of the North/South Ministerial Council, and describes the implementation bodies and areas of co-operation for the delivery of North/South co-operation. I welcome the motion and support its call for an intensification of that co-operation.

As other Members have already said, the Irish Government passed a historic milestone in the commitments that they made in their national development plan. Chapter 5 of the plan shows that it is beginning to take on a truly national character, setting out as it does to strengthen all-island projects across the delivery of public services and a wide range of policy areas. Who here could argue, for example, that the inclusion in the plan of the Dublin to Derry and Letterkenny route as a key strategic border route to be developed is not going to be of huge benefit to the citizens of the west and north-west of Ireland?

That project has been the subject of considerable lobbying by many of my young colleagues for some time. The project is very welcome; nevertheless, its funding should be ring-fenced and a time frame set for its development so that it can be lifted from the pages of the development plan and made a reality. I wish to make the same call for the development of other key strategic cross-border routes mentioned in the plan.

Sinn Féin has always maintained, with substantial justification, that the border in Ireland is an artificial construction, which has acted, and continues to act, as a major impediment to social and economic development on the island. That is particularly true of the border corridor, where life is defined by a low-wage culture, high unemployment, relatively low educational attainment, poor roads, an inadequate transport system and an insufficient energy supply. The duplication of services is an added problem; that is an unnecessary waste, and is totally uneconomic and inefficient.

The motion asks the Assembly to recognise the increasing significance of island-wide co-operation. I support that, and call for a significant increase in North/South co-operation on all the issues of importance to citizens, especially those included in the motion such as agriculture, research and development, tourism, public transport, energy and the environment. My party colleague Caitríona Ruane has already dealt with many of those topics. I shall use the examples of health and education to explain my rationale.

The need for the seamless provision of health services, with disregard for the border, should be obvious to all. Both healthcare systems on this small island are in crisis. Spatial planning of the location of acute hospitals has not taken place on a single-island basis. That is essential if we are to make use of a limited budget. My party supports the cross-border GP out-of-hours scheme, and the Co-operation and Working Together (CAWT) feasibility study, which has led to the setting-up of two pilot schemes, each covering a population of approximately 13,000 along the border. One pilot scheme will allow patients in the North to have access to centres in the Twenty-six Counties; the other will provide patients in the Twenty-six Counties with access to facilities in the Six Counties.

Those schemes are intended to benefit the border areas where 65,000 people live closer to a GP out-of-hours centre in the other state. In particular, patients from Inishowen will be able to obtain a service launched a few weeks ago in Derry. Patients from Keady will soon be able to avail of a service in Castleblayney. Although some professional issues are still to be resolved, my party approves of those pilot schemes and believes that they should be endorsed and supported.

1.15 pm

Andy Pollak, in his discussion paper, 'Educational Co-operation on the Island of Ireland: A Thousand Flowers and a Hundred Heartaches', writes:

"Education has been a 'core value' for Irish people — North and South, Protestant and Catholic, unionist and nationalist" for at least two centuries.

The 9,000 hedge schools in the 1820s and the 7,000 state-supported national schools that succeeded them were part of a genuine all-island system and involved a great deal of teacher mobility.

Pollak continues:

"And then came partition, and education in Ireland, coming from a common root, sprang apart like a child's catapult and stayed apart, with an almost 100% 'back to back' separation. The distinguished Irish educationalist, John Coolahan, has said that he trained twice a teacher in the Republic of Ireland in the 1960s, and 'as far as education'" in the North

"was concerned it could have been Timbuctu. There was no reference to it, no mention of it — it was just out of one's consciousness."

Education should become a policy area for establishing an implementation body, not merely an area of co-operation under the Good Friday Agreement. Social disadvantage and low educational attainment recognise no borders. A 2001 report by the Centre for Cross Border Studies showed that about 1.1 million "education poor" adults in Ireland had significant literacy problems.

Having said that, some good work has been done in the field of education. In particular, universities on this island have come together to form the National University of Ireland (NUI). Sinn Féin welcomes other positive North/South educational projects and calls for the acceleration of such co-operation. For example, much work must be done to counter the delay in progress on the planned centre of excellence for autism in County Armagh.

Recently, Sinn Féin held a meeting with the all-Ireland unit co-ordinators at Iveagh House in Dublin. The Irish Government's Department of Foreign Affairs has a dedicated North/South unit of civil servants. That is a useful advantage in ensuring progress on all-Ireland projects. I call today for the appointment of similar co-ordinators to Departments in the North, and for each Department to follow the good example set in the Twenty-six Counties.

The North/South Ministerial Council has commissioned a study into obstacles to cross-border mobility, and its report is awaited. More importantly, Sinn Féin awaits progress on removing such obstacles to allow people living and working in the border region to get on with their work productively and conclusively. Intrinsic to that is the problem of having on this island two currencies and tax systems, to which my colleague referred.

Finally, progress on the North/South agenda must be accelerated. To have two systems on one small island, with a population of just over five million, is folly. It is detrimental to progress on both sides of the border. Unionists complain that nationalists and republicans raise the issue of all-Ireland integration for political purposes, only for them then to make purely political points in their own speeches. Nationalists and republicans raise such issues out of a genuine desire to make progress.

I also heard unionists make a point about the defeat of the IRA. They should take cognisance of what the Ulster Unionist leader James Molyneaux said on the day on which the IRA called the cessation in 1994. He said that it could be the “most destabilising” act for the Union and the unionist population.

That has more to do with the politics that have come from the other side of the Chamber today and on other occasions. I accept that this has nothing to do with the motion but, like Dr Farren, this is my last speech in the House, so I will allow myself a little leeway —

Madam Speaker: I just point out that it is not up to you to allow yourself more leeway, Mr McGuigan. However, if you are brief and return to the motion, I will allow you that leeway.

Mr McGuigan: I was simply making a point about the politics coming from the other side of the Chamber. On North/South co-operation and other subjects, the inability of unionist politicians —

Lord Morrow: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. If a Member declares that what he or she is about to say has nothing to do with the motion, is it in order for that person to continue?

Madam Speaker: Lord Morrow, I often hear Members saying things that have nothing to do with the motion, but they continue. At least Mr McGuigan declared that he was doing so. I have pointed out to him that I have discretion over what is permitted, but I hope that he will now speak to the motion and conclude his speech.

Mr McGuigan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

Mr Brolly: The Member referred to the political attitude of the Members opposite. I would suggest that, as one of the Irish words for ‘island’ is ‘inis’, a nice new slogan for them would be “Not an inis”.

Mr McGuigan: Go raibh maith agat, Francie. My argument relates to the motion, a Cheann Comhairle. Unionists are unable to deal with the politics of the changing situation in Ireland, which will include continuing North/South co-operation. I am not trying to upset Maurice and his colleagues, but I make no apology in the Chamber that my political activities concern bringing about the day when all of us on this island have full control of our destinies, without interference from any outside party or Government —

Madam Speaker: Please conclude, Mr McGuigan. Thank you.

Mr McGuigan: In conclusion, Madam Speaker, I fully support all of the sentiments in the motion.

Madam Speaker: I have said in the past that people should remember to speak to the motion. Perhaps we have been over-lenient in letting the Member pass remarks that did not. I do not want Members to think that they can do the same.

Some Members: That is unfair.

Madam Speaker: It is not unfair.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Éirím le tacaíocht a thabhairt don rún.

I support the motion. The comprehensive study on an all-island economy, launched by the Secretary of State and Minister Aherne in October 2006 sets out clearly the rationale for North/South co-operation on a wide range of areas including infrastructure, science, technology, trade, tourism, labour market, skills, enterprise and business, fiscal measures and the north-west. The study sets out the vision for an all-island economy — characterised by a strong, competitive and socially inclusive island economy, with strong island-wide economic clusters, the development of which is not impaired by the existence of a political border.

The aim of the policy should be a world-class, all-island economy, which manifests itself in comparable levels of economic dynamism and performance in both parts of the island. Those principles are reflected in chapter 5 of the recently published National Development Plan 2007-2013 entitled ‘All-Island Co-Operation’. I welcome those proposals, as well as the Irish Government’s commitment of resources to the plan.

I particularly welcome the commitment to a bridge linking County Louth and County Down, for which my esteemed colleague, P J Bradley, fought long and hard. I hope that such a bridge will facilitate a southern relief road, to benefit Newry city, which suffers from severe traffic congestion.

One idea, which would benefit foreign direct investment (FDI) in border regions, would be to establish enterprise zones along the border. Those would offer tax incentives aimed at attracting more FDI. The border regions have always been underdeveloped economically, and the concept of enterprise zones is already regarded favourably by the Irish Government. It deserves the support of both Governments.

One recent major success for the Irish economy was the development of the International Financial Services Centre (IFSC) in Dublin. The finance industry is underdeveloped in Northern Ireland, and one way of developing financial services here would be to establish a satellite of the IFSC in Northern Ireland, which has the graduates to staff it.

That would bring huge benefits to our economy. Therefore I propose that the two Governments commission research to explore the possibility of developing a Northern financial services centre, which would be a satellite of the one in Dublin.

I welcome the National Development Plan's continuing commitment to all-island co-operation. That commitment covers many issues, including: infrastructure; spatial planning; science; trade; tourism; human capital; enterprise; the provision of public services; education; and health. Unlike Lord Morrow, I think that many unionists understand that North/South co-operation threatens no one and benefits everyone.

I support the motion. Go raibh mile maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

Madam Speaker: I remind Members, especially the Whips, that the two Members who are listed to speak have not been in the Chamber at all during this debate; indeed, they are still not here. Therefore we will proceed to the winding-up speeches.

Mr Dawson: I am in the Chamber, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I am sorry, Mr Dawson; I see that you are in the Chamber.

Despite Mr Dawson's presence, I point out that two Members are listed to speak, but neither has been in the Chamber for any of today's proceedings.

Mr Dawson: Madam Speaker, I thank you for giving me the opportunity to take part in the debate; I did not think that I was that easy to miss.

I join other Members in wishing Dr Farren well as he seeks to rediscover life beyond politics after today. I am sure that he will find that there is a vibrant life beyond this House. However, he will not find any other words of comfort in the remainder of my contribution.

I am glad of the opportunity to challenge the motion's misty-eyed Darby O'Gill-approach to cross-border co-operation. Listening to the contributions of some of the Members on the opposite Benches, one would think that the political establishment in the Republic of Ireland takes part in a massive philanthropic exercise that exists to ensure that its decisions benefit the people of Northern Ireland. It is about time that the SDLP — and others — woke up and smelled the coffee. Let me be clear: making decisions on the basis of mutual benefit is nonsense. It does not motivate politicians south of the border, nor should it motivate politicians on this side of the border. Even when the Government in the Republic of Ireland announced their development plan, it was clear that their criteria was that any project must benefit their people, and, more particularly, it must benefit the election prospects of the Fianna Fáil Government. Only then would its being of further benefit to the people of Northern Ireland mean that it was worthy of further consideration.

However, the primary responsibility of that Government is to their own jurisdiction.

I have no difficulty with that; indeed, that is the correct approach for a Government to take. We should have enough common sense to realise that on matters for which co-operation is sought, there needs to be strong negotiating for one's own interests before general interests are considered.

Therefore the SDLP's motion is irresponsible. If its recommendations were implemented, that would amount to a dereliction of duty by public representatives here on the handling of cross-border matters. The Democratic Unionist Party has made clear on many occasions its approach to cross-border co-operation. Indeed, that position is reiterated in our amendment. Cross-border co-operation should be based on practical economic — not political — considerations. It should be entered into only when it can be demonstrated that it will bring clear benefit to Northern Ireland and its people, first and foremost.

Dr Farren: Will the Member give way?

Mr Dawson: I am not sure that I will; the Member has had a hard —

Dr Farren: I am not sure that we are having a —

Mr Dawson: I will not give way.

Dr Farren: The Member has already given way.

1.30 pm

Mr Dawson: I have not given way. If an issue that is of benefit to the people of Northern Ireland is also of benefit to our neighbours, that added benefit would be welcome.

However, we do not want or need enforced co-operation that is motivated politically rather than by practicalities. Enforced and unnecessary co-operation is of no use to anyone and will be rightly seen for what it is by Members on this side of the Chamber. Indeed, it would be damaging to the economic interests of Northern Ireland and its people.

I will cite two examples of how the nonsense of prioritising mutual benefit is damaging to Northern Ireland's interests. The first example relates to the single energy market and the document that is out for consultation. It states that to deliver a single electricity market both jurisdictions on the island must have in place:

"a more competitive environment than currently exists".

Northern Ireland already has competition in electricity, achieved by splitting generation from distribution and by introducing new suppliers into the market place. It is true that Northern Ireland got some of the details of the contracts wrong; nevertheless, our electricity is still cheaper than that generated South of the border.

The reason for that should be clear for all in the House to see. In the Republic of Ireland a state-owned inefficient monopoly controls both generation and distribution — and 79% of the market. In fact, the European Court has issued proceedings against the Republic of Ireland because it has failed to deliver competition in the marketplace. The European Commission said that Ireland's infringement of the directives on setting up a fair internal market for energy relates to the fact that the right to supply at a regulated price is granted on a discriminatory basis — namely to the Electricity Supply Board (ESB).

Companies that have tried to get involved in the energy market in the Republic of Ireland have been forced to pull out because competition does not exist. E.ON, better known as Powergen, stated in its response to the Republic of Ireland Government:

“A market based approach which provides investors with a long-term framework which ... minimises the risk of political intervention, will enable these investments to be made efficiently, supporting the competitiveness of the Irish economy and providing value for consumers.”

However, as we speak, because of the type of thinking outlined in the SDLP motion, Northern Ireland is sent sleepwalking into a single electricity market, which does not, and will not, have the required competition.

Minister Dempsey flannels by promising further structural change without spelling out exactly what he will do. What needs to be done is clear. The ESB needs to be split up and its generating capacity limited to below 40% in its own jurisdiction. Why will the Minister not say that? Is it because he has a prior agreement with the ESB and the unions on the matter, which was signed in 2000? Is it because he is protecting those interests regardless of the mutuality of benefit on the island of Ireland? Delivery of the single electricity market in the form and time frame set out will simply let the Republic of Ireland off the hook in Europe, and we will be left with the same legacy of inefficient state-dominated generation with little or no economic return for the people of Northern Ireland.

It does not end there. Somewhere in the machinations of trying to maximise mutual benefit, it has been agreed that the regulated payment for electricity on the island will reflect the lower corporation-tax rate in the Republic of Ireland. Thus generators in Northern Ireland will be paid the same rate as the Republic of Ireland, a rate set on a lower base but taxed at a higher level. The end result will be that, on the basis of the regulated payment, our generators will be uncompetitive in the single electricity market, and any new investment in power-generation plant will inevitably be located South of the border. So much for intensified co-operation and blind acceptance that our neighbours in the Republic of Ireland will protect our interests as we protect theirs.

Let me also turn to Tourism Ireland, set up in the wake of the Belfast Agreement with the same blind acceptance and unquestioning approach that the SDLP motion displays today. My colleague Lord Morrow has already put the case well. I will not reiterate all the points he made, but refer to one statistic: market research carried out by Tourism Ireland reveals that 50% of people in Great Britain view its marketing campaigns as relating only to the Republic of Ireland. That is a disgrace on the name of Tourism Ireland.

Of course, Northern Ireland started at a much lower base, but Tourism Ireland was supposed to bridge the gap. The Members opposite have a long history of telling us that when there is a disparity, an inequality or an under-representation, the way out is to prioritise the under-represented group. Not so in cross-border co-operation and tourism. Oh, no; here the mutual-interest concept kicks in, and rather than being prioritised in tourism promotion, Northern Ireland is actually hidden in the rest of Ireland. Again, unfocused, woolly thinking, such as that promoted by the motion, has been damaging to Northern Ireland.

The amendment is clear; co-operation is possible in a host of areas, but in facilitating co-operation we should not seek to promote artificial all-island cohesion where none exists. We should never forget that our primary responsibility is to our electors, this community and this jurisdiction. Benefits may flow from that to others, but the benefits to other jurisdictions should not colour our thinking.

Mr McNarry: All-Ireland co-operation is distinct from all-island co-operation, yet to hear some Members, you would think that we were debating the former. The emphasis that they put on all-Ireland, as opposed to all-island, co-operation makes unionists quite suspicious of exactly where they stand.

Where this jurisdiction can benefit from or assist its neighbours, the common good should prevail. No one is arguing with that. However, co-operation cannot be presented in the terms in which unionists perceive it to be presented: as a nationalist Government interfering or being selective in its choice of co-operation in an all-island capacity. Political expediency, which I sense is behind much of the import of the debate, is dangerous in this context. Unionists will rightly point out that the National Development Plan has an element of impertinence in announcing within its scope projects for this part of the United Kingdom. Unionists will also point out that the Irish are being selective in that their plan is to help fund predominantly republican and nationalist constituencies.

I do not like to talk about my own constituency, but the beautiful constituency of Strangford —

Mr McCarthy: Hear, hear.

Mr McNarry: Thank you, Kieran.

The beautiful constituency of Strangford has not even been looked at, be it a “national” development plan or not. Strangford is typical of a pro-Union, pro-unionist constituency that the Irish do not consider, even in an all-island plan.

I must say to William Hay that he really needs to check with his party colleagues, because discussions took place at the highest level between the DUP and the Irish Government over this plan before it came to fruition and was printed.

I see nothing wrong with that. I understand that discussions took place with Sinn Féin and the SDLP and with my party, and, as I said, I see nothing wrong with that. I just want to inform the Member that that type of conversation has taken place.

An important point further to that is that the Assembly's economic issues subgroup, which was given authority by the Committee on the Programme for Government, received — on a strictly confidential basis — evidence from Irish officials. That evidence has been documented and will be included in a report, which I have seen, that shows that the Assembly, through that subgroup, was apprised of the National Development Plan and the Irish Government's intentions.

Not all of the Irish Government's intentions were outlined to the subgroup, but enough were, and the unionists on the subgroup used that opportunity to inform the Irish Government of the issues that I have been referring to regarding the unionist position and unionist views. In fact, I understand that the Committee on the Programme for Government is to clear the subgroup's report today. It will make interesting reading.

The Irish Government indicated to the parties — well, I assume that they indicated the same thing to all parties, but I have no evidence for saying that — that, in the main, their intentions were to address Irish weaknesses and to address areas that, so far, have not benefited from the success of the Celtic tiger economy. That is fair enough, and it is reasonable for them to take that approach. However, we should not be too fooled by their dressing it up in the way that they have, suggesting that their encroachment into another jurisdiction is simply because, so to speak, they want to help both sides. Not only do we have an election coming up, but they have an election in the near future, and the Irish Government want to address certain situations that they have neglected.

Through the offer of a large sum of money, the Irish Government have introduced a reference to Northern Ireland. Members must bear in mind that it is only an offer: there is no money on the table. Following the publication of the economic issues subgroup's report, it will be for the incoming Minister of Finance and Personnel in the newly restored Executive to consider more carefully.

However, the Irish officials also said that one of the intentions behind the offer was to give a subtle nudge to Her Majesty's Treasury, with the explanation that this offer was their contribution to the peace process. They intend to tell the Treasury that their offer was their contribution to the peace process, and that from where they were sitting, it seemed as though the Chancellor was dragging his feet, which was an indication for them to throw this large sum of money on the table and seek matching funding from elsewhere. Members know that, in many cases, a nudge is as good as a wink. From where I am standing, the Chancellor needs a shove to initiate the delivery of a better economic package than he has outlined so far.

For Northern Ireland parties to go into an election without having closure on a financial package that has been greatly discussed appears to be the repetition of a past mistake. We must have closure on a financial package for this part of the United Kingdom. Of course, the financial package might, in turn, benefit other parts of the island, and, if so, that is to the good.

Those who have experience of doing business on the island will know that to confine it to an all-Ireland basis is not sustainable for our economy.

That is why the amendment that was moved so ably by my colleague Mr McClarty is worthy of the support of the House.

1.45 pm

Mr Campbell: A series of Members have contributed to this wide-ranging debate. I join with other Members who have indicated their congratulations — and, some might say, commiserations — to the Member for North Antrim Dr Seán Farren on his retirement.

Mr McNarry: Will the Member give way?

Mr Campbell: After about five seconds? Yes, OK.
[Laughter.]

Mr McNarry: I thank the Member for reminding me that I did not do that. I appreciate the use of five seconds of Mr Campbell's time to pass on my best wishes to Dr Farren.

Mr Campbell: As long as it is not contagious, I am happy to allow that. Seán Farren will go into retirement in the knowledge that he has a hardworking Member of Parliament to go to if he needs any problems solved.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Campbell: I, of course, will always be at the ready for him, as I am for others. Dr Farren referred to what he called “all-Ireland reconciliation initiatives”. I regret that that type of language, in various forms, has permeated the debate on the nationalist side. That highlights the different perspectives of cross-border cooperation that Mr Hay mentioned — one person's all-Ireland reconciliation is another's political interference.

Lord Morrow referred to the understandable reticence that many unionists have about cross-border co-operation on security grounds. He spoke at some length and with considerable validity about the example of Tourism Ireland, and he outlined that organisation's less than perfect performance to date. That matter was also raised by my hon Friend the Member for East Antrim Mr Dawson. I hope that both of the matters that were raised by my colleagues will be taken up with Tourism Ireland and that we will see an improvement in its performance after this debate.

Madam Speaker, you mentioned that several Members were not present in the Chamber when it was their turn to speak. I am happy to confirm that they were not DUP Members.

Over several years, we have resented and complained bitterly about interference by the Republic of Ireland in our affairs. We will continue to do that in the future. By the same token, we would not dream of interfering in the affairs of the Republic of Ireland.

There is one matter that has not been mentioned thus far that the Republic of Ireland could address, and that concerns the President of the Republic of Ireland. She visits Northern Ireland quite frequently, and there are those of us who will ensure that she abides by the proper protocols of a visiting dignitary or head of state. The one matter that ensures that she cannot be regarded as such, in a perfect sense, is her title. That is nothing to do with her, but it is the responsibility of the Government of the Irish Republic, because she is not the President of Ireland, even though she is styled as such. She is the President of the Republic of Ireland.

It is a matter for the Republic of Ireland to decide what it wishes to call her, but I and my community deeply resent any title that implies that she is our President. Neither she nor any President who follows her will ever be the President of the people of Northern Ireland.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Campbell: That is a matter that could be addressed on a cross-border basis, and I hope that that will happen. If we can arrive at an accommodation on that matter, so much the better.

David McClarty referred to North/South business takeovers and said that many of them were corporate decisions. He is correct in that analysis. He also mentioned the pound versus the euro. Given the increasing appreciation of the pound against the dollar, one can see why the euro would be a distinctly second-best choice, if anyone were pushed into making such a choice.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Molloy] in the Chair)

Unfortunately, the Sinn Féin contributions concentrated on overtly political issues. I am not one to lecture, because I am lectured quite often, but I keep hearing references to the "North of Ireland". If people study a map, they will see that Malin Head is the most northerly part of Ireland. A couple of weeks ago, we heard contributions from some Members about the thousands of empty homes in the "North of Ireland". I did not know that there were 36,000 empty dwellings in Malin Head — I had no idea that it was that big. I hope that that issue will be addressed. The north of Ireland equals Malin Head. This is Northern Ireland; the Republic of Ireland is the Republic of Ireland; and never the twain shall meet.

Kieran McCarthy made a worthwhile contribution on what I regard as effective co-operation between both countries on this island, which the DUP supports and will continue to support.

I will take Dominic Bradley's helpful reference to the financial services sector at face value. The Republic of Ireland, and Dublin in particular, has blossomed in that sector. However, I fear that when he refers to Belfast being a financial centre, he means that it would be a satellite of Dublin. Why should Belfast be a satellite of Dublin? We should promote the greater Belfast area in its own right as a financial services centre, and not as a satellite of anywhere.

George Dawson referred to the unfortunate Darby O'Gill attitude to economics in both countries that pervaded much of the debate. He made a telling and relevant point about electricity markets and the uncompetitive nature of that market in the Irish Republic.

Cultural and educational issues were not raised during the debate. In that regard, the Republic of Ireland could teach Northern Ireland a lesson, because the orange culture is well treated and well respected there. On the Saturday before the Twelfth of July, there is open advocacy in Rosstown in County Donegal. I wish that that attitude could be reciprocated in Northern Ireland and that people could be welcomed into one another's villages. Unionists in Kilkeel welcome the Ancient Order of Hibernians into their village, and I would like the people of Dunloy to welcome orange brethren into their village. There is no reciprocity; it is a one-way street.

This has been a healthy debate, but the same issues remain. If, in a few months' or a few years' time, we get an Executive up and running, after there has been unequivocal support for the police — seen in practice and tested over a credible period — we will begin to see real, positive co-operation that unionist Ministers can advocate openly and that benefits Northern Ireland as well as the Republic of Ireland.

Ms Ritchie: The debate has been interesting and healthy. There has been a return to the old principle of moving forward, both from unionism and from the SDLP.

I thank the Members who paid tribute to my colleague Dr Farren, who proposed the motion and who is retiring today. He said that relations between North and South have developed in a mutually harmonious way for the benefit of all the people of this island, whether unionist, nationalist or of no particular affiliation. Indeed, evidence, as highlighted by Dr Farren, shows that work done thus far represents the normalisation of practical co-operation.

As Dr Farren said, there is no longer a question mark over the capacity of North/South co-operation to deliver. Indeed, all-Ireland initiatives should not be a hostage to political difficulties, as Dr Farren and Dominic Bradley pointed out. I make this plea to unionists, whether from the DUP or the Ulster Unionist Party: please embrace North/South co-operation for the mutual benefit that it can bring all of us on this island.

As Dr Farren said, the best way to encapsulate North/South co-operation for mutual benefit is through the National Development Plan, which was published last week. The national development plan builds on the proposals that the SDLP presented in its 'North South Makes Sense' document. We should no longer work on a back-to-back approach, as few benefits come from it. We need only note the marginalisation, deprivation and poverty that occurred as a result of partition. It is much better if we can work together. To quote Dr Farren:

"We can do more together in order to get more together".

There is a lesson for all of us in those words. We need to find common solutions, and our strength will grow the more that we co-operate.

Lord Morrow referred to the bogeyman of North/South co-operation. He said that Tourism Ireland has not worked for the benefit of the people of Northern Ireland. That is wrong. In my experience, North/South co-operation, as demonstrated by Tourism Ireland, has worked. Indeed, I need only look to my constituency of South Down, where Tourism Ireland has particularly promoted the Mournes and St Patrick's country.

I welcome David McClarty's comments that the Ulster Unionists have no problem with North/South co-operation. However, that party has worries when such co-operation is used for party-political purposes. In order to develop North/South co-operation, the political driver of the North/South Ministerial Council (NSMC) is required as part of the restored institutions.

Last year, Dr Farren and I were pleased to attend the all-island infrastructure investment conference in Dundalk. This year's conference will be held in Newcastle. At the conference in Dundalk, we talked to many businesspeople and investors from Great Britain. Many delegates from the unionist community in Northern Ireland also attended the conference to hear at first-hand not only what was being done in the Republic of Ireland but how they can co-operate for mutual benefit. The delegates believed that there was a need for a political driver. That political driver should be the North/South Ministerial Council, and we should all move together for the benefit of the entire island in order to improve the prospects for future generations.

Ms Ruane gave a partial constituency critique of South Down. I note that she is not in her place. From her contribution, I note that Sinn Féin is seeking a tax-harmonisation system. I thought that that party strongly opposed lowering corporation tax on the island of Ireland.

2.00 pm

Assertions were made about the Narrow Water bridge. I wish to relate some of the history of that, as I was born and reared in south Down. The SDLP has been involved in the Narrow Water bridge project since the mid-1970s. It participated in, and contributed to, debates in Newry and Mourne District Council, and above all it participated in the Warrenpoint-Cooley group, which was headed up in the 1970s, and is still headed up, by a local member of the SDLP, Dr Donal O'Tierney. Let no one tell me that the SDLP was divided on the issue or was not involved.

The Member of Parliament for South Down, Eddie McGrady, has made significant representations over many years, along with my constituency colleague P J Bradley. Further to that, I am sure that many in the House will agree that terrorism hindered the development of the bridge at Narrow Water. In fact, I well remember a bomb there that killed many soldiers on the August bank holiday in 1979. That put back the cause of North/South co-operation, and of economic co-operation and the political drivers, for many years. I hope that those days will never return to this island. Our children deserve better.

Mrs M Bradley: Will the Member include in her remarks the fact that we received a multimillion pound cross-border investment in City of Derry Airport, and that it was welcomed by all parties in the council?

Ms Ritchie: I thank the Member for her comments. I am well aware that all parties on Derry City Council welcomed the financial commitment from the Irish Government. Assertions have been made in the Chamber, but we in the community have contrary information. It is important that that point be made.

Kieran McCarthy referred to the very welcome all-Ireland free travel scheme, which will be implemented in April 2007 and will be of mutual benefit to all senior citizens on this island. Perhaps we will see Members from the Benches opposite travelling on the Enterprise train. On that subject, there must be increased frequency of departure times, better rolling stock and increased investment in the rail infrastructure.

Mr McCarthy: Will the Member give way?

Ms Ritchie: I have only a few minutes left, so, if the Member does not mind, I will not give way.

I note that unionists, particularly the DUP, are annoyed by peripatetic Ministers, even though those Ministers come with money. William Hay was quite happy to take the money. Philip McGuigan mentioned the need for spatial planning for health and hospital services. George Dawson made considerable reference to the all-island energy market. However, I am sure that he will agree with Members on this side of the House that it has brought benefit to producers in the North. He also made a critique of Tourism Ireland. It would be better if the DUP were to join with the rest of us in participating in those institutions in order to bring benefit to all the people.

Gregory Campbell referred to all-Ireland reconciliation initiatives without political interference. I have no problem with such initiatives. Then he mentioned the President of Ireland visiting Northern Ireland. I recall that unionists were not shy about going to Áras an Uachtaráin or having their photographs taken with the President or participating in the Council of State. Perhaps he needs to consult some of his colleagues.

This has been a very interesting debate, which has clarified some issues. However, in order to maximise the benefits of North/South co-operation, there must be a move towards much more integrated planning and delivery of projects. The SDLP believes that the National Development Plan provides the opportunity for that to happen. Discussions between the Treasury in London and the Department of Finance in Dublin can facilitate progress, which will require the third element to make it work: the restoration of all the political institutions on the island.

Muckamore Abbey Hospital

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: I beg to move

That this Assembly expresses concern that more than 100 adults and young people with learning disabilities have been forced to remain in Muckamore Abbey Hospital, Antrim — some for periods extending to several years — because appropriate care within the community is not available; demands a full inquiry into the situation to ensure it cannot occur again; recognises the frequently undervalued contribution of staff, families and carers; and calls upon Government to implement urgently the recommendations of the Equal Lives Learning Disability Report of the Bamford Mental Health Review.

As Members of the DUP, Mrs Robinson MP and I tabled the motion, which should appeal to all in the House.

Many people across the Province were touched to learn of the plight of those with learning disabilities — including children and young people — and who were prevented from leaving hospital on account of insufficient funding for community services. It seems strange that the places in which they were supposed to receive benefits developed into places in which they were imprisoned.

Those people were well enough to go home and should not have been kept in hospital. For too long, the needs of people who have learning disabilities have been ignored and have been left languishing at the bottom of the resources queue. In highlighting their needs, their voices have not been as strong as others.

2.45 pm

In order to improve the care of those with learning disabilities it is essential that the Government move quickly to implement the recommendations of the 'Equal Lives: Review of Policy and Services for People with a Learning Disability in Northern Ireland' report published by the Bamford Review of Mental Health and Learning Disability (Northern Ireland). A massive amount of time and effort has been invested in producing the report, encompassing views from a comprehensive range of backgrounds, and it cannot be allowed to gather dust. It must be dusted down and its proposals studied and applied.

The report provides a road map for change that includes assisting those with learning disabilities to live in their own homes, feel part of the community and have a greater degree of independence. Those with learning disabilities should have exactly the same opportunities as everyone else. There is an onus on all sectors to achieve that. Carers believe that the 'Equal Lives' report is the best piece of work that has been produced in Northern Ireland on this issue, and, if implemented, could have the potential to transform the experience of those with learning disabilities and their families.

The needs of those families and carers must be addressed. More emotional and practical support for families is essential. Many parents are forced to give up employment in order to care for a young person, and that has an obvious impact on the household income. There is a real level of informal care provided across Northern Ireland, and the good nature of parents and families is hugely undervalued at Government level.

Equally worthy of praise is the dedicated work of staff — often in difficult and stressful circumstances — both at Muckamore Abbey Hospital and in the community. Muckamore Abbey has been a hospital for people with learning disabilities since 1960. It is managed by North and West Belfast Health and Social Services Trust and is currently in the middle of a major reform and modernisation programme. Since the mid-1980s, the number of patients in the hospital has reduced from over 800 to 296. That reflects Government policy that people with learning disabilities should not have to live in hospital. In 1995, the Department of Health published a paper entitled 'The Health of the Nation: A Strategy for People with Learning Disabilities', which stated:

"Each Board and Trust should develop a comprehensive range of supportive services for people with a learning disability and their carers. The overall objective is that, by 2002, long-term institutional care should no longer be provided in traditional specialist hospital environments."

Clearly, that target date has not been, and will not be, achieved.

However, a plan to resettle people who did not require hospital care had been agreed and implemented from the late 1990s. The 'Equal Lives' report recognises that some people will require a period of assessment and treatment in a hospital, but states:

"Everyone should have a home address to which they will be discharged."

The report also describes the range of services required to maintain and support those people to live as independently as possible in the community. A review of regional bed numbers undertaken by the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety in 2005 defined the future requirement for Muckamore Abbey Hospital as 87 beds.

In 2004-05, however, funding to continue the resettlement programme ceased. At that time, it was also becoming clear that almost half of the people admitted to the hospital had their discharges delayed because funding was not available to develop the appropriate support required in community services.

In 2002, the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety approved a business case to provide the capital to build new accommodation at Muckamore Abbey Hospital. A new 35-bed assessment and treatment centre and a 23-bed forensic service were developed. Those buildings provide excellent accommodation and appropriate environments for people with learning disabilities who require a period of admission to hospital.

In order to move patients into those buildings in October 2006, however, the North and West Belfast Health and Social Services Trust had reached an agreement with the Eastern and Northern Health and Social Services Boards that two wards would close. Since fewer people than expected moved to community services due to the ending of resettlement funding, some wards had to be brought together to fulfil that commitment to the boards.

More patients than anticipated, therefore, remain on the wards. It was recognised that some patients would be unhappy about the moves, and that their needs would be reviewed following a three-month settling-in period. That process is now under way. Muckamore Abbey Hospital has to employ several different strategies to manage risks and keep patients and staff safe. That includes the locking of doors in some wards.

Returning to the crux of the problem, huge difficulties remain in discharging patients from the hospital to an appropriate community setting. Many of the patients whose discharge has been delayed are younger people with complex mental-health support needs and challenging behaviours. The provision of appropriate accommodation and support services can cost between £80,000 and £200,000 per person per year. A continuous and recurring funding stream is required from the Government to develop those services and enable people to leave the hospital.

Muckamore Abbey Hospital also operates one 16-bed children's ward. The North and West Belfast Health and Social Services Trust is currently at the advanced stages of completing a business case to relocate that assessment and treatment service for children to a site in Belfast. The business case identifies a need for eight beds for that service, and also emphasises the importance of making appropriate provision for children with complex and challenging behaviours.

Families have expressed the urgent requirement for respite services and residential accommodation. There is also a need for eight additional places in the community, requiring an additional £8 million. The assessment and treatment centre and the provision of other services to support children and families are in keeping with the priorities outlined in the 'Equal Lives' document.

In closing, I appeal for sufficient funding to allow those vulnerable members of Northern Ireland society to leave hospital and lead as normal a life as possible in the area from which they come, close to family and friends. Furthermore, I press the Government not to ignore the 'Equal Lives' report and to proceed with the speedy implementation of its recommendations. I am sure that my remarks will have the support of the entire House.

I regret that Dr Farren is not in the Chamber at the moment, but I trust that his colleagues will convey my best wishes to him.

I have never experienced retirement and cannot, therefore, recommend to him what to do with his time. However, perhaps Dr Farren would like to give me some recommendations a year from now.

Mr B Bell: I add my voice to the concern expressed in the wording of this timely motion. It is important that parties mark the last sitting day of the Assembly by speaking up for some of the most vulnerable and disadvantaged members of our community. I am grateful to Dr Paisley for proposing the motion.

It is right and fitting that Members make clear to the policy-makers in Government that they have scored a massive own goal in the case of Muckamore Abbey Hospital. In many ways, the situation there provides a far more fitting indictment of the failure of direct-rule Ministers than any number of words spoken by their critics in the Chamber or elsewhere.

Future policy-making must be copper-fastened against the kind of institutionalised neglect that Muckamore Abbey represents. Make no mistake, the failure is at the highest level of Government. It is not a failure of the dedicated men and women who work in the Health Service and the caring professions. I have nothing but praise and admiration for all the staff at Muckamore Abbey.

The failure is largely due to the lack of accountability in the political system. Had local, accountable Ministers been in charge, there is no way that the Muckamore issue would not have been aired in the Assembly before now. It is a failure of the twin evils of cost-cutting and remoteness that have so bedevilled the direct-rule fiasco that we are enduring.

The BBC discovered that the discharge from hospital of well over 100 adults with learning disabilities has been delayed for an average of three and a half years. One man remains in the unit 10 years after his treatment ended. Yet, for over 10 years, there has been a policy that no one should live in hospital long term. How can that have happened? It is a mystery — or is it? Do the Civil Service and the Health Department have no way to test whether they adhere to their own policy guidelines? If not, what was the point of putting those guidelines in place?

I agree with my colleague Dr Coulter's comments, reported in the local newspaper at the weekend. He said that the entire reform of public administration (RPA) process is deeply flawed in its consideration of health issues. The RPA will perpetuate the under-funding situation in the very areas of the Health Service that helped to precipitate the Muckamore Abbey crisis in the first place.

The failure to differentiate between primary and acute budgets in the RPA proposals means that many current Aunt Sally community-based services will still be hard up. Following the funding-generated Muckamore crisis, there must a new way of looking at public service reform. Thus far, it has been far too bureaucratic and driven by empire-building pen-pushers.

It is time for the Assembly to revisit the RPA process, and that should happen as soon as possible after the election. Democratic accountability and patient care must be at the forefront of the Assembly's actions.

3.00 pm

That should inform what we put in place.

Many feel that it is time that the Health Service had a much lighter administration and that more money was spent on front-line healthcare professionals, including those who work in the community. That is the only way in which to prevent another Muckamore-like fiasco occurring. There is nothing more sterile than seeing an army of pen-pushers, as I call them, chasing targets when patients lie festering and undischarged from hospital because the system could not get its act together to establish a procedure that would allow those people to be released properly.

I take great pleasure in supporting the motion.

Ms S Ramsey: I also support the motion. It is important for the Assembly to debate issues that are important not only to MLAs, but to the constituencies that they represent and to the community as a whole. However, I put on record my concern that other parties did not support the Sinn Féin motion on collusion, which is also an important issue.

I also put on record my disgust that in this day and age we allow our most vulnerable people to be treated as though they are second-class citizens. The motion reminds me of the debate that we had several weeks ago on the Bamford Review, when we talked about the conditions in which people are treated. We hoped that once the review had been completed, its recommendations would be put in place. Therefore it is sad that we are in the Chamber this afternoon debating a similar issue. However, society will be judged on the fact that it treats its most vulnerable as though they are second-class citizens. I am appalled at that behaviour, as, I am sure, is every other Member.

Politicians do not often commend the media, but the BBC and the investigative report that its journalists carried out into the matter need to be recognised. Journalists do not often carry out investigative reports, but the BBC brought the matter to our attention, and that should be recognised.

We have learned that many young adults are being looked after inappropriately in Muckamore. That is an infringement of their human rights. It is also an indication that the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety has failed to provide the kind of support and care that would allow those young adults to live as independent people with lives that are as full as possible. However, we also have a responsibility to ensure that young people, particularly those who have disabilities, can be supported fully and included in society.

It is also important to remind Members that the chief executive of the North and West Belfast Health and Social Services Trust and the permanent secretary of the Department admitted in their interviews that they got it wrong. That is probably the first time that I have heard such an admission, and I was shocked and amazed that they admitted it so soon. However, now that they have admitted that what happened was wrong, they have a duty to tell us how they will right that wrong. Going back as far as July 2000, I am reminded of the 'Children Matter' report. That considered a way forward for residential care and highlighted the particular needs of disabled children and young people. It seems that little has happened to improve their position since we debated that report. If something has been done, it has failed those young people.

Sinn Féin does not believe that disabled children and young people should spend their lives being looked after in hospitals: they are not appropriate places in which to give long-term care to children who require it. However, we must acknowledge that there will always be children who have challenging and complex needs and behaviour. We need to remind ourselves that it is too much to ask the parents of such children to provide care 24 hours a day, 365 days a year.

Parents often reflect the exhausting and sometimes demoralising experiences of both providing care and accessing services for their children. They describe it as a daily uphill battle to try and secure individual elements of care from different agencies, and a battle on all fronts to get the smallest amount of support. It is important that we recognise the difficulties faced by parents and how they sometimes have to face the difficult choice between an inappropriate service and no service. They may, on occasions, have to balance the needs of different children in the family and sometimes access the only respite care available to ensure that the other children are protected.

We need to acknowledge that alternative provision is certainly insufficient and that the most dangerous step would be to take a knee-jerk reaction that could put children into more inappropriate placements. In the interim, provision at Muckamore Abbey Hospital should be subject to the same standards that are applied in other environments where children are looked after.

Planning for children's disability services should be resource-led and should be in children's services rather than being driven from a disability perspective. That would ensure that disabled children do not spend long periods of time in respite care and do not become children in care by default. Many of the children in Muckamore Abbey Hospital have complex needs and, more than any other group of children, they require the co-ordination of services and prioritisation of their needs by a number of professionals. For example, they may require nursing staff, medical staff, social workers, pharmacists or behavioural nurses. No one should underestimate the level of resources or co-ordination required to support a child with challenging needs in an appropriate setting, or the work needed to create such settings where they are not available.

We may be using residential respite inappropriately for children who could be better supported in community placements — and people should take that on board. If that is the case, as recent stories suggest to me, then places are being taken up that could be better targeted at those who need them most.

It is essential that services are reviewed for the children on an individual basis and that a response appropriate to their needs is put in place. For example, where a child has challenging and complex needs there should be a service in place from the child's birth, and throughout its life, which includes the child and supports the family.

The board and trust have recognised their responsibilities in this case. I want a review of the needs of all of the children and families involved and clear service plans to meet the needs and rights of those children and young people. The plans must include their inclusion, as fully as possible, in the community, and as independent a life as possible for them.

To conclude, I support the motion and the call for the urgent implementation of the Bamford Review. It is in order, Madam Speaker, to ask for a report, through your office, from the Department on the current position of the review because the Assembly passed a motion recently on the issue. Go raibh maith agat.

Mrs Hanna: I support the motion. People with learning disabilities are likely to need additional support to enjoy as ordinary a life as possible — they must be valued for who they are as human beings and not measured by their disability. They must have the same rights and opportunities as other citizens. Despite consensus between the NHS and the various statutory and voluntary agencies about the need to develop consistent and continuous assessment service, that has not been achieved.

People with learning disabilities continue to be marginalised and excluded from mainstream services. As we have seen through the recent example at Muckamore

Abbey Hospital, sometimes people are institutionalised for many years. Some of the patients in Muckamore Abbey hospital would be much better being in a community setting. They have very complex needs and require considerable resources and appropriately trained staff. However, they must be equally valued.

Young people and their families need to be better consulted and informed regarding diagnosis and treatment and their views need to be better taken into account.

We need personalised and comprehensive assessment and treatment plans and a clear and flexible action plan for treatment, with ongoing dialogue between patients, family, carers and medical staff on patient progress and potential discharge. The whole process is, for many, so uncertain that it becomes a most worrying experience. Many young people do not know what will happen to them next, what to expect on admission or when they might be discharged home or elsewhere.

Children and young people with severe disabilities may have specific medical needs in childhood, but the basic care needs of disabled children are really no different from those of other children. They are children first. In this context, it is important to recognise the effects of placing a child in a setting such as Muckamore Abbey rather than in a community setting where they have the support of family. Many young people in distress are being admitted to adult wards for treatment because no community-based care is available. Muckamore may be the right place for assessment, for a longer stay, or give the most appropriate care for some people — but not for the people we are discussing today.

Being in distress is a frightening experience in itself, but to be placed in a hospital for years on end, perhaps as a child next to an adult with severe mental illness, can be devastating. Many young people are admitted for treatment and placed in adult facilities because of the lack of child and adolescent beds and facilities. These young people are experiencing problems such as an acute sense of isolation; difficulties with keeping in touch with friends and family; and a lack of activities and education.

I believe that their treatment falls short of the Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995, and the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. It is unacceptable, and we must ensure that it does not happen again.

Evidence shows that where appropriate community services are available, fewer people need inpatient care. With rapid-response community-based services, people are able to remain more independent, to stay in their homes where possible, and are better placed to achieve their potential. Community care provides treatment in the least restrictive and stigmatising setting, as well as family-orientated care and support, and it is more appropriate to an individual's age and other specific needs.

Early intervention is important in many aspects of health provision, but it is particularly relevant with mental health and learning disabilities. Early intervention aims to reduce the length of time that people remain undiagnosed and untreated. The earlier an intervention is made, the greater the chance of recovery in an early phase, and the greater the opportunity to create and promote independence and confidence.

The training and development of the workforce is extremely important; that is well attended to in the Bamford recommendations, which stress elements such as a positive attitude and sensitivity. I agree and empathise with the difficult and sometimes challenging task of caring for patients. It is very important to have good working conditions and appropriate, regularly updated training. I acknowledge that sometimes, this work can be very challenging, but it is very rewarding. My sister worked as a nurse in Muckamore Abbey many years ago. She really appreciated and enjoyed her time there.

Finally, I also call for the full implementation of the recommendations of the Bamford Review and of the 'Equal Lives' report on learning disability. As Sue Ramsey has said, we discussed this in an earlier motion, and we really need feedback from the Department on the current situation. We have to ensure that all our children have the opportunity to develop to their full potential, physically, intellectually and emotionally.

3.15 pm

Mr Ford: In supporting the motion, I declare an interest, not only as a member of the constituency that houses Muckamore Abbey Hospital — technically, that may not be an interest — but as a former social worker with the Northern Health and Social Services Board (NHSSB), who, at times, was involved with the rehabilitation of those leaving Muckamore Abbey Hospital to rejoin the community in the NHSSB area.

I well remember an occasion in the late 1980s when a colleague of mine was given a senior social worker post, advancing that rehabilitation process. It is appropriate that each of us taking part in the debate acknowledges the contribution of dedicated staff in meeting the needs of those with learning disabilities. Whether they are the staff who provide nursing and other forms of care in Muckamore Abbey Hospital and the other two hospitals, or whether they assist people's moves to the community and provide day care or support in the home, they are all vital to ensuring a quality of life for those who need the services of the learning-disability teams.

Some of the problems in Muckamore Abbey Hospital are due to the success of the increased shift to community care. Over the past 20 years, between 500 and 600 people have been moved out of long-term care in learning-disability hospitals and have been given better lives in the community. However, some of them have not always had the good lives in the community that they should have had, because the resources, which were already inadequate, have not been increased. The simple fact is that it costs more to keep people in a quality environment in the community than it does to keep them in large institutions, and, as a society, we have not always accommodated that fact.

We must also pay tribute, not only to the staff from Muckamore Abbey Hospital, but to the individuals — in many cases, family members — and the voluntary organisations that have provided community care, enabled the moves to the community and made matters better for those people who receive that care.

It is, perhaps, an interesting coincidence that there are representatives of the Buddy Bear Trust Conductive Education Independent School in the Building today. The trust is particularly concerned about young people with cerebral palsy. It promotes the good work that is being done in the community, but is being hindered by the fact that the work is very expensive and is not properly resourced.

It is no surprise that when Mencap published a report in 2003, it called it 'Breaking Point — families still need a break'. It seems that much of the pious talk about community care actually results in giving the minimum support possible to families, which does, at times, leave parents at breaking point. For example, on simple issues such as respite care, it is now much harder to get placements, particularly for people in their 20s and 30s, than it was a few years ago when they were children or teenagers. There is a real need to ensure that the services are rebalanced, and that has not been done. It is not just about Muckamore Abbey Hospital and the other two hospitals; it is about the package of services that is provided to those people with learning disabilities.

I remember questioning the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety about that issue in the Chamber. I received acknowledgements from her that, for example, the year-on-year percentage increase in funding across different services was always biased towards acute hospitals and against community care. Provision for people with learning disabilities and mental-health needs consistently came at the bottom of the pile. They really were the Cinderella services. However, if the Northern Ireland Assembly debated acute hospitals, particularly the location of maternity services between two hospitals that are one mile apart in Belfast, Members filled the Chamber, and everybody cared. Contrary to that, we are now facing the position that, because the Assembly did not ask serious questions of the Department and the Minister when it had the power to do so some years ago, Muckamore

Abbey Hospital has inadequate resources, and there are people in real need and who are really suffering.

Therefore, before the Assembly starts to point the finger too much at other people, there are Members in the Chamber who should ask whether, when we had the power, they did all that was necessary. I am not entirely convinced that we did. There was much more that the Assembly could, and should, have done.

There are three sets of actions that need to be taken to address the needs of patients in Muckamore Abbey Hospital. First, there should be a general enquiry as to exactly what is happening. I was pleased to hear the Chief Commissioner of the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission (NIHRC) intervening when the story broke, and, subsequently, I have had a conversation with her. I am glad to hear that the commission is doing ongoing work.

I am not sure whether that work will extend to a full-scale inquiry, but such an inquiry must be convened. It should not be simply an internal DHSSPS matter, with civil servants saying how hard everyone has tried, but that the money was not there.

There must be genuine recognition that the human rights of citizens have been interfered with. Even if those citizens do not have voices of their own that can be heard in the media, they ought to have the voices of public representatives and of agencies, such as the Human Rights Commission, to ensure that their rights are looked after.

I welcome the comments of another former Assembly colleague, the Commissioner for Children and Young People, on this matter. However, we should recognise that many of the patients concerned are adults, not children. It is slightly denigrating to the position of such patients to concentrate on them as though they were all children. Clearly, there are children with considerable needs, but there are also adults with such needs. We should not focus only on the children.

The second matter that I wish to address — whatever the current financial restrictions — concerns the actions that the North and West Belfast Health and Social Services Trust should take. The trust has recently acknowledged that it knew that there would be problems with some of the current arrangements, that there would be difficulties with some people settling in, and that a review process would be carried out. That is fine, but I wonder how much of that review would have come to light had BBC journalist Dot Kirby not highlighted it.

Any strategy of locking doors on patients who should be in community care needs a fundamental review. Whatever need there may be, at times, for a small minority of patients to be placed behind locked doors, there is absolutely no way that locked doors should be a substitute for proper nursing care and remedial services, which are, by and large, what those patients require.

The Eastern Health and Social Services Board and the North and West Belfast Health and Social Services Trust must both examine their actions and why they had failed to take action until the media got on their backs. Their staff have done much good work, but there have been failures that have led to the current situation. However dedicated those staff have been in trying to make the best of a bad job, they should not have had to make the best of a bad job.

The third area that I wish to address is the need for a commitment from the DHSSPS to the full implementation of the Bamford Report, as other Members have said. The deafening silence from the Minister and from senior civil servants on the various aspects of the Bamford Report, as they have been published, is quite horrifying.

We in the Chamber have acknowledged what needs to be done. We know how much ought to be done, and we have seen the difficulties of funding in the past. However, we still have a Minister who is not prepared to give the necessary commitments to provide basic services and basic necessary care for some of our most needy citizens.

It is simply unacceptable that bodies such as the Buddy Bear Trust and Mencap should be running services on a shoestring budget and on a charitable basis because they are not being funded properly by the agencies of the state that have relevant responsibility. In that sense, however, Northern Ireland is not unique. Generally, as a society, we have been fairly poor at providing long-term care for those who need it. We have been fairly good at providing intensive nursing and medical services for those who have acute problems, but those with a long-term or lifetime care requirement have, by and large, not been treated well, whether it be in Northern Ireland, the Republic, England, Wales or Scotland.

There have been problems in every region of these islands, but the Bamford Report has highlighted what needs to be done, what could be done, and what must be done as soon as possible in this, the smallest of those regions.

It is very easy for the Assembly to agree a more or less motherhood-and-apple-pie motion. There is nothing wrong with saying that we are in favour of motherhood and apple pie, but the real test will come at some point after 26 March when we will see whether Members who make the right speeches today are prepared to put their votes into ensuring that the necessary resources are supplied to implement the recommendations of the Bamford Report.

Mr Girvan: I am glad to address the House in support of the motion on Muckamore Abbey Hospital and the provision of care for the children and young people there.

I apologise for the absence of the Member of Parliament for South Antrim. He is attending the funeral of a very close friend and is unable to attend. He has lobbied strongly on the issue and would have liked to participate in the debate.

A meeting has taken place with the senior management of Muckamore Abbey Hospital, which highlighted not only the plight of the young people in the hospital but the fact that the hands of management are tied about what they can and cannot do. The staff are suffering greatly, and they too share the stress experienced by the families of the young people concerned. We have also had a meeting with the chief executive of the North and West Belfast Health and Social Services Trust, Mr Black, at which he indicated a desire to address and progress these issues.

Many of the comments that have been made in the Chamber this afternoon are 100% accurate, and I am glad to see that we have cross-party support and unity on this topical issue that BBC coverage alerted us to.

Mr Goggins, the Minister with responsibility for health, social services and public safety, has promised to respond today to the Member of Parliament on these issues. At the moment, we are tinkering with a short-term fix, but we want long-term solutions, which means finding the resources for care in the community. Work has already been done on that issue. We need something more than lip-service.

Ms S Ramsey: The Member quite rightly outlined the work done by the MP for South Antrim in ensuring that, in the words of the chief executive of the North and West Belfast Health and Social Services Trust: "this does not happen again". Does the Member agree that it would be appropriate for an all-party delegation to visit Muckamore Abbey Hospital? All Members have referred to the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety's failure to implement the Bamford Review. Does the Member also agree that, if we met officials from the Department, we could put pressure on them to implement the Bamford Review?

Mr Girvan: The Bamford Review has already been debated in the Chamber, and my understanding is that the motion received cross-party support.

There is merit in all Members continuing to lobby on the issue. However, what would be the point in a cross-party delegation meeting the Minister to be told precisely what we already know? Locking up young people in Muckamore Abbey Hospital resembles Third World conditions. It is in our gift to provide a twenty-first-century Health Service. If the Assembly gets back up and running, this issue should be a priority and should have support across the Chamber about the resources needed. The issue must be dealt with.

Members have referred to the provision of respite care. That area is drastically underfunded, and the families of people who suffer from learning difficulties and disabilities are not getting the support that they require. We must address not only the issue of Muckamore Abbey Hospital but the wider difficulties experienced throughout the Province.

I do not want to blame any individual for what has happened. However, solutions must be found.

I am not happy to proceed if something could take the spotlight off the issue and remove it from the media's interest. I want to deal with the issue now. I want measures for the long term to ensure that such a situation never happens again. All Members who have spoken in the debate have already mentioned that. We do not want to be discussing the same matter in this Chamber in several years' time.

3.30 pm

Children have been mentioned. However, a number of people currently in Muckamore Abbey Hospital were admitted as children but are now young adults. Those young adults have lost much of their childhoods through being institutionalised. However, society is also suffering. We are to blame for what is happening. We sometimes adopt a head-in-the-sand mentality whereby if something is not happening in our backyard, we do not see it. We must wake up and realise that the problem exists and that we need to provide joined-up government to deal with it. One division of the Department appears to have enough funding to lay carpets and redecorate, yet other areas are struggling to provide necessary nursing care.

I hope and pray that the recommendations of the Bamford Report will be implemented and that sufficient resources will be made available. Mr Billy Bell mentioned the waste at management level in the Health Service. There is a need for an urgent review to secure efficiencies that will deliver savings and help the Department to deal with the issues.

I support the motion. I hope that we can find some resolution to this issue, not only for those people in Muckamore Abbey Hospital but for many others. Children and young adults need adequate provision. Twenty-four-hour lock-up is no way to help those people. It is unfortunate that, because of the situation in Muckamore Abbey Hospital, there is no alternative to that. The hospital has no other resources, and young people are being placed in totally unsuitable accommodation. We must move forward. It is only human to try to deal with the issue. I implore the House to support the motion.

Rev Dr Robert Coulter: I am pleased to fully support the motion in the name of my fellow Member for North Antrim Dr Paisley. The motion is extremely serious, because it concerns some of the most vulnerable and exposed members of our community — people who, most of the time, do not have a voice. Let the Members in this Chamber give those people a voice as we give them our support.

Mr Justice Gillen, one of our most senior judges, has highlighted a shortage of skilled professional practitioners in the caring profession. Some 17 young people have spent an additional six years at Muckamore Abbey Hospital in Antrim, when they could have been released to the care of community-based workers. The learned judge has identified that more money is needed to create an early-warning system to ensure that children with learning disabilities or mental health problems are properly treated in the future.

Indignation is not enough; recriminations are not enough. Practical action is required to address a raft of problems. The problems can be identified as follows: first, the current system is clearly underfunded, with the consequence that there are simply not enough trained and qualified care practitioners in the community; secondly, an early-warning system must be put in place to identify potential problems early so that what can only be termed the massive system failure of Muckamore is not repeated.

Owing to cuts, there is no pool of qualified staff in the community to fill any posts that might be created right away. It will take time — perhaps several years — to put that right. Therefore, although the Government's promise of an additional £1 million over the next two years to address the problem is welcome, it is not in itself enough. An immediate rescue plan must be put into operation.

I am not impressed by the failure of system in our Health Service generally. It brings to mind the rubric that I have been trying to impress on the official mind for many years now — the patient must come first.

The Health Service is full of excellent staff who have a deep commitment to what they do. They are all excellent people whose hearts are in the job and who display a deep sense of care towards their patients. I could not lavish enough praise on the healthcare practitioners at this level in our Health Service. The problem is higher up.

I am concerned by the thinking at policy level at the top, which drives our trusts' managements to think about nothing but paper targets and financial savings. That thinking has pervaded the review of public administration (RPA) and has resulted in a proposed new system of health governance that addresses none of the patient-focused problems of, for instance, the elderly.

Failing to separate the primary and acute care budgets will starve primary care of money and deal a serious blow to preventative medicine and care in the community. Mental health and learning disability are always the Cinderella services. Acute hospitals consistently receive higher increases in spending, year on year.

I am concerned by the inability of the direct-rule regime and its apparatus of top-heavy officialdom to address this issue in the review of public administration. The entire RPA process will have to be revisited by the Assembly when it assumes the direction of the Province once again. I wrote as much in the 'News Letter' as recently as last Saturday, as my colleague Billy Bell mentioned.

In Muckamore Abbey Hospital and related cases the BBC found that more than 100 adults with learning disabilities have had their discharge from hospital delayed for an average of three and a half years. One person remains in the unit 10 years after his treatment ended, yet for more than 10 years the policy has been that no one should live long term in a hospital of any kind.

In the bad old days, before we had democratic accountability and due process, prisoners would be placed in a cell, known as an oubliette in French. They would then be forgotten and never heard of again. The Muckamore Abbey Hospital case has echoes of that. The only difference is that the care given by staff in Muckamore Abbey Hospital, often in difficult and fraught circumstances, is exemplary. Any time that I visited the hospital, I have had nothing but the highest praise for the staff, who work in difficult situations.

However, in another sense, those patients who should have been discharged are the forgotten. Their forgotten cell may have been more comfortable than the forgotten cell of the past, but hospital was not the place for them; it is not where they should be.

The lesson in all this is that we must not forget. The Assembly must revisit the issue when it reconvenes after the forthcoming election. After that, it must feature regularly on the agenda of the Assembly's Health Committee until it, and all the other issues highlighted by the Bamford Mental Health Review — which we have already debated — are addressed to the satisfaction of the people's representatives.

It gives me pleasure to support the motion.

Mr O'Dowd: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Today's debate has resulted from an intervention on Muckamore Abbey Hospital that Mr Paisley made last Tuesday. Sinn Féin had hoped to debate both Muckamore Abbey Hospital and collusion today, and it is shameful that, because the unionist parties blocked the motion, we are not debating the assassination of a young unionist.

However, Sinn Féin also tabled a motion on Muckamore Abbey Hospital, but withdrew it for one reason only: Dr Paisley raised the issue in the House and asked it to debate it. Sinn Féin Members thought that withdrawing the motion was the proper thing to do because we did not want to play political football with the issue; we wanted to move forward on it with a combined voice. Therefore Sinn Féin will support the DUP motion.

Muckamore Abbey Hospital and similar hospitals were designed in Victorian times to lock people up. However, in this day and age, Muckamore should be used as a centre in which people can be assessed before they are released back into the community. Once they have been released, proper community services will be provided to them so that they can lead as full a life as possible. However, for many reasons, that has not been allowed to happen.

What can we, as Assembly Members, do about that situation? We can debate it — and I have no doubt that the motion will receive unanimous support — but that is all that we will do. David Ford asked whether the Assembly has let down the patients of Muckamore. The answer is yes — we all have. While we have been in this debating shop, young adults and children have been locked up in Muckamore. We should be the people who hold the reins of power and who have the ability to investigate the matter.

I will use my crystal ball to look into the future to see how different the picture could be. Imagine that Iris Robinson were the health Minister. I have no doubt that she would have the chief executive of the trust in her office, tearing strips off him, wanting to know why the situation had been allowed to happen. Any health Committee would investigate the matter and would demand to know why it happened. The Assembly would demand that the Department of Health take action through our local Minister. Unfortunately, we are not doing those things; therefore, we have to take collective blame for what has happened to the young people of Muckamore.

During the recent Assembly debate on the Bamford Review, I mentioned an establishment that I had visited. I said that it was the most depressing place that I had ever been in. That place was Muckamore Abbey Hospital. Another Sinn Féin member and I visited that facility about 18 months ago. That hospital has excellent facilities. At the time of our visit, it was going through a new-build programme, and we were urged to take a look at it. The people who run Muckamore insisted that we look around the whole facility. We did so, and it was depressing. The guy who was with me was an ex-blanket man who spent five years on the blanket. As we walked through the facility, he said that it reminded him of the H-blocks. Although I forget its correct title now, we went to a room that was used to hold people if they were going through an emotionally disturbed state. He said that that room was worse than the punishment blocks in the H-blocks. However, young people were being kept in those facilities.

Since that visit, we have lobbied the trust and the Health Department to continue refurbishing Muckamore, but, more importantly, to ensure that the community facilities are available to allow young people and adults to live as full a life as possible once they have been released. It is clear, however, that those facilities have not been made available.

During the autumn, I also visited Knockbracken Hospital. It has gone through a massive refurbishment programme, and it now has state-of-the-art facilities for people who have learning disabilities and mental-health issues. It is an example to everyone. However, it also has Victorian facilities, and those need to be replaced.

A massive injection of funding needs to be put into mental-health care and helping those who have learning disabilities. During the debate on the Bamford Review, Sinn Féin tabled an amendment that called for the Programme for Government Committee to ensure, in its deliberations with the Exchequer, that the £300 million that is needed to ensure that Bamford becomes a reality is made available. If Bamford does not become a reality, we will continue to let down the young people of Muckamore Abbey Hospital and those people who still live in the Victorian buildings that are in Knockbracken Hospital.

Bairbre de Brún introduced the 11-part Bamford Review to examine the way forward for mental health in the twenty-first century. It was an excellent review; it has done good work on investigating international best practice. However, be assured that — despite the best intentions of whatever direct-rule Minister is in place — it will not be implemented in full, because it is not a priority. It is not part of the priority planning of the Department of Health. We need to have Iris Robinson, or A N Other, as Minister of Health; we need a Health Committee and an Assembly that will ensure that the human rights abuses that have taken place in Muckamore Abbey Hospital stop immediately.

Like David Ford, I welcome the intervention of the Human Rights Commission on this matter. Those young people's human rights are being abused — they have been let down by the Assembly and by the Department of Health. We must ensure that we, as politicians, change the conditions in which they live. Of all the debates that we have had in this Transitional Assembly, this one highlights better than any other the need for local politicians to work together.

Dr Paisley said that he had never experienced retirement, and he wished Seán Farren well. I never thought that these words would come out of my mouth, but I hope that Ian Paisley becomes First Minister before he retires, because he and my colleague Martin McGuinness and whoever is sitting around the Executive table will not let down the young people in Muckamore. They will not let down those people in Knockbracken who have not moved into the new state-of-the-art facilities, and they will do a better job than any direct-rule Minister who is sent here.

It took a BBC reporter to expose this scandal; that alone says that we all let those people down. It should have been exposed by our Health Committee, or by a probing question to our local Health Minister. I congratulate Dot Kirby on her work; she has shone a spotlight not only on Muckamore, but also on this Chamber.

Mr Dallat: When I first heard of this scandal, my heart sank. I asked myself whether it could be the same Muckamore Abbey Hospital that I knew so well many years ago when my family and I regularly visited my brother, Gerard Majella, who was a patient there for five years. I remember the care and love he received from the dedicated staff, who were committed to helping so many children with special needs, sometimes mental, sometimes mental and physical. He died there on 9 August 1968; every day since then he has been remembered, and so too have the staff of that hospital who gave him so much love and care and attention.

Clearly, Muckamore Abbey Hospital has moved on since those days; it has a different role, helping people to re-enter the community, or so I thought until I heard that some people had been there for 10 years longer than they should have been. The question that occupies my mind is how this situation can exist. Is it really about money and lack of resources? I do not think so. I am convinced that it has more to do with a mindset that dictates that, where choices must be made, the weak and vulnerable will be put at the back of the queue, and every time they come to the front of the queue they will be sent back again. Some people might describe it as prejudice. That is the way in which people with mental health problems are treated.

From the day and hour a baby is born with special needs, his or her parents have a struggle to get the child assessed, and their battle is only beginning.

Report after report is compiled from the most extensive consultation, only to be hit on the head when choices about spending are to be made. Perhaps it is unfair, but when this story broke I thought of the Romanian orphans. I asked myself why, in a modern society that talks so much about healthcare, young children spend 10 years or more in an institution when they should have been rehabilitated into the community. The scandal at Muckamore must be sorted out.

Is Muckamore the tip of the iceberg, as has been suggested? How many more people with special needs are neglected or in a queue with no end? How many are waiting for an assessment that never seems to happen? Is the provision for those individuals adequate or are they being neglected in the same way as those in Muckamore Abbey Hospital?

In the previous Assembly, there was a great deal of consultation and loads of reports on health issues, but no substance. In the meantime, money was spent on an Assembly that did not meet. Yet, the people whom we talk about today continued to languish in an institution that was intended only for short stays. What a pity; what a shame.

As Members leave the Chamber, we can give a commitment to end this inequality in society, the injustice, the prejudice against the weak and vulnerable and the preferential treatment for projects that jump the queue. I hope that the scandal at Muckamore begins a process that delves into every corner of society to find who else is at the end of the queue waiting for help and crying out for the services that they need to develop their lives to the best of their abilities. If Members do that, they will do no more than honour the Good Friday Agreement, which was not designed to simply distribute justice or injustice equally, but to acknowledge and accept that everyone is equal. That includes those who have had to stay in Muckamore much longer than necessary because there was no room for them at the inn.

It is a long time since I first visited Muckamore Abbey Hospital, and I regret that I did not keep up those visits, but it was difficult. I am sorry that it has taken so long to discover that people who should have been back in the community and accepted as equals are still there. During the intervening years, something happened that had nothing to do with the staff, but has a lot to do with direct-rule Ministers and civil servants who have demonstrated their prejudice against the vulnerable in a dreadful way that brings shame and a cry for change.

It is a lesson that Members can learn. Those Members who are returned to a new Assembly must come back with a different attitude — one that profoundly favours those in society who are weak. After all, is that not what government is about? Members can support projects that are exciting, but only when the people whom we are charged to care for have been looked after.

I congratulate Dr Paisley for tabling the motion, and I am deeply touched by other Members who have made positive contributions — by and large, in a non-party-political way — and who have raised their voices in support of those who cannot do so for themselves.

Mrs I Robinson: This has been an interesting and important debate, and I thank the leader of my party, Dr Paisley, for his assistance in pursuing this timely debate.

A failure to plan for adequate services may have contributed to the practice of denying individuals who were detained at Muckamore the right to liberty and the right to a family life. I visited Muckamore Abbey Hospital some time ago, and I was impressed by the commitment of the staff. At that stage, concerns about inadequate funding for the resettlement of patients were already real.

The situation at Muckamore has been prominent in the press, but there are other hospitals in Northern Ireland where the same problems might well exist. There are three specialist learning disability hospitals in Northern Ireland — Muckamore Abbey Hospital, Longstone Hospital and Lakeview Hospital — and they currently provide assessment and treatment services. There are few community-based services available, and that increases the reliance of people with a learning disability on those three specialist hospitals.

'Equal Lives', the learning disability report from the Bamford Mental Health Review, defines a learning disability as one that includes the presence of a significantly reduced ability to understand new or complex information or to learn new skills, with a reduced ability to cope independently, which started before adulthood with a lasting effect on development.

Children, as well as adults at Muckamore, require individual packages of care suited to their capabilities. Those care packages may include intensive personal care for an individual, including feeding, cleaning, dressing and medication. Care packages also represent extensive support for the family to help them cope with their added responsibilities. As a society, we rely on families to provide 24-hour service. It is the failure to provide services in the community that has caused the delay in discharges at Muckamore.

One big problem that has arisen at Muckamore is the difficulty faced by agencies when the services required are life-long, rather than single treatable health problems. The fact that learning disability services are, in the main, provided by the family rather than by social services means that services for people with a learning disability have been a low priority for the Government and their agencies. As a result, the small number of individuals in hospitals and their families have put up with conditions that would not be tolerated anywhere else. The 'Equal Lives' report outlines the problems that people with a learning disability and their families endure.

Some parts of the report relate specifically to the situation at Muckamore. The report states that:

"Questions do need to be asked however with regard to the inequalities that may exist in Northern Ireland detailed in Table 2. For example are statutory services in breach of the Disability Discrimination Act and Human Rights Act if they:

- fail to provide adequate community support for a person with challenging behaviours?
- maintain a person in hospital because they do not have a facility in the community for a client to resettle to?"

Recommendation 27 states:

“Resettlement of long-stay patients from hospitals within the context of supported living principles must be progressed as rapidly as possible. By June 2011, all people living in a learning disability hospital should be relocated to the community. Funds need to be provided to ensure that on average 80 people will be resettled per annum over the 5-year period from 2006 to 2011.”

Members have made some important points, and I will go through them in the order that they were made. Dr Paisley rightly said that the recommendations to re-integrate people with special needs into the community have to be acted upon and reinforced. He also said that care packages must be in place so that all people are allowed the dignity of a home address, and he emphasised the core need for additional beds for children who have very complex needs.

Mr Bell of the Ulster Unionist Party emphasised that this motion is dealing with the most vulnerable people in society, so it is important that Members are doubly sure of the provision that is being put in place.

Sue Ramsey of Sinn Féin highlighted the fact that the media, particularly the BBC, should be congratulated for how it alerted the public to how bad the service for children and adults with special needs is at Muckamore. I join her in commending that media reporting. I also agree that it is time to address that failure and put it right. A review should be carried out immediately and its recommendations implemented without delay.

4.00 pm

Carmel Hanna of the SDLP reiterated how important it is that young people know the exact nature of their treatment, the footprint of their stay in hospital, and the back-up care that is available when they return to the community. She also emphasised the need for early intervention. My DUP colleague Paul Girvan said that lip service is of no use; delivery is what matters. When the Assembly gets up and running, as it will when all the boxes are ticked, that will be a priority. Rev Bob Coulter, for whom I have a high regard with respect to health issues, re-emphasised how voiceless vulnerable children and adults are. He said that we need more funding and better planning to provide for specialist staff.

Mr O'Dowd said that we all bear responsibility for the lack of improvement at Muckamore. I remind him that we had a Sinn Féin Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety in the previous Assembly. Mental health problems existed then as they do now. I have no doubt that whoever holds the health portfolio will treat mental health and the Bamford Report with the urgency needed to successfully address the needs of those very vulnerable people.

When we get our Assembly back, it will be because all of the boxes are ticked, and it will be an Assembly where all Members are democrats. No member of the future Assembly will try to employ both the Armalite and the ballot box.

Mr Dallat praised the work of staff who gave his late brother Gerard the care and attention he needed. He also queried what had happened to bring Muckamore to its current state. Many explanations have been given, and I hope that, after the elections, local people will have local representatives in charge of the Assembly to take decisions that affect them. I appreciate all the comments that have been made by Members. This is a very important issue. Mental health has been treated, as another Member said, as the Cinderella service. In many cases, when funding was short in the budgets of each trust, money was pilfered from mental health — in the nicest possible way — for other areas of healthcare.

It is important that local politicians address the needs of the more vulnerable in society. I welcome the fact that there has been support for the motion from all of the political persuasions that are represented in the Assembly. A united voice makes a difference and reaches the ear of the Government. In future, the Government must ensure that those with learning disabilities are not at the bottom of the pile when it comes to allocating resources. Sufficient funding must be provided for community services to allow those who require hospital stays to reintegrate into the outside world. We need to target specialist nursing staff and clinicians — and all involved in healthcare who can ease the burden of those with mental illness — and give them access to all of the services that they need.

The extensive work that went into compiling the ‘Equal Lives’ report must be utilised, and its recommendations acted on by the Government as soon as possible.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly expresses concern that more than 100 adults and young people with learning disabilities have been forced to remain in Muckamore Abbey Hospital, Antrim — some for periods extending to several years — because appropriate care within the community is not available; demands a full inquiry into the situation to ensure it cannot occur again; recognises the frequently undervalued contribution of staff, families and carers; and calls upon Government to implement urgently the recommendations of the Equal Lives Learning Disability Report of the Bamford Mental Health Review.

Liquor Licences

Mr O'Dowd: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I regret to inform the House that my party will not be staying for the two remaining debates this afternoon. Both issues being debated are very important, but they have been used to block a debate on collusion, which has far-reaching consequences for the wider community. As that is the case, Sinn Féin regrets that it will be withdrawing from the Chamber.

Madam Speaker: I thank the Member for letting us know his party's view. It will be reported in Hansard tomorrow.

Dr Birnie: I beg to move

That this Assembly calls upon the Minister with responsibility for the Department for Social Development to ensure that no action will be taken with regard to furthering the proposed abolition of the "surrender principle" for liquor licences, as proposed by the Northern Ireland Liquor Licensing review; and further calls for this issue to be dealt with by a restored Northern Ireland Assembly.

In view of the overwhelming attendance here, I am tempted to say that we must be approaching closing time. However, Members have a few hours — at least on paper — to go yet. I am pleased to propose the motion, and it is regrettable that one party has chosen — for whatever reason — to absent itself. The issue is important and affects the lives and welfare of many people in the Province.

Earlier today I was talking about water, and now I am on the subject of drink — there is something poetic in that. The subject is very important. The Department for Social Development (DSD) consultation document, 'Liquor Licensing – The Way Forward', produced in October 2005 stated:

"There is a clear link between alcohol and problems relating to crime, public nuisance, health and children and young people. Licensing legislation can contribute to solving or aggravating those problems."

The final sentence about "solving or aggravating those problems" should be noted. The UUP's contention in moving the motion is that we fear that the DSD proposals — as recently outlined — will hinder the achievement of the good social objectives outlined in the quotation. I am talking specifically about the so-called "surrender principle", which has ensured, hitherto, that gaining a new licence for certain types of drink outlets can happen only through the purchase of an old licence.

Therefore, from the end of 2005, the total number of Northern Ireland licences in certain categories was capped at just below 2,000. However, there is a range of categories, some of which are not included in that provision.

It is not clear whether Northern Ireland has differed from the very pronounced and, many would say, worrying UK-wide trend towards higher and higher levels of alcohol consumption per capita. However, the surrender principle has at least ensured that we have not been swamped by a dramatic increase in the number of outlets. It may be significant that in Scotland, which does not have this arrangement, there are four times the number of outlets per capita that there are in Northern Ireland.

Ending the surrender principle would mean that an asset worth a considerable sum of money would be rendered pretty much useless at a stroke. The existing drinks trade obviously has a self-interested — although legitimate, in a way — concern about that happening. However, some small traders, particularly grocers, feel that there is a problem with restraint of trade at present, relative to the number of UK multiple supermarket chains.

The wider public is concerned that the end of the surrender principle could mean more outlets, greater competition, more cut-price offers, and so on. That would mean more consumption of alcohol, and that leads me back to concerns about the social outcome of abolishing the surrender principle. There are many ironies in the Government's current position. We are approaching the critical date of 30 April 2007, which has been rigorously set with a view to reducing the number of people smoking and its impact on community health, yet the Government are pushing alcohol-related policies in a radically different and contradictory direction.

Moreover, as we well know, the Blair Government have put the punishment, control and reduction of antisocial behaviour towards the top of their policy agenda. However, what they are doing with licensing-law reform will very likely promote antisocial behaviour. One non-governmental organisation (NGO) working in the sector estimates that between 60% and 70% of cases of domestic violence against women are drink-related, as are about half the instances of child abuse. Those are frightening statistics. Alcohol is responsible for between 22,000 and 40,000 deaths annually in the UK, depending on how many indirect health effects are included in that estimate. The annual financial impact is estimated at £18 billion. According to the British Crime Survey (BSC), one in six of all violent crimes in Great Britain is committed in or around licensed premises; therefore we should think very carefully about multiplying the number of such outlets.

It is striking that, a couple of years ago, many of the English chief constables and judges criticised the Blair Administration proposals for the liberalisation of licensing laws. Those changes occurred in England at the end of 2005, which means that Northern Ireland has had a year and a half in which to learn and, arguably, profit from the English experience. Given all of that, why have our Government not learnt from that experience and the associated problems?

The end of the surrender principle is only part of the Department for Social Development's proposals for the reform of licensing.

I hope that it may be possible for a future Assembly to examine the other important elements, such as the new licensing regime, which will throw much greater responsibility onto local government. In this area, we could profitably consider the English experience, some of which has been mixed, and suggests that, in practice, local government might find it difficult to adequately and correctly regulate the numbers and types of licences. The change in opening hours, pushing them back from 1.00 am to 2.00 am, is of particular interest.

4.15 pm

Many Members have noted the apparent lack of rigour in the DSD consultation document to reduce the scourge of under-age drinking. What is to be done about the problem of those who are under 18 years of age who abuse alcohol and face all the social and health problems that result from that?

It has been pointed out to me also that, under the current system, it is almost impossible for the owner of a licence to permanently lose it. If that is the case, it makes the enforcement of the law very difficult in practice.

I am pleased to propose the motion.

Mrs Foster: I support the motion. Fermanagh District Council discussed this subject during the consultation period on the proposed changes to the legislation. The Minister with responsibility for the matter responded on that occasion, but more of that anon.

I wish to concentrate, however, on the surrender principle, which is the current requirement to purchase an existing liquor licence for the purpose of selling alcohol. The abolition of the surrender principle will, in effect, allow easier access to alcohol at a time when many voices have been raised against the impact that binge drinking can have on one's health. The estimated costs attributable to excess alcohol consumption in Northern Ireland are over 730 deaths a year; the equivalent of over 12,000 expected years of life lost, and approximately 400,000 working days lost each year. The approximate cost to the economy is over £800 million. Members will agree that those are staggering figures.

A Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety report entitled 'Strategy for reducing alcohol related harm' estimated that, as a result of alcohol-related harm, some £34.3 million a year is incurred in costs that have a direct impact on Government spending in Northern Ireland. These include hospital costs, general practice costs and the prison costs associated with alcohol-related crime. In addition, it is estimated that £743.2 million a year is incurred in costs that have an indirect impact on Government spending, such as premature deaths, road traffic accidents and the cost to industry due to sickness absences.

A report published in November 2005, which analysed the drinking behaviour of young people between the ages of 11 and 16 in Northern Ireland, revealed some very worrying trends. It showed that, in Northern Ireland, young people start drinking as early as 11 years of age, and that many young people here are drinking to very dangerous levels. I was disturbed to discover that there is a strongly significant relationship between drinking behaviour and other risk behaviours, such as experimenting with smoking, drugs and solvents, and sexual experimentation. Given those findings, we should, as responsible representatives in this House, be concerned about any legislation that would allow easier access to alcohol. That is exactly what would happen if the surrender principle were to be abolished.

At present, Northern Ireland does not have the same level of alcohol-related harm and social disorder that we see in the rest of the United Kingdom. That is due in part to the over-provision of pubs and off-sales outlets that exist on the mainland and the current regulated system here. Northern Ireland has a population of about 1.7 million, and there are currently 1,938 public houses and off-licences. That does not take into account the number of private clubs, licensed restaurants, hotels and wine bars.

I see no need for an increase in the number of outlets that sell alcohol. In Scotland, there are four times more alcohol licences per head of population than in Northern Ireland. Is that what Members want to happen in this country? The answer must be no.

On the positive side, the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety has estimated that the alcohol industry provides some 32,000 jobs in Northern Ireland — about 5% of the employed workforce — at a combined estimated annual salary of £298.3 million. It also contributes £2 million to the arts, sports and charities. The debate should reflect that too.

As a representative for Fermanagh and South Tyrone, I often consider matters from a tourism perspective, from which the individuality of Northern Ireland's licensed trade forms part of the attraction for tourists. That is as true for Fermanagh as anywhere else, but it must be considered in the context of the debate. Government proposals would result in the influx of large pub chains, to the detriment of tourism in Fermanagh and Northern Ireland as a whole.

Social disorder is often linked to alcohol abuse. One need only glance at the court reports in the local press to see the link between excessive alcohol consumption and criminal activity. Although it would be naive to say that all society's ills stem from an overindulgence in alcohol, a large proportion of crime is committed under the influence of alcohol and, increasingly, drugs. That happens across the criminal spectrum, from street disorder to domestic violence. No responsible person would want to expose society to deregulation as envisaged by the Government.

When the subject of deregulation came before Fermanagh District Council, the Minister, David Hanson, responded to me in writing. He confirmed that the surrender provision had been effective in its aim of influencing entry to the market, thereby restricting the overall number of pubs and off-licences in Northern Ireland. I hope that the Minister has taken that into consideration and will bear it in mind when he introduces legislation. I am happy to support the motion.

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leat as seans a thabhairt domh labhairt ar an ábhar tábhachtach seo.

I am grateful to be afforded the opportunity to speak on this important topic. It incorporates a wide range of economic, social and public-safety concerns, some of which Members have touched on.

In May 2004, the liquor licensing review team at DSD took forward its review with the help of an inter-departmental steering group. On 1 November 2005, DSD produced the consultation paper 'Liquor Licensing — The Way Forward', which contains Government proposals to reform licensing law in Northern Ireland. Although there was support for many of the proposals outlined in the consultation paper, the Minister for Social Development, David Hanson, announced in a ministerial statement on 20 July 2006 that:

"Concerns have been expressed by politicians and parts of the licensed trade regarding two of the proposed changes. These are the transfer of responsibility for liquor licensing from courts to district councils and the abolition of the 'surrender' principle."

The second and more important of the two is the subject of today's debate — the abolition of the surrender principle. Some of those who see the extent of the ravages of alcohol abuse also have concerns about extended opening hours — although that is not entirely within the remit of the motion.

The surrender principle, whereby the granting of a licence for a new public house or off-sales is conditional on the surrender to the court of an existing licence, has capped, to 2009, the overall number of such premises in Northern Ireland. The Minister agreed to commission an assessment of the business impact of the abolition of the surrender principle before making any decision on the way forward. The six objectives as outlined by Government are:

"promotion of public health; promotion of public safety; prevention of crime and disorder; prevention of public nuisance; protection of children from harm; and fair treatment of all stakeholders."

I suggest that in the light of those, the Minister must go much further than assessing the mere business impact of abolishing the surrender principle.

Indeed, established evidence, if not common sense, shows that controlling people's access to alcohol and the number of outlets that sell it is one way to reduce alcohol-related harm and social disorder. As Mrs Foster said, drink-related illness, death and crime already cost the Northern Ireland economy almost £800 million a year, and that is before we face the human cost and misery that they bring to so many families. The Minister should fully realise that harsh reality before making access to alcohol easier.

The surrender principle has economic consequences. Those of us who represent rural areas are well acquainted with many of our smaller licensed premises. Their owners use the licence as an asset, often to release finance to reinvest in their premises. Why should those people not do that? Every business works on that basis.

It has been rightly stated that alcohol is no ordinary commodity. Churches and many other organisations have expressed concerns that the abolition of the surrender principle may increase access to alcohol, thus contributing further to a host of health, antisocial behaviour and policing problems on our streets. In the light of those concerns, I propose that the matter be left to those of us who are most aware of the —

Mr Weir: I agree with the Member about the financial consequences of the potential transfer of responsibility for licensing to councils and the abolition of the surrender principle, which are linked in many ways. In England, the surrender principle has not been applied, and, in the past few years, responsibility for liquor licensing has been transferred to councils. Westminster City Council is one of the major licensing bodies, since its jurisdiction covers the west end of London. It has robust licensing policies and has tried to restrict the number of licences that are issued. However, the impact of the legislation has meant that appeals from various groups and commercial bodies against the refusal of licence applications have been waiting for two or three years to be brought to court. Even though the council has won every appeal that has been lodged, the process has cost it a fortune. Although I agree with the Member about the wider financial costs, there is also a major cost to ratepayers.

Mr McGlone: I thank the Member for his intervention. It is clear that the cost of defending court cases will be a major problem for ratepayers in many areas. That will cause problems to those who pay rates and to those of us who may be elected to the new councils.

I was making the point that the matter would be better left to those of us who are most aware of the alcohol-related difficulties on our streets and in our communities. A restored Northern Ireland Assembly should be left to deal with the matter.

Molaim an rún atá os comhair an Tionóil.

Mr McCarthy: I support the motion, and I also support the Northern Ireland liquor licensing review group's opposition to the abolition of the surrender principle.

A review has recently been carried out of how liquor licensing in Northern Ireland should be altered. I understand that that review has been through consultation and that changes have been made. Some people will say that those changes were necessary in order to bring Northern Ireland in line with other places. However, others will feel that the changes will not improve the lives of those people who live adjacent to public houses that have extended their opening hours.

The proposals to abolish the surrender principle were vigorously opposed by all existing establishments, and, as far as I am aware, by public representatives. The owners of these establishments have paid a substantial amount of money to secure their licences. They have invested in opening and managing reputable establishments. If the principle were abolished, we could end up with a public house on every street corner, and we all know what that would lead to.

4.30 pm

Our system has proved its worth — and if it is not broken why fix it? We have an orderly way in which people can obtain a liquor licence and establishments can be run in an orderly fashion for the good of everyone.

I support the retention of the surrender principle, and I hope that a restored Northern Ireland Assembly will make a reasoned decision on the surrender licence principle. I support the motion.

Mr Beggs: I support the motion. I declare an interest as a councillor, a ratepayer and as a member of a district policing partnership (DPP). The proposals will have major implications for councillors, councils, ratepayers and policing.

It is interesting to note in the responses to the consultation that almost 93% of people opposed the proposals, with about 6% in favour. The Government have decided to go ahead, while ignoring the views of local people.

Why do the proposals cause such concern? The document gives the impression that devolving decisions on licensing to local councils would create more local accountability. However, experience in England shows that that has not always been the case. Local councils have provided instances of regular abuse when they decided to remove licences. Councils often have to fight huge drinks companies with deep pockets that can force councils to court, thus incurring huge legal expenses. In fact, some councils have exceeded their annual legal expenses budget and find that they cannot afford to take any other proposal to court to defend themselves, and they start to cave in. In effect, big business can drive down quality to the detriment of communities.

Extending the licensing laws is a separate issue from removing licences completely. There is evidence that alcohol abuse is related to hospital admissions, particularly at weekends, antisocial activity, police activity and demands on ambulance services. We must be very careful about the additional work that extended drinking time would generate.

Through my membership of a DPP, I became knowledgeable about Fermanagh DPP, and Fermanagh community safety partnership, which carried out a review of the evening economy — I see that Mrs Foster has left the Chamber. They discovered that many of the difficulties occurred not on or outside premises but at fast-food outlets. Licensed premises may have closed at midnight or 1.00 am, but people were congregating around the town for hours afterwards at fast-food outlets, which had to be policed.

The solution that came from the local community safety partnership and from local people was a voluntary agreement whereby the fast-food outlets agreed to shut an hour earlier. After the pubs closed, people were given one hour to get something to eat and go home. That reduced crime and meant that the police could concentrate resources on a specific period so that they did not, unlike in England, have to maintain vigilance throughout the night because of 24-hour licensing. I am pleased that that is not on offer. However, there is licensing until 2.00 am, and that will dilute police cover because there is only the same cover and resources over weekends. That will be an outworking of the proposals.

As regards the proliferation of licences, I do not know how many constituents have complained to Members that they cannot find an off-licence in which to buy alcohol. A wide variety of off-sales is available, from supermarkets to pubs and other venues.

There are locations in virtually every community where people can buy alcohol. It is not necessarily a good thing that it is getting cheaper; that raises the likelihood of abuse. I generally favour a competitive economy, but in this area falling prices give me cause for concern.

Will we follow the example of Scotland, where pubs have proliferated and almost every corner shop sells alcohol? How then would it be managed? If corner shops begin to sell alcohol, with one person on duty on the premises and no supervision or assistance, there is a danger that pressure will be brought to bear. They may begin to sell for income or be pressurised by groups of underage people to sell to them. Additional problems would flow to local communities from such a development. We all know that there is a relationship between alcohol and drug abuse and antisocial activity.

I mentioned Glasgow. Market forces have forced prices down so that beer is almost as cheap as Coca-Cola; there is more and more abuse, and people damage not only their communities but their health.

In a recent survey, one in ten respondents who drank alcohol was found to be highly likely to have a problem with it. Another survey predicts that alcohol sales in the UK will increase by £500 million a year. This will not be good for the workforce, the economy, public health, the ambulance service or policing. I do not see where the winners are, other than the big drinks companies. Are the Government doing this at their behest? Perhaps they are.

Clearly, many difficulties arise from this. Last year, the Government introduced an alcohol and drugs strategy. I suspect that with increased proliferation in licensing hours that strategy will be out the window. How can they achieve their objectives when the product is going to be so much more accessible? Alcohol can already be bought in various outlets, supermarkets and off-sales. We do not need any more.

I support the motion.

Mr Hussey: I declare an interest as a member of the Federation of the Retail Licensed Trade and as a publican.

Mr Copeland: A what? [Laughter.]

Mr Hussey: I stress, publican.

Mr Copeland: Oh, sorry. [Laughter.]

Mr Hussey: Madam Speaker, I would also ask you to note that if the issue goes to a vote, I will not take part in it because I have a pecuniary interest. [Laughter.]

The whole issue of surrender —

Mr Copeland: No surrender!

Mr Hussey: There is no surrender.

The whole issue of surrender is not just an issue for the trade. It affects a great deal in society. Arlene Foster told us that there are 1,938 current licences. If someone wants to open a new pub or off-sales, he must first purchase an existing licence and apply to the court for a new licence by surrendering the existing licence.

The court can then decide whether to grant a new licence for the new premises. However, let us not forget that the liquor licence is being granted to a person who must prove his or her suitability to hold such a licence.

The Department for Social Development's (DSD) consultation document 'Liquor Licensing — The Way Forward' proposes removing the requirement to purchase an existing licence. It is obvious, as Members have stressed today, that controlling access to alcohol and the number of outlets that sell alcohol is one of the ways to reduce alcohol-related harm and social disorder.

Mr McGlone referred to the six licensing objectives. How do they address the issue of protecting, for example, children from harm and protecting public health? The proposals are not fit even to meet the Government's objectives.

What will removing the requirement to surrender existing licences mean? Mr McCarthy talked about the problem of there being a public house on every corner. That is not the issue, because the people who run public houses must be suitable and will, normally, be extremely responsible. There are training courses galore for those people who are involved in the licensed trade. They are professionals.

The problem with alcohol comes from the fact that every corner shop, convenience store and amusement arcade will be able to apply for licences, thus ensuring easier access to alcohol for under-age drinkers, which in turn leads to, as my Friend Mr Beggs said, increased pressure on policing and health services.

A particular issue with the young is not that they can go into a pub or club to buy alcohol; rather it is that someone goes down to the local off-sales and buys it for them. The young people do not necessarily buy the alcohol themselves. A lot of young people start drinking in their own homes. Those issues must be addressed.

The economic impact of introducing the proposed legislation can be summarised. There is quite a list of potential impacts, and I suppose that my focusing on them is due to self-interest. The first impact would be reduced investment in existing licensed premises, as a result of the abolition of surrender and the subsequent loss of value of liquor licences. In those circumstances, if publicans were to approach their banks for a wheen of extra pounds to do up their premises, they would find that they had lost the capital value of their assets.

Another impact would be increased investment by the large national pub chains in Northern Ireland. Although this would result in increased consumer choice, it has the potential to displace our smaller local pubs. In many cases, there is one, or perhaps a couple, of pubs in a village. They are the centre of the social lives of many villages. Mr McGlone referred to the rural situation and local pubs.

In Northern Ireland, licensees invest heavily in their premises. The current going rate for a liquor licence is approximately £140,000. The licence is, therefore, a substantial investment and is used generally as security for bank loans. If surrender were abolished, the licences would become worthless. The banking community is opposed to the proposals and believes that they would undermine future investment.

As stated by a Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone, another potential impact of the legislation would be fewer pubs with local character, which could have a negative impact on the tourism industry.

The legislation would result in the increased availability of alcohol at low prices in a larger number of premises, which would cause an increase in the economic costs to society. These would include costs associated with increased policing, the need to maintain public order in areas where there is a high concentration of licensed premises, and the additional costs to the Health Service of dealing with the consequences of alcohol abuse.

In England, a square mile in Nottingham city centre is home to 365 alcohol-selling outlets. Would Members like that in Belfast? Would they like that in Londonderry? I cannot see the logic behind allowing such a situation to arise.

4.45 pm

Members have referred to the administrative element of the introduction of the legislation. The main concern here is the move away from the judicial process. The district-council-administered liquor-licensing scheme proposed in the DSD consultation document would be less effective, accessible and accountable than the current system.

Courts have applied the current legislation equally and fairly, and in a transparent and consistent manner. Councils will be forced to grant new licences because they may not be able to afford to refuse them or to fund appeals in court. Mr Weir referred to that issue, and he was perfectly correct. In Brighton, a council had to pull out of the appeals system because it was up against one of the big outlets. As Mr Weir rightly said, such companies have the cash and will fight the bit out.

The experiences of England and Scotland have demonstrated that councils can be ineffective in blocking applications for licences and for additional hours. Those Members who sit on councils know how difficult it can be to refuse a licence for an amusement arcade if such a business is to be sited near a school or a bus station where kids gather. One can object and hold up the process for a while, but that is all. The situation with liquor licences will be exactly the same.

Although the number and type of liquor licences could, no doubt, be streamlined, the removal of the various categories of licence and their replacement with one type of premises licence will mean that different responsibilities and rights will no longer attach to different types of licence. That will lead to a proliferation of pubs, and the potential for off-sales to sell alcohol until 2.00 am. People seem to think that everyone in the trade wants to stay open until 2.00 am. At the moment, one can sell alcohol, if one is granted extended hours, until 1.00 am, with clearing out of patrons by 1.30 am. Publicans do not want to do that seven nights a week, and if they are doing it, they must provide either food or entertainment. In other words, they have to give their patrons a reason other than booze for going to the pub — they are going for entertainment, for a meal or whatever. That is not a requirement of the new legislation.

My time is coming to a close, so I shall look finally and specifically at health. The core argument is that easier access to alcohol will lead to increased levels of social disorder, alcohol-related harm and health problems. All are agreed. The Western Drugs and Alcohol Co-ordination Team has stated:

“Research tells us that limiting availability is one positive strategy.”

The Western Investing for Health Partnership (WIFH) has stated:

“WIFH are concerned that by abolishing the surrender principle it will open a floodgate for new licence premises and thereby increase the availability of alcohol and increase the number of premises that would require policing.”

The argument has been well made to the Government. I appeal to Members to deliver to the Government the message that we wish to deal with this matter when the Assembly is back in place. This is a local matter that we as local people wish to address.

Mr Donaldson: I pay tribute to those Members who participated in the debate. I thank Dr Birnie for moving the cross-party motion. I believe that there is consensus in the House on this issue.

The debate has been brief but good. We have gone to the heart of the matter, and good points have been raised. Some Members have rightly identified concerns about the increasing problems of alcohol abuse and the harm that that can create in society. I had the misfortune just a few days ago to attend the funeral of an acquaintance who, sadly, had an alcohol addiction. He left behind four beautiful young girls, the eldest of whom is just 11 years old. I remember the anguish, pain and agony of that family as they watched a father and a husband laid to rest. Alcohol can do a lot of harm — of that there is no doubt.

Every day of every week, I deal, as many Members do, with antisocial behaviour caused by young people who abuse alcohol. As elected representatives, we must ensure that we take reasonable steps to protect the community and encourage a responsible approach to alcohol. That is why for once, Madam Speaker, the DUP is prepared to abandon its traditional principle of “no surrender”. I am only sorry that the hon Members — or the not so hon Members — opposite are not here to hear me say that. It might have cheered them up a bit.

Mr Weir: People sometimes say that there has been no progress in this country, but today the DUP is joining others in defending the pub trade. I think that that would count as progress in many people's eyes.
[Laughter.]

Mr Donaldson: I will not report Peter Weir to Dr Paisley on that one. [Laughter.]

The licensed trade in Northern Ireland takes a responsible approach to these issues. I have worked closely with the Federation of the Retail Licensed Trade in Northern Ireland. I pay tribute to the federation for its excellent work, responsible approach, professional attitude and common sense, which is sadly lacking in the Department. I am sure that other Members will join me in paying tribute to the federation. It has ably represented its members in this discussion, and it has succeeded in bringing about cross-party consensus.

The DUP is opposed to ending the surrender principle for the distribution of licences in Northern Ireland. The party believes that if the principle were to be dispensed with, it would harm the trade and the public. I can divine no benefit that that would bring to society. I have discussed the matter at length with the Minister with responsibility for social development, and none of the arguments put forward by the Department or the Minister has convinced me that it is prudent and sensible to remove the surrender principle.

The Evangelical Alliance, which represents many Christian Churches in Northern Ireland, responded to the proposals on liquor licence reform. It pointed up the need to protect our children and young people from the harm caused by excessive intake of alcohol. Like many other organisations, it opposes the abolition of the surrender principle.

Other social partners have also taken a responsible approach. No body of opinion in Northern Ireland supports the Department on this matter. No substantive voice in the debate stands alongside the Department and backs its view that the sensible way forward is to have what amounts to a free-for-all. The Member for West Tyrone Mr Hussey, with his personal knowledge of the trade, has rightly identified some of the problems that would ensue should the surrender requirement be removed.

Self-regulation of the trade has, undoubtedly, been valuable and responsible. In other areas of life, self-regulation has not worked. However, the clear facts are there: in Northern Ireland, self-regulation, in the form of the surrender principle, works. There is an old principle that says that if it is not broken, do not fix it, which applies to this situation.

We have heard how the removal of the surrender principle will affect existing licensees, many of whom have invested heavily in their businesses and used their licence as security for bank loans; indeed, their licence is their pension. At the stroke of a pen, the Minister could remove that and place those licensees in very vulnerable positions.

The experience in the rest of the United Kingdom draws me to the conclusion that this is not the way to go. I sometimes wish that our direct-rule Ministers would reflect on the benefits of what is in place in Northern Ireland and not try to impose policies that they have experimented with in other parts of the United Kingdom and that have, quite frankly, failed. In supermarkets in Scotland, for example, beer is cheaper than water.

Mr Kennedy: How do you know? [Laughter.]

Mr Donaldson: I am reliably informed. [Laughter.]

I do not have the power to turn the water into beer, however.

The difficulty is that young people walk into supermarkets and take alcohol from the shelves, or get someone to do it for them. Alcohol is inexpensive, which results in more young people developing alcohol addictions. That creates problems for our society. We see those problems every day. Antisocial behaviour has an impact on communities. However, the greatest impacts of all are the broken lives and the young lives that are being damaged, in some cases irreparably.

The retail licensed trade in Northern Ireland takes a responsible attitude. We have heard that from the representatives of the federation that we have met. They do not want proliferation; they do not want young people to find themselves in a difficult situation. By and large, people in the trade act responsibly. However, if the market is opened up, resulting in a proliferation of off-licences, supermarkets selling alcohol and more pubs and clubs on our streets, opportunities for young people to access and abuse alcohol will significantly increase. It will lead to consequences for the licensed trade in Northern Ireland and for society as a whole.

I commend the motion to the House. At its core is the view that it should be for this body to determine the way forward in respect of liquor licences and the surrender principle. Last July, the Minister for Social Development wrote to me to say that the final decision on this matter would be taken by a devolved Assembly, should restoration be successful. The Minister has accepted the principle that it is for this Assembly to take the decision, and there is consensus in the House that we want to be able to take that decision. Therefore, through this motion, we urge the Government not to proceed with the proposed abolition of the surrender principle for liquor licences and to leave the matter to be dealt with by a restored Northern Ireland Assembly.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly calls upon the Minister with responsibility for the Department for Social Development to ensure that no action will be taken with regard to furthering the proposed abolition of the "surrender principle" for liquor licences, as proposed by the Northern Ireland Liquor Licensing review; and further calls for this issue to be dealt with by a restored Northern Ireland Assembly.

Tie-up Aid

5.00 pm

Mr Shannon: I beg to move

That this Assembly calls upon the Minister with responsibility for Agriculture and Rural Development to implement a Tie-Up Aid package for fishermen in Northern Ireland affected by the spring closure of the Irish Sea.

I look forward to debating this issue. It is the last debate of the day, but it is nonetheless a very important one.

I am sure that we have all been reading about the 17 fishermen and boat owners from the Province who recently appeared in Liverpool Crown Court for misdeclarations of landings of fish. Members will also have read about the alleged £1.5 million that was netted by those men.

I would like to paint a very different picture. These men have watched their livelihoods being slowly torn from their grasp. They did not wish to defraud their Government but wrongly felt that they were doing no real harm. They under-declared their earnings to the taxmen by some £400,000, but, due to the incongruous rulings laid down by the EU directives, had misrepresented this on their EU forms.

I am not citing that to attempt in any way to absolve those men of anything, but I am citing the dire straits that our fishermen find themselves in — and it is important to do that.

Tha bare facts er, that because o' tha houl bak oan white fishin, an in tryin tae bring bak tha cod stocks, an tha cloasur an no bein alood tae fish in tha Irish Sea, tha fishermen haeny much chance o' feedin ther families wi'-oot help. Its no that ther lazy, er dinae want tae adapt. But its becaus tha EU er issuin seeminly impaossible tae meet directives. Directives which mean that fer 10 weeks tha boats er banned fae fishin, this is 10 weeks that tha families o' oor trawlers hae tae pit up wi'oot a wage. Hoo caun this be richt.

Whun thes restrictions wur pit oan tha Scots: ther DARD gien them tie-up packages tae enable them tae survive. Sumthin which DARD did iver heer fer a when o' yeers, an then they stapt daein it, fer they saed it wus rang an agin tha law, an it wusnae coast effective.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Shannon: Thank you.

Due to the restrictions on white fishing and the closure of the Irish Sea in an attempt to renew cod stocks, fishermen have a very small chance of feeding their families without help. It is not that they are lazy or refuse to adapt; it is that the EU is issuing seemingly futile directives that mean that the boats are banned from fishing for 10 weeks — that is 10 weeks during which the families of our trawlermen are expected to do without a wage. How can that be right?

When the restrictions were applied to the Scots, their equivalent Department issued them with tie-up packages to enable them to survive. The Department of Agriculture and Rural Development (DARD) did that here for a few years and then stopped — first, it said that it was illegal and then that it was not cost-effective. Doing what is right is rarely the cheap option, and that is the case here also, but that does not negate the fact that these men are being stopped from doing their jobs. They are not choosing this, and they should not be penalised for it.

It has been said that the increase in the quota for other fish stocks, such as nephrops, should enable the fishermen to transfer to fishing those stocks. However, some vehicles do not easily lend themselves to that transfer. It must also be noted that were the entire white-fish fleet to be transferred, it is probable that in a short space of time the situation would be the same again.

In 1999, over 40 trawlers fished for white fish full time; in 2006, that figure had dwindled to eight. How much lower can that figure sink, with no action being taken to address the problem? The refusal of the Government to give grant aid to the fishermen of the Northern Ireland fish fleet is clearly down to Government Ministers. The fishermen have referred this matter to the European Ombudsman, and I hope that they are successful in their claim.

It is the duty of this Assembly to ensure that these men are not left high and dry again. Fishing has been a mainstay of our Province for centuries, and it would be wrong for it to die out now due to the decisions made by people in Brussels who do not understand — or even care to understand — our fishermen and the problems that they encounter in their livelihoods.

Fishin seems tae be a deein traed in tha proavince — while expandin an increesin in Iceland an Nordic watters as oor restrictshun er ther bonuses. Tha drift awa fae fishin o'tha youn is perticularly worrin, an tae fue tha gap Lithuanian an Polish workers er takin ther place. They aw what fue tiem worrk, then they move untae new pastures whun it canny be fun. Whor wull the nixt generation o' fishermen cum fae unless we caun prove it is a viable career fer oor youn. No jist a joab fae tha guid ool daes.

Fishing seems to be a dying career in the Province, yet it flourishes in Iceland and in Nordic waters, as our restrictions are their fishermen's bonuses. That young people are drifting away from fishing is particularly worrying. To fill that gap, Lithuanian and Polish workers are taking their place. They all want full-time work, but move on to new pastures when it cannot be found. Where will the next generation of fishermen come from unless we can prove that it is a viable career for our young people and not merely a job from the good old days?

It must be understood that the EU has not only decreased the amount of fish that can be caught — thereby reducing fishermen's income — but has almost eradicated the confidence that those hard-working men have in the Government. The measures that have been implemented have been for the benefit of no one bar the scientists whose grants are continually funded without question.

The morale of the fishing industry is at its lowest point for years. Although the Department has paid attention to the information supplied by scientists, who flag up statistics that they find, it is vital that the practical, hands-on knowledge of fishermen be given equal credence. When fish stocks appear on scanners, it cannot be ignored. No matter the results that scientists have come up with, the fact remains that fishermen are seeing huge shoals of fish that they cannot touch as they have been told that they do not exist.

Fishermen have been doing their jobs for a lot longer than the EU has been dictating to them. Their reports should carry the same weight as those of the scientists, if not more. It should also be noted that in Canada, which is seven years ahead of Northern Ireland in the cod-recovery programme, scientists are increasingly moving away from the notion that over-fishing has led to the problems. Indeed, scientists are now beginning to accept that the blame perhaps needs to be apportioned more to environmental changes and the fact that seals, for example, do not feel the need to adhere to regulations set by scientists and are fishing more than their fair share.

I wonder whether the EU will be as willing to take on board the views of those scientists as much as they accept every other report as gospel. We want some fish to remain in the sea, but some fishermen who work every day that they are allowed know their limits and that of the sea. The livelihood of the fishing community depends not only on the skill and ability of those fishermen but on their knowledge of the sea.

Fishermen's views must be expressed and be considered vital in any decisions on fishing quotas and the days on which they are entitled to fish. However, that is not the case. Fishermen have been pushed out of the trade, and we seem helpless to stop it happening. However, we cannot stand idly by and watch fishermen's businesses being destroyed without doing all that we can to help them.

Those facts show the problem that our fishermen are facing. It is not a self-inflicted problem, but one inflicted by faceless men. The men whom I see in the harbours are not faceless, but are the men with mortgages to pay, homes to heat and children to feed. They are the men whom Jim Allister represents in his attempts to make the legislators in Brussels see reason and realise what their futile directives do to people who depend on the Irish Sea for their living.

Fishermen are owed tie-up aid as much as farmers who are adversely affected by other EU directives are entitled to help, and as much as men who are made redundant from factories are owed redundancy packages by those who make them redundant.

The EU has promised to carry out a major review of its cod-recovery programme. If that review is open and honest, it should mean an end to such stringent EU controls. If so, tie-up aid will not be necessary for much longer. However, fishermen will not hold their breath in anticipation. Therefore, we must ensure that they are given the support and aid that they so richly deserve. It is in the power of the Assembly to demand that that support be granted without further petty excuse or vain procrastination.

It must be done now. I urge the Assembly to support the white fish fleet and the aid scheme.

Mr McNarry: It is interesting to note that those normally associated with fishy business are, given their absence, clearly not interested in the fishing business.

Rightly, we argue for local farmers, and we have indulged in some good debates recently, but the Assembly seldom has the opportunity to put the case for local fishermen. This debate is necessary, and I congratulate those who brought it forward.

The need for a tie-up aid package for white-fish fishermen arises because, under EU rules, the Northern Ireland white-fish fleet is banned from fishing cod from mid-February each year for around 10 weeks during the cod-spawning season. Under EU rules, the Government are permitted to pay compensatory aid to meet the boats' ongoing overheads and crewing costs. However, last year DARD, under Lord Rooker, claimed — among other things — that aid, having been paid in 2004 and 2005, was not permitted for a third year under EU legislation.

Notwithstanding this, six years on from the introduction of the cod-recovery scheme and closure of the Irish Sea cod stocks for a number of months during the year, there still is no indication as to whether it has been a success. Scientists are unable to tell us whether it has worked and whether the cod stocks are recovering. There is an absence of knowledge on the situation, yet decisions are being taken. The facts and figures constitute the case to be heard by the Government.

The Northern Ireland fishing fleet is a shadow of its former self. Hundreds of jobs have been lost; factories and business have disappeared; and this hit hard the communities that depended on the industry for their livelihood and for the value of that business to be spread among them.

In 1993, 213 commercial fishing fleets were registered in Northern Ireland. This has fallen to a staggering 130. In Portavogie, where there were once 100 boats, there are now only 40 — and they are struggling. Between 1999 and 2003 the average profit before depreciation of a Northern Ireland-based white-fish trawler fell by 76% to earnings of only £10,400. Since 2003 our fishermen have had to deal with other factors, such as acute rises in the cost of fuel and the cost of the leasing quota, with an income that is falling daily.

Why is this happening? The cod-recovery scheme was implemented six years ago on the basis that it would last for three years. The measures have been repeated each year since, and they were extended when the Scottish Executive — acting for the Scottish people — imposed a closure in the North Channel that targeted Northern Ireland trawlers.

The EU Commission has stated that additional recovery measures are needed only where there is biological urgency. Our fishermen may ask where the biological urgency is in the Irish Sea, where the science shows that stocks are nowhere near as low as was assumed. That is an ongoing argument.

DARD scientists — without a grain of evidence to justify the closure of the cod fishery — now say that they hold out little hope of the scheme ever being lifted.

If you were — as Jim Shannon would say — a young fella, a fisherman's son, in a situation that is similar to that of a young farmer who has been brought up on a farm, would you take on those risks and hardships for £10,400 a year, when there is no evidence that anyone is thinking about you or doing anything for you? That is the situation.

An associated issue is the barring of prawn boats from fishing in the area that has been closed as part of the cod fishery closure — because cod represents a substantial by-catch of prawns. When will DARD address that issue? Is it not reasonable that DARD should apologise for its interpretation of the legislation on the tie-up aid scheme? Can it not be argued that DARD's interpretation was wide of the mark?

Members have been informed that the decision to refuse aid was based on the fact that the scheme does not provide value for money. If that was the case, why was it being operated in 2004 and 2005? If it provided value for money in those two years, what has changed in 2006, and why can Members not have an answer to that question?

Is it not worth arguing that the fishing industry in Northern Ireland requires a team effort between DARD and those in the industry? Everywhere, voluntary coalitions are being encouraged — in the Assembly with respect to the Bain Report, and in the councils — but when it comes to getting people together, it seems that Departments under direct-rule control do not want to do anything on a voluntary basis. Why can there not be a team effort between the industry and DARD officials? Given the precarious state of the industry, it is crucial that fishermen, sellers, processors and the fisheries division of DARD work hand in hand to create a sustainable and viable fishing industry? Is that not what Members are asking for?

More effective science, information processing and results interpretation are required. However, to continue on the present course will lead to the destruction of the local fishing fleet. That will have a colossal impact on the lives of the people in the villages and communities that I mentioned earlier, which are bound together by the industry. Without the fishing industry, what would we have, other than blighted communities? The importance of retaining local communities and their environments was discussed in the debate on rural schools.

The bottom line is that Members should not be arguing about the creation of a tie-up scheme that is open only to a fraction of vessels, and we should not be scrambling around in an attempt to secure transitional aid. We must have a local Minister under devolution to deal with fisheries; a Minister who is committed to fight the corner of the local industry and represent, for the first time in years, the issues that fishermen need defended strongly in Europe, and who will bring those issues to the Government and Europe in a cohesive and coherent manner.

It should be done to facilitate the recovery of the local industry, not aid in its destruction. My premise is based on recovery, not destruction. This is not about aid for the sake of it; it is about the recovery of an important and valuable industry to Northern Ireland.

Members require answers to the serious points raised concerning the EU Common Fisheries Policy (CFP).

Notice of this debate and its outcome will be brought to the attention of the Secretary of State.

Ms Ritchie: I commend those Members who have tabled this timely motion on the fishing industry and, specifically, the need for tie-up or transitional aid for the white-fish fleet. Tie-up aid would ensure the provision of income for fishermen during the closure period this year from the end of February to April when some of the fishermen from the County Down ports of Ardglass, Kilkeel and Portavogie are prevented — due to EU regulations — from going to sea to fish, which is their job.

The fishing industry supports a substantial employment base and makes a substantial contribution to the local economy in Ardglass and Kilkeel, and that must be secured and sustained. Fishermen are the harvesters of the sea. They eke out their existence from the fruits of the sea in what are sometimes harsh conditions. The industry is located on and adjacent to the harbours. In South Down, the constituency that I represent, there is a fish processing plant in Ardglass and a larger base in Kilkeel.

Over the last number of years, County Down fishermen have encountered many problems and difficulties, and they have faced adversity well. The issues that they faced included quota restrictions for certain fish species, based on what might have been contrary scientific evidence; the closure of the Irish Sea for two months each year since 2000; the income arrangements for share fishermen; fuel increases; competition from other countries; and the difficulties of an angry and intolerant sea, which has taken the lives of several fishermen from the Ardglass and Kilkeel communities since 2000.

Running in parallel with those factors has been the task force for the County Down fishermen that was established by Downing Street in December 2002. That task force has provided funding for regeneration and revitalisation projects in Ardglass, Kilkeel and Annalong, which are now under way. However, there is a need to provide other forms of support and sustenance to those involved in the fishing industry. Substantial financial assistance in the order of £30 million must be provided for the further development of Kilkeel harbour in order to secure safety for its fishermen. Efforts must continue to secure the fishing industry in the ports of Ardglass and Kilkeel and to provide comprehensive training schemes for all fishermen through the development of a local college. Those provisions would give certainty to young people that fishing was a worthwhile, commendable occupation and a profession for life.

Six years ago, the Assembly debated the provision of tie-up or transitional aid to part of the Northern Ireland fishing industry, and today we return to that matter. In December 1999, the European Union's Fisheries and Maritime Affairs Commissioner decided to impose the first European cod-recovery scheme. The Irish Sea was the first European waters to have such a scheme applied. In the opinion of fisheries scientists, overfishing had reduced the stock of cod in the Irish Sea and measures were required to reverse that process.

During January 2000, a series of meetings was held to discuss the practical measures that would be included in the Irish Sea cod-recovery programme. The main tool applied was the temporary sea area closure in the Irish Sea, and that was targeted at Northern Ireland's white-fish fleet, which was charged with inflicting damage on the cod stock. This year will see the eighth such temporary closure applied in the Irish Sea and the seventh accompanying closure applied by the Scottish Executive in the River Clyde, and that is also targeted at Northern Irish vessels from the County Down ports.

It is worth noting, and it has been mentioned by other Members, that tie-up aid was provided by the Scottish Executive to Scotland's white-fish fleet during 2003, and that decision was a significant factor in influencing the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development to implement such a scheme here in 2004 and 2005.

In 2005, 16 local trawlers benefited from the temporary tie-up scheme. However, in 2006 the Department refused to pay the tie-up money on the basis that European Union rules dictated that it could not be paid for more than two years. That was proven to be incorrect, but DARD then varied its excuse for non-payment, claiming that the aid scheme did not represent value for money.

The Irish Sea is the only European sea where such a closure has a direct impact on a fishing fleet. In the Irish Sea, the closure has been accompanied since 2005 by restrictions on the number of days that fishing vessels may spend at sea. Quotas for the major white-fish stocks have been slashed, and additional technical conservation measures have been applied to all sectors of the fleet.

What has been the result for the fishing industry? The introduction of closure means a restriction on the number of days for fishing. That began with the famous The Sea Fish Licensing (Time at Sea) (Principles) Order 1993. Since 2000, a large part of the Irish Sea has been closed to directed white-fish fisheries, usually from 14 February to 30 April — almost 12 weeks. Here is a stark statistic: in 1999, there were 40 local trawlers that spent the majority of the year targeting white fish; in 2006, that has been reduced to eight. White-fish trawlers have been decommissioned, sold or, in some cases, modified to fish for other stocks, such as nephrops.

This is a landmark year. The European Union is committed to a major review of its cod-recovery programmes. If that review is genuine, the closure will be removed. Fishery scientists have said that closure is not working. Increasingly, factors such as climate change and predation on fish stocks have been seen as more important than overfishing. Only this morning, Eddie McGrady, the Member of Parliament for South Down, told me that he had received a letter from the current Minister, which reads:

“My Department is currently working on an appraisal of options for ‘tie-up aid’ for the 2007 spring cod closure. I will want to consider a range of factors including value for money and sustainability and competing resource pressures before arriving at my decision. I intend to make an announcement before the closure begins.”

I hope that the Minister makes a positive announcement that provides tie-up aid. Equally, I hope that the European Union will end the closure permanently. It does not work, and it impacts on the fishing industry in County Down and on many, many families — not just those involved in fishing. It has wide repercussions throughout County Down.

Other points are also worth noting and provide balance in the debate. While the quota for nephrops has been increased, and scientists describe that fishery as sustainable, nephrop fishing vessels too have had their days at sea reduced. Restrictions have been imposed on the fishing gear that they can use, and they are restricted, to some extent, by closure. That situation needs to be acknowledged, but no one should forget that the closure has been imposed on the white-fish fleet. What can those fishermen do, when going to sea is not a financial option?

I urge the Minister with responsibility for fisheries to continue his work on behalf of the fishing industry, to complete his review of the options as quickly as possible, and to ensure that tie-up aid is made available to fishermen in the County Down ports this year. Other forms of sustenance and protection must be found for those engaged in the industry.

The Assembly must commit itself to the fishing industry, to the fishermen, to the fish producers' organisations, and to those involved in fish processing. On the restoration of the political institutions, we must ensure that the fishing industry is given a high priority; that the local Minister is directly involved in annual quota negotiations in London and Brussels; that he or she has a place at the negotiating table, rather than sitting behind the British Minister; and that an all-party sea fisheries group is established in the Assembly after 7 March.

5.30 pm

Madam Speaker, in conclusion I wish to thank you and your officials for the courtesy and kindness shown to the SDLP and myself.

Madam Speaker: I wish to thank the Member for her remarks.

Mr McCarthy: As mentioned earlier, this is the last round-up of the Assembly. I wish to take the opportunity to thank my colleagues on the Business Committee who, at the last meeting, agreed with me to bring this important motion to the Assembly. I say that for two reasons; of course the issue is important because it affects my constituency and that of Margaret Ritchie, Jim Shannon and Jim Wells. I beg David McNarry's pardon and include him too.

Mr Kennedy: Why is the motion not in the Member's name then?

Mr McCarthy: The fact that the motion is in the names of Jim Shannon and Jim Wells does not mean we are not supporting it; we are.

The second reason is that a certain Gentleman in the House has the record for being the last Member to speak in previous Assemblies. I knew when bringing the motion forward that that man would be delighted to keep that record up, and he will have the opportunity to do that.

Mr Shannon: What about talking about the fishing?

Mr McCarthy: I know that, and I am coming to the topic of the debate now. This is the last debate after all.

Mr McNarry: Jeffrey Donaldson has a better record.

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr McCarthy: Returning to the important issue of the fishing industry in Northern Ireland, it is an important area of economic activity and has been for many years. The areas of Portavogie, Ardglass and Kilkeel in particular have been the hubs of the fishing fleet, providing work and first-class products not only for Northern Ireland but throughout the world over many years.

I wish to point out to Members, who already know this, how dangerous and dirty the work is. A number of local fishermen have been lost in our water recently, and that is the case too in the South of Ireland. At least seven people are unaccounted for in Waterford, and Members must offer sympathy and hope to the families of those people. That is a tragedy in any circumstance.

In recent years, our fishing industry has unfortunately been in decline. That is not the fault of the fishermen or women engaged in the work but because of the restrictions imposed by Europe and our own Department. Those restrictions have been ongoing for years, and I have to say that they have not been for the better. Almost every year, a tighter and more restrictive directive has been handed down. That is having a devastating effect on the industry — both at sea and in the processing factories in our fishing villages. I would like to pay tribute to those fishermen who have stuck the pace and provided an industry against all the odds. I also pay tribute to the representations made on behalf of that industry — for its determination to campaign at all levels and at every opportunity to improve the livelihood of our fishermen.

The motion is calling for a tie-up aid package to cover the enforced spring closure — bearing in mind that that is a forced closure. Men want to do their work; they want to provide for their families; and they want to provide employment; however, they are being denied all that by officialdom. Surely that same authority owes it to the fishermen to provide finance for the time when they are denied a chance to earn a living. It would appear that fishermen from other areas of Europe are better provided for than our Northern Irish fishermen. The sooner we have a profitable, thriving and healthy industry returned to Northern Ireland the better.

I wish to finish by reiterating what my colleague David McNarry said — that the sooner we have a local, accountable Minister to deal with fisheries, who is committed to fight the industry's corner, the better.

I appeal to those parties that have it in their hands to get the Assembly up and running in March on behalf of everybody in Northern Ireland to do just that. I support the motion.

Madam Speaker: I think that I should adjourn the sitting now. However, I call Mr Wells to make the winding-up speech. [Laughter.]

Mr Wells: Madam Speaker, it is a strange fate — if one believes in fate — that I find myself the last Member to speak in the last debate in this Assembly. As Members know, in 1976, I was the last person to leave the Public Gallery when the Northern Ireland Constitutional Convention collapsed, after which there was nothing for six years. In 1986, I was the last Member to speak in the Prior Assembly, after which there was no Assembly for 12 years.

Mr McNarry: Sit down, Jim. [Laughter.]

Mr Wells: In 1995, I was the last person in the Building before it burned down. It was closed for three years after that.

Mr Kennedy: Is there any truth in the rumour that Nuala O'Loan is investigating that case? [Laughter.]

Mr Wells: I was not interviewed.

I was also the last Member to speak in October 2002 before the Assembly collapsed for almost four years. I could be charitable and give way to a Member a few seconds before the end of my fifteenth minute and save the Assembly, or I could go on and cast it into doom and gloom for another four or five years. Members will just have to wait to see what I will do.

Some serious issues have been debated. We are debating a serious subject: the livelihood of people who put their lives at risk to go out to sea in difficult times, some of whom have paid the ultimate sacrifice. One of my sad duties has been to attend the funerals of those who have given their lives to provide us with our food, and other Members for South Down and Strangford have had to do the same. Having gone through all those difficulties, it is very sad that we are once again pleading for our Government to provide some form of compensation for denying those people their livelihood.

Most Members' contributions had a common theme. I was glad to hear Jim Shannon speaking Ulster Scots. It is always refreshing to hear him — one of our few experts on that language — reviving a language that is an important part of our culture. Mr Shannon spoke of the 10 weeks of hardship that those who work in the white-fish trawler industry in Northern Ireland faced. He also painted a very different picture to the one that came out of the court case in Liverpool. He painted a picture of men — it is mostly men who are involved in the trawler industry — being driven to despair, unable make ends meet.

I looked at the economics of the recovery plan. When I looked at fishing quotas, the days spent at sea and the escalating cost of running a trawler, it became clear that the figures in the recovery plan would never add up. It was impossible to make a profit because of the constraints that the Government and the EU Fisheries Council had set. Therefore why was it a big surprise to Government officials to discover that, in order to make a livelihood, men were driven to extreme measures? The picture that Mr Shannon painted was very useful.

Mr Shannon also mentioned the fact that the Scottish Executive have been targeting Northern Ireland fishermen with their cod-recovery plan, which prevents Northern Ireland's fishermen from fishing in the Firth of Clyde. He also questioned, as did other Members, the reliability of scientific research. I received an email recently from Mr Allister, one of our MEPs, who said that that issue was to be addressed in a forthcoming conference organised by the EU. It wants to find out whether overfishing or global warming is to blame for the reduction in fish supplies. Is it the case that we now have different currents as a result of changes in sea temperatures and that our cod stocks have not decreased but have moved to different parts of the ocean, where they cannot be caught? It would be a terrible indictment of the scientists if we were to discover that, over the past seven years, the reduction in fish stocks was not the fishermen's fault at all but was down to issues over which we have very little control.

Mr Shannon made a valid point about the difference in support from one section of DARD compared with another. For example, single farm payments in 2006 came to £210 million. That is a huge amount of money that was given to our farmers, and Members would support their receiving those payments. However, if a tiny fraction of that money were given to our sea-fish industry, it would mean a huge boat boost for that part of our economy.

Indeed, when tie-up aid was paid in 2005, it amounted to only £860,000. As a result of the decline in the white-fish industry, that figure is probably £400,000 to £500,000. We are talking about a tiny amount of money in comparison to DARD's overall budget.

Mr McNarry made a very useful contribution to the debate. He made the valid point that the fishing fleet was a shadow of its former self. I was first elected to take a seat in this Building in 1982, and on the Twelfth of July that year, when all the boats were in the harbour in Kilkeel, it was possible to walk from one side of the harbour to the other on the top of the boats that were moored there. I was in the harbour on the Twelfth of July last year, and I would have drowned very quickly had I attempted that feat. There were only a tiny number of trawlers there compared to those that I remember. I visited Portavogie 20 years ago and witnessed a similar situation. Those are graphic examples of the decline of our seafish industry.

Mr McNarry quoted some useful statistics. He said that in 1993 there were 200 trawlers, and that now there are only 130. There has been an even more dramatic fall of over 60% in the Portavogie fleet. Those statistics reveal the difficulties that our fishing industry is facing. Mr McNarry raised the issue of the Scottish Executive's cod-recovery plan and the problems that that is causing for our trawlermen.

Mr McNarry also mentioned the mistake that Lord Rooker, the then Minister with responsibility for agriculture and rural development, made in his reading of the regulations on the payment of tie-up aid. Members will know that aid was provided in 2004 and 2005, but not in 2006. Mr McNarry failed to mention that it was the diligent DUP MEP for Northern Ireland, Jim Allister, who used his capable legal brain to examine that legislation.

As a result of his correspondence with the Minister and the European Fisheries Commissioner, Mr Allister was able to expose the fact that the Government made a mistake. Indeed, I have a letter from the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development admitting that the Government got it wrong. In 2006, our fishermen were denied their rightful claim to tie-up aid. I congratulate Jim Allister on his work, not just because he is a DUP MEP, but because he has done a great service to our fishing community. I have taken a case to the Assembly Ombudsman and Northern Ireland Commissioner for Complaints, Mr Tom Frawley, on behalf of the Kilkeel fishermen, urging him to rule that there was maladministration and that those fishermen should receive compensation. We all wait with great interest for Mr Frawley's decision.

Mr McNarry also raised the issue of more effective science and the need for a fisheries Minister. I shall be slightly controversial for a moment. We had our own Minister in Northern Ireland who looked after fisheries: Brid Rodgers. I have to be fair and state that I found her to be extremely responsive and extremely good. I remember the terrible drownings of the three members of the Greene family in a tragic accident in the Irish Sea. The news broke on a Sunday afternoon of a massive search-and-rescue effort, and Ms Rodgers came straight down to the harbour in Kilkeel to meet those involved in the attempted rescue. I was very impressed by that.

Having scored political points on behalf of the DUP, we should be fair and say that a locally accountable Minister is good for the fisheries industry in Northern Ireland. The difficulty is how to get to the situation in which we can have our own devolved Minister. However, when we did have one, it was good for the Department and for the industry, and we had a voice in Strasbourg and Brussels at the December EU Fisheries Councils.

It would be entirely inappropriate not to mention the disgraceful situation last year, when Lord Rooker did not even have time to negotiate on behalf of Northern Ireland's fishermen. He was too busy; but Mr Allister checked Lord Rooker's diary on the House of Lords website and found that he had not been as busy as he had first suggested, and could have hopped on the plane to Brussels to represent our fishermen. I am glad to say that David Cairns, the current Minister with responsibility for agriculture and rural development, went to last December's EU Fisheries Council and did his best in a difficult situation. That was recognised by those involved in the fishing industry.

Margaret Ritchie spoke about the income of fishermen in Ardglass, Kilkeel and Portavogie. I missed some of Margaret's contribution, but I am sure that I will be able to read it word-for-word in next week's 'Down Recorder' as I always do. It is guaranteed that Margaret is not shy about feeding her statements and speeches to that august journal.

Mr Kennedy: What about yourself?

Mr Wells: I have been known to do it, occasionally. [Laughter.]

Ms Ritchie also made a valid point when she mentioned the combination of the cod-recovery plan and all the other factors that the white-fish industry has had to endure, which have had a detrimental effect. Those factors, together with the number of days spent at sea and the problem of quotas, have conspired to reduce the potential of the industry.

5.45 pm

Ms Ritchie quoted from a letter that the Minister sent to Mr McGrady, a copy of which I also received. I welcome the fact that the Minister is considering the payment of tie-up aid, which is good news for all concerned. However, I hope that if he decides to do so, he will not repeat what he did in 2004, when aid was announced after the tie-up period had commenced. The tie-up period usually runs from 14 February, St Valentine's Day — a date that tends to stick in most people's minds — to the end of April. Clarity is needed now; if the Minister is going to make a decision, let him do so before St Valentine's Day, because a quick decision is important. As far as the European Union is concerned, there is no good legal reason why that aid cannot be paid.

No one has mentioned it this afternoon, but it has always amazed me that 75% of tie-up aid is directly funded by the EU. Moreover, the tie-up aid is taxable and reduces the amount of required surveillance by the Fisheries Division in the Irish Sea. Therefore, it does not cost the taxpayer a single penny. Given that the money — it is only £500,000 or £600,000 — is available, why on earth can the fishermen not be paid?

Mr Allister has demonstrated that, technically, the money can be paid. Therefore, pressure should be put on the Minister to pay up immediately. I still want him to address what happened in 2006. His officials gave bad advice that led to the non-payment of tie-up aid that should have been paid. I like to think that there may even be the possibility of pressure being put on the Minister so that the aid can be given retrospectively.

I was interested in, and intrigued by, Ms Ritchie's suggestion of an all-party committee on the sea-fish industry at Stormont. I wish that I had thought of that, and if I could get to a local paper, I would try to sell that as my original idea. [Laughter.]

After 7 March 2007, when I hope that most of us will be back at Stormont, the representatives of the industry and the MLAs for Strangford and South Down should get together to work on that idea. I am grateful for her suggestion.

It is always a delight to hear from Mr McCarthy. It is because of him that I am the last Member to speak, but, as Members know, there was no collusion. I am grateful to him for suggesting the motion. It is sad that such an important issue for the coastal communities of large parts of Northern Ireland has not exactly attracted a large number of MLAs, although even as I speak a party leader has arrived, which is a good sign. It is a pity that the debate has been so poorly attended. However, it does not beat my record. In the Northern Ireland Assembly, I hold the record for the smallest attendance in the Chamber. Four Members attended the debate on my motion on the Ballynahinch bypass: the Minister, the Speaker, one other MLA and me. In my local newspaper, I was able to say that I was speaking to a hushed Assembly. I hope that I will not have to say that again; the number of Members attending is somewhat better today.

I am grateful to Alderman McCarthy for paying tribute to those in the fishing industry who have paid the ultimate sacrifice, particularly from the Strangford area. We must keep reminding ourselves that sea fishing is a deadly serious profession, and people have lost their lives in terribly difficult situations.

If something is not done soon, Northern Ireland faces the demise of its white-fish industry. I hope that if it is not possible to offer tie-up aid in 2007 — I hope that it will be — a diversification grant at least can be offered to enable those trawlers that can move on to fishing for other prey species, such as prawns, to do so. However, not every trawler can do that. Therefore, if Members decide to go down that road, an additional decommissioning scheme must be introduced, because many trawlers are up to their necks in debt.

Mr Kennedy: Does the Member accept that a decommissioning scheme brought forward by a new Assembly would be best? Does he share the hope of those of us who remain in the Chamber that we can achieve devolution so that we may appoint a Minister who will supervise such a decommissioning system for the benefit of the fishermen of County Down and all the people in Northern Ireland who fish? [Laughter.]

Madam Speaker: That was very good.

I would not like to annoy my Deputy Speaker. He could just say that he supports the motion.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly calls upon the Minister with responsibility for Agriculture and Rural Development to implement a Tie-Up Aid package for fishermen in Northern Ireland affected by the spring closure of the Irish Sea.

ASSEMBLY BUSINESS

Tributes to Madam Speaker; Bound Volumes of Hansard; and Standing Orders

Sir Reg Empey: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Is it in order, on behalf of my party and, I hope, many others, to thank you for the contribution that you have made in difficult circumstances since May of last year? It is our hope that you remain in position until we can re-examine the issue. I wish to put on record our thanks to you and to the Assembly staff for your contribution to maintaining this institution in recent months.

Mr A Maginness: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. I should like to follow the contribution from the leader of the Ulster Unionist Party in paying tribute, on behalf of the SDLP group in the Assembly, to your work as Speaker. It has been a short time, but not without significance. That is important to remember. Furthermore, your contribution as a Member of the Assembly over many years has been outstanding. You have worked conscientiously and brought many issues to our attention, particularly social issues. That reflects your personal commitment to politics and to ordinary people. On behalf of the SDLP group I thank you for your good humour, firmness and courtesy as Speaker. We wish you well in the near future and in your retirement.

Mr Weir: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. In a desperate attempt to ensure that Jim Wells does not get the last word, I want to associate myself with those expressions of gratitude. As we represent the same constituency, I am aware not just of your contribution in the Chamber over the years but also of your hard work in North Down; you will be greatly missed in that capacity.

Many of us will depart the Chamber without leaving any great personal legacy, but that cannot be said of you. Even the fact that we now have a permanent Christmas tree is something to be proud of. Given the difficult circumstances of recent months, we all want to commend your work and to wish you and your family all the best in your departure from this place — perhaps “retirement” is the wrong word. On behalf of the Democratic Unionist Party I thank you for your courtesy.

Mr McCarthy: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. Will I be the last to speak? Sorry about that, Jim. On behalf of my party I offer my sincere thanks for your work not only in this Assembly but throughout the years that I have known you. You, Derek and your family have added a great deal to politics in Northern Ireland. I have to say that only the best comes from the Alliance Party.

Mr Wells: As Deputy Speaker, it has been a pleasure and a privilege to serve under you. You have guided the Assembly through extremely difficult times. I understand, mind you, that this is not your swansong: you will be back on the first day of the next Assembly. However, it has been a privilege — and I am sure that I can speak for the other Deputy Speaker — to serve under you.

Mr Hussey: Madam Speaker — [Laughter.]

Madam Speaker: Do you have a point of order, Mr Hussey? [Laughter.]

Mr Hussey: Yes. On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I wish to refer to Standing Order 2(a). [Laughter.]

Of course, I wish to be associated with the remarks that have been made, but I do have a couple of items of business to leave with you as we depart this place, some hoping to return, and others moving on to do other things.

Can you confirm whether Members will receive Bound Volumes of the Hansard reports of proceedings, as happened in the old Assembly? Secondly, and you will appreciate my asking this, when an Assembly is reconvened, will it operate under the original Standing Orders?

Madam Speaker: Thank you for those points of order. The answer to your first question is a short and sweet yes. The answer to the second is that the Standing Orders that we are operating under now are Standing Orders for the Transitional Assembly, and they will apply until restoration occurs. At that point, the restored Assembly will be subject to the new Standing Orders on which the Standing Orders Committee has been working.

Before I adjourn formally, may I say thank you, Members, for your totally unexpected remarks. I am touched by them. I would not have been here, and I could not have been the Speaker that you say I have been, without the wonderful help and support of the staff here. On my first day as Speaker, I remember well coming in here terrified — and you all know why I was terrified — at the thought of facing the 107 of you for the first time. I was only able to come in with confidence because of the help that I received from the staff. I hope that that help will continue to be offered.

As my Deputy Speaker said, this is not my last sitting. I will be here when Members come to sign the Roll of Membership, and I hope to be able to hand over to a new Speaker when, hopefully, devolution is restored at the end of March.

I thank you all. It has been a pleasure working with you, and I feel extremely privileged to have done so. I am aware of the hard work that you all do, in spite of what the media says. Strictly speaking, I should not say this, but I will anyway: I wish all the very best to anyone who is going to stand for election. To those Members who want to go out and fight to be returned, I hope that that is what they get.

THE TRANSITIONAL ASSEMBLY

Tuesday 13 March 2007

The Assembly met at 12.00 noon (Madam Speaker in the Chair).

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: No points of order will be taken until after Members have signed the Roll of Membership. Members, please take your seats.

I offer my congratulations to all of you following the election. As well as welcoming back former Members, I extend a particular welcome to those Members who are present in the Chamber for the first time.

Members may have noted that, in accordance with Standing Order 7, today's meeting did not begin with Prayers. Members will also be aware that the main item of business to be conducted today is the signing of the Roll of Membership, as provided for in Standing Order 4.

Before this meeting of the Assembly, the Clerk drew up a list of seats in the Assembly held by members of each party, as it appeared to him. Members had the opportunity, up until one hour before the start of this meeting, to correct their membership as stated on that list by writing to the Speaker. I wish to confirm that I have now published the list, as required by Standing Order 4(g), and that copies have been made available in Members' pigeonholes and in the Rotunda.

Roll of Membership

Madam Speaker: As required by Standing Order 4(a), a Member shall be regarded as having taken his or her seat only when he or she has signed the Roll of Membership. I do not, therefore, propose to take any points of order until the Roll has been signed by all Members present.

I shall now explain the procedures that will be followed for the signing of the Roll. These have been discussed and agreed through the usual channels.

I shall invite Members of the Assembly to come forward in their party groupings to sign the Roll. I will call the parties in alphabetical order by the name of the party. However, with the endorsement yesterday of the Business Committee, I have agreed to a request from a Member who has a pressing commitment that I should call him before I start to call the party groupings. The Independent Member will be called after the party groupings.

When each party name is called, I ask Members of that party to rise in their places and proceed through the Aye Lobby on my right. Members should then come forward to sign one of the two Roll pages placed here on the table in front of the Speaker's Table.

Members should enter today's date and print and sign their name, and may enter a designation of identity — "Nationalist, Unionist or Other". I draw Members' attention to Standing Order 4(e), which provides that a Member who does not enter a designation of identity will be deemed to be designated "Other" for the purposes of the Standing Orders.

The process of signing the Roll may take some time; I ask Members for their patience during this procedure.

We shall now proceed.

I invite Sir Reg Empey of the Ulster Unionist Party to come forward to sign the Roll of Membership.

Madam Speaker: I invite any Member present who has not already done so to come forward to sign the Roll of Membership.

I thank Members for their co-operation.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I wish to revisit a matter that I raised in this Chamber before the end of the last Assembly mandate — namely, the security of Members. Madam Speaker, I wonder whether you are of a mind to finish the task that has already been started so that the work that has already been done will not be lost. Perhaps you could inform new Members of the plans for their security when coming to and going from this House and when they are in the Chamber doing the business of the Assembly.

Madam Speaker: Thank you for that point of order, Dr Paisley. We have been making contingency plans, and I hope that the new Members have already been informed of the current situation by party Whips. As Dr Paisley said, the Commission for the Transitional Assembly was working on this matter before today's meeting, and it has received the final report of the review of security.

Members will understand that it would be inappropriate for me to discuss that report in the Chamber. However, I intend to meet the Secretary of State to discuss the outcome of that review, and the Commission has agreed to engage in discussions with the parties in the coming weeks. We will issue invitations to you, Dr Paisley, and the other party leaders to discuss this matter. The Commission must consider not only the implementation of the review; there is also the matter of cost.

Ongoing security has also been looked at. As most Members know, we have introduced an additional PSNI presence. We have asked people to be vigilant about where they go, and I ask every Member, not just the new ones, to listen to the advice of the Doorkeepers or of any of my staff. If anyone has any queries, please go in the first instance to the Deputy Chief Executive or the Keeper of the House, who will advise about what can and cannot be done until we get the security review finished. Like you, Dr Paisley, I want that completed as soon as possible, and I thank you for asking about it.

I thank Members for their co-operation and patience during the signing of the Roll. The Roll will be placed in the Chamber on sitting days to enable any Member who has not yet signed it to do so. Standing Order 4(a) states that my decision on whether a Member has taken his or her seat in accordance with that Standing Order is final. I can only make that decision after scrutinising all of the entries on the Roll. I intend to make an announcement on this matter at the start of the next meeting of the Assembly.

Adjourned at 12.51 pm.

THE TRANSITIONAL ASSEMBLY

Tuesday 20 March 2007

The Assembly met at 12.00 noon (Madam Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

Security Review

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I have raised a series of points of order on security in the Assembly. I want to record my party's best thanks to you and to the Commission for the Transitional Assembly for the work that has been done on that issue. My party welcomes what it knows of the report at present and hopes that we can soon discuss the report and any representations fully and that the decisions that have been made are put into operation for the full security of every Member of the House.

Madam Speaker: On behalf of the Commission for the Transitional Assembly and the people who have carried out the security review, I thank Dr Paisley for his point of order and his remarks. Party leaders and Members will be informed of the outcomes of the review within the next couple of days. The report will be presented to the House in due course.

Roll of Membership

Madam Speaker: I have had an opportunity to scrutinise the entries in the Roll of Membership and am satisfied that 103 Members have taken their seats in accordance with Standing Orders.

Regarding designations of identity, eight Members entered designations that I have deemed to be "Other" for the purposes of Standing Orders. Members will find details of the designations in the Minutes of Proceedings for the sitting on 13 March.

As not all Members have yet signed the Roll of Membership, there will now be an opportunity for any Member present who has not yet done so to come forward to sign the Roll. I shall invite Members to come forward in alphabetical order by the name of their party.

I invite Mr Edwin Poots of the Democratic Unionist Party to come forward to sign the Roll of Membership.

Madam Speaker: I thank Members for their co-operation and patience during the signing of the Roll of Membership. I am satisfied that the Members have signed the Roll and have confirmed their designations. Mr Edwin Poots, Mr Pat Doherty, Mr Barry McElduff and Mr Fra McCann have now taken their seats.

The Roll will be placed in the Chamber on sitting days to enable any other Member who has not yet signed the Roll to do so.

Standing Orders of the Transitional Assembly

Madam Speaker: I wish to inform the House that I have received a letter from the Secretary of State advising that a direction has been made under paragraph 9(3) of schedule 1 to the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006, amending Standing Orders 20 and 21 of the initial Standing Orders of the Transitional Assembly. A copy of that direction was issued to Members last Friday.

Mr Ford: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Further to the information that you have just given us, I note that the revised Standing Order 20(d) states that:

"the Secretary of State shall notify the Speaker when persons have accepted nomination".

Has the Secretary of State given you any indication of whether he will supply copies of those acceptances so that we can avoid the situation that arose on 24 November and that Members will have the opportunity to judge whether those acceptances have been given in a wholehearted manner?

Madam Speaker: Thank you, Mr Ford. As I said, I have issued a copy of the letter to all Members. That is the only direction that I have received. If I receive any further information, I will inform the House as soon as possible.

COMMITTEE BUSINESS

Draft Ministerial Code

Madam Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed that each contribution to this debate will be limited to a maximum of 10 minutes.

I wish to outline how I propose to conduct the proceedings. I will call the Chairperson of the Committee on the Programme for Government to move the motion. I then propose to ask the Assembly to consider the draft ministerial code, paragraph by paragraph, in numerical sequence, either individually or, where no amendment appears on the Marshalled List, in groups.

Decisions in respect of these questions will be decided by simple majority, as provided for in Standing Order 17 of the Transitional Assembly. At the end of this process, the question on the draft ministerial code, as a whole, will be put. However, as there is an amendment to that question itself on the Marshalled List, it will also be put then and an opportunity for debate will be provided at that time.

The Chairperson of the Committee on the Programme for Government (Mr Wells): I beg to move

That this Assembly takes note of the draft Ministerial Code.

This is an extremely important debate and one to which many Members attach a great deal of significance.

At its first meeting on 27 November 2006, the Committee on the Programme for Government recognised the importance of this issue and agreed that the Committee itself would deal with this matter. Since then, the Committee has discussed and considered the draft ministerial code on a number of occasions, and considerable work has been undertaken by party advisers and officials from the Office of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister. I pay tribute to all those who were involved in that quite complicated process.

Members will be aware of paragraphs 4(1) to 4(3) of schedule 1 to the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006 which state that:

“(1) The proceedings to be conducted by the Transitional Assembly shall include the preparation and consideration of a draft Ministerial Code.

(2) If the Transitional Assembly approves the draft Ministerial Code (with or without amendments) before 24 March 2007, the approved draft Ministerial Code shall become the Ministerial Code for the purposes of section 28A of the 1998 Act on 26 March 2007.

(3) Any approval under sub-paragraph (2) requires cross-community support”.

The Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006 also states that, without prejudice to section 24 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998, a Minister or junior Minister shall act in accordance with the provisions of the ministerial code.

It also requires that the draft ministerial code must include provision for requiring Ministers or junior Ministers to bring to the attention of the Executive Committee any issue which ought, by virtue of section 20(3) or (4) of the 1998 Act, to be considered by that Committee. That is reflected in paragraph 2.4 of the draft code.

The Act also establishes a procedure to enable any Minister or junior Minister to ask the Executive Committee to determine where any decisions that he or she is proposing to take, or has taken, relates to a matter that ought, by virtue of section 20(3) or (4), to be considered by that Committee. This is reflected in paragraph 2.5 of the draft code.

The Act states that the ministerial code must also include provision for procedures of the Executive Committee in relation to: the taking of decisions — that is provided for in paragraph 2.12 of the draft code; and consideration by the Executive Committee of decision papers that are to be considered by the North/South Ministerial Council (NSMC) or the British-Irish Council. This is provided for in paragraphs 2.13 of the draft code. Paragraphs 3.1 to 3.22 of the draft code also set out in detail procedures relating to the North/South Ministerial Council and the British-Irish Council.

In addition, the ministerial code must provide: that it is the duty of the chairman or chairwoman of the Executive Committee to seek to ensure that decisions of the Executive Committee are reached by consensus where possible; that if consensus cannot be reached, a vote must be taken; and that, if any three Members of the Executive Committee require a vote on a matter that is to be voted on by the Executive Committee to require cross-community support, any vote on that matter shall require cross-community support in the Executive Committee. Those matters are dealt with in paragraph 2.12 of the draft ministerial code.

Members should be aware that if the Transitional Assembly has not approved the draft ministerial code, with or without amendments, before 24 March 2007 — which is Friday — then the Secretary of State must prepare a draft ministerial code, which will become the ministerial code for the purposes of the Northern Ireland Act 1998, section 28(a). The draft ministerial code must — so far as is practicable — be in the form of any parts of the draft ministerial code that have been approved by the Transitional Assembly before 24 March, or of the former ministerial code, and must make the provisions that I have outlined.

Members should note that if the draft ministerial code does not include all the provisions set out in the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006, it will not comply with the legislation, and will be supplemented by procedural guidance, which will be a matter for the Executive Committee to consider.

To conclude, Madam Speaker, as Committee Chairperson it would not be appropriate for me to comment on the amendments that have been tabled. I commend the motion to the House.

Madam Speaker: We will return to the debate on the substantive question when we have disposed of the text of the draft ministerial code, which we will now proceed to consider paragraph by paragraph. First, we will deal with section 1, which contains the preamble, the Pledge of Office, the ministerial code of conduct and the seven principles of public life.

Paragraphs 1.1 to 1.2 agreed to.

Madam Speaker: I understand that there may be some objection to paragraphs 1.3 to 1.6. Mr Attwood has asked to speak on those paragraphs, and I invite him to do so.

Mr P Robinson: Does Mr Attwood have an amendment?

Madam Speaker: Before Mr Attwood begins, I remind Members that he is not speaking to an amendment. He has merely asked to speak, and, as is the tradition and convention, I permit him to do so.

Mr Attwood: Madam Speaker, I thank you for giving me the opportunity to speak.

Mr Weir: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. We have already voted on approving those.

Madam Speaker: We are now discussing paragraphs 1.3 to 1.6.

Mr Weir: Have we not approved section 1?

Mr Attwood: Madam Speaker, thank you for the opportunity to speak on this matter. However, it would have been more productive if Members had been given the opportunity to speak on the amendment tabled by the SDLP. That would have given all Members an opportunity to address this matter by way of —

Mr P Robinson: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Can you indicate whether any amendment was received but not called by you, or is the Member speaking on the motion that the paragraphs be agreed?

Madam Speaker: Thank you, Mr Robinson. The amendment was deleted. Every Member has an opportunity to speak to this motion, and they may put their names in the usual manner to the Clerk.

Mr Attwood: I reiterate my thanks at being given the opportunity to comment on paragraphs 1.3 to 1.6 of the draft ministerial code.

Mr Weir: On a further point of order, Madam Speaker. Was an amendment put down and then withdrawn, or was it not accepted?

Madam Speaker: The amendment was received and deleted.

Mr Weir: Does that mean “deleted” as in “not accepted”?

Madam Speaker: It was not accepted.

I have called Mr Attwood to speak — any Member is entitled to speak. We are now on paragraph 1.3, not section 1. Members have already agreed paragraphs 1.1 and 1.2, and we are now discussing paragraphs 1.3 to 1.6.

Mr Attwood: Thank you for the opportunity to speak on this matter, Madam Speaker. Will you confirm that I have 10 minutes?

Madam Speaker: That is your allocated time.

Mr Attwood: I wish to comment on the Pledge of Office. Unlike one or two other parties in the Assembly, the SDLP has never had any difficulty in living up to the requirements of the Pledge of Office and the ministerial code. It is somewhat ironic to the SDLP that those Members who argue most vigorously and relentlessly for collectivity on the one hand and accountability on the other are some of those people who, in a previous Assembly, failed to live up to the requirements outlined in the Pledge of Office and the ministerial code.

The SDLP welcomes those who have come late to the realisation that to be involved in power sharing in this part of Ireland, and if Government is to work to its best and if the community is to be served to the maximum, then there are requirements to live by collective decision-making and to live up to ministerial responsibility.

Secondly, compared with where this issue was going a matter of days, weeks and months ago, as regards binding and shackling Ministers and putting Ministers and Government into a straitjacket, the SDLP welcomes and acknowledges that some of the worst intentions of people in the Assembly have been reversed. Some of the damage that could have been done to the power of Ministers to govern and the Executive to fulfil their responsibility to the community have been lessened.

The SDLP welcomes that and the fact that, within a week, it may be the case that parties in the Chamber will go into Government and share power on behalf of the people in the North. However, the SDLP sends out one gentle warning. Power sharing is not power splitting. If Government is to work to its best, and if the people's needs on the issues that have been identified in the election campaign and over the years of suspension are to be addressed, it cannot be done on the basis of splitting power between parties and Ministers. It must be done on the basis of sharing power and responsibility for those decisions. If parties go into Government next week, the SDLP trusts that that will be the ethic, the essential value, that will inform parties when sharing Government, and that no other ethic, least of all that of separation, will dominate.

I wish to address the issue of the Pledge of Office. The SDLP believes that those who negotiated the matter, to the point that we now face in the ministerial code, have over-negotiated their hand, and will end up regretting and living in error on the basis of what they may decide at the end of this debate.

The SDLP's proposed amendment was designed to remove the Pledge of Office from the ministerial code. It is not that the SDLP does not support the Pledge of Office — as I emphasised at the beginning of my speech, the SDLP supports it emphatically. In Government, the SDLP has always abided by it, and will continue to do so if in Government again, but we are opposed to making the Pledge of Office legally enforceable. If Members cast their minds back to the Northern Ireland Assembly, the Pledge of Office was enforceable by the Assembly — there were all manner of sanctions that that Assembly could apply to a Minister who did not comply with the Pledge of Office. Those sanctions were significant and expansive. They included censure, reduction in financial support and, ultimately, exclusion.

Not only did the Assembly have power in respect of the Pledge of Office, but such power also existed outside the Assembly. In the event of the Independent Monitoring Commission upholding a complaint that the Pledge of Office had been breached, it was in the gift of the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to take appropriate action. Ensuring that Ministers abided by the Pledge of Office was not something warm and meaningless; rather, it was precise and demanding. The Assembly, and authority outside of the Assembly, had power to act in the event of the pledge being breached.

Now, however, the Pledge of Office will become legally enforceable. My party believes that, in the event that an Executive is formed and endures, that will have consequences for Ministers and for the Executive in years to come. What happens when the transition is made from a Pledge of Office that is political in nature, subject to the sanction of the Assembly and external authority, to a pledge that is legally enforceable? It is something that other parties in the Chamber have failed to appreciate until the damage has been done.

When the pledge becomes legally enforceable, the courts are dragged into the functions of the Assembly.
[Interruption.]

Yes, it happened before.

A power that is legally enforceable creates license not just for Members, but also for organisations outside the Chamber, to challenge, by way of judicial review, decisions taken by an Executive or by a Minister. It opens a gate that the Assembly will take a long time in closing. It is a recipe for litigation and for the impairment of good government in this part of Ireland.

That which happened rarely in the previous Assembly could happen much more regularly and routinely, so that any decision about funding for a hospital or a road — or any other decision that might emanate from a Minister — could be subject to challenge. That challenge would be more broadly based and would be taken more seriously by the courts, given that the Pledge of Office was legally enforceable.

It also has consequences for every Member who tables a motion in the Assembly. The consequence of the new ministerial code and a legally enforceable Pledge of Office is that when the leader of the Alliance Party, the Ulster Unionist Party or Sinn Féin tables a motion in the Assembly, he or she must be mindful that the motion can have the weight of law, in that it could be legally enforceable. When any Member tables a motion in order to give a sense of the Assembly, or to reflect a matter of public concern that has arisen in the wider community, that Member, that party, and the Assembly will have to draft that motion so that it is unambiguous and absolutely certain and clear as to what is intended. If that does not put a straitjacket on Members, I do not know what does.

My party wishes that its proposed amendment relating to the Pledge of Office motion had been debated, so that, even at this late hour, those who idly accepted the DUP approach — which creates a straitjacket around the Assembly and the Executive — might have appreciated the error of their ways and recanted.

12.30 pm

Mr P Robinson: I had not intended to speak, until I heard the Member's remarks. Today has just got longer.

As I understand the Member's position, he supports the Pledge of Office, which is the reason he wants it removed from the ministerial code. He seems to think that if it is removed it will somehow disappear. He presumably did not listen to the proposer of the motion, who said very clearly that this matter is governed by legislation — if the ministerial code is not passed here it will be directed elsewhere by the Secretary of State.

Let me deal with the substance of the Member's remarks. I had thought that he had something of a legal background. It is slightly strange that someone with that background should be so much against having legal sanctions. The requirement that a ministerial Pledge of Office should be justiciable seems to me entirely proper in an Assembly where, quite frankly, there is not the level of trust that allows normal conventions to operate. Why is that the case? Because we have seen it in practice. This is not something that has been drawn out for the first run of an Assembly. These are changes that are coming about because of the bitter experiences that many of us have had of previous processes. It is very clear that within the previous structures there was not the accountability that there can now be within this one.

Any Assembly will work — or not work — depending on the determination of the Members of that Assembly. It sails past me that we have the attack from the Member opposite because we did not abide by his understanding of a ministerial code on a previous occasion. Lest he has forgotten, the DUP was opposed to the previous structures, and one of the reasons we were opposed to them was because of the very lack of accountability that this ministerial code produces on this occasion. His attack misses the DUP entirely. I suspect that his real target is not the DUP but perhaps the party to his right, Sinn Féin. If he wants to have a rerun of the election, so be it. Usually, however, replays happen if there is a draw, and I got the impression that the election was not exactly a draw, so he may not have the right of a replay.

It is very clear: the election has passed, and he should leave the politicking behind. Let us get down to the serious business of trying to move forward in a sensible way, taking account of the failures of the past and ensuring that we have in place the kind of ministerial code that will ensure that people can be confident that they are not going to be bypassed and that there is going to be full accountability within the Executive and the Assembly. That, I would have thought, is a democratic principle, never mind a legal principle, that everybody in this House would want to uphold.

I hope that the Member opposite will recognise that this debate took place in the House of Commons and the legislation was passed in the House of Commons; he cannot change that legislation here in this Assembly. This Assembly is a creature of statute set up by the United Kingdom Parliament, which is the sovereign Parliament in Northern Ireland, and no matter what he whistles at this time he is wasting his breath. He should save it for blowing his porridge in the morning, because it will not make the least change to the legislation. This House has not the power to do that.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Murphy: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

I would like to speak briefly in relation to the entire debate, although we are dealing with this paragraph by paragraph. Our objective in dealing with all of these issues, which goes right back to the time when there was a formal review of the Good Friday Agreement under the review procedures contained within it, has been to ensure that the fundamentals of the Good Friday Agreement were adhered to in any review or reworking of the rules and regulations that govern any of the institutions that flow from the Good Friday Agreement. We maintained that approach in all our discussions subsequent to that review, right up to and including the St Andrews discussions. We are satisfied that that objective has been achieved and that the principles of the Good Friday Agreement, as reflected in the original ministerial code and in the Standing Orders that cover this Assembly and the rules and regulations that cover the other institutions, are protected in this ministerial code.

I listened to Alex Attwood's concerns in relation to the Pledge of Office. I have heard them reflected in some of the Committee meetings that we have had.

I am glad that Mr Attwood took a broader approach to the subject, as opposed to the ongoing SDLP approach, which has been one of sound bites and talk of drive-by vetoes and so forth. Whatever that meant was lost on almost everyone else.

The SDLP claims to be the architect, certainly of strand one, of the Good Friday Agreement, which includes arrangements for the operation of the Assembly, and the Pledge of Office is included in the 1998 Act. Mr Attwood has been reminded, and, indeed, he mentioned this, that the inclusion of such arrangements did not stop Ministers ending up in court in relation to responsibility for their decisions, such as where to site the new maternity hospital.

During the last Executive, the Minister of Education and the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety had to take the First Minister to court to enable them to carry out their functions under the NSMC arrangements. The court found that the First Minister had acted unlawfully, but that did not alter his behaviour. Nonetheless, the fact that Ministers ended up in court shows that the safeguards and mechanisms built into the Good Friday Agreement guarantee all Members' rights. However, there are enough mechanisms to enable Members to trip each other up every day of the week if they wish to play that game.

The Assembly will work only if parties agree to do the sensible thing and get on with providing a Government and Administration that are concerned with the needs of the people who have elected us to this institution. That is the objective that will govern Sinn Féin's approach to this debate and its attitude to any amendment.

Given that the SDLP supported the establishment of the Independent Monitoring Commission (IMC) and the powers given to it, I am somewhat bemused by Alex Attwood's lament about the powers of the commission and the Secretary of State to intervene in the operation of this institution. If the SDLP is so exercised by the subject, it will have the opportunity, during the debate on Standing Orders, paragraph 42 (d) of which reflects those powers, to join Sinn Féin in opposing them.

Madam Speaker: May I point out, Mr Murphy, that the current debate is on paragraphs 1 to 3 of the ministerial code. Perhaps you would stick to those. You will have the opportunity to debate the IMC and related subjects later.

Mr Murphy: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

The Member who introduced the debate referred to — and expressed some alarm about — the powers of the IMC and the Secretary of State to intervene in the Assembly. I am merely responding to that by saying that it is somewhat late for Mr Attwood to come to the Assembly with such concerns. The SDLP supported the establishment of the IMC and its powers to intervene in the political process and did not defend other parties when they were unjustly punished by the IMC.

Madam Speaker: Before you give way to Mr Durkan, may I say that you may well be right, Mr Murphy, as I was having problems with hearing all of what Mr Attwood was saying. However, I am sure that Mr Attwood is content with what he said.

Mr Durkan: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. You have ruled that Mr Murphy has been speaking off the subject that is before the House. I wish to add that he is also misinforming the House. The SDLP supported the establishment of a monitoring body: it did not support that body having the power of political sanction. The SDLP is on record as having opposed that at Hillsborough and at Westminster.

Mr Murphy: I thank the Member for his intervention. However, when the SDLP supported the establishment of the IMC, what did he honestly think that its role would be other than to interfere in the institutions? David Trimble called for the IMC to be established precisely so that it could interfere in the institutions, because he could not get his way through the democratic process of the Assembly.

Sinn Féin's objective has been to ensure that the fundamentals of the Good Friday Agreement are faithfully reflected, and that objective has been secured. Sinn Féin will support the amendments that are consistent with that and oppose those that are not. Go raibh maith agat.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: I am amazed at the statement made by the SDLP's spokesman, Mr Attwood. In any contact that the SDLP had with the DUP at St Andrews, it preached that pledges formed an essential part of any agreement, and I wholly agreed with that. In fact, at a meeting with the Prime Minister, the details of which have already been leaked to the press, the SDLP leader, Mr Durkan, told the Prime Minister that he acknowledged the controversy that was raging over pledges at that time.

Those are the facts of the situation. I was absolutely flabbergasted when I sat in the House and heard the SDLP spokesman trying to say that they would have nothing to do with it. Everybody knows that there was controversy over the pledges, and that there was strong discussion and argument. However, at that time the SDLP was on the side that I was on — namely, that the issue of pledges should be in this document.

That was debated in the House of Commons and made part of the law of this country. Members do not have any power to change something that is already law; we cannot have anything in this that goes against the recent law of our country. The issue stands, and I believe that everyone who wants to take part in the Government of Northern Ireland should agree with those pledges and do the best they can to keep them so that the people will know those pledges are realities and not just playthings.

Madam Speaker: Thank you, Dr Paisley. You are the last of the Members who indicated that they wished to speak on the issue.

Paragraphs 1.3 to 1.6 agreed to.

Madam Speaker: Members will now move to section 2 of the draft ministerial code. It deals with the Executive Committee. No amendments to paragraphs 2.1 to 2.7 are proposed.

Paragraphs 2.1 to 2.7 agreed to.

Madam Speaker: I understand that there may be some objections to paragraph 2.8. I call Mr David McNarry.

Mr McNarry: Madam Speaker, neither the Ulster Unionist Party nor I have any objections to paragraph 2.8.

Madam Speaker: I thank Mr McNarry. Before I put the vote on paragraph 2.8 I will give Mr Attwood the opportunity to speak.

Mr Attwood: I thank Madam Speaker for calling me again. I wish to emphasise a point and put it on record in respect to paragraph 2.8 of the draft ministerial code, and in particular the last line of that paragraph, whereby Ministers would pledge:

“to support, and to act in accordance with, all decisions of the Executive Committee and Assembly”.

I repeat that point for all Members of the Assembly. The draft says to “support” and “to act in accordance with” all decisions of the Assembly. Given that decisions would be interpreted to include matters such as resolutions passed by the Assembly, that has consequences for how the Assembly does its business.

We can comment later on how the Executive does or does not do its business; however, we must consider the implications for how the Assembly does its business.

Madam Speaker: Mr Attwood, I am having difficulty hearing you. I have asked that the sound be checked; however, for the meantime, please address your comments through the Chair.

Mr Attwood: Thank you, Madam Speaker. As I was saying, the likely consequence will be that all decisions will be interpreted as being inclusive of, for example, resolutions of this Assembly, which Executive Ministers will be obliged to uphold. The consequence of that could be significant for Assembly staff giving advice to Members about how to draft motions.

In the first Assembly, as far as I recall, there may have been only one example of a Private Member's Bill being drafted so as to ensure legal certainty and precise definition. That was a particularly onerous undertaking. As a result, when it comes to motions of this Assembly, Members will have a heightened responsibility to ensure that their intentions are absolutely clear, that there is no reason for doubt and that there is certainty. The consequence of that for decisions of the House on matters that might arise is significant and substantial.

Mr Weir: Unless I picked him up wrongly a few minutes ago, Mr Attwood seemed to be suggesting that one of his main objections to the first set of proposals was that it would lead to power being divided between parties rather than shared. He now appears to be complaining that that might lead to collective decisions being made by the Executive. I am sure that Mr Attwood can make an argument for one case or the other, but it seems entirely strange to me that he is arguing two completely contradictory positions. I would be grateful if Mr Attwood would enlighten the House on the true position of the SDLP on this matter.

Mr Attwood: I thank Mr Weir for his intervention. It is not the first time that he has missed the wood for the trees. Let me repeat the point that I made earlier. We welcome the fact that, within a week, a collective Executive may be formed that may live up to the responsibility of being a collective Executive on behalf of the people of the North. However, as Mr Weir will recall, we gently made the point that when the parties went into Government the danger was that it would lead to a culture of power splitting rather than power sharing. That was the broad political thrust of the point that I made on behalf of the SDLP, and I will make it again.

The ethic of power sharing is difficult and demanding, and it is a value that requires great attention and dedication. Given the inevitable turbulence that will inform politics in the North over the coming months, it is important that that ethic and value is at the core of what the Government stand for. Given the past history of parties — although we have travelled a long road over many years — there is a danger that a power-splitting culture may yet inform elements of the Government. We all trust that that will not happen, but if anyone, including Mr Weir, disregards that, or does not consider it a serious threat, I suggest that he should think again.

That is different from the fact that under the influence of the DUP, various mechanisms were negotiated into the draft ministerial code that put into law and practice elements that had the potential to damage the ability of Ministers to carry out their business and impede the Executive in the fulfilment of their collective responsibilities. That was negotiated into the draft ministerial code, which, as the member for East Belfast Mr P Robinson rightly pointed out, is now in law. The Pledge of Office is not necessarily in law, but the ministerial code is in law —

Mr Weir: It is in the Act.

Mr Attwood: It is referred to in the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006. [Interruption.] Go and check the legislation. Let me explain it to the Member for East Belfast, Mr P Robinson. The draft ministerial code, which includes the Pledge of Office, is legally binding. Consequently, there is a danger that the Pledge of Office also becomes legally binding.

The problem with Mr Weir's point is that the ministerial code obliges Ministers to uphold Assembly and Executive decisions; those decisions, therefore, would also become legally binding on Ministers. This can get a bit technocratic sometimes, but in the real world, when the Assembly is up and running, Members will have to face those issues.

Mr McFarland: I understand why there might be a wish to collectively bind the Executive. Is it that the Member is concerned about the debates on motions from individual Members on Tuesday afternoons at 5.00 pm, which see two men and a dog sitting in the Chamber, demanding to have a resolution passed on a new hospital for Ballymena? Members who served in the first Assembly will be familiar with that. Is the Member suggesting that a few Members on a Tuesday afternoon could pass a resolution in the Chamber on a matter of local interest that, as a result of the ministerial code, would be binding on the Minister?

Mr Attwood: That intervention captures what would happen in the real world. A motion debated at 5.00 pm on a Tuesday afternoon — subject to there being a quorum in the Chamber — would have to be drafted with legal clarity, and, if the motion were agreed to, it would be binding on the Executive. That would have consequences, and Members should have their eyes open to those consequences.

It would frustrate Members of the Assembly from passing resolutions that create a sense about some issue — whether in North Down or more regionally — that do not have the intention to bind people, but rather to give expression to public concern or public disquiet in a way that the electorate would expect of parties fulfilling their democratic responsibilities. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. None of us at the Table can hear what Mr Attwood is saying. He is doing his best; however, I would be grateful if Members could conduct their conversations as quietly as possible or outside the Chamber.

Mr Attwood: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I have made my point.

Mr P Robinson: Of what I heard — and I suffered to a lesser extent than you, Madam Speaker — I understand that the Member would prefer to remove the last bullet point in paragraph 2.8 of the draft ministerial code, which is an affirmation that Ministers have:

“to support, and to act in accordance with, all decisions of the Executive Committee and Assembly”.

However, that is normal democracy: it is what happens every day in our national Parliament at Westminster. Any decision that is taken at Westminster is binding on the Government. If, for some reason, the Government do not have their Whips in order, or if they are not earning their money and a resolution goes through that they do not like, then it is up to the Government to put forward another resolution to rectify the situation.

As for the two or three people sitting in the dead of night in the House of Commons or in this Assembly, those would be Adjournment debates that are not legally binding as they are made on the motion that the House does now adjourn. That does not bind the Executive or the Assembly in any way.

Regarding Mr Attwood’s point about the Pledge of Office, I direct him to the Northern Ireland Act 1998, schedule 4, where he will find under the heading “Pledge of Office” — which might have been a clue for him — the original Pledge of Office.

He will also see the additions to that Pledge of Office in section 7 of the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006. It is in the legislation and therefore binding on Ministers.

I understand that Members might have concerns. The basis of the proposition in the ministerial code is to get greater collectivity and to encourage the Executive to act as a collective body. I should have thought that even the SDLP would want that. I cannot understand quite why it wants to remove that obligation from Ministers.

The nonsense that some decisions might be taken that the Executive might be forced to abide by indicates either some lack of knowledge about how Governments can rectify such situations should they occur, or less faith than I have in the whipping systems of the Assembly. Certainly, the DUP Whip would have our Members out if there were any resolution in the Order Paper that was injurious to the good health of his ministerial colleagues or the Assembly itself. I am sure that other parties would do the same.

Mr Ford: I am also puzzled by Mr Attwood’s line. He appears to be concerned that there would be consequences for a motion passed in this Assembly — or rather in the Assembly as we hope it to be in a week’s time. I understood that we were elected to the Assembly to make a difference to the people of Northern Ireland and that resolutions passed here should have consequences.

When Kieran McCarthy proposed a motion in favour of free personal care for those who required it, the House supported it unanimously. The fact that everyone but the Alliance Party back-pedalled a year later when there was a Bill that could have made a difference on the issue illustrates what might happen in the future. However, if this is really to be a legislature, we must accept that there will be consequences for what we say. Mr Attwood’s suggestion that we should not want that to be the case is puzzling.

Mr Peter Robinson has pointed out that Mr McFarland’s example of an Adjournment debate between two men and a dog — and these days at least one of them should be a woman, at least from my party’s point of view — would not be binding on the Assembly.

Mr Attwood has spoken on at least two occasions about the necessity of seeing power sharing, and not power splitting, in the Chamber. I entirely share the concerns that others might have as to whether the two largest parties are fully committed to the concept of power sharing. However, I would have to ask the SDLP Member where he was between 1999 and 2002 when we were supposed to have power sharing in this place. We clearly did not; Ministers operated in silos, doing their own thing and having very little regard for anyone else — whether in the Assembly or in the Executive. Principled complaints were directed from the unionist side of the Chamber at the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and the Minister of Education, but they were not the only Ministers to behave like that.

I have wonderful memories of the day when I successfully defeated a Minister 3:1 in an amendment to the Game Preservation (Amendment) Bill. I remember not just the victory, but the sight of Ministers sitting in their seats in the Chamber while their Executive colleagues went through one Lobby and Members of their own parties went through the other Lobby. Is that a recipe for coherent Government? Can that give any opportunity for this society to move forward? If we cannot enhance collectivity, there will be a further period of very bad Government, with people doing their own thing in their own silos and no movement forward.

Of course the problem was not down only to individual Ministers. The Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister was set up to provide a collective lead. At least in those days we elected the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister jointly, as opposed to the Secretary of State determining whether people had given pledges. Nevertheless, on something as fundamental to the future of this society as the policy on a shared future, we could get no agreement from a First Minister and a Deputy First Minister elected collectively with the remit to carry through that policy.

Therefore, when talking about concerns about ensuring greater collectivity, it ill behoves a member of the SDLP — or, indeed, the Ulster Unionist Party — to lecture other Members of this House.

1.00 pm

Mr Durkan: As Mr Attwood said, our main concern with paragraph 2.8 lies in the potential implications from giving full legal effect to the requirement that any decision of this Assembly be binding on Ministers and on the Executive. We have no problem with the Pledge of Office itself; we negotiated the Pledge of Office into the agreement and fully supported its inclusion in the Northern Ireland Act 1998.

The Pledge of Office exists as a tool of this House and of its Members to ensure that Ministers perform to certain standards and in a certain, clear spirit. However, by incorporating the Pledge of Office into a ministerial code that has full statutory effect, it would become not just a tool in the hands of Members but a potential weapon in the hands of people outside. Various interests might want to challenge or delay decisions that have been made or planned by Ministers —

Madam Speaker: Mr Durkan, I must point out that there has already been a vote on the Pledge of Office. We have moved on to the section of the report that deals with the Executive Committee. I appreciate that paragraph 2.8 states that: but we are discussing the bullet points in paragraph 2.8.

Mr Durkan: I am referring specifically to the fourth bullet point in paragraph 2.8.

The fact is that a relatively innocent expression of concern or hope on the part of Members could be taken by somebody else who wanted to challenge or obstruct a decision that had been made or was pending and incorporated into a judicial review. We need to be aware of the consequences of that. Things will not operate quite as innocently as Members might want.

We want to make sure that Ministers appear before this House more often. In the review of the workings of the agreement, and at the negotiations at Leeds Castle, we put forward more proposals to improve accountability and add transparency than any other party. We want the Assembly to have a much stronger role and, again, we put forward proposals to that effect.

We are concerned that the provision could work in two ways, one of which has been described very well by Alan McFarland. However, the provision could also end up being used to intimidate Members against expressing their views. Committees could be intimidated from putting forward resolutions on issues that they wanted addressed. Ministers will be told by their civil servants to tell the Assembly that if a loosely worded motion is passed it will create difficulties for them. We might end up with less debate and fewer expressions of interest.

We are asking Members to think about the consequences of the provision. When those consequences arise, and Members want to revise things, they will know what we were talking about.

Madam Speaker: I have received no indications from any other Members that they wish to speak, so I shall put the Questions.

Paragraph 2.8 agreed to.

Paragraphs 2.9 to 2.13 agreed to.

Madam Speaker: Amendment No 1 on the Marshalled List relates to paragraph 2.14.

Ms Ritchie: I beg to move amendment No 1: In paragraph 2.14 leave out from after the first “meeting” to end of paragraph and insert

“the responsible minister, or ministers in the case of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister, should as far as practicable set out in writing to all ministers and the Secretary to the Executive –

1. the decision to be taken;
2. the background to the issue;
3. the views of any other ministers with a relevant interest;
4. the position of any other interested administrations; and
5. the consequences of deferring the decision in question pending the next Executive Committee meeting and of not taking it at all.

A matter dealt with in this way will be deemed to have been dealt with in accordance with paragraph 2.4 of this Code. Ministers should communicate their responses to the Secretary to the Executive within the time limit specified by him – and failure to do so will be taken as assent. Decision making under this written procedure shall be as under paragraph 2.12 and the Secretary to the Executive shall notify the responsible minister of the outcome.

Where it is not practicable for reasons of genuine urgency to follow the procedure above, the responsible minister, or ministers in the case of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister, should notify the Secretary to the Executive of the decision taken and, so far as practicable, the matters set out at 2. to 5. above. A matter dealt with in this way will be deemed to have been dealt with in accordance with paragraph 2.4 of this code.”

The SDLP seriously and anxiously wants the restoration of the political institutions — namely, the Assembly, the Executive, the North/South Ministerial Council and the British-Irish Council.

An essential requirement of the Executive is their ability to deliver good Government for the people of Northern Ireland. That is something to which the SDLP earnestly wants everyone in the Chamber — all 108 Assembly Members — to subscribe. Hence, the SDLP's amendment is designed to ensure that proper procedures for emergency decisions be introduced. Such procedures are essential to good Government.

The Member for East Belfast Mr Robinson referred to the failures of the previous Administration. However, I refer Members to the good Government of the previous Administration. Members will recall the 2001 foot-and-mouth crisis. On one day in particular, the then Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development had to act quickly and, if she had not chosen to close our ports by the end of that day, way back in February 2001, Northern Ireland — indeed, the island of Ireland — would have been left in a very vulnerable position.

Mr Paisley Jnr: The Member referred to there having been a good Government. Was that the same Government that had their First Minister in court facing their Health Minister, other Ministers in court with the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister and, indeed, at one point, most of their Executive's business being conducted at the High Court in Belfast? Is that the good Government to which the Member is referring?

Ms Ritchie: I thank the Member for his point of destructive information. It is obvious that he has forgotten that the DUP was happy to act out the game of charades and enter the Executive with various Ministers executing the same portfolios and enjoying those ministerial roles.

I am talking about good Government decisions that were taken in the best interests of all the people of Northern Ireland, including those in the farming industry, farming families and the food industry. The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development took such decisions at that time.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Is it right for the hon Lady to completely mislead the House by saying that members of the DUP worked in the Executive? DUP MLAs did not sit on the Executive and did not take part in Executive meetings. The Member should read the real history of the Northern Ireland Assembly.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Madam Speaker: Dr Paisley, that was not a point of order.

Ms Ritchie: I thank the hon Member for his contribution. I am sure that he will agree that the DUP

Ministers corresponded freely with the Executive and acted out their ministerial roles.

A Member: Is the Member sure?

Ms Ritchie: Yes, I am sure that they did. In fact, I know that they did because the then Deputy First Minister told me that that was what happened — [Interruption.]

I wish to continue because this is an important issue. The proposed amendment is designed to ensure better Government for the people of Northern Ireland.

That is why during all the negotiations, whether at Leeds Castle, St Andrews or during the various meetings of the Programme for Government Committee, the SDLP has emphasised the importance of Ministers retaining the power to take emergency decisions.

Unfortunately, the St Andrews legislation — which was sought by the DUP — does not provide an emergency procedure; so the SDLP suggested inserting an emergency provision into the ministerial code. However, as officials have freely conceded, we cannot be sure that the courts would allow a decision made under an emergency procedure to stand. We earnestly hope that the courts would allow such a decision to stand, but, because the legislation contains no clear provision for an emergency procedure, we cannot be sure.

The SDLP is pleased that there is an emergency decisions procedure in paragraph 2.14 of the ministerial code; however, the problem is that it is insufficient. Paragraph 2.14 allows the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to approve any emergency matter, but as the St Andrews legislation does not give the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister that power, the SDLP cannot see any merit in giving it to them in the ministerial code. The power should rest with the responsible Minister, who would be best placed to decide on how to cope with a genuine emergency. The Minister will know his or her Department and will have been fully briefed on the issues. That is what the SDLP amendment provides. However, we are clear that the power should be used only in genuine emergencies.

Mr P Robinson: Will the Member give way?

Ms Ritchie: No, I will not, because I have little time left and I wish to continue.

Madam Speaker, I recognise that the DUP is trying to obfuscate this debate, but it has failed to recognise the realities of the situation.

If matters are less urgent, but cannot await the next Executive meeting —

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I do not know whether you heard the accusation that was just made that we are not having a fair debate, as you were being advised at the time. You are responsible for ensuring fairness in this House, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I am trying to make the proceedings as fair as possible and to ensure that every Member gets an opportunity to speak. I heard the Member say the word “debate”, but I am not sure that she was inferring that the debate was unfair. However, I am sure that the Member will clarify that.

Ms Ritchie: I shall clarify the situation for Members; I know that the DUP earnestly wishes that I would clarify it. I said that the DUP was trying to obfuscate the situation. I did not mention anything about fairness. If you check the record, as I am sure you will, you will read my comments and see what they referred to. I shall now continue.

If matters are less urgent but cannot await the next Executive meeting, a written procedure should be used to clear Executive papers. The procedure is clearly outlined in the SDLP amendment. Allowing the Minister to make a decision would therefore be reserved for only the most urgent cases. It is emphatically not carte blanche for Ministers to do what they like, when they like.

There may be some suggestion that it would be illegal for a Minister to make a decision on an issue alone. There is some legal uncertainty about that assertion, but there is even more legal uncertainty about giving the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister the veto powers of paragraph 2.14, as currently drafted. We believe that the ministerial code is an Executive decision and that, through the code, the Executive can decide to delegate emergency decisions to individual Ministers.

Some Members might suggest that Ministers already have the power to retrospectively bring matters to the attention of the Executive under paragraph 2.15. I concur with that, but the SDLP believes that it would be far better to ensure from the start that a Minister has the power to act in the best interests of everybody in Northern Ireland, and in the best interests of good government, to ensure the best delivery for the people of Northern Ireland on the issues that matter to them. That is what our amendment provides.

Mr McNarry: We are considering a report on the draft ministerial code on a take-note basis. Under the Hain rules — in what is, after all, still the Hain Assembly — the Secretary of State’s preference was that the Assembly should vote today on a motion tabled by the Chairman of the Programme for Government Committee that the Assembly approves the draft report on the ministerial code.

1.15 pm

This side of the House is grateful for the amendment to replace “takes note of” with “approves”. That will enable the House to decide to what extent the ministerial code will operate as a direct result of the efforts of those parties that are likely to provide the Ministers who will ultimately be bound by that code.

I am sure that we are all aware that failure on our part to approve a ministerial code will add to the already convoluted atmosphere of the debate. Not only will we relinquish approval and the opportunity to decide for ourselves —

Madam Speaker: Mr McNarry, you are talking about “approval”; you are not talking about “urgent decisions”. Please keep your remarks to paragraph 2.14.

Mr McNarry: Far be it from me to enter into an argument with you, Madam Speaker — I would not win it. I realise that I was begging your indulgence. An amendment was properly tabled by my party, although you decided in your wisdom that it would not be put to the House. We have accepted —

Madam Speaker: Please keep to paragraph 2.14, Mr McNarry, and speak to your amendment, even though it was not accepted.

Mr McNarry: Madam Speaker, it will be appreciatively difficult for us to give our seal of approval to a ministerial code should paragraph 2.14 be retained. We could be persuaded to support an amendment that we understand is to be tabled to paragraph 2.15 because that is relevant to paragraph 2.14. Paragraph 2.15 deals with the retrospective consideration of ministerial decisions in accordance with the duty to inform the Executive as detailed in paragraph 2.4.

How would a Minister define a matter of urgency that necessitated the taking of action outside an Executive meeting. Does “urgent” not mean “emergency”? Do “urgency” and “emergency” mean the same thing in ministerial terms? If so, surely we can envisage an emergency requiring an urgent ministerial decision. The draft ministerial code makes no specific reference to the provision of emergency Executive meetings. If an emergency demanded an urgent decision, why should we want to hamper a Minister by implementing paragraph 2.14? If it was all right for the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to act on an urgent decision without consulting, why should we shackle departmental Ministers by compelling them to write to the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister and to the secretary to the Executive in the detailed way described and then oblige them to meet the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to consult on what action they would take in an emergency?

Of course there will be occasions — not of an urgent nature, I am sure — when a Minister might wish to consult the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, especially, I suspect, if the Minister belongs to the same party as either the First Minister or the Deputy First Minister. I am sure, too, that if an emergency arose, the Minister concerned would welcome being able to share the problem. However, the problem facing a Minister is not to whom to go for a chat; the problem is this: when faced with an emergency could he or she deal with it urgently when bound by the restrictions of paragraph 2.14? That is what would happen when a Minister faced an emergency that could be dealt with only by urgent action.

Under paragraph 2.14, a Minister faced with an emergency would be restricted from acting swiftly. He or she would be delayed by the code's protocol, which is preventive. The paragraph is of no useful assistance, although we fully understand the points that the SDLP has made. We understand from where they are coming.

The House should reject paragraph 2.14 in order to allow for it to be reconsidered, either by the incoming Executive or in another sitting of the Assembly. The issue is not being dealt with fully, because paragraph 2.14 does not meet the necessary requirements for "good government".

Say that the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister could not agree on an urgent decision or that, heaven forbid, they were not on speaking terms, would we use chaperones, or junior Ministers who might be speaking to each other, to deal with the situation? The paragraph is flawed. What if industrial action were paralysing the country, or an outbreak of avian flu or another virus were affecting our livestock? What if there were a serious health scare, a freak weather situation or an environmental catastrophe? I could cite examples that do not even stretch reality to take in alarmist situations. I do not wish to use alarmist situations as examples, because those really would be emergencies, the resolution of which would totally rely on ministerial competence.

Paragraph 2.14 would place a burden on any Minister. It is too restrictive; it is unnecessary, especially with paragraph 2.15 in place. For the good reasons that I have outlined, it makes no sense to adopt paragraph 2.14.

There are also legal complications, which this debate has yet to unearth. Those complications will surely be unearthed in the days to come, and they must be properly addressed. For that reason, I again ask Members not to support paragraph 2.14, in order to allow for the Executive to deal with the ramifications of those legal complications.

The report on the draft ministerial code makes no specific reference to any provision for the Executive to deal with an emergency. In such circumstances, I suspect that an Executive would gather, by urgent request, to hear first-hand how the Minister concerned was dealing with the immediate needs of the situation. Thereafter, the Executive would be required to give regular, informed updates on how the Minister responsible was dealing with the emergency.

Madam Speaker, that is how urgent decisions should be taken, and that is how they can be taken. We see no reason why urgent decisions cannot be taken in the way in which I have outlined; therefore we ask that paragraph 2.14 be set aside for further consideration by an Executive.

Mrs Foster: I wish to raise several points about paragraph 2.14, the first of which is the key issue of who decides whether a matter is urgent. If a Minister can decide on his or her own that an issue is urgent, many issues will be called into question. What may be urgent to one Minister may not be urgent to the rest of the Executive. That should be borne in mind when looking at paragraph 2.14, and that is precisely why I support that paragraph as it stands in the draft ministerial code. It states:

"The First Minister and deputy First Minister, acting jointly, will consider the decision in consultation with the responsible Minister, and notify him/her of the outcome of their consideration of the matter."

One huge deficiency in the SDLP's proposed amendment to the code is that it contains no approval mechanism. According to its amendment, the Minister responsible would take the urgent decision, after which it would be deemed to have been dealt with in accordance with paragraph 2.4 of the code.

I find the debate strange — as I am sure do others outside the House — given that the two parties that are speaking against the draft ministerial code are the champions of collectivity. To me, collectivity is about sharing the burden of decision-making, and surely if one has an urgent decision to make, one would want to seek one's ministerial colleagues' advice and share with them the burden of approval. That is why my party believes that paragraph 2.14 as it currently stands is the way forward. It is for the SDLP and the Ulster Unionist Party to explain why they are now against collectivity.

Mr Ford: I listened with interest to Margaret Ritchie speak to amendment No 1. I had considerable sympathy with the ideas behind that amendment, but I am not sure that my sympathy necessarily extends to its entire wording. The difficulty is that we now seem to have two different classes of urgency: genuine and non-genuine. Those of us who saw how Ministers behaved in the past may have doubts about the potential to exploit the loophole that those categories create.

Mr McNarry made some entirely reasonable points about what would happen if a First Minister were not speaking to a Deputy First Minister. However, he should not judge the future entirely by his own experience. [Laughter.] Even so, Mr McNarry's points illustrate the conflict that the different views in the Chamber represent. As well as paragraph 2.14, we are now talking to some extent about paragraph 2.15 and its proposed amendment. There are dangers in adopting an approach that allows a Minister to make a decision single-handedly, without reference to anyone else, including, logically, the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. However, examples such as the one significant urgent event of the previous working Assembly have been cited. As I understand it, on that occasion Bríd Rodgers used her ministerial authority to decide off her own bat to close the ports. Any delay, other than that caused by the courtesy of informing the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister that she was taking that action, would have put our agriculture industry at serious risk. Therefore we must be careful not to institute procedures that cramp Ministers' ability to make those really urgent decisions that may need to be made at an hour or two's notice.

At the same time, there may be a danger that some issues that had not been mentioned a few hours earlier suddenly became matters of urgency on a Thursday evening, whenever the Executive would not meet for another fortnight. Until the House can collectively decide that it is confident that a First Minister and a Deputy First Minister will act jointly and that an Executive will have collectivity, we will not resolve that issue. That may mean that the ministerial code, regardless of whatever is decided this afternoon, will have to be revisited.

There is a need to ensure greater collectivity; therefore, amendment No 2 to paragraph 2.15 would ensure at least retrospective collectivity, even if it were not possible to have it when a decision is made.

However, I am keen for Ms Ritchie or Mr Attwood to explain the difference between genuine and non-genuine urgency. Such an explanation would help to clarify the amendment in my mind.

Mr P Robinson: Mr Ford is right to suggest that we may have to revisit paragraph 2.14. However, of the options that are available to us, there is more safety in holding to the draft code rather than deleting paragraph 2.14, or amending it, as the SDLP would have us do.

I have a further category to add to the two — genuine and non-genuine urgency — that Mr Ford suggested. Mine concerns those matters that a Department deliberately leaves, which are consequently made urgent by that delay. It is conceivable that a Minister who wants to bypass the Executive's collective procedures could hold back on making a decision until it urgently needed to be taken. That would mean that, outside of the Executive, Ministers could make such a decision, thereby bypassing the process of collectivity.

Paragraph 2.14, as it stands in the draft ministerial code, is a safer outcome than the SDLP amendment, which would effectively allow the Minister to get off with it; or the silent option, which would leave us with no route to deal with an urgent situation, should it arise.

1.30 pm

I rather suspect that an Executive would make efforts to avoid ever having to use that part of its code. If an emergency arose, I should hope that the Minister, the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister would discuss the issue and attempt to bring colleagues together in a meeting of the Executive. None of us are so far away that we could not get back in those circumstances, so, in the event of an emergency, it might well be possible to get the Executive together at that time rather than waiting until their normal weekly or fortnightly meeting. If that were not possible and an urgent major issue had to be dealt with, I agree entirely with the Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone Mrs Foster that as a Minister I would want the support of ministerial colleagues and of as broad-based a group as possible in the Assembly for the important decision that I needed to take.

I suspect that the Minister responsible for agriculture in the last Executive did not hide in a hole and take decisions herself without reference to others. Of course ministerial colleagues have to be brought along; however, there is no decision that requires an instant as opposed to an urgent response. I hope that normal processes would be brought in whereby an emergency meeting could be called; otherwise, there would be a fallback position.

Sir Reg Empey: The Member gave the example of the Minister with responsibility for agriculture. As I recall, the Executive met in emergency session on a number of occasions. That is not quite our concern here. The terminology of paragraph 2.14 is as follows:

“and notify him/her of the outcome of their consideration of the matter.”

That refers to the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. First, a legal point is raised because that phrase implies that the legal power of decision in a Department is being transferred to the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. That requires further clarification. Secondly, there is a difficulty if the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister disagree. Where does that leave the Minister? As the Member said in his opening remarks, we can imagine all sorts of scenarios but things generally work if the will is there. I understand that. However, there is a flaw in this that could be challenged legally. One can envisage circumstances in which decisions would have to be more or less instantaneous — health and safety issues, for example. The difficulty that we have is this: does the legal power reside with the Minister ultimately, after consultation, or is it being transferred? That is not entirely clear.

Mr P Robinson: I take the Member's point. The issue is, I suppose, in the definition of what the decision is that the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister are taking. Are they taking a decision that would ordinarily be taken by the Minister or are they taking the decision that the matter should be deferred until the Executive meet? I suspect that it is the latter rather than the former. It is untidy, which is why I indicated that we would probably have to return to the issue. It is safer to have it in the ministerial code in the present circumstances with the very clear caveat that if it is not dealt with urgently, experience will force us to look at this again.

Mr Attwood: I wish to make three or four points. First, it has been acknowledged that there is an issue here that must be addressed. That is important. Whatever happens today, it may have to be reviewed again and re-examined.

This matter did not form part of the outcome of the St Andrews negotiations so all of the parties have been trying to work their way through it in the Programme for Government Committee and at staff level.

The DUP argues that it would prefer the particular model in question. To characterise that preference, that party has invoked issues such as a Minister's holding papers back so as to bring about an emergency procedure. A better argument, and one that the community in the North would acknowledge more readily, would be on the grounds of public safety, as outlined by the UUP and others, including David Ford. Owing to the nature of emergencies per se, the SDLP feels that it would be better to err on the side of public safety and public welfare, rather than introduce a procedure that could legislate in extreme against both.

When one bores down into the various suggestions, it is clear that the issue is about which mechanism parties believe will legislate in favour of public safety and public welfare and whether there is a risk of any other procedure — innocently or otherwise — impeding that outcome.

I suggest to the DUP that, even at this stage, and given that all parties acknowledge that the matter might need to be re-examined, the safer, sounder course of action would be to err on the side of public safety, rather than on the side of the risks outlined by Peter Robinson. No one is suggesting that the DUP's argument — that a Minister could deliberately hold back papers to avail of an emergency procedure — is invalid. However, in the current circumstances in which we could have a Government within a week, and in which — as stated by David McNarry — there are all sorts of safety and security threats that might arise, would it not be better to go one way rather than the other, acknowledging that all of this will have to be looked at again?

Arlene Foster mentioned collectivity. The record demonstrates that the SDLP has outlined more mechanisms than any other single party to enhance collectivity during the years of the first Executive, and since. The record of proposals made during the review of this matter at Leeds Castle, at St Andrews, and since, shows that a body of proposals for collectivity has been proposed by the SDLP, some of which have been adopted.

The SDLP proposed Executive subcommittees on key policy priorities, and proposed that the Executive should have the power to call for people and papers. The SDLP also argued for better ways to implement the Programme for Government.

I suggest that I have presented an evidence-based argument as to why the SDLP is in favour of mechanisms that will enhance collectivity, rather than those that could end up frustrating it.

Question accordingly negatived.

Paragraph 2.14 agreed to.

Madam Speaker: Two amendments to paragraph 2.15 have been selected and published on the Marshalled List of Amendments.

Mr P Robinson: I beg to move amendment No 2: Leave out paragraph 2.15 and insert

“Where, by virtue of paragraph 2.4 of the Code, a Minister, including the First and Deputy First Minister acting jointly, or junior Minister, is required to bring to the attention of the Executive Committee any matter which ought by virtue of section 20(3) or 20(4) of the Act to be considered by the Executive Committee, the Executive Committee may, subsequent to a decision being taken, nonetheless determine that the decision has been taken in accordance with paragraph 2.4 of the Code.”

I am moving the amendment in the name of my friend Lord Morrow of Clogher Valley and myself. Today’s debate represents an important milestone in the path towards devolution. For my colleagues and I in the Democratic Unionist Party, it is the culmination of our campaign to make ministerial decisions accountable and a necessary precondition to any return to devolution.

A statutory ministerial code of the kind set out in the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006 represents the fulfilment of the DUP’s long-held manifesto commitment to create accountability for decision-making in Northern Ireland. Today will not determine whether there will be a statutory ministerial code in place upon the restoration of devolution, but as Jim Wells said earlier, the question is whether the ministerial code will be determined by the Assembly or by the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. If the Assembly cannot agree a ministerial code today, the Secretary of State — pursuant to schedule 1 of the Act — is legally required to prepare a draft ministerial code that is satisfactory to my colleagues and myself, as already stated in legislation.

While the imposed code would satisfy the needs and agenda of the DUP, it is in the best interests of the Assembly and of the Executive to agree their own code. I hope that this will prove possible, and I am keen that the new arrangements will not only provide the safeguards we require but will allow for the efficient running of Executive business.

Agreement would not only send out the signal that the Assembly can agree vital operating procedures for the Executive, but it would produce a more tailored solution for the Executive to work with and for it to face the challenges that will lie ahead.

2.00 pm

Today is not a day, and this is not an amendment, that allows me to dwell on the reasons for a statutory code being so necessary or on the failings of the last Executive. It is a time to look forward and to try to create the best possible arrangements.

I believe that the draft code produced by the Programme for Government Committee offers a positive way forward. However, there is a particular issue that is of some significance to my colleagues and me and for which we have tabled a constructive amendment for consideration. The issue addressed by this amendment must be resolved. If it is not resolved today, then my colleagues and I could not support the ministerial code and would instead rely on the Secretary of State’s exercising his function.

First, I will address the issue on which we require change. Paragraph 2.15 in the draft ministerial code deals with retrospective approval for ministerial decisions. It should be noted that there is no requirement in the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006 for such a paragraph to be inserted in the Northern Ireland Assembly’s code, and, in the event that Members cannot agree today, it would not be in the code imposed by the Secretary of State. However, the DUP believes that there is value in having a paragraph that deals with such an eventuality, though not in the precise terms that are suggested in the draft ministerial code that is before the Assembly today. That flows from the structure of the legislation. Section 28A (10) states that:

“Without prejudice to the operation of section 24, a Minister or junior Minister has no Ministerial authority to take any decision in contravention of a provision of the Ministerial Code made under subsection (5).”

Section 28A (5) states:

“The Ministerial Code must include provision for requiring Ministers or junior Ministers to bring to the attention of the Executive Committee any matter that ought, by virtue of section 20(3) or (4), to be considered by the Committee.”

As David Hanson confirmed in the House of Commons during the passage of the Bill, the combination of those two provisions means:

“that a decision that by virtue of section 20(3) or (4) ought to be brought to the attention of, and considered by, the Executive committee, is not validly taken without the approval of the Executive committee, and that without such approval, a Minister has no ministerial authority to take such a decision.”

He went on to confirm that a decision taken without Ministerial authority:

“would have been taken in contravention of the code itself. As such, it would not be a legitimate decision and would be open to legal challenge.”

That is a vital safeguard for the Assembly and the Executive, but one can imagine circumstances in which, in good faith, a Minister might inadvertently or through some other reason not bring a matter to the Executive that he or she was required to bring.

In the absence of a procedure to retrospectively approve of such a decision, there would be significant adverse legal implications. I am sure that all Members are keen to avoid such an eventuality. However, the provision, as it is presently drafted, runs the risk of undermining its own intention. For those Members who do not have a copy of the draft ministerial code to hand, it states that:

“Where a Minister, including the First Minister and deputy First Minister acting jointly, or junior Minister takes a decision and subsequently brings that decision to the attention of the Executive Committee for its consideration, the decision will be deemed to have been dealt with in accordance with paragraph 2.4 of this Code.”

The difficulty with the provision is that it is not sufficiently clear that the decision needs to receive the approval of the Executive, as well as merely being brought to the Executive, to avoid legal challenge. Bringing the provision to the Executive alone is clearly no safeguard. Again, as David Hanson said:

“such matters are for the Executive committee.”

A Minister cannot discharge his or her obligations subsequently by simply telling the Executive about the decision that he or she has taken. The DUP has tabled an amendment to replace the current provision with a new draft. I assume that Members have read the amendment on the Marshalled List, and I believe that that will give the Executive the ability to approve a decision retrospectively. It will not, however, create the presumption, or allow any argument, that bringing the matter was, of itself, sufficient.

For my party, it is critical that the amendment is passed. There is no reason why it should be opposed, and I am not aware of any fundamental objection to the principle it contains.

Mr Durkan: The SDLP opposes the amendment. Paragraph 2.15 allows the Executive to consider decisions that have already been taken. A Minister can bring to the attention of the Executive a decision that he or she has already made. Under paragraph 2.15, as it stands, the decision is deemed to have been brought to the attention of the Executive at the time that it was taken. That provision protects such decisions from being invalidated by the courts.

This relates to a point that my colleagues and I made earlier. The SDLP’s intention is not to constrain or limit ministerial accountability in this House or to this House. We want to maximise accountability. We are trying to ensure that competent decisions, properly taken, are not imperilled in the courts.

The DUP amendment to paragraph 2.15 would change that. It would result in a decision being deemed to have been brought to the attention of the Executive only if the Executive were to agree on it. To my party that makes no sense. The SDLP is endeavouring to prevent ministerial decisions from being found to be invalid by the courts. The amendment — and certain other provisions — will work only to heighten the risk of Ministers and decisions being challenged, on these procedural grounds, in the courts and beyond the control of anyone in this House.

If tighter rules are needed to enable Ministers to carry out their duties, the SDLP is open to considering that option. Members should note that compared with the current ministerial code, the draft ministerial code is a very slim volume. It was recognised correctly that it would be wrong to transfer all the previous ministerial code into a new statutory ministerial code, thus giving it all the force of law. If it is wrong to give the new ministerial code all the force of law, Members should be judicious in deciding what provisions are given that force. The force of law potentially puts leverage into the hands of other, sometimes vested, interests who might be out to prevent or overturn decisions taken in the public interest.

All the other material that was in the old ministerial code is to be included in new procedural guidance. Tighter rules can be included in that guidance, which is being drafted by officials at the moment. As with the previous ministerial code, it will be binding upon Ministers. The Assembly will be able to hold Ministers to that procedural guidance and punish Ministers who do not comply with it. However, as it is not legally enforceable in the courts, those outside the Assembly will be unable to use legal action to overturn a decision that the majority of Members have accepted.

The SDLP is not in favour of an approach, whereby failure to comply with some procedural mechanism would lead to a decision being invalidated and, possibly, compromise the public interest, which might suffer as a result.

The DUP’s response to that issue is to make paragraph 2.15 more onerous. That makes it more likely that perfectly sensible decisions could be struck down by the courts, with the risk of damage to the public interest. For that reason, the SDLP opposes the amendment.

Mrs Foster: I would like to bring up a very brief matter in response to Mr Durkan’s comments about this mechanism, which is a difficulty.

As the code currently stands, under paragraph 2.4, there is a duty to bring matters to the attention of the Executive Committee if it falls into one of several categories, such as cross-cutting responsibilities or requiring agreement on prioritisation. If the proper channels are gone through for that, it has to be agreed and approved by the Executive.

However, if a Minister uses the mechanism for retrospective consideration of ministerial decisions under paragraph 2.15, the decision does not require approval by the Executive; it has simply to be brought to the attention of the Executive Committee for its consideration.

I contend that there is a direct contravention between paragraph 2.4 and paragraph 2.15. This is not a procedural mechanism. It could become a very substantive mechanism if people were taking decisions and then seeking retrospective consideration. It is not an approval mechanism as it currently stands.

Mr P Robinson: Is the key issue not that there is no provision of this type in the Act of Parliament? Therefore, if it is left to the Secretary of State, there will be no provision for retrospective decisions. If we do not have agreement in the Assembly, there will be no provision at all. This side of the House will only support a measure that ensures that if a Minister takes a decision that should have gone before the Executive, the Executive will deal with it as they would have had it properly been brought to them and not been taken by the Minister beforehand.

In opposing this, the SDLP needs to be clear that the only option it leaves to the DUP is to vote against the whole of the ministerial code and to let the Secretary of State bring it in.

Mrs Foster: Yes, indeed. If the SDLP proceeds in this manner, the DUP will not be able to approve the draft ministerial code, and the Secretary of State will impose a ministerial code without a mechanism to deal with retrospective decisions. To the DUP, this is not a procedural mechanism; it is a substantive matter, and therefore the amendment should be taken as it is laid before the House.

Mr Attwood: Let us take a step back from the comments of the deputy leader of the DUP that it is this or nothing; it is either this or what the Secretary of State decides. The Assembly should make a decision about what is in the best interests of the Assembly and the Executive. The Assembly should say to the DUP that what came out of the Programme for Government Committee was a proposal that dealt with the issue of retrospective decision-making: the best model that we have come up with, to date, in order to deal with that.

2.15 pm

I suggest that, rather than thumping the table, the DUP adopts the same approach that it adopted to emergency decision-making and allow the retrospective consideration of ministerial decisions. If it becomes necessary to revisit the subject because Arlene Foster's worst fears of Ministers making decisions and using the retrospective procedure are realised —

Mr P Robinson: If the DUP were to do that, every Minister could take every decision retrospectively and simply notify the Executive later. Decisions would be taken for which the Executive would have no collective responsibility.

Mr Attwood: That was another expression of the worst-fears argument. Earlier in the debate, however, the DUP clearly indicated that when all the systems are in place, collectivity will transcend all the internal, narrow party differences. The DUP berated the SDLP for, arguably, opposing collectivity, while that party made collectivity its goal, yet Peter Robinson is telling us that the Assembly must ensure that no single party or group of Ministers can go into a huddle to make decisions and rush them through using retrospective procedure.

I suggest that there is a tension within the DUP: on one hand, it argues for legislating against its worst fears by creating a model that will face all sorts of potential legal challenges; on the other hand, it says that everything will work out because the mechanisms of collective decision-making are all in place.

The Assembly should base its decision on the correct approach to retrospective decision-making rather than basing its decision on the DUP's assertion that if the Assembly does not agree to a certain approach, the Secretary of State can do his worst. I suggest that all parties that will have ministerial responsibilities probe what all that might mean.

It is interesting that the DUP makes retrospective decision-making the issue over which it would die in a ditch. It is revealing that, in his opening remarks, Peter Robinson said that there would be consequences if the issue were not resolved. He later intervened during Arlene Foster's speech and said that the resolution of this issue is "critical" in shaping what happens next week and thereafter.

I ask Members to consider why retrospective decision-making is the issue over which the DUP is prepared to die in a ditch. Having successfully negotiated — as I acknowledge — the reworking of so much of the Good Friday Agreement in respect of North/South operations, Executive responsibility and ministerial power, through the comprehensive agreement and the negotiations up to and including those at St Andrews, why is the DUP making so much of this issue now?

Mr P Robinson: Will the Member allow me to answer?

Mr Attwood: I will let Mr Robinson respond later.

Returning to the core point, the SDLP suggests that the Programme for Government Committee's proposal provides a more appropriate mechanism, whereby any decision for which a Minister required retrospective approval would be brought before the Executive. By that stage, the Minister's actions would, in the best way that can be devised, be legally validated.

Not to adopt that approach would mean that any refusal by the Executive to retrospectively validate a decision taken by a Minister would open the door to legal action. At that stage, all sorts of people would begin to argue that decisions had been taken without due process or legal authority and were therefore invalid. The consequences of that would be claims for compensation, legal action and judicial review. The SDLP suggests that the model proposed by the Programme for Government Committee is better.

The model proposed by the DUP would open the Executive Minister and the Assembly to all sorts of legal challenges. Equally important is the political point about why the DUP is so dogmatic about this particular matter. Other parties' reasonable concerns were dealt with in the findings of the Committee on the Programme for Government.

Madam Speaker: I have no indication that any other Member wishes to speak on the issue.

Question put, That amendment No 2 be made.

The Assembly divided: Ayes 74; Noes 14.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Paragraph 2.15, as amended, agreed to.

Mrs Foster: I beg to move amendment No 3: Insert a new paragraph after 2.15:

"The Executive Committee may make additional provision to enable the duty set out in paragraph 2.4 of the Code to be satisfied."

I am pleased to speak to amendment No 3, which is in the names of my noble and hon colleagues The Lord

Morrow of Clogher Valley and Mr Peter Robinson, a Member from East Belfast.

Today, we have heard much about Ministers being unduly shackled, and, hopefully, amendment No 3 will deal with some of those concerns. Indeed, Members have heard a lot from the SDLP about what will happen if the draft ministerial code is adopted as it stands. We have heard of dire consequences, such as the possible intimidation of Members who table private Members' Bills. Indeed, at one stage, I was reminded of Private Fraser from 'Dad's Army' whose catchphrase was "We're all doomed". The SDLP seems to believe that we are doomed if the draft ministerial code is adopted.

The key to the draft ministerial code is accountability. The lack of effective accountability in the pre-2002 Administration should be instructive to all Members. The DUP will have more Ministers than any other party in the new Administration. Therefore, the DUP will be held to account more than any other party. However, it is the party — [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mrs Foster: However, it is the party that will have the fewest Ministers that is making the most noise about accountability.

Amendment No 3 is a straightforward way of adding an enabling power for:

"the duty set out in paragraph 2.4 of the Code".

The amendment will allow the Executive the freedom to deal with other issues should the need arise. In full, it states that:

"The Executive Committee may make additional provision to enable the duty set out in paragraph 2.4 of the Code to be satisfied."

It will give the Executive the freedom to create procedures to deal with many eventualities. It will have no immediate impact but will merely allow the Executive to react appropriately, without the need for subsequent changes to the ministerial code.

Essentially, this part of the ministerial code will provide a mechanism to filter out everyday, non-controversial matters, and, as amendment No 3 states, it will provide an enabling power that will help Ministers to avoid the danger of legal challenges, of which there has been much discussion today.

One can only try to avoid legal challenges; one can never be sure that a legal challenge will not be made. This House — even those in the SDLP — knows full well the creativeness and ingenuity of lawyers. Members can but try to make adequate provision.

I hope that the House will support the amendment.

Madam Speaker: As I have been given no indication that any other Member wishes to speak, I shall put the Question.

Question, That amendment No 3 be made, put and agreed to.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: I do not know what is wrong with this House today. There have been difficulties with the recording machines, and there is a clock that does not know whether it is working. There is also a breath of what I call “stepmother’s air” in this Building today. I draw your attention to that, Madam Speaker. You would be more comfortable if you could hear all the nice things that are being said, and Members would be more comfortable if the draught could be stopped and there could be some hot air in the Chamber.

Madam Speaker: Even I would like some hot air, Dr Paisley. It is very cold in the Chamber, and I have asked that enquiries be made about the temperature. As regards my hearing the proceedings, I can hear them now, provided that Members do not whisper among themselves when other Members are speaking. I have asked the Whips whether we can adjourn for 30 minutes after the debate on the draft ministerial code has been concluded to allow the engineers to investigate the heating problem. It is very cold in the Chamber, and we must make sure that it does not affect the debate. Be as hot as you can, Members — do not put that in Hansard. [Laughter.]

We now move to paragraph 2.16.

Paragraph 2.16 agreed to.

Madam Speaker: We shall proceed to consideration of paragraphs 3.1 to 3.22 of the draft ministerial code, which relate to the North/South Ministerial Council and the British-Irish Council (BIC).

Paragraphs 3.1 to 3.22 agreed to.

Madam Speaker: That concludes the consideration of the draft ministerial code. One amendment to the substantive motion has been selected and is published in the Marshalled List of Amendments.

Mrs Foster: I beg to move amendment No 4: Leave out “takes note of” and insert “approves”.

We have all been made aware that for this ministerial code to become the ministerial code for the new Assembly and Executive it must be actively approved by the Transitional Assembly. Otherwise, the Secretary of State holds the power to impose a ministerial code. Much reference has been made to that today, and it would be a good signal to send to the community in Northern Ireland for the Assembly to approve the ministerial code in totality.

Madam Speaker: I have received no indication from any other Members that they wish to speak. Before I put the Question, I call the Chairman of the Committee on the Programme for Government to wind up the debate.

Mr Wells: There is a website that offers our constituents a free service whereby, every time one of their Assembly Members rises in the Chamber, they receive text messages outlining what we have said.

2.45 pm

There are some poor, sad people in South Down who have received at least 15 text messages stating that all that I have said is: “Moved, Madam Speaker.” I shall not add to their pain by saying those words again, but I would like to thank Members for their contributions.

As I said during my opening remarks, and as has been evidenced by the comments of Members, this is a matter that Members consider to be extremely important and one on which they have strongly held views. The various views on what should and should not be included in the draft ministerial code were reflected during the debate and mirrored those of the parties on the Programme for Government Committee. Members will note that the Committee’s report on the draft ministerial code did not state a view on the contents of the draft that is before the House. Nevertheless, the Committee considered it extremely important that the Transitional Assembly should have the opportunity to consider and debate the draft ministerial code, and Members have availed themselves of that opportunity, some more so than others. We have had a successful outcome to today’s business, and it now remains for the Question to be put.

Question, That amendment No 4 be made, put and agreed to.

Madam Speaker: Approval of the draft ministerial code requires cross-community support in accordance with paragraph 5 of schedule 1 to the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006. I therefore intend to divide the House.

Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to nemine contradicente.

Resolved (with cross-community support):

That this Assembly approves the draft Ministerial Code.

The sitting was suspended at 2.50 pm.

On resuming (Madam Speaker in the Chair) —

3.25 pm

Draft Standing Orders for the Northern Ireland Assembly

Madam Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed that each contribution will be limited to a maximum of five minutes. It has also been agreed that amendments appearing on the Marshalled List will be treated similarly to amendments to Bills. In other words, Members will be entitled to make one contribution on each question.

I shall say something about how I propose to conduct proceedings. I shall call the Chairman of the Subgroup on Standing Orders to move the motion, and I shall then propose to ask the Assembly to approve the draft Standing Orders in numerical sequence either individually or, where they are unchanged from the current Northern Ireland Assembly Standing Orders, and no amendment appears on the Marshalled List, in groups.

Where a draft Standing Order contains only a consequential change as a result of a substantive change to another, later draft Standing Order, I intend to conduct proceedings so that that consequential change will be provisional and can be made formally later only when that substantive change has been made.

Decisions on those Questions will be decided by simple majority, as provided for in draft Standing Order 17. At the end of the process, the Question on the approval of the draft Standing Orders will be put as it appears in the Order Paper. That decision will require cross-community support in accordance with schedule 1(5) to the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006.

Members will appreciate the complexities of the procedure that is required, and, if matters are unclear, I urge them to seek guidance from the Table at any time during the debate. The process may become less confusing as we proceed so we shall make a start.

The Chairperson of the Subgroup on Standing Orders (Mr Poots): I beg to move

That this Assembly approves the draft Standing Orders for the Northern Ireland Assembly (dated 13 March 2007).

I can see the headlines of tomorrow's papers: "Poots proposes Standing Orders report".

The considerable work underlying the motion was carried out by the Transitional Assembly's Subgroup on Standing Orders. That subgroup differed from the Assembly's other subgroups in that it was a subset of the Business Committee and not of the Programme for Government Committee.

Following a decision of the Business Committee, the subgroup was formed on 11 December 2006 to take on the responsibility of meeting the requirements of schedule 1(5) to the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006. To that end, at its meeting of 5 December 2006 the Business Committee established the subgroup and agreed the following terms of reference:

"A subgroup of the Business Committee should consider draft Standing Orders for the Northern Ireland Assembly;

The subgroup's membership should reflect the party strengths on the Business Committee (2 members each for DUP, Sinn Féin, UUP and SDLP and 1 member from Alliance);

Membership should be drawn from those who were members of, and alternate attendees at, the Business Committee;

The subgroup should seek representations on Standing Orders through written correspondence with those members not represented on the Business Committee;

The subgroup's quorum would be 5 members;

The subgroup would agree its own chairing arrangements;"

and that the subgroup should report to the Business Committee by Tuesday 16 January 2007.

The subgroup comprised nine members, with a quorum of five, and its first meeting took place on 11 December 2006. It was agreed at the meeting that voting would be made on the basis of consensus, and where that could not be reached, voting would be carried out on the basis of party strengths in the Assembly. The Chairman would have a casting vote. It was also agreed that deputies could attend if members of the subgroup were unable to do so.

The subgroup met on eight occasions between 11 December 2006 and 15 January 2007 and operated under the following arrangements: meetings were chaired in rotation by parties with more than one member on the subgroup.

It is this arrangement that has dictated that I carry out my function today as Chair.

3.30 pm

We wrote to the Independent Members seeking representations or contributions. We took the existing Standing Orders of the Northern Ireland Assembly as a base document. A programme based on an assessment of the essential burden of work on Standing Orders imposed by the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006 was agreed. In addition, the Committee noted that some other amendments to existing Standing Orders would be desirable and undertook to consider those, where time permitted. We decided that the services of the Office of the Official Report would not be used, as the work of the subgroup was largely deliberative and discursive. Drafts of revised Standing Orders were prepared under its direction and subsequently formally agreed.

During the course of our work we were contacted by the Chairperson of the Programme for Government subgroup dealing with policing and justice, who asked that the Standing Orders subgroup take on board some of its concerns — those relating to potential conflicts of interest with the establishment of a new policing and justice Committee. That resulted in the drafting of a single Standing Order and advice note.

I should also say that we addressed the requirement of section 11 of the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006 to establish an institutional review mechanism. In considering that, we came to the view that in this area in particular the legislation did not appear to be fully consistent with the terms of the agreement on which it was based. We concluded that the matter would be best taken forward if and when the Standing Orders of the next Assembly were debated in a plenary sitting. It was the subgroup's recommendation that the Standing Orders, as amended, be considered as the Standing Orders of the Northern Ireland Assembly in accordance with paragraph 5 of schedule 1 to the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006. There were some very minor amendments to drafts upon referral to the Business Committee.

I would like to express my appreciation to all those who worked hard and with enthusiasm and for the experience that they brought to bear, in particular the Committee Clerk and the staff for their diligence and expertise in bringing our task to a conclusion here today.

These Standing Orders will come into play only if the Assembly comes into play. Therefore the basic rules of democracy would need to be adhered to by all parties and accepted by all parties.

Mr O'Dowd: On a point of order. Is it appropriate for a Chair of a Committee presenting a report on behalf of the Committee to make a political statement during that presentation?

Mr Poots: Madam Speaker, in drawing my remarks to a conclusion, I can say that I received a threatening letter from the Secretary of State regarding the position that we are in.

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr Poots: This may well be the last debate in the Assembly —

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr Poots: I wish to move —

Madam Speaker: Order. I must respond to Mr O'Dowd. That was not a point of order, but if you think that Mr Poots's remarks were political, I will examine the Hansard report to see if that is the case. I do not think that his comments were political, but I will look into the matter and give my ruling at the next sitting of the Assembly.

Lord Morrow: Further to that point of order.

Madam Speaker: As I said, Lord Morrow, that was not a point of order. [Interruption.]

Order. Please address remarks through the Chair.

Mr Poots, have you concluded your remarks?

Mr Poots: Yes, thank you, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: We will now proceed to the consideration of the draft Standing Orders. We will deal, first of all, with draft Standing Orders 1 and 2, which are unchanged from the Northern Ireland Assembly Standing Orders. I propose to take these en bloc.

Mr Storey: I welcome the opportunity, as does my party, to speak in what is the first day of debate after the recent election. All returning Members who have demonstrated their commitment to solely democratic means are to be congratulated on their electoral success. I hope that in the not-too-distant future those who have some work to do to catch up with the rest of us with regard to their democratic credentials will be able to deliver. We look forward with interest to see how that will be achieved.

This House must, of course, have adequate Standing Orders so that debates can be regulated in a way that is appropriate and the issues that are brought before it dealt with effectively.

My party's position was very clear in the negotiations that took place at St Andrews and in the arrangements that followed. The DUP entered into those negotiations in order to help to bring about the changes that could rectify the problems that so fundamentally undermined the operation of devolution under the terms of the Belfast Agreement. That is why it is so important that those arrangements are reflected now, as it is to be hoped that they will make up yet another element of the foundation that is required for a stable and lasting devolved Administration to operate.

The DUP in particular pressed for the need for accountability arrangements to be built into the working of any new Administration, given the problems that dogged the previous Assembly. In the House today, we have heard ample examples of the problems that the previous Executive faced when proper rules and regulations were not in place. Therefore, proper rules and regulations are an imperative, given the fact that the SDLP has given us a glaring example of its desire not to have rules and regulations that benefit the good governance of the people of Northern Ireland.

The Subgroup on Standing Orders has been careful, and has worked extremely hard on the detail. I, along with the Chairman, Edwin Poots, wish to thank subgroup members and staff for the work that they undertook. They deserve credit for the hard work that has been carried out to date. The subgroup was able to settle on most of the areas that required attention and would be broadly content with the work that was done.

It is never possible to foresee everything that could happen; therefore it is necessary to retain the possibility of reviewing Standing Orders. They should be considered a work in progress. That would give the House flexibility to adapt Standing Orders to meet its needs and challenges in the coming months and years. I hope that we will move forward with the job of legislating for the people of Northern Ireland when the conditions have been met.

Although the initial Standing Orders will give us a platform from which to start that work, changes to them will need to be made over time, and it is important that the opportunity exists for those changes to occur.

In conclusion, this debate is unlikely to provide any controversy. However, given the happenings earlier, I may have to eat my words — I trust that that will not be the case. It is important that Standing Orders be agreed for the House. It is also important to ensure that all parties, even the party that still has considerable work to do in order to measure up to the democratic credentials, have rules and regulations placed on them. Rules, and the rule of law, have been glaringly missing from the party that sits opposite.

Draft Standing Orders 1 and 2 agreed to.

Madam Speaker: Draft Standing Order 3 reflects the requirements of section 13 of the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006 under which circumstances a Member may change his or her community designation. I call Mr David Ford.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Ford: Good gracious. It is good to know that some people still have a sense of irony despite all that this society has been through over the past few years. It will come as no great surprise that I view draft Standing Order 3(8) with supreme indifference.

As one of only three Members who have gone through the process of changing his or her designation for the good of society and to enable other people to take opportunities, which, sadly, they did not take, to make this a better place some years ago, I have no intention — and nor does any of my Colleagues — of making any use whatsoever of Standing Order 3 (8).

However, I want to draw Standing Order 3(7) to your attention, Madam Speaker, and to the attention of those who will form the Committee on Standing Orders. The announcement that you made earlier about the designation of Members who have signed into the Assembly proves that that Standing Order is actually out of line with the 1998 agreement and the Act which is supposed to be based on it. The agreement refers specifically to Members choosing a designation of “nationalist, unionist or other” — with those words appearing entirely in lower case and without quotation marks. However, Standing Orders has given each of those designations a capital letter and has placed them inside quotation marks.

Last week, my seven colleagues and I signed into the Chamber with the designation “United Community”. That is our designation — not “Other”. The rules may require you, Madam Speaker, to regard us as “Others”. However, they certainly do not — according to the 1998 agreement — require that we sign the Roll as such. Therefore, we did not. It is incorrect for Standing Orders to pretend that we should have. If Standing Orders were correct, you would have had to rule that we had not validly signed the Roll of Membership, because we had not used the term “Other”. That issue must be dealt with.

When those points were being discussed during the past couple of years, members of the four main parties said that it would be good if we could move away from those divisive designations and that we must do so sometime. However, the mood was always that the time was not quite right. Some day, the Assembly must become a normal legislature in a normal society. We must move away from the utterly bogus and fictional view that we are a society of two divided groups that do not relate to each other or have any crossovers. That is patently not the case, as anyone who looks at the breadth of backgrounds in my party can see clearly.

Let us accept that if, as Mr Storey says, we must regard Standing Orders as a work in progress, a key starting point is to recognise that Standing Order 3(7) is at variance with the 1998 agreement and actively discriminates against a small group of MLAs. Rather than delivering platitudes about how they wish we could move away from those designations, it is time that Members were prepared to do something about them.

Madam Speaker: I have received no further indications from Members that they wish to speak on draft Standing Order 3.

Draft Standing Order 3 agreed to.

Madam Speaker: Draft Standing Orders 4 to 11 are unchanged from the Northern Ireland Assembly Standing Orders.

Mr Beggs: I want to put on record my appreciation of the Committee Clerks and staff for their efforts during a concentrated period. We were all under a great deal of pressure at that time. Without the use of email to speed up communications, we would have been lost.

I rise to speak on the motion. I want to highlight one issue that came out of the work of the Subgroup on Standing Orders. After the St Andrews Agreement, one party claimed that it had won a great victory by increasing the reporting of North/South Ministerial Council meetings. Section 52C was added to the Northern Ireland Act 1998. Subsection (3) states that:

“A report under subsection (2)(b) shall be made orally unless standing orders authorise it to be made in writing.”

However, when the subgroup examined the existing Standing Orders —

Madam Speaker: Mr Beggs, I ask you to clarify what you are speaking to in this instance. The discussion is on Standing Orders 4 to 11. You have indicated to me that you wish to speak on Standing Orders 5, 6 and 8, which are included in that.

Mr Beggs: I apologise. I did not ask to be called to speak to draft Standing Order 4; I thought that we had moved on to draft Standing Order 5.

3.45 pm

Madam Speaker: We are dealing with draft Standing Orders 4 to 11.

Mr Beggs: These draft Standing Orders cover Standing Order 18(1) of the Standing Orders of the Northern Ireland Assembly, under which —

Madam Speaker: We are dealing with draft Standing Orders 4 to 11.

Mr Beggs: I want to clarify that I did not ask to speak to those draft Standing Orders; therefore, there must have been an oversight.

Madam Speaker: I shall query that. We shall move on and let Mr Beggs speak later.

Draft Standing Orders 4 to 11 agreed to.

Madam Speaker: Draft Standing Order 12 contains a consequential change. We shall not consider that consequential change until we consider the substantive change that gives rise to it at draft Standing Order 45.

Draft Standing Order 12 agreed to (subject to any change which may be required to it as a consequence of any decision on draft Standing Order 45).

Madam Speaker: Draft standing orders 13 to 25 are unchanged from the Northern Ireland Assembly Standing Orders.

Does Mr Beggs wish to make a statement?

Mr Beggs: I indicated in writing the debates on which I wanted to speak, rather than the Standing Order numbers. I wrote that I wanted to speak on debate number five, so there was a misunderstanding.

At St Andrews one party claimed a great victory in increasing the reporting of North/South Ministerial Council meetings. New section 52C was added to the Northern Ireland Act 1998, and that took parliamentary time and the time of legislative draughtsmen to put together. New section 52C(3) states:

“A report under subsection (2)(b) shall be made orally unless standing orders authorise it to be made in writing.”

When the Standing Orders Committee examined this aspect of the legislation it referred to Standing Order 18(1) of the Northern Ireland Assembly, which states that the Minister:

“shall where possible make a written copy available to Members as early as possible before delivering the statement in the Assembly.”

In the previous Assembly that was the custom and practice. Legislation on this matter was unnecessary; therefore, there is no need to change existing procedures. Some people claim that there has been a wonderful change in the reporting mechanism, but in fact, none has occurred. I wish simply to put that on the record.

Mr Storey: Earlier we saw some infighting in the nationalist family, and it is not my place to start infighting among the unionist family. However, the election results made it abundantly clear that our electorate understood what we achieved in negotiations with the Government where Mr Beggs's party had failed abysmally.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Madam Speaker: I have no indication that any other Members wish to speak.

Draft Standing Orders 13 to 25 agreed to.

Madam Speaker: We move to a new draft Standing Order, draft Standing Order 25A, which reflects the provisions of section 17 of the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006 and provides for the exercise of a vote in the event of a vacancy in the membership of the Assembly.

Mr Beggs: The provision, in effect, allows dead Members to vote, which is regrettable. The draft Standing Order allows for a vote to be exercised in the case of a vacancy. I therefore oppose draft Standing Order 25A.

Mr Ford: I concur with Mr Beggs' comments, having supported him on the matter in Committee meetings. The provision may have been imposed upon us in the Standing Orders of the Transitional Assembly, but there is no reason whatsoever for us to continue that practice.

Draft Standing Order 25A negatived.

Madam Speaker: Draft Standing Orders 26 and 27 are unchanged from the Northern Ireland Assembly Standing Orders. I propose to take them en bloc.

Draft Standing Orders 26 and 27 agreed to.

Madam Speaker: We now move to another new draft Standing Order, draft Standing Order 27A, which deals with the referral of ministerial decisions to the Executive Committee.

This new Standing Order arises from the requirements of section 6 of the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006. It envisages a situation whereby a large number of Members consider that a ministerial decision either breaches the ministerial code or relates to a matter of public importance. In circumstances where at least 30 Members sign a petition to that effect, the Speaker will consult the parties in considering whether to refer the matter to the Executive Committee.

The Standing Order lays out the procedure for such a circumstance.

Mr Beggs: I appreciate that this Standing Order reflects the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006. Nevertheless, it is very bureaucratic. If 30 Members sign a petition of concern, it would be handed to the Speaker, who would consult the parties, and then decide whether the ministerial decision is a matter of public concern. However, if 30 Members have signed a petition and at least one party has indicated its concern during a consultation period, when would the Speaker ever say that a matter is not one of public concern? I wish to highlight the fact that the process is quite bureaucratic and has not been well thought out; however, it reflects the legislation.

Mr Weir: This draft Standing Order allows the Speaker to act as a filter in circumstances where one party, or a group of parties, wants to act in a disruptive manner by repeatedly submitting frivolous petitions.

One hopes that that attitude will not be taken by any parties. However, there must be some degree of provision in the Standing Orders to ensure that one party or a group of parties does not try to gum up the machinery by consistently putting in petitions on frivolous issues. That is the reason for the inclusion of Standing Order 27A.

Draft Standing Order 27A agreed to.

Madam Speaker: Draft Standing Orders 28, 29 and 30 are unchanged from the Northern Ireland Assembly Standing Orders. I propose to take those en bloc.

Draft Standing Orders 28 to 30 agreed to.

Madam Speaker: We will now consider draft Standing Order 31, which contains a consequential change. The consequential change appears in your draft. We will not consider the consequential change until we consider the substantive change that gives rise to it at draft Standing Order 45.

Draft Standing Order 31 agreed to (subject to any change which may be required to it as a consequence of any decision on draft Standing Order 45).

Madam Speaker: Draft Standing Orders 32 to 40 are unchanged from the Northern Ireland Assembly Standing Orders. I propose to take those en bloc.

Draft Standing Orders 32 to 40 agreed to.

Madam Speaker: We will now consider draft Standing Order 41, which contains a consequential change. The consequential change appears in your draft. We shall not consider the consequential change until we consider the substantive change that gives rise to it at draft Standing Order 45.

Draft Standing Order 41 agreed to (subject to any change which may be required to it as a consequence of any decision on draft Standing Order 45).

Madam Speaker: Standing Order 41A deals with the taking up of office by the First Minister and Deputy First Minister.

Mr Beggs: I wish to speak on the motion, and, once again, I note that the Standing Order has been adjusted to reflect legislation. I appreciate that that limits what can be done. There are flaws in that legislation, and I was disappointed that the amendment that I tabled in that regard was not accepted. However, I respect the decision of the Speaker.

Standing Order 41A refers to sections 16A and 16B of the Northern Ireland Act 1998, but section 16C is more significant, because, on occasions, it overrides sections 16A and 16B.

4.00 pm

That has created a destabilising effect. It has created a rat race to become the biggest political party in Northern Ireland. That, in turn, encourages voters to go to the extremes to stop the other political extreme from being top dog. There are flaws in draft Standing Order 41A and the associated legislation. It is bad for community relations and for Northern Ireland. It is also detrimental to the unionist community, because ultimately we will have no say in who is appointed to the position of Deputy First Minister. That is a gift that has been handed entirely to another party.

How did this happen? Interestingly, it is not in the St Andrews Agreement. However, when it came to passing the legislation in Westminster, that additional clause was somehow slipped in, and it appears that neither Sinn Féin nor the DUP decided to make a stand on the issue. I believe that they have an advantage from it. They have, therefore, taken a political advantage for themselves over the long-term interests of the entire community in Northern Ireland. The Ulster Unionist Party MP, Lady Sylvia Hermon, moved amendments, but they were defeated by filibustering. Ulster Unionist peers also attempted to change the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006 at Westminster but were unsuccessful. Essentially, the extreme political parties are looking after their narrow self-interest rather than the interests of the entire community in Northern Ireland.

Mr Donaldson: I must respond to the points made by the Member for East Antrim, because I am curious as to what it is that makes me extreme in comparison to him. Is it because I am a unionist? Maybe it is because, like him, I am a Presbyterian or a member of the Orange Institution. I would be interested in knowing what it is that makes my colleagues and me extreme. If we are, then the majority of the unionist population is extreme, because the majority of the unionist population voted for this Assembly.

Mr Weir: Perhaps it is the fact that this party is extremely popular? [Laughter.]

Mr Donaldson: I thank the Member for North Down for that intervention — he stole my punchline. He is absolutely right.

This is not about extremes; if it were, rather than seeking to move Northern Ireland forward, the electorate would be dragging it backwards in the way that it has voted in these elections. The reality is that the electorate in Northern Ireland voted for progress.

The DUP will take no lectures from the Ulster Unionist Party on the structures in this Assembly. It was the Ulster Unionist Party leadership — and Mr Beggs supported that leadership — which introduced the voting systems that we have in this Assembly, the idea of designations and so on. The Ulster Unionist Party need not try to wash its hands of what it did in the past. The consequences of that are there, and every day of every week they rise up to bite that party because it made those mistakes. The changes that are being introduced are about putting right what was done wrong and fixing the mistakes made by the Ulster Unionist Party. That is why I am proud to be on these Benches and I am glad I am not on those Benches. [Interruption.]

Do not worry, I will be staying here. I hope that in time the Member for Newry and Armagh will catch himself on and come and join us. [Laughter.]

Madam Speaker: Order. Please keep to the issue.

Mr Donaldson: These changes are for the good of the operation of this Assembly, and I believe that hon Members should support these amendments because they are about progress, and not about the past to which the Member for East Antrim would try to drag us back.

Draft Standing Order 41A agreed to.

Madam Speaker: We will now consider draft Standing Order 42, which contains several changes to the Northern Ireland Assembly Standing Orders.

Mr O'Dowd: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. As has already been stated, there are three changes to Standing Order 42. Standing Order 42(2)(e) reflects the Independent Monitoring Commission (IMC) legislation that was introduced in the British Parliament in 2003, giving authority to the Secretary of State over the elected Members of this Chamber and also over the electorate, which a fortnight ago went to the polls and, in the words of Mr Donaldson, voted for progress.

At the stroke of a pen, Standing Order 42 and the legislation from which it derives gives the British Secretary of State the right to exclude any Minister from the Executive and to reinstate that Minister after a period of exclusion. Sinn Féin can endorse neither the IMC legislation nor Standing Order 42(2)(e) and will vote against this provision. If 42(2)(e) is included in Standing Orders, Sinn Féin will vote against all the Standing Orders at the cross-community vote. Sinn Féin cannot endorse the role of the IMC, which allows secuocrats to override elected representatives of the Assembly and the wishes of the electorate.

I am joint Chairperson of the Standing Orders subgroup. I was asked to present the report and refused because I wanted to make some political statements to the House and I did not wish to undermine the position of Cathaoirleach — the Chairperson — by doing so. It is unfortunate that that happened this morning. However, I am not about getting my name in the headlines of the local newspaper; I am about trying to ensure that we make progress in the Assembly and that next week we have a fully functioning, up-and-running Executive.

DUP Members must remember one important thing: they are not the gatekeepers to democracy; they do not have the qualifications for that task. If we make progress together, we can make change in people's daily lives and create the society that David Ford spoke about earlier. However, the DUP must not put itself on a pedestal or claim to be the gatekeepers to democracy.

Mr Storey: I find it strange to come to the House and be lectured by a party whose sole mandate for 35 years was to undermine democracy, which was quite happy to endorse the murder of our constituents, and which was quite happy to tear the heart out of the economy of Northern Ireland. Although some would like us to forget what happened in the past, that will not happen. Sinn Féin has a long way to go to prove to my constituency that it can measure up to the credentials of democracy.

Mr O'Dowd: I thank Mr Storey for his intervention. Neither my party nor I ask anyone to forget the past; however, I will not engage in a debate that we have had many times in the Chamber and which, no doubt, we will have many times in future. Everyone has their own pain from the past. As one of Mr Storey's colleagues said, the electorate voted a fortnight ago for progress. Let us all move forward towards that progress for the sake of the whole of society.

A LeasCheann Comhairle, Sinn Féin will not support Standing Order 42(2)(e).

Mr Ford: Mr O'Dowd and his colleagues have made their position on the IMC legislation clear; doubtless they will continue to do so. However, if they vote against Standing Order 42(2)(e), they run the risk of removing any opportunity for people to re-enter ministerial office after a period of exclusion has ended. They are in danger of cutting off their nose to spite their collective face. They might not like the primary legislation — many of us do not like aspects of primary legislation that affect Standing Orders — but Mr O'Dowd's argument does his case no good.

Mr O'Dowd: Our stance is that we do not give anyone the right to exclude us in the first place, never mind include us. The only people who can exclude us, as far as we are concerned, are the electorate — and the electorate has spoken.

In relation to this Standing Order we do not have the power to change the primary legislation, because that is set in Westminster. Sinn Féin accepts that. But we do have the power to say to the British Government that the IMC legislation is wrong, and this is our only way to show opposition. If this is not included, Sinn Féin accepts the fact that primary legislation still governs us and that the Secretary of State will still have the power to exclude and reinstate Ministers.

Mr Weir: This Standing Order refers to section 18(1)(d) of the 1998 Act, which actually pre-dates the IMC. Sinn Féin is obviously in a constant state of paranoia about so-called securocrats. One wonders why it is concerned about spies; it seems at times to be riven with them. The reality is that if Sinn Féin is doing nothing wrong it has nothing to fear from exclusion.

The Standing Order refers to the 1998 Act, which derives from the Belfast Agreement, of which Sinn Féin is supposedly an enthusiastic supporter. If it is going to reject Standing Orders, it should at least do it on the correct basis. If Sinn Féin wants to join us in the Lobbies against the Belfast Agreement, we will all welcome its conversion. Sinn Féin is actually rejecting something that is nine years old. It is an attempt at political point-scoring rather than an objection with a degree of substance.

Draft Standing Orders 43 and 44 agreed to.

Mr Deputy Speaker: We move to draft Standing Order 45, which contains a number of changes. For example, there is the need to change the status of the Committee of the Centre and restrictions on membership of the Committee of the Assembly responsible for policing and justice. I would also like to draw Members' attention to draft Standing Order 45, which if approved will necessitate consequential amendments to draft Standing Orders 12(1), 31(1), 31(2) and 41(8).

Mr Poots: Section 10 of the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006 facilitates a necessary status change for the Committee of the Centre. As a former Chairman of that Committee, I particularly recognise the need to bring it into line with the other Statutory Committees. The minor changes to Standing Order 45 and the deletion of the existing Standing Order 54 satisfactorily facilitate this and create a Statutory Committee to scrutinise the important work of the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. The Committee is free-standing and cannot be combined with any other scrutiny Committee, and therefore cannot be ignored as it was in the past by the First Minister.

Mr Beggs: I believe that the proposals are in line with the legislation. The DUP Chairman of the Subgroup on Policing and Justice wrote to the Standing Orders Committee on 12 December 2006, requesting that the potential conflict of interest between membership of the Policing Board and any Assembly policing and justice Committee should be avoided. This Standing Order will clearly achieve that. If policing and justice is not going to be devolved between Standing Orders —

4.15 pm

Mr Poots: Perhaps Mr Beggs's comments relate to the next item on the Order Paper, as opposed to the one concerning the Committee of the Centre.

Mr Beggs: The proposal to add wording to Standing Order 45 will clearly bring about the avoidance of conflict between the two groups. The Ulster Unionist Party does not believe that the Assembly is ready for the devolution of policing and justice or that it should debate such divisive issues, as that could have a destabilising effect. The unionist community is not ready for the devolution of those powers.

Draft Standing Order 45, and the consequential amendments to draft Standing Orders 12(1), 31 (1) and (2) and 41(8), agreed to.

Draft Standing Order 46 agreed to.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Draft Standing Orders 47, 48 and 49 remain unchanged. However, I draw Members' attention to a printing error in the draft version, which incorrectly indicates that there is an amendment to draft Standing Order 47. That is simply a duplication of the text already inserted in draft Standing Order 45. I propose to take draft Standing Orders 47, 48 and 49 en bloc.

Draft Standing Orders 47 to 49 agreed to.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Draft Standing Order 50 reflects a change from the Northern Ireland Assembly's Standing Orders in paragraph 5 relating to substitutes and voting rights on the Business Committee and in paragraph 6 as a consequence of the new Standing Order 25A.

Mr Ford: I thought that the motion to create a new Standing Order 25A was defeated.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Yes, that is correct. Consequently, that has been deleted.

Mr Beggs now wishes to speak.

Mr Beggs: I appreciate that Members previously chose not to give a dead person the ability to vote. My amendment intends to deal with a similar situation that arises under Standing Order 50(6).

I beg to move the following amendment:

In Standing Order 50 (6) leave out all after the second "party."

I want to ensure that anything that allows dead people to vote does not end up in Standing Orders. If that can be resolved without my having to move an amendment, I am happy. However, I wish to get a ruling, because I would not like such a provision to appear in Standing Orders. Therefore, I leave Members to make a decision.

Question, that the amendment be made, put and agreed to.

Draft Standing Order 50, as amended, agreed to.

Mr Deputy Speaker: As draft Standing Orders 51 to 53 remain unchanged from the Northern Ireland Assembly Standing Orders, I propose to take them en bloc.

Draft Standing Orders 51 to 53 agreed to.

Mr Deputy Speaker: We move to draft Standing Order 54.

Mr Beggs: Although the proposal reflects the legislation, I wish to comment on it. In light of the experience of the previous Assembly, Members could easily have agreed how they should be regulated without the need for legislation, and it is unfortunate that legislation has been used. Regulation could have been achieved under Assembly rules.

There could well be a need for cross-community support if there is to be an outcome as a result of the proposal. No one crowed about that aspect of the review when this powerful review mechanism was achieved. I wish to highlight the fact that it seems very powerful on paper; however, unless there is subsequent cross-community consensus, it might amount to nothing.

Draft Standing Order 54 agreed to.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Draft Standing Orders 55 to 75 are unchanged from the Northern Ireland Assembly Standing Orders. I propose to take them en bloc.

Draft Standing Orders 55 to 75 agreed to.

Mr Deputy Speaker: That concludes the consideration of the draft Standing Orders. I call the Chairman of the Subgroup on Standing Orders to wind up the debate.

Mr Poots: I thank the Deputy Speaker for his assistance and my democratic colleagues for bringing the matter to a conclusion. I am disappointed that one party veered away from the issues during the discussion and introduced some that indicated that they still have problems with fulfilling the democratic requirement in Northern Ireland. Ultimately Mr Deputy Speaker, I trust that those rules will be in place in the new Northern Ireland Assembly and that Members will be in a position to carry out the work of the Assembly for the good of the public. The draft Standing Orders will give us a template from which to work. I trust that everyone else will fulfil all other rules to ensure that happens.

(Madam Speaker in the Chair)

Madam Speaker: Do any other Members wish to speak?

As approval for the draft Standing Orders requires cross-community support in accordance with schedule 1(5) to the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006, I intend to divide the House.

Question put.

Mr Kennedy: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. As the Secretary of State has the authority to impose Standing Orders on the Assembly, can you confirm that the amended Standing Orders will be referred to him? That being so, will the Speaker reflect to the Secretary of State the minor, yet important, changes to which the Assembly has agreed?

Madam Speaker: I cannot confirm that the amended Standing Orders will be referred to the Secretary of State. He will have access to Hansard, and it is up to him as to whether he imposes the Standing Orders. He will inform my office of his decision, and I will pass on that information to Members at the next plenary sitting.

I wish to remind members of the Business Committee that it will meet in Room 106 half an hour after the sitting is adjourned, which will be at approximately 5.00 pm.

Mr P J Bradley: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Must the Business Committee meet 30 minutes after the House is adjourned? Can it not meet earlier than that?

Madam Speaker: The Committee is scheduled to meet at 5.00 pm. My officials and I have to do a few things before then, and I am sure that the Committee's members will be glad of a short break.

Adjourned at 4.39 pm.

The subgroup met at 2.00 pm.

(The Chairman (Mr Wells) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Welcome gentlemen, and thank you for coming along. I am sure that you know most of the folk around the table. We would like you to make a brief opening statement, and then members will put questions to you.

Mr David Sterling (Department for Regional Development): I apologise that we have only been able to bring our presentation with us owing to pressure of work. I understand that we have 10 minutes for our presentation in order to allow the subgroup plenty of time for questions.

The subgroup asked us to consider the potential Budget deficit in the event that the water reform legislation and other revenue-related issues do not proceed or are deferred. We want to cover three issues. We will give the subgroup a very quick overview of the strategic and public expenditure context; we will talk about how we might set about estimating the impact of delay, and we will deal with questions at the end.

Mr Pengelly will set the scene as regards the fiscal outlook.

Mr Richard Pengelly (Department of Finance and Personnel): I will spend a few minutes on the context and financial environment in which water reform will be taken forward over the coming years. At the moment the Treasury is leading the work on the comprehensive spending review, and its forecast for the coming three years is that public expenditure growth at UK level will be at a maximum of 2% per annum in real terms.

Application of the Barnett formula effectively sets an upper limit in respect of the implications for Northern Ireland. At best, if we are fully comparable, we can get 2%. However, some of that 2% growth will go into areas that are not comparable, such as the Ministry of Defence and the Home Office, or into areas that are only partially comparable.

Our expectation is that if a significant element of UK-level funding goes into areas such as health and education, we could be looking at real terms growth of between 0.5% and 1% for Northern Ireland via the Barnett formula.

Northern Ireland's starting position is that it has a significant per capita lead in funding for services over England. Thus a population-based share through the Barnett formula means that per capita growth in Northern Ireland will always be less than the position in England.

Drilling that down to the next level, much of any consequential that we get come through health and education. However, there are no Barnett consequential for water because that sits outside the public sector in England. The extent to which we then need to fund water through the use of Barnett consequential means that those consequential coming in through areas such as health and education cannot go into health and education in Northern Ireland. This position, on top of the fact that we are starting from a position in which we cannot sustain comparability, further compounds the problem.

Mr Sterling: The water reform objectives that Ministers are pursuing are largely designed to address the problem we have with water; namely that we get nothing through the Barnett formula for water and sewerage services and that, therefore, we have to use our share of general taxation for water services.

The Government's reform objective, as you probably know, is that the new company that they are planning to set up from next April should be self-financing by 2010. However, it is not just about financing. There is a desire to improve environmental and water-quality compliance; to improve customer service; and to do this by levying charges that are fair and affordable in comparison with elsewhere.

This, they believe, is a solution that will be cost effective in public expenditure terms and will produce an efficient business model as well. One of the by-products of the reform agenda is that as the new company starts to charge, the public-expenditure resources no longer needed will be available for allocation to other public services.

I now want to move to the meat of the presentation. It is difficult to give a straight answer as to how much a delay would cost, because we have not been planning for a delay in the introduction of charges and therefore it has not been precisely costed. Furthermore, we have not developed alternatives. There are major differences in how public expenditure rules apply to the existing agency and the way in which the new public corporation would be financed. That makes it difficult to cost alternatives.

In the existing agency the operating costs score as resource departmental expenditure limit, and the capital costs score as capital departmental expenditure limit. Non-cash charges, such as depreciation and cost of capital, are accounted for in annually managed expenditure. In other words, they do not affect the spending power of Northern Ireland Departments. However, that is a concession from the Treasury, which will run out if new domestic charges are not introduced by next April.

In contrast, the Government-owned company (Go-co) will score in public expenditure in a different way. The only thing that will score in resource departmental expenditure limit will be subsidy. Net lending — what the company borrows to fund capital investment, minus what it repays through borrowing — will score in the capital departmental expenditure limit. We will show how that works as we proceed with our presentation.

Mr P Robinson: What does the word “subsidy” mean in that context? Do you mean reliefs?

Mr Sterling: In that context, there would be three types of subsidy. First, there is the subsidy that will pay for the affordability tariff — the reduced tariff that will be available to low-income customers. Secondly, there is a pegging subsidy. As members know, the Government will peg the tariffs during the first three years to the average charge in England and Wales. Thirdly, there is a phasing subsidy — the charges will be phased in, with customers paying one third in the first year of charging and two thirds in the second. The term “subsidy” encompasses those three separate elements during the first three years of charging.

The way in which certain company costs will be calculated will differ because the company will be a Go-co, which, in public expenditure terms, will be classified as a self-financing public corporation. Capital investment, capital maintenance and the depreciation cost of capital charges will be calculated differently to the way in which those charges and costs are currently calculated because of the organisation’s current status as an agency within the Department for Regional Development.

The Government have concluded that the potential for efficiencies is much greater through the Go-co compared to running the service as an agency within Government. That conclusion is based on the strategic financial review of Water Service, which found that the organisation is much more likely to be efficient if it is outside Government and can enjoy commercial freedoms and flexibilities.

There will be some additional costs involved in setting up the new company, which the organisation does not incur now. For example, the new company will have to set up a new pension system and will have to purchase insurance rather than carry its own insurance as it does now as part of a Government Department.

The company will need to procure new internal systems to manage human resources, personnel, finance, and charging and billing. The affordability tariff is, in a sense, a new cost, and other transformation costs will be required to set up the new company and put it on the path to greater efficiency.

The table in our presentation shows the revenue sources for the organisation as an agency. The first line shows the resource departmental expenditure limit, which is going into fund the operating costs of the company. The next line shows the capital departmental expenditure limit being provided to the company for capital expenditure. The departmental expenditure limit subtotal is important, because it shows the amount of spending power available to the Northern Ireland Departments that is currently being consumed by the Water Service.

The next line below shows annually managed expenditure, which is not subject to annual control but is demand led. That expenditure covers depreciation and the cost of capital charges. At the moment, it does not affect the spending power of the Northern Ireland Departments, however, as Mr Pengelly has just said, it is a concession offered by the Treasury up to the point at which the company is set on the path to becoming self-financing. If we do not set up the company on a self-financing basis from April 2007, the concession will end, and the depreciation and capital charges will score in our departmental expenditure limit.

The next line shows the tariffs currently being paid by non-domestic customers, and there is a total for public expenditure requirements. The final lines show what we currently collect in the regional rate, broken down by domestic and non-domestic sectors.

The next table shows the current Budget allocations for the new company. The resource departmental expenditure limit, which is £153 million, covers the subsidy to the company in 2007–08. The capital departmental expenditure limit line shows the amount that it is projected the company will need in net lending.

There is nothing shown in the annually managed expenditure line. The projection is that total tariffs collected next year will be £133 million. That is a combination of the approximately £40 million already coming from non-domestic customers, plus the new domestic and non-domestic charges.

The next table provides a comparison between what people in Northern Ireland pay in taxes and charges with what is paid in England, Wales and Scotland.

As regards the consequences of delay — I emphasise that we have not estimated exactly what the costs would be, for a variety of reasons that I will deal with. If the project is deferred, we would lose between £85 million and £90 million in revenue — the new revenue collected from domestic and non-domestic customers. Clearly, if there were to be a delay of more than a year, there would be knock-on consequences in subsequent years.

There is a strong likelihood that we would lose the reinvestment and reform initiative (RRI) borrowing concession, which allows Northern Ireland to borrow up to £200 million a year for investment in infrastructure. The company would stay within the Crown immunity regime; the European Commission has already begun infraction proceedings against us because the Department of the Environment (DOE) cannot regulate the company properly. The DOE's advice is that if the company is not set up in April 2007, there will be a heightened risk of those infraction proceedings leading to infraction fines.

Any deferral could lead to constrained investment in the infrastructure, and other benefits to water customers and to other public services would be delayed.

Mr McNarry: What is the reason for the delays pending the threat of European infraction fines? Those fines were going to be imposed a few years ago, and they were to be hard-hitting. Why have they not been imposed?

Mr Sterling: The previous infraction proceedings concerned the non-compliance of a number of wastewater treatment works; the new infraction action was launched within the past six months. The European Commission has taken action against the UK Government because the environmental regulator — the DOE — is unable to regulate effectively. The primary reason for that is that, because the company is part of government, it enjoys Crown immunity.

2.15 pm

Mr McNarry: Have you a ballpark figure as to how much the fines might be?

Mr Sterling: I would not like to predict the amount, although I have heard numbers. I will not estimate how much they will be, nor will I estimate how long the infraction proceedings might take. As members of the subgroup will know, those proceedings can run on for several years.

Mr McNarry: Would DOE know the figure?

Mr Sterling: The DOE might have a better idea, but the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (DEFRA) takes the lead on the handling of infraction proceedings on behalf of the UK. However, if the subgroup so wishes, I will try to get a better estimation of the time risks and the risk of potential fines.

I would now like to refer to some of the nugatory costs that would arise if the reform was delayed. As the Government have been planning that Northern Ireland Water Ltd (NIWL) will be set up from next April, they have had to put a number of measures in train. A contract has been awarded for billing and charging, and a new contact centre has been established, recruitment to which has started. By next April, up to 200 staff will have been recruited to deal not only with billing and charging but with all contacts between Water Service customers and the company.

The Northern Ireland Authority for Energy Regulation (NIAER) is planning to appoint 15 new staff by next April, and the Consumer Council has already appointed five new staff to deal with water complaints. Major transformation and restructuring are ongoing in the Water Service, and, again, those are predicated on NIWL becoming a Go-co. Procurement procedures are under way to buy the corporate systems that I mentioned.

Slide 14 is titled "Time taken to develop alternatives?" It is difficult for DRD to estimate the public-expenditure implications of the delays without knowing how long they will last, and what alternatives, if any, might be advanced. For example, if the delay were to be for one year only, and it was intended to proceed with the reforms as planned, the accrued loss would be the sum of the lost income in the first year, plus nugatory costs, plus any delayed or deferred benefits, plus whatever might happen with the RRI borrowing concession.

If it were decided to abandon water reform and maintain the status quo, the costs would be factored in through, perhaps, a material increase in the rates and/or a reduction in spending on other services.

If the delay were to allow a review of policies and the introduction of different, although not radically changed, policies, new legislation would need to be developed. It might also require new consultation and impact assessments to be conducted. That could lead to uncertainty around the timescale for that.

Therefore, each scenario would result in different public expenditure and cost consequences, possible loss of the RRI borrowing power, the cessation of the Treasury concession, whereby non-cash costs score in annually managed expenditure (AME), and, perhaps, significant implications for rates.

It is worth highlighting that the Treasury has stated that funding the Water Service through the rates, rather than through direct charges, will result in capital charges scoring in the departmental expenditure limit. Perhaps Mr Pengelly can confirm that.

Slide 15 outlines an indicative timetable that speculates as to how long the legislative process might take if the Executive wished to review the policies and develop new proposals that required fresh legislation and consultation. I reiterate that the timetable is indicative, but it suggests that it could take two or more years to introduce reforms by a different means.

In conclusion, the Government are committed to introducing the charges on 1 April 2007 because of the current public-expenditure context, and because of the environmental and other benefits that they believe customers will get.

It is worth pointing out that it would be open to the Assembly to amend that policy in legislation, if it were able to finance any new proposals. Even with existing legislation, there is plenty of scope to amend policies by changing the Regulations.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That has been helpful. Will you confirm that the three-stage charges that were announced last week, the household rebates for pensioners and the right to a water meter are all in line with what is in your presentation, and that, if they all go through, there will be no slippage?

Mr Sterling: That is correct.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): If you get your way, there are no implications for budgets.

Mr Sterling: That is correct. If the House of Lords passes the legislation on Monday, we will be on track to have the reforms, as I have described them to you, in place from next April — subject to finalising the business plan for the company. We are not projecting the public-expenditure consequences that are set out here.

Dr McDonnell: What if the legislation does not go through the House of Lords?

Mr Sterling: My understanding is that the Government have one shot at this. If the legislation fails on Monday, that is it. They would then have to try to take the draft Water and Sewerage Services (Northern Ireland) Order 2006 through Parliament again, but they would not be able to do so in time to have the new arrangements in place for next April. The Government's prime objective is to have devolution in place by 26 March, in which case it would be up to the Assembly to decide what it wished to do with the legislation.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Assuming that the legislation goes to the Privy Council, when will the various provisions commence?

Mr Sterling: Some provisions will commence at the beginning of January 2007. They are provisions to set up the company to prepare to operate from 1 April 2007. Other provisions must commence, too, to enable us, for example, to develop the affordability tariff, so that people who are entitled to it can do so by 1 April. A small number of provisions will commence on 1 January, but the vast majority will not commence until 1 April.

Mr P Robinson: Referring to the legislative timetable in slide 15, I notice that you have a very short period for consultation. I assume that two years is required for any piece of legislation?

Mr McCormick: Two years is considered to be optimistic. That is a better guide to the minimum timescale.

Mr P Robinson: Therefore it would be optimistic to expect an Irish language Act in place before March.

I wish to return to the fiscal backcloth that Mr Pengelly was painting, and in particular the forecast for UK growth and what may happen in Northern Ireland. I am confused as to where the Chancellor's £35 billion fits into this. What assumption on growth has been made with that £35 billion? What difference would a variation of 0.5% make? You cited 2% growth for the UK as a whole, but that might only be 1.5%.

Mr Pengelly: The Chancellor's £35 billion is predicated on flat growth in real terms; therefore, flat or zero growth in real terms for Northern Ireland.

Mr P Robinson: That was very generous of him.

Mr Pengelly: That is in the context of the Chancellor's announcement of early settlements for some Whitehall Departments in March of this year, such as the Department for Work and Pensions (DWP) and the Chancellor's own Departments that settled on a 5% reduction per annum in real terms. The Home Office has settled at flat cash, which is a reduction of about 2.7% per annum. Growth of 2% depends on where the money goes at UK level. If the bulk of that 2% real-terms growth, which is about 4.7% cash growth, went into areas such as health and education, Northern Ireland would expect to have between 0.5% and 1% growth in real terms.

However, that is by no means a given. International events mean that a great deal of that money may need to be skewed towards areas such as defence spending and towards the Home Office to combat international terrorism and crime. If money went there rather than to health and education, a Barnett formula could result in reductions in real terms for us. The Chancellor's package offers a guaranteed minimum of standing still in real terms.

Mr P Robinson: The other question related more to what happens if we look at new policies. Can I suggest a “for instance”, so that people can bounce consequences back to me? If, for instance, the proposed system were retained, but a very generous relief or benefit system were put in place — with perhaps 50% or 75% of average bills to be paid out of the departmental expenditure limit — what would be the implications, particularly for the RRI? Could the RRI still be accessed under existing rules, and would the AME advantages be retained in those circumstances?

Mr Pengelly: We have never had complete clarity from the Treasury on that. However, we can define the two ends of the spectrum. At one end, the Treasury says that access to borrowing and the AME concession is conditional on moving to self-financing status. If self-financing status is total, it defines itself. There is acceptance that there may be some form of reliefs for low-income and affordability tariffs at the margins. However, we have never had a definitive engagement about the point at which it is no longer considered close enough to self-financing status for those concessions and that access to borrowing to be in place.

Mr P Robinson: What would happen if you decided to phase it in over seven years? You would still be moving towards self-financing status, although perhaps more slowly than the Chancellor might wish.

Mr Pengelly: Our interpretation is that the Treasury has accepted the phasing as currently structured. Treasury officials would see anything beyond that as a step backwards, away from the current agreement to move to self-financing status within a defined period. That would open up the question of access to borrowing.

Ms Gildernew: How was the figure of £1 billion reached for the regulatory asset base? The dividend of 5·8% proposed for the Go-co is above the allowed rate of return set by the regulator across the water. How can that be the case if Go-co carries less risk than a private company? Why has the dividend been set higher than the normal rate? What implication does that have for the relatively high local percentage of families on low incomes?

Mr Sterling: The Government carried out a strategic and financial review to look at the way in which the company might be set up and what its financial structure might be. That report was published last February, alongside the Government’s decisions on the report’s recommendations. The Government decided to value the company at set-up at £1 billion — the regulatory capital value (RCV) to which you referred. That will be the level of the Government’s investment of their resources in the new company.

DRD must comply with the public-expenditure rules set down by the Treasury. These require the Department to ensure that there is a rate of return for Government companies. The weighted average cost of capital or rate of return that has been prescribed in Government is 5·8%. You are quite right; the OFWAT rate of return is 5·1%. The justification is that there is a higher risk in the new company, and that higher risk justifies a higher rate of return.

You referred to the dividend. Within the rules for public corporations, DRD puts the investment into this company on behalf of Government.

We are required to extract a dividend from the company that is equal to the rate of return that it is allowed to charge on its capital investment. Therefore that dividend will be 5·8% of £1 billion, which is £58 million, and that is the Government getting their return on the investment that they have put into the company. I will look to Richard in case I get this wrong, but essentially the way in which the dividend rules work is that, if the company underperforms and finds itself unable to pay its dividend, or part of its dividend, the risk falls to the Department for Regional Development.

2.30 pm

In those circumstances, we would either have to approach the Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP) for more money to cover that shortfall in the dividend, or we would have to cut other services in DRD. Underperformance by the company in those circumstances would not have an immediate impact on customers.

You mentioned low-income customers. Government policies for dealing with those customers are contained in the affordability, or reduced, tariff, which is the guarantee that households should not spend more than 3% of their household income on water charges. That is why a special tariff, capped at £180 at the full amount, has been set. Those who are eligible would pay that tariff.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Peter wishes to ask a supplementary question on that issue.

Mr P Robinson: I do not think that we got an answer — or at least a satisfactory answer — to the two specific questions that were asked. The first question concerned the figure of £1 billion.

Mr Sterling: Do you mean why the value of the asset was set at £1 billion?

Mr P Robinson: I presume that that figure was simply plucked out of the air.

Mr Sterling: The strategic and financial review recommended that the asset valuation should be £1 billion.

Mr P Robinson: Based on what?

Ms Gildernew: That does not answer the question.

Mr Sterling: It was based on analysis that the review team had conducted. The review team was a consortium that was led by Union Bank of Switzerland (UBS), the investment bank.

Mr P Robinson: Can we see that analysis? I rather suspect that the figure was plucked out of the air.

Mr Sterling: The 'Financial and Strategic Review of Water Service' has been published and is available on the Internet.

Mr P Robinson: Can the breakdown of the Water Service's assets be found in the review?

Mr Sterling: Nigel, perhaps you can answer that question.

Mr P Robinson: I am not simply talking about somebody saying, "This is the valuation", and putting it on the Internet. That does not impress me at all. I want to see a breakdown of the facilities that are available to the Water Service that arrive at that figure.

Mr Nigel McCormick (Department for Regional Development): The strategic and financial review reviewed the business, the assets and the business risks of the Water Service becoming the Go-co. It then considered how those business risks might materialise, and what capital might be required to ensure that the business continued to be financially sustainable. It examined all the issues surrounding the type of capital structure that would be required to enable a business to be self-financing.

The 'Financial and Strategic Review of Water Service' is quite an extensive document. It could not be easily summarised in a couple of sentences; quite a lot of analysis is required. As I have said, a consortium led by UBS undertook the strategic and financial review. That consortium identified a high-to-low range of regulatory capital value (RCV) for the Go-co. In its judgement, that valuation was about £1 billion. That does not answer directly every specific question that you have asked, but I probably could not do that in a couple of minutes.

Mr P Robinson: The Department clearly did not really challenge how unhelpful that valuation was.

Mr Sterling: We are here under strict instructions to explain Government policy. We cannot state a departmental view. I am sorry that I cannot be more helpful than that.

Dr McDonnell: Chairman, was Government policy not to challenge something that was inaccurate? I have had somebody assess the asset value of the Go-co, and I have put that assessment on the table, and it would have been more appropriate for the figure to have been set at £350 million, which is a little over a third of the Go-co's current valuation. That valuation is as good as the valuation of £1 billion, for the Department would still receive a third of the £58 million dividend from it. Sorry, Peter.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): You interrupted a question.

Ms Gildernew: I agree with Peter — that did not answer the question. I still do not really know whether we have heard a fair assessment of where we are at. If the dividend is there to provide the Department with a return, the public are going to have to pay for that entire dividend. If the 5.8% dividend brings in £58 million, ultimately the Department will have put nothing into the company. It will have put in the initial funding, and then withdrawn it from the public coffers. It will reap the benefit without having to pay anything. The Government are taking no risk.

Mr Sterling: DRD is taking a big risk. If the dividend is not paid in full, the Department will have to make up the shortfall, either by asking the DFP to bail us out or by cutting services elsewhere; for example, in roads or public transport.

Ms Gildernew: I still do not understand how it has been calculated that £58 million must be clawed back from the public. You are talking about the risk to the Department — the risk is still with the public. The public will have to carry the cost.

Mr Sterling: The Department is a manifestation of, and represents, the taxpayer. The £58 million is the return that Northern Ireland taxpayers will receive for their £1 billion investment in the company. Perhaps Mr Pengelly can explain this better.

Mr Pengelly: The Go-co is valued at £1 billion, and that amount is being invested in the water company. Given a different set of ministerial decisions, that money could be taken from the water company and invested elsewhere. The company must generate a return, but that return is available for the Government to redeploy.

Mr Sterling talked about the implications of underperformance. However, if the company over-performs to the tune of, say, £10 million, that sum would become available to Ministers for reallocation to other public-service priorities in Northern Ireland. There is a risk to services, but there are also rewards.

Ms Gildernew: However, such a reward will not go towards a water-charges rebate.

Mr Pengelly: That would be a decision for Ministers. They could decide to spend it in that way, or they could invest to offset pressures in health, education or other public-service priorities.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr McClarty and Dr McDonnell want to ask further questions. Sorry; I meant to say Mr McNarry. Have the possible effects of non-compliance — a withholding campaign or non-payment of water charges — been factored into the figures?

Mr P Robinson: They will not get Bob's money.

Mr Sterling: DFP is working with the Water Service to develop a strategic business plan. In that plan, we will be making assumptions on levels of bad debt, and so on. We have not yet finalised that.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That plan would be based on normal levels of bad debt that any utility might expect. Has the effect of a campaign for withholding payment been considered?

Mr Sterling: We must take account of political realities. However, through the affordability of the reduced tariff, we will be providing considerable protection to the 200,000 least well-off households in Northern Ireland — one third of all households. It is very hard to predict what the impact of a non-payment campaign might be, but we are taking into account all the factors that we believe to be relevant.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr McNarry has a question.

Mr McNarry: Thank you, Francie. That is kind of you.

Slide 5 of your presentation mentions “anticipated pressures”. I must ask a hypothetical question: if there were to be efficiency savings in education, what relief would those have on the pressures that are being talked about? Correct me if I am misinterpreting the Chancellor's pre-Budget speech yesterday, but if he did say that education here were to receive an extra £6 million — without conditions — would that have an impact on the pressures on education? The reason why I ask that is that the pitch being made to the subgroup is based on pressures. Good management would strive to alleviate those pressures as far as possible.

If those two factors were to kick in, what effect would they have? Would it amount to small beer, or is it the argument that such a contribution is necessary from the public because the pressures are so strong?

Mr Pengelly: Rather than going through the specifics, we are dealing with matters on a more strategic level. The key points at the strategic level in the health sector in particular are —

Mr McNarry: Skip health for a minute and stick to education.

Mr Pengelly: As part of our work on the 2007 comprehensive spending review, we are actively seeking efficiencies in education and all other sectors to the tune of approximately 3% per annum. That is initially designed to remove the hard edge from some of those pressures.

However, we know that the demographics of the education service, and other services, will create pressure as we proceed. At the same time, declining pupil numbers and rationalisation of the schools estate will create opportunities for savings. There is scope to lever out efficiency savings that will make a contribution.

Mr McNarry: Do you have some figures on efficiency savings? You refer to making efficiency savings, so can you tell me what the figure is?

Mr Pengelly: I cannot give specific figures. As a general approach to the strategic management of public expenditure, we are trying to squeeze out all possible inefficiencies from all services. That will apply as equally to education as it will to health services and to DRD services.

Mr McNarry: Is it not possible to put a figure on the cost of turning around the inefficiencies of the Department of Education? Turning those inefficiencies around would make that Department more efficient and would make a saving. Are you telling me that you have some figures that say that the Department is inefficient to the tune of £X?

Mr Pengelly: We certainly cannot quantify the extent to which a particular service is inefficient, and we are not saying that any one service lacks efficiency. However, there is scope for all services to become more efficient without us making a judgement call as to how efficient or inefficient they are.

Mr McNarry: It was wishful thinking on my part for some figures to be available.

Mr Pengelly: Looking at the strategic level, many of the efficiency savings in education will flow from fundamental infrastructural changes. However, those savings cannot be captured quickly, because they are medium- to long-term savings.

I apologise for going back to health, but demographic issues apply to that sector. In particular, an ageing population will put massive pressures on funding for health services. Given that health expenditure accounts for more than 40% of the block, there are implications for education, roads, water and all other services.

Mr McNarry: Am I right? Did the Chancellor say yesterday that £6 million will be available unconditionally for education? What difference would that make?

Mr Pengelly: Are you asking what difference that would make overall? That sum applies for just one year.

Mr McNarry: You are making a pitch on pressure; what difference would £6 million make to that pressure?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): You need to stick to the issue of water; we are drifting a bit.

Mr McNarry: I am discussing water issues. Mr Pengelly is saying that those reforms are being introduced to alleviate pressure on health and education spending.

Mr Pengelly: Those reforms are designed to alleviate pressures in the long-term strategic view. Yesterday's pre-Budget report dealt with 2007-08; however, the reforms and the pre-Budget report do not necessarily deal with the same issues.

Mr McNarry: What billing arrangements have been made? Have any contracts been agreed or entered into? Are there any associated costs?

Mr Sterling: Yes. A seven-year contract has been agreed. It will provide billing, charging and customer-contact-centre services for domestic and non-domestic customers. If a decision were taken not to proceed with domestic charging, costs would be incurred, in that the contract would have penalty clauses that the company could cite.

Mr McNarry: Would there be provision for metering in that contract?

Mr Sterling: Yes.

Mr McNarry: Is the metering aspect of the contract written in general terms only?

Mr Sterling: Government policy is that, from April 2007, a meter will be installed in all new properties and for all new connections. Pensioners — those who are aged 60 or over — will be able to choose whether to have a meter. If a meter does not suit their circumstances and they let us know within a year, they will no longer be metered.

The Government have also said that there should be another review in two years' time to define how metering should be rolled out further. The Government's overall policy is that there should be a long-term transition to widespread or universal metering.

Mr McNarry: I picked up on what was said about new contracts and new builds. For some years now, developers of new builds have made provision for metering. Will that be taken up? Will people who can have access to a meter use it? Technically, everything is provided: people just need to have it connected. I understand that there are thousands of homes in that position.

2.45 pm

Mr Sterling: That is correct. I believe that all new builds since 1994 have contained that provision.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We must be careful. The subgroup is not tasked with having a general discussion on water metering or bills; its task is to work out whether there will be any shortfall in public expenditure if there is a delay in introducing water reform. I knew that this would happen, because it is an emotive issue. However, the subgroup must keep within the confines of what it is here to identify.

Mr McNarry: If there were a failure to proceed with the existing legislation that is before Parliament, would that result in a loss on RRI borrowing?

Mr Pengelly: As Mr Sterling said in the presentation, we have not planned for deferral. Our position is that of a couple of years ago when the Treasury made it explicit that access to RRI borrowing was absolutely conditional on the introduction of water charging.

The Government's position is that water charging will be introduced in 2007-08. If there were to be any slippage, we would be obliged to have a discussion with the Treasury. Its position has always been that any deferment would have serious implications for access to borrowing. However, we have not had a definitive conversation on that, as we are not planning for deferment.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Surely you should be able to identify a figure, because you know what borrowing entitlement the income figures being discussed would achieve.

Mr Pengelly: It would affect access to the full £200 million. The Treasury line is that, at present, Northern Ireland can access £200 million. The ability to access any of that money would lapse were we not to proceed with water charging.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Therefore it is £200 million.

Mr McNarry: We knew that it was £200 million.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is it no more than that?

Mr Pengelly: It is limited to £200 million.

Dr McDonnell: Much ground has been covered. Forgive me if I digress slightly, but it is very hard to stick to a single dimension of an issue. If one tries to probe at all, one tends to probe a little bit further.

I wish to return to the point about the valuation of the company, and what one can infer from that. I remain deeply concerned about the company being overvalued. Has any comparison been made with the privatisation of electricity here?

Mr Sterling: Not specifically. However, the consortium that dealt with the valuations examined those of other water companies, certainly in England and Wales, and, I believe, in Scotland.

Dr McDonnell: Was that valuation in respect of pipe work only or were elements such as goodwill taken into account?

Mr Sterling: RCV is a valuation of the business in its entirety rather than of its assets. Water Service's accounts show that its assets are valued at a replacement cost of £5 billion to £6 billion. However, that, in a sense, is not a valuation of the business. The RCV is an estimation of the value of the business, and the rate of return is the determination of what is a reasonable amount that that business should earn.

Dr McDonnell: You said that, from April 2007, all new houses and pensioners would have access to metering. If I want to have access to metering from April 2007, can I have it?

Ms Gildernew: Yes; he is over 60.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am sure that he is not. Are you, Dr McDonnell?

Dr McDonnell: Chairman, I probe the issue because it will have an impact. If I were to install a water meter, I want to know whether that will cut my charge if I use very little water.

Mr McNarry: If somebody reads your meter.

Mr Sterling: The reason why meters might be attractive to pensioners is that they tend to have smaller households of one or two persons who would have lower-than-normal water usage. In those circumstances, a meter is likely to result in a lower bill. However, whether an average family would save money with a meter would depend on the value of the property in which they live.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We must stop discussing such matters, because you will be appearing before a separate subgroup.

Mr Sterling: We are to attend next Wednesday, I believe.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That subgroup will ask you identical questions about the mechanics of water rating, how meters will be read and whether rating is good value for money. Those issues have nothing to do with this subgroup.

Mr Sterling: I apologise.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I realise that you are concerned, Dr McDonnell, but you should ask your colleague on that subgroup to raise those issues.

Dr McDonnell: Chairman, you are being very harsh and very cruel.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am, but we will be meeting next Thursday to spend hours going through the same process with the same people. We are only giving the officials some practice.

Dr McDonnell: Can I ask another question?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Does it concern slippage?

Dr McDonnell: Are implications for staff outside this subgroup's remit?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Again, that belongs in the remit of the subgroup that will be looking specifically at water reform. The issue of redundancies, and so on, has nothing to do with the specific issue that we are discussing today.

Dr McDonnell: I was considering the issue only in the context of the valuation being a guesstimate.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): You can ask about the public expenditure that will be incurred by redundancies, which is within our remit, but not whether it is right or wrong that there will be redundancies.

Dr McDonnell: That is my point. I am not querying the rights or wrongs of redundancies but the cost of redundancies and the cost of the transition. Will public servants who currently work for the Water Service be moving to the Go-co? Will they still be public servants? Is there a significant cost implication?

Mr Sterling: Water Service staff are currently civil servants. On the date of transfer, which is 1 April next year, those staff will transfer to the Go-co under The Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 2006 — the TUPE arrangements — and lose their status as civil servants. On the numbers question, we are still working on the strategic business plan, which will set out the financial parameters, and so on, for the first three years of the company's existence. Such issues will be discussed as part of the business plan's formulation.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We can ask questions about those issues next Thursday.

Mr Dawson: I want to return to the valuation question and the figure of £1 billion. Did the consortium specifically recommend that figure or was a range of figures offered from which somebody had to choose?

Mr Sterling: My colleagues can keep me right on the detail, but the consortium's view was that the company would be financially sustainable between £650 million and £1 billion. However, the consortium recommended that the valuation should be £1 billion. That is contained in the report, which, as I have said, is available on the Internet.

Mr Dawson: Therefore the company could have been sustainable at a figure of £650 million, had that decision been taken?

Mr Sterling: It could have.

Mr Dawson: That would have been a better scenario for consumers.

Mr Sterling: There are arguments for and against.

Ms Gildernew: Either £1 billion is paid back or just over half that amount is paid back.

Mr P Robinson: What answer is there other than yes?

Mr McCormick: The consortium's concern was to ensure that the company was a financially sustainable business. The consortium's view was that the figure of £650 million carried too much risk to ensure that it would be. If the business is not financially sustainable, that means that there is some sort of —

Mr P Robinson: Is a business more financially sustainable if it costs more?

Mr McCormick: Yes. If the business suffers some sort of financial shock, a new injection of capital is needed if it is not financially sustainable. The consortium said that, if the business were to be self-financing and sustainable, an RCV in the region of £1 billion was required. That was the consortium's judgement.

Mr McNarry: Nice business if you can get it.

Mr Dawson: It sounds like the electricity issue all over again.

Slide 7 referred to the potential for greater efficiencies under the Go-co option. Those efficiencies seem to have been reflected in the costs. What are those efficiencies?

Mr Sterling: Do you mean the quantum of the efficiencies or how they are made?

Mr Dawson: I want to know the specific efficiencies and the cost to each.

Mr Sterling: I cannot give you the cost to each, but we expect efficiencies to be delivered in various ways, such as through better procurement, more efficient working practices, or simply by taking different approaches to doing things. There is a range of different ways in which we believe the company should become more efficient.

Mr Dawson: Are the Government prevented from choosing those different options in the current model?

Mr Sterling: The evidence shows that it is much more difficult to deliver that level of efficiency in Government, especially the closer a body is to Government. A body cannot be much closer to Government than to be a Civil Service agency. That is at one end of the continuum, with completely privatised companies at the other end.

The strategic and financial review concluded that the further the company is from Government and the greater the private-sector involvement, the greater the likelihood that the optimum level of efficiency would be delivered.

Mr Dawson: Have you included those efficiencies in the figures in slide 9, which give a total cost of £436 million?

Mr Sterling: Those allocations were determined in the 2005 Budget, so they do not necessarily reflect all the up-to-date work. However, by and large —

Mr Dawson: Based on that figure, is there £300 million of efficiency savings or difference in cost?

Mr Sterling: I hesitate to draw that conclusion, because we are not comparing like with like.

Mr Dawson: What conclusion would you like me to draw?

Mr Sterling: The main differences between the figures for 2007-08 and the figures for 2006-07 are as a result of the different public expenditure treatments — one shows the Water Service as an agency and the other shows it as a public corporation.

Mr Pengelly: The figures in slide 8 show £319 million for AME. AME is driven by an organisation's asset base. As an agency, it has an asset base of £7 billion; as a Go-co, it is worth £1 billion. That is the biggest component.

Mr Dawson: Discounting that, what is the value of the efficiency savings that are reflected in the figures?

Mr Sterling: I am not sure that I have the figures to hand.

Mr Dawson: We are very clear about the difference as regards AME, so what are the efficiency savings?

Mr Sterling: Until the beginning of this year, the company had delivered about £18 million of efficiency savings against its 2003-04 baseline. By the end of this year, subject to meeting its targets, it will have delivered £25 million of efficiency savings. We have not yet finally settled the strategic business plan for 2007-08 to 2009-10, so the exact efficiency target that will be put on the company has not yet been determined.

Mr Dawson: Fine.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): You have lost me. I could, for example, create and build up a company and hand it to my son, telling him that it is worth £1 million. However, I may then decide that it is not worth £1 million; rather it is worth £600,000. Why would that company be any more or less viable as an entity because I decided that it was worth £600,000 rather than £1 million? Obviously, the knock-on effect of what DRD is doing is crucial because the decision that has been taken on the valuation of the assets is costing the taxpayer an extra £20 million a year in water charges. Why would the company be any less attractive or less viable if it was valued at £650 million rather than £1 billion?

Mr McCormick: It is not so much about whether or not it is attractive; it is about trying to establish a capital structure that would allow the company to be financially sustainable.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Why would it be any less or more sustainable if I decided to value it at £650 million as opposed to £1 billion?

Mr McCormick: If, for example, its future revenues were considerably less than anticipated, it would need to have sufficient capital resources to draw on to enable it to continue trading without a new capital injection. In the case of a Government-owned company, such an injection would mean a call on public expenditure.

Mr Dawson: It would mean a call on public expenditure anyway. If it does not produce the £58 million dividend, you will have to fund it anyway.

Mr P Robinson: Does that mean borrowing against the value of the company?

Mr McCormick: No. Normally, when a company experiences a financial shock, ordinarily it must seek further investment to keep the company financially sustainable, and that would involve a call on public expenditure. The work on the strategic and financial review tried to establish a capital structure that would allow a company to continue trading after a financial shock without the need for a capital injection.

Mr P Robinson: I thought that it was supposed to be self-sufficient. Surely the call would not be on public expenditure but on the consumer.

Mr McCormick: That was the point: to ensure that the company would be financially self-sufficient so that it could absorb any financial shocks itself.

Mr P Robinson: I do not follow that logic.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am lost, but we have experts here who can no doubt explain the logic of this to us.

If Members have finished asking questions, I will ask our two advisers, Victor Hewitt and Michael Smyth, to enter the discussion.

3.00 pm

Mr Hewitt: The layperson will find the whole subject completely baffling due to a combination of public-expenditure rules, the way in which the company has been set up, the models that have been used, and so on. Therefore, I will attempt to clarify some points.

In your presentation you set out the differences between the agency and Go-co set-ups. As regards the Go-co, there is no reference to a capital charge against the Department. Is there no such charge against the Department in respect of the company?

Mr Pengelly: Do you mean a cost-of-capital charge?

Mr Hewitt: Yes.

Mr Pengelly: There is, but it does not appear in the presentation because it nets to zero. The cost-of-capital charge against the Department is offset by the extraction of the dividend.

Mr Hewitt: The dividend, therefore, will cancel out the cost-of-capital charge, and that is why you need the dividend to be paid across.

Mr Pengelly: Yes; and the extent to which the dividend cannot be paid would have to be met through the increased subsidy. Therefore, it is captured in that item.

Mr Hewitt: OK. In your presentation you provided a comparison of public expenditure requirements. Public expenditure is calculated net of receipts. However, you have included a tariff line in the table you have provided: are those not receipts?

Mr Pengelly: Yes.

Mr Hewitt: Should there not, therefore, be a negative against them?

Mr Pengelly: The table aims to show the full cost of running the Water Service.

Mr Hewitt: So, are we talking about gross cost rather than public expenditure cost?

Mr Pengelly: The figures on the first two lines of the table show the net departmental expenditure limit costs. The table is showing the full cost.

Mr Hewitt: Would the tariffs net off those departmental expenditure limit costs?

Mr Pengelly: A departmental expenditure limit resource cost of £118 million allows expenditure of £160 million.

Mr Hewitt: It appears that the Treasury is setting the rules in order to make the existing situation look extremely expensive for Northern Ireland and make the proposal for the Go-co attractive in public expenditure terms.

In a sense, therefore, retaining the agency format is being made to look like the worst-case scenario for the Province. Going down the other route is being made to look sweeter by such things as riding down the asset base from £5 billion or £6 billion to £1 billion, which you are charging on in the AME line in your table. Of course, you will be taking those charges through to the customer, which you are not doing at present.

Mr Pengelly: I have a contextual point to set against that — as regards the figure of £717 million and the agency context. That figure grows every year by a percentage uplift, however, we get nothing through the Barnett formula. That means that an annual uplift of 5%, 6% or 7% — where nothing is coming into the block grant to fund that increase — is the worst-case scenario, but that is because of the mechanics of the way in which Northern Ireland is funded.

Mr Hewitt: There was an interesting revelation that access to the borrowing requirement now depends on the introduction of water charges. Interestingly, the Northern Ireland Audit Office (NIAO) this morning published its analysis of the RRI in 'Reinvestment and Reform: Improving Northern Ireland's Public Infrastructure'. Helpfully, in appendix 1 to that report, the formula used to determine the RRI borrowing power has been published for the first time. No mention was made in the report that access to the borrowing requirement now depends on the introduction of water charges. Was the NIAO aware that that condition has now been imposed on top of the other conditions?

Mr Pengelly: I cannot say definitively. However, given the NIAO's access to a range of papers when producing that report —

Mr Hewitt: So, they simply did not bother to mention it.

Correct me if I am wrong, but it appears that the consortium that advised on the Go-co considered it as though it were a private sector company. They asked themselves what asset base the company would require in order to be credible in the market situation. As Mr McCormick said, it serves as a buffer against bad times. It is a case of the shareholder picking up the tab by putting assets into the company. The question is whether it is an appropriate model to be applying in these circumstances.

It has been stated that the taxpayer is putting £1 billion into the company. As it stands, the taxpayer has put £5 billion into the agency. Short of privatising the agency and selling it off as a company, there is no way in which the taxpayer can recover any of that money. In what sense are the Government putting £1 billion into the company and applying private-sector required rates of return?

Mr Pengelly: With regard to the point that the investment capital is already there — that there is a current asset base of £7 billion, which is coming down to £1 billion, I agree that there is not £1 billion of additional money going in at this point. However, there is £1 billion of taxpayers' equity in this organisation.

Mr Hewitt: Which one cannot get out, short of actually selling it.

Mr Pengelly: Regardless of that, in the UK public expenditure context, the fact that £1 billion of UK capital is tied up in an organisation means that there must be a return, to reflect the fact that the capital is sitting in that place as opposed to another.

Ms Gildernew: But taxpayers here paid that money. It is not as though it was a handout from the Exchequer. We pay taxes too.

Mr Pengelly: Yes, but it was funded from UK general taxation — the funding was made available to Northern Ireland through a formula. The £58 million, which is the return on that funding, will come from the people who will pay water charges in Northern Ireland. That money will come to Northern Ireland and will be available to Northern Ireland.

Mr McNarry: Are we allowed to ask if this is a set-up for privatisation? It looks ripe for that.

Mr P Robinson: Are you expecting to get an answer to that question?

Mr Sterling: David Cairns would want me to say this. He would want me to repeat —

Mr McNarry: He told Stephen Nolan all this. I heard that.

Mr Sterling: He said that it was unthinkable that this company would be privatised within five years. In saying that, he took account of the fact that he could predict only for the next three years. The Labour Party is only going to be in power for three years before there is a general election. That comes on top of the Secretary of State's statement in which he said that it would be unforeseeable that there would be privatisation and that he has no plans for privatisation.

Mr McNarry: That is not what I asked. I just asked if the company was being set up for privatisation.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Cairns did not say what was going to happen in year six.

Mr Smyth: I have a couple of questions. First, you mentioned that the dividend of 5·8% was set higher than that of similar water companies in Britain because of the higher risk involved. It is not immediately obvious why that should be. How can you justify such a high dividend when the Go-co must be less risky than a private company?

Secondly, could water charges be construed as a new income stream with respect to the RRI? If so, would it be possible to borrow against those for investment purposes instead of investment having to be funded from the block grant?

Mr McCormick: As Mr Sterling said earlier regarding the business risk, there is the setting up of the new company and its income streams. A lot of what is happening is new, and the business risk is reflected there.

Additionally, the financial and strategic review of Water Service identified the regulatory risk. That would be higher here because there would be a new, untested regulatory regime. The conclusion was that, overall, there would be a premium for risk here in comparison with England and Wales because of the local circumstances in which we find ourselves, both for the company and for its regime. That goes some way to explaining the difference between the figures of 5·1% and 5·8%.

Mr Pengelly: The position is that access to RRI borrowing is conditional on what is called “qualifying revenue”. The policy in Northern Ireland is that only rates increases count as qualifying revenue — water charges do not.

Mr Smyth: Says who? Was that negotiated in 1998 under the RRI, or has that been subsequent evolution?

Mr Pengelly: The position has been clarified in the last few years. There was a lot of uncertainty, when the RRI was first negotiated in 1998, about the introduction of water charges. Subsequent to the policy on the clear-path introduction of water charges, the Treasury has clarified the position.

Mr Smyth: There might be a case for revisiting that and arguing that this is a new income stream.

Mr Pengelly: The policy at the moment is that it does not count for qualifying revenue purposes.

The Committee Clerk: Mr Sterling provided a note clarifying the date on which the change took place at the behest of the Treasury. Was it in 2004 that water was added?

Mr Sterling: Yes, I believe so.

The Committee Clerk: The note did not include a rationale for the addition.

Mr P Robinson: Were they not attempting to be helpful by adding water reform at that stage — so that it would count for qualifying revenue purposes? RRI funding could not be accessed unless the gap between the increases here and those in Great Britain was met. Was adding water reform not supposed to narrow that gap?

Mr Pengelly: When the RRI borrowing power was negotiated, the correspondence was predicated on closing the revenue gap between Northern Ireland and Great Britain. In 2004 it was clarified that, for the purposes of RRI borrowing, the revenue gap should be defined purely by reference to rates and council tax as opposed to rates and water charges.

Mr P Robinson: That is not the question that I wanted to ask. Since there are no Barnett consequentials for water, why is the Treasury charging anything? Surely the issue is one for a Northern Ireland Government. The Treasury pays nothing towards water here.

Mr Pengelly: In the overall context of UK public expenditure the Barnett consequentials —

Mr P Robinson: There are no Barnett consequentials for water; we get no money from the UK Exchequer towards water. Is that not right?

Mr Pengelly: That is right. However —

Mr P Robinson: Therefore it is ours.

Mr Pengelly: The UK Exchequer looks at the unhypothecated nature of the Barnett consequentials: it was UK public expenditure that put the asset base in place, therefore, it is still an asset of the UK taxpayer. According to the UK public expenditure system, it must generate a return.

Mr P Robinson: In fact, it was Northern Ireland Government expenditure that put the infrastructure in place. How far back do we go? The asset is one over which the Northern Ireland Government have control, because no money comes from the Exchequer towards it. Why does the Exchequer control whether the asset value of the Go-co is £650 million or £1 billion? Surely that should be our decision. Is that decision flexible? Can it be changed?

Mr Pengelly: I am not sure of the position post-restoration. At present, the valuation of any public expenditure asset is subject to Treasury ratification.

Mr P Robinson: Can it become a devolved matter?

Mr Pengelly: I would need to confirm that definitively, but my view is that the Treasury would regard the matter as primarily a fiscal one in which there would be a reserved element and in which the Treasury would continue to have an interest.

Mr P Robinson: Responsibility for water is devolved, as is responsibility for our finances. Why should water revenue not be a devolved matter?

Mr Pengelly: If an Executive were to lower the valuation from £1 billion to, say, £500 million, the loss of £500 million would be a hit against the resources available to the Executive.

Mr P Robinson: If the issue were deferred, for example, for six months, the decision to proceed with a Go-co would be taken by a Northern Ireland Executive, would it not?

Mr Pengelly: Yes. The Executive could decide on a lower valuation. However, the decision to reduce the valuation from £1 billion to, say, £600 million could affect resources available.

Mr P Robinson: However, we are not talking about real money, are we?

Mr Pengelly: That is an entirely different debate.

Mr P Robinson: What I mean is that you could have chosen a figure of £650 million and not £1 billion.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): By how much would a valuation of £650 million on the asset base reduce water bills? Would the £58 million dividend go down to £32 million a year, which is what, roughly, the figure would be, given that asset base? Would that not take £20 million off water rates bills in Northern Ireland? Would it not wipe out a significant proportion of those bills?

Mr Pengelly: I am not sure about the proportion, but I agree that that would take £20 million off the cost base of the organisation, and that, as it is to be self-financing, would take £20 million off bills.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That equates to £20 for every adult in the Province: the first year's bill could be as low as £30. If that simple economic measure were taken, what would be the impact on people's bills?

3.15 pm

Mr Hewitt: The impact would be to increase the subsidy required from the Department to the company. It would be like a carousel in which they pay a dividend to you, but you pay a subsidy back to them.

Mr Dawson: Are the subsidy and dividend not exactly the same amount?

Mr Hewitt: No. The subsidy would be higher than the dividend.

Mr Pengelly: That will be the case in the first year.

Mr Hewitt: Therefore if the company brings in less money and is constrained in what it can do with its charges, would it not require a higher subsidy to maintain itself?

Mr Pengelly: If, instead of starting with a value of £1 billion, the starting point were at £650 million, the Department for Regional Development would require a rate of return of 5.8% on £650 million. Therefore the requirement on the Go-co would be lower, with the result that there would be an impact on bills — because the cost base of the Go-co would be reduced.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Therefore, one of your options would have reduced the bills to the public substantially.

Mr P Robinson: It is bound to.

Mr Hewitt: Yes. It is inevitable that that would have happened.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Therefore, this is just a paper exercise. You could have chosen the option of £650 million, which was available and which was entirely within Treasury guidelines. However, you went for the neater figure.

Mr Sterling: It was not an option for us.

Mr Dawson: The range was set, though.

Mr P Robinson: The option was available to the person who took the decision.

Mr Pengelly: That is correct.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): However, you went for the neater and easier to remember figure of £1 billion because that would get you £58 million a year as a dividend.

Ms Gildernew: That is also the bigger figure.

Dr McDonnell: Most of the points that I wanted to discuss have been probed already. However, taking a slightly different angle; is there the option to review the £1 billion figure a year or two down the road or is it fixed for ever? When the mistake in valuing the asset at £1 billion has been realised, can it be revalued at £500 million or £600 million?

Mr Sterling: The regulator could review it in the pricing — or periodic — review in 2009. However, if the regulator decided the value should be reduced, we understand that that reduction in valuation would be an impairment on our accounts and, therefore, would result in a cost to us. For example, if we wrote it down by £200 million, there would be a cost to us.

Dr McDonnell: Does that mean that we are locked in at the £1 billion figure?

Mr Sterling: That is my understanding.

Dr McDonnell: Not to play games: I feel that the company is grossly overvalued at £1 billion.

Mr McNarry: Is the point not that —

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Please let Dr McDonnell finish.

Mr McNarry: I am sorry; I thought that he had finished.

Dr McDonnell: What is the argument against a handover to the Go-co at zero-asset value and allowing it to build up the asset value? There is a very strong argument for that, and other members have picked up on it.

There has already been investment in the assets over the years — the infrastructure already exists; it is in the ground and cannot be dug up. Theoretically, in a virtual situation, it could be claimed that the assets are worth £1 billion. However, rather than fiddle around with a phased-in system, surely the honest thing to do would be to say that the company has a zero valuation, and as such its value could increase, and people could be charged X amount for water. Effectively, that would mean that the assets would be given to the Go-co at zero value. What is the argument against that?

Mr Sterling: The value of the asset helps determine how much the company can collect from its customers. The lower the asset's value, the lower the amount that can be recouped to recover the cost of the company.

Dr McDonnell: You are therefore telling me that the value of the asset will set the dividend to the Government, and that that dividend will set the cost of the water charges? That means that this is a virtual exercise, which is largely similar to what happened with the electricity companies. The overvaluation of those companies set the price of our electricity for 15 or 18 years. The artificial and excessive valuation of the water company at £1 billion will set the price of water at a much higher level than it should be.

That is all that I wanted to know; you have probably answered the question. Much of this relates to the valuation that is put on the company.

Mr McNarry: Following on from that simple question, would a new Executive be able to restructure the Go-co?

Mr Sterling: Yes. However, DFP would make the call on the extent to which Treasury rules apply during devolution.

Mr Pengelly: The Executive would have significant flexibility. The provision of water and sewerage services would be a devolved matter and the Executive would be the primary body taking decisions on those services.

However, the limiting factor is the extent to which those decisions have public expenditure consequences within the public expenditure framework as defined by the Treasury. The Executive would have to deal with those consequences also. They would have the flexibility to restructure, but the issue would be about managing the implications.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Would that require primary legislation?

Mr Pengelly: It would depend on the extent of the change.

Mr McNarry: Have we reached this point because the person who wanted to take the decision, did so, and dismissed other options? In so doing, has that person bound the Treasury to a level that it will be very difficult to get it away from, were a new Executive to be formed? According to what was said earlier, there is now a query about what might be devolved and reserved matters.

Mr Pengelly: To make it clear, the provision and structuring of water and sewerage services in Northern Ireland would be a devolved matter, and the Executive would deal with that exclusively. The reserved matter is the UK public expenditure framework.

Mr McNarry: However, restructuring the Go-co might involve restructuring the equity.

Mr Pengelly: There would be a transitional implication from the point of transition from the structure that already exists to one that an Executive would establish.

Mr Sterling: Again, much would depend on what the Executive would want to do.

Mr McNarry: Will we be getting a copy of the Hansard report of this session?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes.

This has been a useful session. Have efficiency savings been built into the system so that they can be used to offset bills?

Mr Sterling: Efficiency savings, and the tariffs that flow from them, will be built into the cost structure of the company. Those elements are being developed through the strategic business planning process.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): To what extent are we locked into this situation once the legislation goes through the Privy Council? I would like to know that, and our researchers could possibly help the subgroup with that question. What scope would the Executive have if they were to come to the Assembly on the issue? Any primary legislation required would take quite a long time to be enacted, and the system will have been up and running for several years by then. It would be interesting to know what scope is available before we start making promises that, technically, we may not be able to keep.

Are there any other questions?

Mr Hewitt: I have a point of clarification. The Chairman mentioned efficiency savings. Are those not linked to the dividend issue? In a sense, requiring the company to pay a dividend while simultaneously capping what customers can be charged pressurises the management of the company to make efficiency savings within the company in order to balance the books. Therefore all aspects are interconnected: one element cannot be removed without having an influence on the others. Reducing the dividend reduces the pressure on the company to become efficient; increasing the dividend increases the pressure to become efficient. Is that a correct interpretation?

Mr Sterling: Yes.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is everybody happy? Perhaps the correct question is whether everybody is finished.

Mr Dawson: Moving on from the water issue, I have a question for Mr Pengelly about the Chancellor's £35 billion figure. I think that he said that it was a no growth figure.

Mr Pengelly: It is flat real growth.

Mr Dawson: If real growth of 0.5% or 1% is assumed, what would the four-year projection for Northern Ireland be vis-à-vis the £35 billion?

Mr Pengelly: I do not know the exact projection off the top of my head.

Mr Dawson: Would you come back to the subgroup on that?

Mr Pengelly: Yes, I will reply very quickly.

Dr McDonnell: Is there any perspective on the innovation fund or how it might work? Part of the information on that was vague.

Mr Pengelly: We have heard nothing beyond the Chancellor's letter of 13 November.

Dr McDonnell: Does that mean that you cannot put any parameters on that?

Mr Pengelly: Yes.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Thank you. The discussion was illuminating and interesting, if somewhat quirky at times. The subgroup will be seeing some of your team next Wednesday for a much more intensive question-and-answer session on the whole principle of water charging.

Adjourned at 3.25 pm.

The subgroup met at 10.20 am.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Good morning and welcome to the first meeting of the Subgroup to Consider the Schools Admission Policy.

As is the normal practice, I will call out the name of each Member as they ask their first question, rather than waste time with introductions. I will begin by asking the representatives of the Department of Education to commence with opening remarks. Then I will allow Members to ask questions. School admissions policy is an issue on which everyone has strong views, and I am keen to hear as many views as possible.

Dr Robson Davison (Department of Education): The Department has put together some short papers covering topics such as previous developments, the current position, and the main elements involved in the admissions process. Do you want us to begin by summarising the papers, or would you rather we started straight into the discussion? Have Members received their copies of the papers?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes. Please begin.

Dr Davison: I will be brief. The papers explain how policy has developed, the present position and the main elements of the process in which we are engaged. We are here to clarify anything that we can for Members in relation to the various processes. We are bound by the Secretary of State's letter to the Assembly setting out the parameters within which we can operate. We are here to explain things as best we can for Members, but we are unable to supply personal or speculative views.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do any other members of the Department's deputation have anything to say at this stage? No?

Members, this is your opportunity to ask questions. You are all aware of the reference to this issue in the St Andrews Agreement. My understanding is that the form of selection represented by the 11-plus is over, although other forms of selection are not precluded.

Dr Davison: From the Department's perspective, the last transfer test will take place in 2008. However, the St Andrews Agreement refers the decision on selection by ability or otherwise to the Assembly. The Assembly's decision, endorsed by the Executive, would then become policy. Present policy may therefore change.

Mr D Bradley: The Independent Strategic Review of Education, carried out by Professor Sir George Bain, proposed an area-based approach to future school planning. Might that approach be streamlined to match enlarged catchment areas for schools, so that transport planning, building development and other services might be co-ordinated? There would be obvious advantages, including financial savings.

Dr Davison: You will appreciate that the Department has just received the Bain Report. We are still studying its implications — not only as regards the issues we are discussing today, but for the breadth of ground that the report covers. My only comment is that in our paper on admissions, catchment areas are one possibility that could be incorporated. Like other elements of policy, catchment areas might be aligned to area-based infrastructure planning. That would be for a future Minister and a future Assembly to determine. Certainly, catchment areas are one option on the admissions side.

Mr D Bradley: Is that a possibility?

Dr Davison: Catchment is a current consideration, but it would be for the Assembly and a future Minister to determine what is built around it.

Mr Leslie Ashe (Department of Education): Catchment is just one of a number of elements in the admissions criteria — it is important to remember that.

Mr D Bradley: If there is an opportunity for alignment between what Bain is suggesting and future admissions criteria, that may prove to be useful.

Dr Davison: That is at one end of the spectrum. It has the benefits of a central planning view of the world. However, there are downsides as well.

Mr D Bradley: What are the disadvantages?

Dr Davison: Parental choice would be involved. The catchment areas drawn up might not match everyone's choice.

Mr D Bradley: People will not be pleased anyway.

Dr Davison: You cannot win in a lot of cases.

Mr D Bradley: I said that an enlarged catchment area might overcome some of the problems that people have referred to in the past as the postcode lottery.

Mr David Woods (Department of Education): That is one point, certainly. One of the papers that we have submitted touches on the Department's current thinking on how certain admissions criteria might be defined.

The Department assumed that it would leave the definition of a catchment area to the schools themselves — recognising the other side of the coin, that one size may not fit all. We are conscious that the catchment areas of schools differ quite markedly depending on whether one is in an urban or rural area. We had been allowing flexibility around that. Other jurisdictions have defined catchment areas separately for their own reasons, and there are other ways of coming to a decision.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I wish to outline the way forward for the rest of the meeting. We have extra time, as the opening remarks were quite brief. I wish to invite Mr Jeffrey Donaldson to ask a series of questions, then Mr David McNarry, then Ms Caitríona Ruane and then Mr Barry McElduff. That saves introducing each individual later.

Mr Donaldson: I want to return to Mr Bradley's point about catchment. Research Services have provided us with a paper on the new admissions arrangements for post-primary education. It contains the following question:

"Will the geographical criteria not result in selection by post-code?"

The answer given is:

"One of the underlying principles of the new arrangements is that schools normally service their local community."

Forgive me, Mr Chairman, for being parochial: I wish to use the city of Lisburn as an example. Within a two-mile radius of the urban core there are six post-primary schools. St Patrick's is a maintained school, and there are five state-controlled or independent grammar schools. Some of them — for example, the two grammar schools, Friends School and Wallace High School — sit almost side by side. How do those schools define the local community that they service? If someone lives in Moira, Hillsborough or Annahilt, which school's local community does that person fall into?

10.30 am

Dr Davison: You have illustrated one of the problems with catchment areas, which is the simple issue of definition. Lisburn is an example. However, one could name several places where there is the same problem: it might be extremely difficult to define a catchment area. However, that is not to say that it is impossible. It would be a difficult call in a town that has five or six schools.

Mr Woods: Although we have not attempted to define what a catchment area is, it is on the list of admissions criteria that a school could decide to use. Some schools have a clearly defined catchment area, such as the local parish. However, to return to the wider issue, which is that schools normally serve their local community, there are costs involved in pupils travelling long distances to schools. There is some inconvenience to families as well as costs to the education budget. The aspiration is that a school that is well regarded in its community will serve its community without the need for pupils to travel in other directions. However, we have not sought to constrain or confine people in any way.

Mr Donaldson: Therefore, the idea of a catchment area or of serving a local community is, at the moment, a broad concept that has not been pinned down. With regard to a particular local community, what is going to happen to the Dickson plan in Craigavon under those proposals? As you know, transfer in Craigavon takes place at age 14 — albeit there is transfer at age 11, but selection takes place at age 14. Will the Dickson plan continue under the new system, and if it does, what does that say about the capacity to develop local arrangements in, for example, Lisburn, where there are several schools in close proximity to one another?

You mentioned that there is not a "one size fits all" approach. However, I must say that as a parent and a public representative, nothing that I have read from the Department has made clear how it is going to handle that in practice. It was made clear in the Burns Report, which went into some detail about local collegiates, and so forth. However, there has not been any clarity since. I am not sure whether there has been a move away from that. Where does the Dickson plan lie under those arrangements, and what is there to stop other areas adopting the Dickson plan under that system?

Mr Woods: To date, nothing in the Government's thinking has had any impact on the structure of schools or on how schools are organised in any locality. The key difference is in the Government's current stance to introduce a non-selective system by which pupils in Craigavon, for example, could still go to junior high schools up to the age of 14 and transfer to other schools thereafter, but not on the basis of academic selection. Therefore, the structures would stay, but the basis of transfer beyond that would not include academic selection.

Mr Donaldson: Does that not render the whole point of the Dickson plan irrelevant? The idea was that there would be transfer at age 14 on the basis of a form of selection which would allow children to transfer according to their aptitude, vocational interests, and so on. What is the point in maintaining a system that transfers children at the age of 14, when it is not based on any academic criteria?

What would be the role of Lurgan College as against Killicomaine Junior High School, Clounagh Junior High School or Portadown College, for example? What will be their role in the future? They are clearly defined at present, but what will Portadown College become when this new system is in place? Will it become an all-ability comprehensive?

Mr Ashe: There is nothing to prevent those schools from retaining their existing status, position and role among the schools in the area. Like transfer now at the age of 14, a parent would have to examine a child's attributes and consider what the school can offer before deciding whether Portadown College or some other school is appropriate for the child's needs at that particular age. The system of transfer at the age of 14 would be identical to the system at the age of 11.

Mr Donaldson: If I were a parent living in Moira, and I had a choice between the schools in Lisburn and the schools in Lurgan, when would I take that decision? Would it be when my child is aged 11 or 14?

Mr Ashe: It could be at both ages.

Mr Donaldson: Is it possible to have two transfers?

Mr Ashe: At the moment, two transfers are possible under the Dickson plan.

Mr Donaldson: The Department's submission notes the complexity of the current admissions criteria; your approach in the new system is to simplify those criteria. However, I have read your detailed documentation and, as a parent, am left very confused about how this system will work. That is not a cheap point; it is a genuine concern as someone who deals with parents appealing decisions about what school their child will get into and so on — as I am sure all my colleagues do every summer. I know how confusing all that form-filling can be. I appreciate that the current system is far from simple, but I feel that issues have not been simplified for parents. There is so much uncertainty in much of what you have said this morning that I am still left very confused.

Nevertheless, I want to turn now to the issue of the pupil profile. The Department is at pains to make clear that the pupil profile is not a means of selection. The Department is clear in saying that the objective of the pupil profile is to inform parents. I accept that parents need information to make informed decisions about their child's education. The Department has made provision whereby, if it is the parents' wish, the school can see the pupil profile, but not for the purposes of selection. Why is the Department opposed to the pupil profile being used as a basis for selection?

Mr Woods: It is not so much that we are against it, but that the pupil profile is not designed for that purpose. It is an information document — a standardised annual report. All schools give annual reports to parents at the end of the school year.

Mr McNarry: Is that the pupil profiling that you are pushing, or is it profiling per se?

Mr Woods: It is the pupil profile that has been under development. We are talking about the position to date.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Ms Ruane, I think that you may be concerned about the way in which the subgroup is being conducted?

Ms Ruane: Yes, I think that we should stick to your earlier arrangement.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am allowing Mr Donaldson to go down a line of questioning, but I will be equally generous with other members so that they can tease out their own issues.

Mr Woods: The current concept of the pupil profile is a standardised annual report that gives parents consistent information about how children are progressing at school. At the moment, if parents have children attending different schools, the format of their reports will differ from school to school. The pupil profile will be more consistent in order to benefit parents. A profile will indicate a child's progress in the core skills areas — communication, use of maths, information and communication technology — as well as in the other broad curriculum areas.

Its purpose is to provide information. As currently conceived, it does not place pupils in any sort of rank order. Therefore, in its present form, it could not be used for the purposes of selection.

Mr Donaldson: Implicit in your remarks is the suggestion that the pupil profile could be developed, by changing its layout and so forth. My children's reports clearly tell me where they came in the class in their examination results, the class average for the results and so on. If it is possible to include that kind of information in a pupil profile, is it not also possible, at least in theory, to develop pupil profiles so that they could be used in other ways? For example, in the event of oversubscription, a school could use pupil profiles as one of the criteria for selection.

Mr Woods: In theory, everything is possible. However, two issues must be borne in mind. First, we know from historical experience that primary schoolteachers will not be comfortable with the idea that what they write in a pupil's report will determine which school that pupil goes to at the age of 11, and their position must be considered.

Secondly, using the information contained in the profile in that high-stakes manner would raise the issue of ensuring consistency. For example, my child's profile could show that he is third in the class, but how would that profile compare with that of another child who is fourth or fifth in a different class, based on a different class test? There are issues about ensuring consistency and validity in that sort of arrangement.

Mr Donaldson: I appreciate that. The consultation document stated that the pupil profile was to provide parents with information about the most appropriate school for their children. What does the word "appropriate" actually mean in that context? Does it indicate a tacit acceptance that certain schools are better for children with particular aptitudes? Does that not implicitly represent a form of selection, even if it is the parents who are making the decision?

Mr Woods: I am not sure about the particular reference that Mr Donaldson mentioned — it may be a bit of poor drafting on our part. The purpose of the profile is to allow parents to determine which is the most appropriate school for their child. The Department does not determine that — it does not have a definition of the most appropriate school.

It is clear that some form of differentiation—selection is perhaps the wrong word — is implicit. The Government have not said that they will abolish grammar schools, so there will be different types of schools with different educational characteristics and different styles of curriculum. Thus, under the current proposals, parents must choose which type of school is most suitable for their child.

Mr Donaldson: Finally, what work has the Department carried out on alternatives to the 11-plus examination since 2000? Has any work been carried out on a proposed acceptable alternative to the 11-plus? For example, has any work been carried out on whether future admissions criteria might involve some form of examination, either through continuous testing or through pupil profiling? Is any such work available from the Department?

Mr Woods: No.

Mr Donaldson: The Department has not carried out any work on replacing the 11-plus?

Mr Woods: Not with regard to selection by ability. The work that has been carried out has been based on the Minister's view that there ought not to be selection based on ability.

10.45 am

Mr McNarry: Gentlemen, you are welcome. The message that I receive from parents and teachers in my constituency, and in every constituency that I have visited lately, is that education is overwhelmed by documentation but underwhelmed by satisfactory outcomes. The issue of academic selection has been held over for consideration by the Assembly, with which comes the murky world of deadlines and compelling handovers. Given that that is happening despite the possibility that a devolved Assembly may not be restored, it surely prompts some interesting thinking.

If there were to be no restoration — and I am sure that you are not betting against it — then, under continued direct rule, the passing of those deadlines vis-à-vis the future of the Assembly causes a state of confusion about the handover of deadlines relating to the 11-plus. I would welcome a statement from you outlining exactly how, in the absence of a restored Assembly, the Department would handle things under direct rule.

Dr Davison: You have entered political territory there, which the Department is not in a position to debate. The Department's understanding of the legislation is that there is a deadline and that if it is not met, Ministers will proceed with the policy as enunciated before the legislation was passed. The Department cannot debate speculatively about what might happen if that deadline is not met: those are political issues.

Mr McNarry: Correct me if I am wrong but, in effect, the Department is preparing either for a deadline to be met or missed. If it is missed, the fate of academic selection will no longer be in the Assembly's hands. The part of the legislation that leaves academic selection to be considered by the Assembly will be nullified, and the Department will kick into action with its proposals under new legislation.

Dr Davison: That is our understanding, but that is clearly a matter for Ministers.

Mr McNarry: It is a major concern for parents. I understand the restraints under which you are operating, and I am not trying to take you into political waters. However, some clarification would be helpful, because parents and teachers are trying to prepare for all eventualities. It is unfair to parents that the situation is so unclear — and I am sure that other Members have been hearing the same thing. They are asking what school uniform they should buy. Are you saying that you cannot offer the parents any help on that?

Mr Woods: Given that it is not a matter of opinion but of legislative fact, the Department can clearly state that if the Assembly is not restored by the date specified in the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006, the automatic consequence will be that the element of the Education (Northern Ireland) Order 2006 banning academic selection comes into effect. There is no other intervening process.

Mr McNarry: You will understand that I cannot accept your choice of words — “the automatic consequence” — because that almost puts the blame on the Assembly.

Mr Woods: Sorry, I am not blaming anyone. It is what the law states.

Mr McNarry: The law does not refer to “consequences” and does not deal in consequences.

Mr Woods: The law simply states that if the Assembly is not restored by the specified date, academic selection will be banned.

Mr Ashe: It is also important to say that while academic selection will be banned at that point, the ban will not take effect until admissions in September 2010.

Mr McNarry: That is precisely the point, and I am glad that you have made it. That is a grey area for parents; they find —

Mr Ashe: The existing arrangements will continue until then.

Mr McNarry: I understand that, but the situation is not clear for parents. There is an onus on the Department of Education to try, where possible, to clarify the situation for parents. Equally, there is an onus on politicians to seek the Department’s help in clarifying the situation for parents. That would be valuable.

One of the principles set out in the post-primary consultation document is that:

“the interests of the child” should be

“at the centre of the decision-making process”.

However, none of the Department’s criteria mentions the real interest of the child. In your opinion, has that principle been achieved? Parental choice, which is given a great deal of credibility throughout the documents, is still an individual choice, yet there has been no recognition of the deserving case for a parent’s choice to be put into a parental voice, forum or organisation in order to give it some formal status. We have gone through all of this without having the benefit of a formal parental voice being heard on the admissions guidelines. I know that one of the Department’s tributaries is working on the new single education authority, and a parental voice may be considered there. Will the Department consider expediting that in light of the involvement of this subgroup and, in broader terms, the Assembly?

The new admissions criteria allow post-primary schools to use the category of “feeder” primary schools. What freedom or autonomy will post-primary schools have in determining which primary schools will, or could be, feeder schools? Many parents are anxious about that issue. It is important that parents know what degree of autonomy schools will have in determining which primary schools they use as feeder schools.

Parents will be selective about which primary school they send their children to. The restraints for bussing are not the same at that stage. Parents will say that they want their child to attend a certain school, because it is a recognised feeder school and their child will stand a better chance. That could lead to a form of discrimination. Parents cannot be faulted for seeking what is best for their children, and the system allows that to be explored by parents.

Dr Davison: The question of the parental voice is for the Minister to determine. The parental voice has been expressed in various consultations over the past few years, but on the specifics of where we go at this point or subsequently, it will be for Ministers to determine the way in which they want to assess the parental voice. Whether that be a forum, an organisation, a consultation or whatever will be a call for Ministers.

Mr McNarry: Do you agree with the principle, referred to in the consultation document, that the interests of the child should be central? One would expect, perhaps, that a parent would be the best person to uphold the interests of a child.

Mr Woods: That is certainly recognised; it is the rationale behind parental preference and giving parents the information to exercise that preference in an informed way, accepting that they have the best interests of their child at heart. That is one aspect of admissions. As Dr Davison said, the wider issue of the parental voice will have to be considered by Ministers in the context of the new education structures.

Mr McNarry: Will you take it back to the Minister? She is not really listening.

Mr Woods: The proceedings of the subgroup will be reported, and I am sure that the Minister will be able to pick that up.

Mr McNarry: She did not listen to previous proceedings. She was very badly briefed at an earlier meeting.

Mr John Leonard (Department of Education): Post-primary schools will define their feeder primary schools. The basis of the proposals is to try to have as much flexibility as possible for schools.

Mr D Bradley: On what basis will feeder primary schools be defined?

Mr Leonard: They will be defined on the basis of the extent to which the children who already attend the post-primary school have come from them. That will be a matter for the post-primary school. There are indications from the current system that —

Mr D Bradley: Therefore, a post-primary school cannot decide to add feeder primary schools to its list unless that primary school has contributed pupils over a number of years?

Dr Davison: The school will be free to choose on the basis of historical attendance. However, that freedom will be constrained. The Department of Education has the power to consider and approve where it thinks that there is doubt. What it would not want, for example, is for a primary school that has historically sent children to a post-primary school to be excluded on rather strange grounds. The Department will be in a position to monitor and challenge those sorts of decisions.

Mr McNarry: I accept what you say, Mr Leonard. However, given the school closures and amalgamations that we face today, what degree of flexibility is built into those criteria? What if an established school, with those kinds of links, hits the wall? How does the post-primary school make a decision when, for instance, it used to be school A, but now schools A and B have joined together? How does it address that situation? Is it still the school's decision?

Dr Davison: In that situation the new school would revisit —

Mr McNarry: Who would sanction that revisit?

Dr Davison: Given the Department's power to intervene, it would want to examine what emerged from that.

Mr McNarry: When a primary school has closed or been amalgamated, and is in the process of making representations to re-establish links with a post-primary school where there is now no history, must that be sanctioned by the Department of Education, and could there be disruption to that process?

11.00 am

Dr Davison: In the current system, when an amalgamation takes place, the same process applies. The difference will be the Department's role in the process. I am not assuming that there will be any major dislocation of any process. The purpose is to leave as much in the hands of the school as possible, because it knows the local circumstances best.

Mr Woods: There will be no mystery about what are, or are not treated as feeder primary schools. The post-primary schools will have to list the feeder primary schools in their admissions booklet or prospectus, so parents will know what the position is. In circumstances where there is an amalgamation — which would not happen overnight — there would always be adequate notice. The list of feeder schools can be extended.

Mr McNarry: I understand that. I know that you have not had a chance to adopt the Bain Report, but there is a reference in it about the funding of preparatory schools. They are obvious feeder schools in a true sense. Is that likely to have any impact?

Dr Davison: It is too early to speculate on that.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The next question is from Ms Caitriona Ruane, to be followed by Mr Barry McElduff. They have been waiting for some time.

Ms Ruane: Fáilte romhaibh. You are very welcome. Thank you for the papers that you presented and for taking questions from us.

There is much angst about all the changes. Perhaps that is because — as you can hear from my accent — I did not grow up in the North of Ireland, although my children are in school here.

In my town, the changes happened very seamlessly and easily, and parental choice was fundamental to the process. Very few parents were unhappy about the changes and the schools that were chosen to transfer pupils from primary to secondary school. Different factors were taken into consideration, such as whether the pupils wanted to go to an Irish-medium secondary school, etc. I am not as worried about the situation as some other people. However, I understand the angst, because change is difficult.

The changes will benefit society in the longer term and create a more cohesive society. Initially, there will be much angst, but eventually, common sense will prevail. Parents with busy lives will get used to sending their children to the nearest school, because they do not want to spend half an hour travelling every morning. Change also brings dynamism and creativity. Once we get over the initial difficulties, that dynamism will kick in.

I come from a border area: I live in the South and my kids go to school in the North, so you can see where my question is coming from as regards catchment areas. Are you meeting with an Roinn Oideachais agus Eolaíochta (Department of Education and Science) in the South of Ireland? There would be no point in setting up a system in the North of Ireland when we will have North/South Ministerial Councils. The nearest post-primary school for my kids is in Newry rather than in Dundalk, as is my nearest primary school of choice for the Irish language. What thought has been given to North/South catchment areas? I am sure that the same applies for Inishowen and Castleblayney, and vice versa. That has other implications; one of the banes of my life is that there is no transport for my kids, which is a pain in the neck and does not make sense. What thought has been given to that issue, and what work are you doing in relation to that?

I love the idea of schools specialising in different subjects, such as music. How would that work in relation to catchment areas or criteria?

I must declare an interest as regards my next question. What would the development of Comhairle na Gaelscolaíochta — Irish-medium secondary, primary and pre-schools — naíscóileanna — mean for the development of new schools? At the moment, there is a gap in provision. My child had all her primary education in a bunscoil, and yet there is no meánscoil for her, and she is now in an English-speaking secondary school, which is heartbreaking for me. Comhairle na Gaelscolaíochta has plans for development in areas where there is a gap in provision, such as Downpatrick, Newry and west Tyrone.

The same is true of the integrated sector, and there will be dynamism in the way in which schools will work together. I hope that we will start to see more natural integration of the current schooling system rather than a new integrated set-up, although that is an issue in which people are also interested. What is the Department doing about gaps in provision, and are there any barriers to groups such as Comhairle na Gaelscolaíochta and the integrated movement? It would be very worrying if there were any barriers.

The issue of special needs is very dear to my heart, as it is to other politicians around the table. Children who do not get the right intervention at the right stage is something that breaks my heart. There is some very good early intervention, but what are the plans for special needs? Mainstreaming is also an issue. We really must examine the provision for giving children the best start at post-primary level. Go raibh maith agat.

Dr Davison: Where do we start? Let us take catchment areas. The Department has been working on a set of proposals that emerged from a consideration of the existing system. The Department has not consulted on what the admissions criteria would be, so there is no agreement on them. Ministers intended to consult on the issue, but it has still to be considered. The North/South dimension means that there is clearly an issue about border areas. The Department of Education is in regular contact with colleagues in the Department of Education and Science. At this stage, full consideration has not been given about what is incorporated formally. Nonetheless, the Department is aware that it would be wise to talk to colleagues in the Department of Education and Science about catchment areas around the border. That is the best answer that I can give you on that issue.

Catchment areas have not yet been an issue with regard to specialist schools. The Department's approach to specialist schools is via school improvement. The school uses its specialism to improve on a more general basis and to link into the new curriculum 14+, with its emphasis on a wider provision and a more collaborative approach to the curriculum, where the specialist school can be seen in a wider context. Specialist schools have not yet been read into catchment areas in a detailed way.

The Department has clearly established criteria for the establishment of new schools in the Irish-medium sector. Those proposals go through the same development proposal route as those for other schools. That is the policy at the moment. It is too early for us to say what we make of proposals in the Bain Report.

Ms Ruane quite rightly said that special needs is an area of real importance. We have brought in a schools inspector with expertise in that area to review special educational needs; that review is under way. We have brought together a panel of the main players in that area, and work has been ongoing for three or four months. We hope to have an outcome in the new year. The Department regards special educational needs as a really important issue.

Ms Ruane: Who is the inspector, and who is chairing that?

Dr Davison: The inspector is Marleen Collins.

Mr Ashe: Parents will have a choice of different types of schools. There will be those with an academic curricular emphasis and those with a vocational curricular emphasis, and there will be specialist schools. Therefore, specialist schools will be one of a range of schools from which parents can choose. At the moment, there is a small number of such schools, but that will increase.

Mr McElduff: From the information that you have provided, I understand that 100 schools have trialled the pupil profile, which has been evaluated independently. Two questions arise from that. First, what information about the profile would parents like? Secondly, what do teachers say about its manageability? Perhaps we should deal with those questions first, and I will ask my other two questions later.

Mr Woods: Parents and teachers in the schools that have undertaken the pilot generally reacted positively to it. Parents have appreciated the format of the pupil profile and the information that it contains. They expressed views about ensuring that it was written in good, clear English rather than in teacher-speak, as it were. Therefore, we must ensure that the language in which it is expressed is meaningful and accessible to all parents.

Teachers were generally content with the pupil profile. At an early stage, they expressed fears about its being an additional burden. However, since it is meant to replace the annual reports that schools already provide, there should be no extra burden. We are making arrangements to provide computer software that will allow teachers to complete the pupil profiles using their laptops or other equipment. They can call down comment banks that would help them to populate the report. The aim is to make the pupil profile meaningful for parents but manageable for schools, and the pilot work to date confirms that that is the case.

People have issues with parts of the pupil profile, but the Council for the Curriculum, Examinations and Assessment (CCEA) has been adjusting the format of the profile to address those concerns.

Mr McElduff: Named parishes, named feeder schools and named catchment areas play a part in admissions. I am thinking of schools such as the Christian Brothers Grammar School in Omagh. Primary schools in Castlederg and Aghyaran are natural pathways to schools in Omagh, but people might consider that those areas are, technically, in the Strabane district. However, people who live in Castlederg or Aghyaran shop in Omagh, or perhaps in Ballybofey; in the main, however, people from those places go to school in Omagh.

Are natural, cultural and social pathways taken into account? For example, a big fear that I have heard expressed in that community is that its enriching contribution to Omagh CBS may not continue, even though people would like it to. Is a cut-off planned that would mean that people from that community would be discouraged from going to Omagh and encouraged to go elsewhere?

Dr Davison: In the first instance, it would be for the schools in Omagh to determine their feeder schools. When it comes to monitoring, I doubt whether we would intervene to stop that connection being as broad as the school felt that it should be. It would not be in our interest to break natural pathways.

Unfortunately, I am not as familiar with the Omagh area as Mr McElduff is, but we need to see how maintaining those connections would work in practice. The first call would be to ask what schools see as their feeder schools and how they see their natural pathways. I am sure that a historical picture would be built up over many years.

Mr Woods: A wider issue relates to rural schools and rural communities in general. If a school is oversubscribed after it has applied whatever other criteria it has decided to use, it may still retain some sort of a tie-breaker at the bottom end. If it were to use proximity to the school, the most rural would be most likely to be disadvantaged. We anticipate that our advice to schools in those areas would be that a randomised approach, rather than a distance-based approach, tie-breaker might be better. That approach would not disadvantage those at the greatest distance.

Mr McElduff: I have learnt about the development of learning partnerships in communities such as Limavady, which is very progressive in its approach. What value is there in establishing learning partnerships now to be ready for the future?

Mr Woods: Learning partnerships are coming about naturally from the bottom up as part of the work that schools have been doing in anticipation of the entitlement framework requirements, which seek to provide access to a wider range of subjects for pupils. It has always been recognised that schools cannot do that if they are working in isolation; they will need to collaborate with one another and with their local further education colleges.

Schools in several areas have been developing their thinking and holding conversations among themselves about how they might make arrangements to provide that wider range of subjects. The Limavady partnership pre-dates anything that the Department was doing on the entitlement framework requirements, to be honest. Nevertheless, it is a good example of what can be done. We are aware of similar developments in other areas.

Earlier, Mr Donaldson mentioned the Burns collegiates. These did not receive much positive comment, as it was felt that they were over-engineered and were brigading schools into certain clusters without the schools having had a say in the matter. The present approach is to leave it to schools to make pragmatic decisions on collaborative arrangements. The idea of considering provision on an area basis, which I notice is a feature of the proposals in the Bain Report, has much to commend it, as the proposals should ensure that when individual components are taken together, they make for a broader range of provision for the young people of an area.

Dr Davison: Mr McElduff asked about the value of learning partnerships. We have always considered education to be of personal benefit: it is a good thing to be an educated person. We have always regarded schools as having social and cultural value. The revised curriculum, of which the entitlement framework is a key part, recognises the economic purpose of education in opening up the curriculum to include not just academic provision after the age of 14 but what the Department for Employment and Learning calls professional/technical provision for all pupils.

Therefore, the value of learning partnerships in either school to school, school to further education college or in a broad mixture of those settings is in trying to develop that aspect of schooling as well as the more traditional aspects. That ties in with the work that the Department for Employment and Learning has done in skills development. That is another dimension of learning partnerships.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Although we have had the main questioning, several members wish to ask a supplementary question. Can we keep the questions to one or one and a half?

Mr D Bradley: Since I asked only one question in the first place —

[Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is an important issue, and I have allowed members to tease out points with the representatives from the Department. Mr Donaldson, Mr Bradley and Mr McNarry will now put their questions, and then there will be an opportunity for other members to ask one final question.

Mr Donaldson: Your paper says that non-academic admissions criteria:

“would be required whether or not it is decided that academic selection should form part of future admissions policy: they would be used by non-grammar schools, and also by grammar schools where it is necessary to differentiate within a given ‘ability’ group.”

I am anxious to explore what you mean by “ability” in the context of non-academic admissions criteria.

Mr Leonard: At the moment, grammar schools that are oversubscribed within a grade — A or B1 or B2 — apply their non-academic criteria to decide which pupils to admit. That is the current pattern. Under an assumed non-academic scenario, all grammar schools would apply non-academic criteria all the time and would not have academic criteria. The purpose of the criteria is to give them a menu from which to draw.

Mr Donaldson: I appreciate that, Mr Leonard, but, with respect, that is not what I asked. I understand that what we are moving to at the moment is non-academic selection procedures. However, the Department talks about:

“where it is necessary to differentiate within a given ‘ability’ group.”

I am anxious to explore what you mean by “ability” and how you define that. What does that mean in the context of non-academic selection procedures?

Mr Woods: In the context from which you quoted, we are saying that if there were to be academic selection, those same criteria would serve a certain purpose. That is perhaps what has caused the confusion. In that context, “ability” would be determined by whatsoever means a future Administration decided. That would be the issue. It is one of the questions that you must grapple with. If we are not going to have the existing transfer test but still want to have something that allows for academic selection, the question is quite what —

Mr Donaldson: I am sorry, Mr Chairman, for pursuing this, but I am not getting what I am looking for. I appreciate where the gentlemen are coming from, but that is not actually what the paper says. The paper states:

“These would be required whether or not it is decided that academic selection should form part of future admissions policy.”

So it is in either context.

Mr Woods: You are right. That is bad drafting, specifically on my part. I contributed that sentence; I should stop contributing sentences. We tried to deal with both sides. Of course, in a non-academic situation, all the criteria that schools apply would be non-academic. If — and it is still “if”, depending on what happens with devolution — there is going to an element of selection, we are simply saying that the work done on the non-academic criteria has not been nugatory. It will still be required, even in the event of academic selection. First, there will be a group of schools that will not use the academic criteria, and, secondly, the grammar schools will need it further down their list of criteria. I apologise for any confusion.

Mr Donaldson: My half-question is a very simple one. You talked about the different elements that a school might include in its admissions criteria. There is the “nearest school” or “nearest suitable school” aspect. My question concerns school transport. As you know, at the moment a child qualifies for school transport at post-primary level only if the distance between his or her home and the nearest suitable school is more than three miles.

Currently, “suitable” is defined in different ways. How will it be defined in the future? If the term “nearest suitable school” has a much wider definition in the future and can include any post-primary school — or will it include any post-primary school? — then what do you mean by the word “suitable”?

Dr Davison: One issue that feeds into that is the Bain Report, and how Sir George Bain sees the world developing in the future. One of the issues will relate to that definition and the world that Bain portrays. We will then need to consider what is meant by the term “nearest suitable school”, because there is a picture that suits the current situation, but that may not suit the decisions that are taken in relation to the Bain Report.

We will have to consider the direction that the Bain Report takes us in as regards the overall planning of the schools estate, the nature of the schools estate and, importantly, the transport implications. One of the main school transport issues is the resource implication, the costs. We need to take that issue on board in relation to the debate on the Bain Report.

Mr D Bradley: I want to return to the issue of pupil profiling. I understand that the pupil profile will be a formative document, in so far as it will outline a pupil's successes and achievements, as well as areas for future development that will be addressed by the school, the teacher and even the parents. It is on that basis that primary schoolteachers have agreed to co-operate in the production of pupil profiles, and I believe that they have the support of their unions in that.

I assume that, if pupil profiles become an instrument of academic selection, that goodwill will not be forthcoming, either from the teachers' unions or, indeed, the teachers themselves. Does that mean that pupil profiles could not be used as an instrument of academic selection in the future, purely on the grounds of the probable withdrawal of support for pupil profiling from teachers and teachers' unions?

Mr Woods: It would be inappropriate for me to comment on what the position of individual teachers' unions might be. I mentioned that we would have to have regard to that issue in the context of whether pupil profiling will be used as a basis for selection or whether it will form some part of the selection process.

Those with long enough memories will remember a process that was attempted for a few years in the late 1970s whereby the recommendation of the primary school determined whether a pupil moved to a grammar school or a non-grammar school. That process was fraught with difficulties and only survived for a couple of years. The evidence of history tells us that there are certain constraints on what can be done.

Mr Ashe: There is further historical evidence on the use of assessment outcomes for transfer purposes. That proposal was originally mooted when assessment was introduced but had to be shelved, simply because teachers were not prepared to take part in the training, and so forth, if the assessment outcomes were to be used for transfer purposes. That example contributes to the historical picture.

Mr D Bradley: Just to make up the balance from my only having asked one question at the beginning —

The Chairman (Mr Wells): This is your half-question.

Mr D Bradley: If academic selection were introduced, how would it impact on the other provisions of the Education (Northern Ireland) Order 2006, given that that Order is largely predicated on the existence of a non-selective system during its period of operation?

Mr Woods: The other main provisions of the Order concern the curriculum and the entitlement framework. Those provisions can proceed, and are proceeding, on the basis that was originally planned. Those provisions are free-standing and can, therefore, proceed.

11.30 am

Mr D Bradley: You said that the new curriculum could be a driver for the economy. I understood by that that it would provide many skills that are currently lacking in the workplace. If academic selection were reintroduced, the present situation would continue. Those skills that we would expect to get in the workplace through the operation of the new curriculum would not, in all probability, be forthcoming.

Dr Davison: Under the proposals, one third of the curriculum offered to all children — whether they are in academically selected schools or not — has to be what the Department for Employment and Learning calls “professional and technical”. The provision offered to children would have to include that dimension of learning. That would obtain whether selection continues or not. That is an important part of the plan.

Mr McNarry: How can you square the circle on curriculum content and vocational education for 14- to 19-year-olds on the back of this morning's report when so many pupils fail to reach standards? Many are not achieving; their education stops, in effect, at the age of six. That is a point to which I hope to return.

Does the Department categorically rule out any elements of selection while direct rule continues?

Dr Davison: The Department cannot answer that; that question should be addressed to Ministers. Policy is determined by legislation. Ministers, whether devolved or direct-rule, will decide what happens. It is not for civil servants to determine.

If I may address your first question —

Mr McNarry: I wish that you had answered my second.

Dr Davison: I cannot. It is for Ministers to determine direction.

Mr McNarry: Surely the Department can determine the direction that a Minister might take.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Or advise Ministers.

Mr McNarry: Is that not why this Minister and her predecessors are in such a blooming mess?

Mr Donaldson: Resist the temptation.

Dr Davison: My job is to give advice to Ministers and to implement their policies.

Mr McNarry: And therefore you cannot possibly comment.

Dr Davison: I will answer your first question, which is important. The Audit Office and the Public Accounts Committee have illustrated an important issue. It ties in with the importance of providing for special educational needs.

The Department rightly congratulates itself on the quality of outcomes in its system. Sometimes, however, that success masks underachievement, which was pointed out in a straightforward manner by the Audit Office and the Public Accounts Committee. Underachievement presents the Department with a significant problem. One of the Department's responses is to strengthen greatly the emphasis in the revised curriculum on basic skills such as literacy, numeracy, and information and communications technology. It is conscious that underachievement is a significant issue.

Mr McNarry: This is my half-bit now —

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Strictly speaking, this is not in the subgroup's terms of reference.

Mr McNarry: If you allow me to complete my question —

Mr D Bradley: If I leave the room at this stage, does he have to stop?

Mr McNarry: Do you accept that academic selection has had no bearing whatsoever on the figures in that report, and that it is not a barrier to pupils?

Dr Davison: That is a big question, to which I cannot give you a simple answer. It is a moot point as to whether the selection of pupils with the highest ability has a negative impact on those not selected.

Mr McNarry: We are talking about eight-year-olds.

Dr Davison: We are not just talking about eight-year-olds: underachievement is a significant problem at Key Stage 3 and at Key Stage 2.

Mr D Bradley: It continues into adulthood.

Dr Davison: Whether selection affects those not selected is a moot point.

You said that there are problems at primary-school level, which would come through; however, it is a moot point whether those problems are accentuated by what happens at the age of 11. That is a huge question, to which I cannot give a simple answer.

Mr McNarry: Could you give me an answer in writing? Could you give the subgroup an answer in writing?

Mr Woods: It comes back to the question of how relevant it is to the subgroup.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): You were given a clear indication of the constraints under which we, as a Committee, were acting. I am happy that you have dealt with that subject to the satisfaction of most members.

We have time for a final supplementary question. It must be extremely short, because we must stop at 11.45 am.

Ms Ruane: I wish to make a point that I hope will be taken in the right — Nílím in ann.

Mr D Bradley: Spirit.

Ms Ruane: The right spirit. Go raibh maith agat.

Mr McElduff: I know what point you are about to make, Caitríona. Go for it.

Ms Ruane: I am a big fan of gender equality.

Mr McNarry: Try to include the rest of us in this.

Ms Ruane: I will, David. I always include you.

Mr McNarry: You wanted to be called "Caterina", or whatever, earlier. Now we do not know what you are talking about.

Ms Ruane: Gender equality is important in society, and many of our teachers and educationalists are women. Any future delegations should include a senior woman from the Department of Education.

Dr Davison: I will certainly pass that request to Will Haire. After all, I have come from a Department where I was a token male.

Mr Donaldson: I want to return briefly to the guidance principles for admissions criteria. There is great public concern about postcode lotteries, particularly in areas in where there is likely to be oversubscription, such as my Lagan Valley constituency and, in particular, Lisburn. You talk about the need to ensure that:

"the combined effect of the criteria does not result in postcode selection or social exclusion, and that it does not disadvantage pupils living in particular areas e.g. rural areas or pupils attending feeder primary schools that are not given an appropriate degree of priority for admission."

I am anxious to know how those living in rural communities such as Glenavy, Ballinderry, Moira, Hillsborough and Annahilt can avoid ending up with postcode selection. There is a massive population in the urban core where schools are located. How can the Department ensure that pupils who live in rural areas and attend rural primary schools are not disadvantaged?

Mr Woods: Part of the answer to that lies in the flexibility that the Department envisages in the admissions criteria, which will allow schools to define for themselves the range of feeder primary schools or other catchment arrangements. The new education authority, as and when it arrives, will be anxious to ensure in considering those issues that no small primary school in a rural setting has, inadvertently or otherwise, been omitted and the children not given an appropriate measure of priority. It is simply to ensure that whatever arrangements are put in place operate as fairly and comprehensively as possible across the board, so that there is inclusion for everyone.

Dr Davison: Also, sitting in Bangor and not knowing the specifics of every locality, the Department is open to taking representations if areas feel that in some way the arrangements that are being arrived at by schools are going to disadvantage them.

Mr D Bradley: Are you saying that it may be possible for grammar schools to retain their current catchment areas, which one could say are defined by their feeder primary schools?

Dr Davison: In the first instance, the grammar school, or any school, will nominate what it considers to be its feeder primary schools. As far as the Department is concerned, it will be a matter for the local body — either the board, if the boards still exist, or the education authority — to look carefully at what that says about the area from which the school is drawing its pupils to see whether there are any issues with that.

I believe that folk would raise those issues locally with the new education and skills authority, the boards or the Department if they felt that, in some way, they were being particularly disadvantaged. The system itself would have to be satisfied that they were not being disadvantaged.

Mr D Bradley: As Jeffrey said, if it were possible to ensure that rural children would not be disadvantaged under those circumstances, the fear that some people have of a postcode lottery would also be removed.

Dr Davison: The Department has stated that it does not want a postcode lottery. It will do its best to ensure that that does not apply.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I must call it a day at that point, gentlemen. Thank you for coming. As you can see, we read your briefing notes carefully and ask some difficult questions. The subgroup reserves the right to give you feedback in written form or to ask further questions, because, as you know, the issue is controversial and difficult. It has attracted much interest. The subgroup appreciates your coming at short notice to give us that highly adequate briefing. Undoubtedly, we will see you again at some stage. Thank you.

Dr Davison: Thank you very much.

The subgroup met at 2.00 pm.

(The Chairman (Mr Molloy) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): You are all very welcome to the first meeting of the subgroup. Let us allow the members of the team to introduce themselves and open the presentation. We will ask questions afterwards.

Mr Damian Prince (Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister): Thank you, Chairman. My name is Damian Prince, and I am head of the Review of Public Administration (RPA) Central Unit of OFMDFM. On my left is Laura Hague, and to my right Jim McKeown, who are also with the unit. At the far end is Ian Maye, who deals with RPA in the Department of the Environment.

We have modelled our initial presentation to the subgroup around its own terms of reference. I will cover the first three items and then hand over to Jim for the fourth and to Ian for the fifth.

Members will know that in the current circumstance we can give some factual briefing of where we are with the RPA, but must steer clear of items that are subject to confidential briefing to Ministers. However, we hope that everything that we say will be helpful.

We do not propose to use this time to rehearse all the reforms that will arise from the RPA, but rather to tell the subgroup how we are implementing it and to provide an update on the progress on the various strands. We will also leave an information pack containing useful links, which members can peruse at their leisure.

If members are happy for me to do so, I will deal with terms of reference 1 and 2 together. Taken together, they start to embrace the full scope of the RPA. A programme structure has been put in place to help with the implementation. To make the programme manageable, we have divided the RPA programme into four sectors: the first is health and social services; the second, education and libraries; the third, local government; and the fourth, other public bodies. Each of the relevant lead Departments has its own implementation team. The range of changes that we have embarked upon is so complex that we may not be able to answer some of your questions today. In that case, we will have to refer them to colleagues in other Departments, but we will try to bring the information to you as soon as we can.

We think of the four sectors as the four vertical strands of the RPA. They represent the outcomes: the changes that the man and woman on the street will see. For example, the five education and library boards will become one education authority and one library authority.

However, it is also important to draw members' attention to the 12 cross-cutting themes. They are very important because if we accept that the four vertical streams — health, education, local government and other public bodies — mean that we are doing the right thing, the 12 cross-cutting streams ensure that we are doing our job correctly and that equality, cost benefit and common boundaries are taken into account.

The scope of the 12 cross-cutting themes can be found on our website, which sets out exactly what each theme will endeavour to do. Four of the 12 themes relate to local government, and the fifth relates to legislation, which Ian and Jim will pick up on later. The remaining seven themes are all very important, but I want to draw your attention to two in particular: common boundaries and capacity building. I mention those themes because we recently published new research on each area, and that is available on our website.

As regards the governance arrangements, members will already know that David Hanson has ministerial responsibility for the RPA. A steering group has also been set up, which is headed by Nigel Hamilton. It meets monthly and reports to the Minister.

I also wanted to bring to the subgroup's attention the important work of the Public Service Commission (PSC). The RPA will bring big changes for service users, but it will also have a big impact on service providers. Staff in organisations affected by the RPA will see a great deal of change in their work.

The PSC has produced six guiding principles, which are designed to steer the human resources strand of the RPA. There have been principles on communication, managing vacancies, staff transfers, filling posts in new organisations, voluntary severance schemes, and employer responsibilities. To date, the Government have accepted and endorsed four of those guiding principles; the remaining two are still under discussion.

Staff interests are also represented by the Northern Ireland Committee, Irish Congress of Trade Unions (NICICTU) and the various medical unions, with which we meet monthly to resolve any issues and to keep the lines of communication open.

I will give an overview of progress to date on each of the main themes in the situation report. However, I will leave local government and legislation to Jim and Ian. Members probably already know that David Sissling has been appointed chief executive of the new health authority. The chief executives and the finance directors have been appointed for the new health and social services (HSS) trusts. The five new HSS trusts are scheduled to go live on 1 April 2007, as are the seven local commissioning groups.

It is hoped that the chief executive of the education and skills authority will be in post by January and that the chief executive of the libraries authority will be in post shortly afterwards. It is also hoped that the education advisory forum will be established, on an informal basis, in the spring of 2007.

The fourth sector that I mentioned is that of the other public bodies. Changes to that sector are primarily driven by the legislative programme, which is moving ahead as we speak. For example, one of the main developments so far is that the Public Record Office of Northern Ireland (PRONI) has become a division of the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure and is no longer an agency.

Under section 3 of its terms of reference, the subgroup is to consider the work of the Boundary Commissioner. As the Boundary Commissioner is an independent officer, I cannot comment on the detail of how he is going about his work and so forth. Nevertheless, it should be useful for members to know that OFMDFM has put a great deal of information and research on the RPA website. That research provides information about the current design model that OFMDFM is using to implement the RPA, including the 7C seven-council model that has been the subject of so much recent debate.

Some of the research is quite technical. However, the picture that the body of research paints is, in our view, fairly consistent. In the pack that OFMDFM will leave with members is a reading list detailing all of the available research, from attitudinal surveys to comparative studies with other areas of the UK and Ireland.

I also want to draw the subgroup's attention to two particular pieces of research: Queen's University's research on population and geographical compactness, and the University of Ulster's research on the evenness of the rating base. To put their findings into ordinary language, both say that the seven-council model provides the best means of avoiding major disparities between rich and poor councils, big and small councils and of deriving councils capable of delivering a new, enhanced portfolio of functions.

At this point, I will hand over to Jim McKeown to give members an update on the relevant legislation.

Mr Jim McKeown (Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister): Good afternoon, everyone. Since September 2005, part of my role has been to work alongside the RPA Central Unit, initially to design implementation arrangements at the centre, in OFMDFM, and subsequently to provide an overview of the progress on legislation and relationships with the Public Service Commission.

As Damian mentioned, the implementation process, which includes the preparation of relevant legislation, is carried out by lead Departments. In addition to subordinate legislation, seven pieces of primary legislation are required to implement the RPA decisions taken by Ministers. The main items are listed in the information pack that I will leave with members this afternoon. I will talk about the legislation with reference to each of the four strands that Damian mentioned.

In relation to health and social services, legislation enabling a reduction in the number of trusts is already in place in the form of the Health and Personal Social Services Order 1991. Five pieces of subordinate legislation have been made under the 1991 Order creating the five new trusts that will come into operation on 1 April 2007. One piece of primary legislation is required to create the new health and social services authority and the patient client council, with effect from 1 April 2008, and it is currently being drafted.

In the second strand, one piece of primary legislation is required to create the new education and skills authority. The Department of Education has recently put some related issues out to consultation, and drafting of that legislation has, therefore, not commenced. A single piece of primary legislation is also required to establish a new library authority. That legislation is well advanced, and it is expected that drafting will be completed in December.

Thirdly, there are three pieces of primary legislation on local government issues. The first of those, the Local Government (Boundaries) (Northern Ireland) Order 2006, has been made. It enabled the appointment of a Local Government Boundaries Commissioner and established the procedures that he must follow in relation to the creation of seven new district areas. The other two provide for the operation and modernisation of councils and for the transfer of new functions to local government.

The fourth strand and final piece of primary legislation deal with those public bodies that do not fall into the three main sectors and provides for their winding-up or dissolution.

The Secretary of State initially asked that Departments aim to have the remaining six pieces of primary legislation laid at Westminster by July 2007. Elections, and the restoration of the Assembly in March 2007, are likely to have an impact on that timetable, since there is normally a period in advance of elections when no new consultation processes are commenced. All matters dealt with in the legislation fall within the Assembly's competence, and proposals would therefore be introduced as Assembly Bills.

Finally, as part of this summary, it is worth drawing specific attention to the fact that there are likely to be common provisions in primary legislation for the transfer of staff to new organisations. The Public Service Commission has just published a third guiding principle to deal with that matter. The Government have accepted its recommendations and are translating them into legislative provisions in the Draft Libraries (Northern Ireland) Order 2007, which will act as the model to be followed.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Thank you very much.

Mr Maye (Department of the Environment): I shall speak only briefly. We will leave a paper with you on the origins and evolution of the local government task force. However, I want to talk to you about the work of the task force since its inception in March 2006. Some members present are on the task force and will know that, since its inception, 10 meetings of its political panel have taken place, and there have been several meetings of the task force working group and the nine subgroups.

The initial task force structure was designed with the modernisation and reform of local government in mind. The implementation of the review of public administration was part of that, but the task force was not initially designed to deal with the transfer of functions. It subsequently took that work on after Easter, when Ministers decided that the Department of the Environment should take the lead in working with local government and with Government departments on the transfer of functions. That is an important point to bear in mind: it was not designed with the transfer of functions in mind at the outset. However, it took that work on board.

The initial focus was on developing policy on the preparation of two pieces of legislation. First, the Local Government (Structures) (Northern Ireland) Order 2007 will modernise and reform local government and put new finance and governance arrangements in place. It will deal with several modernisation and reform issues and give effect to ministerial decisions on the RPA.

The second major piece of legislation, which the initial work of the subgroups helped to inform, is the Local Government (Transfer of Functions) Order, which will give effect to the decisions made by Ministers about the functions that will transfer to local government on the creation of the new councils in 2009.

The initial focus of the task force, from political panel level — the top-level leadership group — to the working group, which was essentially an officer group, and the nine thematic subgroups, was to develop the policy that would underpin those pieces of legislation. However, the nine subgroups and the political panel began to map the way forward on how we would manage the process of modernising and reforming local government over the next two and a half to three years and beyond. The political panel, in particular, recognised that modernisation and reform was a long-term process and that it was not just a matter of implementing the decisions of the RPA.

The subgroups reported at the end of June. The political panel and the working group considered those reports in July and broadly endorsed them, although some required further substantial work, particularly the report by the governance subgroup. That work has been in hand since then. We have been using those subgroup reports as the basis for preparing the legislation and for thinking again about the shape and structure of the task force.

In July, the political panel agreed that it was time to review the task force structures and that we had moved beyond the initial policy development phase. There was still further policy development work to do, but we needed to look at the task force again to ensure that there was shared political ownership of the implementation process between central and local government. We also had to make sure that the structures that we had in place were designed to take us through the implementation phase of the modernisation and reform programme.

We jointly commissioned the Improvement and Development Agency (IDeA) of the English Local Government Association. Throughout September, they met a range of key stakeholders, including the members of the political panel and the working group, in which they brought forward proposals that the political panel and working group considered in the two months that followed. We considered that report, in particular, at the political panel over the course of the last two meetings. In those meetings we agreed on how to take forward the top two elements of the structure that the IDeA proposed.

The top element of the structure will be the driving force for implementation, and will be known as the strategic leadership board. It is designed to clearly demonstrate central Government's commitment to working in partnership with local government and the five main political parties in modernising and reforming local government. The Minister will chair it, and the president of the Northern Ireland Local Government Association (NILGA) will be the vice-chair. It will have 10 representatives from the five main political parties, and NILGA will act as the voice of local government. It will be supported by a number of chief executives from local government, and by a number of senior officers who will be transferring functions. The Department of the Environment and NILGA will provide a joint secretariat to that board. The aim, having agreed the composition of the board, is to hold the first meeting on 15 January. NILGA and the political parties agreed nominations to the board yesterday.

The second layer in the new task force will comprise five policy-development panels. Those panels will weave together the work and issues identified by the nine subgroups, and the transferring functions. By agreement, the work has been divided among those five policy-development panels. One important item of note, which is a significant change from how the work was carried out at earlier stages, is that each panel will be politically chaired, and there is agreement on how those chairs will be distributed among the five main political parties. There will be strong political representation — each policy-development panel will have 10 members, representing political parties and local government. They will be supported in their work by a range of officers and officials from central Government, and potentially others. A joint DOE and NILGA secretariat will support them.

The policy-development panels will be responsible for devising regional policy that will inform the development of detailed work at a lower level. They will be able to commission, task and finish work. They will be able to call on local government, central government, and other bodies such as the Housing Executive to look at particular issues and bring forward proposals on how they should be dealt with in the next two and a half years and beyond.

Below that level, the IDeA recommended the establishment of seven local implementation pilot schemes, in the seven prospective council areas. There has not yet been agreement on whether those pilots will be put in place, and if so how. There is further discussion to be undertaken, in particular in the strategic leadership board, on how to take that recommendation forward. There is recognition that work must be done at a local level to examine local implementation issues, but because of continuing debate about the number of councils, there is not yet agreement on how the pilots should be formed. That work is still ahead of us, but it must be addressed in due course.

Our aim is to have the first meeting of the strategic leadership board in January, and we want to agree with them how the five policy-development panels should be put together; their terms of reference; their initial tasks; and the officer and official support staff who will work with the 10 elected members on each panel. We wish to establish those panels and have them up and running as quickly as possible — certainly before the end of March.

Mr Maskey: I would like to clarify one point. There was a discussion at the last panel meeting about their composition of the policy-development panels. You have mentioned the two members from each of the five major parties, but there was also an issue about the need to bring in other stakeholders who are not politicians. I was not sure how you would do that.

Mr Maye: At the first meeting of the strategic leadership board we plan to propose what the composition of those panels should be. We will do that as part of the joint secretariat relationship that we have with NILGA. It must be decided whether officers and officials will be involved in the panels. We must also decide on the involvement of the social partners and other bodies, such as the Local Government Staff Commission, which is likely to have a role in developing work on human resources over the next couple of years.

In some cases, our proposals will mean that wider discussion in the strategic leadership board will be necessary. The Minister and the Department have not yet taken a view on precisely how those panels will be comprised; that issue is still open for discussion at the board.

Mr Maskey: I do not know the official NILGA position, but its representatives argued that no one, other than politicians, should be on the policy panels. That argument was not agreed to. Therefore I am concerned as to whether the delivery will proceed with just NILGA representatives. However, those representatives had a clear view on the matter.

Mr Weir: There was no consensus on the matter. Some of us took the view that the policy development panels should comprise elected representatives and officials; others had a different view. The final decision on whether additional people will join the elected politicians, how many there will be and in what circumstances they will join has been left to the strategic leadership board. There are other issues of whether their joining is accepted in principle, whether the level of involvement means that social partners should be on the panels almost permanently, or whether the membership should rotate when different subjects are being discussed.

There are five boards, and even if it were agreed that a certain number of representatives sit on those boards, that number may not apply necessarily to all the boards. It could be argued that certain subject matters have a greater need. For example, the trades unions would have a strong input on human resource matters.

I would like to clarify one point of Ian's. No nominations were made to the strategic leadership board yesterday, and none was intended. It is a matter for each of the parties to decide who its two representatives should be. However, the five parties selected which of the five panels they would chair, and it was also suggested — although this may not be adopted — that a vice-chairperson should be chosen and that each party would have one. That point needs to be put on the record.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do you have any further questions to ask on that?

Mr Weir: I am perhaps more familiar with the Government aspects of the issue, but this matter is perhaps more concerned with what happens on the other side. Therefore I wish to comment on three areas. First, although some discontent was expressed, through local government, there is clearly direct political involvement. What consultation or opportunities for discussion with politicians has there been on the health and education aspects of the implementations?

Mr McKeown: I do not have an answer to that. We would need to ask the individual Departments.

Mr Weir: Perhaps you would come back to the subgroup on that.

Secondly, with regard to transparency and ensuring that people are informed, you mentioned that four of the cross-cutting issues involve local government. Presumably meetings are going on in Government in those four areas.

Mention was also made of the higher-level steering group. I appreciate that a lot of its work will involve technical issues, but has any thought been given to making available the information that arises from those meetings in minute form to the strategic leadership board when it is established in January? We cannot have a situation at one level — particularly where those issues that affect local government are concerned — in which decisions will be taken by a strategic leadership board while, behind the scenes, the Civil Service will make completely different decisions.

We need to take decisions on the basis of knowledge. Has anything been done to ensure that the minutes of that steering group, which is chaired by Nigel Hamilton, are published?

Ms Hague (Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister): They are published on the RPA website.

Mr Weir: A lot of claims were made regarding funding, cost implications and efficiency. As regards health and education, what is the current estimate of the overall costs and savings of implementing RPA?

Mr Prince: We are still working on the Deloitte report, which provided the strategic outline case for RPA. At the high level, the report stated that RPA would cost a maximum of £400 million and that there would be the potential for £200 million per year in efficiencies and savings. The report was based on a series of assumptions about the use of shared service centres. However, it did not actually cover the full ambit of RPA as it currently stands, principally regarding the transfer of central Government services to local government. Work is ongoing to consolidate the figures and set a budget for RPA.

Mr Weir: I cannot speak for the health and education sectors, but there was a feeling of scepticism, and that is putting it mildly, on the parts of finance officers and elected politicians in local government towards some of the assumptions made in the Deloitte report and, consequently, on some of the potential savings and costs stated in the report.

It would be useful if a better idea could be given as regards savings. You specifically mentioned the cost of transferring functions, but a main area of concern for the public purse is that there are heavy cost implications in transferring Civil Service staff into local government pension schemes, say under the Northern Ireland Local Government Officers' Superannuation Committee Pension Scheme (NILGOS) system. Has that cost been estimated? You may not be in a position to give me a figure today.

Mr Maye: We do not have a better estimate than that which appeared in the Deloitte report.

Mr Weir: What was that estimate? Obviously we do not have the Deloitte report in front of us. Was there a particular figure put on the pension side?

Mr Maye: There was a range identified, from £37 million to well over £100 million.

Mr Weir: Was that on the local government side?

Mr Maye: Yes. There were quite substantial costs involved. We are trying to refine those cost, and we will be working over the next few months to develop a much more detailed business case, which will look at costs and savings — not only the cash savings that might flow from this process but non-cash benefits such as improved service delivery to the citizen. We want to spend quite a bit of time on that over the next few months.

Ms Hague: There is an executive summary of the Deloitte report on the RPA website with a break down of all figures.

Mr Weir: One really has to question a potential cost gap of between £37 million and £100 million. I appreciate that there is a range of different assumptions involved. However, it is useless trying to draw satisfactory information from that, given such a wide range. Questions were raised by a lot of people about the assumptions that were made in the Deloitte report. For example, assumptions made about savings were based on the number of chief executives involved and their salaries, which were fairly wide off the mark.

Ms Hague: The main reason for the range of people costs in the Deloitte report is whether to give enhanced pensions.

2.30 pm

Mr Maskey: In the few short weeks that we have to deal with this matter, we cannot pour over it or deliberate on all the detail of the huge amount of work that has been done. However, I want to endorse what Peter said about the health and education sectors. I said many times at the political panel that it would have been very helpful for us, when dealing with the local government aspect, to have more awareness of how the RPA will affect the health and education sectors. Health and education are a big part of the review, yet we on the political panel did not even get an update on them.

I hope that we get some more information over the next couple of weeks in our work programme, although we cannot second-guess the work that has been done to date. However, not having a good sense of what is happening in the health and education sectors — which are a big part of the review — makes our job more difficult.

Mr Gallagher: I must apologise for my late arrival. I want to ask about the governance subgroup and the report. You described the report as needing further work, and you said that although there was broad endorsement, more work needs to be done. Am I right in saying that there is not agreement on the governance subgroup's report?

Mr Maye: It was clear from the report and from the discussions in the task force and from the discussions between the Minister and the political parties that there are broad areas of support for the governance arrangements. However, some issues remain to be teased out, and there are one or two differences. They are not major differences, but areas on which the parties suggest slightly different approaches; we still have to work through them.

Our aim, through the task force and through the strategic leadership board in particular, is to introduce much more detail into the governance arrangements over the next few months, particularly into the legislative proposals. We would like to do that before legislation is published that can be used for public consultation. There is work in hand that we want to bring back to the leadership board and to others on the task force to test our work before we go to public consultation on the legislation. Beyond the legislation, there will be more work to do, as much of the detail of what is likely to happen will not be contained in the primary legislation. The standing orders, the subordinate legislation and the statutory guidance will have to be worked out. That will be a strong element of the task force's work over the next couple of years.

Mr Gallagher: One of your colleagues spoke about the workforce and voluntary redundancies. Is it fair to assume that, as a result of the reform, job losses will go beyond those who leave under voluntary redundancy schemes?

Mr Prince: It is recognised that there will be fewer jobs at the end of the RPA process. Employers are required to ensure that they avoid redundancy as best they can and take all measures to avoid compulsory redundancies. However, it is unlikely that compulsory redundancies can be avoided altogether.

Mr J Wilson: I am not my party's spokesman on health or education, so I am not as well tuned in on those matters as I might be. However, I share the concerns that have been expressed on those issues. Most of us accept that every opportunity has been afforded to us to have a political input into the proposals as far as local government is concerned.

However, I am not aware of any opportunity being presented to us to have a political feed into health and education. I look forward to your response to our concerns about that.

With regard to local government, there is a view, which is gathering some support, that the programme leading up to the shadow elections in 2008, with councils in place by 2009, is simply not doable. The review of council boundaries is ongoing, and the commissioner has expressed concern that his programme for reporting is extremely tight — he did so at the launch in Belfast. That review will then be followed by the appointment of a district electoral area commissioner, with a further review of district electoral areas. Furthermore, the uncertainty of this Assembly and the result of the vote on the debate on the RPA this week should also be considered. Taking all those factors into consideration, and given that, as you said, there is an extensive legislative programme, which you outlined clearly to us, between now and 2008-09, surely you must all be concerned that that entire programme is not doable by those dates.

Mr Prince: You raise some interesting points. We shall note what you have said. At the moment, we are planning on the basis that the programme is still doable, but there are so many variables that could intervene. We cannot see into the future.

Mr Poots: Chairman, it would be useful if we could have some questions answered today, as opposed to evaded, otherwise this session will be a pointless exercise. My question is about coterminosity. Who decided not to go ahead with that? When was that decided?

Mr Prince: Coterminosity is still very much on the agenda and is part of the benefit of the RPA. Is that the question you asked?

Mr Poots: Yes, absolutely.

Mr Prince: Coterminosity is still on the agenda. One of the benefits of the RPA will be common boundaries. That will allow services to be delivered to citizens within a boundary in which they can get the full range and ambit of services available to them. It is more important that that delivery of service is coterminous in relation to commissioning, that people have the services available to them. The location from where services are delivered is a different matter — there are five health trusts, and the hospitals are where they are. Our research found that people feel that it is more important that they can get the services that they need when they need them, that those services are of good quality, that they are responsive and that people can influence those services. That is done from the commissioning side rather than from the supply side. In that sense, common boundaries — coterminosity — are still being pursued.

Mr Poots: I thought that that had been forgotten. There will be five health trusts and seven councils, but it appears that the Department for Employment and Learning (DEL) gets to do what it likes. That Department went off at a complete tangent and did nothing to deliver coterminosity in any respect. Within the new councils, certainly in my area, three very important functions will be stretched across new boundaries. I thought that that was to be done away with.

Chairman, I should declare that I am a member of Lisburn City Council.

Mr Prince: Coterminosity works, and the greatest benefits come from common boundaries. With the people who commission services making sure that those services are available to citizens. The actual supply of the services is of less importance; the real benefits come from ensuring that all services are available to a common area.

Mr Poots: I have one further question. What does that mean for local economic development? Councils are currently responsible for local economic development. Will that stay the same? Will it be enhanced? How much of Invest Northern Ireland's (INI) current work will come to local government? Will INI pick up the type of work that the Local Economic Development Unit (LEDU) used to do? Can we have some more teeth on that one?

Mr Maye: Unfortunately, we do not yet have answers to those questions. I am not being evasive. The task force structure has been deliberately designed to tease out those answers, because there are questions over exactly what Ministers meant when they announced that local government would take a greater role in local economic development and local tourism development.

Ministers clearly meant for our local Government to have a more extensive role than at present. We do not yet know just how extensive that role should be, but we want to use the new task force structures to facilitate the debate on that role and, ideally, reach agreement on what it will mean in practice.

Mr Maskey: I have two points to make. The task force will recommence next month. In the last number of months, members from all parties have been concerned about the transfer of functions, the functions to be transferred, whether the correct budget will transfer with the functions and so forth.

We have received a number of presentations from the various Departments involved in the transfer of functions. I stand to be corrected, but it is probably fairly accurate to say that most members of the political panel thought that the presentation from the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, for example, was a bit minimalist, to say the least. I am probably being generous with that comment.

Among the issues that the political panel raised were the supporting people programme and the provision of Travellers' accommodation. All that work is ongoing. In fact, as the departmental officials have explained, we have already agreed that a policy panel will be set up specifically to deal with the transfer of functions. All the issues will be teased out through that policy panel in the time ahead.

Chairman, I want to put something on the record because of misleading statements in relation to the governance arrangements that were made during the Assembly debate on Tuesday. To be clear, the final detail of the governance agreements has not been agreed. In fact, several months ago, I rejected an earlier set of proposals on those governance arrangements from the political panel. That work is in hand.

There is no question that most parties agreed on the issue of proportionality and that some other checks and balances should be built in. For the record, there is not yet full and final agreement on the extent of the checks and balances that are required — certainly not from Sinn Féin's point of view. I put that on the record solely because of the misleading things that some Members said during the debate.

Mr J Wilson: I want to pick up on two points that I raised earlier. How much time has been set aside for the appointment of the district electoral area commissioner and the completion of the commissioner's work? Has that been factored in?

Mr Maye: We have factored that in to the overall timetable insofar as possible, given our current knowledge. However, the timetable could well change. If the current Boundary Commissioner takes longer than initially expected to produce a report, for example, that will impact on the district area electoral commissioner, the work that must be done and the timescales to which the commissioner will have to work.

Mr J Wilson: Are you factoring in the result of the Assembly debate on the review of public administration this week? If so, how will that decision be dovetailed into the presentation that you made earlier?

Mr Maye: The decision in relation to —

Mr J Wilson: The decision in relation to the number of councils.

Mr Maye: At almost every political panel meeting within the task force, all but one of the political parties made clear their opposition to the option 7C model. Equally, however, those parties have continued to engage in the process because the process does not concern the option 7C model; rather, the process concerns modernisation and reform.

The option 7C model is part of the modernisation, but it does not represent the totality of what the local government task force is seeking to achieve. That issue has always been on the table, but it has been parked because local government, central Government and the political parties recognised that there was a broader job of work to do. At the last meeting of the political panel, we agree with the parties to push ahead with that broader job of work.

We want to take account of what emerges from all debates and discussions. We will also want to take account of this subgroup's report. Of course, we will have to take into account the effect that a restored Assembly and Executive will have. However, there is a valuable job of work to be done in the meantime, which is to continue to press ahead with the much-needed reforms and modernisation work that we are already engaged in.

Mr Gallagher: I want to return to the issue of modernisation and the huge task involved, both in terms of resources and personnel. I want to ask about the work that has been done so far. First, has the cost of modernisation been estimated? Secondly, is there a timescale for modernisation?

2.45 pm

Mr Maye: We do not have firm estimates yet, but we are working with NILGA to tie down a firm estimate of implementation costs and the longer-term savings it will produce. We plan to spend time on that over the next six months. We will have to keep an eye on costs, because as work continues and the detail of implementation emerges, it will have an impact on costs and the potential for savings over the longer term.

We intend to put the basics of modernisation in place by April 2009: that is the instruction that has been given to us by Ministers, and that is the timetable we are working to. However, Ministers — and everyone involved in the process — recognise that modernisation will continue well beyond that date. We have embarked upon a modernisation and reform programme that will continue over the next 10 years or more. Much work will remain after 2009 to continue modernising local government.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are there any further questions for the members of the delegation? They are leaving a paper for the subgroup and will forward the other documentation to which members referred. The Clerks will contact the representatives about that. I thank the delegation for attending.

I remind Members to switch off mobile telephones. They interfere with the sound recording.

The next delegation is on rural planning. I welcome Tom Matthews and Mike Thompson from the Department for Regional Development. Members have before them the terms of reference:

"To consider —

- the proposals set out in PPS 14;
- the impact of the proposals, if adopted,"

— although it does seem as though they have been adopted already —

"on rural development, rural regeneration and future planning in the countryside; and

To identify any alternative proposals."

Mr Thompson, would you like to begin?

Mr Mike Thompson (Department for Regional Development): I thank members for the invitation. Members will be aware that draft Planning Policy Statement 14 (PPS 14) is subject to a judicial review, which was granted to Omagh District Council and Liam Ward. The case is scheduled for 15 to 17 January 2007. That will have an impact upon what I can say.

Our job is to provide the subgroup with factual briefing. I propose to summarise the rationale behind draft PPS 14, review the policy and try to provide a review of the results of the consultation process undertaken by the Department for Regional Development. That would be the most useful way to spend the time. It will provide fresh and useful information for members.

Draft PPS 14 was published on 16 March 2006 and introduced, for the first time, a presumption against development across the whole of Northern Ireland. Large areas were already in green-belt zones, so for those there was not much change. The rationale for the statement was grounded in 'Shaping Our Future: Regional Development Strategy For Northern Ireland 2025', which was published in 2001. It identified concerns about the cumulative impact of development in the open countryside; the loss of agricultural land and habitats; fields being sold off to house townspeople; increased traffic on rural roads; increased risk of pollution from growing numbers of septic tanks; and so on.

Since the regional development strategy was published, there has been an explosion in the number of planning approvals for single dwellings in the countryside. During the 1980s and 1990s, approval rates were approaching 3,000 per annum; however, those figures started to push up in about 2000.

There were approximately 8,800 planning approvals for single dwellings in the countryside in 2004-05. That was for full and outline planning applications, not reserved applications. To put that into context, that is like approving the size of a town like Coleraine in one year. Those levels of approvals are unprecedented. It is a new phenomenon. It was those levels of approvals that led Ministers to the view that the regional development strategy was being undermined and that a presumption against development in the countryside had to be introduced.

I have already mentioned the ministerial statement to give draft PPS 14 immediate, substantial weight in the determination of all planning applications after 16 March 2006. Ministers took that decision because they felt not to have done so would have meant that the Planning Service would have been swamped with pre-emptive applications.

I wish to make a couple of points about Draft PPS 14. First, many have said it is a moratorium on development, but it is not: single dwellings can still be approved under draft PPS 14, but at a reduced level. The evidence for making that statement comes from looking at the old green belts in the east of the Province. There were usually 1,000 approvals a year, so, pro rata, the introduction of draft PPS 14 would have meant that approvals for single dwellings in the countryside would have gone down to about 2,000 to 3,000 a year. That was a guesstimate and no more than that.

The exceptions to draft PPS 14 are based on local people. It is those exceptions on which much of the consultation focused. At the consultation, we had community technical aides facilitate six public meetings, which about 380 people attended. The PPS 14 team and I were available to appear at council meetings and public meetings. A number of members present at this subgroup attended or, indeed, chaired those public meetings. We met with councils, interested groups and, of course, elected representatives. There was a good, open, wide-ranging debate in both the community and the media about what rural planning should mean and about what the right rural planning for Northern Ireland should entail.

The consultation closed on 9 June, and we received 8,513 written responses. That is a phenomenal number of responses for a consultation to receive. Breaking down the results, the vast majority of responses — 87% — was made up of about 10 different types of petition letters for which political parties, pressure groups and other interested parties canvassed. For example, the largest number of responses came from Sinn Féin, from whom we received 3,247 pamphlets that were opposed to draft PPS 14. The other 13%, or 1,147 responses, were usually, but not exclusively, substantive replies from individuals, professional bodies, councils, political parties and other non-Government bodies. To set aside the petition-type letters for a moment, those 1,147 responses amount to a really large number for any consultation. Normally, consultations receive 100 or 200 replies.

What were the conclusions of the consultation? Of the 8,513 responses, not surprisingly 95% of respondents were opposed to the broad thrust of draft PPS 14. The main focus of those who objected to it was on the presumption against development. The type of comments that we received were:

"Draft PPS 14 should be withdrawn, reconsidered and substantially amended", and:

"Its proposals are too sweeping, too restrictive and take no account of their impact on the rural economy, house prices or the history and social life of rural dwellers."

That gives a flavour of the comments that we have received.

Another comment said:

"PPS 14 is inherently wrong as it fails to acknowledge or illustrate any real understanding of the sensitivities, needs and complexity of the rural context. The proposals are simply inappropriate and threaten to undermine the future of rural communities."

On a similar note, many expressed the view that that PPS 14 was a ban on building single dwellings in the countryside and that it would have a detrimental impact on rural schools, community groups, sporting organisations, businesses and, by definition, the rural community. Many held the view that rural areas and populations were not homogeneous and that implementing a one-size-fits-all blanket policy such as draft PPS 14 across all regions was inappropriate. There was much debate about that one-size-fits-all approach. We have always believed that adopting a pepper-pot approach — different policies in different areas — would only result in demand being moved around and funnelled into areas that had looser planning policies.

I will turn now to specific policies, and I want to mention four areas about which people had useful ideas. The first area involves farmers and the farm viability tests. Draft policy CTY 2 states that planning permission for a dwelling house on a farm would be granted where it was essential to the needs of the farm and the farm business was established and viable according to the definition of viability as stated by the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development. That test of viability, and the linking of it to PPS 14, was discussed by a lot of consultees and participants. People pointed out that farming has changed so much in recent years that many farms would never meet that viability test. We had to look again at the test because it was irrelevant to a large swathe of agricultural Northern Ireland. It simply did not work.

It was also pointed out that part-time farming is increasing and financial input to many farms comes from income earned off-farm. Part-time jobs provide essential supplementary income that helps to support farms. People told us that the overall total financial input from farming families should be taken into account rather than simply an assessment of the farm viability. There were many thoughts and ideas about that, and it was felt that any new definition of viability should allow both small and large farms to be considered eligible. People felt that the farm viability tests worked against the smaller farm and discriminated against small agricultural holdings.

The replacement policy also generated a lot of interesting debate. Many of those who were unsupportive of that policy expressed a view that it was just too restrictive and recommended that it should be much more flexible. The issue involved residential abandonment — the old abandoned house out in the countryside with the roof falling off it. Many people felt that as such houses were blots on the landscape, they should be able to bring them back into residential use. Again, I will quote from a interesting comment made by a consultee at one of our workshops:

“There are far too many examples throughout Northern Ireland of what were once sound family homes that have now become derelict and cannot be replaced because of antiquated planning regulations.”

Restrictions on the size and siting of replacement dwellings were considered unnecessary by some, and many felt that they led to additional costs. Some also suggested that policy should maximise the potential afforded by rural brownfield opportunities. Similarly, it was suggested that not allowing the replacement of existing derelict buildings could actually lead to a greater loss of built heritage. In many instances, replacement, conversion and re-use of existing buildings as residential accommodation was seen as the only economic and viable alternative.

Issues around VAT were also raised. Many felt that it was wrong that VAT was payable when restoring an existing building, but that it was not payable on new builds.

I will discuss only four policies today, the third of which is the social housing policy. It was generally welcomed, but people were aware that it had problems and shortcomings and could be improved in a number of areas. That leads to the issue of affordability, which obviously applies to urban, as well as rural, Northern Ireland. It is an important issue, and Sir John Semple is currently investigating it. One consultee remarked that:

“Future policy should proactively address integrated social and affordable housing in rural Northern Ireland.”

3.00 pm

In view of the current trends, many people felt that there was an inconsistent approach to planning and that rural approvals lacked effective enforcement.

Therefore, they called for greater accountability in the planning process and better co-ordination between Government departments.

Many people felt that the planning policy should be tailored across the region to reflect differing needs and pressures. Furthermore, they wanted the dispersed rural community designation to be reinstated. There were similar calls for the reinstatement of policy to facilitate special personal or domestic circumstances.

I now turn to kinship ties and occupancy conditions, the most strongly represented alternatives to the proposed presumption against development.

Participants suggested that we operate instead a presumption favouring development with restrictions, and that such restrictions could perhaps focus on providing connections with the land.

A frequent request in the consultation was that planning permission for houses be given to local people who could provide evidence of links with the land in their local area. It was suggested that such a link might be to have lived, worked or gone to school locally; to be able to trace grandparents back to a particular bit of land; or to provide a family connection with the land through parish records. The Republic of Ireland's system was often cited to us as a system we should operate here.

However, there are a number of reasons why we have not implemented that system. We discussed those issues in the consultation. First, we raised issues about enforcement. Would a kinship or local needs test work when approximately 400,000 people already live in the open countryside? Would there be any point in having it?

Secondly, we raised equality considerations, which were not accepted by the people we were talking to. They said that the presumption against development would have a better chance of success if realistic exceptions that centred on genuine rural need were factored into the equation.

I think that everyone agreed that speculative development around the countryside was harmful and that we must stop it and address genuine rural needs.

In that quick overview I focused on four broad areas that may clarify the consultation. I make two final points.

The contents of draft PPS 14 already applied to a large extent across Northern Ireland, particularly in the east of the Province, via the old green belt regulations. Therefore, many did not see it as a new policy. However, its impact has been felt particularly strongly in the west of the Province, and most of the consultation responses came to us from that area.

The general agreement seemed to be that something needed to be done to stop the speculative developers. There was broad agreement about the need for balance between sustainability and thriving rural communities. However there is a strong feeling that these two should not be mutually exclusive: we should be able to have both. The challenge for us was how to marry the two.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We will take questions beginning with the DUP, then Sinn Féin, the SDLP and finally the Ulster Unionists.

Mr Weir: Thank you. Mr Thompson, you mentioned that there had been an escalation from 1,800 to 8,500 successful single-building applications. You said that as a measure that the policy was working, you would expect that number to be between 2,000 and 3000 per year in areas that would be covered by PPS14. What are the figures now?

Mr Thompson: We do not know yet, because there is a time lag in the introduction of draft PPS 14.

Because of the backlog of applications, our colleagues in the Planning Service are still working through applications that were made before draft PPS 14 was introduced. I am not sure whether the Planning Service has started to process any applications that came in after the introduction of draft PPS 14. The only reason that I used the figures 2,000 to 3,000 is because, historically, that was the typical number of applications for single dwellings in the countryside. I do not think that there is any right number.

Mr Weir: I appreciate that, because of the timing of applications that are going through the system, DRD is not in a position to monitor the figures. However, if only 300 applications were being made in countryside areas, that would clearly indicate that the policy had gone badly wrong. At the other end of the scale, if the idea were restricted and there was a shift down from 8,500 to 8,000 applications, there would not be a great deal of impact. There may not necessarily be a right number, but there would be clear indications as to whether the policy has gone badly wrong — or not.

Mr Thompson: I totally agree with that.

Mr McGuigan: Thank you for your submission. You will be aware of my party's position with regard to draft PPS 14. My party submitted a proposal and felt that that the Minister made the wrong policy choice. My party is still of that opinion today.

I want to make a few points about your presentation. The 3,427 leaflets that you mentioned were not Sinn Féin leaflets. They were submitted by 3,427 individuals who chose to use that method. Those people should not be disregarded; I certainly do not want that to happen. The fact that 95% of people are opposed to the policy gives a good indication of the strength of feeling that the policy has engendered.

I do not want to rehash all the arguments that were made throughout the consultation process. At the time, there was a dispute — a non-consensus, shall we say — with regard to figures. Your presentation highlighted that a large number of people submitted applications at a time when they knew that proposals were being put forward that would later restrict those applications. That does not create an accurate sense of the number of people who were planning to build at that time. People submitted applications because they knew that restrictions were being put in place. I do not believe that it would have been the case that several thousand houses would have been built in the countryside in any given year.

Under the previous policy, as members who are also local councillors will know, it was quite clear that one reason for refusing applications to build dwellings in the countryside was the build-up argument. To some extent, that was built into the previous policy. Many of my party's difficulties concerned the level of enforcement of the planning policy that was in existence.

I have some further general points. The consultation process ended in June. I would have expected that a decision would have been announced. You raised four of the policy issues. Is that an indication that you expect changes to be made on those four policy areas when the Minister has responded? Does the judicial review restrict the Minister in making a decision?

Mr Thompson: Thank you for those points. I will try to cover them all. If I do not, please return to any that I have missed.

The Department certainly did not in any way disregard the 3,427 people who submitted leaflets. I apologise if what I said came across as otherwise. That was not intended. Indeed, the Department acknowledged every single one of those responses individually and separately — as it did with the other 8,500-odd people. In our analysis, each one is included as a unique individual response. I hope that, from our presentation, members are in no doubt about our understanding of the clear message that came through from the consultation.

I attended many of the meetings, and I am in no doubt about the views expressed.

There are many factors involved in the increase in the number of approvals. There is no question that a number of pre-emptive applications were submitted. However, a trend started from around 2000, and the number of applications has crept up every year since then. There were other factors responsible. The change in agriculture and Common Agricultural Policy (CAP) reforms were driving forces. It is hard to consider rural housing in isolation. Rather, it is necessary to examine the housing market as a whole. As house prices began to increase, building in the countryside became a much more attractive option. People's perceptions of where they want to live and work are changing, and many people travel greater distances than they did 30 or 40 years ago. There is a wide range of factors: lifestyle choices and perceptions are starting to kick in, as are mortgage rates and readily available finance.

However, although I do not dispute that pre-emptive applications were being submitted, that alone does not explain the total number of applications made. It is difficult to say how many applications were due to one cause and how many were due to another. It is a complicated picture, and all the factors are mixed up.

That point strengthens the reason for the ministerial statement, if that is the case, for the immediate introduction of draft PPS 14 — but that is another point. The judicial review impacts on the Department, and legal advice is that we should not move to finalise draft PPS 14 until after the outcome of the review, which is currently listed to be heard by the courts on 15–17 January 2007. The two cases will be heard at the same time, and the judgement will be made about three or four weeks after that. We are in the hands of the court, but that is the sort of time frame involved.

Mr Gallagher: I am very concerned about the outworkings of draft PPS 14 and the way in which it has been handled. With respect to the Department officials here today, they are preoccupied with the pre-emptive and speculative applications submitted over a number of years. On top of that, there was a consultation period that was not really a consultation period. On such a contentious issue as planning, there should be, in the future, a proper and detailed consultation on rural planning. I hope that there will be an Assembly to facilitate that.

A further couple of points, which bear out what I have just said, relate to some of the issues that have arisen today. Part of the replacement dwelling issue to which Mr Thompson referred is the test of abandonment. Already, in my experience, that test is creating problems and is impacting unfairly on some applicants. Everyone understands that a house with four walls, no roof, no windows and no doors can hardly qualify under the rules for a replacement dwelling.

However, I have experience of cases in which new farmhouses were built, perhaps 20 years ago, without Housing Executive grants or anything like that, and where the original farmhouse has been maintained in good condition: roofed, weatherproofed and could be habitable. However, when an application is submitted to planners, there is a strict interpretation of the test of abandonment. That aspect must be re-examined.

Some outworkings of draft PPS 14 are also unfair in respect of applications submitted before 16 March. I am referring to unresolved issues, and we all know that in going through the process unresolved issues will crop up. Up until draft PPS 14, resolution was facilitated. Now, if an issue arises with an application submitted before 16 March, such as road frontage, it can be difficult to resolve if neighbouring property comes into it. I have come across several examples, and my colleagues, and elected representatives from other councils, have had the same experience. A little bit of time resolved the issue, and the planners are now saying that because an application was made before 16 March, it has to come in as a new application, which means that it comes in under the very strict criteria operating since the date of effect. That must also be examined urgently.

3.15 pm

Mr Thompson: The point about the consultation is, perhaps, one for another day. The matter of the replacement and abandonment test was raised frequently, and there was a great deal of good discussion about it. Many ideas and options to consider came out of the consultation.

On the question of applications received before 16 March, or applications not fully completed, the Planning Service line has been that an application only becomes a proper application when it is complete, and some have been caught out. That is an operational issue that is outside my remit, but it is an issue for the Planning Service, so I cannot comment on it any further.

Mr Tom Matthews (Department for Regional Development): I may be able to offer some help on the abandonment issue. It was a part of the old rural strategy policy, Housing and Mixed Use (HMU) 13. Draft PPS 14 has utilised some guidance provided by the Court of Appeal in 2000, which clarified how to assess the issue of abandonment properly. Much of the thrust of that is in the old policy. What is new is the decision on what an owner's intentions were. It is not really a new test, but the courts provide clarification, and we have tried to adapt and incorporate that clarification into the new policy, albeit that it was something that came forward during the consultation as a major issue.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): One of the things that I picked up on was that even in Tommy's example, where there was no roof on a house, it had mature trees around it, was on a good site and had integrated well with its surroundings over a 50- to 100-year period. It may be down to its foundations now, but it was a good site. It also lends credence to the line being followed in the case of normal brownfield sites. The example that was given was that of a brownfield site that had been reactivated.

Mr J Wilson: I would not agree with those who argue that draft PPS 14 should be scrapped and that we should go back to the drawing board — far from it. As someone who has lived his whole life in the countryside, I tend to get uptight when people who live in cities try to tell me how I should spend my life in the countryside and what the countryside should be like.

That is the personal element out of the way.

Mr Maskey: You have too much time on your hands, Jim.

Mr J Wilson: There is an argument for re-examining the particular part of draft PPS 14 that says that there should only be a "few exemptions" to the presumption against new development. We must examine the whole question of exemptions, particularly with regard to retirement dwellings for farmers. In the research that we have been provided with, there is an interesting phrase, which is "dwellings for non-farm enterprises." I think I know what that means, but at a time when the farming community is under considerable pressure, diversification is very much the "in" thing, and there surely is a case for looking at other developments in support of farm incomes. To scrap the whole thing, however, is out of the question.

I can give many examples of bad planning in the countryside, planning verging on the irresponsible. Great damage has been done to the countryside. In some instances, bad planning policy is to blame; in others, ill-considered implementation of policy. There are many examples of large-scale development in the countryside with little or no consideration for infrastructure. The infrastructure — roads, sewerage or drainage — is simply not there. That has resulted in gridlock in many small towns and villages. Villages are used not just as places for commuters to begin their journey, but as through-routes, yet they are not designed for the traffic they are taking.

With respect to some planning decisions, it is the case that, during the consultation process, the Environment and Heritage Service advised against the granting of planning permission, yet permission was granted nevertheless. So much for joined-up government. In other examples the Roads Service advised against the granting of planning permission, and its advice was disregarded. I have proof of that. I am not simply making it up. There are examples, although members might find them hard to believe, of several hundred houses being built on a greenfield site without connection to a main sewer — the sewage was tinkered for a long period until the Department could find the money to provide a sewerage system. Houses can hardly be brought closer to the sewers. Those are all examples of bad practice which had to stop; and cessation of those practices was due more to pressure groups like Friends of the Earth than to sensible proposals by the Government.

I therefore support the broad principles underlying draft PPS 14, but in certain circumstances, it may be too restrictive. It should remain in place as a principle. Were I a candidate for the proposed super-councils, I would relish taking the planning portfolio, for restrictions and exemptions are best dealt with at local level.

Mr Thompson: Thank you for those comments. Many of those consulted offered their experience of the implementation of existing planning policy. Many had concerns about inconsistencies in planning.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Mr Wilson mentioned the lack of sewerage. I recall several instances when the Water Service refused to consider provision of a main sewer until houses were in place. It refused to put in a sewer in case the houses were not built. Chicken-and-egg situations then arose. In such cases overall planning is poor.

Mr McGuigan: In the countryside there are developments that have not been well-planned. No one here argues that good decisions have been made with regard to every application. However, a presumption against development was a drastic way of addressing the problems. Other measures may have been taken to ensure that good planning practice was implemented and supported by sound enforcement policies.

The Minister was presented with a number of options prior to his decision on draft PPS 14. Requests under the Freedom of Information Act have attempted to garner the information given to the Minister and the nature of those options — it would be useful to this subgroup to have all of that information without redaction.

If the Assembly were to get up and running in March, I imagine that it would consider that issue very carefully under devolution. If this subgroup is to do the job that is expected of it, we should be furnished with that information.

Mr Thompson: That freedom of information request is currently under appeal. I will check its status and see what we can do.

Mr Poots: Thank you for coming to the subgroup today. It seems that you have gone from a free-for-all to something that Trotsky would be proud of in respect of state interference in an individual's rights.

I am concerned about paragraph 4.26 of the consultation document, which refers to other development opportunities and states that permission for additional houses will be refused where other development opportunities exist. Many people have found themselves in a situation that they could not have foreseen, in that sites have been sold off from farms that were not originally in the green belt.

Under the new policy, sons and daughters working on their parents' farms will be unable to get a site because a site has previously been sold off. That will apply throughout the country, given the circumstances of the agriculture industry, particularly in the last 10 years. Many farms were only sustained because farmers sold off sites from their dwellings.

That is one of the most reprehensible aspects of draft PPS 14. I note that you did not mention it, even though you referred to other matters. I hope that that will not pass unnoticed, because that policy will have a crucial impact on individuals whose farms were not previously part of the green belt, as most of my constituency was. However, if those people now try to get a site through legitimate means and there is a farm to act as a basis for the site, they will not get a site because of those circumstances.

Mr Thompson: I mentioned two areas within the range of available policy options that could address such a situation. The first is the farm viability test. Many people wanted the test changed to make it more adaptable for such a scenario, namely for farmers' sons and daughters. The second option, which many people indicated to the Department as their preference, is the kinship option. However, implementing the kinship option involves many operational and practical difficulties.

I understand your point, but suggestions that would address those concerns have been highlighted in the range of options that have been put to us through the consultation exercise.

Mr Poots: My local planning office has referred me to paragraph 4.26 of the consultation document, which is very clear about other development opportunities. It states that:

"if any houses or sites have been sold off from the farm holding."

In other words, if anyone has ever sold a site, there is no specific period of time during which the policy applies; it applies for ever. If a site has ever been sold off from a farm holding, an applicant will not be entitled to a site. It does not matter whether a farmer has 500 milking cows and only one house on the farm; the farmer will not be entitled to an additional site.

Mr Matthews: I can perhaps provide some assistance. Under the old rural strategy and the policies that applied, that was the criterion. However, it was agreed that that option was essentially only applicable in green belts or countryside policy areas.

Mr Poots: Under the old system, there was a time frame of about 10 years, but there is no time frame with this policy.

Mr Matthews: There was not a time frame in the old one; a 10-year period may have been as a rule of thumb. However, one issue that arose through the public consultation was that the criteria dealing with other development opportunities, and their sell-off, should be time limited. At some of the public meetings held as part of the consultation, time limits of five, 10 or 15 years were bandied about. Perhaps the policy should be time limited, and that is something to consider.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The main problem is that the policy has effect from 16 March 2006, so anyone who had already sold sites did not have that type of opportunity.

Mr Matthews: Yes; that is a question of planning ahead.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The idea of Lord Rooker as a Trotskyite is interesting. [Laughter.]

Mr Poots: That will cut no ice with the Department.
3.30 pm

Mr J Wilson: There is something that I should have mentioned earlier. I do not wish to get too bogged down in detail, but I referred to restrictions that apply to the farming community and those who provide services for it. That matter must be re-examined. However, in doing so, we should also re-examine criteria that may be laid down by agencies other than the Planning Service. For example, when a farmer makes a proposal to diversify or build a retirement dwelling, DARD lays down strict criteria, particularly in respect of diversification. The Tourist Board may also impose criteria. Easing such restrictions would assist in removing hostility to draft PPS 14. The principle behind draft PPS 14 is not wrong.

Mr Poots: There are a couple of other issues that I would like to raise. One is health, which was addressed in the old policy but has since disappeared. I do not suppose that health problems suffered by people in rural areas have disappeared. It is critical that that measure is restored. The number of sites approved in such circumstances was limited but, nonetheless, the health measure should be reinstated. There was no reason for its removal.

Other matters include the building of developments within older courtyards, which contain many vernacular buildings. Has consideration been given to crossroads developments, where four or five dwellings already exist around a crossroads and there is scope for further development? In such cases, a small sewerage works might be built so that a proliferation of septic tanks does not arise.

Mr Thompson: Both of those suggestions are interesting. The development of a social housing policy was challenging, but the service did not get it quite right. We are starting to push in the right direction. People talk about the old clachan concept: a small group of houses at the crossroads, beside the church, the sports club or school, where one can install support facilities. The idea of using older farmyards and vernacular buildings is very interesting.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): There is concern about social housing policy because some small blocks of Housing Executive houses were simply dropped into the middle of the countryside without provision of services. The style and design of developments is important.

Mr J Wilson: I have concerns about development around settlements. I recall that, in the past, extension of development around small villages and settlements was permitted. However, instead of one or two houses being built along the roadside in support of a local school, or a church or — dare I say — a local pub, fields to the north, south, east and west of those settlements were bought, and thousands of houses were built around villages, creating commuter and gridlock problems. That policy contributed to instances of housing development without infrastructure.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): And the need for a bigger pub. [Laughter.]

Mr McGuigan: On the agricultural viability test, has DARD set a test in terms of income, for example, on an average industrial wage? Even before draft PPS 14, in green belt areas, many complaints were made to the effect that the Planning Service had rejected applications that had been approved by other agencies. For example, when the Tourist Board has agreed that there is a need for tourist accommodation, and has proved that need, the Planning Service should take that into account.

Mr Thompson: I cannot speak about individual cases. I have no knowledge of them, nor do I have the authority to comment on them. However, the Tourist Board looks at proposals from one perspective only; the Planning Service considers it from a different perspective. It is feasible and understandable that each may, from time to time, produce different answers because each asks a different question. However, I do not know the details, and that is beyond my remit. I take the point about joined-up governance and, as we are striving to promote farm diversification and tourism, the views of the Tourist Board are an important consideration. Much depends on other factors in making a determination.

The farm viability test is a test undertaken by DARD. There are options with how that test is utilised.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Another measure that the Assembly introduced was that DARD would undertake rural proofing that should cut across all Departments. Rural proofing seems to have become lost in PPS 14.

Mr Thompson: Reference is certainly made to that. We went through a rural-proofing process in developing this policy. Rural proofing is about the differential between urban and rural, but by definition this policy is a rural policy.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): But you need people living in rural areas.

Mr Thompson: Absolutely.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): That is important. Are there any other pressing questions?

Mr Poots: I have a question relating to business and diversification. Some time ago, I became aware that DARD grants from European funds were being awarded but could not be used because about one third of planning permission applications were not being granted. That was before this policy came into operation and when about a third of Northern Ireland was green belt. My concern is that, as virtually nobody in the green belt was getting planning permission then, virtually nobody will get it now. Those people who want to stay in the countryside, who want to establish a business in the countryside or who want to develop tourism in the countryside will, as a result of this policy, come under the same restrictions. As a consequence, a substantial number of economic development opportunities will be lost.

Let me put it like this: I am glad that this is a draft document and that it will not be the final PPS 14. Issues such as those that I have outlined need to be addressed prior to draft PPS 14 becoming a fully operational document.

Mr Matthews: On the diversification issue, we are working with our colleagues in DOE in respect of where there is overlap, for example, between draft PPS 4, which includes an element on farm diversification, and draft PPS 14. We need to iron out the overlaps and ensure that there is less ambiguity and as much clarity as possible.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): This has been a useful meeting as regards the subgroup's consultation with the Department. However, I hope that you will be able to view this meeting as consultation with the Assembly subgroup in regard to draft PPS 14. As such, it is a two-way process. We may request additional papers or information from you.

I have a final question. I heard recently that a new policy is being developed in relation to farm buildings, as opposed to farm dwellings. If that policy is in draft form, it might be useful for the subgroup to see it. If the policy will restrict the building of silos and other buildings on farms, it will have a big effect on the viability of farms.

Mr Thompson: That is not something that I am fully familiar with.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I think that it may be a Planning Service document.

Mr Thompson: We will check with our DOE colleagues. I am not aware of that policy, but I will check.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): You will come back to the subgroup on that?

Mr Thompson: Yes. We will also reply on the FOI issue. We will check the progress on that and see whether we can give you further information.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Thank you very much.

The evidence session started at 10.32 am.

(The Chairman (Mr McGlone) in the Chair:)

The Chairman (Mr McGlone): We shall now hear evidence from representatives of the relevant Departments. That will be followed by a question-and-answer session. Mr Peover, have you agreed a speaking order?

Mr Stephen Peover (Department of the Environment): As members received a presentation on local government on Friday, I did not intend to make a presentation today. However, I am happy to do so, if members prefer. I understood that the subgroup wanted to use this morning for questions. Andrew McCormick has brought some papers that he wishes to make available to the subgroup, but it is the subgroup's decision as to how it wishes to use the time.

The Chairman (Mr McGlone): We shall begin with Andrew's submission on health and social care, and members may ask questions on any issue arising from that. We shall then turn to health and education.

Dr Andrew McCormick (Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety): The Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (DHSSPS) has the privilege of being first in line in the review of public administration (RPA), so its process is further advanced than that of other Departments, as I will explain. That sequence affects the nature of our present work.

I shall begin by setting the context in which changes are being driven and in which the factors leading to the current model have emerged.

Health and social care can be organised in several ways. The DHSSPS is characterised by several unique features whereby social care is integrated with healthcare. The nature of the organisation is such that there are increasing demands on the service, as members will know from their constituency business. There is no more pressing issue than the day-to-day demand for better health and social care. There are rising costs, rising opportunities to provide new forms of care and demographic changes. Northern Ireland has a higher level of ill health than other regions, so all of those issues must be addressed. The major expansion and expenditure that has taken place over the past few years will tail off, owing to the nature of the comprehensive spending review.

Those issues make up the context in which the DHSSPS is organised to achieve the best outcomes.

The objective of the structural change is to secure those best outcomes. Northern Ireland has had too many small health and social care organisations, and that is an issue with regard to providing safe and high-quality hospital care. Securing the best outcomes is difficult to do when the trend in medicine is to increase specialisation, etc. There are also serious issues to consider in providing the best possible care for rural areas.

The service needs to secure better performance and to deal with efficiency and productivity. Those issues, along with a range of other challenges were highlighted in the independent review of health and social care in Northern Ireland that Prof John Appleby produced last year.

The strategy that was carried through into devolution is essentially public-health led. The only way to improve health and social care is to make more people take responsibility for looking after themselves and to have a system that makes prevention and early intervention high priorities. However, the present structures do not serve those aims very well, so some of the structural changes are designed to make that better.

Although we plan to enact some elements of the reform programme first — that is a matter of fact — those elements are part of the wider RPA process. Therefore, we must consider how we can improve coterminosity and have the same principles that are applied in the rest of the RPA, in which accountability, efficiency and getting services closer to the public are the underlying principles. Those are the reasons for change.

The overarching diagram of the model is complicated, so I have created a simpler version. If the subgroup wants to talk at greater length about the Patient and Client Council (PCC) and the Regulation and Quality Improvement Authority (RQIA), we can do so later. However, the simplified diagram of the model draws out the main points.

The Secretary of State last November decided to create a regional health and social services authority that would take responsibility for the management and operation of the service and to reduce the number of trusts from 18 to five. The ambulance trust stands unchanged. However, the idea is to have five health and social care provider organisations that will provide the full range of care from acute secondary care, through to community care. The health and social services authority will oversee the planning process and will work with the new local commissioner groups to plan and prioritise services. The trusts will then provide that service. That is a continuation of the separation that has existed since the early 1990s, with the process of planning and prioritisation on the one hand, and provision on the other.

There is an increasing emphasis on primary and community-based care through the planning process, which provides a proposed strong link with local authorities. Those are the fundamental points of the model, and that is the point of coterminosity in planning and commissioning.

One major strength of the model is that the regional authority will be accountable for delivery and can say to the trusts that it is up to them, as a team, to deliver a better performance for the public. The regional authority will have a strong performance management role in the trusts, and they will require them to deliver part of the improved services. They will also hold them to account. Therefore a challenge is going out and ensuring that that accountability is coming back. That is a major part of how we drive through change.

Present structures have not served that aim of clear accountability very well; it has been more complicated than accountability in the proposed model would suggest. The roles of the Department, the boards and the existing trusts are not resolved and they do not provide clear lines of accountability.

We put together some thoughts on the rationale for the changes, to explain why we use this particular model and why we do things a certain way. If planning decisions are in the hands of the provider organisations, there is a strong risk that the community would not be as well served as possible. Therefore, the Minister decided to separate the planning aspects from provision, and to link them as closely as possible to a community base.

That is the reason for the alignment between community planning in the local government sector, and health and social care planning by the commissioning groups. That is the reason for the proposal to have commissioning groups aligned with local councils. That is the Minister's position on how things should be organised, and it should better serve the strategy for improving health and well-being. If commissioning were led by public health and by the desire to have better prevention and earlier intervention, the effect would be to change the balance of roles and to secure a better strategic direction. It should result in less dependency on hospital care and more on self-care and support in the community. Patients should be able to stay closer to home.

A further intention is to maximise the benefit of the integration of hospital and community care, so the five trusts will be unique in that sense. They will carry the full range of responsibilities and that provides opportunities for improving service delivery.

It is important to have a strong voice providing feedback from service users, patients and clients. A stronger patient and client council will replace the existing four health and social services councils. That provides a balance between a strong voice at regional level and a strong local voice. Both regional and local dimensions are catered for. There is a need for strong regulation, and the Regulation and Quality Improvement Authority will provide standards. That is its function.

I return to my fundamental point that the Department will step back from the operational management of the service, which has been its preoccupation, because the Department has been the only regional organisation up to this point. Having a strong regional tier of management can provide a different way of doing things.

Trusts came into being as legal entities on 1 August last, and we are making appointments to them. Chairpersons and chief executives were appointed over the summer. Those appointees are now appointing directors. Those organisations are coming into being, and the transfer of staff will occur under secondary legislation. That is all firmly on track; it can and will be completed by 1 April.

The chief executive designate of the Health and Social Services Authority was appointed in August. The decision was taken to proceed with aspects of that appointment without prejudice to future legislation. All of the changes in the organisation of the authority require primary legislation. The trust mergers did not require that, as that could be achieved under existing powers. That is how it has been possible for those mergers to proceed. The powers are in place already. The plan is to complete the mergers and to have the trusts working as fully fledged service providers by April.

The question is how best to manage the transition to the new structure. A joint committee of the existing boards will be established to provide a step towards the new structures — again, that is subject to legislation. The seven commissioning groups will, on present plans, reflect the configuration of seven councils. We intend to have members of those groups appointed, in place and able to begin work by March because planning of services for 2008-09 and onwards will then be possible. The timetable, as set by the ministerial team, is to have that full process completed by April 2008, although that depends on legislation.

The final diagram illustrates that the idea behind these reforms and changes is that health and social care can be a black hole.

10.45 am

Previously, on that issue, Ministers sensed that it was hard to see what was going on in the system and to have drivers for change. If we have in place a system of planning and commissioning, strong performance management and a new system of financial management, the intention behind all of that is to secure a better outcome for the public. If, for example, those who commission services can say, “That is not a good enough service, and, as commissioners, we have the right to exercise financial control”, and, “No longer will we buy from this provider; we will buy from that provider instead”, then that is a powerful lever for change, and often it is sufficient to have the possibility of that in people’s minds as a way of improving services. That is what we have found in dealing with the waiting list issue over the past 18 months. It is the possibility of change.

Dr Eddie Rooney (Department of Education): As Dr McCormick said, health is a little in front of education in this area. We are working towards the same deadline, but we are behind on some of the elements of the process. I will give you a quick overview of where we are.

The RPA decisions made in November 2005 resulted in fundamental changes in every aspect of education administration. None of the existing groups escaped fundamental change, not least the Department itself. Our decisions were clear: like health, we are much more focused on the policy and strategy, transferring operational functions from the Department to an operational body, and on occupying a strategic leadership role within education.

The bulk of functions and decisions centre around the establishment of a single, large education and skills authority to take all the functions of the current education and library boards, and the support functions of a range of other bodies that currently exist in education, to provide a single home that supports front-line education. That body will also act as a single employing body for all teaching and non-teaching staff in the education sector. These changes are part of bringing cohesion to what has been a fragmented system. The changes will also impact on other educational support organisations, with the support functions that they provide moving to the new education and skills authority.

There is recognition that the Department and the Minister must have a much stronger direct relationship with the widest range of education stakeholders. That means not just the owners of schools and those with an interest in the sector, but, crucially, directly with teachers, staff in schools, boards of governors, parents and young people. Traditionally, those links have been weak, and we acknowledge that information must be communicated directly between those stakeholders and the Department to help it in its strategic role.

Those bodies and interested parties will have a statutory education and advisory forum that will report directly to the Minister to reflect their views, offer advice, and act as a sounding board on how the system is actually working.

From the outset, we have recognised that schools are changing — and changing dramatically. Policies have been in place since 1989 regarding community use of schools, but that was a limited development. In recent years, in particular, we have seen a significant shift in the link between schools and their communities that has been driven by educational needs.

Teachers and those at the front line recognise that the ability to teach and deliver education would be increasingly difficult without those community links. That is very much in the context of the extended school, or full-service school, with health services coming into schools. It is a model of schooling that is very different from what it has been in the past, and an acknowledgement that, within the context of community planning in particular, those linkages are vital in the planning of education.

Yesterday we named the chief executive designate of the new Education and Skills Authority (ESA), which is the first concrete appointment to the new body. We have been concentrating on fleshing out the decisions taken on 22 November and getting under the detail of the policy. We have issued policy papers to all stakeholders, including political parties, and we want feedback by 19 January 2007 to help us refine the next stage. That is the basis of the legislation. The policy papers are there to help us write the legislation and to ensure that it is in place by April 2008.

Mr Peover: Members are probably as familiar with the local government position as I am. The RPA timetable is diverse, and ours is the furthest back of the three and currently scheduled for implementation in April 2009. Our process has been open. The structure in place to date consisted of a political panel, supported by a working group and underpinned by nine subgroups.

The real rationale for local government reform is to give local government a fuller role in the governance of Northern Ireland overall. That will be done by increasing the size of the authorities and their budgets and functions on the one hand, and giving them a role in community planning on the other, which would allow them to engage, as of right, with other public bodies in the determination of the services provided for local populations.

The concept is fairly straightforward, but the policy is tricky. The subgroups reported on time at around the end of June or early July, and some further work had to be done after that. We are now in the process of replacing the structures that were used for the purpose of policy development with a new structure for the next phase of implementation, consisting primarily of a strategic leadership board chaired by the Minister, with a vice chairman from the Northern Ireland Local Government Association (NILGA) and 10 political party representatives supported by various officials. Underneath that, there will be five work streams, again led by politicians and supported by officials. The work streams will spin off subgroups — research and task groups, etc — and we see that structure being in place from now right through to the implementation phase of the process.

Our documentation, including policy papers and minutes, is all on our website and is freely available to anyone who wants to read it. It is a challenging process. Dick Mackenzie, the Boundaries Commissioner, will be joining us and giving evidence later. The legislation in place on our side is The Local Government (Boundaries) (Northern Ireland) Order 2006. Mr Mackenzie has been working to the remit given by the Government to the Boundaries Commissioner to devise boundaries based on the seven areas defined in the RPA provision.

That legislation is in place, but the rest is not. Our intention was to publish proposals for a draft Order in Council in the spring, and that will depend on political developments. We will have to wait and see what happens with the Assembly. The work involved in drafting the legislation is going on. We have had inputs from the subgroups under the political panel and the working group, and that informed the process of legislative development. However, how that will be managed from here is not a matter for officials. We will have to wait and see how it shapes up.

So far, it has been going well. The issue that we have in common is how the other public services, and not just education and health, fit into their own government structure through the community planning process. That is key to the whole arrangement and the chosen route, which gives local government the purchase on the wide range of services.

We in the DOE, and certainly our Minister, see local government as the point for looking at the needs of a defined population in a geographical area. It has a clear geographical focus, and it is a broadly-based one, not a functional focus on any of the specific public service delivery areas. The aim is to try to ensure that there are arrangements in place that allow the other services, whether housing, health, education, the police or anybody else, to integrate with Government and to allow the various services to develop a creative synergy, and build up a more unified delivery of service to local populations. That will be the challenge for all of us. Most of you are as familiar with this as I am. We have had the general inquiry where we had to take questions on it, but you know what the arrangements are for it.

The Chairman (Mr McGlone): Go raibh maith agat. Before we move on to the questions, may I advise people in the room to switch off mobile phones, which may cause some interference with the audio recording system.

The members will be called in party order as follows: DUP, Sinn Féin, SDLP, UUP.

Mr Poots: I wish to ask Dr McCormick a question about the health trust model that has been set up. Previously, we had a situation in which the patients had the primary care, the general practitioners, the providers, health trusts and the health boards. Now we have a situation in which we have the trusts, the commissioning groups and the health and social services authority. So, there is another group there, when this exercise is about achieving efficiencies. I am sure that you have an explanation for that.

Dr McCormick: The commissioning groups are not separate specific organisations. They are subcommittees — the proposal is that they are subcommittees of the health and social services authority — so all the rationalisation of employment is possible in that context. The difference is that, previously, there were 15 local health and social care groups, so they are being, in a way, replaced by seven local commissioning groups. The intention is that they will play a significant part with the new local commissioning groups.

At every level, there is a smaller number of organisations. The clear requirement of Ministers is to deliver substantial efficiency savings within the new structure.

A lot of things are coming together on a regional level because of the commissioning groups and a better relationship with primary care. This exercise is about finding a way to have simplification, as well as a strong engagement with communities. The desire is to achieve both.

Mr Poots: Can you demonstrate how efficiencies will be achieved? Huge amounts of money go to paper trails and to the exercises that take place currently in commissioning. We want work to be carried out so that patients can benefit from the new builds that are coming along and the extra care packages that are needed as a result of the reductions in the waiting lists for operations. That is what public representatives are being asked to deliver.

We support any aspect of the RPA that achieves efficiencies, so it can deliver more services on the ground, and reduce the amount of paperwork involved. I am sure that you can demonstrate to us how there will be a reduction in the paperwork work that needs to be done.

Dr McCormick: Yes; the process that you are describing is related to the relationship between the current Department and the four boards. There is an extensive amount of process among the boards, 18 trust organisations and 15 local health and social care groups. That is a very large number of networks to deal with. This model will be simpler, with fewer senior posts. A very substantial amount of work is already happening in the trust context, with the number of senior executives going down from around 150 to around 50. That is a very significant change in leadership and personnel.

11.00 am

The second stage will be when those groups merge into the new authority in April 2008. There will be some cost in providing for the commissioning groups, but that is a means to promoting the relationship between the community planning side in the wider sector to secure links with other services, and to promote a public health agenda. That is regarded as a worthwhile investment to improve health and social care. I can provide more detail if that would be helpful.

Mr Poots: What we have heard thus far is helpful; if there is any further detail we would be interested in seeing it.

Mr Maskey: There are a few points that I would like to raise with Dr McCormick and Mr Peover. Dr McCormick, you dealt with the question of the impact on management staff. Can you give us any indication of what, if any, greater role the medical side will have in the placement of resources to health provision? I am interested, as coterminosity is one of the drivers of all this, to know why we have five trusts and seven commissioning groups. Can there not be the same number?

Dr McCormick: A role is intended for doctors as well as other health and social care professionals in designing and commissioning services. The commissioning groups will include GPs, other independent contractors such as dentists and pharmacists, and other professional staff from the boards. They will make up the new authority. As colleagues have said, the commissioning groups will have lay representation as well. There will be a balance of a strong professional lead and accountability and openness to wider community interests. That is an essential feature of the model.

I am sorry; I have forgotten your second point.

Mr Maskey: It was about coterminosity.

Dr McCormick: Coterminosity is essential at the planning stage; hence the alignment of planning and the prioritisation of services. That is the idea. The trusts are providers; it does not matter so much if they are not coterminous, because they are there to do what the commissioners ask them to do. We should think of the trusts as groups of people, assets and equipment. They are there to serve whomever plans the service.

Of course, a lot of business is done by the Belfast hospitals on behalf of other major hospitals. There are lots of services that cross boundaries anyway. It is up to us to ensure that we promote equal and fair delivery of services. The money and the planning power should be in the hands of the seven coterminous commissioning groups. They should have the leverage to require the service-provider organisations to answer to them.
[Inaudible.]

Mr Maskey: Is there any direct link between the current level of the health budget and the proposed changes: in other words, is there any tangible link between reducing management, or other structures, by a certain amount and freeing up X amount of the budget for front-line services?

Dr McCormick: The obligation to produce savings has already been taken into account in the financial decisions taken by Ministers over the last year or more. Those decisions have produced savings and have made some service developments possible. Looking ahead, service developments will only be made possible by the efficiency gains secured.

Mr Maskey: The public is fairly well aware of current developments. As regards the structure of the task force, there is a bit of work to be completed on policy planning. Drafts are being worked on in order to put into practice some of the deliberations that have taken place thus far, or to prepare for legislation. What portion of the work done by the subgroups and the RPA political panel has the Minister taken on board?

Mr Peover: The DOE has not had any great difficulty with any of the subgroups' recommendations, although the subgroup that discussed local governance left some issues unresolved. In general, the draft legislation closely reflects what came out of the subgroups, and I cannot think of any major disagreement that we have had with their work.

The issue for us is how much should be put into primary and subordinate legislation. As regards Dr McCormick's point about commissioning groups, one community-planning issue is how to define those who are mandated to be at the table and who will have a duty to engage with local authorities when decisions are being made about community planning. That issue could be dealt with in primary legislation, but the Department will probably not choose to do that, because it would be too awkward to amend the legislation in the future.

I cannot think of any major issue that arose from the subgroups' reports that the Department could not live with. The Minister is still considering some of the issues. Although not all issues have been resolved, we are getting close to that point, and I do not foresee any major difficulties. There may be some negotiations in some of the policy development panels on specific issues, but there are no major problems with broader policy.

Mr Gallagher: I have a couple of questions for Dr McCormick on coterminosity and on the apparent sense of confusion that persists, even when people look at the new arrangements. He talked about how the Department can handle coterminosity and how groups of hospitals within the new trusts are already working well together.

From my experience, that is not the case. For example, patients with fractures cannot be transferred for treatment — and that occurs in hospitals that will be grouped together under the new trusts. Patients who require dialysis, some of whom are seriously ill, will have to be transferred between hospitals that will be grouped together under the new trusts. I am concerned whether that arrangement will deliver an efficient service.

I want to ask you about the legislation. The commissioning groups have the important role of ensuring that the needs of service users are met. Is the legislation specific about the wider groups to which you referred? I am sure that other subgroup members have had the same experience in dealing with people with physical and learning disabilities and with those in need of respite care. Those people say constantly that they are never asked about the kind of service that is delivered to them. Will the legislation be specific about who exactly will be consulted so that we can better target the resources at those who need them?

My second question is about jobs. How many people does the Department employ centrally now and how many will it employ when this exercise is over?

My third question is about the very short consultation exercise on the new boundaries, a question that I also intend asking of the Boundaries Commissioner. That is compounded by the Christmas holidays. We will end up with a shorter consultation period than usual on this important issue.

Dr McCormick: I take your point about the difficulties in the present system. Part of our intention is to drive through performance improvement to help to set the minimum standards of service that people can expect. We will enforce those standards and require their delivery. Our challenge is to do that, as much more needs to be done to improve networking between the various agencies.

Dr McMahon will speak about the specifics of the legislation later. At this stage, the plan is to try to get the legislation into the public domain for consultation before 23 January 2007. We are nearly ready to do that. We want to ensure that the public has an input into the process.

Dr Denis McMahon (Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety): There are two important elements in the primary legislation that were not included before. One is the structure and role of the patient/client council, which will be a statutorily separate organisation. At present, there are four health and social services councils, and the people who work for them are employees of the boards. The complaint has been that something more independent with teeth is needed, so there will be statutory provision in the proposed legislation to allow for that.

The second important element is that, for the first time, we are proposing a duty of engagement, which will involve much more than the consultation requirements under section 75. It will mean engaging with people in communities about their health and well-being and about the design, management and prioritisation of services. Under the new arrangements, that statutory duty will be placed on all the new health and social services organisations. Those are proposals at this stage.

Dr McCormick: The new arrangements will deal with what are often thought of as the Cinderella services, but those services are critical to people in the long term. I am thinking of carers and those with a learning disability. We also have to deal with the Bamford review. There is a range of issues to be addressed.

On your third point, indicative figures show that the number of departmental staff will be reduced from around 1,000 to around 500 as some of the main functions move to the regional authority or to other organisations, leaving the Department to support the Minister on policy, legislation, the highest level of performance management and planning. A lot would be delegated.

Mr Peover: As regards timescales — let them blame me for this. The timescale is set by working back from the end date, 1 April 2009. It is like the old Irish saying: if we had wanted to get to where we are going, we would not have started from where we did. In our case we would have started about two years earlier.

All of us could have done with more time. There are several key stages for the DOE. First, there is the establishment of councils in shadow form in the summer of 2008, and the political panel has discussed how long the shadow period should be. The longer the period, the better. However, given the timescales we are working to, we do not think that it is possible to make it longer than the period from June 2008 to April 2009.

If you work back from 1 April 2009 as regards the legislation, the work of the Local Government Boundaries Commissioner, the decisions needed on the basis of his work, followed by the decisions needed on the district electoral areas, the Commissioner had to be given a very tight timescale in which to complete his work. He did a very good job. He produced the proposals on time and is still working to the timetable.

I take the point that the formal consultation period is relatively short. However, there will be public hearings, and a submission went to the Minister yesterday about the appointment of assistant boundaries commissioners to chair those hearings. I hope that that submission will be cleared in the next few days. The process will kick off in January 2007, and I know that Mr Mackenzie wants to make arrangements so that he and the assistant boundaries commissioners can engage with the politicians and other interest groups in the run up to the hearings.

The timetable is tight in every respect. It will be difficult for any of us to meet the deadline of 1 April 2009; the only way we can possibly do it is by keeping every element in the process as tight as possible. All I can do is offer my apologies. The process is dictated by the timetable.

To pick up the point about numbers, I will answer your question before it is asked. The DOE will change dramatically for several reasons. A large part of the Planning Service will move out of the Department because of the RPA, and we expect that the outcome of the review of environment governance will, more than likely, result in the creation of an independent body, although that decision has yet to be made. There is also the merging of the Driver and Vehicle Testing Agency (DVTA) and Driver and Vehicle Licensing Northern Ireland (DVLNI) and the efficiencies resulting from that.

The DOE has 3,030 staff, but we expect that number to halve as a result of the RPA, the review of environmental governance and the merger of DVTA and DVLNI.

Mr J Wilson: Following on from that, you will all be aware that there is only some support — from one particular party — for the seven-council model. Indeed, the Assembly voted against having seven councils. Should a future Assembly decide to increase significantly the number of councils, how would such a decision be factored into your proposals with respect to the target date?

As regards health, during the consultation period many folk took the view that a separate hospitals authority would be a good proposal. It did not turn out that way. As time has passed, is that over and done with, or is there still some support for that?

Looking at the models that you have presented to us, I see that community care is not mentioned. Having read material in support of the models, it seems to me that community care is deemed to be taken care of under primary care. However, those are two separate issues. I am wondering why community care is not mentioned; it is an important matter. I would like to hear your comments on that.

Dr Rooney, you mentioned sharing of services. You suggested that better partnerships would be formed with the new local authorities, whatever number is decided upon. Some of us remember the bad old days when most schools closed at 3.30 pm or 4.00 pm and services — school halls, playing fields — were locked up. That attitude still exists in many education circles. I hope that you are suggesting that partnerships will be formed with local government — local government being a provider of sporting and leisure facilities. I would like you to comment on that.

I would like to ask Mr Peover how he is factoring in an Assembly decision to change from a seven-council model.

Mr Peover: All that we can do at present is to have in place a contingency plan. As the Chairman said at the outset, we are working to the decisions made by the Secretary of State earlier this year. Therefore, our planning has been based on the structural model decided upon by the Ministers. In the local government sphere, there is not a huge amount that is contingent on the number of councils. Community planning, the new roles of local government, the modernisation process and the governance arrangements are, largely, independent of numbers. They are affected by, but not dependent on, the number of councils.

One issue that is slightly dependent on numbers — or more than slightly, I suppose — is the transfer of functions. In the case of my Department, it is envisaged that the bulk of Planning Service staff will move from the centre to the local authorities. That amounts to between 600 and 700 members of staff — probably 700. If there are seven local authorities, that means a pretty substantial planning department in each authority. If there are 11 authorities, the planning departments will be smaller. If there are 15, they will be smaller still. If there are 26, they will be very small.

If there were to be a different number at the end of a process of decision by the Assembly, a lot of thought would need to be given to the operational arrangements for the Planning Service, the Roads Service, the transfer of functions, and so on. That is the major issue with regard to changes to structures.

If the legislation does not proceed on the basis of a seven-council model, we will have to find a boundaries commissioner and give that person a remit to look at a different number. The process can be curtailed slightly because of the work that Dick Mackenzie has done. There is a framework of factual information in place that can be drawn upon. We would have to go through the basic process again of considering that information and mapping it onto a different structure, looking at the consultative arrangements — hopefully, a longer period of consultation than the one that Mr Gallagher referred to — and holding public hearings.

It would not be possible to have a neat and tidy timescale that takes us to 1 April 2009. It would be possible only if there were no shadow period for the councils. Otherwise, it would be unmanageable. There is huge jeopardy for our planning in all of this, and we are conscious of that. However, as we said earlier, we are working to the remit given to us by the Secretary of State; we have no other remit at the moment. We shall see how matters pan out over the next three months.

Dr McCormick: As far as we are concerned, the plan is to go ahead with the recruitment and appointment of members to the seven local commissioning groups by the end of March. It would be possible to reassign those individuals, even after they have been appointed, to a different configuration. That is possible, and we need to make sure that it is possible.

Whether it will continue to be one commissioning group for each of the, say, 15 councils, or whether it might be better to have one commissioning group for each two councils together rather than have too many commissioning groups, will have to be decided. Coterminality could still be preserved if the ratio were 1:2 rather than 1:1, and the action could proceed. There is no great impediment to timetable or action, as far as we are concerned. We can proceed, and we can adapt if necessary at a future stage. That is manageable and achievable.

In terms of your questions about hospitals authority and community care, the model that we are trying to promote is the one that has maximal integration, so that trusts have the full range of responsibilities from the acute side in hospitals through to, and including, community care. Community care is there in full; all five trusts will have that as part of their responsibilities. The strategy is to strengthen and promote that and to see more care being provided in a community setting, through investment in infrastructure and through changing the pattern of delivery; moving money; fewer beds in acute hospitals; more community care packages. We see a hospital as a provision of last resort. The norm should be the maximum possible care outside hospital. No one is asking for a separation of hospitals. All the trends in service delivery and in terms of the consultation are to promote integration.

Dr Eddie Rooney (Department of Education):

The number of councils is probably less critical for us than for some other Departments. The unit of delivery of education is at a very local level. It is done by schools and youth services throughout the community. Some of those have fewer than 20 pupils. We have the flexibility to adapt to whatever the structures may be. Likewise, the new education and skills authority will have the flexibility to adapt to whatever way those areas are defined. It is not yet embedded.

You are right about the relationship between schools and the community. We are at the start of a very long path. There have been many difficulties for a whole host of reasons, whether structural issues, support issues or attitude issues. They have isolated schools from communities. It is changing very dramatically, faster in some areas than others. It is recognised officially. We have an extended schools policy and funding streams in place for that. This is the first year of those developments, and the take-up is very high. There is an immense amount of interest in schools. It is the way of the future.

With a different hat on, I chaired the task force on tackling childhood obesity. The policy rationale for joint working is screaming out. These are the same children in the same communities; there are only so many directions that you can hit them from in terms of separate policies. The “joined-up” concept is being firmly embedded. We all recognise that that is the way we have to go in the future.

The Chairman (Mr McGlone): Are there any members who have not spoken and wish to ask something, or members who want to request further detail?

Mr Storey: I have a question for Dr McCormick. I appreciate the answers that we have been given and that there may be some more detail to follow. Recently, you wrote to us with regard to the estates and how that process will be managed. I noticed that the title “Permanent Secretary and Chief Executive” was at the top of your letter; I had not noticed that previously. Will you clarify why that is?

11.30 am

Dr McCormick: That title was used to emphasise the fact that those roles reflect the management responsibility in the current and future structure. They also encompass the classic policy advice role. There is a need to bring together the different aspects of the service and to provide for the overarching nature of the new authority, the existing boards, the Regulation and Quality Improvement Authority and the Patient and Client Council. For example, the Department of Health in England is managed by two individuals, one of whom is the Permanent Secretary and the other is the Chief Executive of the NHS. Our structure shows that you are getting two for the price of one.

Mr Storey: Certain education providers have expressed considerable opposition to change. That has been highlighted by this week’s statement from the Catholic bishops. What problems do you see in implementing a more streamlined and efficient educational service, given that there is a plethora of education providers and a reluctance to change?

Dr Rooney: Inevitably, this scale of change means that a lot of issues will emerge, some of which were expressed last week. I do not think that the nature of those views and concerns are surprising, given that we have recognised within the policy development processes that we still have to nail down a number of implementation issues. A lot of those relate to how much the legislation — when we finish that work — will reflect the balance of functions between the Education and Skills Authority and local schools. There are not only sectoral issues; there are general issues about where within the continuum of provision we have consistency and very clear, effective and efficient central support within a model that also recognises maximum autonomy for those who deliver education.

We have a fair bit of work to do to specify those issues. That was the purpose of the policy papers that stimulated the comments. They were designed to create debate and to get the issues fleshed out so that we can reflect on those views and put them into the legislation.

Therefore, we are not at the end of this road. It is not surprising that those issues will come up for comment. There will be further detailed discussion on those matters to find a resolution and a clear way forward for us.

However, that is in a context of us never having had a sense — and a lot of this came from yesterday’s stakeholder meetings — of people not recognising that fundamental change is necessary and is happening. We are on that path —everybody is on that path — but we have issues to resolve.

Mr Maskey: I would not like Eddie to go away thinking that, because I have not asked any questions, I am entirely happy with all of the Department of Education’s proposals. I am currently taking counsel on that, so I will not go into the issue now.

The Chairman (Mr McGlone): Do members have any other questions?

Members indicated dissent.

The Chairman (Mr McGlone): Thank you very much for giving your time to be with us today.

I have been advised that you may stay to listen to the rest of the meeting, if you wish.

Mr Peover: I am happy to stay if you want me to.

The Chairman (Mr McGlone): This part of the meeting relates to the local government boundaries. I do not think that I have met Mr Mackenzie and Ms Morrison before. You are very welcome. As with your previous appearance before the subgroup, you will make a presentation and then field questions from members.

Mr Dick Mackenzie (Local Government Boundaries Commissioner): I am a bit blind as to what presentation I am to give.

The Chairman (Mr McGlone): Have you not been advised what was requested of you?

Mr Mackenzie: No.

The Chairman (Mr McGlone): We will look over the previous minutes.

The Committee Clerk: The subgroup wanted Mr Mackenzie to give an overview of the work that he is carrying out, and the timescales involved. At the last meeting of the subgroup, a concern was raised that the timescales were particularly tight, and members wanted to explore that matter.

The Chairman (Mr McGlone): Is there a specific reference to that in the minutes?

The Committee Clerk: The subgroup’s terms of reference state that the subgroup should consider the initial proposals on the new council area boundaries that were published by the Local Government Boundaries Commissioner in November 2006.

Mr Mackenzie: If it would be helpful, Mr Chairman, I could give an overview of the work that I have been doing to date, and the timescale involved.

The Chairman (Mr McGlone): I would appreciate that.

Mr Mackenzie: I started this work on 1 June this year. Mandy Morrison, who is the secretary to the Commissioner, was appointed a few weeks before me.

At the outset of my work, I did two things. On 26 June, I met representatives of the political parties represented in the Assembly. I explained the work that I was proposing to do, the timescale involved, and the various procedures that I would follow. I then met the chief executives of the current district councils in Northern Ireland and explained the procedures to them. I am enjoined by the legislation not to consult before I make my provisional recommendations, so I did not speak to anyone about what I proposed to do in making my provisional recommendations.

I started work on the provisional recommendations in the last week of June. To do that, I had the assistance of the Geographic Information System (GIS), which was provided by Ordnance Survey Northern Ireland (OSNI). Over the two summer months, I worked in the Ordnance Survey offices in Stranmillis. I finished my preliminary work on the boundaries in the first week in September. That work was sent for mapping and printing, and the proposals were published on 7 November at an event at the Ramada Hotel. Copies of my provisional recommendations were circulated to all MLAs and district councils. In addition, the provisional recommendations were displayed in 160 venues in Northern Ireland.

I allowed a period of eight weeks for responses to the proposals to be made, plus three additional days to allow for the three public holidays of Christmas Day, Boxing Day and New Year's Day. In setting an eight-week consultation period, I had regard to the code of practice for the public sector, which states that a minimum of eight weeks should be allowed for responses to consultation processes. Following the minimum period, plus three days, responses to the preliminary proposals should be received by 5 January 2007. I gave the subgroup staff a copy of my programme. Has that been circulated?

The Committee Clerk: Yes.

Mr Mackenzie: I will begin a series of public hearings on 11 January, which will run through to 9 February. At an early stage, I decided that I would not hold the hearings myself; I have asked the Department to appoint seven assistant commissioners. I was concerned that people at the public hearings might be worried that, if I held the hearings, I would be seen as judge and jury in my own cause. The Department has been very helpful and is about to appoint seven assistant commissioners, whose names I expect to be announced next week.

The assistant commissioners will hold seven hearings and, under their terms of reference, I have asked them to report to me within four weeks.

A verbatim note will be taken of those hearings, and a full record will be published on our website. I will start to receive the commissioners' reports in February, and we will start working on revised recommendations. As you can see from my schedule, I need to start publishing my revised recommendations by the end of March. If I make any revisions — and, at this point, it is fair to assume that I will — there will be four weeks to respond, as set out in the legislation. I will finalise my report in May, and the Minister has asked me to report by 31 May.

That is the procedure and timescale that I am following. Thus far, we have received 12 representations in response to my provisional recommendations. I have not as yet heard from the political parties or the local councils, bar one council.

When I produced my provisional recommendations, the parties asked for additional information. They wanted to know the street names in each ward in Northern Ireland, and we had to do some work on our GIS software to make that available. The street names and postcodes for all the wards have now been posted on the website. We are trying to be as helpful as we can to the parties. In the four weeks since I published my provisional recommendations, it is the parties that have engaged with us most.

Chairman, is that fair enough for an opening statement?

The Chairman (Mr McGlone): Yes, thank you.

We now move to members' queries. We will work in the following order: DUP, Sinn Féin, SDLP and UUP.

Mr Poots: Dick, it is good to see you again. Your task of producing boundaries for the seven councils flies in the face of what most people in Northern Ireland want. I recognise that you have a job to do, but none of us will be happy with the outcome because we were not happy with the terms of reference in the first instance.

However, the terms of reference allowed for up to 65 councillors in certain areas, and they also allowed for the number to fall below 60. Why did you decide to have 60 councillors in each council when there is a significant disparity between certain areas? Some have a high population concentration and others a more dispersed population. You may put forward the argument that it is harder to meet the needs of rural communities than those of urban areas, which have denser population centres, but that does not stand up. For example, councils in the south-east of the Province cover areas of high population that are also quite rural. What was the thought process behind that decision?

Mr Mackenzie: The legislation is interesting because it pushes the commissioner towards a 60-ward model. It states that, subject to two sub-paragraphs, in each district, “the number of wards shall be 60”. Thus, there is a presumption that there will be 60 wards. It goes on to say that that number can be varied between 55 and 65, having regard to the size, population and physical diversity of a district.

In my initial work, I did not see a particular case, based on those three criteria, for moving away from the presumptive figure of 60. However, the recommendations are provisional, so if people put forward persuasive arguments, I am open to moving between 55 and 65 wards. For example, I would be surprised if the proposed West Council, which runs from Belleek to Ardboe —

The Chairman (Mr McGlone): Ballyronan, even — it straddles three counties.

Mr Mackenzie: Ballyronan; even better.

I suspect that there will be arguments about the proposed West Council, as it will cover a substantial area. People will point out that the area that a councillor in the West Council would have to cover would be substantially greater than the area that a councillor in Belfast Council would have to cover.

Mr Poots: That is why I drew the south-east as a comparator, particularly the area around Dromore.

Mr Mackenzie: I am open to persuasion on the matter, Chairman.

Mr Maskey: Mr Mackenzie, since my party colleagues are already engaging with you, I am happy to leave that process to one side.

Mr Mackenzie: That engagement is very helpful.

Mr Maskey: As you said, there is quite an amount of detail to consider. Our party’s support for a particular model is based on a number of outcomes. If those are not delivered, we are not wedded to any figure whatsoever, so we are very keen that that process should continue.

For the record, Sinn Féin’s initial submission argued that, while there was no real need for the number of councillors in Belfast to be changed, for example, we are not voting the argument down. However, we could see anywhere up to 75 members in some councils, taking land mass, rural nature and other factors into consideration. We are more than happy that there should be a very critical look at, and consideration of, the number of councillors that it would be appropriate to have in some of the council areas. Depending on the nature of community planning and the range of functions that have to be transferred, there is an important issue around dealing with the democratic deficit caused by reducing the number of councillors by a couple of hundred.

Mr Maskey: There will still be a couple of thousand or more public appointees to the quangos, so the democratic deficit argument does not stack up. Sinn Féin is happy that that very detailed work should continue. My colleagues, along with the other parties and other stakeholders, are involved in very detailed discussions. There is a lot of work to be done.

Mr Gallagher: Earlier, I asked the permanent secretary about the length of the consultation. You have said that it is to be the minimum, rather than the maximum. If there were a spectrum of low, middle and high public interest, in my view there would be a high level of public interest in what is a pretty contentious area of work, whether on Westminster boundaries or anything else, and yet we have settled for the minimum period of consultation. I find that very odd, and I wonder if you have any views on that.

That brings me, again, to the length of the delay. You pointed out that some unforeseen enquiries arose from the maps that you published, because there was a lack of detail, particularly in the urban areas, which concerned the political parties, who then wanted clarification.

What was the length of the delay? How long did it take to produce the new maps? That is important, in terms of the case for extending the consultation period. Work in many areas could not start until that information was available again.

Finally, when you complete your part of the work, do you hand over to commissioners?

Mr Mackenzie: It goes to the assistant commissioners.

Mr Gallagher: You will be handing over information to them, I presume?

Mr Mackenzie: Yes.

Mr Gallagher: Could you give us an idea of exactly what kind of information you will be handing to them? Following that, there will be a commissioner for the district electoral areas, as I understand it.

Mr Mackenzie: Yes; that is right.

Mr Gallagher: Could you tell us what kind of information, if any, you will make available? What do you think that you will be required to hand over to the commissioner for the district electoral areas?

Mr Mackenzie: I shall start with the point about the timescale. At the meeting that I had with the parties on 26 June, I outlined the programme that I proposed, including the timescale for representation — the eight-week period — that I mandated at an early stage. One of the first things that we did was to work out a programme as to how I would deliver by 31 May 2007. In a room down the corridor from here, I mentioned that I would propose an eight-week period. No issue with that was raised at that time.

It took four days for the software to be changed in order to give the parties the street names in each ward.

Although the closing date is 5 January 2007, the first public inquiry does not open until 11 January in Derry. Therefore, an extra week is available between those dates. I will not hold parties to the deadline of 5 January as long as they provide information before the opening of the relevant public inquiry. I hope that we have been as helpful as possible to the parties. We met some party representatives to discuss what further information and help we could provide. In the end, however, I decided on a period of eight weeks, with a further three days to allow for the public holidays. I discussed that matter with the parties and with the chief executives in June. If I were to extend the deadline beyond 5 January, the consequence would be that I would have to seek dispensation from the Minister to report at a later date.

We have produced a booklet with information for the assistant commissioners. The contents are as follows: terms of reference; a code of practice; a brief on the work that I have done; legislation; the legal advice that I have received; questions and answers; a procedure guide; and suggested opening remarks. All being well, if the Minister appoints the assistant commissioners next week, I hope to provide them with a written brief then, and to take them to Ordnance Survey to give them a demonstration of the software. Perhaps the subgroup would also like to see a demonstration of that. It is the most amazing software. I drew up the boundaries, from start to finish, in nine weeks. I was able to do that simply because of the software, the aerial photography and the skilful operators in OSNI.

What was your third question, Mr Gallagher?

Mr Gallagher: I asked about the district electoral areas commissioner.

Mr Mackenzie: The district electoral areas commissioner is the person who comes after me, as it says in the good book. He or she will be given all of the data and information that I have. The Northern Ireland Office, not the Environment Minister, appoints the commissioner. In 1980 and 1990, the local government boundaries commissioner was the late Sir Frank Harrison. He also became the district electoral areas commissioner. Maurice Hayes was the boundaries commissioner in 1991. He could not be appointed until the same process that I have undertaken was finished.

Last week, legislation was presented at Westminster to enable the district electoral areas commissioner to be appointed as soon as possible. The intention is that the district electoral areas commissioner will be appointed before I finish my work. Therefore, that person will be in post, I imagine, in January or February.

Mr Gallagher: At the meeting that you mentioned, I recall pointing out concerns on behalf of the SDLP about the short timescale. I referred to the mid-winter and the roads in Tyrone and Fermanagh as being possible problems. Poor roads, combined with bad weather conditions, could cause problems.

Mr J Wilson: Over many years, I have had contact with a number of commissions, and, like yourself, Mr Chairman, I have done so wearing the hat of party official, councillor or MLA. This time, the contact between the political parties has been good, and the available information has been helpful.

However, I have concerns about the timescale. I mentioned that to you at the launch of your provisional recommendations. I think that you agreed that the timescale was very tight. There are two upcoming matters that might derail your plans. First, as Tommy Gallagher said, the appointment and work of a district electoral area commissioner will take a long time.

The second matter relates to the option seven-council model, and I mentioned that to the departmental officials who were here earlier. You are working on that option now, but that could change. How much work would be involved in changing that proposal to an option that involves more than seven district councils?

Mr Mackenzie: I will take the second question first. I am not supposed to think about that, but, of course, I have. Before a revised system can be devised, the Assembly would have to set out the context for it. The first necessary action would be to introduce new legislation on local government boundaries. Given that cross-party support would be required to pass such legislation, I do not know how long it would take the Department and the Assembly to deal with it.

The new legislation might prescribe the number of wards per council, but the current legislation does not do that. Therefore, there are a varying number of wards in each of Northern Ireland's 26 district councils. If the legislation were to prescribe the number of wards per council, the process would be speeded up dramatically. For instance, it is easy to calculate the electoral average if there are 60 wards per district. The Chief Electoral Officer could tell me the number of electors in each of the districts. I would then divide that number by 60 to get the electoral average. Therefore, defining wards becomes almost a mathematical exercise.

Depending on the legislation, the delineation of wards could be achieved in nine weeks, which is what I did previously. It might even be possible to delineate the wards in eight weeks; a few glitches with the software in our first week prevented that from happening previously.

Interestingly, the mapping and the printing take almost as long as the delineation; therefore, another eight weeks could be added. In that case, it would take four months to delineate the boundaries and get to the stage of making provisional recommendations. Another eight or 12 weeks could be added for the public hearings. Therefore, from the point of decision, it would take an additional year to 18 months to change the system. Is that helpful, Mr Wilson?

Mr J Wilson: Yes.

Mr Mackenzie: What was your first question?

Mr J Wilson: I commented on how long it would take to complete the work of a district electoral area commissioner.

12.00 noon

Mr Mackenzie: Again, that is hypothetical. If I were in a court of law, I would probably not answer the question. However, I am trying to be as helpful as I can. Because of the hearing system, the process will take a minimum of six months.

The delineation of the district electoral areas could be achieved very quickly, once the final number of wards per district is known. The legislation provides that there will be five, six or seven wards per district. The timescale will have to allow for the public hearings, objections and so on. From what I hear, the district electoral areas could be more problematical for local politicians than the electoral wards. The process will take at least six months. If my boundaries are eventually accepted by the Assembly — which is itself another issue — by July 2007, the district electoral areas will not be finalised until the end of 2007.

Mr J Wilson: That brings me back to the timescale. I am not trying to box you into a corner, but, being realistic, even without increasing from seven districts, a timescale leading up to 2009 is impossible.

Mr Mackenzie: With respect to the Department, if the district electoral area model changes, keeping to the deadline of 1 April 2009 will not be possible.

Mr J Wilson: Even if the model is not changed, adhering to the timescale will be extremely difficult.

Mr Mackenzie: I am determined to report by 31 May 2007. It will then be up to others.

The Chairman (Mr McGlone): Thank you very much for your time. It has been good to meet you, Mr Mackenzie.

Mr Mackenzie: All that is left is for me to wish you a merry Christmas.

The Chairman (Mr McGlone): Thank you — we will be spending Christmas looking at the boundaries.
[Laughter.]

(The Chairman (Mr McNarry) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): I welcome Members to this first meeting of the subgroup.

A paper from the energy regulator is to be tabled. I apologise that Members are receiving it only now; the subgroup staff received it only yesterday.

I welcome Mr Iain Osborne, chief executive of the Northern Ireland Authority for Energy Regulation (NIAER). I regret that we are pushed for time; I do not mean to be dismissive, but perhaps you could keep your opening remarks brief. Members will benefit not only from your contribution but from your responses to their questions.

Mr Iain Osborne (Northern Ireland Authority for Energy Regulation): Have Members received, and had an opportunity to read, the papers that I sent last night?

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Unfortunately, as a result of the delay in receiving the papers, Members have not had time to digest that material fully. As you speak, they will be reading through it. However, the material is now on record and will be of benefit to them.

Mr Osborne: I will summarise in one or two minutes what I have written. I apologise that the material arrived late. Events are moving quite fast.

I have two prefatory remarks to make. This is the first time that I have spoken to a subgroup of an Assembly Committee, and I am extremely pleased to do so. I wish to record my heartfelt desire that I might be speaking to Committees of the Assembly for years to come.

I also wish to clarify the status of my remarks. We are the Northern Ireland Authority for Energy Regulation. We will have no powers over water reform until the new legislation is passed. We have a consultancy contract to advise the Department for Regional Development (DRD), and some of the steps that we have taken over the past six months have been taken under that contract. In addition, I have made a number of statements in my capacity as chief executive about steps that I thought appropriate for the water regulator to take and about positions that I will be putting to my board when we have the powers. It seemed important to get certain statements into the public domain, although we recognise that, until our powers become effective, we are legally restricted.

The paper that I have put before the subgroup essentially says that we have the powers to make the regime work for customers. It may not be the best water rate reform that could have been devised — given another three years, perhaps we could have done better. However, that is not the question. The question is, rather, whether the package will work for customers and whether it will be better than not proceeding with water reform.

Our view is that we have strong regulatory powers. Taken together, they are stronger than the powers enjoyed by the Water Services Regulation Authority (OFWAT) in Britain. Indeed, they are stronger than those of any United Kingdom utility regulator. I have previously worked in both energy and telecommunications.

In the paper, I have set out a number of areas in which the position has moved on significantly over the autumn. When I was first appointed, only six months ago, DRD's position was that our powers should be quite strictly curtailed, and that we should be in a position that I would not regard as being fully independent. DRD has rarely been given credit in the past few weeks, but it ought to be given credit for listening to the arguments and changing its position. It has come up with quite a robust regulatory regime.

We look forward to starting. In my paper I have mentioned three concerns. Two of them are about the transition. I had hoped to have more staff in place. We are now advertising for staff to manage the water aspect. Funding has been agreed, but we have not increased our staff as quickly as we wanted. I am happy to discuss the reasons for that. Our powers commence on 1 April 2007, which makes it harder to prepare.

The regulator should consider the issue of metering quite quickly, because we recognise the widespread concerns about capital values as a basis for charging, and, in the absence of meters, it is hard to determine a fair basis for water charges.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Thank you, Mr Osborne; we are now open to questions from members.

Ms Stanton: If and when power is transferred, could you lower the regulatory capital value (RCV)?

Mr Osborne: We could if we thought that it was the right thing to do. The Government are using £1 billion as the basis for charges over the first three years. I have said that I will propose to the board that we use £1 billion as a starting point going into the next price control.

However, we must consider two things. The first is the amount of investment in the first three years. That investment will be significant, and it is appropriate that, in any regulatory regime, the capital value reflects the investments that have been made. Secondly, we must look at the sustainability of the financing regime that is put in place. If it appears to us, for example, that sticking to £1 billion would make the water company financially unsustainable, our statutory duties would require us to change that figure.

Ms Stanton: Is that how you would regulate the self-financing?

Mr Osborne: It must be financially sustainable, which is to say that we will look at the business as if it were a commercial entity, and we will look at the cost of capital being broadly benchmarked to commercial levels. The fact that this is a Government-owned company is not particularly relevant. We will regulate it as if it were a commercial company, and that means that if the initial cost of capital has been set at the wrong level, for whatever political reasons, we will not necessarily stick with it.

Ms Ritchie: My question is in three parts. What difficulties do you anticipate in regulating a self-financing system after 2010 when customers, as envisaged in the legislation, will pay for everything? What risks will customers face before 2010? What reporting arrangements will you put in place to advise the Northern Ireland Assembly, and the Consumer Council, about the performance and efficiency of the new Go-co in each year between 2007 and 2010 when you take on your full role?

Mr Osborne: It would be logical to speak about the first three years first and come to the first of your questions last.

Until 2010, the main risks for customers are the problems that are being stored up for after 2010. We ought to be concerned about water poverty and about environmental problems that are part of the backlog. The subsidy regime has been designed by people who know more about this subject than I do to take most of the edge off water poverty. We should ensure that the efficiency of the water service improves as it should. If it does not, and the company has been missing its efficiency targets by 2010, that will give us a problem going into the first price control regime. If the company remains substantially inefficient, water poverty will be all the more acute.

The reporting arrangements over the first three years are not set in stone. As a new regulator, we will be open to views on them.

The regulator will publish an annual report, which would be laid before the Assembly, and which will give an indication of how all areas of work are progressing. If it is seen that there is would be value in an additional publication, particularly on water, then I would be open to that suggestion. If the Assembly would like to discuss that matter with the regulator during the first three years, I would be happy to facilitate that.

The third question referred to the difficulties of regulating a self-financing system. Fundamentally, it is about the bare bones of what the business is doing, and how well it is doing it. If the business is substantially inefficient then it may get to the point at which the regulator is setting price controls on the basis that the company achieves efficiency but is missing its target systematically. In that context, a commercial business would be put under great pressure by its shareholders, and its management might be expected to change. We will have to wait and see how the Government perform as a shareholder in that situation.

The finance package that has been put in place for the company is intended, in some ways, to duplicate the pressures of the commercial world. The rate of return has been set on the basis that it is, in some sense, the opportunity cost of the capital that has gone in — I understand that that is the rationale behind it. It is not completely clear at this point how well that will work in reality, and that will be a real difficulty if we run into the situation where, under the OFWAT regime, a company would be seen to be failing and the capital market would be imposing its own discipline on that company.

Ms Ritchie: Thank you for that information. Your answers reveal that this is a very unsatisfactory state of affairs. Have you yet received the ministerial guidance under which you will be allowed to regulate, and, if so, is it open to scrutiny?

Mr Osborne: There is no legal basis for the regulator to receive guidance, as the legal regime has not yet come into force. I have received assurances from the DRD; and Lord Rooker went on record in House of Lords on 11 December 2006 to say that the various authorisations needed to operate as a regulator will be given at the beginning of April 2007.

There is more than one set of guidance — there is a whole series. The regulator will expect Ministers to provide guidance about the balance required between environmental needs, social needs and customer prices. The approach in Great Britain has been that guidance has been given in stages, which grow increasingly precise as one works through the price control. I expect that Ministers will be providing the first set of guidance next spring, with the other two sets of guidance following in the following 18 months.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Following on from what Ms Ritchie said, there is a distinct possibility that government could be provided by the Assembly. You said that you would wait to see how the Government would perform as shareholders, if they were facing a deficit. Please elaborate on that for the benefit for those who might be preparing to take over the reins of government?

10.45 am

Mr Osborne: This conversation is about the situation post-2010. If price controls are put in place, which will enable an efficient company to make a normal return on capital based on those prices, what will the shareholders' attitude be to the dividend if that company turns out to be inefficient? Will they expect it to be paid? What steps will they take to improve the company's efficiency? There is a range of steps — from giving the company a ticking off, to selling it. In a capital market situation, the shareholders could think about selling the company. This is not within the ambit of the regulator; it is very much a question for direct rule, or Executive, Ministers.

It would be helpful if people in Northern Ireland who will have control over the matter would start thinking about what they would do in such scenarios.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Thank you for clarifying the matter.

Mr Shannon: Many of us feel that the emphasis is on setting tariffs at the same level as those in England in Wales, and the subgroup will be speaking to other people today who share its views. We feel that the level is being driven in order to keep the tariffs equal, rather than looking at the costs that will be needed to implement the system and the service. What is your view on that issue as it affects us until 2010?

After 2011, should water rates be greater here than they are in England and Wales, would you view that as failure?

Mr Osborne: For the first three years, the DRD will be setting prices, and those prices will be fixed in the licence that will be issued by the direct rule Minister. The regulator will set the prices from 2010. That is logical, because, otherwise, we would just be recycling subsidy if we were shaving prices that were held down by subsidy. Going back to Ms Ritchie's question, it is explicit that prices are being pegged to the levels in England and Wales as part of the effort to remove risks from the customer.

After 2010, prices will be set by the regulator through the normal regulatory process, which is cost based. If the company has not improved its efficiency to the point that it is at the same level as those in England and Wales, prices may be higher here than they will be in England and Wales. Prices may be higher here anyway because people in Northern Ireland use more water — for reasons I find quite difficult to understand.

I would see failure if the first price control set by the regulator does not allow for the investment that is required. Investment is badly needed to ensure that customer service standards and environmental standards in Northern Ireland are on a par with those everywhere else.

Whether direct rule, or Executive, Ministers want prices to rise is a question on which I am neutral. I would be happy to facilitate a continued subsidy regime after 2010 if Ministers choose to put one in place. As the regulator, I will be seeking to balance the long-term interests of customers, which require investment and funding, with their short-term interests, which are that prices should be kept as low as possible and consistent with investment.

Mr Shannon: I would view it as failure if the prices you set here were higher than those in the rest of the United Kingdom after 2010. That would concern the subgroup.

With regard to the tariffs here, are they being set at the level that will provide the service here, or are they being set at a level that is the same as that in England and Wales?

Mr Osborne: It is ministerial policy, not regulator's policy. I understand that they have been pegged to England and Wales for those three years so as to remove one of the risks from the customers, and that from 2010 onwards, for the first price control, NIAER will do that through a normal regulatory process based on an analysis of costs.

Mr Shannon: There is pressure on all of us to ensure that, but perhaps more so on the regulator. I have a few more questions to ask, if that is OK.

You said that the RCV is likely to be about £1 billion. Have you any views on the accuracy of that figure? Is there a danger that the RCV could be set lower — perhaps at around £600 million in the short term? What impact would that have in the long term?

Mr Osborne: I take it that by “accurate” you mean if we had done it on a normal commercial basis, looking at historic investments and depreciation?

Mr Shannon: Yes.

Mr Osborne: This is not an area that NIAER has looked at directly, but I am led to believe that if a normal commercial approach to setting the capital value of the agency had been taken, it would have been five or six times higher; £1 billion is very much lower than the value that a commercial approach would have arrived at.

That said, could it have been £600 million rather than £1 billion? That is a question for Ministers, in that they are setting the initial tariff package and providing the subsidy that covers the gap between prices and costs over the first three years. I have already described the approach that NIAER will take once we are setting prices, which will be a much more normal regulatory approach. There will be a starting point — whatever it is — plus whatever has been spent in the intervening period; then we will have a sanity check to make sure that the business can be financed and sustained on that basis.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): The Members of the Transitional Assembly want to get people like you to give evidence and bring forward your recommendations. The Members are keen to delve into this, and you can assist by giving answers to their probing and some guidance as to how to take these matters forward in the form of a report to the Programme for Government Committee so that it can take it into negotiations. If we pursue that dual purpose we can get a report that we will all find useful.

I am asking a lot; these people are used to probing, but this is not a court, so feel as free as you can to answer. We need guidance; we want to hear what you think is best. Some penetrating questions have been asked and your answers have been very useful. Mr Shannon has already picked up on your answer to the first question. We want to know what you think.

Mr Osborne: As I have already said, I think that the risks for customers in the first three years are quite substantially mitigated by the package that is already on the table. I hesitate to offer advice, but in terms of the amounts of money involved, if the RCV was successfully shaved from £1 billion to £600 million — and assuming that the cost of capital did not change — 40% of £58 million would be saved, which is £20-odd million. That is neither negligible nor an enormous amount of money.

It might be worth considering the situation beyond 2010 in more detail. If Northern Ireland Water Ltd (NIWL) does not succeed in reaching the efficiency levels achieved in England and Wales — which is to say that on the economics, prices ought to be rising higher than in England and Wales — will there be an openness to the continuation of a subsidy regime, particularly for vulnerable customers?

I hear two fundamental concerns time and again. The first is about water poverty, and a support regime for the poorest is something that we need to worry about for a long time to come — probably until the Northern Ireland economy as a whole is much stronger. The second concern is about fairness, and the regulator will consider, at a very early stage, what we can do to accelerate the move to universal metering. That is another issue that the subgroup may want to consider.

I understand why many people do not like using the capital value of properties as a basis for charging. However, in the absence of any data on how much water each household is using, it is difficult to see what would constitute a fair basis for pricing. Therefore, the way to deal with public concern is to introduce universal metering as quickly as possible.

If I were in the subgroup's shoes, I would focus on those two issues. I would concentrate less on the capital-value issue than on the scope for a subsidy for vulnerable customers after 2010. Secondly, I would examine the issue of universal metering.

Mr Shannon: I am greatly concerned that the burden of costs seems to fall on the householder and domestic user. Everyone on the subgroup is concerned about how that will work. My worry is that if costs are in line with the rest of the UK, then they will be too high, and that there will be real trouble if they are greater than those in the UK by 2011.

I do not want to hog the available time for questioning, because I realise that other members must have their chance.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Everyone is grateful to you for saying so.

Mr Shannon: Mr Osborne, does the current charging system meet the EU Directive to promote the efficient use of water?

Mr Osborne: Quite honestly, I am not sure that I have an answer to that question.

Mr Shannon: I agree that the question was somewhat pointed. Nonetheless, I would like to hear your comments.

Mr Osborne: We have not carried out any analysis on that topic. I have described our situation: we have limited resources as we are in a shadow regime. I do not know the answer.

Mr Shannon: The subgroup would be happy if you could come back with an answer at a later date, when you have had time to think about it.

Mr Osborne: Perhaps when we have the legal powers and resources, but that will be in the spring of 2007. If I promised to write to the subgroup with a quick answer, I would have to go back to the office and write to the DRD and ask for its view — and the subgroup could do that. I do not have the resources or the legal basis to spend a lot of money on water issues at the moment.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Are you are saying that you will be able to address the question when the position changes?

Mr Osborne: I will be happy to take a view on that matter when, as regulator, I am in a position to do so.

Mr Cree: Good morning, Mr Osborne. Thank you for your report, which I have read a couple of times. I have a few questions arising from your submission. You refer to the draft Water and Sewerage Services (Northern Ireland) Order 2006 as being “reasonably robust”. In view of the widespread concern about water charging, is the phrase “reasonably robust” good enough? Can you identify any further weaknesses in the draft Order?

Mr Osborne: Mr Cree, we have been asked to do a job. No one elected me, or any of my board members: we exist because of statute. If I were being asked to do a job in a way that I thought was basically unsustainable, I would be sitting here telling you that.

Frankly, the basis on which the job was being scoped last summer was unsustainable, and I warned the Department then that I would not go quietly. When I say that the framework is “reasonably robust” I mean that we now have the powers to move down the track towards bearing down on the company so that it becomes more efficient, because efficiency is at the heart of the issue. If we want to achieve sensible prices for water and sewerage, the company must be made much more efficient.

Only time will tell whether there are weaknesses in the draft Order. A piece of legislation cannot be judged to be perfect, because it “glitters” as it is being passed. It can be judged only on whether it does the job.

11.00 am

One of the good things about the current debate is that many people now understand the issues relating to utilities, including water, in Northern Ireland. That is not always the case. Utilities tend to be a ‘Cinderella’ subject. If the regime is failing two or three years down the track, many people will want to revisit it.

Mr Cree: It may be false to say that the framework is removing all of the risks to the consumer. On the contrary, it may just be storing them up until 2010. What do you think about that?

Mr Osborne: That is not terribly different from what I said to Ms Ritchie.

Mr Cree: You referred to metering, which is an obvious bone of contention. You say that in the absence of universal metering, no charging methodology will be fully fair. I agree with that. You are to consult on metering in the summer of 2007. How do you foresee your findings on that consultation being enacted? What timescale do you see for implementing it, bearing in mind that it is the only way in which we can meet the EU Directive and ensure the efficient use of water?

Mr Osborne: There is a range of options available to a regulator. If in the second half of next year we decided not only that we wanted universal metering but that we could see a reasonable plan for moving towards it, we could do a great deal simply by having discussions with the company. If, for example, we made it clear to Northern Ireland Water Ltd that anything it spent on metering in the first few years would be covered by the first price control, we would be solving a problem for them as well as for the customers. We might be able to do it on a purely voluntary basis for the first couple of years.

We approve the charging scheme each year, and we could intimate that if the charging scheme did not reflect rapid movement towards universal metering, the company would have increasing difficulty in getting its scheme approved.

We could propose a licence condition; if the company chose to resist that licence condition, the whole question would have to go to the Competition Commission to be resolved. That would probably take six or nine months, so it is probably not the first option, but it is there as a backstop.

Those are all things that we could do in the first few years. In 2010, we will set the price controls. It would be reasonably straightforward to do that on the basis that the company would have relatively little economic option but to go down the metering route. It would not be able to recover its costs otherwise.

Mr Cree: Do you have a view on the efficiency improvements that you will expect from the company between 2007 and 2010? Have you any views on what might happen to the affordability tariff after 2010? Have you identified a real need among those people just above the benefits level who, because of the implementation of water charges and the review of the rating system, could well be forced into the poverty trap?

Mr Osborne: I do not have a number to give you regarding the progress we want on efficiency. If we had chosen to be intimately involved in the preparation of the company's strategic business plan, we might have a number in mind. It seemed to us that it would be better if we did not, as it were, give our seal of approval to the business plan, so we have not been involved in that. We have not yet gone through the careful benchmarking process that we will use, as part of the price controls, to get to those numbers. I have seen enough evidence to be convinced that the efficiency gap is very large indeed.

The issue regarding the people just above the affordability tariff bracket is primarily for Ministers. It is not a problem that will go away in 2010; in my view it is something that we should all be very concerned about. We would be very happy to facilitate an extension of the subsidy regime beyond 2010.

In energy regulation we have experience of a range of ways of dealing with affordability issues. NIE customers pay a levy, most of which is used to help customers who have difficulty paying for electricity. A number of schemes are being developed. Broadly speaking, the water poverty agenda in Britain is less developed than the fuel poverty agenda, but nevertheless there are a few ideas in Britain. So, on the basis of our experience in energy there are a number of levy ideas that we could play with. The core of this is probably about the affordability subsidy, which is not something that we are in a position to put in place, although we would be very happy to facilitate it being extended.

Mr Cree: What about the band just immediately above those covered by the affordability subsidy?

Mr Osborne: In a way it is the same question. Who should have access to this subsidy and how do you structure it? It is not really a question for the regulator.

Ms Stanton: Is it not true that the people themselves are paying the levy towards the groups on the outside?

Mr Osborne: Yes, that is true. That is one of the things that limit the overall size of it. If you had a very large levy you would damage the overall competitiveness of Northern Ireland, although you would be able to help the poorest more.

Ms Stanton: It is not the private company giving anything away; it is the people themselves who are paying for it.

Mr Osborne: Under the latest network price control that we announced a couple of months ago, NIE —

Veridian — has announced a fund for vulnerable customers that it will be funding itself. That is an innovation that is not yet in place.

Ms Stanton: It is still a reality that it is people themselves who are funding it. We cannot deny that.

Mr Osborne: The levy that is already operating is a recycling scheme. NIE has proposed something additional, which it will be funding itself.

Ms Stanton: Jim Shannon asked about the large fixed standing charge. It does not promote efficiency. Do you agree?

Mr Osborne: Yes, I do. In these issues one is always balancing different factors. It may be that a large fixed standing charge is cost-orientated, because there is a large fixed cost in serving a customer. The reason these questions are not simple and need to be consulted on is that you are balancing off different factors. Certainly a stepped tariff, for example, that did not have a fixed standing charge — if for the first volume you use you pay a relatively low price, and then it becomes more expensive the more you use — would be a much stronger incentive to efficiency. However, that too has impacts on different groups of customers.

Ms Stanton: It does not promote efficiency. None of the other models have proved that it promotes efficiency.

Mr Osborne: That is true.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Thank you. The meter is running on this session.

Mr Raymond McCartney: Perhaps some of the questions we do not get to ask could be tabled for written replies.

I am sure you are aware that the Consumer Council took a judicial review about the consultation process, and the judge found that it was flawed. You submitted an email to the judicial enquiry in which you said you were not happy and suggested that perhaps the Department was deaf and stupid. We are meeting DRD this afternoon, so we would like to know whether the concerns that you had then have been properly addressed.

DRD has chosen the Go-co model, which is a commercial model for self-financing, but are there alternatives? I am sure you know that people are not happy with the Go-co model. A future Assembly would have to look at the other models, because Members feel that the decision to choose the Go-co model should be deferred. What implications would deferral have?

Mr Osborne: In my evidence to the judicial review, I set out the context in which my email was written. We did not take a view on the issues that were the subject of the judicial review; we left that to the judge. We intervened only because one side had introduced the e-mail and was co-opting our position. We wanted to make sure that our position was set out clearly.

I was hopping mad at that time as regards regulatory independence. The proposals on the table were unclear as to the date when the regulator would be given enforcement powers over water. I was also concerned about the draft licence in circulation at the time because it contained a number of provisions that would have fettered us as regulator. I was particularly offended by the provision in the licence which stated that the regulator would have to pass through to the customer any costs arising from the PPP, regardless of whether it was efficient or inefficient. There was a whole suite of issues that I was concerned about in addition to that.

People may feel that I have had some kind of Damascene conversion since then, but I do think that it is reasonable to give DRD credit for changing its mind on those issues. The licence, as circulated for consultation, gives the regulator a strong and complete suite of powers, and DRD has been clear that the commencement of our enforcement powers will be immediate, in April 2007.

What was your second question, Mr McCartney?

Mr Raymond McCartney: It was in relation to the Go-co model.

Mr Osborne: I would refer the subgroup to a review carried out by a consortium led by the UBS Investment Bank in 2004-05, which considered the different models that could be used for water reform. I cannot remember whether that review included keeping the status quo as one potential model.

However, the consortium considered the options of a Government-owned company; a Government corporation; a partly privately owned company, and a fully privately owned company. Anybody with ten minutes to spare and a blank sheet of paper could figure out the options. They came up with an analysis, which I think is correct, and concluded that the closer you get to a fully privately owned company — such as the GB model — the stronger the pressures for efficiency will be. The consortium recognised that there were a number of other pressures — and I think that the Government opted for the Go-co model on that basis.

If the Assembly wants to revisit that question I would suggest that Members read the consortium's report. From the regulator's point of view, it makes relatively little difference who owns the company, because we will regulate it as if it were a commercial company. We will use the same cost-of-capital benchmarks and the same approach to efficiencies.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Are you saying that as the regulator you would make no difference in how you regulated a Government-owned company and a commercial company, or would your approach to the latter be different, because you would expect inefficiencies from a Go-co?

Mr Osborne: We would regulate them both the same, more or less. However, the likelihood of encountering the difficulties that I mentioned earlier — failing to hit targets — would probably be higher if the company were Government owned. There have been four price reviews in GB, and the regulator there has set targets that have seemed, at the time, challenging, because the company is under strong pressure from its shareholders. However, the company has not only hit the regulator's targets, it has exceeded them.

11.15 am

I want shareholder pressure to come from the Government to the shareholder, and we will have to see how well the Government perform that role.

Mr Raymond McCartney: Do you believe that it is the best model? Are there alternatives or is the suspicion that the Go-co is the easiest model to privatise?

Mr Osborne: I am going to duck that question, as it is political. The UBS analysis is right in that the efficiency pressures are stronger the further into the commercial world you go. As a citizen, I recognise that that is not the only criterion, and that the other criteria are essentially political. Therefore I give the question back to you.

Mr Raymond McCartney: Do you feel that the break-even date of 2010 can be stood over?

Mr Osborne: In what sense do you mean "stood over"?

Mr Raymond McCartney: Will the company break even in 2010?

Mr Osborne: If you are asking whether it will have reached efficiency levels such that the prices can compete with those in England and Wales, I do not know; we will have to wait and see.

Mr Raymond McCartney: We are to put those claims to DRD this afternoon. The broad question in the first instance was about consultation. People, including the Consumer Council, are saying that it became obvious during the judicial review that the Department was consulting because it was told to do so, but that it did not listen to people. That is why I ask whether this is the best model.

Mr Osborne: The judge has spoken about that, and I do not have much more to add.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): I need your co-operation, for we have eight minutes.

Ms Ritchie: Mr Chairman, I have a short question to ask.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Do you promise to keep your question short, Ms Ritchie? The less we waffle, the more quickly we get the questions asked.

Ms Ritchie: Mr Chairman, there has been much discussion about how the Water Service intends to collect its debt and how it has impugned people's integrity. Such presumptions should not have been made about anybody's ability to pay or not to pay. Has the regulator any concerns about how the draft licence proposes to deal with bad debt? Would the regulator have any role in relation to lands and assets owned by the Water Service that could be disposed of over the next three years?

Mr Osborne: It was stupid to call the customers names; it is certainly not a commercial thing to do. We will expect the water company to apply commercial best practice to debt collection with the kind of process that is used across the economy as a whole. You do not hear of banks or companies that sell furniture on hire purchase calling customers rude names; it was a crass thing to do.

The licence is quite high-level; it incentivises the company to be commercial as it will have to pick up the first element of bad debt. Five percent of the revenue is quite a lot of money, and if the company fails to collect that money that will be its problem. Recognising that there is potential for widespread non-payment, the proposal is that it be rolled in to the regulatory capital value. The proposal is a compromise. One cannot allow large-scale non-payment to threaten the viability of the business, as it has to operate and provide a vital service to society. That means that most customers would end up paying for non-payment by other customers.

Above all, we have to deal with uncertainty. We do not yet know the value of the assets held by the company that are not needed for service delivery. I recall an analogous situation with the electricity company 15 or 20 years ago. We had a nasty shock when the value of the asset turned out to be a lot more than was expected. However, that situation was not managed properly.

I am therefore pleased that the water company will have to provide an annual report that details its intentions of what it proposes to sell. The licence allows no scope for sweetheart deals. The company has to show us that it has achieved an appropriate market value on each sale.

That will prevent any fire sale, or accelerated selling of land early on, perhaps to avoid payment of the subsidy. Once we have a business-as-usual situation, from 2010, the expectation is that there will be a 50:50 split between shareholders and customers. That approach is used in England and Wales, and it seems acceptable. Broadly speaking, I am comfortable that we have the powers that we need to avoid another Danesfort situation.

Ms Ritchie: Do you not think that, as the regulator, you are too wedded to the Department?

Mr Osborne: I do not accept that we are wedded to the Department. My office is a creature of statute: no one has elected me. If, a year from now, the Assembly chooses to change the regime, I will happily work under a new legal framework. I will not work to counteract the wishes of this Assembly any more than I actively work to subvert the wishes of Ministers at the moment.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Is your question about licensing, Mr Shannon?

Mr Shannon: No, it is about metering.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): I understand that the licence provides for reference to the Competition Commission. In the event that Northern Ireland Water Limited (NIWL) disputed a price limit that the authority set, what would be the Competition Commission's role and powers? Are you in a position to clarify that?

Mr Osborne: I am. Price controls are complicated animals that are made up of many elements. Essentially, the Competition Commission could unpick the whole package and change individual elements, or it could change the whole thing if it wanted to. The commission would essentially substitute its view for that of the regulator; it has quite a broad remit. It also tends to use a straightforward, economics-driven approach, without much sympathy for local factors.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): What about efficiencies?

Mr Osborne: The Competition Commission's traditional approach has been to pull in evidence from the company and the regulator about why each believes that one level of efficiency as opposed to another is achievable. The commission then takes a view that is based on the expertise of the people with whom it deals. The process is a little unpredictable.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Everything seems unpredictable at the moment. That is why we are probing the issues, but I hope that we get to the bottom of some of them.

Mr Shannon: If, at some stage, the Assembly wanted to introduce universal metering, would legislation be necessary, or could the regulator implement it without having to ask the Assembly?

Also, at what percentage of the average would a standing charge be set? Would it be at the level that has been set in Scotland or at that which has been set in England? I am keen to hear your opinion.

Mr Osborne: In answer to your first question, the Assembly could legislate for universal metering, or we could do it without further legislation. Either would work.

Mr Shannon: Could you do it without the approval of the Assembly?

Mr Osborne: We could.

Mr Shannon: If the Assembly were in place would you not introduce it?

Mr Osborne: I am not saying that. If the Assembly strongly opposed universal metering, we would have to think carefully before we introduced it.

Anything we do must be demonstrably in order to fulfil our statutory duties, and not just because it is something that we think is good to do. If we did think that it was an exercise of our statutory duties, then we should do it. We have the powers to push through universal metering. Sorry, what was your second question?

Mr Shannon: The metering option — would the starting average be similar to Scotland or similar to England?

Mr Osborne: I do not have an answer to that. That is a question about what DRD is putting in place, and I do not know. I would be happy to write to you with the answer to that.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): As usual, when we come to the end of something, we wish it were the beginning. I would love to have a long conversation with you about what you just said about metering. We are grateful to you for coming here. Thank you for your openness and frankness. The Members have asked that some information be solicited at a later date in writing, and we are grateful that you have agreed to that. I sense that we will see you again, in some or other guise. Many thanks, on behalf of the Committee, for coming and making your presentation to us.

Mr Osborne: I am happy to help, and happy to come again.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Members, the next evidence is from the Coalition Against Water Charges. I refer you to the written submission received from the coalition, and that of the Northern Ireland Anti-Poverty Network, which is part of the coalition. I assume that you have not had time to digest these either, so perhaps we need a few minutes of speed reading.

We will hear what they have to say, and then take questions.

You are welcome, and thank you for taking the time to come to the subgroup. The Committee would like to hear a brief introduction, and, without sounding rude, I emphasise the word “brief”. We are pushed for time, but we are on schedule, so it will be your fault if we miss lunch, and we have no intention of doing that. If you could open with your brief remarks, the Members are finding that the greatest benefit in these sessions comes from asking questions and listening to your answers.

11.30 am

Mr John Corey (Coalition Against Water Charges): I represent the Northern Ireland Committee of the Irish Congress of Trade Unions and the Coalition Against Water Charges. It is in the latter capacity that I speak to the subgroup today.

I want to set out the four principal reasons why we have opposed the introduction of household water charges and why we intend to continue to oppose it.

First, it is a fundamental human right that every home should be supplied with clean water by the state; it should not become a commodity to be bought and sold like any other. People must have clean drinking water supplied for their public health. Consequently, we do not accept that it is right that the provision of that fundamental service should be on the grounds that a person has to pay for it through an annual bill. That is fundamentally wrong.

Secondly, we reject the Minister’s recent protests that the people of Northern Ireland are not paying for the current water service. The Minister said in media broadcasts and press articles that people have not been paying for water through the regional rate since 1998, at which point the regional rate element for water was 37% — a figure of £127 was quoted.

I do not remember — and I am not sure if anyone else remembers — being consulted at that time about such a fundamental change in our public finance arrangements whereby people no longer contributed towards water services in Northern Ireland. I refer the subgroup, and also the Minister, to a report prepared by the Economic Research Institute of Northern Ireland (ERINI) in response to the Government’s public expenditure programme, which highlights and explains that in the 1990s the people of Northern Ireland contributed up to £1 billion towards the cost of investment in their water service, but that money was never invested in the Water Service. We are arguing on two grounds that the introduction of water charges requires people to pay twice: once because they are already paying, and twice because the money that they paid previously was not invested.

Thirdly, the trades unions believe passionately that water should remain a public service, and they reject Ministers’ statements that say they do not intend to privatise the Water Service. My colleague from the Water Service trade union may explain that privatisation is already taking place within the Water Service. However, why go to all the trouble of bringing in water charges if not for the purpose of introducing privatisation? In response to a recent request under the Freedom of Information Act 2000, we discovered that £18.5 million has been spent on consultants in the water-reform exercise. That must all be for a purpose, and we believe that that purpose is privatisation.

A letter dated July 2004 from the then Secretary of State to the Chief Secretary of the Treasury at that time — referring to a meeting between the Secretary of State and the Chief Secretary of The Treasury — stated:

“At our meeting on 17 June 2004 you said there needed to be an independent assessment of all the financial options for the water industry in Northern Ireland and privatisation must not be ruled out in the medium term.”

That was the Treasury’s view in 2004 and I have seen nothing since then to indicate that its view has changed. We believe that the introduction of water charges is ultimately for the purposes of facilitating privatisation.

The fourth point is that water charges are a regressive tax. The introduction of household water charges will negate the positive impact of the change to the domestic rating system, which is a progressive tax inasmuch as, although there are exceptions, those who can afford to pay more will pay more. The positive impacts of the changes to the domestic rating system, with respect to equality and targeting social need, will be negated by the introduction of water charging.

Water charges are a regressive tax because those who are well off will not pay proportionately more than the poorest in society. I am sure that my colleague will pick up on that point.

Those are the four reasons why we have opposed water charges from the beginning and will continue to oppose them.

I would like to make some brief points about the events of the last month or so. First, we are very concerned about the Government’s publicity campaign for water charging. Goodness knows how much is being spent on that campaign. There are newspaper advertisements, booklets to every home, television advertisements, billposters etc — the cost must be enormous.

We are concerned that the Government is not providing the public with accurate information about water charging. The banner headlines are that the bills for water charges will be £100 and £30. However, what is not being made clear to the public is that those bills are only, in the Government’s terms, for the short transitional period of two years.

If one takes the trouble to read the Government’s leaflet, one will see that, for example, on the basis that published data indicates that the average price of a home in Northern Ireland is now in excess of £162,000, the water charges for a home worth £160,000 will be £390 per annum.

Therefore, the truth is that the Government are introducing water charges that will cost householders up to £400 per annum; not £100 or £30 as indicated in the headline figures. We believe that it is wrong for the Government to be publishing a picture to the public that is different from the real picture.

I wish to make one last point on current events so that there are no misunderstandings. The trades unions in Northern Ireland intend to campaign against the introduction of water charges, and they intend to take the unprecedented step of urging people not to pay water charges. We recognise that it is a big step for the trades unions, but we believe that we are right and that we are justified in challenging the Government on their proposals to introduce water charges.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Thank you for your presentation. Our task is to tempt you into giving us some recommendations, proposals and guidance, which you can hopefully address through the questions asked, to help us compile a report that will be sent to the Programme for Government Committee. That is very important to us.

I understand the challenge that you have laid down as regards Government propaganda — or perhaps it would be more correct to say Government information. That is something that the subgroup may or may not wish to address.

With the subgroup’s indulgence, I will steer members away from some particular activities that you may be promoting, because this is a subgroup of the Assembly. What you have said has been duly noted; it is on record, and it could not have been clearer. However, the subgroup must address its remit, and should members want to explore certain issues with you, I will ask them to steer away from those so that we can get some ideas from you.

Mr Corey: Would it be possible for my colleagues to make a short contribution? We will be guided by the subgroup.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): I do not wish to deny you that opportunity, but there is the time factor to be considered. If you wish to say something that you feel is new and has not been on record before, then it will be deeply appreciated by the subgroup. Having said that, I know how it is when you have made the effort to come here and have prepared something that you want to say. It would not be right to deny you that opportunity. However, I would ask you to be brief, because it is your time. Our job is to try to get inside your heads. In what order do you wish to speak? How is your first name pronounced, Mrs Horgan?

Mrs Goretti Horgan (Northern Ireland Anti-Poverty Network): It is Goretti. Think spaghetti if you are confused.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): It is nearly lunchtime.

Ms Horgan: I have a couple of quick points. The first concerns the so-called affordability tariff.

The Northern Ireland Anti-Poverty Network is very concerned about the basis of the affordability tariff, because we believe it to be very misleading. The explanatory memorandum accompanying the legislation makes it clear that the tariff is based on the single person pension credit guarantee, which is £114 a week at present. Forty per cent of the people who are dependent on state benefits in Northern Ireland are single adults without children. They receive less than half of that amount, which is less than £57 a week. Those people are going to be plunged deeper into poverty, even with the affordability tariff. We really need to put that on record, because it marks a return to the idea of the deserving and the undeserving poor.

My second point concerns the dishonesty of the Government's propaganda campaign. Our members live in some of the most disadvantaged parts of Northern Ireland, and yet none of them have been able to find a house that is worth as little as those in the lower three or four bands in Water Service's explanatory leaflet. I defy anyone to find a house worth £20,000, £40,000 or £60,000, even in the most disadvantaged areas.

Finally, a recent report entitled 'Monitoring Poverty and Social Exclusion in Northern Ireland 2006', published by the Joseph Rowntree Foundation, a UK-wide organisation, shows that the levels of income poverty here are likely to soar with the introduction of water charges and the rate increases, because our housing costs have traditionally been lower than in other parts of these islands. The report clearly shows that the new charges will greatly deepen poverty levels.

For that reason, the Northern Ireland Anti-Poverty Network will be supporting the water charges non-payment campaign. Our members — over 300 voluntary and community groups — have made it clear that they think that the campaign is necessary in order to ensure that a revenue stream attractive to private corporations will not be established. We must not replicate the situation in Britain in which people are paying huge amounts of their income towards water charges.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Thank you, Goretti, you have done very well, because not only have you got your contribution into Hansard, you also have it in your submission. Pat, can you help us as regards time?

Mr Pat Torley (Water Service Trade Union): I will be brief. I speak more from the industrial perspective. We all know that the plan is to convert Water Service into a self-financing Go-co by April 2007. In order to do that the Government must be making some sort of profit to, allegedly, put back into the infrastructure. Of course, they tell us that they do not have the expertise. So how do they go about it? They bring in another bunch of consultants.

The consultants that they have brought in this time are the Union Bank of Switzerland (UBS), the Royal Bank of Scotland, National Economic Research Associates (NERA), Halcrow Water Services (HWS)

Ltd and Deloitte. That consortium came up with the financial and strategic review of Water Service.

I am sure that no one is surprised that their conclusions pointed to full privatisation. We know, and they know, that there was major opposition to that, so they went about matters in a different way. At present, there are two private finance initiative (PFI) projects being undertaken by the Water Service. The first is the Alpha project, which will put nearly 50% of clean water treatment in Northern Ireland in the hands of a private company. Dalriada Water has told us that out of the 80-odd people who are currently employed in the process of water treatment in Northern Ireland, it will retain around 15. All other requirements will be outsourced.

The second PFI project is named Omega. That will privatise around 20% of wastewater treatment in Northern Ireland. We know that there are around 30 people working on that project. The company, Glen Water, still has not told us how many people, if any, it will retain. Owing to those projects alone, upwards of 100 jobs will be lost. They will cost £270 million. Another contract has been issued for outsourcing customer billing and contacts.

It is interesting that the Water Service put billing before contacts. In effect, that means that if customers have a burst pipe or a dirty water problem, and phone the Water Service to complain, they will not be speaking to a Water Service employee; they will be speaking to the employee of a private contractor named Crystal Alliance. Further down the line, as part of that contract, a system called mobile work management will be used. Water Service management have told us that, initially, that will cost 182 jobs. We asked them how they came to that conclusion, and they told us that it was an estimate, working out at 22 supervisory staff, 24 administrative support staff and 136 industrial operatives. That seems to be a detailed estimate.

Since April 2004, 66 industrial staff have retired from the Water Service on age or medical grounds. None of those people has been replaced. However, the work that those people did still must be done. If you have a burst pipe in your street, and you ring Water Service in order to get it repaired, the likelihood is that a private contractor will repair it.

The average age of a Water Service worker is between 50 and 55. Many of those people have in excess of 30 years' service. However, we are told that when the Water Service becomes a Go-co, they will no longer be eligible to remain in the principal Civil Service pension scheme. Therefore, Northern Ireland Water Ltd will set up its own private pension scheme specifically for those people. A company does not have to be floated on the London Stock Exchange in order to privatise it. That can be just as easily done through the back door.

Ms Ritchie: John, Pat and Goretti, you are welcome to our meeting. I appreciate the fact that access to water is a basic, fundamental right, irrespective of where someone lives or of his or her income. It is an undeniable right. Everyone should have access to water. However, I am sure that you would agree that the £18.5 million that was spent on consultancy and preparation for water charges and reform, and possible privatisation —

Mr Cree: Margaret, could you speak up a little?

Ms Ritchie: Sorry; I was not aware that I could not be heard.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): You do not usually have a problem in that department.

Ms Ritchie: No; not usually.

Notwithstanding the position that water is a fundamental basic human right and that we should all have direct access to it, irrespective of our income, would the members of the Coalition Against Water Charges agree that the £18.5 million that was spent on consultants would have been better invested in water services? Can they elaborate on the Economic Research Institute of Northern Ireland (ERINI) report, which demonstrated that funding was provided previously, but was not properly invested in water services? I take on board that you have stated that the additional cost of the activities of DRD, the regulator and the Consumer Council will be at least £4 million per annum and that that cost will be passed on to consumers.

Do you have any concerns that the additional cost of establishing the Go-co with separate personnel and finance arrangements as well as the costs of establishing the charging regime and the bad-debt collection service that you mentioned will add considerably to the overall costs and consequently be passed on to customers?

Mr Corey: I will lead off on the answer, and my colleagues may add points.

We absolutely agree that spending £18.5 million on consultants is unacceptable and, in many ways, inexplicable. Expenditure on consultants by the public sector in Northern Ireland requires serious investigation and examination. The revelation that £18.5 million has been expended on this project alone is deeply worrying. That money would have been better spent on water service investment.

I do not have a copy of the Economic Research Institute of Northern Ireland's (ERINI) report, but I will provide the Clerk with a reference for it. My recollection is that the ERINI report was prepared in response to the departmental budget plans for Northern Ireland Departments. The report contained an analysis of the public expenditure regime in Northern Ireland, which was quite illuminating in explaining how public finances operate. The author of the report concluded that, during the 1990s, the Northern Ireland public contributed more than £1 billion towards water services. However, that money was never invested in water services but was used for other purposes instead.

I will emphasise our main point: the people of Northern Ireland have already paid for investment in water services, but that money has not been invested in water services. Establishing the Go-co will involve associated costs and will create an impact, and Ms Ritchie is right to raise the issue of how those costs will be passed on to consumers.

Crystal Alliance has been awarded the billing contract for water charging. That company has signed a £70-million contract to provide a billing service and customer-relation service. As Pat Torley explained, it will be Crystal Alliance that customers will have to contact. That is a further privatisation of water services. A few weeks ago, the BBC published Crystal Alliance's views and attitudes on the treatment of customers. If Crystal Alliance maintains those views and attitudes, the impact of water charges will be deeply worrying.

Northern Ireland does not need water charges. We believe that it would have been appropriate to continue collecting the public contribution to water charges through regional rates. As I said in my opening remarks, that method at least ensured a progressive system of contribution, unlike the regressive system that separate water charges will entail.

Ms Ritchie: Is the coalition concerned that the water regulator will not be involved in setting charges until 2010?

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): If I may interrupt for a second, can we try to ask questions that will pick the coalition's brains? They have outlined where we are; we know where we are, and we share common concerns. Mr Corey can, by all means, answer the question; but the purpose of this meeting is to get an idea of where we are going and to discover what the coalition can bring to the subgroup. If we accept the coalition's arguments, we can make them right at the top.

You have a little latitude, John. I am sure that that will not be difficult for you.

Would you like to ask your question, Margaret?

Ms Ritchie: I am being circumscribed in what I can ask. The aim of my second question was to delve into the coalition's mind to find out whether there were any concerns on the back of the previous submission, which related to the role of the regulator in setting charges.

Mr Corey: We have not addressed the role of the regulator in detail at this stage, principally because, as the regulator has stated, he has no role until 2010 at least. Therefore it is not feasible for the regulator to contribute to the debate on setting water charges. I ask the subgroup to bear in mind our perspective on this matter.

Our perspective remains that the proper course for the Government, and any devolved Administration, is not to proceed with household water charges.

Mr Shannon: Obviously, the Water Service has many assets. What should those assets be used for? Should they be sold off and the money reinvested in the system? Many assets will be identified over the next two years, and we are keen to know your opinion on what should happen to them.

Mr Corey: In broad policy terms, trades unions accept that unused Government assets, be they buildings or land, should be used to assist the provision of other public services. We have no fundamental objection to that proposition.

There is a danger, however, that the assets owned by the Water Service are becoming part of the argument about the potential privatisation of the service, and whether those assets are attractive, or perceived as being attractive, to any companies or other bodies bidding to take over the Water Service. We are deeply concerned about that. Following that logic through, it almost suggests that that should be avoided and that the Government should sell off all unused assets so that the public purse, and the public in general, can benefit.

I do not have details of the exact assets involved, how easily they could be disposed of and whether they could be disposed of quickly. However, that is my instant reaction to the question. Mr Torley may have some points to add.

Mr Torley: An article in a newspaper a few weeks ago said that a number of Water Service assets were to be sold off, with the money being reinvested to deal with education, hospitals and so on. I have noticed that schools and hospitals are also going down the public finance initiative (PFI) route, so money is not being invested in those sectors either. The Government are taking money from the Water Service, allegedly to reinvest it in health and education. Blatantly, that is not happening; neither is the money being reinvested in the Water Service to try to rebuild the infrastructure. My personal opinion is that we are hearing more spin from Government.

Ms Horgan: Once the legislation is in force and the Go-co is established, any money that is made from selling off assets will not be public money — it will be private money. Therefore, that money will not be able to be used for further borrowing against further infrastructure development, under the reinvestment and reform initiative (RRI). That is a really important point, which is often lost in this debate. From the moment that the Go-co is established, all money that accrues to the Water Service, from wherever it comes, whether it comes from us as private citizens, or from the sale of assets, will not be able to be used for the greater public good. One reason the coalition is united against the privatisation of the Water Service is that everybody will lose out as a result — except, of course, the shareholders.

Mr Cree: Can I clarify something for accuracy? Under the licence, any profits made after 2010 will surely be shared, if there is anything left in 2010 after the disposal of assets.

Ms Horgan: From the legislation, that is unclear. Any profits will certainly be private money, because the Go-co will be a private company. That is made very clear in the legislation and the explanatory memorandum.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Mr Cree, your remarks have been noted as regards accuracy.

Are there any further questions?

12.00 noon

Mr Shannon: John, you have mentioned your position in the union and the coalition and where you stand on policy. Does the coalition consider that water metering is out of the question as a possible means of paying water charges? Some people have told us that they would not mind paying for water because they do not use much. Others have said that there is no way that they would pay for water. My point is that there is a diversity of opinion. Given that diversity, I am keen to hear your opinion on metering. Perhaps there must be diversity in the strategy on how to fight it as well.

Mr Corey: The coalition's opposition to metering is clear and logical: as we are opposed to water charges, neither would we want meters to be installed at a huge cost. I cannot recall the precise cost, but it is significant.

Furthermore, the Minister and the Government are playing on the fears of pensioners in relation to the issue of metering. Pensioners worry intensely about having to meet the cost of any household bills. The Government's ploy of announcing that they will install meters for pensioners deliberately plays on those fears. It is disgraceful.

In addition to the reasons that I have outlined, the coalition is opposed to metering because of the sheer cost of installing meters: that money would be better spent on investment in water infrastructure.

Ms Horgan: I have a further point to make against metering, from an anti-poverty point of view. Research in England and Wales has shown that the most disadvantaged people, particularly those with large families or with disability in their families, suffer most as a result of metering. That is the main reason for our opposition to metering. In fact, a report by Save the Children shows the extent to which such families, who need a lot of extra water for washing sheets etc, end up paying an awful lot more because of metering. I can provide that report to the subgroup, if it so wishes.

Mr Shannon: Do you feel, therefore, that metering will mean that many more people will fall to the poverty level?

Ms Horgan: Precisely; particularly large families and families with disability, who require extra water.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): A highly significant point is emerging. Iain Osborne appeared to be encouraging a form of universal metering; now we have been given an opposite view. No doubt the subgroup will note that.

Ms Horgan, your submission says that:

“We believe that even quite large increases in rate bills — based on ability to pay — in order to meet the investment needs of the Water Service would be acceptable since people would know that their money was not being used to boost private profit.”

Will you elaborate on that? Can you put a figure on the increase in rates that you propose? Have you done any work to back up the idea that people would accept an increase in rates? That was a surprising statement.

Ms Horgan: No. The vast majority of people are sensible enough to realise that the water and sewerage infrastructure needs to be improved and that that must be paid for. The public has already paid a lot of money that has not been used for its stated purpose.

We consult our members all the time, and their main fear is that water charges will rocket after privatisation, as has happened in other places, such as Britain. Therefore, people would be happy enough to pay a bit extra in their rates bills.

We have not carried out any work in that area, but the trades unions have estimates and have commissioned research from England on this matter, so I will hand over to John shortly. Based on those estimates, we believe that it is possible to pay for the additional work that needs to be done without impacting too much on the poorest in society. One advantage of the rates system is that anybody who is poor enough to be on housing benefit has their rates paid through that benefit. Therefore, the poorest in society, be they pensioners or families, are protected. That is why we will continue to support the proposal for payment of water charges through the rates.

Mr Corey: I am checking my papers to see whether I can give the Committee an exact figure. In 2003, we commissioned research from David Hall, an academic from the University of Greenwich who specialises in water issues. He calculated at that time that adding £35 to every domestic rates bill would provide, over a period, the extra revenue needed for the estimated infrastructure investment. I am looking at pages 8 of 17 of Dr Hall’s document, but that figure has not been updated.

However, Goretti’s principal point is the same as my earlier point. We do not argue that people should not contribute to the cost of water services through the regional rates system. Using that payment system would not contribute to private shareholders’ profits. However, we object to the water charges system because it means that people are paying towards the profits of a private company — and we do believe that the Government intend to privatise the service.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): These proceedings will be completed in a couple of weeks, but I would be grateful, John, if you could provide the Committee with an update on that figure, if possible.

Mr Raymond McCartney: I want to pick up on the point about privatisation. The opinion seems to be that the Go-co is a launching pad for privatisation. Have similar situations arisen elsewhere?

Mr Corey: I cannot immediately think of an occasion when a Government have established a Go-co that has eventually become a privatised company. Certainly, it is in my mind that that has happened before, but we are basing that contention on what has already been said and done.

For example, Pat referred to the report undertaken by the consultancy group that was organised by the Department, which followed the correspondence to which I referred in my opening submission between the Secretary of State and the Chief Secretary of the Treasury. The Government organised the consultancy group to assess the position. Given the make-up of the group, it was not surprising that its conclusion was that the Water Service should be privatised. The Government’s response was that they did not believe that it would be popular or politically acceptable at that stage to privatise the Water Service, but they decreed that that decision would be reviewed in 2008. Based on the Government’s statements to date, the plan is to examine the water Go-co again in 2008, with a view to introducing private sector involvement then.

Mr Raymond McCartney: David has already mentioned the coalition’s campaign, which is obviously a “can’t pay, won’t pay” campaign. An incoming Assembly would have difficulty with that problem. How will you gauge the response to your leaflets in terms of how many people will not pay for their water? Would you need a certain number of people to make the campaign a success?

Mr Corey: We have not reached the point of working out that figure. However, we are certain of strong public support against the payment of the charges. For example, one of the constituents of the coalition — a campaign group called “We won’t pay” — has collected up to 70,000 signatures of people who are pledging that they will not pay. Our soundings indicate very strong community support against the introduction of water charges. The people of Northern Ireland believe, in principle, that water should be supplied to their homes — as it is in many other countries — without it being turned into a commodity that must be paid for annually like other commodities. There is strong support for that. People in Northern Ireland know that they have always paid for their water service. Ministers are wrong in thinking that the people of Northern Ireland will simply accept the charges.

Ms Stanton: I welcome you here today. We already know that water charges will have a major detrimental effect on the poorest in society. Statistics show that unemployment alone does not cause relative income poverty — inadequate income causes poverty. These charges will cause further hindrance across the board and will affect not only people on benefits but the working poor. The gap is growing between the rich and poor, and these charges will have a detrimental effect on society as a whole — not just one section of the community.

We have heard evidence about levies. Levies have been used in the past; for example, Northern Ireland Electricity (NIE) used levies to help deprived groups and communities. Is it your view that these levies are collected from the most deprived communities and go back to the most deprived communities, with nobody adding to them other than the people themselves? Do you agree with that?

Ms Horgan: Yes. The taxi driver on the way up was making the point —

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): You are lucky that you can afford a taxi driver. According to your man on the TV they charge £12.50.

Ms Horgan: It was only a tenner from the bus station. The taxi driver referred to the cap mentioned in the explanatory leaflet. A millionaire who has a swimming pool and three cars that are washed every weekend would have his rates bill capped at £750 each year, whereas the poorest would pay more than half of what the millionaire would pay. It is impossible to find a house worth less than £100,000 these days. It seems that the poorest always end up paying the most.

Professor Paddy Hillyard — who will be giving evidence to the Committee — did some work for OFMDFM on water affordability before the affordability tariff was introduced. It is very clear from his updated work that the poorest sections of society will continue to pay the most with these water charges. That is a reason for keeping the Water Service in public hands and paying for it in a more progressive way.

I have two points. Mr Corey, you touched on the question of moneys paid in respect of Water Service, and how that money may have found its way to the relevant cost centre. At the time of water privatisation in England and Wales, there was a green dowry, and Northern Ireland received £50 million. I understand that that was meant to be per year, and that it did not go directly to the Water Service. In fact, it went into some other pot. Will you confirm that?

Mr Corey: I cannot personally confirm that, but I am happy to check whether we have dealt with it in a previous document. We have dealt with the issue of the green dowry. David Hall calculated the equivalent amount using the Barnett formula, assuming that the green dowry were made available now for investment in the Water Service in Northern Ireland. He was then able to extrapolate from that what the additional cost and rates would be. However, I cannot answer because I do not know, precisely, what happened in Northern Ireland.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Mr Cree, would it be useful to you if we looked at it?

Mr Cree: Yes, it would. My second point is that much has been made of the potential efficiencies to be achieved by this new company. Will you share your views on that?

Mr Corey: The trade unions do not have any fundamental objections to the efficient delivery of service by the public Water Service. However — and Mr Torley will be able to comment on this in more detail — we do not share the approach of the programme to date, namely that efficiency is achieved simply by cutting staff numbers in the Water Service.

One of the big issues for the Water Service is the level of leakage from the system and how much of that goes untraced. To achieve greater efficiencies, it seems logical that more, rather than less, staff should be employed to address the leakage issue. Therefore, we do not disagree with the principle that services should be efficient. We part company with the Water Service and the Government on their view that this is achieved simply by having less staff. Mr Torley may wish to add to that.

Mr Torley: Very much so. I will also pick up on Ms Ritchie's earlier point about £18 million being spent on consultants.

The majority of my members are industrial staff. They are the guys you see in the blue suits, with the white vans, digging up the roads. I am sick and tired of phone calls from my members to say that they went out to a breach in the road and spent most of the day digging it up, only to be told when they asked for materials to repair it that there were no materials in the store, and that they were to backfill the hole. When this happens, a contractor is sent out the following day.

Our people know that the materials are not in the store, yet they are told to go out and do these things anyway. The guys on the ground are actually being more efficient than senior management in Water Service. Any God's amount of money can be found to throw at consultants, towards privatisation, but none to do the basic jobs that are supposed to be done.

Our people want to be efficient. They want to do the job and keep their jobs, and they are out in all weather — 24 hours a day, seven days a week, and 365 days of the year. They do not mind doing the job, but inefficient senior management hinders them.

So yes, the trade union has no problem with efficiency, but efficiency does not, necessarily, mean job cuts or that 'public' is bad and 'private' is good. That seems to be the direction that the Minister and directors of the Water Service are pushing for.

Mr Cree: Are there no existing systems to measure efficiency in the Service?

Mr Torley: I would draw your attention to an interesting article in 'AgendaNI' Issue 2, November 2006. Katharine Bryan, the Chief Executive of the Water Service in Northern Ireland, states that the private companies in England and Wales are achieving efficiencies of, on average, 20%. In Northern Ireland, we are on track to achieve 22%. If we are achieving 22% efficiencies, when we do not even have materials in the stores, what sort of comparison is she giving us? One she makes is with Welsh Water. Welsh Water used to have 4,000 employees — they are now down to 200. Those 200 employees are writing contracts with, and signing cheques to, private companies. That seems to be their idea of efficiencies.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Thanks for that, Mr Torley. Ms Ritchie, you asked the first question, so you will be honoured with asking the last question. That is the last time it will happen. [Laughter.]

Ms Ritchie: This question is specifically for Mr Torley. When you are managing your staff, from a trade union perspective, do you think that the management of the Water Service have any idea of the assets that it currently owns? Have they carried out an inventory, and is that inventory available for public use and to the staff when they go out to look? It has been my experience that they cannot locate a water main in a rural area because the maps are not available. We want to know what preparations the Water Service has in place. Even under public ownership such information is required. It is my opinion that the Water Service is not ready.

Mr Torley: I do not disagree. They are on their third asset management plan, whereby they are able to tell everything they have. However, the problem — as you say — is that they cannot find a water main on a rural road, because they are not using our people to put the water in. I know that this sounds like I am supporting our Water Service guys, but they are no longer allowed to do it. Instead, contractors are using what is known as MDPE (medium density polyethylene) — a plastic pipe that is put down the roads.

When our people do it they put in what is known as a tracing wire. It is an awkward, time-consuming job, but the guys do it. If a main needs to be traced then the guys can come out with the detection equipment and trace it. Because it is so time-consuming, private contractors do not bother doing it, and so when our people go out looking for a main they cannot find it. That is basically the long and short of it.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Thank you. This has been most interesting. Thank you also for your promise to come back to us in answer to a few things. I do not think that this issue is going away.

Mr Corey: Absolutely not. I have noted and will check the reference to the ERINI report in relation to the expenditure position. I will also follow up Mr Cree's point about the parallel increase — if any — in the Northern Ireland block grant at the time of the green dowry. I will also take on board your own point that you want us to tell you what we think you should be recommending.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): I wish that you had told us that during this past hour.

Mr Corey: We would like to consider the point in those terms and come back to you.

Mr Raymond McCartney: Will you include the update of David Hall's figure?

Mr Corey: Yes.

Ms Horgan: I will send you the Save the Children Report on the impact of metering in England.

The evidence session was suspended at 12.22 pm.

On resuming —

1.26 pm

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Mrs Gill and Mr Costello, I noticed that you were observing this morning's evidence sessions, so perhaps you learnt as much as we did; I hope that you did. That is a good sign of your interest, and that is creditable. I hate to labour this —

Mr Steve Costello (Consumer Council): I know the point that you are going to make.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): I will make it, anyway, for the record. I would be grateful if your contribution could be brief; five minutes would be sufficient. As usual, we have received an excellent presentation from the Consumer Council, but we do not have time for it — as the Committee Clerk has explained to you. Therefore, please confine your contribution to five minutes or so. The meeting will benefit more from a question-and-answer session today.

Depending on how well we get on, and if there is time, we can return to any subject matter that you feel has been missed. The instructions from the Committee on the Programme for Government are that reports should be short and concise with action points, targets and recommendations, so your help in that regard would be appreciated. The report will only benefit everyone if it meets those criteria, and the recommendations will be particularly helpful. You are welcome; please proceed.

Mr Costello: I will say a few words on the principles behind the water reform agenda, and Eleanor Gill will speak for a couple of minutes on what we consider to be the way ahead.

All of us should understand the complexities of what we are embarking on. We are moving to a position where the Department for Regional Development (DRD) will be in charge of policy and be a stakeholder, and in which there will be a new company responsible for our water and an independent regulator. The key to the success of those changes will be in the scrutiny, openness, transparency and accountability of the water company. To date, those qualities have been lacking. The reason for the present discomfort is that lack of openness and transparency.

The strategic business plan will be key to the transparency of the new system. A Go-co is different from any other business. It must have a value system, because the shareholder is the Government, which is owned by the people. Therefore, what could be confidential or secretive about that business plan? Why can it not be put out into the open? It is our plan and our business, and we have rights.

There is a need for an independent regulator, and that will be a difficult job. This morning, someone asked how a self-financing system could be regulated.

I do not think that anybody knows how to regulate a self-financing system for which customers have to pay. That has to be worked out, and we have a right to understand the policies that accompany it.

The draft Water and Sewerage Services (Northern Ireland) Order 2006 went through the House of Lords on Monday. That legislation went through, but its passage was difficult. The Consumer Council believes that side deals were made. A letter was certainly sent from DRD to Lord Glentoran, and Lord Rooker appeared to change the policy as he talked about the affordability tariff and re-examining the dividend and its rate. His comments on how the regulator deals with land were different from what the regulator said this morning, so DRD must give clarity on those side deals, secret deals or letter deals. Do members agree?

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): How do you think an Assembly might have differed from our direct rulers in its approach to this?

1.30 pm

Mrs Eleanor Gill (Consumer Council): I think that the answer came first and then everything else came in behind it. It was about how much money was required. That was agreed at £3 billion, and then they worked back to how it would be put in place. That was done without starting from the premise that public services must be paid for. We must find a fair, affordable and sustainable way of doing that and building around it.

If the Assembly had been in place and providing proper scrutiny, we would not be where we are today. We would still have a method for paying for water, but it would be one that would be owned. It might be uncomfortable for water to be owned and paid for, but there would have been a sense of confidence that it was out in the open and that the principles underlying it were that the service was owned by the people as a Government-owned company and not something that could be masked as something commercial, and in the business sector, when it is not. It is a Government-owned company, and therefore it must work in the people's best interests.

We were clear throughout about amendments to the water reform legislation that would have made it fairer, more affordable and more sustainable, though conscious that they were sticking plasters on something that had started from the wrong place. The Assembly would have come up with legislation, but it would have been legislation that had been scrutinised and had integrity.

Mr Costello: Also, the secret Treasury deal with the Secretary of State would not have been a secret if the Assembly had been up and running.

Mrs Gill: Our objective today is to set out the principles as we see them, but also to help you to examine what needs to be done from now on. We are conscious of and respect the fact that the water reform legislation is being passed. That is the reality, and our statutory remit requires us to work within that reality and to come up with something better. The three-year phasing-in period provides time for the Assembly to put in place a project that works towards a defined end point, providing fairness, openness and scrutiny for consumers with regard to what they are paying for.

There are six points on which the Assembly could immediately work and make recommendations. First is the need to have a completely independent scrutiny and review of the entirety of water reform by the Assembly — even in its transitional form — starting today. That review should examine everything, from the business plan to the Secretary of State's deal with the Treasury through to the whole area of ownership and whether there are alternative business models through to fair prices.

Secondly, there is a need to examine price protection in particular and the stability of the Go-co. If the subgroup achieves anything in our eyes today, it will be to give a straight answer to one very important question: will this Go-co be in break-even position by 2010? We do not want an aspirational answer; that is what we hope. Has the required position of the Go-co in 2010 been defined? If not, contrary to what the regulator is saying — that consumer risk is covered for three years — we will be building consumer risk for three years, and we are storing up a pretty uncomfortable picture from there on in.

There are unfair elements within the price, such as the capital investment backlog of £1.4 billion. I would press you as an Executive in waiting to negotiate with the Treasury to get it to contribute, at least in part if not full, to that backlog of cost.

In the House of Lords on 8 December Lord Rooker said that central Government and not consumers would pay for the affordability tariff. That must be clarified, because the cost to the Assembly in 2010 will be more than £50 million, and it will rise year on year. Incidentally, once that happens and central funding comes in, it is not a self-financing system. A definition of self-financing would be a good question for the Department for Regional Development. It is a crazy way of doing things.

On land disposal, the Consumer Council is absolutely adamant that the Assembly must ensure that no land — our silver — is sold off to cover for the inefficiencies of an unstable Go-co.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): I sense that perhaps you are answering questions that have not been put.

With regard to the Minister's assessment, is it fair of me to ask you whether the situation is heading towards privatisation?

Mr Costello: We believe that the agenda is for privatisation. We have possibly stalled that process, but it is driven by the Treasury. That is our firm belief from discoveries that we made in the judicial review, etc. Our surveys have always showed that 90% of the consumers do not favour privatisation, and that is why we asked for a consultation on that point.

Mr Raymond McCartney: We have some indication of models, other than the Go-co, that are available. We particularly need some elaboration on reference to self-financing not being a fair system.

Finally, we need some pointers on the results of the judicial inquiry and its findings on the consultation process with regard to what would constitute a better process of consultation for the future.

Mrs Gill: We recommend that the Assembly review business models and explore the advantages of other models that are available, or indeed hybrids, that would meet the particular circumstances of Northern Ireland.

I was disappointed to hear that your point of reference for looking at business models should be the Union Bank of Switzerland (UBS) strategic financial review. Our comments at the time on that matter was that it was overwhelmingly oriented towards a privatisation agenda and that there was not sufficient evidence in that document to show why that premise would be so, as opposed to any other model.

In saying that, I have to be clear that what consumers are looking for, in particular, is an efficient, effective and accountable system. Therefore, we are not taking an anti-privatisation view, but rather saying that there are other models that should be considered and proper analysis openly conducted. On Friday, one of the commissioners from the ScottishPower model was with us and was able to tell us that, when they took this on the company, it was worth less than £500 million; in 2010, it will be valued at £3 billion. That company did not have to go into private ownership in order to be competitive and efficient.

A total of 40% efficiencies were achieved in four years by Scottish Water. When we asked that commissioner what was the secret to turning things around, he put it down to the clear matching of cash to the outcome of the public service delivery organisation, and to ensuring that efficiencies were driven. Thus, it is not rocket science to see that there are different models. We implore a full study of those models and a recommendation that is open and acceptable.

If the Go-co, or privatisation, turns out to be the right option, I think that we can only fairly rest with that. However, we believe that other options have not been explored fully and with an open mind or properly documented. Therefore, at this point, we believe that the Go-co has not been proven to be the right option because, as we heard this morning, there is not even an understanding of how one would regulate such a beast, and that leaves us fearing great risk for the consumer.

Mr Costello: On the matter of self-financing, I think that we have a right to know how the regulator — whose job is to try to create conditions similar to competition — would regulate inefficiencies. This morning, Iain Osborne said that prices would go up to cover Go-co inefficiencies and bad debt. That cannot be right because, in a normal regulation competition, the price would stay level until efficiencies are achieved, and the company would bear the risk of inefficiency.

Who will pay for bad debt and non-payment? Will the consumers pay for that? In our fair model of regulation, the shareholders pay for inefficiency, not the consumer.

Mrs Gill: There were several outcomes to the judicial review. I shall explain our motivation in taking that case. Under our statutory remit, we felt that we would be failing in our duty had we not questioned the development of the finalised draft legislation because we had clear evidence that the consumer had not been taken into account. Therefore, we took the case on the process itself. That was not a negotiation tactic to either stop water charges or to force changes to the legislation, but purely to show that the legislation was not drawn up in the right way. That feeds back to the issue of the consequences of lack of scrutiny, openness and transparency, which are a lack of trust and confidence in the outcome, and that is a poor outcome compared to what could have been achieved.

Another outcome to the review was our discovery of the Government's main argument to the court. We were horrified to hear them say that there was no legal duty on them to consult and, therefore, no requirement for them to answer on the issues. That is not a good place to be because we are dealing with a £3 billion project that will be paid for over 20 years out of all of our pockets. The Government should have a duty to answer on those particular issues.

Furthermore, we were able to unearth helpful evidence in trying to get to the bottom of where the parameters and principles lie and to begin to ask the vital questions that we are now putting.

Ms Ritchie: I want to ask about the role of the regulator. I am mindful that we must look forward, and we probably are looking for recommendations from you in respect of that matter. I am also mindful that you were present this morning when Mr Osborne gave evidence.

What does the Consumer Council believe should and could be done by an incoming Executive and Assembly to strengthen the role of the regulator to ensure that he is not a supervisor, but a regulator in the proper sense of the word? What can we do to ensure that his word is stronger, more robust and is there to defend the rights of consumers as opposed to the duties of the Department?

Mrs Gill: The subgroup and an Assembly could push for greater powers for the regulator. Earlier, Mr Osborne described how the situation has developed from the point where he was hopping mad to the point where he now feels that he has the full powers he requires. However members must appreciate that no legislative changes have occurred as a result of the interaction between Mr Osborne and the Department. Changes are being supplied through secondary legislation. The regulator faces such challenges that he needs our support in calling for the measures that are required, even if he is not demanding them right now.

It is the Assembly's duty to provide input into ministerial guidance, to examine it and ensure that it does not fetter the role of the regulator. At the moment, it looks as though there will be an unfettered monopoly, and the Consumer Council will not be satisfied that that is not the case until we know — and have written evidence of — the enforcement and authorisation powers the regulator is to be given and from what date.

Lord Rooker said that the regulatory powers would become effective on 1 April 2007, whether that day fell on a Saturday or a Monday. Yet we have heard today that the regulator himself is unclear as to which date is correct. It would be useful for members to ask that question.

Members should also ask what reporting arrangements the regulator will have, in order to ensure that he will be reporting to the Assembly and the Consumer Council, as the statutory body involved, as opposed to reporting to the shareholder Department. That distinction must be clearly drawn.

As regards the licence, the issue of land disposal is very important. The Consumer Council is concerned about the issue because the water company could use the sale of land as a get-out-of-jail-free card — the company could be inefficient and its shortcomings could be masked by the sale of land, and, therefore, yet more of the family silver would be sold off.

Certain exemptions must be removed from the draft licence because they tie the hands of the regulator. The regulator receiving an annual report of land disposal is different from his approving those disposals. If the authorisation for land disposal is not with the regulator then there will be no independent force involved in that process. If nothing is done until 2010, we may find that the land disposal issue will have been taken care of because the land and assets will have been disposed of and used in ways that are contrary to the best interests of the consumer. The Consumer Council will advise the subgroup on how the licence can be strengthened to support the role of the regulator and avoid any lack of clarity.

As an example of the problems we face, on Monday, a letter was written from the Department for Regional Development to Lord Glentoran. The Consumer Council has not seen that letter, and we do not know whether it clarifies the situation or obscures it. What we heard from the regulator today differs from what we heard from Lord Rooker on Monday. We need more time to consider those matters.

Mr Costello: The basic principle of how self-financing schemes are regulated needs to be analysed.

Mr Shannon: What does the Consumer Council consider to be the best method of levying water charges? Is there a more appropriate system? Would you advocate metering? Earlier this morning, and together with other members, I drew attention to the point made by the Coalition Against Water Charges that pensioners are being encouraged to consider water metering, and indeed were being directed towards that option whether or not they liked the idea. I am anxious to hear your opinion about that. Some people are saying that a small charge is not too bad; others are saying that charges must be scrapped.

1.45 pm

Mrs Gill: Before we talk about how to pay the water charges, whether through metering, rates, or anything else, we should talk about whether there is a fair price on the table to begin with. As I said earlier, our concern is whether there is in place a viable, stable, sustainable Go-co that can achieve a lower price for the provision of water services, as opposed to keeping to an artificial pegged price into the future.

The Consumer Council is really concerned about this issue for a number of reasons. The Consumer Council has not been privy to the strategic business plan since September 2006. However, on receipt of the second draft of the plan at that time, the Consumer Council sent it to an independent expert in London for review and scrutiny. The findings of that review are extremely concerning. It concluded that that version of the business plan did not set out a sustainable future and could not be sustained without significant price increases in the future.

We must first ask whether the premise of this plan is fair and affordable for consumers. Only then can we ask about the best way in which to meet that need. Is it necessary to install meters? Is it fair that those who can afford meters can get them when others cannot, or should the universal metering approach that the regulator mentioned be adopted?

This issue raises many questions, but the problem is that there has been no public debate about the best way of meeting the costs — and we are all agreed that the costs have to be met. In early 2007, the Consumer Council hopes to hold a symposium at which people can give evidence about the pros and cons of every proposed method of payment — whether that be via the rates, some sort of income-tax link, metering or whatever.

The Consumer Council's belief is that if there are to be water charges, and if we really are to be pushed by the EU Water Framework Directive, a metering system would be the best option, because it reflects the amount of water that the consumer actually uses.

We have failed to think outside the box. For example, one of the issues that was raised by the Coalition Against Water Charges was that metering would be harmful to bigger families who use more water. However, Belgium uses a universal metering system, and it has in place an allowance per person in the household. Consumers who exceed that allowance are charged for the excess water that they use. That keeps health and hygiene at the top of the list and causes no hardship to the family. If consumers use water inefficiently, they pick up the rest of the bill. Thus, there are many options to be considered, and many pieces of contrary evidence. We would like to assist the Assembly by gathering evidence that presents the pros and cons of every different payment method.

Mr Shannon: We would all appreciate that. We are aware of all the problems that can occur as a result of extra charges, and those charges will multiply with the increased rates next year and the new water charges. What are your feelings about bad debt management? I am keen to get your ideas on how debt can be managed.

Mr Costello: The target for bad debt that has been set in the business plan is 5%, and we believe that that is far too low. If that 5% is added to the “no pay” campaign, the bad debt figure could rise to 15% or 20%. I would have thought that good business practice is to have certainty in a business plan, not assumptions about best possible achievement.

We also take issue with the strategy for collecting bad debt. We fundamentally believe that all people should be treated equally. A strategy for the collection of bad debt cannot be based on location and people being categorised.

Mr Shannon: Have you been involved in any discussions with DRD on some sort of strategy? Has the Department asked for the Consumer Council's opinion at any stage?

Mrs Gill: We have advised the Subgroup on the Economic Challenges Facing Northern Ireland. We have been very frustrated by our lack of involvement in helping to shape the policies and procedures that are being proposed. Members will know that we have a strong track record in representing electricity, gas and transport consumers, and in positively building up and consumer proofing policies so that they are in the consumers' best interests. However, with the water proposals, we are finding time and time again that we are being informed after the event, as opposed to consulted before the event.

Taking the recent issues concerning debt recovery as an example, it was only after a year of pushing that we got a presentation on the contractual agreement that had been made with Crystal Alliance and learned how issues such as customer complaint handling, billing and debt management were to be taken forward.

It was during that presentation that information was shared with us on the use of the Experian database, which is a private-sector-owned database that identifies people by location and by labels, such as “affluent achiever” or “rock bottom”. We would like an assurance that this subgroup will push for the use of that database to be stopped — it should not be the basis of a debt management strategy in a Government-owned company. The Consumer Council feels that the values of the database are wrong.

It is proposed, without there having been any consultation, that the ability of people to pay will be profiled and there is also the suggestion that there might be a two-tier system for debt management. The Consumer Council is pleased to hear that the Chief Executive of the Water Service has now said that this proposal is up for discussion. Her organisation made us very clear of its intention to proceed without consultation. We wrote in September and said that we are absolutely and fundamentally opposed to any system that is not open to consultation — particularly with the consumer representative body.

There are equality issues involved. Those who cannot pay, for whatever reason, be it because of their location, income or credit history, will be chased down twice as quickly. We do not think that is acceptable.

Further, the way this proposal will work is that if it is self-financing and the bad debt is undercalculated, then that will be passed on to consumers’ bills. The more that a bill increases, the more people come into the poverty band. How does one square such a self-financing system with the anti-poverty strategy that is in place? Such a system will add to the problem as opposed to take it away.

Mr Costello: Yes. There is cycle of debt — prices go up and there will be more debt.

Mr Shannon: My perception is that the figure is closer to 20%. I have a concern about who will have to pay the debt — will that burden be placed on those who are able to pay?

Mrs Gill: We met with John Spellar in January 2005 and raised the point that a figure of 5% was an underestimation. The fact that everything is uncertain after 2010 does not help to give us any confidence or assurance that things will be OK by then. There is an onus to recalculate that bad debt estimate, rather than sit idly by knowing that it might be different — surely there is a requirement to increase the figure so that it is at the level that might be expected? This matter is causing us great concern.

Mr Costello: We need the regulator to articulate, in policy terms, how he intends to manage bad debt.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Arising from that and previous lines of questioning, there is an important thread coming across. The difficulty that you appear to have had regarding consultation concerns us. Why have you been blocked — if that is the correct word — in this process? Do you have any redress? It is unfortunate that a body such as yours, which survives on information gathered through consultation, is arriving after the horse has bolted in many cases. How can that be redressed? That is an important handling issue that contributes to public confusion on issues, because there is no champion out there until either we or the Consumer Council arrive on the scene. Is that a major problem for you? It seems to me that it is one that you are grappling with.

Mr Costello: It has certainly become a major problem in the last three months, especially in the lead up to the passage of the legislation. If the legislation goes through on Thursday we have a statutory place and we can and will be more demanding to have information and consultation available to us. The Judge said in our recent court case that the Minister of the Department failed the legal test of fairness by failing to show conscientious consideration for consumers as a body. We do remain concerned about it — relationships have to be worked on.

We have been very intense in our questioning of the Minister and the Department; at times they found we were too intense and too demanding of them.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): That is tough luck for them.

Mr Costello: Yes, it is tough, and that is the way we view it.

Mrs Gill: The Consumer Council recommends that the Assembly require the Department and the Regulator to ensure that the water company consults the Consumer Council on all issues that affect consumers rather than merely informing the Consumer Council about matters or asking its advice after policies have been drafted. The Consumer Council has demonstrated that it can engage positively on electricity, gas and transport issues in order to build policies that will last, as opposed to marking homework after the event.

It is around three months before water bills go into people’s homes. At present, the Consumer Council has only the front page of the Bill in its possession, yet there are 140 different types and iterations of that. We do not know what the Bill looks like, front to back.

The Consumer Council knows what recommendations it made. However, it does not know what will happen, despite the fact that 85% of the complaints that it receives are on billing. The Consumer Council has not seen the debt management strategy, nor does it have a copy of the code of practice

The Consumer Council found out, through its diligence and persistence, which annoyed different people, that the Crystal Alliance contract that was signed outlines performance indicators for Crystal Alliance. In the contract, a complaint is defined as one that is put in writing. The Consumer Council has communicated many times to the Water Service that complaints in writing constitute about 5% to 7% of all the complaints that we receive. Despite that, because of the Crystal Alliance contract, the Water Service and Crystal Alliance will only count complaints that they receive in writing. The Consumer Council had to draw them back from that and get an agreement that complaints would include any expression of dissatisfaction by consumers.

The problem is, however, that that was set in a contract that was signed last year. The Consumer Council had to get the contract changed in order to reflect the fact that consumers must have their complaints recorded whether they write them, sing them, or phone them. Every expression of dissatisfaction must count. That has only unearthed one element of a sophisticated contract of which the Consumer Council knows nothing. We recommend that the subgroup examine the Crystal Alliance contract and how it came to be signed off with key performance indicators without the statutory consumer voice being taken into account.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): I want to interrupt proceedings for a moment to welcome Mr Paul Girvan, who is deputising for Mr Peter Weir. Just to let you know, Paul — the subgroup is working till nine o'clock tonight.

Mr Girvan: Thank you. You have made me feel at great ease.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Take your time, Paul, to bed your way in.

Finally, before I call Mr Cree, I want to know how the equality impact assessment affected that. You have left me a bit behind. What did it reveal?

Mrs Gill: The Consumer Council does not have a copy of an equality impact assessment that was done on the bad debt management strategy. The Consumer Council has asked what the consultation and line-up will be with regard to proposals to put in place any type of debt management system; what the consultation processes will be; and what equality impact assessments will be done to it. It has received no answer. It has now been told that there will be another system. The Consumer Council does not know what that other system is. That is an unsatisfactory situation. The system must put people first. The Consumer Council is there to protect people's interests. However, it does not know what debt management system is being put in place. It does not know what the Bill looks like or what the customer complaints procedures and codes of practice are just three months before the introduction of the Go-co.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Do members' wish to find out more about the equality impact assessment? I believe that there is agreement on that.

Mr Cree: Welcome, folk. I want to thank the Consumer Council for its continuing hard work. It has been helpful. It is fair to say that the Department has been less than forthright throughout the whole exercise.

I have three questions. The first arises from your last point about the debt recovery system. How does the Consumer Council characterise the proposed debt recovery system? How do you refer to it?

Mrs Gill: Do you mean the current system?

Mr Cree: I mean the proposed system.

Mrs Gill: The Consumer Council understands that if there is a bill to be paid, it should be paid. There is a duty on the company, whether it is Government-owned or not, to recover that money because revenue is required to keep the company going. That is moving into the area of best practice: how, in a sensitive and proper way, to collect debt or identify those who are in difficulty and need help. We want to get back to the first-base principles of debt recovery with the new Go-co before it starts its work.

2.00 pm

In relation to the information that we have seen to date and what was presented to us in August, the subgroup can have access to the emails that we have sent to the Water Service since then. In them we pleaded with the Water Service to say when it would consult on the debt management system so that our views could be taken into account. On 27 September 2006, that culminated in our being advised that there were no plans to change the proposed system at that point.

We understand from what the chief executive has since said publicly that that system is now off the table. However, we are unsure what system is now on the table and what consultation will take place with us before any further amendments are made.

Mr Costello: The Water Service said that that system was never on the table — it was.

Mrs Gill: The proposed system was odious. Even if the system came from the database of a private-sector organisation, Experian, it should not be the basis on which to proceed. Rather than help people to manage their household bills, it targets and labels them.

Mr Cree: You have been helpful in identifying a possible way ahead. To what extent do the Consumer Council's proposals ensure that the water company's infrastructure costs are what it requires and that it would get the necessary investment? Do you see any difficulty with that?

Mrs Gill: Yes. When we examined the independent analysis of the second iteration of the business plan, it became clear that there was a lack of clarity in the capital work programme. Since then, we have not seen any further scenarios or iterations of the business plan. Therefore we cannot comment on whether the issues that were identified in September have been addressed in the short period since to give the Consumer Council any confidence that the anticipated capital work programme is not gold-plated but realistic and achievable.

We must be careful because, in a self-financing system, an underestimate or overestimate of the capital investment programme will have implications for the price. The excuse that has been given for our not seeing the full business plan is that it is commercial in confidence. We ask the subgroup to recommend that that excuse be removed. It is the public's business plan, and we need to see it. Nothing should be identified as commercial in confidence — certainly not to either the Consumer Council or the regulator. On behalf of consumers, we should be able to see the complete business plan in order to be assured that the issues that we have identified have been addressed. Today, under privilege, we offer to provide the subgroup with a copy of the analysis of the September 2006 business plan that we received. The analysis shows that, contrary to what the Minister said about our being scaremongers, real risks have been identified. Those risks must be addressed.

Mr Costello: The return on the dividend being set at 5.8% also determines the cost of borrowing, which is above commercial rates. It is higher than any other water consumer in the UK would have to pay and, therefore, automatically builds cost into the system, which makes the situation more difficult.

Mrs Gill: The cost of capital in the Scottish public service-owned model is only 4.1%. We are paying 5.8%.

Mr Costello: Lord Rooker said that the figure of 5.8% would be reviewed as part of a side-deal on Monday, I think. We must ensure that it is.

Mr Cree: I am sure that everyone agrees that fairness for consumers is vital. What impact would your proposals have on the water bill for the average Northern Ireland family that is in the band just above the poverty threshold?

Mrs Gill: There are a couple of problems about what is a fair price. At present, there is an artificial price that is pegged to the UK average. We do not know, as we would were it a gas or electricity price, whether that is cost-reflective. It could be too high or too low. We simply do not know because we have been unable to see the business plan to find out whether the point at which the Go-co will break even has been calculated, at which stage the costs will begin to decrease.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): May I interrupt for a moment? We are most grateful that you are prepared to talk to us in extensive detail, but parliamentary privilege does not extend to you. Indeed, it does not fully extend to us. I am not cautioning you, but just pointing out that it may be prudent to be a little careful with some of your replies. You have not strayed too far.

Mr Costello: The power of truth.

Mrs Gill: We are quite comfortable that the information that we have outlined is in the public domain. We take full responsibility for what we say.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): While you are here, I am totally responsible for you, but not for what you say.

Mrs Gill: Thank you. We do not know whether the price is cost-reflective. We must get to a point where that break-even point will be reached. We are concerned that that will not occur in 2010. Aspirations or hopes that that will be the case are not good enough when one is carrying the risk.

We believe that, within the cost, there are unfair elements that need to be stripped out. I have talked about the cost of underinvestment, which perhaps could form part of the recommendations for a financial deal so that the infrastructure costs of the past are not picked up, as well as those of the future.

Mr Cree: Is that the £1.4 billion?

Mrs Gill: Yes.

As for the affordability tariff, the Coalition Against Water Charges is quite right. The affordability tariff does not reach everyone and does not help everyone, but it is a lot better than it was. We were presented with a 25% discount on the price. That is a guarantee that those who are in particular circumstances will not pay more than 3% of their income.

We pushed in the legislation for a provision to allow the Assembly to look at that scheme in the future and extend it — if there is the money — to other groups who may need help. Time and again, the near-benefits group is excluded. There are other elements that we have identified that could be taken out of water bills. Why, for example, are consumers paying for road drainage via their water bills? Our concern is that even if that were removed, it would not result in lower bills, but would be used to pay off some more of the subsidies. Savings never actually come back to the people.

Mr Cree: Did that not happen with the new developers?

Mrs Gill: It did.

Mr Costello: That is the system because the price is not associated with cost; the price is just set by an artificial mechanism based on the price in England and Wales. Therefore, the inefficiencies are at one level, the price is at another level, and the job is to try and squash them both down.

We believe that until the point at which the Go-co breaks even and the efficiencies are at the appropriate level, there should be price capping in the system. If that means that capping must continue until 2015, so be it. That is the only way to ensure that the customer gets fairness in this model.

Mrs Gill: Another matter that concerned us this morning was the repeated assertion that we may need to continue to give pegging subsidies to the company, which is just feeding an inefficient model. If it is known that the model is inefficient, we need to know that now so that if that break-even point is perhaps eight years from now, we know that what we are signing up to is shovelling ever more money into a model that we know is unstable.

The answer that we have received to date is that this is still work in progress. We implore the subgroup, when you speak to DRD and the Water Service today, to ignore the work in progress and ask, “What do you know today — three months from the establishment of this Go-co? From your calculations today, can you tell us when the break-even point will be reached?”

If that is in three years, we will be happy, and I will go home for Christmas and forget about much of this. Our concern in the meantime is that other taxpayers’ money will be brought in to what is supposed to be a self-financing system to help the Go-co to remain stable so that the business turns over — or that the land is actually disposed of.

One of the exemptions within the licence that is out for consultation at the moment is that the regulator need not even be told about the land disposal. As I understand it, although I have not examined this matter in great detail, there are certain exemptions in the land disposal measures. The Go-co can dispose of land if, for example, its asset value is £1 million or less, or a greater amount, if DRD is satisfied.

A second provision is that the Go-co can dispose of land if DRD gives authorisation under legislation, and a third is when the Go-co has already made an obligation to dispose of land before the transfer date of 1 April 2007. I would like to know whether the Go-co has already sought or been given approval to dispose of land ahead of that date. If so, what is that land, and how much is it worth? This is the family silver, and we may be going to lose the assets.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Because of the lack of consultation, you are throwing questions in our direction at the same time as we are throwing questions in your direction. We intend to put these questions to the next set of witnesses, but I suspect that they have been put before and ended up at the same roadblocks.

There is talk of efficiencies. However, there is concern that we would be giving the OK to start up a business that would be inefficient. No bank manager would be receptive to that kind of business plan. I am concerned that the general consensus would view this as inefficiency. How, through time, do you think that that will be reflected on charges?

Mr Costello: The regulator said last week on the radio, and again this morning, that there are gross inefficiencies — between 20 and 50 per cent. We know that the Minister has set efficiency targets, but we believe that they will not be met. The only way that the regulator sees that he can sort this out is by putting the price up or by putting it into longer-term debt, where you put the price up but not by so much, because you are borrowing to pay for the inefficiencies. Neither of those scenarios is fair for the customer. Essentially, we would be making the customer pay for an inefficient business from day one. The Government should be responsible for sorting out the efficiency of the business before the consumer starts paying.

Mrs Gill: If we were a private enterprise wishing to buy this service then there would be proper due diligence given to us. The books would be opened and there would be no talk of “commercial-in-confidence” or not being able to see the full business plan. We would see it all to make sure that what we were buying had a fair chance of working. We used this analogy during the week: we have been asked to buy a car and our mechanic is not allowed to look at it before we take it out. We do not know how roadworthy it is. It is unacceptable that consumers should have to take this on in such a blind way. When the Assembly is restored, as I hope it will, this will become your problem and these your questions.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): This is real politics and real action: we are sitting here as consumers. It is one of those situations where we can say, “Hang on a second, that is going to happen to me”.

Mrs Gill: It may appear that we are asking more questions than we have answers for —

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): It makes a pleasant change.

Mrs Gill: There are five or six fundamental areas that we feel the Assembly needs to concentrate on. A three-year period to 2010 would allow the Assembly to take ownership and get a better model and a better outcome than we have at the moment. We would be more than happy to work through any of those issues with you. We do not want to come across as having nothing but issues; we have solutions to offer along with everyone else.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): I appreciate that.

Ms Stanton: I want to ask Mrs Gill for a copy of the strategic business plan that was commissioned. We were told that it would be delivered.

Mr Costello: The independent review of it?

Mrs Gill: It would not be the strategic business plan because, that is “commercial-in-confidence” to the Water Service. You could ask the Water Service for it.

Ms Stanton: We have made mistakes in the past. It would be madness to do exactly the same thing again and have the consumer paying through the nose. I have listened to your contribution, and it seems that the same mistakes are happening all over again.

Mrs Gill: There are five questions. Is capital value the best premise upon which to charge for water; is the financial agreement between the Secretary of State and the Treasury the fairest deal; is the Go-co the fairest model; is self-financing the fairest system; and is the average of England and Wales the fairest charge? The Assembly should ask those questions. It should conduct reviews and commission views on those questions, so that answers can be found. People would then have the confidence to say that paying is painful but it has to be done, and this is the way that we will do it.

Ms Stanton: Is it correct to say that if the water legislation goes ahead in its current form, it will severely hamper an incoming Assembly financially?

2.15 pm

Mrs Gill: The legislation sets a premise upon which the other instruments will sit. The Consumer Council was concerned that it was being asked to sign off legislation without having first seen the business plan, the governance letter, the licence, and so forth. Why bother sending the licence out for consultation three weeks before the Go-co begins on 1 January unless there is a chance that comments will be listened to and recommended changes will be acknowledged?

The events that took place during the judicial review made us ask whether there was any point in asking for such a review, because the Minister was correct in what he said: the judge did not see any problem with the consultation up until it closed. The most important issue following consultation is how people’s comments are considered. We need to make sure that that is taken into account and not dressed up as a technical point of procedure.

We must also be assured that when looking at the whole picture, we can return to the five questions that I mentioned earlier about ensuring that we are receiving the fairest deal possible. The Consumer Council will not be found wanting in its support for the Assembly, the Department and the regulator once the decisions are openly and properly made. At that stage, we will be content to tell consumers — as we have done regarding gas and electricity — that the water charges may be expensive, but they are fair, cost-reflective and reasonable and, therefore, must be paid.

Mr Girvan: I apologise for arriving in the middle, or probably near the end, of the proceedings. I thank the Consumer Council for its work, and I do not think that it is out of order to do so. It raised many questions to which members will seek answers. I do not know whether we will receive them; we can but try.

In other parts of the United Kingdom billions of pounds were invested in the water services before their privatisation, but that has not happened in Northern Ireland; we did not have that benefit. As someone said earlier, we will be taking over with a millstone around our necks. That shortfall must be addressed, and proper clarification should be given on what mechanism will be put in place to redress that shortfall.

Ultimately, there will be a shortfall, and the charges have caused me major concern. The first-year charges may be achievable for most people, but I am concerned that the charges in the third year will be a major problem and that people will have to make a judgment call on whether to pay a water bill or put food on the table.

We need to make serious judgments, because the proper methodology was not used in completing the table. Water charges per household should not have been based on the property value.

The Consumer Council’s presentation provided guidelines on what questions political representatives should be asking. Chairman, what mechanism will the subgroup be given in order to deal with those questions? Will they be dealt with solely in the Assembly or could the subgroup make some input before that? It would be difficult to make changes in March when the bills start hitting people’s tables.

What mechanisms are in place to deal with those questions? Does the subgroup have any place in the overall plan and can we make an input? Are we merely taking part in a window-dressing exercise that will achieve nothing due to the mechanisms? We must also consider that we are dealing with a Secretary of State who will not listen to what we say.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Mr Girvan, I have to interrupt you. I have been waiting a long time for a question, and in the last thirty seconds you have actually asked me questions. [Laughter.]

Mr Girvan: I am looking for guidance.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): I appreciate that. I also appreciate that our role is an issue foremost in everybody’s mind. I intend to address that question and have it recorded at the end of this session, because it is your subgroup. I am only here to service it and to serve you.

Mr Girvan: Thank you.

Ms Ritchie: The Department for Regional Development has a general oversight role; DOE and the EHS are environmental regulators and overseers of private water matters; and DCAL and DARD also have oversight roles, as has the regulator and the Consumer Council.

Are you satisfied that the roles of all those bodies are clear, adequate and well defined? Are workable provisions in place to facilitate co-ordination? If not, what can an Assembly and incoming Executive do to ensure better co-ordination?

Mrs Gill: It is an extremely complex piece of legislation, and I do not envy the officials' task in drafting it. It ran to some 300 pages and is potentially based on matters that have been ill defined or ill thought out as regards the self-financing premises and the financial deals that underpin the legislation. It is an unenviable task.

We are very much of the view that those issues were not fully thought through in respect of not only our role, but the roles of others in relation to the Consumer Council and vice versa. For example, given that the company will be Government-owned, we felt that a duty should have been enshrined in the primary legislation for the water company to consult with the Consumer Council on all matters relating to consumers.

We now have the opportunity to strengthen the licence to ensure that the water company absolutely must consult with the Consumer Council on all matters impacting on consumers. The Programme for Government Committee may also have that opportunity, and we are happy to give direction on that.

There is a similar opportunity in respect of relationships with the regulators to ensure that we will have the proper relationships to aid information sharing, not only with the economic regulator but the environmental regulator. As it stands, the legislation does not place a duty on the environmental regulator to consult us. Again, there are certain areas where protocols can be put in place to make sure that all partners give proper consideration to what we are trying to achieve. The sad thing is that we could really get it right, if we addressed the issue correctly.

For example, the energy regulator and the Consumer Council as the consumer representative in energy work very well together. We have wonderful relationships and memorandums of understanding, and clear and progressive legislation is in place that allows everybody to understand each other's roles and not overstep those roles. In this instance, however, we are left trying to make something work that we feel is imperfect in its formation.

We have accepted the fact that the legislation is progressing through Parliament. However, we could still strengthen the licence to make sure those fundamental issues are in place. Everything is not past the post, and we could certainly do more. After its three-year project of answering all those questions, the Assembly may decide to make certain amendments to the legislation in order to strengthen the various roles. However, rather than doing that quickly, the Assembly will probably need time to consider what is a very complex issue.

I reiterate that it has not been easy for anyone. The rush to get things done and to get things right has taken a heavy toll on everybody in the system.

Ms Ritchie: Thank you, Chairman.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): You are very welcome. Are you any warmer yet?

Ms Ritchie: I am much warmer; thank you.

Mrs Gill: I am roasting.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): I was concerned about you, so I am glad to hear that.

Ms Ritchie: I began to get worried when I saw that Eleanor was wearing short sleeves.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): We shall take questions, with quick answers, from Mr Shannon and Mr McCartney. I ask members to be accommodating in respect of the time available.

Mr Shannon: It was suggested this morning that a high, fixed standing charge does encourage efficiency. Is it your opinion that the same answer applies to charges based on the capital value of property?

Mrs Gill: In Northern Ireland, we led the way in removing standard charges from electricity bills and moving to a tariff-meter charge. We have the opportunity to do the same in respect of water charges to ensure that charges are realistic and that a payment system can be established. That is why I suggested that the Consumer Council facilitate a symposium to examine all those issues to determine the most progressive system that will also reflect the need for usage.

If meter tariffs that properly reflect water usage are installed, it is true that that will involve a huge infrastructural cost. However, that is the same for all utilities. We need to consider models used elsewhere, which we have already done.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Have you ever heard of a slow foxtrot?

Mrs Gill: Strictly come dancing. [Laughter.]

Mr Raymond McCartney: I have a point of information. The subgroup heard from Goretti Horgan from the Anti-Poverty Network about the fact that more people are falling below the poverty line. Do you have any assessment of that in real terms, as opposed to the general terms of rising numbers? You could perhaps give us any information that you have on that.

Mrs Gill: We have research papers on business models on poverty and metering. We will send them all to the subgroup.

Mr Cree: I asked this question of the witnesses that appeared before the subgroup this morning, and I am interested in your response to the same question. Will the regulatory framework remove all risks to consumers or are those risks merely being stored up until 2010?

Mrs Gill: We do not know; we have not been given access to the strategic business plan and the governance letter. If openness and scrutiny existed, we would be happy to be told that we were scaremongers, as opposed to people who identified real risks.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Thank you very much for coming.

Mr Girvan: Mr Chairman, we should commend the Consumer Council for the work that it has done and for what it is doing on this particular challenge.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Steady on; we have done that now.

Mrs Gill: We posed questions in our presentation that we would like to pass over to you, Mr Chairman, so that you can ask them on our behalf as well.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): I think that we can receive those.

The subgroup thanks you for your efforts, and that thanks applies to anyone who appears before a subgroup. Your contribution is valuable to us because your brief — consumer care — is similar to that of elected representatives. Our brief is care for the electorate and the voter, but those groups comprise the same people.

I wish you a good Christmas, and I hope that we will see you some time in the new year. Thank you.

The evidence session was suspended at 2.26 pm.

On resuming —

2.38 pm

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Members, the submission received from the Department for Regional Development is at tab 13 of your pack.

Ladies and gentlemen, you are most welcome. Please turn your nameplates around, so that we can identify you.

I invite you to give a brief introduction, and to outline the portfolio you hold at present. Are you leading the delegation, David? Please introduce yourself and your colleagues.

Mr David Sterling (Department for Regional Development): I am Deputy Secretary in the Department for Regional Development (DRD) and I have overall responsibility for the development of the water reform programme within the Department. I am accompanied by Katharine Bryan, who is the chief executive of the Water Service, and Nigel McCormick, one of the two directors in the water reform unit in DRD.

I do not plan to make any opening statement. I understand that the subgroup wants the maximum amount of time to ask questions, and I am happy for you to begin without further ado.

Mr Cree: It is good to see you. To set the scene, will you explain what DRD means by its use of the term “self-financing”? Will Northern Ireland Water Ltd (NIWL) break even by 2010?

Mr Sterling: A self-financing company is one that recovers its costs, and the NIWL’s costs will be paid for through its customers’ tariffs. I assume that by “break even” you mean whether or not the company will operate at a loss. It is our plan that the company will begin on a cost-neutral basis and continue as such.

Mr Cree: Does that mean that the company will be self-sufficient by 2010?

Mr Sterling: That is the Government’s intention. To avoid confusion, I remind members that the company will break even in the first three years so long as the Government subsidises it during that time.

Mr Cree: Will you describe the subsidy?

Mr Sterling: There will be three forms of subsidy during the first three years. As the subgroup will be aware, the Government are phasing in the new tariffs for domestic customers and non-domestic customers whereby they will pay one third in the first year, two thirds in the second year and the full amount in the third year. To ease the transition and reduce the burden on people in Northern Ireland, the Government have also agreed that they will peg the domestic tariffs, during the first three years, to the English and Welsh averages projected for 2009-10.

The Government have a third policy in place to provide protection to those on low incomes. It is a capped tariff and is sometimes referred to as the affordability or reduced tariff.

There will be three forms of subsidy to address those issues: one to cover the cost of the affordability tariff; one to cover the cost of phasing in the charges; and one to cover the cost of pegging the tariffs to the English and Welsh averages. However, it is the Government's intention that there will be no need for subsidies beyond 2009-10.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): During the process that led to Northern Ireland Water Limited being set up as a Go-co, did the Department consider any other models? How did you arrive at Go-co as the preferred option?

Mr Sterling: The Government followed two processes. In spring 2003, the Government launched a consultation to identify options for a variety of aspects of what is now known as the water reform programme. One important issue on which the people of Northern Ireland were asked for their views was the future business model for the company. Five options were put forward in a continuum, with privatisation at one end, followed by a not-for-dividend model, a public-private partnership, a Go-co or a statutory corporation.

The responses to that consultation made it clear that the people of Northern Ireland and the political parties — a wide range of interests — were opposed to privatisation. In October 2003, John Spellar MP, the Minister responsible at that time, announced that privatisation was being ruled out for the foreseeable future. He also said that they would rule out the not-for-dividend model as well and that there would be further analysis of the Go-co/statutory corporation model. A decision was taken later, and it was announced that the Government's preference would be for the Government-owned company.

2.45 pm

In 2005, the Government decided to conduct further analysis of their options, and they began what is now known as a strategic financial review. A consortium led by the Union Bank of Switzerland (UBS) Investment Bank conducted that review, and it re-examined a range of options. Its brief, in a sense, was to identify the most appropriate model for Northern Ireland and to examine the implications of the different models with regard to their ability to deliver high quality, efficient services.

The consortium's report looked at a variety of options, including a statutory corporation; a Government-owned company; privatisation; and a mutualised model. The Government-owned company model was subjected to detailed examination. The consortium did not look in detail at the privatisation model or at the mutualised not-for-profit model. The consortium's report produced evidence to suggest that the greater the private-sector involvement in water and sewerage companies, the greater the likelihood of higher levels of efficiency. The Government published their response to the consortium's report in February 2006 and announced that they were proceeding with the Government-owned company model.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Now that the Go-co has been established, is it fair to even dare to think that privatisation is inevitable?

Mr Sterling: No. I do not believe that it is inevitable. I would point to the Secretary of State's statement that it was not likely in the foreseeable future — I think those were his exact words. NIO Minister David Cairns has said that he thinks it unthinkable that it could occur in the next five years. It is worth recognising that the current Labour Administration's term of office will end in three year's time. If there is no devolution at that stage, it will be open to whatever Government come in to do what they see fit. Indeed, you will recognise that there is nothing that could be done legislatively now to prevent a future Government doing something different in the future. Nevertheless, I am clear where I am. I am acting under clear ministerial instructions that privatisation is not on the agenda. It is not being looked at.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): If it was not fair to suggest that, would it be unfair to suggest that implicit in your answer of "No" is a case built on the fact that the operation is highly inefficient and, therefore, of no interest to the commercial world?

Mr Sterling: The simple answer is that the commercial world will put a price on something, depending on what it regards it as being worth. There are no plans to privatise, but I will say that the Government have set up the Government-owned company on the basis that it could evolve in the future, subject to whatever future Ministers might decide in a variety of ways.

The Government's clear intention was not to lock us into a model that would not be capable of evolution. I know and have heard local discussions about what might be desirable in the future. One of the reasons we went for the Government-owned company solution was that it was capable of evolution in different ways.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): I am sure that we will return to the question of inefficiency. It has been a major issue in the evidence that we have heard.

I must ask about the strong representations that we have had from the unions. They are concerned about employment. Their concerns were, of course, addressed to you. Are you able to allay the fears of the unions about job losses?

Ms Katharine Bryan (Water Service): It is clear to unions, staff and stakeholders that to raise the Water Service to the level of performance and efficiency of other water undertakings and companies in the rest of the UK, we must lose substantial numbers of staff. That is the path that has been taken in England, Wales and Scotland.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): May I interrupt?

Ms Bryan: Yes.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): The suggestion is that jobs may be lost by the Water Service either through efficiencies in the service or as a result of the employment of private contractors. Could you put the two together for us?

Ms Bryan: Thank you for the clarification. As chief executive I have no fixed agenda on whether to in-source or outsource services. We must do what is best for the business in cost and risk terms. As David Sterling explained earlier, the company could potentially be of interest to a commercial operator in the future; however, an inefficient one would come at high risk and therefore at high price.

To return to your question, I want to increase the efficiency and performance of the organisation over the next three years, delivering to the customer good and improving standards of service while protecting the environment. At the same time, we need to meet appropriately stringent efficiency targets, both on our operating costs and on our capital costs. Losing numbers of staff will be one way in which the Water Service will become more efficient. However, an important part of that — for me as the leader of the organisation, for the trades unions and for the staff — is the way in which people depart from the organisation. I hope that, as of April 2007, we will have a means of voluntary severance that will enable people to depart from the organisation with dignity.

I turn now to the balance between contracted services and in-house services. At the moment about 25% of our services are contracted out. This is not a new issue for the Water Service. We expect that by 2010 that may have grown to about 40%. However, our PPP packages, Alpha and Omega, will come online between now and then, and these will outsource, for the contract term, some waste water and water treatment works.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Within the package that you are heading towards, if I may put it that way, how might a devolved Executive work with you on prioritising between standard-type employees and private contractors as regards efficiencies?

Ms Bryan: I am sorry; I honestly do not know how to answer that question.

Mr Sterling: Could I pick up that? The intention behind setting up a Government company is to allow the utility greater commercial freedom than it would have in the Northern Ireland Civil Service.

The idea is that a company has a greater chance of being efficient if it is set up outside Government. That is based on a considerable volume of evidence. The intention behind setting up the Government company is that it should be given a clear remit as to what it is required to deliver in terms of quality of service, the tariffs which it is allowed to collect and the capital investment which it is permitted to deliver. However, once that is all established within the framework set by the Department and the regulator etc, the company should be left to judge how best it should deliver its business. Therefore, decisions about whether to in-source or outsource should be left to the company.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): That is clear. Thank you.

Mr Raymond McCartney: Thank you for coming.

First, was the non-profit company given any consideration, and why was it the view of the Department that the Go-co was the better model?

Secondly, it has been suggested that on Monday in the House of Lords, Lord Glentoran was given some sort of assurance in relation to the position going into the House of Lords. I would like you to comment on that, if the information can be shared.

Thirdly, Lord Glentoran is on record as saying that in 2010, the £50 million affordability tariff would be paid by central Government. That would not be self-financing; that would amount to consumers paying for it themselves.

Mr Sterling: I will go in reverse order. The affordability tariff, which was announced by Shaun Woodward on 8 December 2005 when he was Minister for Regional Development, was to be reviewed in 2009 after three years of operation. I know there has been concern about this issue, so I will attempt to clarify the points. There is nothing in the legislation, which has now gone through both Houses of Parliament, to prevent the tariff being paid beyond 2009-10. During those first three years it would be paid for out of Northern Ireland public expenditure. Our current estimate is that by 2009-10 it is likely to cost in the region of £40 million, which will come out of Northern Ireland's budget. It is a policy that Ministers have said they are proud of. However, they would not wish to commit a future Administration to the payment of the tariff beyond 2009-10, although of course it would be open to whatever ministerial team is in place at that time to decide whether to continue it.

The review is necessary in any event, because while Ministers are proud of the intention of this tariff and the protection it will give, it has been constructed in the absence of really good knowledge about the customers it is seeking to protect. In Northern Ireland, we do not have reliable information about the circumstances of people on low incomes and the properties that they live in. The available data is not good enough to tell us the incomes of people in low-value properties. In 2009, when we will have much better information than this, it will be important that we look at whether the protections are really working and whether the people who need them most are getting them.

On the Lord Glentoran point, you may have seen the Hansard report of that debate. Within that, Lord Glentoran referred to a letter he had received from the Department last Friday. I will ensure that the Committee receives a copy of that letter. Other than that, the discussion is detailed in the Hansard report.

3.00 pm

Mr Raymond McCartney: There was the issue of non-profit companies.

Mr Sterling: That option was considered. There are a number of ways that one could have a non-profit company: it could be a mutual company — a bit like a building society — or a not-for-dividend company such as Welsh Water.

The Government felt that there were attractions in the option, although there was no consensus about it in the consultations. The trades unions were quite strongly against the Welsh Water model — I hope I am not misrepresenting them — on the basis that they saw it as just another form of privatisation. Welsh Water employs about 100 people and relies heavily on outsourcing.

There was no consensus on the not-for-profit model. The Go-co model that we have adopted would be capable of evolving into a company limited by guarantee, or into a mutual-type company, if that was what Ministers wanted to do at a later date.

Ms Ritchie: Thank you, Mr Chairman. I welcome Mr Sterling and his team. I wish to ask a three-part question. The first part concerns the affordability tariff. Article 213 of the draft The Water and Sewerage Services (Northern Ireland) Order 2006 provides the legislative basis for the Government to make grants to pay for the affordability tariff. A few moments ago Mr Sterling said that the legislation places no constraint on the durability of the tariff and that the Government are giving a commitment to review it in three years. Surely, that review would be subject to public expenditure constraints and, therefore, would be meaningless. Would you agree with that statement?

Secondly, in relation to privatisation, could the Treasury pressurise the Department to look at privatisation, as was noted in the email from Mr Taylor, which was shown as part of discovery of documents in the judicial review?

Thirdly, and this is a question for Ms Bryan, could she give us a guarantee that Water Service and Crystal Alliance have withdrawn the Experian database, which labels people as rock bottom? Can she guarantee that location does not, and will not, play a part in debt management and recovery? Those are important questions that require answers, and we have to address those issues if there is going to be a future here.

Mr Sterling: I will answer the question on the affordability tariff. As I said to Mr McCartney, it is expected that the affordability tariff will cost in the region of £40 million of Northern Ireland public expenditure in 2009. As with all things, Ministers will have to make choices, and I am assuming that we are speaking in the context of a devolved administration here. It would be open to devolved Ministers at that stage to do what they thought was best given the consequences for public expenditure. By that stage, the affordability tariff will be in the baselines of the Northern Ireland Budget, and, in that sense, will be entrenched.

However, if we are under direct rule at that point, the situation might be slightly different because the affordability tariff is unique to Northern Ireland. Direct rule Ministers would need to take account of the implications that extending the tariff here would have for other parts of the UK. I do not want to leave the subgroup with the impression that that would not be an issue.

As to whether the Treasury could pressurise for privatisation, I am not sure how the Treasury could apply such pressure. I am not aware of any legislation that the Treasury could enforce to make Northern Ireland privatise the company. I cannot see how they might do so, other than by applying political pressure, but I have no reason to believe that they would do that.

The straight answer is that I am not aware of any means that they could use to force Northern Ireland to privatise if it did not wish to do so.

Ms Ritchie: Does that mean that the review that was suggested for 2008 has now been ruled out?

Mr Sterling: No. When the strategic and financial review was published in February 2006, it was announced that there would be a review in 2008 to identify whether greater private sector participation in the company would be beneficial. Even if you disagree with the strategic and financial review's recommendations, it produced evidence to show that the greater the private sector participation in a utility, the greater the chance of that company operating efficiently and effectively. It would actually be remiss of the Government to set that type of evidence aside. Therefore some value will be gained from having that review, and as things stand, I expect that it will take place. If, as we all hope, devolution returns next year, I question whether the devolved Administration would be required to hold the review.

Ms Bryan: I assure you categorically that the Experian term to which you referred has not and will not be used by the Water Service or Northern Ireland water in the future. It is a term, indeed, that Experian itself dropped a year or two after it was used in 2003.

Similar to any other responsible utility, Northern Ireland water will have to have debt management processes. For that, it will need databases and credit management tools that will enable it to protect the interests of those business and domestic customers who pay responsibly. Therefore we will probably continue to use Experian — and a range of other databases — because it provides information to all utilities, to many businesses and to public sector bodies.

Turning to the second part of your question, location is absolutely irrelevant. We are interested in building up a history of payment in the domestic and non-domestic customer base in Northern Ireland. However, we have not yet formulated our debt management policy; we are still doing that. We hope to involve the Consumer Council for Northern Ireland (CCNI) and other customer representatives before we finalise it. That policy will then be educated by the picture of debt that will build up over the first year or two of billing.

Ms Ritchie: Will you assure the subgroup that the consultation exercise that will be carried out with the Consumer Council will be full and adequate? Will you also assure the subgroup that the regulator will be involved? We have heard evidence today from the regulator, and we are not satisfied that his role is robust enough. Do the Water Service and the Department have any comment on that?

Ms Bryan: It is the Water Service's stated aim, and, hopefully our practice, to involve a number of stakeholders in many areas of our work. This matter is of interest to everybody at the moment, and we continue to work with CCNI in particular on a range of aspects of billing and debt management. Therefore I hope that we will continue that discussion with the Consumer Council over the next few weeks.

I do not know whether David has any comments to make on your other question or about the Department.

Ms Ritchie: I asked about the role of the regulator.

Mr Sterling: I am sorry; I was unable to listen to all of what was said earlier. I have had some feedback, but I am not quite sure in what respect you are saying that the authority will not have sufficiently robust powers.

Ms Ritchie: We got the distinct impression today that the role of the regulator will be not as robust as it should be. I think the evidence is there to show that.

There are various areas. The regulator will not be able to undertake his water powers until 1 April 2007. The preparation of guaranteed standards cannot begin until then, and that will delay the coming into force of those standards probably until January 2008. Although the Department has agreed funding arrangements, insufficient staff are allocated to the regulator to enable him to do his work. What will be done in that respect to ensure that he has the resources and the commitment from the Department to carry out his work in a fair and balanced manner?

Mr Sterling: Unfortunately it is not practicable to have the regulator established before 1 April 2007, much as we would like to do so. The timetable does not permit us to do that. However, it is the clear intention — and Lord Rooker made this clear in the House of Lords — that where there are powers of enforcement or general authorisations to be given to the regulator, these will be given from day one, or as close as possible to day one. Do not take from that that I am talking about a delay; there might be a few days in some cases, but the intention is to give the regulator general authorisations, where possible, from day one.

Indeed, where there is a choice to be made between whether a general authorisation lies with the Department or with the regulator, we will be giving the general authorisation to the regulator. This is a point that is explained in the letter that was sent from the Department to Lord Glentoran. I will let the Committee have a copy of that, and I hope that it will provide some assurances in that regard.

The resourcing of the authority is a matter, at this stage, primarily for the Department of Finance and Personnel. I am happy to take that point back to that Department and, indeed, to take any representations from the authority as well.

Ms Ritchie: Thank you.

Mr Raymond McCartney: Will an equality impact assessment be carried out in relation to debt recovery management?

Ms Bryan: I understand that an equality impact assessment was done for water reform as a whole and, within that, for charging. I was not aware that we needed to do an equality impact assessment on sub-sectors of charging, and I do not know that one has been delivered.

Mr Raymond McCartney: In the Crystal Alliance documents there seems to be a two-tier system. Irrespective of the terminology — and we accept that people may now have removed some of the terms like “high risk”, “rock bottom”, “low risk” and “affluent” — there seems to be a two-tier system of pursuing people who are in debt, and that does not meet the standard of equality.

Ms Bryan: Thank you for giving me the opportunity to clarify this very important issue. Obviously, many of us are aware of the media attention on this point. Let me state categorically there will be no two-tier approach to debt management. We will be doing our best to build up a clear picture of debt as it occurs in Northern Ireland. Our aim will be to get to people supportively as soon as we can, knowing that a number of people will have difficulties. Processes, procedures and strategy will follow only when we have a much better set of data to build up a good, sustainable and fair policy.

3.15 pm

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): I am pleased that the room is getting warmer; some members were complaining that they were cold. The session is probably heading in the direction that we want.

As part of the subgroup's remit, we must shortly present a report, including detailed action points and recommendations, to the Committee on the Programme for Government. There is nothing personal in any of our questions; their aim is to extract something that perhaps others have failed to. If we do better, we will be very pleased.

Our ultimate aim is to be in some form of government in Northern Ireland; we will then be more accountable than your present masters. That would let you off the hook. We want to be in good government, and we want to address the concerns of the consumer. The consumers are our electorate, and we must listen to them. Many of the comments and questions will be based on the perspective of a concerned electorate who are also consumers.

I was concerned by Mr Sterling's earlier comment that there should be much better joined-up government between his colleagues in the Department of Finance and Personnel and the Department for Regional Development. Last week, Mr Sterling appeared before the subgroup on the economy, which I also attended. According to the Hansard report, a DFP official said:

"Our interpretation is that the Treasury has accepted the phasing as currently structured. Treasury officials would see anything beyond that as a step backwards, away from the current agreement to move to self-financing status within a defined period."

Bearing in mind what you said in evidence 15 minutes ago, are you both on the same wavelength on that issue?

Mr Sterling: Yes. I was talking to Ms Ritchie about the affordability tariff; the quotation from Hansard refers to the phasing-in of tariffs. At present, a three-year phasing-in period has been agreed, with consumers paying one third of their water bills in the first year, two thirds in the second, and the full total in the third year. I do not consider there to be any difference between what I said about the affordability tariff and what my DFP colleague said about the phasing-in of tariffs.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Therefore there is no difference between DRD and DFP on the tariff issue.

Mr Sterling: No. The Departments work closely together. I said that I would raise the issue of OFREG funding with DFP to make sure that we, in central government, ensure that the part of central government responsible knows about the issue.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): I want to take that point into another area. At its meeting with DFP officials last week, the subgroup tried to establish whether responsibility for water services is a devolved matter. It would be useful for this subgroup to have some awareness of that query as well. Do you recall that conversation? Bearing in mind the quotation from Hansard that I read a moment ago, the same colleague said that:

"If an Executive were to lower the valuation from £1 billion to, say, £500 million, the loss of £500 million would be a hit against the resources available to the Executive."

He went on to say that:

"The Executive could decide on a lower valuation. However, the decision to reduce the valuation from £1 billion to, say, £600 million could affect resources available."

We are concerned about efficiency in that area. One concern is that you have structured something. We have heard evidence to the effect that there has been very little consultation in the weeks and months before announcements being made. No doubt, members will raise that issue with you.

We are concerned about what the inheritance of a devolved Executive would be in terms of efficiency and inefficiency. We need to be able to clarify for the PFG Committee that you are not, for want of a better phrase, sending the Executive a bum steer that is not going to work because of its inefficiencies.

It may be that the Executive will be hamstrung in working out different finances, with the same Finance Department serving different masters on a reduced scale. Can you allay fears that any interference, in terms of lowering the valuation, on the part of an Executive would seriously damage the company that is coming forward and, in turn, would then punish consumers, because resources would have to be found from charges?

Mr Sterling: I will try to address those points, although some would be better addressed to the Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP).

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): You are saying that you work closely together; you are bound to have worked this out.

Mr Sterling: Indeed. In anything that I now say where I feel that I need to add a caveat that DFP should take a position, I will do so.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): I understand.

Mr Sterling: On that point, first of all, I think the Hansard report records that DFP has agreed to write to the Committee to clarify where the boundary between reserved and transferred matters actually lies.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Your colleague from DFP said that he would need to confirm that definitively. He was not resiling from the view he was putting to the subgroup in that he felt that this was a fiscal matter and that Treasury would retain an interest, even in a devolved Government structure. That is basically what he said, but it will be interesting to see what he confirms.

Mr Sterling: My understanding is that the fiscal rules are a reserved matter and apply across the UK. To be clear on the rules affecting the Go-co —

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): But we own the water.

Mr Sterling: Indeed. In public expenditure terms the Government company will be a self-financing public corporation, and the rules governing the public expenditure treatment of self-financing public corporations are set out in the ‘Consolidated Resource Accounting and Budgeting Guidance’ — not an easy read.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): I am glad that you remembered that.

Mr Sterling: That is where those rules are set out. My understanding, subject to any clarification that DFP might wish to make, is that those rules are part of the fiscal framework within which we operate and that that is a reserved matter. However, the structure and governance of the company in Northern Ireland is a transferred matter, and the Executive and the Assembly will have discretion over that. Indeed, they will have a wide discretion to amend and develop policy as they see fit.

On the specific issue of what would happen if there was to be a write-down in the asset valuation, I think I am right in saying that it will be for the regulator in the first instance to determine — in a periodic review, or perhaps at some other stage — whether he feels that the regulatory capital value is the right value for the company. However, in such circumstances where he might decide to reduce the regulatory capital value, the amount of that reduction might be an impairment in the accounts of the Department for Regional Development. I think it would be best for DFP to clarify this issue once and for all.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): For clarification purposes, would it be in order for us to pursue the matter on that basis?

Mr Sterling: Absolutely.

Mr Nigel McCormick (Department for Regional Development): I have nothing more to add; David’s understanding is also my understanding.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Thank you for that clarification.

Mr Girvan: I thank the officials for coming to the subgroup this afternoon. Some questions could be answered if the business plan were made available to those who wish to peruse it. Much of the fear in the community has arisen due to a lack of information or, I should say, due to a lack of will to make information available. I am concerned about that. Now is the time to make the business plan public.

The present policy does not encourage people to conserve water if they do not have a meter. What will the split be between the metered amount and the standing charge on the proposed scheme? Would legislation be required if metering were made universal?

From your earlier comments, I am also concerned about the Go-co’s evolving into something different, because it could operate slightly differently from an ordinary publicly owned company. How will the Go-co be open and transparent? It is like suspending standing orders in a meeting in order to allow something to be facilitated, and I am always concerned when that happens.

Mr Sterling: I understand concerns about the apparent lack of transparency in the strategic business plan. However, the strategic business plan will be a contract between the Department, as the shareholder, and the company. The plan will contain many commercially sensitive issues, so it is not, and has never been, the Government’s intention to publish it. However, in the House of Lords on Monday, Lord Rooker said that Ministers would make an announcement early in the new year containing the key assumptions underlying the creation of tariffs. In other words, it will include some key elements in the strategic business plan.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Perhaps you would be interested if a devolved Executive had a copy of this secretive business plan.

Mr Girvan: From what I hear, I do not think that we will be.

Mr Sterling: The Minister for Regional Development — whoever that may be — will have the strategic business plan

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Will that plan have been carried forward from the present business plan?

Mr Sterling: Absolutely. The current business plan is a three-year one up to 2009-10 and beyond.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Could a scrutiny Committee of the Assembly pursue information pertaining to the business plan?

Mr Sterling: If it so chose.

Mr Girvan: By then, however, it would be too late. The business plan will have to be published before it is signed off; not publishing it would create problems. The media are having a field day because of the lack of transparency throughout the entire process. This is yet another issue that the media will pursue and, to be honest, they would be quite right to do so. Unless the plan contains an issue that is of such a commercial value that it should remain secret, there is no reason for not making the business plan available to the public.

3.30 pm

Mr Sterling: The strategic business plan, when it is concluded, will be a long and detailed document, and DRD considers that much of the detail will be inappropriate for the public domain.

Lord Rooker announced that the Water Service will publish a business plan before April 2007, which will set out the key elements of the strategic business plan before control is vested in Northern Ireland Water Limited (NIWL) on 1 April 2007. Members may not consider that to be sufficient assurance, but I hope that the statement early in the new year, which will set out the key assumptions underlining the tariffs, and the subsequent publication of a business plan — but not the full strategic business plan — should address any concerns.

Mr Girvan: Without that information, how will the regulator become involved in the process?

Mr Sterling: Before the strategic business plan is finalised, DRD intends to have further discussions with the Consumer Council and the economic and quality regulators, from the Environment and Heritage Service (EHS) and the Drinking Water Inspectorate (DWI) respectively.

Mr Girvan: Will those discussions take place before the strategic business plan is signed off?

Mr Sterling: Yes, they will take place before the plan is finalised.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Will there be room in those discussions for comments that may seek to alter the Department's plans or will the consultation be a question of either taking it or leaving it?

Mr Sterling: I would not characterise the discussions in those terms, nor would I consider them to be a full-blooded consultation.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Now that I am giving you the opportunity, do you want to characterise it?

Mr Sterling: There will be further discussions.

Mr Girvan: Are you in a position to discuss the disparity in relation to charging between the metered amount and the standing charge? Is that also privy information?

Mr Sterling: No. I am hesitant to give you the figures on how the metered tariff will be calculated. However, I am happy to write to the subgroup to explain how that works. The policy for tariffs for domestic customers has, in a sense, been determined.

Mr Girvan: Please send us that information.

Mr Sterling: We will send the information to the subgroup tomorrow.

Mr Girvan: Should there be universal metering? Would legislation be required for that to happen?

Mr Sterling: No. Mr McCormick may correct me if I am wrong, but universal metering may require an amendment to regulations but not to primary legislation that has already been passed by Parliament.

Mr Girvan: Moving on to water efficiencies policy, what is being done to encourage customers who will not have water meters to conserve water?

Mr Sterling: That is a good point. It would be good if we could wave a magic wand and install a meter in every house in Northern Ireland now, because it could give us many more options. However, to do that would cost in excess of £100 million. The Government's stated policy is to work as quickly as possible towards widespread metering. Metering may never be universal; there may always be some properties in which it is simply impossible or inappropriate to install meters. However, the aim is to have almost universal metering.

Government have listened to a variety of views on metering and taken on board the concerns of those who say that free-for-all metering could lead to unfortunate social consequences. Small middle-class families that are better off may rush to get a meter, but that would inflict a cost burden on larger low-income families. To avoid that, and yet still make steady and fast progress towards more widespread metering, the Government have decided to install meters in every new property and at all new connections from April 2007.

The Government will also offer pensioners — that is, anyone who is over 60 years old — the option of having a meter, if that suits their purposes. The Government have stated that further consultation will take place within the first two years of charging to determine how best metering should be progressed.

Indeed, Ministers have gone further and have said that it should be for devolved Ministers to develop policies that are right for the people of Northern Ireland.

Mr Girvan: I would like to ask a supplementary question.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Listen here, I know that you arrived late —

[Laughter.]

Mr Girvan: I want to make up for it, Chairman.

Is there any indication that the Water Service's current assets will be disposed of, or has permission been sought to dispose of assets before privatisation — well, it is not called privatisation —

Mr Sterling: Are you trying to trick me?

Mr Girvan: I use that term because I believe that that is what it is.

Has any mechanism been put in place to allow for the disposal of assets?

Mr Sterling: We are acutely conscious of the concerns about asset disposal. People have formed views about this issue based on what has happened in the past in Northern Ireland. In a speech in the House of Lords on Monday, Lord Rooker made it clear that the Government do not want to make the mistakes of the past and that they have learnt from what they regard as the mistakes of previous Administrations.

Lord Rooker referred to asset disposal and, to help improve confidence, he said that that the Government will exercise a power within the legislation whereby, from day one, authorisation will be given to the regulator to determine whether or not assets should be disposed of. If assets are disposed of during the first three years, the proceeds will be retained within the company at the discretion of DRD.

Beyond 2010, the position will be as it is in England and Wales whereby the proceeds of any sale of assets will be shared between the company and customers — and, again, the regulator will decide whether or not assets are to be disposed of.

Mr Girvan: Have any approvals been sought from DRD for the sale of assets before 1 April 2007?

Mr Sterling: It is important to point out that it is firm Government policy that assets that are no longer needed should be disposed of because they are an unnecessary cost to the taxpayer.

Mr Girvan: I appreciate that, but has approval been given for the sale of any assets?

Mr Sterling: Within the strategic business planning process, we are looking to identify all assets that are no longer needed for the purposes of the business. Such assets would be disposed of.

Mr Girvan: Before 1 April 2007?

Mr Sterling: Even if we had any, I do not think it would be possible to dispose of them between now and then.

Mr Girvan: Does the money go back to the Go-co or the Exchequer?

Mr Sterling: The proceeds of the disposal of any assets in the first three years will remain in the company, and, of course, any disposal will have to be approved by the regulator. It will be at the Department's discretion to determine what happens to those proceeds.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Mr Sterling, you have been very good as you have been sitting here for an hour. We could discuss this issue for quite some time, but are we all comfortable to give it another fifteen or twenty minutes? I am in everyone's hands. Mr Sterling, are you happy enough to continue a little longer?

Mr Sterling: Yes.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Are members happy enough with that, bearing in mind that that we have other business to attend to afterwards?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Before Kathy Stanton speaks, I would like to follow up on Mr Girvan's line of questioning. Is there any way that you could help the Committee on the commercially sensitive issues that you talked about?

I do not want to write to the Department only to receive a refusal to answer. I therefore ask you now whether you would respond to an inquiry from the subgroup as to the nature of these sensitivities?

Mr Sterling: I would be happy to do so.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Are Members happy with that? I think that might yield something. We are grateful, David. You have been very patient and it is all his fault so — [Laughter.]

It is all part of DUP/Sinn Féin bonding. We keep that going all the time. [Laughter.]

Ms Stanton: I would have asked about approval of land disposal in advance of the 2007 transfer date, but that has been answered.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Were you anxious about him stealing your thunder then? [Laughter.]

Ms Stanton: Oh yes, definitely.

I must also ask about equality impact assessment. What policies have been assessed? I have seen none to date. You referred earlier to water reform, but could you give the subgroup a list of exactly what policies have been so assessed?

Ms Bryan: I cannot give you a list of what has been screened out, what assessments have been carried out, or what are planned. I can only reiterate that the whole of water reform activity was assessed and certain areas, such as charging, were also assessed. It is a matter of judgement for experts in that area as to what should be equality impact assessed and what should not. I will be in communication with you.

Ms Stanton: Could we have information on those areas of water reform that you say were assessed?

Mr Sterling: We will let the subgroup know what has been impact assessed, what has not, what has been screened and what has not.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): We are grateful to you for undertaking this considerable amount of work; but we need the material within days. We have not got time to wait.

Furthermore, if the equality impact assessment material is incomplete, you might consider what aspects may have been omitted. Would you agree, Ms Stanton?

Ms Stanton: I do. Furthermore, the Northern Ireland anti-poverty strategy was launched last month, initiating what is supposed to be a co-ordinated approach across all Departments. You claim to have addressed poverty through a range of tariffs. However, we heard from the Northern Ireland Anti-Poverty Network earlier, and, as they pointed out, tariffs do not match house values. There are now no £20,000 houses in the Six Counties. So tariffs do not match the latest figures that were provided through the rules and guidelines to customers.

As I said to that delegation, we now have the working poor as well, in addition to other vulnerable groups. Water charges will hit everyone; but not everyone will have an adequate income.

Mr Sterling: I understand. May I pick up on what you have said about house values? I do not know how many £20,000 properties there are, but I know that there have been misleading comments about that in the press that had to be corrected. It is important that people understand that the values that will be used to determine water charges are the capital values which the Valuation and Lands Agency (VLA) published in the summer. Those valuations were conducted in January 2005. Reference was made earlier to the fact that the average property value in Northern Ireland is now £160,000. That may well be right for the average market value, but the average capital value in the VLA database is around £115,000. Some 420,000 properties in Northern Ireland out of the total 650,000 are valued at less than £115,000.

There is also a significant number of properties valued at below £70,000 within the VLA database. It is important that the distinction, between current market values and VLA capital values used for water charging, is understood.

Ms Stanton: Will there also be an equality impact assessment on the VLA valuation process? Will that be incorporated throughout all the policies and strategies dependent upon it?

3.45 pm

Mr Sterling: I will need to check with Department of Finance and Personnel, which is responsible for the valuation process and for the rating policy reforms. I am fairly sure that they were impact assessed. I will confirm that to the subgroup.

I have said that I will supply information to the subgroup tomorrow; but would the Committee be content if all the information promised is provided by Friday 15 December? We have undertaken to provide a considerable volume of information.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): That is reasonable.

Mr Cree: Thank you for your contribution, which has been very useful so far. Your responses have been fairly good but some, however, have been a little unclear.

Some of my colleagues have raised issues that could have been developed a little more. For example, many of us wish to know whether Northern Ireland Water Ltd will be a viable company, and we can know that only from the information supplied. My colleague mentioned the strategic business plan, which is fundamental to the viability of the company. However, there are other issues. For example, we have not seen an asset management plan, even though we have begun to talk about assets.

We know that there was an agreement between Treasury and the Secretary of State, but we have received no detail on that. We have no information in respect of governance of the company. In addition, why is there a need for a standing charge at all? Why bring up this nonsense about capital value, which is not linked to ability to pay or, indeed, to sustainability? That is my first question. [Laughter.]

Mr Sterling: I see a strong link between those three elements.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Do you want to answer, Mr Sterling? That was a heck of a one.

Mr Sterling: In 2002, the company conducted a major asset management planning process. The regulator will conduct a further asset management planning process. That will begin as early as summer 2007 and will be an essential prerequisite for the periodic review in 2009.

The current strategic business plan is being constructed on the basis of previous asset management planning, with the advice of consulting engineers. However, in the time available, it would have been impossible to complete a full asset management planning process. Nevertheless, that will form part of the periodic review process and will be completed in the same way as similar processes in England and Wales are completed through OFWAT. There is a considerable degree of transparency with that.

Ms Bryan: There may be some confusion. The company produces the asset management plan, not the regulator. However, the regulator will avail himself of independent reporters, who will check our costs and assumptions so that the regulator has an independent basis for the asset management plan on which to fix prices for the coming regulatory review, as David Sterling said.

Mr Cree: Will the company not develop the plan?

Ms Bryan: It will be our responsibility to do that. We are thinking about the plan now, and will start work on it in 2007. It is a long process, but a very important one for the company, the regulator and the customers.

Mr Cree: We have already touched on the issue of land disposal. We know that there are 130 pieces of silver — the going rate used to be 30 pieces of silver.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): That is because of inflation.

Mr Cree: The land in question has been declared as surplus and could be disposed of. I am led to believe that some of those declarations go back 16 years; I wonder why someone would wait 16 years before disposing of land.

You almost answered the question about the disposal of any land prior the transfer date of 1 April 2007, but I am not quite sure that you have answered it completely. I shall ask you the question in an unambiguous manner: has any disposal been agreed prior to the transfer date?

Mr Sterling: Katharine will answer that question, and I will answer the questions on governance and standing charges.

Ms Bryan: I shall answer in two parts. There may be some confusion as to what an asset management plan is — forgive me if I am making assumptions. An asset management plan has nothing to do with sales of land.

Mr Cree: No. I am moving on from that.

Ms Bryan: Sorry, I was referring to your previous question. I am glad that there is no misunderstanding on the asset management plan.

You asked about asset sales ahead of 1 April 2007. We regularly review our surplus lands and disposal.

We are not planning to make sudden sales, or proposals for sales, ahead of April 2007. As any responsible company would, we intend to develop an estates-management plan. That sounds grandiose, but the assets may be small parcels of land or disused pumping stations. They are assets that most people may not perhaps recognise as such. The regulator, the shareholder and Water Service will identify a responsible use for them.

The organisation may not have used an asset such as a length of pipeline for some years, but its water-resource strategy may dictate that it will eventually need that pipeline. Even though an unused asset may have been on an organisation's books for some time, it will still need to be cautious about disposing of it suddenly. That is why we need a good, 10-year estates-management plan. There are no plans to suddenly present the Department or anyone else with a list of asset sales.

The plan that has been mentioned already allows for proceeds from disposal of assets to be shared between the customer and the company after 2010. That is the norm in England and Wales, and I believe that it is a fair approach.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Will your accountancy procedures over the next 10 years involve writing down in the normal way the value of the assets that will be listed?

Mr Cree: Assuming, of course, that the values of those assets had not fully depreciated.

Ms Bryan: I will defer to David on that point.

Mr Sterling: There are a couple of issues there, so I shall defer to the accountant.

Mr McCormick: Normal accounting procedures will apply. Impairments in assets must be accounted for as they arise. However, there is nothing special about the process.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): The company's definition of usage may be significant. It may declare that it does not need the asset but that it could be valuable to someone else. In that case, the company could write down the value of the asset, rather than declare its real value. Therefore that asset becomes more valuable on disposal. That would normally happen. How can one see the list of assets and the current valuations and how they are proofed?

Mr McCormick: The current list of surplus assets, which is quite long, was published recently with a press release. There are no valuations with that, because I understand that, at present, we do not have valuations that could be published with them.

Mr Sterling: That means market valuations.

Mr Cree: Is a residual value stated on the balance sheet?

Ms Bryan: Yes.

Mr Cree: Is that based on current cost accounting?

Mr McCormick: The valuation of the company's opening assets will be determined by the transfer scheme to set up the company. Therefore all its assets will be transferred through that scheme.

Mr Cree: How do you decide the value of the assets?

Mr Sterling: For what purpose?

Mr Cree: For balance sheet purposes.

Mr Sterling: Through the relevant accounting standard.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): From what I am hearing, a sharp accounting cookie who is a businessman would run rings around you and would love to go after those assets. You need to be clearer. Forgive me for this — and it is not a reflection on you — but your answers may give rise to the interpretation or the suspicion that you really could not care less because you are heading to something much brighter and that the way down the road is to get rid of the assets. We have seen it many times before: the Government dispose of assets and properties that they had underwritten or undervalued, and all of a sudden the lottery comes home to whoever picks them up.

Mr Raymond McCartney: If no assets are disposed of between now and 2010, is the strategic business plan viable? Or does it rely on some disposals?

Mr Sterling: Again, that has not been finalised.

Returning to the procedure for disposal of assets, the company will be required to produce an estates-management plan and provide it to the regulator by September 2007. As I explained earlier, the company will be able to dispose of an asset only with the approval of the regulator. Therefore the company cannot, in some willy-nilly fashion, dispose of assets. The regulator has a clear role to play in that.

When it comes to disposing of an asset there will be procedures in place to determine the value of that in such a way that the company gets value for money and, indeed, taxpayers and customers get value for money, depending on how the proceeds are actually to be used.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): I hope that the procedure is not the same as that which the Department of Education is using to dispose of its schools' assets and estate? I would not recommend it.

Mr Sterling: Forgive me if I do not comment on education.

Ms Bryan: I am a little concerned that we have inadvertently given you the wrong impression about that. The disposal of assets is an important issue.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Do not take full blame for it. It has not just happened today. It is a combination of matters.

Ms Bryan: I want to reassure you that the disposal of assets in 2006-07 is, of course, in the normal course of business subject to the Government Accounting Northern Ireland (GANI) policy. Any assets on the surplus list will have a market value in order to give such assets a value in the open balance sheet. There will, therefore, be openness.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): On the market value?

Ms Bryan: Yes, on the market value. The VLA will also give them an independent value. Please reassure people that, for this year, the processes will be carried out via GANI and the VLA.

As Chief Executive, I will have responsibility to examine asset disposals with the Regulator and the shareholders. That will be an entirely proper process. It will be in the interest of the customers, which, after all, is our raison d'être. I want to reassure you of that.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): The subgroup is grateful for that. You understand that criticism will come from the Public Accounts Committee across the water if you do not get those issues right. If a Public Accounts Committee is installed in the Assembly, and the same questions and issues arise, the criticism from those elected representatives and from those who put them in position will be intolerable. I appreciate what you said. Thank you.

Mr Cree: We have had clarification on that. I want to know how to get rid of the standing charge. I want to leave that aside, however, and try to get some logic on the matter. Surely the Regulator's involvement from 1 April, or whenever he appears on the scene, will mean a change to the draft licence?

Mr Sterling: Yes, it could mean a change.

Mr Cree: Can you comment on the standing charge? It seems to me to be a bit of an anachronism now.

Mr Sterling: With regard to electricity, all costs are covered through the unitary charge. Obviously, there is an argument that a significant proportion of the costs of the water and sewerage business is actually involved in providing the infrastructure. The variable element, the actual —

Mr Cree: The product?

Mr Sterling: Indeed. The product is a disproportionately small percentage of that, and the standing charge recognises that. That is my view on that.

Mr Cree: That is interesting. Chairman, I will move on quickly to my other eight questions. [Laughter.] Some of them have been touched on. In the current situation, what transformation costs have you allowed for this year and for the first year of the new Go-co?

Mr Sterling: That has been addressed in the strategic business plan.

Mr Cree: Will the subgroup get that information? I would not have thought that that would be too confidential. The current year is a reality, I hope.

Mr Sterling: Indeed. May I reflect on that?

Mr Cree: Would you, please? I look forward to that.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): You have had 48 hours to reflect on it, David, judging by your previous promise.

Mr Sterling: I have got used to responding quickly in recent times.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): We appreciate that very much.

Mr Cree: We have known David of old. He did not tell you that he actually came from DFP, I believe. Did you spend time there, David?

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): We do not have time to go into all of that.

Mr Cree: Efficiency targets? What efficiency targets have actually been set?

4.00 pm

Mr Sterling: It is for a matter of public record that, at the start of the strategic planning process in February this year, the Department set provisional targets of 35% for operational expenditure and 27% for capital expenditure. Those targets were the products of a mechanistic process whereby the Department examined relative efficiency analysis and were designed to create a benchmark against which the Department could work within the strategic planning process. The targets were set at a time when it was clear that our knowledge of the business, and of the underlying costs, were not as good as it could have been. We knew that there was a likelihood that those targets may need to change. The Department has not yet finalised the targets in the strategic business plan.

Mr Cree: But the Department is not far from finalising that?

Mr Sterling: No, we are not far from doing that.

Mr Cree: When will the final targets be known?

Mr Sterling: The Minister will set out the assumptions that underpin the tariffs in the new year. The Department aims to be as transparent as possible, subject to commercial and confidential issues.

Mr Cree: From your projections, what will the bad-debt target be by 2010?

Mr McCormick: I do not have that figure to hand.

Mr Cree: Perhaps Mr McCormick can supply that to the subgroup later, if it is not a secret.

What is the Department's position on the potential recommendation to part-privatise the Water Service, following the review that is planned for 2008-2009?

Mr Sterling: The Government have announced that a review of the process will be conducted in 2008.

Mr Cree: You mentioned the appointment of undertakers in the sewerage side of the business and others in the Water Service. That suggests a split in the company.

Mr Sterling: No. The legislation has been drafted to refer to "undertakers" in the plural. That may give rise to suggestions that there are plans for appointment of more than one undertaker. However, I can assure the subgroup that the Government's intention is to award a licence to a single undertaker for Northern Ireland's water and sewerage services from 1 April 2007. The legislation was framed in that way to comply with European competition legislation, which prevents Governments from forming or enshrining monopolies in statute. That is why flexibility was built into the legislation and why it was drafted in those terms.

Mr Cree: Will the licence run for a significant period?

Mr Sterling: It will.

Mr McCormick: The legislation provides for an open-ended licence. An undertaker will be appointed, and the licence can only come to an end by way of a period of notice, which will be a long time.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): I shall indulge Mr McCartney and Ms Ritchie, if they will indulge me with succinct questions.

Mr McCartney: My question is short and to the point. The delegation has perhaps been hiding behind the business plan. It is important that members have further insight into the process in the future. Many questions have been evaded with answers that refer to work in progress.

The subgroup is tasked with helping to frame a Programme for Government for an incoming Executive. Considering the process of water reform to date, if that process had to be undertaken again, what recommendations would you make? Is there anything that you would change or do differently, if you could?

Mr Sterling: Is there anything that I would change? Where shall I start? [Laughter.] I hope that my response does not sound facetious, but should a similar process ever have to be undertaken again, I hope that I am not the one who has to do it.

To be serious, however, when the Department reaches the end of the process it will consider what lessons may be learnt, as it does any major reform programme. That will form part of the Department's programme management practice when it nears the end of the process.

This is one of the biggest local reform initiatives that has been contemplated. It was extremely controversial and contentious, and has been extremely difficult to manage and progress. There is a lot that we can learn.

Ms Ritchie: What are the implications for Water Service staff from April 2007, and what are the plans for pension and redundancy up to 2010? How will water charges be adjusted after the revaluation of capital values in 2010, and will the cap on rating valuations be adjusted?

Mr Sterling: On the final point, I cannot say whether the cap will be adjusted because the revaluation exercise is a matter for the Department of Finance and Personnel and the Valuations and Land Agency.

Ms Bryan: Pensions are a big concern for staff, of whom I am one. The plan is to have a new pension scheme because staff will no longer be civil servants. A mirror-image pension scheme is in the final stages of development, and we have worked with the trades unions and staff on that over the past 18 months or so.

As I have already said, there will be fewer staff in the future, and we hope that there will be a good voluntary severance scheme to enable people to leave with dignity. On the positive side, I can promise the staff of Northern Ireland Water Ltd an exciting time, greater job potential, greater job satisfaction and involvement in a very important service in Northern Ireland.

Ms Ritchie: Will those staff enjoy the same conditions as civil servants, and will the new company treat them as if they were civil servants as regards salaries, conditions of work and pension arrangements?

Ms Bryan: All staff will come under The Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 when transferring to the new organisation. However, if the company is to operate as a business, and if it is to deliver the same standards of service and efficiency as England and Wales, it cannot operate under the same grading structure and other systems as the Civil Service. We will take the opportunity, with unions and staff, to develop a business-like approach that suits the utility.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Thank you very much. It has been an endurance for you as well as us. We are delighted you came. Thank you for your frankness, where possible. You will get back to the subgroup with the missing elements. Have a good Christmas and a good New Year.

Mr Sterling: Chairman, it would be helpful if the Committee Clerk could let us know quickly the list of things that we have committed to. We have taken notes, but it would be useful if we could agree the points that need to be followed up.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): I am going to miss Chelsea's kick off if we keep going at this rate — and it is not until 7.45 pm.

Mr Sterling: Thank you very much.

The Chairman (Mr McNarry): Thank you.

Witnesses:

Prof John FitzGerald } Economic and Social } Research Institute (ESRI)

The subgroup met at 10.23 am.

(The Chairman (Mr O'Dowd) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr O'Dowd): I welcome Prof John FitzGerald to the Subgroup on Economic Issues. He has travelled from Dublin this morning, and I believe that he has rescheduled his itinerary in order to appear today. The subgroup thanks him for that. Prof FitzGerald will begin proceedings with a statement lasting around 10 minutes, and then the floor will be open for questions from members.

Prof John FitzGerald (Economic and Social Research Institute): Thank you; it is an honour to be here. I was asked to talk about two matters: the priority areas for investment in the Republic of Ireland, and the drivers and principles for cross-border co-operation, particularly in infrastructure-related areas.

To determine the Republic of Ireland's priorities, we must look first at constraints. The current problem in the Republic is that the economy, just like a child, is growing out of its clothes. There are huge constraints due to infrastructure, and something must be done about that because it is affecting competitiveness.

The other problem is that the economy is growing above its potential; though the money may be there, the infrastructure cannot be delivered as rapidly as people would wish.

Human capital remains important. The national plans include significant investment in the infrastructure of education and training as well as in the people involved. That colours our views on investment priorities and on areas in which there should be co-operation between the North and the Republic.

Since the completion of the single EU market at the end of 1992 there has been a free market for business North and South, and there is no constraint on business. Market forces should, in the absence of market failure, give the optimal outcome for business. Of course, market failure does occur, and Governments have to get involved, but that involvement should only happen when market failure has been proven.

Barriers still exist in the production of public sector goods and services where there may not be an optimal allocation of activity on the island and where the border still exists. I shall return to that theme later.

For Governments to become involved, then, market failure must be proven, and before cross-border co-operation can begin, it must be clear that a better outcome can be achieved through co-ordinated activity by the two Governments than if they continue on their own. The costs of co-ordination are very high; studies show that the completion of the single electricity market would benefit the people of this island, North and South, but the transactions costs of doing it are very high. Alternatively, the 'Enterprise' train does very well out of cross-border co-operation. So, you do it if you have to, and if the benefits outweigh the costs.

As regards the Republic's priorities, the problem is how much the economy can deliver. Last winter the Irish Government published their spending plans for the next decade. The Economic and Social Research Institute (ESRI) examined those plans and said: "You cannot spend that much. You will have the money, but if you spend it, the economy will explode and you will have to cut back on what you intend to do."

The top priority is to complete the inter-urban motorway system, which will be completed by 2010, followed by urban public transport system, particularly in the Dublin area. However, in the ESRI's view, the planning for that has not been done properly. In addition, human capital remains important, and R&D has been ramped up, but one of the problems in all of these areas is that if we go from zero to 100 very rapidly, we may get into trouble. Ramping up R&D rapidly may not be very efficient.

The final factor, which the Department of Finance in the Republic finds difficult to take on board, is that economic infrastructure is not the be-all and end-all, and that social, cultural and recreational infrastructure may play a role too. Mostly, the latter is provided for by the private sector, but making Ireland an attractive place for skilled Irish people to come back to — remembering that one-third of all young Irish people in the Republic still emigrate — to attract them back and to attract skilled foreigners, who are so important to the economy, we have to make Ireland an attractive place. That is why public transport is needed, but there may be other elements in making an economy successful, which would not normally be thought of.

The low priorities are the productive sector; aids to business and agriculture. We should really get rid of them. If one cannot make business work in the Republic today, one should not be in business at all. It is necessary to show market failure. There are still areas, though, such as marketing tourism and R&D in which there is still a need for public involvement.

If the Irish Government were prepared to tax the housing sector to release houses for social housing, the ESRI would say yes. However, the Government cannot just pump more money in; that would lead to inflationary problems.

It is interesting to compare the differences in priorities North and South. The ESRI has examined those differences, because it is important to the Republic to know what is going on in the North. The Republic needs certain things from Northern Ireland, and vice versa. For example, the Republic's priority is to spend four times as much per head of population than the North on transport, but less on health and education infrastructure, which is surprising, because the health system is much better in Northern Ireland than in the Republic.

According to the Secretary of State, Northern Ireland has too many schools. Why, therefore, is there a need to invest so much in education, rather than transport or the environment — areas in which there are different levels of investment in the North than in the South?

10.30 am

Our research in the Republic has shown that the issue is not simply about spending money, but about making use of the infrastructure. Appropriate pricing of water, waste services and congestion charging may all be unpopular, but an infinite amount of money could be spent on urban roads, for example, and they would still be congested. Unless good use is made of money by investing it in public transport, there will not be a sustainable society. In addition, to produce sustainable cities, planning must be based on a much denser population, particularly in Dublin and possibly in Cork and Limerick.

Growing and retaining human capital, and R&D, could benefit from co-ordination. As student numbers in the Republic will fall, and Northern Ireland has too few third-level education places, co-ordination could benefit both regions.

The border makes a difference in the provision of public goods such as education and health. For example, the single biggest infrastructure project planned for Northern Ireland is a new hospital in south-west Ulster. There are major problems in the Republic's health system; so, if that hospital were to be sited in Enniskillen, for example, it would make sense for the Republic to buy services from Northern Ireland in order to provide a decent health service in border areas. The Republic could vice versa provide services to Northern Ireland.

Infrastructure benefits from co-ordination. That already happens in certain sectors, such as electricity provision, and is being driven by market forces. However, there are regulatory problems. In many cases, the Government should not just spend money, but should establish the regulatory environment for telecommunications and energy in order to produce the optimal outcome.

North-west Ireland is a major issue for the Republic's Government. Donegal's problems cannot be solved without considering investment in Derry. The north-west will be a priority area and the Republic wants Northern Ireland to co-operate in the north-west to benefit infrastructure development on the island as a whole.

Elements that can help businesses include selling the location of the island, marketing, tourism and so forth. Our research shows that there should be less emphasis on aids to the private sector and more on concentrating on public goods in the areas that I mentioned.

The Chairman (Mr O'Dowd): Thank you. The floor is now open for members to ask questions of Prof FitzGerald.

Mr Storey: I welcome your comments, Prof FitzGerald. There is a raft of issues to consider from your presentation. I was interested in your comments that co-operation only happens when it produces a better outcome. You highlighted the example of co-operation in electricity provision, which is driven by market forces, and that such co-operation arises not because of political expedience but because of the benefits it brings.

The DUP has been very clear that co-operation is not about establishing institutions for the sake of it or ticking a box to placate some particular ideology. Co-operation should be based on good economic sense, and provided that areas can be identified and clearly defined, and that co-operation would achieve a better outcome, it is to be welcomed.

You mentioned the percentage of the population aged 25-34 with a third-level education in 2005, and you said that the figure for Northern Ireland was calculated on the basis of 36.3% of males and 31.5% of females having a third-level education, giving an overall figure of 26.4%. My estimation is that that figure should be around 35% or 36%.

Prof FitzGerald: You are correct. The data that I received was incorrect but was later corrected. The two Governments published a paper, and the correct data is included in the appendix to that paper.

Mr Storey: The figure should be 33.9 %, which you say is higher than the EU average.

Prof FitzGerald: It is slightly higher than that.

Mr McLaughlin: That was an interesting presentation. You discussed the impact of the border and gave some examples of co-operation, cohesion and obstacles to mobility. You specifically mentioned the public sector. What possible options might we explore, and is there potential in the new EU regulations relating to territorial co-operation for widening the areas of co-operation and, perhaps, eliminating those difficulties?

Prof FitzGerald: From the Republic's point of view, EU money is irrelevant at this stage. However, EU regulations, such as those that may lead to the hiving off of the transmission of the Viridian Group plc, may be significant. As regards INTERREG funding, it is not so much the money as what must be done for other reasons. The Republic will find the money on its own part, if it needs to, but the north-west is an area where you cannot solve those problems with money alone. The infrastructure connecting Derry and Belfast is important for Donegal. Historically, Donegal was part of Belfast's wider hinterland, but now it is not. I am not an expert on regional issues, but that is one area where the Republic would like to see investment. There has already been some investment in the airport there. I travel by public transport, and to get to Donegal is a real pain. Now I can fly to Derry, so I can see that, on a personal level, it makes a difference.

Mr McLaughlin: It will be possible to establish bodies that, with the two Governments' agreement, will have their own legal identity and can be located in the North or the South. I am using this island as an example, but dealing with shared boundaries is an EU-wide matter. Those legal entities would be subject to the fiscal policies, or legal issues, of whatever EU state they are located in. Would that provide an example of how we can deal with the difficulties of mobility?

Prof FitzGerald: Having spent three and a half years, up to the end of September, on the Northern Ireland Authority for Energy Regulation (NIAER), I have been involved on Northern Ireland's behalf in negotiating the all-Ireland electricity market.

The complexity of producing co-ordinated legislation between Westminster and Dublin is warranted by the potential benefits to the island. However, there must be big benefits involved in order to justify that level of co-ordination.

I have been part of a process dealing with multiple levels of government in Westminster, on issues that Westminster should not have been involved in and was not interested in. I am loath to be prescriptive, and organisation economics is not my area, but when you start messing around with those sorts of organisations, the costs are high, and as such should be avoided.

I remember when a House of Commons Committee came to the ESRI in the mid-1990s, and I said that an all-island electricity market is important. I was asked if I thought that there was a need for all-island institutions. I said possibly not, but it might make life easier. Having been involved in such co-ordination work with NIAER, I know that it is very demanding on everybody's time, but it was obviously warranted in that case. Matters must be dealt with on a case-by-case basis.

Ms Ritchie: Prof FitzGerald, you are very welcome. I believe strongly in North/South co-operation, and North/South economic co-operation in particular. I read your documentation, and I note that you mentioned the north-west quite a bit. I can understand that from the Republic's perspective as it sees an advantage in developing the north-west as far as Donegal.

However, you mention at the end of your submission that the Dundalk Institute of Technology should exploit further its hinterland with the North to provide services in that area. Please expand on that as regards skills and technology. Furthermore, how could the south-east be developed? In contrast with the north-west, it seems to get left out a lot.

The subgroup has been given detailed research, which shows that the South expanded the work of the colleges of technology in the area of skills, which helped the growth of the economy in Dublin. How did the development of the colleges of technology impact on growth and development in the economy in the South, and how could that contribute to the development of the economy in the North? What further levels of co-ordination, including the development of North/South bodies, are required to ensure that we can share some of the South's resources and develop the economy in the North to a level that is comparable with that in the South?

Prof FitzGerald: I visited the Dundalk Institute of Technology, and I was struck by the fact that they have a relatively limited number of students from north of the border. Looking at a map, one would expect that the institute would attract more students from north of the border than from the South. The institute had to check on the numbers as they had not focused on this issue. It seems that the North is short of places in third-level education.

People are not going to take the train to Dundalk, morning and night — the Belfast issue has to be solved on its own. However, IT colleges in the South should be given incentives to focus on cross-border recruitment of students and provision of services, because they do interesting work on sustainable energy there. There is also interesting work being carried out in Northern Ireland on sustainable energy, of which people in the Republic need to be more aware. Quite a lot of experiments have been carried out up here.

There are areas in which the Dundalk Institute of Technology could provide a service. We also need to look at the Institute of Technology, Sligo and Letterkenny Institute of Technology. Of course, third-level education works as an island without anybody telling it to do so. The bulk of the sociologists with whom I work come from Queen's School of Sociology, Social Policy and Social Work, because it is the best on this island.

We organised a seminar in the institute on electrical engineering, and we work jointly on PhDs with University College Dublin (UCD). One of the top students at the seminar was from Queen's University, and she was being jointly supervised in her PhD studies by UCD and Queen's University. Thus, co-operation is happening at a local level, but more focus at an IT level would be important.

In terms of impact on the Republic, it is the expansion of third-level education down to certificate diploma one and two-year courses that is keeping kids in school until the age of 18 and then, afterwards, allowing them to study for what we in the Republic call a post leaving certificate, which would be one year after high school graduation — the European norm being to graduate from high school at around 18. The North has a big gap. In the past, when people in the Industrial Development Agency (IDA) saw themselves as being in competition with Northern Ireland — I do not think that they would do so any more — one of their big benefits was that when a company such as Intel needed technicians in Carlow or in Kildare or wherever, the local IT college would put on a course and train lab technicians or whoever very rapidly so that they would gain qualifications within one or two years. They needed third-level graduates, but they also needed other trained people urgently, and they had the flexibility to meet that need.

Those arrangements were set up in the Republic in the 70s, but it had a major impact only when kids stayed at school until age 18 and then went on to do the course.

10.45 am

My kids went to the local community school, where two thirds of the children came from local social housing. I was very conscious that, in the late 1980s, parents were saying that there was no point in their kids remaining in education. The children who were in my youngest daughter's class remained at school and the parents changed their attitude. However, you needed a flow of kids from working class backgrounds to stay in education until age 18 and then to go on to third level education, so you have to look at them jointly.

Ms Ritchie: With regard to the development of partnerships, would you see a significance in Newry College of Further Education developing further partnerships with Dundalk? Some partnerships already exist, but there are other possible areas for development, for example in IT.

Prof FitzGerald: I would have thought that there would be scale economies there — they are sufficiently close, especially with the recent road improvements. There are similar links, for example between Letterkenny Institute of Technology and Magee College. Such links may well happen anyway without anybody suggesting them because market forces will drive them. However, I think that there is logic in terms of improving the content and range of services available to everybody in that region.

Ms Ritchie: In assessing the impact of 'Transport 21', have you or your team given any thought to where the North needs to develop complimentary roads, given that the South has put such an emphasis on inter-urban routes as a means of developing growth in the economy?

Prof FitzGerald: The two road systems that are important to the Republic are the Belfast to Dublin road, because so much of our exports go out through Larne; the other is the Derry to Belfast/Derry to Dublin routes. However, say, for example, a new hospital is built in Enniskillen and it is the major centre of excellence in that part of the island, then there might be a wish to improve the regional roads, because the roads from Enniskillen to the Republic are rotten. There might therefore be a desire to develop some routes for regional reasons, depending on what is happening in the area.

The Chairman (Mr O'Dowd): David, the floor is yours.

Mr McNarry: Four short questions, if that is OK.

The Chairman (Mr O'Dowd): Four short ones or two long ones?

Mr McNarry: I will go for four short ones. Prof FitzGerald, thank you making the effort to be here. Are you able to give a sense of what public opinion is like in the Irish Republic with regard to the Irish National Development Plan, which proposes to contribute capital investment into Northern Ireland? How do the people of the Republic feel about that?

Prof FitzGerald: I live in an ivory tower, so I am not necessarily the best person to assess public opinion. I think that if the amount of capital investment were limited and had a very clear logic from the point of view of the Republic, then I think that people would say yes. If it were a substantial amount, however, concerns would be expressed about dependence and so on. However, as an example, I think that the Derry people are happy that Derry airport is there and that it provides a service to Donegal. Similarly, where there are direct benefits for the people of the Republic, they would see the benefit. However, if the amount of investment increases, then people would ask whether the Republic were just making Gordon Brown's life easier and subsidising the United Kingdom rather than Northern Ireland. I think that it is a question of scale.

Mr McNarry: Would the intellectual argument in people's minds stretch as far as involving Gordon Brown? Would the Irish people be so alert to that?

Prof FitzGerald: They would be if there were a lot of money involved. Think of people the world over; where there is a lot of money involved, people start asking questions — all it takes is one newspaper article to raise questions in people's minds and then they are off.

Mr McNarry: So, 1 billion euro, as alleged, is not really an awful lot of money?

Prof FitzGerald: It depends over how many years you spread it. You may spread your butter thinly.

However, that is not my area, so I cannot answer your question.

Mr McNarry: That is fine; I just thought that you might have been able to give us a local perspective. How do you feel about it, or is that an unfair question?

The Chairman (Mr O'Dowd): I think that you are being slightly unfair.

Mr McNarry: If it is an unfair question, Prof FitzGerald does not have to answer.

Prof FitzGerald: It is not unfair. I would have thought that the amount would be limited. However, if we take east Germany or the Mezzogiorno as examples, pumping money into infrastructure does not necessarily pay off, because other things are needed. Therefore there should be a limited amount where there is a clear pay-off for the Republic.

Mr McNarry: My question was obvious. I wanted to know how people in the Republic feel. Unionists have sensitivities with that issue, because for electoral reasons nationalist areas appear to be bolstered, while unionist areas are excluded.

Prof FitzGerald: That would reflect the fact that the Government in the Republic may be more magnanimous; however, their electorate may be less so and would want to see a pay-off. That is an important point, given that governments have to be re-elected.

Mr McNarry: I got more out of asking that question than I thought, so I am very grateful.

My second and third questions run into each other. Agriculture seems to feature less as an economic issue in both jurisdictions than it did previously. Are you aware of any plans to encourage agricultural growth in the Irish Republic?

Prof FitzGerald: That depends on what you mean by growth. Eighty per cent to 90% of farm incomes are paid in the form of cheques in the post or as subsidies. As regards production, German taxpayers might be happier if farmers stayed in bed in the morning, although the Irish would not. Agriculture is not making a major addition at the moment.

However, if we look at what is happening with global-warming — and I am conscious that the British Government and the Prime Minister are committed to fighting it — we will find that, in the long run and if the price of carbon increases enough, the use of biomass to generate heat and, possibly, electricity, will become an economic option. Indeed, biomass is already an economic option for the production of heat.

My friend John Gilliland, who sits with me on the Northern Ireland Authority for Energy Regulation, has been successful with his work in Derry on biomass. People from all over Ireland — and now from the United States — are interested in his work. If using biomass becomes profitable, given environmental constraints, farming could make a much more positive contribution to the economy, North and South.

The run-off of agricultural waste into rivers and lakes is the greatest environmental problem in the Republic. Agriculture is causing significant environmental damage, although one or two other minor industries also contribute. Therefore agriculture is a complicated issue. However, in the future we may need the agriculture sector to get involved in biomass, not biofuel. That will be a profitable move. Biomass is certainly profitable in heat production, and Balcas Sawmill CHP Plant in Fermanagh is successful in that regard.

It is interesting to note that all the activity on biomass takes place in Northern Ireland; I am not aware of similar work in the Republic. Perhaps I am just ignorant, because it is not really my area.

Mr McNarry: Might the grants be a contributory factor?

Prof FitzGerald: Yes. I was a member of the Northern Ireland Authority for Energy Regulation, which visited the Balcas plant. Given that John Gilliland, who could certainly convince anyone about biomass, sits on the authority, I would be aware of it.

Mr McNarry: Keeping to the agricultural theme, I think that I am right in saying that bureaucratic gold-plating affects Northern Ireland farmers terribly, but when it comes to the application of European rules down South, the restraints do not appear to be the same. Obviously, that has a bearing on economic performance up here. Is there a trick in that down South? Do they pay no attention to it? Do you have any guidance for the industry up here to prevent it from suffering as a result of that gold-plated bureaucracy?

Prof FitzGerald: I am not sufficiently familiar with the area to comment.

Mr McNarry: I have a final question. I was interested in what you said about education. Undoubtedly, education has played a successful role in your economy.

To what extent does the economy suffer from underachievement in education? That is a massively serious issue for us. There is a suggestion that gaps in employment due to underachievement are being addressed, conveniently, by migrant workers. How do you cope with educational underachievement in the Republic?

Prof FitzGerald: That is a matter on which my colleagues in the institute have been working for 15 years. The top priority in the late 1980s was to address the number of students that were leaving school before the Junior Certificate — the equivalent of GCSEs — was completed. There was a substantial reduction in that number up to the late 1990s, when 80% of children, on average, completed high school with the Leaving Certificate. However, there has not been much progress since then, particularly for boys. The rate for girls has continued to rise, but the rate for boys has remained static or fallen. We are concerned that more children complete school. There will then be questions about quality in third-level education: is the quantity up, but the quality down?

I am not an expert on that area, and I deal with education on the macro level. I know that colleagues are concerned with the micro level, and have done much research on how to achieve better results. My school reports always said, “could do better” and, in the Republic, the education system certainly could do better in several areas.

The focus of attention at the moment is the fourth sector — PhDs. However, the biggest benefits will be obtained if we keep kids in school productively so that they complete high school. That would produce the biggest return to the economy.

The study that colleagues have carried out shows that Irish people who emigrate and come back are 10% more productive as a result of what they have learned abroad. I am interested in carrying out a study to see how many of those in the management of multinational companies in Ireland are returned emigrants. It strikes me that if you consider Intel or Dell, the top people are Irish, but they did not grow up in the firm here; they went abroad, learned another language, and learned how to do things differently. That aspect of the educational system — which one might not classify as education — is hugely important. In the last 30 years, a lot of kids have left Northern Ireland to go to university in Great Britain, and have not returned. David Trimble, in a speech to the Institute of Directors before he became First Minister, raised that issue. In the Republic, that is a matter that people generally do not refer to, but I see it as part of the broad human capital.

The final point that you raised concerned immigrants who fill employment gaps. The research that we have done shows that immigrants to the Republic are highly skilled, and have a much better education than the average Irish person. If they come from an English speaking country, such as Britain, the US, Australia, or New Zealand, they get jobs commensurate with their qualifications when they arrive. If they come from a non-English speaking country, they may go home or learn good English and, within six years, they get jobs commensurate with their qualifications. The research shows that because they are upgrading the skills of the economy, they have helped solve the unemployment problem. The economy was constrained and could not grow because there were not enough people with third-level education. If people come from abroad and the economy grows more rapidly, you need more people with lower skills, and that helps to solve the unemployment problem.

Quite a lot of immigrants, especially those from non-English speaking backgrounds, are in jobs that are unskilled, but experience shows that many learn English and gain appropriate employment.

A colleague, who is Chinese, began work in the canteen but now works in our accounts branch. Such good use of resources is hugely important for the economy and for the unskilled. Since the economy will grow faster with more skilled people, careful use of resources helps solve the unemployment problem.

Mr McNarry: I have a quick question. What of the indigenous people, the locals who are underachieving? What happens to them? Do they go onto a heap? We will be faced with a problem in that respect; indeed, we are faced with it already. Most of the immigrants aim for skilled or semi-skilled employment, though not at the levels you are talking about. We do not have the jobs for them at that level. There are growing numbers of people who consider themselves on the scrap heap because they do not have the skills, education or qualifications to improve their lot.

Prof FitzGerald: The boom in the economy changed attitudes, and people began to see hope in education. The long-term unemployment rate is 1.3% or 1.4%. It is sufficiently low for people not to be on the scrap heap today. It could be a problem in the future. The building and construction sector cannot continue to be a quarter of the economy. Hopefully it will slow, but it could collapse. In those circumstances, many unskilled or semi-skilled people in that sector might find themselves unemployed. Issues might arise then. Government policy at the moment is to find anything they can do to upgrade the skills of immigrants — in particular their competence in the English language — so that they will get the skilled jobs that they need them to do rather than take up unskilled jobs.

Our research suggests that the market will deliver and that the Government do not have to worry too much about it. Studies show that the immigrants who arrived up to 2000 have now secured jobs commensurate with their skills. They have either learnt English, or they have gone home.

11.00 am

Mr McNarry: I hope you are not paying £100 million for translators?

Prof FitzGerald: That is a concern.

Mr McNarry: Thank you. That has been enlightening.

The Chairman (Mr O'Dowd): I will open the floor to one more question from each of the delegates, then we shall move on.

Ms Ritchie: Prof Fitzgerald, in view of your involvement in the energy market, may we have your assessment of the all-Ireland energy market, including the electricity network? What benefits do you think it has brought to the island's economy?

Prof FitzGerald: I am unsure about whether it has brought benefits as yet. It begins next autumn. In the long run, the recently published cost-benefit study indicates limited benefits over cost for the island as a whole and for both jurisdictions. In the final negotiations, Northern Ireland should take care to ensure that it gets its share of benefits right from the start. I am no longer responsible for that, but my colleagues in the authority and DETI will strive to ensure that that is the case. It is something that DETI and the authority will have to work at. It is an incredibly complex area. We know there will be benefits, but we want to be sure that they are maximised.

Ms Ritchie: Chairman, may I have a supplementary question? Prof FitzGerald has said something that requires investigation. What work is required by DETI and those in the North of Ireland to bring that to fruition?

Prof FitzGerald: It is complex. The models must be used. We need to be sure that the price in 2008 will be less than or equal to what it would have been without an all-Ireland market. I think it will be; but officials need to do their sums on that. I understand that they are working on it.

Mr Storey: Prof FitzGerald, do you agree that co-operation between Northern Ireland and the Republic should be only on the basis of benefit? You said earlier that the outcome had to be established. If we establish a framework, it cannot be allowed to become legalistic and cumbersome.

The benefit, cost and sustainability of any particular project must be considered. Would it be possible to look at the axis turning for Northern Ireland? Rather than have a North/South axis, Northern Ireland may benefit more if the axis were turned east-west, given the fact that we could deal with 55 million people in England compared with three million in the Irish Republic.

Prof FitzGerald: If you are looking for economic benefits, those are what you go after. You co-operate where it is beneficial. There may be wider strategic issues on which the Republic and Northern Ireland need to work together. That depends, however, on what you are trying to do in any particular area. In an all-island market, the electricity market is the most prominent, because it is driven by commercial factors and will deliver benefits, North and South. Rather than say that you want there to be co-operation, you could say that you want to save money for consumers in the North. How do we do that? That was the focus of a House of Commons Committee that came to Dublin in the mid 1990s. Electricity prices had gone through the roof in Northern Ireland. Consumers were being screwed, and the Committee wanted to do something about that. The electricity market would be my economic focus.

What strikes me about east-west co-operation is the cosmopolitanisation of the Republic's economy and how important it has been for it to have had people with a range of skills from different places, as well as Irish people who have worked abroad. We have substantially underestimated that factor in the success of the Republic's economy. To focus on the island alone would be most unwise, just as it would be to focus solely on the rest of the United Kingdom.

Northern Ireland must ask how it can cosmopolitanise its economy. You need to look to Europe and beyond — to countries such as China. The Republic has done very well out of those who have gone from the North to work in the Republic, so Northern Ireland must look to an even wider audience than these islands.

The Chairman (Mr O'Dowd): I apologise for the movement while you were talking, Prof FitzGerald. A number of people present have had to leave to attend another meeting.

Our advisers have tabled a number of questions on your commentary. I apologise if I am hesitant while I am reading, but it is like reading a doctor's notes. If we require further clarification, the subgroup can write to you.

Your table on infrastructure spending in the Republic and the North shows a high level of spending in the productive sector. We are interested in support for the economy. Can you tell us what the money will be spent on in the South?

Prof FitzGerald: Some of that money will provide marketing aid for tourism and some of it will be to aid R&D. I would have to look at the list because I do not have the report in front of me.

The Chairman (Mr O'Dowd): Thank you. The subgroup can follow up that query with a letter.

You suggest that Government must crack market failure. Is that a wide enough perspective, or must strategic objectives also be taken into account?

Prof FitzGerald: Strategic objectives such as building clusters in a particular sector could be set. If you look at the success of the market in healthcare products in Galway and in pharmaceuticals in Cork, you may want to consider building a cluster around Dundalk and Newry. It depends on what you call market failure. I would not get too involved in pedantry. If the state can produce much bigger benefits by spending money, it should go for it. However, you need to be pretty convinced that the state knows what it is doing. Economists said, in reference to the Irish Government in the early 1980s, that Governments cannot pick winners. Fortunately, the economists were wrong and Industrial Development Agency Ireland was right, although not quite in the way that it expected. I may have been more dismissive of this question than I would be in the cold light of day.

Mr McNarry: My question relates to that point, in a sense. I wish to ask about the concept of harmonisation. I am amazed that we have not talked about that yet. Harmonisation has been bandied about as though it were a new god for Northern Ireland. What would the impact be if Northern Ireland were harmonised and able to compete with the Republic? Would we benefit, would the Republic suffer, or would we both benefit or suffer? I use the comparison with tourism reluctantly. We made tourism an all-Ireland issue, and anyone will tell you that Northern Ireland did not do well out of that. Harmonisation creates a conundrum for everyone.

Prof FitzGerald: I would not like to comment about harmonisation in general terms. It may be sensible to harmonise some matters, but not others.

Mr McNarry: Should corporation tax be harmonised?

Prof FitzGerald: I know that people have left the room to discuss that issue. It is considered to be important for Northern Ireland to have a lower corporation tax rate, which would, undoubtedly, bring benefits. The question is: how great would those benefits be? People in the Republic exaggerate the extent to which corporation tax is currently important. It is important, but the investment in human capital and the successful attraction of human capital to Ireland is more important for the future than corporation tax rates.

To some extent, the Republic also had first-mover advantage; it was first to go into the field. However, countries such as Estonia and Slovakia are now queuing up, bumper to bumper. Northern Ireland speaks English, which is another advantage that we should not tell anyone about.

Mr McNarry: We do not speak Irish. That may be another factor.

Prof FitzGerald: The Republic has the advantage of speaking English as well. We both speak English.

Mr McNarry: I thought that Ireland was an English-speaking nation, but perhaps I am wrong.

Prof FitzGerald: The English-speaking factor is important in attracting high-tech, mobile investment and skilled non-English speaking people who are from outside of Ireland, who will come here to learn English, but who will not learn Dutch.

Mr McNarry: Fair enough. You said that the Republic exaggerates the importance of corporation tax now. It must, however, have been important in the past.

Prof FitzGerald: It was important in the past. However, it is less important now. Strategically, the Republic must concentrate, not on changing the corporation tax rate, but focus primarily on its other attractions, given that other countries, including Northern Ireland, are going for corporation tax measures.

Mr McNarry: What are those other attractions?

The Chairman (Mr O'Dowd): Remember me, David? I am in the Chair.

Mr McNarry: What are the other attractions, Chairman?

The Chairman (Mr O'Dowd): Thank you. Go ahead.

Prof FitzGerald: Supporting the human capital area, for example.

Mr McNarry: Shimmers — once you give them an inch, they take a mile. [Laughter.]

Mr McLaughlin: I was enjoying that. I want to follow on from the previous point. The issue of corporation tax is hugely important to the discussion and to our engagement with the Treasury. However, is it accurate to say that the conditions that existed when corporation tax was a vital element of economic regeneration in the South do not apply in the current circumstances of global economics? There is a different context.

Prof FitzGerald: The context is different today. During the 1970s and 1980s, the Republic was the only country that was cutting corporation tax. However, there is now a lot of competition, for example, in pharmaceuticals, from Puerto Rico and Singapore. In many areas, there are now many competitors.

Corporation tax might well produce benefits from within the United Kingdom, such as relocating activity, which would not be available to the Republic, but that would benefit Northern Ireland as part of the UK; as well as firms from outside of these islands moving to Northern Ireland. There would, undoubtedly, be benefits. However, I believe that there will be fewer benefits for Northern Ireland than there were for the Republic when it reduced its corporation tax.

11.15 am

Mr McLaughlin: If we can compete with the economy in the Twenty-six Counties, that benefits the island, which is a point that was made earlier. That can be achieved by combining other measures that produce the same outcomes, given what are likely to be the British Government's parochial interests.

Prof FitzGerald: I would not give up hope for Northern Ireland, no matter what. It has potential, and I would place a great deal of emphasis on the human-capital area. However, the issue is not a simple one. Mayo, Galway and Kerry in the west of Ireland have the highest participation in third-level education in the Republic, but if you give people a great education and they obtain MAs, they want jobs in which they will be able to use those MAs. Those jobs are in services areas in cities, although that would include Galway. Therefore the issue is whether you can hold on to graduates. If you can, that will represent a whole new ball game.

The Chairman (Mr O'Dowd): The final contribution will be from Mervyn Storey. We have time constraints, and Prof FitzGerald must travel back to Dublin.

Mr Storey: Mr McNarry picked up on a point that is well worth rehearsing. If we look at the legacy from Tourism Ireland Ltd, it is abundantly clear that Northern Ireland has become the poor sister. The despicable situation is that the NITB can only promote Northern Ireland in Northern Ireland, yet Tourism Ireland's remit is to promote the island. From an economic perspective, that has created a disproportionate playing field. Northern Ireland has been adversely affected because of the way in which that organisation was structured and the matter was handled.

Prof FitzGerald: I am not an expert on tourism, so I cannot comment on the Republic versus Northern Ireland. However, having watched what has happened in the Republic, I can say that people thought that a big boom in tourism would be great for rural Ireland. It has not been. There has been a boom in urban tourism, with people spending the weekend in Dublin. The rest of the country and Northern Ireland have suffered in comparison because of Dublin's dominance.

My daughter bought a painting from one of the best Ethiopian artists. He had spent six months on an Irish Government scholarship in Dublin, and the painting was called 'A Hen Night in Temple Bar'. That is like Irish people going to paint the natives in Africa. For an African, the painting depicted a strange cultural event. Hen nights in Temple Bar are part of what one might call a success. For those of us who have to live beside Temple Bar, however, they are of doubtful benefit.

The Chairman (Mr O'Dowd): We could go on all day, but we have time constraints. I thank Prof FitzGerald on behalf of the subgroup for his contribution and continuing co-operation with us. Thank you.

The subgroup met at 2.20 pm.

(The Chairman (Mr O'Dowd) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr O'Dowd): Good afternoon. I welcome the Treasury officials to this meeting of the Subgroup on Economic Issues, which is a subgroup of the Committee on the Programme for Government. Perhaps you would introduce yourselves and give your presentation, which will be followed by a question-and-answer session.

Mr Ray Shostak (HMT): I am the director of public services in the Treasury. This is Dan Rosenfield, who is head of the devolved countries and regions team, Judith Knott, who is head of our corporate taxation team, Martin Beck, who works in Judith's team as an economic adviser on corporate taxation, and Mark Parkinson, who is head of the devolution branch in Dan Rosenfield's team.

We are grateful for the opportunity to talk to you. I begin by thanking the subgroup for rearranging its timetable in order that we were able both to give evidence here and to deliver the Pre-Budget report. In my introductory remarks, I will set out the context for the Chancellor's offer and then introduce the rationale and elements of the financial package. That will provide some background in order that we may field your questions.

You will know that the economic package has been put together in order to support the steps that the political parties and the Secretary of State are taking under the St Andrews Agreement. The package recognises the substantial progress that has already been achieved since the signing of the Good Friday Agreement, and it reflects the need to work on wide-ranging reform. The programme would promote the peace process and economic growth, strengthen involvement from the public and private sectors, and enhance the performance of the public sector so that peace is matched by economic prosperity.

The package comes at a time when the fiscal climate is much tighter than in the past, and is in the context of the two fiscal rules that have led to the strong macro-economic stability of recent years. The first is the "golden rule", which is that, over the economic cycle, the Government will borrow only to invest, and not to fund current spending. The second is the sustainable-investment rule, which dictates that public-sector net debt, as a proportion of gross domestic product (GDP), will be held at a stable and prudent level over the economic cycle.

The package also comes before the 2007 comprehensive spending review (CSR) which is within that much tighter fiscal climate, and which has led us to work with all Departments to ensure that spending and supply-side programmes, which promote economic growth, are cost-effective and provide value for money. That again reflects the tighter fiscal climate.

As you will know, the Northern Ireland Departments are carrying out their own spending review, and we are liaising closely with them — again, within that tighter fiscal climate. The Treasury and other Westminster Departments are determined to continue to make progress in that climate and look forward to working with you post-devolution also.

It is worth noting that the Government have already made several early settlements as part of the 2007 CSR. The Departments that have settled include the Department for Work and Pensions (DWP), HM Revenue and Customs and, indeed, the Treasury group, which have all settled at –5% for each of the three years in the CSR period.

In its recent pre-Budget report, the Treasury also announced –3% efficiencies year-on-year during the CSR period, with a focus on cashable efficiencies to facilitate reinvestment. That gives an indication of the approach of the 2007 CSR and some of the challenges that we have faced in relation to it.

Finally, the Treasury recognises that the St Andrew's Agreement built on the considerable progress that has been made in Northern Ireland so far. Indeed, we touched on that point when we met with your advisors this morning. We also recognise that the Northern Ireland economy has prospered in recent years. Since 1996, the economy has grown every year, and the average annual rate of growth in nominal terms has been 5.4%, which is similar to the UK average. The unemployment rate is falling, from 8.2% in 1997 to 4.4% in 2006, compared to 5.5% in the UK. Whatever problems remain, particularly with productivity and inactivity, there is a strong platform from which to go forward. The Chancellor's package is an attempt to work with you to build on that platform.

Work is ongoing to reduce dependency on the public sector and improve Northern Ireland's public services. There are record levels of investment and, in nominal terms, public spending by the Northern Ireland Departments will be 20% higher in 2007-08 than it was in 2004-05. Public spending in Northern Ireland is 30% above the UK average and is by far the highest in the UK.

I am aware that members know those figures, but they create the context in which the package that the Chancellor put to you was formulated. The package is intended to reflect that context and, in the light of analysis and representations that were made to him, on 1 November 2006 the Chancellor announced a medium- and long-term funding package to provide the incoming administration with a secure and certain basis for planning spending. That package is, of course, contingent on the restoration of devolution. In view of the settlements that the Treasury has made with other Departments, that secure and certain basis has significant value.

In his letter of 8 November 2006, the Chancellor explained that the Government are prepared to offer a funding package in order to support the objectives that they share with the local parties. The aim is to promote a private-sector-led economic strategy for Northern Ireland and to create a world-class, modern and dynamic economy.

We want to answer any questions that you may have about that package and to develop a common understanding of it. The funding commitment for the next four years is a minimum of £35 billion. That confirms the existing departmental expenditure limit spending for 2007-08 and increases it by the rate of inflation over the following three years. I have no doubt that you will want to ask questions about that.

The CSR settlement will be confirmed next year and will be based on the updated Statement of Funding Policy. Should devolution return, the Executive would, inevitably, be consulted on that. The figures for each year are £8.5 billion, £8.7 billion, £9.0 billion and £9.2 billion.

The package also confirms the £200 million reinvestment and reform initiative (RRI) borrowing limit for 2007-08. That is in addition to departmental expenditure limit spending and is available to finance increased infrastructure investment. That facility is unique to Northern Ireland.

There is a long-term funding commitment of £18 billion for capital investment for the years 2005-17. That extends the existing 10-year strategy by two years and provides a framework for modernising Northern Ireland's infrastructure. The package also commits to an end-of-year flexibility drawdown of £0.4 billion over the period to 2010-11. The Northern Ireland Executive would be able to carry forward all departmental expenditure limit underspending.

In order to boost capital investment, the Executive would also be allowed to retain the receipts from the planned sales of public sector assets, which are currently estimated at over £1 billion to 2010-11. There may be scope to identify further asset sales in the spending review.

The Executive would be allowed to retain all efficiency savings identified over the CSR period to strengthen frontline services. Those would, on current estimates, rise to at least £800 million in 2010-11.

2.30 pm

Work is in hand on value-for-money reviews to maximise those savings here as it is in the rest of the UK.

Finally, the Northern Ireland Executive would be allowed to retain EU receipts under the structural fund and peace funding. These are estimated at £500 million for the period 2007-13 and are designed to promote regional development and community cohesion. In aggregate, the package is worth around £50 billion.

We talked earlier with your advisors about our concerns relating to corporation tax. The Government are fully aware of the representations made in favour of reducing the rate in Northern Ireland, and have considered those carefully. The Government's view is that the UK, including Northern Ireland, has a competitive tax structure.

According to the joint report on the 'Comprehensive Study on the all-island economy', direct taxation, as a percentage of income, is lower in Northern Ireland than in the Republic: 24.8% compared to 26.3%. A small-companies rate already exists; other allowances mean that the effective rate of tax paid is lower than 30%; and R&D tax credits are more generous in Northern Ireland than in the Republic. There are many difficulties associated with lower rates of central government taxes in Northern Ireland, and such an approach would be illegal. Instead, the Government envisage strengthening supply-side policies, such as that on skills and innovation. This is also advocated in the all-island report.

That leads us to two further aspects of the package that you may wish to discuss. The package proposes the setting up of an innovation fund to support R&D and innovation in Northern Ireland business and research. That reflects the importance of Northern Ireland focusing on developing a highly skilled workforce, building on its science and education sectors and responding to the challenges of globalisation.

Secondly, the package proposes to provide a corporation-tax office that will be a one-stop shop, offering advice to companies that are considering a potential investment in the Province, advising on business issues such as R&D tax credits, and advertising the skills and the new incentives to the world.

Members are welcome to ask questions and seek clarification today on the package. We are also here to help you research your report, which we look forward to.

In summary, this funding commitment is unique to Northern Ireland, particularly in the context of the overall CSR, and will ensure that Northern Ireland continues to have the highest levels of public spending in the UK. We will also work with the Northern Ireland Executive and the Republic to strengthen the development of the all-island economy, and improve value for money in public services across the island. We will co-operate with the Irish Government and devolved Ministers in relation to joint funding that the Irish Government may wish to put forward.

To conclude, the Treasury looks forward to working in partnership with devolved Ministers, when devolution returns, on public service and economic growth to reform and improve public service delivery, while at all times recognising that in those devolved areas it will be for the Northern Ireland Executive to decide their priorities and policies. That has been an important driving force in constructing the package, and it is the basis for any discussion or clarification that you may want during the course of the afternoon.

Dr McDonnell: Having attended the session with the Chancellor, most of the detail of the added money and the infrastructure fund is fairly clear-cut to me.

Can you tell us anything about the innovation fund that the Chancellor mentioned at that stage? Will it be additional to the existing health research funds that were established in England? If not, how does it relate to those funds? Will it be additional or will it be assumed that — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.]

The Chairman (Mr O'Dowd): I am sorry to interrupt you, Alasdair, but someone has left their mobile phone on. It is causing interference with the recording equipment. Can members please ensure that their mobile phones are turned off?

Dr McDonnell: Is that research academic or commercial — they are very different animals. I, and many of my colleagues, believe that it would be wonderful to have money invested in academic research, but we really want investment in commercial research that will produce a profit at the end of the day.

Mr Shostak: We would be delighted to clarify that for you, and I welcome this opportunity to ask my colleague Dan Rosenfield to respond. To reflect the spirit of the question, we, too, as you will have gathered from my introduction, see the innovation fund as an important component in supporting the development of the economy in Northern Ireland.

Mr Rosenfield (HMT): The starting point, as you suggested, was your meeting with the Chancellor, at which he clearly signalled that he was committed to an innovation fund in Northern Ireland. He subsequently asked officials to follow up with details, which is where we come in. Our approach has been one of partnership with our colleagues in Northern Ireland on the idea and the overall context, but also of generating links with officials in the Republic of Ireland to identify opportunities across the piece.

I will briefly set out the context that informs that deliberation and the way in which we are trying to take it forward. I will pick up on your specific points as well.

We are very keen to meet some of the priorities set out at the meeting that the Chancellor had with the local political parties. The needs identified were to meet the perceived historical underinvestment in capital; to generate higher private-sector investment; to collaborate more closely with the Republic of Ireland; to develop Northern Ireland's science and R&D base; and to create world-class universities, building on the solid base that already exists and ensuring that it is capable of meeting the specific challenges of globalisation.

We are also very mindful of the 'Second Report on the Economic Challenges facing Northern Ireland', particularly some of the points that it made about science and innovation. Equally, the study of the all-island economy touched on some of the evidence base we will take account of when thinking about how to structure and focus a fund.

Finally, it is important to recognise the partnership approach between reserved policy areas and what could be devolved policy areas. We are mindful that there is a UK science and innovation investment framework, which spans 10 years, and it would be critical that any fund complements and builds on it.

That is the broad context. I will now move to specific issues. Since the parties met the Chancellor, we have engaged directly with our colleagues in Northern Ireland, recognising the partnership nature of the approach and that there is already a significant amount of policy on which we would like to build, such as some of Invest Northern Ireland's work.

If we got the design wrong, there would be a risk of duplicating already existing policy, which we are keen to avoid.

Equally, as I signalled, we opened up communications with the Republic of Ireland to explore some of the ideas around collaboration. However, at the very strategic level, while we do not want to be too prescriptive about the fund, we suspect that the overall approach wants to be one that seeks to increase business investment and innovation and to encourage innovative collaborative projects that include the private sector. So I am referring very much to a commercial angle as well as to the academic angle that you mention.

What does that mean in practice? Currently, dialogue and engagement are not prescriptive. Ideas and proposals at this stage include prioritising specific areas such as funding to encourage innovative R&D investment by companies in high-growth sectors, particularly with a focus on small to medium-sized enterprises and inward investors. One proposal is that that could be operated as a challenge fund, a model used in the Republic of Ireland and elsewhere.

Another priority might be an international innovation investment collaboration fund, which would recognise the global nature of the R&D innovation challenge and explore collaboration with countries across immediate borders, but also with global players such as the US, India and China.

We are also keen to explore how we might best use the funds to develop centres of world excellence by investing in innovative technologies and technology transfer, perhaps through joint investment between Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland universities, building on existing research centres and making sure that we are capturing the commercial angle of development and the spin-offs that one can realise from the more academic side of research.

Finally, we are interested in considering whether we can learn lessons that from some of the existing Northern Ireland policies around science parks, and those in other parts of the United Kingdom. We also want to look at the best practice of UK policies such as science cities, and to establish whether that could be applicable in a Northern Ireland context.

Dr McDonnell: Will the issue be 20% commercial and 80% academic or 20% academic or 80% commercial? How will the balance be struck, or who will decide that?

Secondly, you say that you are in dialogue with Invest NI. I do not want to offend or criticise those in Invest NI, but they are, by and large, people with a Civil Service background and frankly, when new, cutting-edge, hi-tech and highly innovative technology appears, it scares them because there is big risk involved.

How can we introduce necessary risk-taking? Where are we going to strike the balance?

There is much talk and action from a lot of tremendous people in the medical world here, but it is by-and-large all academic. It is impossible to persuade them that it is not dirty or prostituting to make money out of these projects. The challenge is to convince them otherwise.

In my view, the fund will work if it is commercial and radical in terms of risk. We must stop being scared of risk-taking; there are small companies throughout the country that would potentially take those risks, but we are not pulling any of them through.

The Chairman (Mr O'Dowd): Does anyone want to comment on those remarks?

Mr Rosenfield: Chairman, if I may respond. I suspect that our starting point is very much the same. Our interest in investment, innovation and R&D is because it is a key driver for improving productivity and therefore economic growth. If we agree on that and take it as our starting point, it rather suggests that the focus should be more heavily on the commercial side than the academic side.

While we do not want to be prescriptive about the specific balance, I think that we would share the thrust of your point on that. Similarly we seem to agree on how we can really exploit the current dialogue and make sure that it delivers the expertise we require to make a policy work in practice.

However, the critical element for me is that we see this as a collaboration with the private sector; that it should promote dialogue and encourages an element of challenge; and that we bring the private sector to the table in a way that frankly recognises, dare I say it, that the Civil Service does not always have the best answers to some commercial questions and that we are at our best when we create the right space in which to work in partnership with the private sector.

Mr McNarry: Thank you for taking the time to come and speak to us today. I hope that it will not be the last opportunity that we will have to discuss those issues.

The local media caused some confusion by reporting headlines of new money in the Chancellor's package. Our local experts seem to have taken the £50 billion and reduced it to nothing. Can you state clearly what is new money beyond the public expenditure that we might reasonably have expected in Northern Ireland?

2.45 pm

Mr Shostak: I will ask Dan to go through the detail. I will take the direct question about the new money in the package.

Mr McNarry: It would help inform the public, because they have either been misinformed or misrepresented — or you have been misrepresented.

Mr Shostak: Indeed. Before Dan describes that for you, I remind you of my opening remarks and the context in which we are operating. It is a much sharper fiscal outlook, and settlements have already been made with Departments. What that does is create a climate in which we have tried to construct a package, so the direct question is entirely relevant.

Mr Rosenfield: Ray, in his opening statement, described all the elements of the package, totalling over £50 billion. The package contains the following elements that have already been announced: £8.5 billion departmental expenditure limit in 2007-08; £16 billion investment strategy; and £200 million for reinvestment and reform initiative borrowing in 2007-08.

The new announcements in the package are a commitment to: first, at least uprate the 2007-08 departmental expenditure limit by inflation in the comprehensive spending review, with the actual settlement to be announced next year in the normal way; secondly, an additional £2 billion, by extending the investment strategy by two years; thirdly, additional flexibilities, including drawdown of existing end-year flexibilities over the comprehensive spending review period, retention of over £1 billion of planned asset sales, retention of at least £800 million value-for-money and efficiency savings in 2010-11 and retention of £0.5 billion EU receipts up to 2013.

Mr McNarry: To help the poor soul who has difficulty in putting all that together, what is your assessment of how much of that, in total, is new out of the £50 billion? Can you give me a ballpark figure of £x billion?

Mr Rosenfield: The package totals around £50 billion — just over £50 billion.

Mr McNarry: I am well aware of that. Can you tell me what I have got now, that I might not have got, had colleagues not gone to see the Chancellor at 11 Downing Street?

Mr Shostak: It is difficult to tell you what you might not have got. Part of what we are doing is creating an early settlement for the new devolved Executive. In that respect, we are currently in the process of setting departmental budgets for 2008-11, and as part of that process we are going through with Departments zero-based reviews against all of their major negotiated spending lines.

The package that the Chancellor put to you creates that new certainty and is an allocation of resources, which provides that certainty now.

Mr McNarry: I am trying to say to you that the package as explained by the Chancellor has not penetrated and that whatever benefits are in it have not been grasped. Perhaps they need to be simplified so that the public can grasp them. Equally important is that the package is being presented in a climate in which the politicians in Northern Ireland — and I respect you and I am grateful that you are trying to help us — are coming to an arrangement whereby a devolved Government would be restored.

I am sure that if you were advising a potentially incoming devolved Government you would be asking them to find out what more money they will have in order to govern than they will inherit directly from the outgoing direct rulers. I suggest to you that work needs to be done to deal with the confusion, and now the perception, about the package. To be honest, I will need to think about your answer two or three times because I do not have a clue about what you have told me.

I will leave the matter for other colleagues, unless Mr Robinson wants to ask a supplementary question.

Mr P Robinson: I think I understood what was being said — we are being provided with certainty and not new money.

Mr McNarry: I agree.

Mr Rosenfield: If there is an issue about understanding I will restate the figures, specifically to answer direct questions, and then set out what I think is new, and I will be absolutely clear about that.

The overall package is around £50 billion and contains specific elements that have already been announced — the £8.5 billion departmental expenditure limit in 2007-08, the £16 billion investment strategy money, and £200 million reinvestment and reform initiative (RRI) borrowing in 2007-08.

There are three new elements in the package. First, there is the uprating of the 2007-08 departmental expenditure limit by inflation across the CSR. That will provide an incoming Executive with much greater certainty than Whitehall Departments currently enjoy, or, in Northern Ireland's case, than a direct rule organisation would enjoy. An incoming Executive will be able to come into the CSR process in an environment of certainty and will be able to make plans on that basis.

Secondly, a new element, which is critical, is the extension of the Investment Strategy for Northern Ireland to 2017, which will provide an additional £2 billion. Behind that decision is specific recognition of the challenges for Northern Ireland to invest in infrastructure as a key driver to attracting private sector investment. An incoming Executive will be able to enjoy the longer-term certainty that that will provide as regards planning and funding.

Thirdly, there is the announcement of specific flexibilities, which is a new announcement. These include the points around end year flexibility and the retention of the receipts from the sale of public sector assets. I appreciate that the Subgroup on the Economic Challenges Facing Northern Ireland looked at the issue in its report. Those additional flexibilities provide greater certainty and spending power for an incoming Executive.

Mr McNarry: I will read that again with interest. I understand the aspect of certainty. I am concerned that what you outlined is what we could have reasonably expected. You appear to be ring-fencing with some certainty, what we would have reasonably been expecting. There will have to be some thought as to whether or not it is additional in real terms.

My second question concerns a press release from the Treasury, issued on 1 November 2006, which stated that:

“The UK Government will work with the Northern Ireland Executive to simplify the R&D tax credit rules”.

Can you outline what that simplification will entail? How will simplifying the rules encourage new opportunities, particularly those with environmental benefits? For example, how would it further the development of biomass opportunities for our hard-pressed farming community? That issue has recently come to the fore. Although we are advanced in some aspects, simplification of the R&D tax credit system could help some people immensely.

Ms Knott (HMT): To provide background, I will explain the basics of the R&D tax credit system. The system in the UK compares very favourably internationally. That assertion is supported by external research. For example, Deloitte has assessed the UK’s R&D tax credits as among the world’s most attractive regimes. Benchmarks set by the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development benchmarks also rate the UK system as attractive compared to that in the Republic of Ireland.

Over recent years, we have consulted on R&D tax credits, most recently last year. That consultation made clear that improvement of the administration and delivery of the R&D tax credit was vital. Companies will not take advantage of R&D tax credits unless the system is simple to administer and will be managed in helpful and friendly way towards claimants.

Mr McNarry: You must appreciate that Northern Ireland has a large number of small companies that are not attracted to R&D because they do not see how it would benefit them.

Ms Knott: I fully understand that. The Treasury is also well aware that the problem with R&D is uptake, especially in Northern Ireland but also in the UK. As a result of the consultation, improvements in administration and delivery will ensure that the three core principles of the system — simplicity, consistency and certainty — are upheld. Certainty is vital; R&D will not be factored into an investment plan unless a business is certain that it will receive the tax relief.

A major initiative that has arisen from the consultation is the creation of new specialist units that will handle all R&D tax credit claims by small and medium-sized enterprises. The units will be centres of expertise and excellence within Her Majesty’s Revenue and Customs that will deal with tax credit claims. The units will also have a strong outreach function and will build strong links with the local R&D community and tax professionals. In addition, the units will have a major role in promoting the tax credit to help encourage uptake and will assist companies with claims.

Those elements of the simplification and promotional package are now in place. However, an additional element for Northern Ireland, as part of the financial package accompanying the St Andrews Agreement, is an extension to the corporation tax and VAT office in Belfast. That office will have a specific R&D remit and will act as a specialist unit for R&D claims. Furthermore, it will advise potential overseas investors on other aspects of the tax system. However, the R&D tax credit aspect, including promoting and dealing with claims, will be central to its operation.

3.00 pm

Mr McNarry: Would you be able to consider the additional aspect of R&D tax credits favourably for businesses now going into the environmental management of products?

Ms Knott: The general rules on qualification for R&D tax credits would apply to environmental and other areas in the same way. What emerged from consultation is that simplicity and certainty are key to the R&D tax credit. Putting more bells and whistles on particular types of investment would actually detract from the benefits of simplicity and certainty.

Mr McNarry: I can imagine a farmer going in to your corporation tax shop seeking help on diversification and bumping into a businessman looking for some information on corporation tax. I doubt if you would be able to give the businessman the information he requires, because from what you have said a reduced rate of corporation tax may not be introduced, although you may be able to help the farmer.

Ms Knott: The outreach function will serve the local business community. To the extent that farming is an element of local business, the outreach function will serve it.

Mr McLaughlin: Thank you very much. You are very welcome.

I will briefly set out the context. The parties that will form an Executive, if we arrive at that point, are represented in this subgroup. An Executive will have to address the challenges and very significant difficulties that will emerge.

We are emerging from a conflict that has lasted decades. We are dealing with very significant deficits in infrastructure and with the reality that our economy is unbalanced: we have a struggling private sector and a much stronger public sector, and we are committed to doing something about that.

In your statistical analysis you referred to what appeared to be very favourable and comparable employment statistics. But, of course, they do not tell the whole story, because we are dealing with a population of 1.6 million people, half a million of whom are economically inactive.

I do not want to waste time trying to find out where the extra money is. I want to cut straight to the chase. The Chancellor bowled short, because even if there is extra money in the £50 billion, the question is, is it sufficient? The answer is quite clear. It is not.

The Executive is being set up to fail, unless the Chancellor recognises the need to invest in the peace process and in the political process. The deficits have emerged over a period of time for various reasons, and there is no real benefit in going over that again.

No one is seriously disputing that investment is necessary if we are to rebalance the economy, attract investment and make the step change described in your presentation to a modern, dynamic and vibrant economy. If we had the resources we might be able to do that in five years, although that would be a miracle. It will probably be a 10-year programme to reorient third- and fourth-level education to produce the type of graduates who will manage this new economy.

We are living cheek by jowl with one of the most successful economies in the world, which is performing better than any collective region in the UK, or any individual region for that matter. Northern Ireland's disadvantage is real, and is compounded by what appears to be a lack of appreciation. I know you are constrained by the policy as set out in the Chancellor's statement, but the message has to go back very clearly that the investment is short of what is needed if we are going to succeed

Presumably, Government want us to succeed.

The Chairman (Mr O'Dowd): Are you waiting on a response to that?

Mr McLaughlin: I do not expect a response.

Mr Shostak: We certainly want the devolved Administration to succeed.

Mr Rosenfield: Ray has already mentioned the tight fiscal climate, and the challenges of delivering the comprehensive spending review in that context. However, it is worth saying, more widely, that the Treasury and the Government are absolutely committed to working with an incoming Executive in order to make the Northern Ireland economy a success. We broadly share your initial analysis of the economic problems facing Northern Ireland at present. As Ray suggested earlier, it is important to be positive about the wins that Northern Ireland has experienced. For example, although some employment figures do not compare favourably to other regions across the UK, they do compare favourably to some of the historical figures. Therefore, progress has been made. We must celebrate that progress and learn to build on it.

There are three broad strands to the approach that we are taking in trying to make a success of the economy. First, there is macroeconomic stability. The Chancellor and the Treasury have worked hard to deliver 57 quarters of consecutive economic growth. That that has happened is in part due to the measures taken to make the Bank of England independent and to the prudent and cautious approach taken to managing the public finances. Let us not forget that that is critical to the investment decisions and the environment in which businesses operate. Clearly, however, that is not the whole picture, and we accept that analysis.

Secondly, in England, and I suspect that it also applies in Northern Ireland — although that would be for an incoming Executive to decide — one would need to supplement that macroeconomic stability with microeconomic reform and appropriate investment. Our analysis suggests that one can bend policies and public investment in order to help drive the underlying factors of productivity, as well as those factors that contribute to increasing and growing productivity in a way that brings stronger economic performance in the medium and long term.

Thirdly, as has been suggested, there are comparatively high levels of public spending in Northern Ireland. Northern Ireland has the highest level of comparative public spending per head of any UK region — around 30% higher than the UK average. Although that may affect the balance of the economy, it also presents a significant opportunity for an incoming Executive to use that resource most effectively in a way that drives microeconomic reform and facilitates and supports private-sector investment. The Treasury sees itself working in partnership with an incoming Executive in order to ensure that macroeconomic stability and microeconomic reform work hand in hand within a devolution framework, whereby the decisions that drive Northern Ireland's economy and influence local people's standard of living are taken at the right level, close to where market failure occurs and where those decisions have impact.

Mr McLaughlin: I would like some clarity on a final point. When the Prime Minister last visited here, he made a commitment to political parties and, in particular, to the business community that the Government were prepared to listen to arguments and specific proposals. There is, of course, a debate on the issue of corporation tax. In his remarks, however, the Prime Minister made it clear that a possible cocktail of measures and initiatives could create the level playing field that people believe is axiomatic if there is to be a successful political relaunch.

A step change is clearly required if, 12 years since street conflict ended, we are dealing with the fact that policies are being applied — under direct rule, expect for a brief interlude — in the way in which you described them; the fact that there is a dependency on the public sector; the fact that 96% of businesses are small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs); and the fact that 500,000 people are economically inactive. We could manage that step change on the same basis, with the same resources, and still have the same outcomes.

However, we are describing a different future and a different world; we are talking about the economy's ability to grow and to create employment opportunities. I know that you will not second-guess the Chancellor, but where in his statement are the proposals concerning a cocktail of measures on a broad fiscal policy, and the flexibility, that could lead to a step change?

Mr Rosenfield: My answer to that question is rooted in our approach, which has emerged in the financial package and the way in which we would wish to work with an incoming Executive. The Treasury is responsible for the reserved public spending framework, but it wants to create the space and opportunity for an incoming Executive to work in partnership with us in order to make decisions on spending and investment priorities. The challenge with a cocktail of measures — and the Treasury is addressing that issue — is to provide planning certainty on public spending and the appropriate resources. We are trying to create the space for you to make those decisions in partnership with the Treasury, where appropriate, in a way that you see fit.

Partnership is the approach that we seek. The Treasury would not want to be prescriptive about a cocktail of measures for the Northern Ireland economy. We want to work in partnership with you but, equally, we want to respect the space for an incoming Executive to make those decisions — and rightly so — in respect of devolved matters.

3.15 pm

Mr P Robinson: First of all, I welcome you all. When I am involved in negotiations, I often try to test how my words might sound to those sitting on the other side of the table. I rather suspect that it is only your good training and civility that stops you from biting your tongues at times. You could well say that you have produced a package worth £50 billion, yet these awkward people are quibbling about it.

I do not wish to give you a talk on the Union and how we should all benefit from the prosperity of the nation. The Chancellor and the Secretary of State have clearly indicated the need for significant investment in Northern Ireland. Any incoming Executive would applaud your certainty, particularly a future Minister of Finance and Personnel. It is helpful to know where we stand on those issues.

We are all old and experienced enough to recognise that, however the financial deal is packaged, it is essentially what a reasonable man might have expected it to be. However, we are being told about the financial package at an earlier stage. The newspapers and economists that have addressed the issue have more or less come to the same conclusion. If that is the position — and I have heard nothing today to persuade me otherwise — it really does not cut the mustard in addressing the very issues that have been recognised by the Chancellor and the Secretary of State. Mr McLaughlin and I share the same position on this issue, and we could not come from more diverse political viewpoints. If the financial package does not address Northern Ireland's long-term economic structural problems, the quantum must be increased.

The Chancellor has not sent you here today to announce that the package will be upscaled. When we met the Chancellor, I sat directly opposite him; I noticed that his statement was handwritten and had not, perhaps, gone through the normal, official channels. You must accept that more work clearly needs to be done on that package.

Are we wasting our breath? Has the Chancellor made his offer based on our present situation, with the understanding that we can go to him some time between 7 March 2007 and 26 March 2007 — when he hopes that we will have sorted ourselves out — and say that progress has been made so that he can talk real business? The quantum must be increased.

I am sure that you wish that the corporate tax issue would go away and that we would stop talking about it, but it is recognised that a little corporation tax shop will not be enough to get the people from business and industry on to the American airlines and over to Northern Ireland. However, they will come if they have the incentive of a reduction in corporation tax. It is the most important element of a package that could help to raise our economy from its present level to being less dependent on the Treasury. We could move our economy away from being so heavily public sector-led to one that is more prosperous with greater private-sector investment.

3.15 pm

We do not want to have a long-term hands-out approach to the Treasury; we want to be able to change the mess that we are in, and we can do that only if we move up a few gears. There is no better way to do that than by reducing corporation tax. You will find that people — such as myself — in the awkward squad will continue to raise the issue until somebody listens to us and takes the step that can lift us out of our present circumstances and make us less dependent on Exchequer funding.

Mr Shostak: I will ask Judith to talk about corporation tax shortly.

Mr Robinson's contribution contained today's second reference to "any reasonable man" — which we all are — expecting certain sums of money. In the new financial climate, many of our discussions with Departments relate to what have been reasonable expectations about the period of growth that has been experienced over recent spending reviews. The comprehensive spending review is in a different climate from that. Therefore what was reasonable some years ago may not be in the assumptions that underpin the discussions that we are having now with other Departments or the context in which the financial package is being put on the table.

I hope that today is helpful in clarifying the nature of that financial package and the rationale behind it. It is about us supporting the subgroup's aspirations in respect of an economic relationship with the Treasury and our objective to support Northern Ireland in developing its capacities, which we are desperate to do.

Judith will address your concerns on corporation tax.

Dr McDonnell: May I interrupt? I have two supplementary questions following on from Peter's contribution. Has the Treasury taken a view on ERINI's study of corporation tax?

Since we will keep on about the issue of corporation tax, what is the best way to take forward the discussion on it? We will probably keep annoying you about it, and you will probably keep annoying us by rejecting it. It does not square. However, it is better to ask those questions now rather than later.

Ms Knott: We have read with interest the ERINI report on reducing the rate of corporation tax for Northern Ireland. Having looked at it, we do not believe that such a measure would result in the benefits that the report claims would accrue, or that a reduction could overcome the serious practical problems involved in implementation — problems that the report itself does not consider in any depth.

Recent surveys by respected international bodies consistently show that the UK as a whole is successful in providing a business-friendly environment and a competitive tax system. Looking at the tax systems in total rather than the rate of corporation tax alone, we think that the Great Britain and Northern Ireland tax system enjoys a number of advantages over that of the Republic of Ireland. For example, the rate of VAT and the top rate of income tax are lower. Moreover, tax relief on dividends is beneficial, and that is quite important when looked at alongside the corporation-tax rate.

I have mentioned R&D, so I will not say anything further on it. The UK tax system is competitive. A cut in the rate of corporation tax in Northern Ireland would not represent good value for money for the Exchequer. It would have a significant revenue cost, which we estimate would be well above the cost that the ERINI report suggests, once allowance had been made for the encouragement that such a tax cut would give to tax avoidance.

The report explicitly assumes that there would not be shifts of production or profits from the rest of the UK to Northern Ireland. That assumption would not be borne out in reality. Most of the savings would accrue to existing businesses in Northern Ireland, so that would be dead-weight cost and would not represent good value for money. It would also exacerbate the problem of tax-motivated incorporation by introducing a differential between the self-employed and the corporate structures, and that would simply reduce tax revenues without there being any extra economic activity in Northern Ireland.

A change in the rate of corporation tax would also introduce complexity into the system. That would not be good for the rest of the UK — or for Northern Ireland, as Northern Ireland businesses would have to deal with the complexity. Essentially, a system would be created in Northern Ireland in which the rules that currently apply to cross-border transactions would have to be applied between Northern Ireland and the rest of the UK.

Perhaps most importantly, we do not believe that the corporate tax rate is core to developing Northern Ireland's economy. International investors are interested in a variety of factors, both tax-related and non-tax-related, when deciding where to locate investment. Survey evidence and our own discussions with businesses, which have been extensive recently, suggest that the corporate tax burden is not at the top of their list. Rather, it comes below factors such as the availability of skills, cost of labour, transport infrastructure; and access to markets.

Finally, we do not believe that a change in the rate of corporation tax would be legal. We have looked at the issue on its merits and have not focused on the legality of any change, but we conclude that the case has not been made that a change in the rate would achieve the benefits that the report claims.

Mr P Robinson: I wish to make two comments. First, in response to Ray's apologia, I must make it clear that there is a distinction to be drawn between saying to us that no new money is available and saying that there is currently a tight fiscal environment in the UK and that the climate is such that we might have expected to get less over coming years.

However, that does not address the issue that we have raised. If we are doing well to get much the same as we currently get, when in some areas we might have expected to get less, that is nevertheless not the new money that is needed to address the problems that the Chancellor, the Secretary of State and we ourselves have identified.

That is the problem that I have with the response.

Members may wish to engage with your team on the issue of corporation tax. It is not a question of whether that measure provides good value for money, because, with respect, I do not believe that the Treasury has thoroughly analysed the benefits that would accrue to the UK if that project were pursued.

There would undoubtedly be more business in Northern Ireland as a result of cutting corporation tax. That would result in less dependence on benefits and a greater tax take due to the resultant higher level of employment. There would also be greater National Insurance contributions and other benefits for the Treasury. The Exchequer might take a hit in the short term, but, before too long, it would receive considerable payback.

Judith's comments possibly indicate that some consideration and analysis has been carried out on the matter. We have carried out our analysis, and shared that with the Treasury. I wonder whether the Treasury is prepared to share its analysis with us so that our team might be in a better position to persuade the Exchequer about areas in which its analysis is deficient. Perhaps we could also address what your team believe to be the deficiencies in our approach.

Ms Knott: We have examined the ERINI report, and some of our concerns are based on assumptions that that report admits to making. For example, it assumes that, if the corporation tax rate were cut, the economy of the North of Ireland's foreign direct investment (FDI) would grow at the same rate as that of the Republic of Ireland in recent years. We believe that to be an overly optimistic assumption, and the report admits that its position is optimistic compared with the consensus of academic literature on tax rates and the growth of FDI.

A further issue rests on the assumption that there would not be artificial profit shifting from the rest of the UK into Northern Ireland as a result of a tax shift. Artificial profit shifting would significantly increase the cost of a cut in the corporation-tax rate. The report itself states that a 1% shift in profit from the rest of the UK to Northern Ireland would cost an additional £200 million. Therefore much of our analysis is based on points that are contained in the report.

Mr P Robinson: Your comments could be seen as contradictory. On the one hand, you pour cold water on the suggestion that the Northern Ireland economy might move at the same rate as the Republic's, but, on the other hand, you then suggest that, if that happened, everyone in Great Britain would take to their boats and move to Northern Ireland.

Ms Knott: I had in mind artificial profit shifting, not the shifting of real activity. I had in mind the shifting of profit without any shift in the underlying economic activity. That would not actually help the Northern Ireland economy at all.

Mr Beck (HMT): A company in London that set up a so-called brass-plate office in Belfast could shift its profits to Belfast but keep its real economic activity in London.

Mr P Robinson: It would not be too difficult to implement regulations to prevent that from happening.

Dr McDonnell: As a supplement to Peter's comments, it strikes me that, first, there are very few companies here that pay substantial amounts in corporation tax. Secondly, any loss in the short term would be swung into reverse gear and into profit within four or five years because of, as Peter has suggested, the amount of extra tax that would be collected.

3.30 pm

The political point about it is that if I go into a boardroom in New York with David McNarry and I say that I have the most wonderful tax regime in the world and I will give them this, that and whatever, and I have a cocktail of 25 different advantages — and David says that he will provide 12.5% corporation tax — who do you think is going to get the deal? David is going to get the deal every time. This is about the banner headline: the politics of it.

That is where we are coming from. We need that lower rate of corporation tax, as Peter Robinson suggested earlier, to kick-start us, to draw a line in the sand and say that the past is behind us and we are now going over the top in terms of the economy. It is a political trajectory that says that we are on a new platform. Within 10 or 12 years we would become a net contributor to the Treasury.

The Chairman (Mr O'Dowd): You are going beyond a supplementary question now, in all fairness.

Dr McDonnell: I am just making the point. Whether we grow at 80% compared to the Irish Republic, or 70% or 85%, is not the issue. The overall cumulative benefit would be the mood change and mind change that would move the whole equation on. That element needs to be factored in. I do not have the knowledge to disagree with your financial analysis, but there is a political dimension that says: "let us switch on the jet engine". I can assure you that if David McNarry goes to New York and says to an investor that he will get 12.5% corporation tax, the guy will break his arm.

Mr McNarry: Clearly, the understanding is that we are not in negotiations with Treasury officials. If that were so I sense that things might be less friendly. Therefore, this is the preparation for negotiations to give people the confidence and encouragement to go forward into Government. From my party's view, I will not be reporting back to the largest political membership in Northern Ireland that this session has been helpful. I am more likely to report that there is a deal-breaker in the offing. That goes against the grain in terms of the contribution that we all want to make to the restoration of Government here.

We are in an investigative mode. We have given you notice in writing of our intention to make counter-proposals. The question is much as Mr Robinson said: are we going with this or not? We want to be able to make an encouraging report that the financial deal is not going to hold back the other deals. Is it fair to ask how you would envisage how we can together manage and facilitate the counter-proposals that will be put to you in a manner that will bring a satisfactory outcome and encourage the formation of a devolved Government with the financial clout to proceed?

Mr McLaughlin: Can you also give us an indication that there will be an opportunity to engage further with you and the Chancellor around the proposals?

Mr Shostak: It has not been part of our remit to be part of a negotiating team. You have made reference to that already. Those are matters that you may want to take up with the Secretary of State; it would be inappropriate for us to comment on that as officials. What we have done today, I hope, is to help you to understand the nature of the package and to see the strength of what is being put on the table, in order to be able to support what sounds like a shared set of ambitions as regards a devolved Administration.

I am not sure that I can add much more to that. We are aware that you are preparing a report, which we look forward to receiving. The Chancellor has made an absolute commitment to consider that report, and he has deputed us to meet with you to help in producing it.

Mr McNarry: It would be useful if you could accommodate any counter-proposals that the subgroup might have and then produce a report on how those were received. That would give clear guidance to the Committee on the Programme for Government, which was established by the Secretary of State.

Mr Shostak: I can note that, but it is a matter for the Secretary of State.

Mr McNarry: Does the notion of a reasonable man not apply? [Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr O'Dowd): I thank Mr Shostak and his team for their co-operation with the subgroup and for meeting with its officials throughout the day. I also thank them for the time that they have spent with us for this afternoon's question-and-answer session.

Mr Shostak: Thank you for inviting us, and we look forward to working with you in the devolved Administration.

Adjourned at 3.36 pm.

--	---	-------------------------

The subgroup met at 10.46 am.

(The Chairman (Mr Hay) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Hay): You are all very welcome. I apologise for the delay. I welcome David Hughes, Rachel Miller, Jim Strain and Tom Haire from the Northern Ireland Office. The subgroup decided that the meeting will be open to the public. We will go through each item in the response from the Northern Ireland Office to the request by the subgroup for further information on a range of issues, and members can ask questions on particular sections.

Ms Rachel Miller (Northern Ireland Office): Are members aware that, unfortunately, we do not have a full board of officials?

The Chairman (Mr Hay): Yes, we understand that. The subgroup may ask for written clarification on some issues that you are not able to answer today.

Ms Miller: In addition to what we have set out in our response, Mr Hughes is happy to talk about the intergovernmental agreement on co-operation on criminal justice matters.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): Let us start with the first section, which is the role of MI5 in Northern Ireland. You have clarified that somewhat in your letter, but perhaps you could go through the section.

Ms Miller: Do you wish us to go through the document section by section, starting with the section on MI5?

The Chairman (Mr Hay): Yes.

Ms Miller: I am afraid that none of us can talk specifically about that section. However, we can take your questions, and we will endeavour to get back to the subgroup in writing as soon as we can.

Mrs Foster: The response states that the arrangements, as regards the accountability structures concerning MI5, are comprehensive. I have no difficulty with that, although other members may. However, as those arrangements are said to be comprehensive, could you give us clarity now, or in writing, as to whether it is felt that any other arrangements will be necessary and whether any other measures are currently envisaged in relation to accountability?

Ms Miller: I will take that back to my colleagues and endeavour to get an answer.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): Does Sinn Féin have any questions?

Mr G Kelly: No.

Mr Attwood: I have a lot of questions, but I will ask only two new ones on the NIO document, which states:

"It is envisaged that a future Justice Minister will receive the same level of information as does the Board".

Can you confirm what the NIO, or the British Government, mean by the "same level of information"?

Can you also explain how that position can be reconciled with the view of the British Government, and the parties at this table, that the powers and statutory functions of the Policing Board should not be encroached upon in the future? Sharing the same level of information with a justice Minister who may not have the same level of power could create tension. Should the justice Minister have the same level of information as the Policing Board? If so, what does that mean?

The second question is for the British Government: have any complaints to the Investigatory Powers Tribunal (IPT) resulted in any proceedings being taken under the Human Rights Act 1998? The SDLP understands that not one of the 400 cases that have gone to the IPT has resulted in such proceedings, and I would like confirmation of that. I asked that question yesterday, and I would like to have an answer.

Thirdly, please explain the process after a complaint has been referred to the IPT. One would expect due process in any complaints procedure; therefore, I would like the Northern Ireland Office to explain the procedure of the IPT, because no one seems willing to do that. What rights does the complainant have with regard to the submission of evidence, attendance, representation, and hearings, even in private?

What detail is provided in any decision of the IPT? Of the 400 cases that have gone to the IPT, none has been upheld, and no reasons for that have been given.

How does the IPT justify itself to the wider public, when it provides no reasons, explanation, detail or commentary? The IPT fails to live up to any standards that one would expect from any relevant complaints procedure.

Finally, given that MI5 is conducting an ongoing recruitment campaign in the North and in Britain, how many new people has it recruited, and what is the nature of the jobs that those people will do? How many people will be doing each of those jobs?

Mr Cobain: What are their names, addresses and phone numbers? [Laughter.]

Mr Attwood: Funnily enough, yesterday I had to tell the director of MI5 that recruitment was ongoing. When he asked me how I knew, I told him that the information was on his recruitment website. He did not know how I had accessed that information. [Laughter.]

Is Hansard covering all of this?

The Chairman (Mr Hay): Yes.

Mr Cobain: That has blown your cover.

Mr Attwood: Nonetheless, the question is relevant. How many people are being recruited, and what jobs will they do precisely? How many people will be recruited to each job description?

Mr Cobain: First, are the Government considering the inclusion of a Northern Ireland MP on the Westminster Intelligence and Security Committee in order to balance the increased role of MI5 in the Province?

Secondly, could we be given a little more information about exactly what security information is shared with the Policing Board? The board was meant to set up a small subcommittee to seek that information, but it was never set up. I would like to know what information is shared, and with whom.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): If there are no other questions, we will move to the next matter, which concerns the provision to the subgroup of details of any new papers and proposals that are being considered in relation to a policing and justice Department.

Ms Miller: We do not have any new papers of the type that the subgroup is seeking, other than the discussion document that we produced in February. That was a summary of where we were then on this matter, and it raised a number of questions that we — and members — are working to resolve. That is currently the only document that outlines the direction in which we are going with policing and justice, and the Government's position on possible departmental structures and scope. Obviously, various developments have taken place since then and will continue to do so. I imagine that we will eventually agree the scope and structures of a new Department and that that will lead to further documents.

It may be sensible if members ask questions about what we have stated in the paper. I am not sure that I can add much to what has already been said.

Mrs Foster: The paper stated that work has already begun with other criminal justice agencies. As you said, we already have that paper. Has any further work been done with other criminal justice agencies?

Ms Miller: We have not produced new papers or proposals. Everyone understands that the devolution of policing and justice is a very big move, because it involves a number of criminal justice agencies and three Whitehall Departments. Aside from the decisions that must be taken on the exact scope of what will be devolved — we know the broad shape, but not the detail, which members are working on — there is a lot of practical pragmatic work to be done, at whatever point devolution takes place, to deliver a fully functioning, joined-up criminal justice Department. We were very grateful that the Committee on the Preparation for Government stated earlier this year that a single Department of justice was every party's preferred choice. That has been hugely helpful in the planning process.

The type of work that has been going on includes matters such as personnel policies, bringing people together in one Department, examining where the Department might sit, buildings, IT, and talking to one another. That is not really policy work; it is a pragmatic planning process. That is the type of work that has been done and that continues to be done.

11.00 am

Obviously, it is much easier to complete such work once firm decisions have been taken about what will happen in future. I know that that is everyone's aim.

I am not aware of a replacement or successor to the discussion document on the devolution of policing and justice. The work has been fairly practical in nature, considering how the various sections will be joined up. That work is on the practical implementation side of devolution.

There are also other preparations that must be done in order to get devolution in place. One such example is that we have started to identify the primary and secondary legislation that relates to Northern Ireland and replace "the Secretary of State" with "the Northern Ireland Executive", or whatever term will be used. That work, which is continuing, results from the legislative requirements of transferring responsibilities to a devolved institution.

Our ambition is to do as much work as possible so that, when policing and justice are eventually devolved, we will not delay the process. There is much that we can do at the moment. That work has started, but there is a limit. The earlier that decisions are taken on the scope and structure of devolution, the more detailed work that we can do.

Mr Foster: Therefore, you cannot do anything more on the implementation plan until you know the scope of devolution.

Ms Miller: It is not a matter of the NIO not doing anything until the scope of devolution is known, because there is consensus on many issues. However, we could do so much up to a point, but then we would get stuck. We are not there yet, and our work is continuing. We are engaged in a lot of planning work, for example. I want to register the point, which is also registered in the discussion document, that fairly firm decisions are required in order to devise a detailed plan.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): I remind members that I am calling the parties in alphabetical order. Mr Kelly is next.

Mr G Kelly: Notwithstanding the model and the time frame, there is consensus on a huge amount of the detail that will be transferred. Has that allowed you to make progress?

Ms Miller: Yes. As I said, we are doing a great deal of work in bringing organisations together. We are also engaged in a lot of planning work. The consensus has helped us to plan, and we are progressing on that basis.

Mr G Kelly: My second question is also notwithstanding the outstanding core issues. If a decision were taken today and you were presented with a model for devolution, how long would the entire devolution process take?

Ms Miller: That is a very difficult question to answer.

Mr G Kelly: That is why I asked it. [Laughter.]

Ms Miller: I thought so. My answer will not be carefully worked out, as there is not certainty on absolutely everything. The St Andrews Agreement cites May 2008 as a possible time for devolution. Clearly, the Assembly will decide when devolution should begin. It would be quite wrong of the Government to say that all issues will have been resolved and that all matters will be ready to be devolved by May 2008 unless we were sure that we could accomplish everything in that time frame.

However, the process does not quite work like that. I cannot say that everything will be ready for devolution in 18 months or two years from now, because certain things can be done only once the Assembly has taken a decision. The model is that the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister will propose something to which the Assembly will agree. That proposal would then go to the Secretary of State, who would lay a devolution Order before Parliament.

Even if a devolution Order were prepared and we all knew what was happening, it would take a while for the Order to be passed by Parliament — probably three to four months. In a sense, it is like asking what is the length of a piece of string. If there were absolute certainty today, the process could possibly be completed in 18 months to two years. The earlier that certainty is achieved, the more likely it is that that time frame will be met. That is my guess as to how it would work.

Mr G Kelly: Are you waiting for certainty before beginning to deal with the detail? You mentioned work on primary and secondary legislation.

Ms Miller: We cannot begin to prepare devolution Orders until we know more of the detail. It is difficult to do that work without knowing the detail. We know that certain work in relation to secondary legislation will have to be done, and we have started work on identifying the relevant statutes. For example, we have begun the practical work that will be required in order to create a justice Department.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): I remind Mr Robinson, who has just joined us, that the meeting is in public and is being recorded by Hansard. Also, will Mr Robinson state whether he has any interests to declare.

Mr P Robinson: Do you want my criminal record? [Laughter.]

Mr Attwood: I want to probe the timing issue a bit further. Was reference made in the discussion paper to an indicative time frame of 18 months?

Ms Miller: I do not think that we gave a time frame. We did not do so deliberately because the more preparation work that is done, the better an idea one has of what will be necessary. Therefore we said that we would not give a timescale.

Mr Attwood: However, given that you issued a discussion document in February and it is now December, and given that you also gave evidence of having done various levels of preparation over the past 10 months, are you saying, two months after St Andrews, that you are still talking about 18 months or more? If that is so, it begs a question about the huge chunk of time that will have passed before you get around to having the administration side satisfactorily in place.

Furthermore, given that the outstanding issues are more political than material in nature — and some of the papers that we have been provided with today indicate that — I do not understand how it could take 18 to 24 months in any circumstances, but I do not understand, 10 months after you started doing the work in the discussion document, how it could still take 18 to 24 months, when, clearly, you are doing an enormous amount of work.

Ms Miller: It is because there is a difference between having a project in which we are certain about the end product, and which can be prepared for, and one where one does not know what the end product will be, the full scope of what will be devolved and the future structure of any Department. In fact, until quite recently, we did not know whether there would be one Department or two. We do not know when the end product will be introduced.

If one has absolute certainty about the scope of a project, one can have definite start and end dates, and it can be run as a proper project. A timetable with milestones and targets can be set, and one could say that the project will be completed by such-and-such a date.

We are dealing with something that is much more difficult because it is much fluffier. We are receiving more and more detail, and the subgroup is providing useful pointers on where we might go and what we might do. Therefore, what I am saying is that we can do a lot of preparatory work, which is what we are doing at present and will be doing in the future, but one does reach a point when one has to know what is actually going to happen.

That is why it is difficult to provide a timescale. At the moment it is probably fair to say that it will take 18 months; however, that is an estimate and not a detailed implementation date. The earlier that matters become more certain, the more likely we can reduce that timescale, but that is not likely to happen. We are running a project at the moment, which is going —

Mr Attwood: Let me rephrase my gripe. If all parties in the North agreed tomorrow to have full devolution of justice powers 12 months from today, are you saying that you could not comply with their wishes?

Ms Miller: What you are trying to ask is what would happen if parties requested devolution tomorrow; I think —

Mr Attwood: If the parties declared politically that they would want devolution to be in place 12 months from today.

Ms Miller: Before I could answer that, I would need to know what they had agreed, what the shape of the Department would be and how much change it would involve. I would then need to go away and say —

Mr Attwood: Let us say, for the sake of argument that there will be one Department, one justice Minister and devolution of powers relating only to everything that has been agreed so far. Could you do that in 12 months' time?

Ms Miller: I cannot give you an answer because you have not clarified with certainty what you are asking for.

Mr Attwood: Do you have a draft implementation plan ready?

Ms Miller: I have already said in the document that we are not yet in a position where it is possible to draw up a detailed implementation plan.

Mr Attwood: Do the various Departments and bodies that you deal with have a draft implementation plan? Given that the discussion document came out in February, is there work in progress in those agencies towards producing an implementation plan? Could that work be brought together?

Ms Miller: Each of the various agencies is examining what is necessary to deliver devolution. How detailed that plan will need to be, and what will need to be done, varies according to the agency, for example, where it is positioned. Also, it is possibly slightly easier if it actually is an agency rather than, say, part of the Lord Chancellor's Department. Therefore the circumstances vary according to the individual agency and where it is situated.

Certainly, the agencies have started to examine and work on that. So too has the NIO. However, none has put forward a detailed implementation plan. It is not possible to produce one at present. That is part of the reason that the earlier we have firm decisions on issues, the better.

Mr Attwood: Given that one party maintains that there must be a period of proof on the issue of policing before devolution of justice can be reached, are you saying that if, for the sake of argument, that period of proof expires only 12 months after the Assembly is restored next March, you would still need a significant period of time after that because, by that stage, many issues that you say must be defined might still be up in the air? Are you saying that even a year after there has been proof — a year after restoration — you would still need further time in order to bring about devolution of justice and policing?

Ms Miller: Clearly, the decision on when a request is made lies in the hands of the Assembly, rather than the Government. I am simply saying that a considerable amount of preparatory work must be done. That work has been started. However, as we have said in the discussion document, it will take time. Whatever the date of any request or decision about the timing of devolution, the earlier that is and the more certainty that there is in the scope and structure of the proposals, the easier it will be for us to plan and to begin to process them.

I understand that that does not answer your question. However, it is the only answer that I can give you at present.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): I remind members to keep their questions short. There is quite a bit of work to get through.

Mr Cobain, do you have any questions?

Mr Cobain: I will make it short, Chairman — no.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): Are there any other questions on that particular subject? If not, we shall move quickly to North/South protocols.

Mr David Hughes (Northern Ireland Office): Our submission contains a copy of the intergovernmental agreement on criminal justice co-operation, which I am familiar with. I am not in a position to comment on the other agreements on sex offenders and policing and co-operation protocols in other areas.

The agreement is quite straightforward in that it sets up a structure that allows the Ministers responsible for criminal justice in Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland to meet and to take forward work jointly, to commission work jointly and to have a working group in both jurisdictions. It is actually quite a simple arrangement, which has been designed and drafted with that intention because it is an agreement between the UK and the Irish Government. It would not have effect once policing and justice is devolved. However, it is drafted in such a way that the decision can be taken by the Minister for justice here to maintain structures and continue the way of working that it sets out. There is nothing to stop that happening.

11.15 am

The Chairman (Mr Hay): The next section of the paper is quite large. Are there any general questions on the entire section?

Mrs Foster: The paper mentions that project groups have been working on several areas. Have any of those groups produced papers, or are they still works in progress?

Mr Hughes: The language that we used when drafting the Intergovernmental Agreement on Criminal Justice Co-operation was designed to set up project groups with specific remits. In practice, the groups have comprised senior operational and policy officials from the respective jurisdictions who meet to discuss issues in general and have become fora.

The groups regularly report to the working group and to Ministers. Those reports have been quite basic, outlining when the groups met, what they discussed, noting opportunities to share good practice and identifying areas of work where members can better understand how their opposite numbers operate. That is the nature of their operation. A project has not been the groups' focus.

Mrs Foster: Did the memorandum of understanding on sex offenders come from one of the working groups, or was it Minister-led?

Mr Hughes: The memorandum was led by — and jointly issued by — the Home Office and the Department of Justice, Equality and Law Reform. We have an interest in that because it is a particularly pertinent issue.

Mrs Foster: You said that, if devolved Government comes to Northern Ireland, there are ways of empowering to Ministers to have North/South co-operation. What procedures will be put in place for east-west co-operation? Issues such as the movement of sex offenders affect the whole of the UK. Offenders may come through Northern Ireland and on to Scotland, England or Wales.

Mr Hughes: A Minister for justice could decide to maintain the structures that are currently in place under the agreement. There is no requirement to allow for different circumstances where responsibility for criminal justice has been devolved, neither are there any deliberate changes to the way that the system operates to account for devolution. It would be for a Minister for justice to decide whether to maintain those structures, in agreement with the Irish Government, if that is what the Minister wanted to do.

I am not aware of any particular plans for east-west procedures in the event of devolution of policing and justice.

Mrs Foster: If a Minister for justice were to decide to engage in North/South co-operation, are you saying that there will be no east-west co-operation?

Mr Hughes: I am saying that there is no structure for that. That is not what the intergovernmental agreement (IGA) is about, so I cannot comment on an east-west aspect. I am not aware of what the arrangements would be between a Department of justice in Belfast and the Home Office or Department for Constitutional Affairs in London. I am not aware of the plans in that regard. I am not sure that there are particular plans for that at the moment because, again, the co-ordination and communication that would be required on that issue must be addressed in the preparations for devolution. I am not aware that the issue has been addressed yet.

Mrs Foster: For example, there may be an issue that will be discussed between London and Dublin, but not with Belfast; that is what I am getting at. There could be a gap. If an issue is being discussed in a European context, and something needs to be discussed between London and Dublin —

Mr Hughes: I imagine that those issues will have arisen in relation to devolution in Scotland. There must be a precedent for the way in which the Home Office and the Justice Department in Edinburgh ensure communication on issues. If there are issues to be discussed between London and Dublin, I am sure that those issues may have implications elsewhere.

I am being slightly vague because I am not aware of whether there is any formal arrangement at present. It is mostly informal.

Ms Miller: Those issues are governed by a memorandum of understanding between the constituent parts of the UK. Without having done any preparatory work on the matter, I imagine that such a memorandum would certainly be required between a Department of justice in Northern Ireland and the Home Office, and possibly also between the Justice Department in the Scottish Executive. All issues that need to be covered in that way would be identified in that memorandum.

Mr G Kelly: I assume that there is an unlimited capacity to expand North/South, and indeed east-west, relationships and harmonisation.

Mr Hughes: The Minister for justice and the Executive will presumably decide how to progress any structure. The structure that we are describing is simply the one that currently exists.

Mr Attwood: You characterised how the project groups report to Ministers. Just as a memorandum of understanding on sex offenders exists between the British and Irish Governments, one could anticipate that various initiatives may be taken on any of the issues that the work programme covers. Other than having conversations and scoping issues, is anything concrete coming out of the work programmes?

Mr Hughes: I am not aware of any memorandum of understanding emanating from those work programmes. Their particular benefit has been increased communication; practitioners and officials have been in touch with each other far more than they were in the past. That has been fruitful because awareness of practices and issues has increased. I am not aware that anything has been formalised or signed by both sides.

Mr Cobain: I want to pursue the issue of memoranda of understanding and protocols between the British Government and the Government in the Republic. Most police officers believe that sharing information, not only throughout the islands but also throughout Europe, is probably the best way to tackle large-scale criminal empires. Is it not a bit restrictive to have a protocol between a Minister of justice in Northern Ireland and the Minister for Justice, Equality and Law Reform down South and to have separate protocols between Northern Ireland and the Home Office, Edinburgh and Cardiff respectively? Is there not a case for having protocols between the islands rather than separate relationships? As far as fighting crime is concerned, I do not understand why the relationship is restricted to an island resource.

Mr Hughes: The document on criminal justice co-operation does not intend to limit communication and co-operation. It describes a structure that encourages them, because it is useful to identify issues that are particularly relevant to both jurisdictions.

Mr Cobain: When you say "both jurisdictions", do you mean Northern Ireland and the Republic?

Mr Hughes: Yes.

Mr Cobain: Are the issues that are relevant to those jurisdictions not the same in the rest of the United Kingdom?

Mr Hughes: I hesitate to say that they are necessarily the same.

Mr Cobain: I assume that the issue of sex offenders, for example, is the same for all jurisdictions.

Mr Jim Strain (Northern Ireland Office): That is the case because there is coterminous legislation in the South and North, and, indeed, in the rest of the UK, to reflect that. However, although other issues may not be in any way less important, there are some matters on which the South does not have reciprocal legislation. That is why the Home Office pushed for legislation to provide for the registration of sex offenders and the tracking of their movements between the South and the UK. As David said, one can imagine that other matters may be purely North/South issues.

Mr Cobain: What is the difference between tracking sex offenders and tracking major criminals?

Mr Strain: As David said, there is no difference as such; it is simply that the legislation on sex offenders exists.

Mr Cobain: I do not wish to labour the point, but that measure seems somewhat restrictive. It looks as though, purely for political reasons, there are to be protocols for Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland, and separate protocols for the rest of the United Kingdom. Major crimes, not only on this island but across Europe, are becoming ever more sophisticated and complex. Police forces throughout Europe and throughout these islands are seeking closer co-operation. Except for political reasons, I cannot see why there should not be protocols throughout these islands, rather than on a North/South basis alone.

Mr Hughes: I am not sure that we can answer that question.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): If there are no further questions, we move to the next matter, which concerns a concordat between Her Majesty's Government and the Northern Ireland Executive on the independence of the Public Prosecution Service for Northern Ireland.

Mr Hughes: The draft concordat is attached to the NIO paper and sets out the key points of the arrangements provided for in the Justice (Northern Ireland) Act 2002 and the Justice (Northern Ireland) Act 2004. It simply expresses the provisions of a concordat for the purposes of maintaining the settlement provided for in those Acts.

Mrs Foster: With respect to the Director of Public Prosecutions (DPP), it is important to bear in mind that, if the Bill currently going through the House of Commons is passed, the DPP will have a huge influence on whether a suspect is tried by a jury or by a judge sitting alone. I notice that the DPP will be appointed by the Attorney-General. Are any further accountability mechanisms envisaged in relation to the appointment of the DPP? Can the delegation add anything else on that matter?

Mr Hughes: I cannot really add anything on that matter. The arrangements are those set out in Justice (Northern Ireland) Act 2002.

Mrs Foster: I wish to ask a general question about the architecture of the criminal justice system in Northern Ireland, which obviously derives from Westminster. Members have discussed the devolution of criminal law to the Northern Ireland Assembly. Arguments have been made for the maximum degree of devolution, including control over existing and new offences.

As far witnesses are concerned, will the architecture of the criminal justice system in Northern Ireland continue to reflect that decided by Westminster or will there be fundamental changes, such as changes to the court system, etc? Will Northern Ireland retain the architecture of the British legal system? When changes are made to criminal law, Northern Ireland has usually been included with England and Wales.

Mr Hughes: Decisions on the criminal law and the institutional architecture of the criminal justice system will be devolved. Concordats in relation to prosecutions and the judiciary are intended to maintain the appropriate level of independence.

Mr G Kelly: I would like to take that document away for further consideration. It is a draft, and I will return to it later.

Mr Attwood: I have just one question, to which I cannot recall the answer. Who appoints the Attorney-General for Northern Ireland?

Mr Hughes: The First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, acting jointly, make that appointment.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): If there are no other questions, we can move to the next matter, which concerns the Life Sentences Review Commissioners.

Mr Tom Haire (Northern Ireland Office): The paper mentions a point of detail about how the review of life-sentenced prisoners will proceed, within the context of a power for confidential information to be deployed. Were that confidential information deployed, arrangements would be in place for the Secretary of State to deploy it, as opposed to a Minister of justice. As the update states, that matter sits within the overarching arrangements on the provision of information on national security. There is no specific draft proposal on that particular provision, which sits within a more general approach to national security information.

11.30 am

The Chairman (Mr Hay): If there are no questions on that section, we will move on the next section, which is the clarification of offences under the Justice and Security (Northern Ireland) Bill.

Ms Miller: Again, unfortunately, my colleagues who have more expertise on these policy issues are busy elsewhere. Therefore, it might be best for members to give me their questions on the information that has been provided, and I will take them back to those colleagues who are better able to provide answers.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): Do members wish to ask any questions?

Mr G Kelly: I will come back to the officials on this issue.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): The next issue is the remission of sentences in Northern Ireland.

Mr Haire: The paper provides information about proposed changes to the Northern Ireland (Remission of Sentences) Act 1995. There are, in fact, no proposed changes to the Act. The sentencing proposals that Mr Hanson announced last week will affect only those offences committed after the introduction of the new legislation. Therefore, the Northern Ireland (Remission of Sentences) Act 1995 will be untouched.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): Do members have any questions?

Mr G Kelly: I want to elaborate on that issue. You said that the Northern Ireland (Remission of Sentences) Act 1995 will remain as is, but I was not quite clear as to the meaning of the remainder of your remarks.

Mr Haire: The Northern Ireland (Remission of Sentences) Act 1995 will continue to apply to anyone convicted of a qualifying offence committed before the introduction of the new legislation.

Mr G Kelly: What will happen after that?

Mr Haire: Any offence committed after the introduction of the new legislation will not come under the provisions of the Northern Ireland (Remission of Sentences) Act 1995.

Mr Attwood: My question is about timing. Announcements have been made about the new arrangements. Has an indicative time frame for when parole boards might be in place been considered? Is that kind of detail too premature?

Mr Haire: I can give an indicative timetable. The Minister's intention is to draft and consult on the proposed legislation, and, subject to the outcome of that consultation, enact the legislation in 2007. A parallel exercise to resource the new provisions will have a bearing on the legislation's implementation, but, at the moment, that is the indicative timetable.

Mr Attwood: What will be the terms of the parole board's structure and accountability?

Mr Haire: The proposals that I mentioned previously will suggest that the Life Sentence Review Commissioners assume wider responsibilities. There are requirements in law for the commissioners to present annual reports to Parliament and so on.

Mr Attwood: Is that not an excepted matter?

Mr Haire: No.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): Do members have any other questions on this section? The next section is the purchasing of police weapons in Northern Ireland.

Ms Miller: Again, I am afraid that colleagues from the policing branch were not available to attend this meeting. Therefore, it will be best if I were to take members' questions back to my colleagues. I am aware that, as some subgroup members are also members of the Northern Ireland Policing Board, they may be better qualified than I on this issue.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): Do members have any questions?

Mr Attwood: I wish to make the comment that the SDLP does not agree with the interpretation of the law that is presented in this note. Our interpretation of the law, the Patten Report and the Exchequer purchasing requirements is that those matters fall within the Policing Board's authority. The SDLP does not accept the laboured legal advice produced to justify the NIO's assertion.

Ms Miller: I can certainly take that back to my colleagues.

Mr G Kelly: If the Policing Board is in charge of the budget, does that have an impact on the Chief Constable's decisions on buying weaponry? What is the impact of the Policing Board having power over the budget on issues such as that? Can the Board refuse to pay?

Mr Strain: Do you mean a police grant, Mr Kelly?

Mr G Kelly: For example, could the Policing Board decide not to accept a spend of £2 million on a particular item?

Ms Miller: I cannot say, because it is not my area of expertise. However, colleagues in the policing division will be happy to expand on that. I am sure that we will address that specific point.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): Do members have any other questions?

Mr Attwood: I was not going to elaborate, but I should say that the Policing Board decided to purchase a water cannon and new-issue personal weapons, but when it came to other potential police weaponry, tensions arose between the Policing Board and others about where responsibility for purchasing lay.

In addition, the Chancellor's purchasing regulations state that the public body should determine novel or contentious purchases. Clearly, weaponry may well be novel and contentious.

The SDLP believes that the interpretation of the law has been stretched in order to conclude that the decision should remain an operational matter. The SDLP thinks that, in financial and broad policy terms, it is a matter for the Policing Board. That is what we have been advised. The NIO has legal advice suggesting otherwise, although it acted differently before it came up with that legal advice.

Chairman (Mr Hay): Do members have any questions? We need to move on quickly to the issue of military support for the police in Northern Ireland?

Ms Miller: My colleagues who deal with that area are elsewhere, but I am more than happy to reflect questions or comments back to them.

Mr G Kelly: Sinn Féin is against the British Army being used in public order situations because there is a substantial anomaly. The Police Ombudsman can, at least, investigate policing situations in which plastic bullets — which my party also opposes — are fired. However, the Ombudsman cannot investigate situations where plastic bullets are fired by British Army personnel, even when they are acting in a back-up role to the police. The Police Ombudsman cannot investigate the British Army, which is one of the reasons why the Army should not be there.

Mr Attwood: Contrary to what a member at this table once claimed, the SDLP opposes any role for the British Army in the North.

I always enjoy the way some of these papers are drafted by the NIO and other officials. The words "focussed support to the police" are used followed by examples such as explosives, the Patten Report, and military support in public order situations.

I would like confirmation of all the anticipated examples. Somewhere in the system there must be a number of case studies or examples of when the police will be required to call upon Army support. What are those examples — over and above emergency situations, such as a simultaneous strike by all the emergency services, and the examples contained in the Patten Report? In what other circumstances would the military provide focussed support to the police?

Mrs Foster: I will not defend whatever answer the officials give, but I do not see how anybody can give an exhaustive list of circumstances in which the military will be required. Nobody knows the circumstances that may arise in any given situation. Indeed, the paper states that:

“When and in what circumstances support will be required will be an operational decision for the Chief Constable”.

It is fair enough for Alex to look for more examples, but it is not possible to provide an exhaustive list.

Mr Attwood: I would like some more examples.

Mrs Foster: Fair enough.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): We will move on to the next section, which deals with guidance to the Police Ombudsman.

Mrs Foster: This issue was raised because it seemed that two people — the Secretary of State and the Minister for policing — would issue statutory guidance to the Police Ombudsman. That matter has been well enough explained. The only exception might be in circumstances involving a national security issue, in which case the Secretary of State would issue guidance. I am happy enough with the guidance that has been given.

Mr G Kelly: Given that the Office of the Police Ombudsman is the main accountability mechanism for investigating police action, the power to issue guidance should taken away from the Secretary of State and devolved to the incoming Minister. The note clarifies the issue, though.

Mr Attwood: The SDLP believes that the Police Ombudsman should have the power to investigate personal security matters. She has that power at present, as demonstrated this week through the investigation into the murder of Stephen Restorick, which involved national security intelligence and a national security agency. Therefore, the real issue is much less about who issues the advice — although that is important — than it is about maintaining the Police Ombudsman’s current power to deal with complaints involving national security matters.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): We now move on to firearms legislation.

Ms Miller: I am afraid that it is the same story with this issue, too. The note gives a reasonable outline of where matters stand, but I am happy to take a note of any further questions and reply to the subgroup later.

Mrs Foster: Looking back to what we discussed last week, the issue was about whether fireworks would be dealt with in the same way as explosives, and whether responsibility for fireworks should rest with the Minister with responsibility for public safety or the Minister for policing and justice.

Ms Miller: I can certainly pass on your questions. I am trying to think of what we said in the discussion document, but I do not think that we specifically referred to fireworks. We talked about explosives and public safety.

The Committee Clerk: The Committee on the Preparation for Government agreed in the summer that responsibility for firearms should rest with the Minister with responsibility for public safety.

Mrs Foster: That covers explosives and fireworks then?

The Committee Clerk: Yes.

Mrs Foster: That is fine then.

Mr G Kelly: It was later clarified that, for some reason, it was not the Minister in charge of public safety, but the Minister in charge of health.

Mrs Foster: It is the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety.

The Committee Clerk: It is to do with employment safety.

Mr G Kelly: That amounts to the same thing.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): Mr Cobain, do you have a question?

Mr Cobain: Can we come back to that issue?

The Chairman (Mr Hay): OK. As there are no further questions, we will move on to the Court Service and financial arrangements.

Mr Hughes: As the response document sets out, the Court Service is currently financed by the Department for Constitutional Affairs. When responsibility for justice is transferred, the financial burden for a justice Department will be transferred also. Therefore, the financial burden will rest with the Executive and the Department of Justice, which will be responsible for financing the Court Service.

11.45 am

Mrs Foster: Is the money for a justice Department additional to money for the block grant?

Mr Hughes: The block grant would then be added to; the money will go with the functions.

Mrs Foster: That was the issue.

Mr G Kelly: Will the money be negotiated for as part of the block grant or will the block grant be sorted out separately and the money for a justice Department, as appropriate to the amount, will be extra?

Mr Hughes: The money is attached to the functions currently carried out by the NIO, the Court Service, etc. It will be matter of identifying the money that is attached to the function and moving that money from the Whitehall Department that currently operates the function.

Mr Cobain: How much money are we actually talking about?

Mr Hughes: The current indicative is between £131 million and £132 million, because it includes the legal aid budget. That sounds quite a lot of money, but it includes legal aid money for the costs of the courts.

Mr Cobain: Will the money be absorbed into the Northern Ireland block grant?

Mr Hughes: That is my understanding.

Ms Miller: Yes, it would transfer into the block grant. It would become part of the Northern Ireland block, so there would be a bigger block.

Mr Cobain: Would the money be ring-fenced or will it form part of the block grant? Would the Assembly priorities run after that?

Ms Miller: I do not know the answer to that.

Mr Hughes: I have never heard anyone discussing ring-fencing and money being attached to functions. It is just the understanding that that is the —

The Chairman (Mr Hay): It is something that we could clarify.

Mr Cobain: We need to, because money follows functions.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): It is something to clarify.

Ms Miller: I agree with David.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): We need to clarify whether it is part of the block grant or separate.

Mr Cobain: The problem is that, once we assume the responsibility for justice, it must be carried through, and we will have to find the money from the grant. If there are any restrictions on the grants, it will have implications for the whole budgetary system. We want to know.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): We move on to the last section, which is the Northern Ireland Executive on the independence of the judiciary of Northern Ireland?

Mr Hughes: The draft concordat between Her Majesty's Government and the Northern Ireland Executive on the independence of the judiciary in Northern Ireland is attached to the end of the response document.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): We are dealing with at the moment. It is the last item on the agenda.

Ms Miller: That is the last question that I had.

Mr Strain: Is there another question, Chairman?

The Chairman (Mr Hay): There is. I have it on my paper.

The Committee Clerk: It is the draft concordat on the independence of judiciary.

Mr Hughes: It follows exactly the same as the concordat on the independence of prosecution. It sets out what is currently in the Justice Act 2002 and the Justice Act 2004.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): Do members have any questions?

Mr G Kelly: I have not had a chance to read the concordat, so I will come back to it later.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): I thank the officials very much for their time and apologise for keeping them at the start of the meeting.

The evidence session ended at 11.48 am.

SUBGROUP ON WORKPLACE 2010 AND PUBLIC SECTOR JOBS LOCATION

Thursday 14 December 2006

Members in attendance for all or part of proceedings:

The Chairman, Mr Edwin Poots
Dr Esmond Birnie
Mr Thomas Buchanan
Mr John Dallat
Mr Pat Doherty
Mr Robin Newton
Mrs Pat O'Rawe

Witnesses:

Mr Kieran Bannon	}	Northern Ireland Public Service Alliance (NIPSA)
Mr John Corey
Mr Jim Lilley
Ms Janette McNulty
Mr Tommy O'Reilly	}	Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP)
Mr Chris Thompson

The subgroup met at 11.06 am.

(The Chairman (Mr Poots) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Poots): I have received an apology from Mr William Hay, who cannot attend the meeting. Mr Tom Buchanan is deputising for him today.

The next item on the agenda concerns the minutes of the subgroup's meeting on 7 December, which was chaired by the Deputy Speaker Mr Molloy. I do not know whether those minutes are correct or whether the staff have recorded them. Do those members who were present wish to propose that the minutes are an accurate record of that meeting?

Mr Dallat: I propose that the minutes are correct.

Mrs O'Rawe: I second that.

The Chairman (Mr Poots): Is the subgroup satisfied that the minutes represent an accurate record of its proceedings of 7 December?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Poots): Does any member wish to raise an issue that arises from those minutes? One such matter has been drawn to my attention, which relates to the revised procedures for subgroups. Those procedures were agreed by the Programme for Government Committee at its meeting on 11 December.

Members are advised that, in addition to agreeing on the chairing of subgroups, the Programme for Government Committee agreed that where a member attends a subgroup meeting that is held in private to deputise for another member who is not yet ready to leave, the deputising member should be allowed to sit in the gallery in place of a party researcher until the other member leaves the meeting. There should be no more than one member and one researcher per party in the gallery at any one time.

I invite members to offer their comments and views on the revised subgroup work programme, which is in members' packs. It has been suggested that we schedule a contingency meeting on 3 January in the event that the draft report is not finalised at the meeting planned for 21 December. Do members have any thoughts on the programme that has been set out? Do members wish to pencil in a meeting on 3 January?

Mr Doherty: Must we have a meeting on 3 January or during that week?

The Committee Clerk: That date is a contingency in the event that the subgroup does not conclude its business next Thursday. The subgroup is due to present its report to the Programme for Government Committee on 3 January.

That is the expectation, and that is what we are all working to. I thought it advisable to say to members, as a contingency, that if the subgroup needs to have a meeting then that is the last possible date, given the Christmas holidays, etc. It is just a suggestion. Members may be confident that they can conclude the business next Thursday and that there will be no need for a meeting. Members are, of course, entitled to nominate substitutes.

Mr Doherty: If the subgroup concludes next Thursday, the report will not be available for members to read. Do we therefore need to have another meeting?

The Committee Clerk: If all of the business is concluded today, the Committee staff will draft the report over the weekend, and it will be issued to members next Tuesday.

The Chairman (Mr Poots): Would the subgroup still need to clear the report?

The Committee Clerk: Yes.

The Chairman (Mr Poots): Therefore, the last date on which we can meet is 3 January 2007.

The Committee Clerk: Yes, the papers have to be lodged with the Committee on the Programme for Government by then.

The Chairman (Mr Poots): So, in a sense it is Hobson's choice.

Following last week's meeting, advice has been received from the Assembly's procurement service regarding the possibility of calling the four remaining bidders for the Workplace 2010 contract to give evidence. The advice is generic and, by necessity, is not informed by the circumstances particular to the subgroup or to procurement.

It is highly unlikely that bidders would disclose details of their proposals or provide information that they consider commercially sensitive during the course of questioning by the subgroup.

It is also highly likely that the competition rules protect the bidders from disclosure of such information, and the subgroup would therefore be in breach of those rules. It is now an established principle within the freedom of information environment that information relating to active procurement processes is protected until the conclusion of those processes, and even then, only successful information is generally released.

As the request for information is occurring prior to evaluation of the tenders, the subgroup would be exposing itself to accusations of influencing the evaluation process by compromising commercial confidentiality or by unduly influencing the evaluation process, which will have been heavily prescribed in the contract documents and for which the subgroup has no responsibility.

Finally, and most importantly, in the opinion of the Head of Procurement, bidders responded to the stated need, as described in the specification and evaluation process. Therefore, whether the issues concerning the subgroup have been addressed is not isolated to the bidders' determinations but is much more influenced by the process conducted by the client — the Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP), supported by the Strategic Investment Board (SIB). If those issues are substantive to the requirement then they should have been fully described in the procurement strategy, tender specification and evaluation methodology.

For the subgroup to better understand whether the issues have been given due consideration in the Workplace 2010 project, the Head of Procurement recommends that the SIB and the Workplace 2010 team are asked to demonstrate, from the project initiation document, the procurement strategy, specification and evaluation methodology, how, and to what degree, the issues will be addressed.

In summary, the Assembly's Head of Procurement recommends that the subgroup does not call the bidders to give evidence as it would expose the subgroup to procurement and probity risks. It is also, for commercial and process reasons, unlikely to achieve the objectives of the subgroup.

That is the advice we have received and it is fairly clear. Has anyone anything they wish to say on it.

Dr Birnie: I have two points.

First, we have to take that advice. It is pretty comprehensive and detailed. On a related point, and possibly other members are in the same position, I have received approaches from two of the bidders for a personal briefing. In the light of the above advice I will be turning down those requests.

Mr Dallat: Chairman, I am very disappointed that I was only contacted by one of them.

Dr Birnie: Only one contacted me yesterday, Chairman.

Mr Dallat: I would certainly be influenced by Esmond's point. That is not something with which I feel comfortable.

11.15 am

Mr Doherty: Like John, I was contacted by only one of the bidders. That contact stopped with the office staff, and I was not going to comment on the list.

The Chairman (Mr Poots): Robin, how do you feel about the advice that we received?

Mr Newton: I declared last week that I had been contacted months ago. I have not been contacted since then. I understand fully and concur with the advice. However, I have two areas of concern within the overall context of the award to the successful bidder, which may well result in companies who currently work for the Civil Service losing contracts and jobs. I note the indication that efforts will be made to ensure that the successful bidder absorbs some of that loss, but there is no guarantee.

The successful bidders have indicated that they will rely on local suppliers. However, that is easily said when making a bid. I want an assurance that, when awarding the contract, those persons currently contracted to us retain some form of connection — although I do not know how that would be done. The successful multinational organisation should ensure that, where possible, use is made of local labour and companies.

The Chairman (Mr Poots): That is a good point, which should be raised with the Department of Finance and Personnel later, because it will ultimately make the recommendation. Perhaps the subgroup could say something about the response that we received from the Department.

Do any other members wish to comment on that issue?

Mr Doherty: Is it not predetermined that one of the four bidders will be awarded the contract? Is that not what this meeting is about?

The Chairman (Mr Poots): That is a matter for the Department. Are members content with the advice that we have received?

Mr Doherty: Chairman, you say that it is a matter for the Department. Where then does the work of the subgroup sit?

The Chairman (Mr Poots): The Department is carrying out the work, and we, as a subgroup of the Programme for Government Committee, have been asked to examine that. The work of the Programme for Government Committee is to establish a Programme for Government. If the subgroup decides that it disagrees wholly with the Workplace 2010 strategy, for example, that view would be passed on to the Programme for Government Committee. If the Executive were established, it may wish to take cognisance of that decision, bearing in mind that it was the four main parties in Northern Ireland that made that decision.

However, at present, the strategy is being taken forward by direct rule Ministers and the Department of Finance and Personnel. The view of the subgroup is not unimportant, but they are taking the decisions. However, the parties in this room could take those decisions at a later stage.

We move to subgroup procedures. It was agreed at the subgroup's meeting on 7 December to issue letters inviting the Northern Ireland Public Service Alliance (NIPSA) and the Department of Finance and Personnel to present evidence on Workplace 2010 and public sector jobs location. Letters were also issued seeking written submissions from the Committee on the Administration of Justice and John Simpson, and papers from the respective Administrations on the experience of decentralisation in Scotland and the Republic of Ireland. Each request sets out details of key issues that were identified by the subgroup at its meeting on 7 December. The remainder of today's meeting will be concerned with the consideration of those oral and written responses.

The subgroup will shortly call representatives from NIPSA and departmental officials to give evidence on Workplace 2010 and on public sector jobs location.

Before calling the witnesses to give evidence, members may wish to allocate questions or they can ask questions as they wish — I am in your hands on that. A series of questions has been produced that you may or may not wish to use.

Dr Birnie: We should use our own discretion.

The Chairman (Mr Poots): Each session will last for approximately 45 minutes, with five to 10 minutes for questions and answers. The NIPSA witnesses will be first. The meeting will adjourn at about 1.00 pm to allow Mount Charles to set up lunch. I propose that we eat our lunch and return to the table as quickly, and with as little interruption, as possible. There are some technical matters to be attended to by Pi Communications, and as soon as that is completed I would like to restart the meeting.

After lunch, the key issues will be the matters that will have arisen from the oral evidence session; then we will move on to the written submissions. At the end of the session, the subgroup and the staff will summarise the key issues and draft the report. Time allocations are important today, because Hansard needs to provide transcripts of this morning's evidence session, which will assist the drafting. We are working to an exceptionally tight deadline of 3 January, and it is important that we get through the work as quickly as possible to allow the staff to concentrate on the detail.

We would like your views on the layout of the proposed format of the draft report that was agreed by the Programme for Government Committee, a copy of which is being circulated around the table. All the subgroup reports have similar layouts.

The Committee Clerk: As the Chairman says, the report pretty much follows the standard format, although this subgroup is one of the first to draft a report. However, it is reasonably conventional and not dissimilar to previous experiences. Last week, members of the subgroup agreed that it should be short. I understand that the Programme for Government Committee has encouraged its members to encourage their parties to think in those terms, given that the Programme for Government Committee also has six such reports to consider in a very short time.

The Chairman (Mr Poots): Are members happy with the format?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Poots): Members may want to discuss the draft in private session, bearing in mind that when it is finished most of it will be available to the public.

A letter from the Secretary of State about the provision of advice and information to the Programme for Government Committee and its subgroups is being circulated around the table. The subgroup may wish to note that the letter states that while departmental officials:

“may provide factual briefing and describe the key elements of Government policy on particular issues, it is not their role, nor should they be requested, to provide the Committee or its sub-groups with confidential information, Departmental or personal views or generally to do anything other than support current Ministerial policies.”

I see a little confusion on members' faces, particularly about the line on expression of views. Please take a moment to read the letter; I had the misfortune to read it yesterday.

Do members have any comments that they wish to place on record?

Dr Birnie: It circumscribes what the DFP officials can say to us, but that is probably inevitable.

The Chairman (Mr Poots): It is the Secretary of State's instruction to them, so they will have to follow it.

Mr Dallat: Chairman, the paragraph that you read out merits some response. We must record our concern. It almost leads me to believe that we are wasting our time.

Mr Doherty: The letter mentions confidential information, which leads us to suppose that there actually is confidential information. If we are to do our job properly, we must know whether there is another agenda apart from our agenda.

Mr Newton: The Programme for Government Committee has accepted it, and we are operating as a subgroup of that Committee. While I may feel otherwise —

Mr Dallat: By saying nothing, though, the subgroup is giving the impression that it approves of this letter.

The Chairman (Mr Poots): I will put the matter to the subgroup then. Do members want to note our dissatisfaction at the content of the letter from the Secretary of State?

Mr Dallat: I propose that the subgroup notes that. I do not want it to appear that we agree with it.

The Chairman (Mr Poots): Are we all agreed?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Poots): We now move to declarations of relevant interest — membership of councils and so forth does not apply here. Does anybody have a directorship in any of these companies? [Laughter.]

Nobody has anything to declare.

Mr Doherty: Does declaration of interest include a political opinion?

The Chairman (Mr Poots): I do not think so.

We are now ready to move to the evidence session with the Northern Ireland Public Service Alliance (NIPSA), who will provide evidence on Workplace 2010.

The Chairman (Mr Poots): Lady and Gentlemen, you are very welcome.

I am Edwin Poots, the Chair of the subgroup. As such, I am independent, so I will facilitate the meeting rather than enter into debate. Witnesses will have five to 10 minutes to give evidence, and members will have 20 to 30 minutes to pose questions.

I remind members — and advise witnesses — that under schedule 1(8) to the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006, members' statements are granted qualified, not absolute, privilege. However, given that witnesses who appear before a subgroup of the Transitional Assembly are not members, their evidence does not attract the qualified privilege that is provided for under schedule 1(8) to the Act. I do not expect that we will need to worry about that; nonetheless, I must explain the rules.

11.30 am

Any one who speaks should identify themselves so that the Hansard staff, who are producing the report, can pick up their names. I will now hand over to Mr Corey. Members will have the opportunity to ask questions after he has given his evidence.

Mr John Corey (Northern Ireland Public Service Alliance): I am John Corey, the general secretary of the Northern Ireland Public Service Alliance (NIPSA). I thank the subgroup for giving us the opportunity to present evidence on Workplace 2010 and on the location of public sector jobs.

We submitted a short briefing paper, which I assume is available to the subgroup. In that, we focus mainly on Workplace 2010 because it is the issue that is of most urgency to civil servants. We also have major concerns about the location of public sector jobs in the context of the review of public administration (RPA). There are direct connections between those issues.

The second paragraph of our submission summarises eight key points for consideration on Workplace 2010, and we expand on those points in the subsequent paragraphs. The Department of Finance and Personnel and the Strategic Investment Board, which are responsible for Workplace 2010, will present — and have done so — it as a groundbreaking project that will provide, in their words, “a modern flexible working environment”. As the trade union that represents civil servants, we have no reservations about wanting them to have good quality, modern accommodation. At the same time, NIPSA is not opposed to open-plan offices. The majority of civil servants have always worked in such environments, and the majority of them who are below the rank of deputy principal work in open-plan offices. Therefore that idea is not new to us.

However, we do not accept that modern, open-plan offices for the Civil Service can be secured only via a private finance initiative (PFI) project, or, in this case, a total-property PFI project. We set out our principal arguments against the proposal in our written submission; however, I will not repeat those now.

Workplace 2010 proposes to sell off for all time almost all the Government's wholly-owned office accommodation in Northern Ireland. That is a massive decision. In the long term, that decision has unforeseen consequences and implications. No one can predict exactly what the requirements or needs of public services in Northern Ireland will be in 20 years or 25 years.

However, there are immediate and foreseeable consequences of the total-property PFI-deal proposal. We have identified those consequences in our written submission.

I want to emphasise three points in addition to those raised in the written submission. NIPSA stands by its argument that the cost to taxpayers of a private finance initiative (PFI) will always be higher than properly organised traditional procurement. Last week, the Northern Ireland Audit Office (NIAO) published a report confirming that there is already a £1.5 billion PFI debt to be repaid out of the Northern Ireland block grant over the next 20 years. The Workplace 2010 programme has the potential virtually to double the liabilities for a future Northern Ireland Administration, be it devolved or otherwise. NIPSA contends, therefore, that such a level of PFI debt will curtail the capacity of any devolved Administration to determine where money should be spent on future priorities. We are concerned about the sheer scale and size of Workplace 2010.

Whatever arguments may be made in favour of PFI for specific buildings, to sign up to it for all Civil Service or public service office accommodation is, frankly, madness. It is not in the interest of anyone in Northern Ireland: it is not in the interest of public-service staff or the delivery of public services. As presented, the Workplace 2010 PFI programme can only be in the interest of the private shareholders of the successful company.

Northern Ireland needs maximum flexibility and control over its office estate. Fundamental policies on the location of public-service jobs in Northern Ireland have still to be determined. This week, I took delivery of a draft report on the location of public-service jobs from the Department of Finance and Personnel, which will be published for consultation, as I understand, in January 2007, and no decisions have been taken on the principles, policies or framework for that. NIPSA's argument is that it is fundamentally wrong, therefore, to enter into a Workplace 2010 contract that will fetter the flexibility that is currently available to Government in relation to the determination of the location of all Civil Service offices and Departments.

Secondly, an important part of the policy determination of the location of jobs will be the application of equality under section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998. There are other policy considerations, such as a new targeting social need (new TSN) policy, a regional development strategy, a guide to rural policy and the RPA itself. NIPSA submits that the equality impact assessment to date on Workplace 2010 does not discharge the Government's responsibilities under section 75.

We reminded the Department concerned that its duty under section 75 is to "promote equality", not to undertake a cursory check of the limited available data and make broad statements about adverse impact or otherwise. Given the scale of Workplace 2010 and, particularly in the context of the fundamental change in public services under the RPA, NIPSA submits that the equality impact assessment of Workplace 2010 should be exemplary in its application of the Act. That has not yet happened.

NIPSA also strongly believes that the equality impact assessment of Workplace 2010 cannot be undertaken in isolation from the equality impact assessment of the review of public-sector jobs, or, indeed, the RPA and the location of those jobs detailed in the paper about to be presented.

The third and final point relates to facilities management under the proposed Workplace 2010 contract. DFP and the Strategic Investment Board (SIB) are currently insisting — it appears to NIPSA — that facilities management, which affects 500-plus Civil Service staff, must be part of the PFI contract. Indeed, a DFP spokesperson has been quoted as saying that including the facilities management element and the staff in the contract — possibly forcing those staff to transfer to a private-sector employer — is in line with Government policy.

NIPSA respectfully submits that that is not in line with Government policy. The latest Government policy was published in March 2006 in a document entitled 'PFI: strengthening long-term partnerships'. At paragraph 5.58 it clearly states that:

"The Government's policy is that departments have the option of not transferring soft services staff in a PFI project, where they believe their transfer is not essential for achieving the overall benefits of improved standards of service delivery specified by the procurer, and where not transferring staff is consistent with delivering the Prime Minister's commitment to flexibility in public services provision."

The fundamental point that NIPSA wishes to raise is that to date, on Workplace 2010, DFP and SIB have not been following Government policy as stated. In our view, that policy requires the total separation of the facilities management element of a PFI contract from the rest of the contract. Properly, that should be assessed wholly independently and separately.

Those are the three points that NIPSA wishes to emphasise in addition to all that we have said in the written submission.

The Chairman (Mr Poots): Thank you. As is practice, we shall go round the parties first, and then members will be free to ask further questions.

Mr Newton: What has the trade union experience been with similar programmes in England and Scotland? What has been the impact of new technology, the freeing-up of space, the embracing of hot-desking and the opportunity to work at home?

Mr Corey: The most famous — if famous is the right word to use — example of PFI contracts on the provision of accommodation is a similar project for the Inland Revenue/Customs and Excise. The company that secured the contract was Mapeley, and the Inland Revenue was severely reprimanded by the Public Accounts Committee for entering into that contract. Mapeley was Bermuda-based and not paying any relevant taxes in the UK, yet it was taken on to provide accommodation services for the Inland Revenue at the time.

11.45 am

With regard to NIPSA's experience of these so-called modern, open-plan offices, I am not familiar — my colleagues may be — with any research or analysis of how they work in practice. In the Clare House pilot project — part of the Workplace 2010 plan — significant difficulties arose in trying to negotiate arrangements that were acceptable to staff. According to my latest information, there are more staff than desks — or workstations — in that building. There has been no resolution of that. Our members report that they cannot work, in practical terms, without being assigned a workstation of their own.

New technology tends to occupy more office space, rather than less. At least that has been the experience of many people. Previously, workstations would not have had technology around them.

There are mixed views about working at home. That can suit particular individuals at particular times, but there is no consensus on it. Recently, I met representatives of people with disabilities, and they argued against working at home. It can leave workers isolated and unable to enjoy the benefits of coming to a workplace.

Kieran may want to add to that.

Mr Kieran Bannon (NIPSA): I am the assistant general secretary of NIPSA.

The issue of hot-desking relates to one of our other concerns. On the Workplace 2010 project, the report from Deloitte, referenced in our submission, discussed the undertaking of two pilot exercises. It said that those pilot exercises should be fully and properly evaluated in order to decide whether the programme for Workplace 2010 should be rolled out across the Northern Ireland Civil Service. However, that is not the approach taken by the Northern Ireland Civil Service. Matters such as hot-desking arrangements and home working should be properly evaluated. Home working involves a raft of other issues: health and safety, the isolation of homeworkers and how they are managed. From a trade union perspective, there are many other issues. There is no home-working policy in the Northern Ireland Civil Service at the moment. NIPSA has just received a draft document on the subject.

NIPSA's concern is that much of Workplace 2010 is being forced through without proper evaluation and costing. The Clare House experience of hot-desking is such that, when members of staff were moving in, they were told that the IT connections were not working correctly and not up to the standards required. When some of our members raised that point, they were told that they could go to a hotel down the road and use its IT facilities. Those are the sorts of concerns that we have.

Mr Doherty: I have a substantial main question, and a short subsidiary one. What work has been undertaken to compare the cost of refurbishment through PFI as against the cost of the Northern Ireland Civil Service carrying it out on the basis of providing good-quality, modern accommodation? Have any comparisons been made? For my supplementary question, may I ask what percentage of civil servants your union represents?

Mr Corey: On the first point, NIPSA has not undertaken any such cost comparisons.

Data available to date relates to the outline business case, which has been used to justify the decision to proceed to the invitation to negotiate. Quite frankly, our view is that the outline business case was constructed to achieve an objective: to show that it would be financially beneficial to proceed with a total PFI property contract.

Arrangements for comparing the costs of a PFI proposition with a traditional in-house procurement arrangement make provision to add factors to the calculations. One such element is the optimum bias factor, which can be used to inflate costs when comparing one arrangement with another. As trades unions, we are sceptical about the validity of those cost comparisons.

We are wholly unconvinced that the projected costs and savings for the Workplace 2010 project will be realised. Significantly, the outline business case did not contain a proposition that staff would be transferred to the private-sector company. For some reason — we are not 100% sure why — between the outline business case and the invitation to negotiate being issued, it was decided that staff would transfer to the private-sector company.

We submit that, when the outline business case was prepared, there was no proper costing of the alternative comparator with a total PFI contract, in which staff would be transferred to the private-sector company, and an in-house procurement process. Furthermore, we are not convinced by the figures in the outline business case or that they can be realised.

The finances of the Workplace 2010 project are based on very shaky ground. I do not wish to stray into other areas, but the point should be made that entering into a total PFI contract, which ties up Civil Service accommodation for 20 years, makes no sense when maximum flexibility is required. If there is a desire to use PFI contracts for any Civil Service accommodation, those contracts should be on a building-by-building basis. That would allow each contract to be assessed separately, rather than committing the Civil Service to the project for the duration of the contract.

Can you refresh my memory on your last question, Mr Doherty?

Mr Doherty: What percentage of the Civil Service does NIPSA represent?

Mr Corey: NIPSA represents about 70% of all civil servants. Our total membership from the Civil Service is about 18,500 staff from a total of 24,500 non-industrial civil servants. NIPSA does not represent industrial civil servants.

Mr Dallat: Mr Corey, you will be aware that Civil Service jobs are being lost outside the greater Belfast area, not least in Coleraine, where the staff of Revenue and Customs has been completely wiped out.

In the House of Commons, Mark Durkan submitted a question for written answer about whether civil servants would be able to remain employees of the Northern Ireland Civil Service under the review of public administration and the Workplace 2010 project. David Hanson's response on 7 November 2006 was that the Civil Service:

"would be obliged to treat the refusal to transfer as a resignation."

Is that a very polite way of saying that NIPSA members will be sacked if they do not comply?

Mr Corey: You could put it in that way, but I assume that the Minister was seeking to explain that if staff are to be compulsorily transferred to a private-sector company, the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 2006 will apply. Where those regulations apply, and a person refuses to accept the transfer, that person would legally be deemed to have resigned. That is the ultimate legal point on the matter.

In order to be clear for the record, as I indicated in my earlier remarks, more than 500 civil servants will be affected by the proposed PFI contract. We have been engaged in extensive discussions with the Department of Finance and Personnel about the transfer of those staff, and have asked whether all staff would be expected to transfer and what the alternatives might be. Work is ongoing on that. However, those 500 staff have had no assurance that their Civil Service employment would be maintained or that some or many of them — many of whom are the lowest-paid staff in the Civil Service — would be forced to transfer to a private-sector company, with the loss of their Civil Service employment and the consequent risks to their pensions.

Government policy dictates that the examination of whether facilities management or soft services should be transferred as part of a contract requires entirely separate assessment and analysis from the rest of the PFI contract. Our essential demand is that facilities management be assessed separately. Moreover, we do not believe that facilities management should be included in the contract.

Under Workplace 2010, the private sector is to be given control and ownership for all time of Civil Service accommodation by dint of a Government decision; we do not like and do not agree with that. We strongly believe that the staff should be separated from that. There is no reason that the private sector could not own a Government building — not that we agree with that — but with those providing the services in the building, such as messenger, porter and mailing services, continuing to be Civil Service staff. That is our preferred and clear demand for the project.

Facilities management staff should be removed from the contract. We still believe that the contract is wrong for the other reasons that I have outlined, but that would be our approach.

Mr Dallat: On the same matter, Mark Durkan submitted a question for written answer in the House of Commons about the future of Civil Service staff at Waterside House, Carlisle House and Orchard House in Derry. In response, David Hanson wrote:

"Current planning assumptions are that the existing staff will remain in Derry. Under Workplace 2010 there are no plans to relocate these staff out of Derry."

On close examination, that is no promise at all. Is there a danger that there could be recentralisation rather than the decentralisation that we had hoped might come out of this? Is that of concern to your members?

Mr Corey: Absolutely. Workplace 2010 contains no policy on decentralisation. It in no way takes account of desirable policies of dispersal, rural development or targeting social need. Those matters are not being considered at all in the determination of Workplace 2010. That is our fundamental point.

We are concerned that, by signing up to a 20-year contract, the Government will lose their flexibility to consider matters of dispersal, equality, and rural development. The private-sector owner will have the major say on where buildings and staff are located.

If we are to determine fairly where jobs should be located in Northern Ireland as part of the review of public administration — and there will never be a better opportunity to determine fairness and equality in relation to the location of those jobs than the RPA — it is critically important that all Civil Service and public-service jobs are part of that consideration. The Government should have full flexibility to determine that.

12.00 noon

That critical flexibility will be lost for Civil Service accommodation if Workplace 2010 is agreed before next April.

Dr Birnie: Thank you for coming. Taking you back to Pat's question, the Government and the Department of Finance and Personnel will say that the outline business case shows that over the 20 years, PFI will create perhaps a £200 million advantage over traditional procurement. Is a large part of that apparent saving likely to come about through either a reduction in the floor space that is allocated for each staff member or through a qualitative reduction in provision? Will the quality of the working environment be reduced and could that lead to a reduction in the quality of service provision?

Mr Corey: I shall answer that in the first instance; then Kieran can pick up on the detail of the costings. The £200 million saving is at best a guesstimate; we cannot say that the savings will be in one area or another. As I said to Pat, under the outline business case, the optimum bias factor is used in the calculation of the cost. Using that factor, there is a great deal of scope to adjust figures to suit a particular end.

We still believe that PFI is not necessarily in the taxpayers' interests: we will not change our view on that. We are highly sceptical about the alleged £200 million saving. I remarked in our written submission that one person who had connections with a bidder said to me openly that Workplace 2010 was "a licence to print money". That concerned me greatly. I assume that he meant that the project is a licence to print money for the private sector — not for the taxpayer.

Mr Bannon: It is difficult for us to be precise about the quoted figures. You might have seen some of our announcements in the press in which we quoted figures. To use what I understand is a good political term these days, the figures that appear on the websites of the Strategic Investment Board and the Northern Ireland Civil Service do not add up. We are concerned that some of the figures show an automatic £0.8 billion profit for the private sector.

Picking up on some earlier points, and again with reference to Mr Doherty's questions, we are concerned about the unitary-charge element of the contract. Indeed, we have expressed concerns that the Government office standard accommodations — to which you have referred where standards of space are concerned — appears as a one-size-fits-all standard. Civil servants assure us that that is not the case; however, in the document that was released to the private sector, one table appears in the invitation-to-tender document.

It sets out one standard of accommodation. In fact, we have had meetings with the private sector, and it is not breaching any confidentiality to say that we raised concerns about the one-size-fits-all approach.

Indications are that most people would admit that a one-size-fits-all approach is not possible. For example, a different standard would need to be applied to a general office situation as opposed to a laboratory or to the office of a planner who works with large-scale maps.

It appears that this standard provides an opportunity for the private sector to increase charges significantly. It may be prepared to pick up a requirement that deviates slightly from the standards and run with it at a cost to itself. However, it will charge excessively for additional requirements that are significantly different from the agreed standard. We have had experience of that in the Civil Service already in the Driver and Vehicle Testing Agency (DVTA).

I come back to the point about the comparison between PFI and normal procurement. My colleague John Corey referred earlier to the Mapeley contract. Figures produced in relation to that project show that, by Mapeley's own evaluation, the HM Revenue and Customs portfolio was worth £220 million in 2001. It now stands at £566.6 million — a significant increase, and a loss, we would argue, of £346 million to the taxpayer. That loss is only over a five-year period. This contract will last for 20 years. If that sort of loss were to happen in Northern Ireland, there would be significant losses to the taxpayer.

There are other examples of PFI contracts here, both in the Northern Ireland Court Service and in the Health Service. This year both organisations decided not to renew contracts, which covered a two- to three-year period. At least they had the ability, under those contracts, to move services back in-house on the same premise that NI Civil Service management is arguing that Workplace 2010 should move them to the private sector — that standards of service are better and there is less cost to the taxpayer.

The Chairman (Mr Poots): Do any members who have not yet asked a question wish to do so? Does any member who has asked a question wish to ask a follow-up one?

Mr Doherty: From reading all of the material that we have and from my understanding of it, there are two big issues — decentralisation and privatisation. In this situation I am in favour of decentralisation and against privatisation. On decentralisation, the Scottish Executive, in their written submission, make it very clear that as a policy position they will:

"assist areas with particular social and economic needs."

The material from the Twenty-six Counties, while not as specific, indicates that that is the thrust of what they are doing. How does the trade union relate to that information?

I see from your material that 60% of the population live in the greater Belfast area and that 59% of Civil Service jobs are based in Belfast. That seems to match, but the information is being shown as percentages and does not take into account social and economic need. Also, many people have to travel into Belfast, which complicates and skews the figures. My core point, with regard to decentralisation, is about the policy requirement to assist areas of economic and social need.

Mr Corey: I can say unequivocally that NIPSA supports decentralisation and dispersal of jobs where that is and can be clearly and objectively justified under section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 and in relation to targeting social need, rural development policy and other relevant policies. I am clear about that.

I also recognise that there can be tension between that statement and the views and concerns of our members. I am certain that our members in the greater Belfast area would have strong views if the ultimate application of that statement were that x thousands of jobs had to be transferred from the greater Belfast area to west Tyrone.

Mr Doherty: Not if they went to Omagh or Strabane.

Mr Corey: If the policy of dispersal and the decentralisation of jobs is objectively justified, it will have to be implemented. That is our approach.

Workplace 2010 operates against the policy of dispersal and decentralisation in very simple terms. I do not know whether the Government's proposed consultation on the guiding principles for the location of public sector jobs, which is about to be published, is available to the subgroup. However, it seeks to establish policy, frameworks and principles on the future of public sector jobs in Northern Ireland, including Civil Service jobs. For the life of us, we cannot see how that policy can be addressed and determined while at the same time, under the current timetable, a contract can be signed with a private sector company — whether one company or a conglomerate — that curtails what the Government can do with their Civil Service accommodation.

We will know the answer in two or three years' time. If a devolved Administration wished to relocate a certain number of Civil Service jobs to a certain town, it would not be a question of considering the proposal's costs: the Administration would have to examine the contract with the private sector to find out what it could and could not do.

NIPSA has been told that flexibility will be built into the contract and that there will be a premium for flexibility. In other words, taxpayers will have to pay a premium to the private sector for the necessary flexibility — a fundamental issue in the location of public sector jobs — in a contract for property that the Government currently own. That makes no sense.

We can cope with PFI propositions for individual Government buildings. However, signing up for the total property of the Northern Ireland Civil Service is madness; it is not in the interests of people in Northern Ireland. If selling off Government property is such a good idea, why is the whole United Kingdom Civil Service not doing it?

Mr Dallat: I would like to ask about decentralisation. I am sure that you would agree that many of your members are among those who block the motorways into Derry and west Tyrone and everywhere else and that they are suffering stress as a result. They are constantly lobbying their politicians for transfers home.

Mr Corey: Yes.

Mr Dallat: Would you agree that there is much to be learnt from the Welsh model? Five hundred civil servants have been transferred from Cardiff to Aberystwyth, which is a town that I know well — it would suffer a great deal of social deprivation, were it not for the university. Do you agree that an affirmative approach to decentralisation is well worthwhile in the interests of the huge parts of the North that have been socially and economically disadvantaged since the foundation of the state?

Mr Corey: I repeat my point: the review of public administration's paper on the location of public service jobs is a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to change, to promote equality and to address all the other issues. NIPSA is deeply concerned that that opportunity will be unnecessarily fettered by Workplace 2010 in itself, forbye all the other issues that we have raised.

Mr Bannon: We have already highlighted the links with the RPA. Those links cannot be understated because the entire demographics of public sector jobs will be different as a result of that process. As the leading public sector trade union in Northern Ireland, we have been at the forefront of trying to advance that policy.

In 1991, we agreed a proactive approach with the Civil Service, although several documents produced since then have tried to get away from that position. That proactive approach was supposed to function was when the lease of a building ran out or when a new function was to be introduced. The areas where buildings and functions would be relocated were outside Belfast and the greater Belfast area. We considered that to be a pragmatic way forward.

When Tom King was Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, civil servants tried to put Ministers off the big-bang approach of moving to the north-west by showing that it would cost money. It may come as a surprise to Government, but equality costs money. We are certainly of the view that we need to be doing that.

Much of what is happening in the Civil Service is contrary to that at the moment. For example, the electronic human resources (EHR) project, with which members may be familiar, has meant another substantial contract of many years' duration. In fact, that contract cannot be walked away from for another 15 years. That contract sought to close a branch in Derry that had been relocated 10 years previously for the specific purpose of decentralisation. We are concerned about the approach of senior civil servants to that issue.

The Chairman (Mr Poots): Our time is up. Thank you for your presentation and for responding to the questions. I have no doubt that your views will feature in the subgroup's report, which will be produced in due course. Your views will be recorded in the Hansard report.

The subgroup will now have a presentation from officials from the Department of Finance and Personnel. Members should be aware that the same arrangements as regards privilege apply: subgroup members have qualified privilege; witnesses do not. However, I am sure that nothing will be said that will cause any concern.

I am glad to welcome Chris Thompson, director of DFP's corporate services group, and Tommy O'Reilly, programme director of Workplace 2010. The officials will make a 10-minute submission, after which members will ask questions.

Mr Chris Thompson (Department of Finance and Personnel): We welcome the opportunity to make a presentation on Workplace 2010 and the work that we have done on the location of public sector jobs to the subgroup. We have provided a background paper, which includes a draft of our consultative document on the location of public sector jobs. The aim of the presentation is to help the subgroup understand the context of Workplace 2010 and to assure the subgroup of the ability of the programme to positively contribute to the agenda of an incoming Executive.

For the benefit of members, I shall place Workplace 2010 in context as part of the wider reform of the Civil Service. Workplace 2010 aims to improve the way in which we manage, lead and provide services. A series of programmes and projects is aimed at providing better human resources, better accounting facilities, better information and communication facilities and making good cost savings in all those areas.

By providing a new way in which to manage Civil Service business, Workplace 2010 sits very much within that programme.

I must make it clear from the outset that much of our current office estate is very rundown and inefficient. Some of the estate is relatively new, but those properties tend to be the ones that we have leased, because we have neither built nor bought properties for many years. Therefore our better accommodation tends to have been leased to us. The owned office estate is generally old, inefficient and in need of investment.

Moreover, in the wider public and private sectors, both nationally and internationally, there is a move towards the workplace environment supporting better and more efficient services. That involves rationalising the estate into a smaller but more efficient set of buildings and moving to a largely open-plan environment.

We know that to do nothing is not an option. That fact has been recognised for a long time. To address the problem in the traditional manner would require a minimum investment of more than £100 million. The question is whether we want to take £100 million from money that would be spent on front-line services.

There is clear trend towards the use of PFI in the public sector. It is felt to be a more efficient and effective vehicle to deliver change, and, based on projects that have been undertaken over the years, there is now a considerable body of evidence to support that view.

We have looked at all the options available for implementing Workplace 2010, and the PFI option provided best value for money and was considerably cheaper than traditional procurement. PFI is therefore the solution that we propose to transform the office estate. The upshot is that we believe that the proposed solution could be broadly funded from current funds for the estate. Moreover, that could result in an injection of £250 million of capital into the Northern Ireland block.

From our point of view, the choice is stark. Do we want to remove £100 million from front-line services to fund this essential move forward, or do we want to provide an incoming Executive with £250 million of spending power to achieve the same result? Faced with that stark choice, we propose a PFI solution.

The package should include a fully integrated facilities-management service. In fact, most of these services, including cleaning, catering and security services, are already outsourced. However, messenger services and portage are not outsourced at present. We believe that those services should also be included in the PFI contract.

Decisions are still to be made, but we are working with the trades unions to minimise compulsory transfers to the private sector partner (PSP). I need to update members on developments on that matter, as we have now set an objective of having no such transfers.

That will mark a good step forward, which, if achieved, will largely take The Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations (TUPE) out of the equation.

The other big issue is dispersal. Many commentators, although not all, are committed to the dispersal of Civil Service jobs. Members need to understand, however, that dispersal costs money, and whether Workplace 2010 were in place or not, dispersal will require significant investment. However, we are committed, as and when decisions are taken, to facilitating dispersal as economically as possible through Workplace 2010 and the non-transferred estate. We believe that that provides the best vehicle for future decisions on dispersal.

That said, we cannot consider the location of Civil Service jobs in isolation from the wider public sector and the input of the RPA. Accordingly, we have produced draft proposals to guide decision-makers in those complex areas. Those have been copied to the subgroup, and those proposals will be issued for public consultation in January.

Moving to the progress that we have made on the project, the original outline business case envisaged contract completion by the end of 2006 and the beginning of 2007. After the outline business case was completed, we spent six months in consultation with Ministers and externally, so that period was taken out of the equation.

We began the formal procurement process in November 2005 with the issue of the Official Journal of the European Union (OJEU). We shortlisted four consortia in April 2006; we issued an invitation to negotiate in June 2006, and we received responses in November 2006. We are evaluating those responses, and the evaluation will be completed by mid-February 2007.

What happens then will depend on the outcome of the evaluation and on other external factors — a great deal of work will be required at that point to determine the next step. Broadly, we are assuming that we will take two of the four consortia through to best and final offer with a view to completing contractual business by the summer of 2007.

Finally, I would like to make it clear that we have conducted this programme in a totally open and transparent way, and we have kept the political advisers of the four main parties up to date as we have moved forward. We have carried out two public consultations on the subjects of the Stormont estate and on the equality impact assessment. We have been completely upfront and honest in our dealings, and we have listened to the views that have been put to us. I hope that the subgroup will regard Workplace 2010 as a positive contribution to the programme of an incoming Executive.

Mr Newton: I would like to ask some brief questions. Several companies that supply services will be affected when the final allocation is made. They are small local employers with a small labour force. What indications have the four consortia given that they would use local companies and local labour, particularly in the area of facilities management?

You will be aware of what the trade union said as regards the Inland Revenue allocated project. The union also quoted the situation in Clare House — I do not know where that is — with which it is not happy. It views the hot-desking situation there as very undesirable.

Some political representatives commented on the number of people working at home and the opportunities for facilitating that in order to free up space and to reduce the stress involved in travelling to work.

The trade union was quite disparaging about one previous successful bid.

Can you reassure me about protection for local employees and contractors working for the Civil Service and the potential to save space by hot-desking, home working and reducing stress?

Mr Thompson: On the first point, all the bids are from consortia, which comprise several companies.

In fact, 40 companies are involved in the four bids. Of those, 30 are based in Northern Ireland. Therefore, as each consortium has been built up, it has used local firms, and it intends to use local labour. There is no question of that. The consortia have established a presence in Northern Ireland. It is positive for the Northern Ireland economy in that it attracts more inward investment with this contract. Competition will be good. I am absolutely convinced that as a result of Workplace 2010, employment opportunities will be at least as good in the private sector, and there will be good opportunities for Northern Ireland companies to be involved in that process. Of course, we cannot insist on using any particular firm in a contract. However, it is absolutely clear that local firms have a big part to play in each consortium.

12.30 pm

The central procurement directorate started to move into Clare House about a month ago. I have been there several times. It is fantastic. If members would like to visit, we would be absolutely delighted to make arrangements. Just by walking around it, it is interesting to see the different ways of working. There has already been greater teamwork as people get together in little groups. It is not a single workspace — there are breakout spaces, little meeting rooms, conference rooms, table and chairs. All those positive facilities are already being used extensively.

We have not insisted that anyone should hot-desk. However, many people who work in Clare House are peripatetic workers. They work out of the office a lot of the time. Several of them have said that they do not need their own desks, and we are beginning to see this. There is plenty of touchdown space for them to come in, plug in their computer and work away. That facility is provided as normal. Staff are already saying that that is the way that they want to work. We are not making it compulsory for anybody. We are not telling anyone that he or she cannot have a desk.

Finally, an open-plan environment does not mean that one size fits all. I must make that absolutely clear. It is about the allocation of workspace by function rather than by grade. We accept that “by function” means that there will be people who need to work at drawings, for example, who will need more space. That is absolutely part of our plan. The accommodation is much more fit for purpose.

We visited many areas in Great Britain where similar projects have been undertaken. I have seen similar arrangements in dozens of buildings. You specifically asked me about that. I have never met anyone who has told me that that is awful and that he would rather go back to cellular accommodation. I have met one or two people who said that they missed having their own office, but they went on to say that they accepted that it was a more efficient and effective way of working and that they could not argue with it. It is remarkable that having visited so many such offices, I have never met one member of staff who said that he thought it was awful.

Mr Newton: The trade union was quite disparaging about the Inland Revenue. Can you comment on that?

Mr Thompson: The firm involved is Mapeley, which is an offshore business. The criticism was of tax avoidance. We cannot legislate as to who will or will not apply for competitions; what we can do is make sure that the full costs are taken into account. In our evaluations, we will be asking Mapeley about its tax position. Where its tax position shows that it will be avoiding paying tax we will take that into account in the price. In other words, we will compare like with like to ensure that no one is getting an advantage.

Mr Newton: You said that all the bidders had tied in some local companies to the contract. How tightly are they tied in? Do those links go live when the contract is awarded? A local company called ABC is tied in with whomever the major successful bidder will be. How tight will that link be?

Mr Thompson: We cannot tie that in very tightly. Even we are not tied into any of them. Contracts are let for a specific time and then they are competed for again. There is nothing to say that any of our current suppliers will still be a supplier in five years. Another local or national firm could beat them in a competition. We cannot legislate for that; that is how competition works. However, there is a tremendous opportunity for local firms here. We want to concentrate on ensuring that local firms get the support that they need to get these contracts and remain part of the competition.

Mr O'Reilly: When contracts are awarded for the main services we are looking at, there will be firm contracts in place. At the moment, all the bidders have selected partners whom they envisage as the main organisations to provide their services.

For example, for the refurbishment of the 18 buildings amounting to the expenditure of about £100 million to £120 million, the bidders have nominated organisations that they will be able to work with who will actually deliver the services. Before the contract is finally awarded, firm contract terms will have to be in place to make sure that the outcomes will definitely be delivered. The contracts will be the vehicle for stipulating the services to be delivered. At the moment, we have four sets of partners, all of them locally based. Whoever is awarded the contract will have the contract firmly in place and the services will be delivered to the local companies.

Mr Doherty: You made it clear in your submission that doing nothing was not an option. Then you went on to talk about the cost of £100 million and whether that money could be better spent. Having established the cost, I want to focus on the value that would result. Was any evaluation done of the cost of doing this in-house? If so, did you employ consultants in that process, and who were they?

If phase 1 is implemented, it will leave absolutely no room in phase 2 for any real decentralisation. What is your response to that?

Mr Thompson: We tend to contrast PFI against in-house options. A full and rigorous examination of the costs and benefits of those two options were considered at outline business case stage. We worked very firmly to the rigorous Treasury guidance on comparison. That comparison showed clearly that the in-house option would cost £200 million more than the PFI option. As that was the clear outcome of the outline business case, we have moved forward with the PFI solution. However, in taking those decisions, we are guided by the performance of PFI as opposed to traditional methods. The most authoritative guidance is the National Audit Office's 2003 report, which made a specific comparison between PFI and traditional construction. That report showed that, in traditional construction, three quarters of projects came in over cost and late; whereas in PFI, three quarters came in on time and to cost and, of those that came in late, only 8% were more than two months late. Those compelling figures came from the National Audit Office, and not from consultants; they are key statistics for Government in considering whether a PFI solution or a traditional solution is best.

We were, of course, advised by consultants, as would be the case with any project of such a size and nature. This is a highly complex area, and we need people who understand it fully, who have done it before, and who take previous experience into account. We have engaged a consortium of consultants to advise us on the project, which is led by Deloitte, including many very experienced advisers who have been involved in similar projects in the past.

No decisions have yet been taken on phase 2, which concerns the non-transferred estate, because we have not yet decided whether there will be a phase 2. However, the non-transferred estate contains most of our buildings and about 20% of our floor space. There is still considerable flexibility. However, that is not really the point as far as decentralisation is concerned. Our requirement for the private sector has included an obligation to cost now for the flexibility to vacate any building in the future — apart from a small core. The price will be predetermined through competition so that we will know what it will be. There is good competition between four keen bidders, and we believe that we can secure a good deal on the flexibility that is required to allow us to vacate buildings in the future.

As I said in my introduction, there will be a cost to dispersal or decentralisation. However, we are putting arrangements in place so that we will know the cost up front. The price will have been arrived at through competition, and that will give us the best vehicle for decentralisation and dispersal. It will not reduce flexibility; it will make it a much more straightforward and clear process with predetermined costs.

Mr Doherty: Do the four preferred bidders employ any of the same consultants that you employ?

Mr Thompson: One of the consultants that we employ was an employee of one of the bidders a few years ago

12.45 pm

He has declared that interest, and some of the other consultants who work with us have worked for some of those consortia. Those interests have been declared, and we have made sure that the consultant who used to be an employee of one of the bidders will be involved in a non-executive role in any evaluation. He will not be involved in scoring, for instance, nor in deciding who will move to the next stage of the process. That requirement has been put in place and has been made absolutely clear.

In addition, we have set up an independent compliance committee to look at how the evaluation process is being carried out. It comprises a non-executive director from one of the Departments, a person from the Office of Government Commerce, someone from the wider public sector in Northern Ireland and our Treasury officer of accounts, who is our most senior accountant. Their job will be to ensure that conflicts of interest are dealt with in a fair, open and equitable way.

Mr Doherty: Are you saying that there could be a conflict of interest?

Mr Thompson: I am saying that as long as conflicts of interest are declared, we can ensure that they cannot compromise the evaluation process.

The consultant that you mentioned will not be involved in scoring the bids or in the decision to shortlist or to award to any particular consortium.

Mr Doherty: I want to pursue that point. Are you are saying that you have employed consultants, with safeguards, who are employed by the preferred bidders?

Mr Thompson: No; they are not employed by the preferred bidders at this point; they had some connection with the bidders in the past through doing work for them. I am sorry; I totally misunderstood your point. No one who works for us is employed by one of the bidders. I can categorically assure you of that.

Mr Dallat: I could not help noting, Mr Thompson, that you have quoted the Northern Ireland Audit Office (NIAO) several times; perhaps that indicates an improving relationship.

However, last week the NIAO published a report that is very worrying for future generations, who may be up to their neck in debt for the next 50 years as a result of some PFIs. What evidence is there that future generations will not be up to their necks in debt over private contracts?

Mr Thompson: I assume that you refer to Balmoral High School. I will answer the question first in general, then specifically.

We can bandy good and bad experiences back and forth about PFIs and traditional procurements. For every bad experience with a PFI contract, believe me, there are matching bad experiences with traditional procurement contracts, which have cost the taxpayer millions. We must learn lessons from those bad experiences, whether through PFI or traditional procurement routes, so that we do not repeat the mistakes of the past.

The contract for Balmoral High School was for a school with a certain number of pupils, and the number has since halved and is likely to fall further. That is not a new problem. There have been cases in Great Britain where people have contracted for more places than they need.

From the point of view of Workplace 2010, that was the point of our taking a phased approach — of not going for 100% of our accommodation upfront. We are contracting for accommodation that will facilitate 18,000 staff out of a total of 28,500. I simply cannot envisage a Civil Service that will employ less than 18,000 staff in the foreseeable future.

We have learnt that lesson, although there are other lessons to be learnt. We carried out a full evaluation of all the issues that were raised in the various National Audit Office reports, and we have ensured that those issues have been taken care of in our project.

Mr Dallat: Just as the needs of education change, so do the needs of Government. I wonder what changes might come about in the next few years that will cause similar problems.

Can you give us the estimated average monthly unitary charge that will go to the private sector as a result of Workplace 2010?

Mr Thompson: I am sorry; I cannot. All the firms have tendered bids; therefore I cannot go into details on a matter that is part of that bidding process.

Mr Dallat: I was simply asking for a projection.

What are priority frontline services? Can you elaborate on the terms and conditions of the contractor requirement on the private-sector partner to share profits with the Northern Ireland Civil Service?

Mr Thompson: Frontline services are the direct services that people interface with daily: health, education, social welfare, tax, motor tax and so on. We want public funds to be used for those services, as far as possible.

What was your second question?

Mr Dallat: My second question was about the sharing of profits. I am thinking in particular of the car park at the Royal Victoria Hospital and similar fiascos.

Mr Thompson: I take your point completely. The contract will contain mechanisms to deal with that matter. Tommy may like to deal with the issue in more detail.

Mr O'Reilly: Several mechanisms have been built in to deal with what we deem excess profits. We are considering the deal from a public-sector perspective and trying to ascertain what would be a reasonable rate of return, and that is being dealt with in a competitive environment. We will measure the company's profits annually, and if they exceed the amount agreed in the contract, clawback provisions will come into effect.

If, during the lifetime of the contract, the company sells the property that we sold to them for over and above the price that it paid for it — or the company is granted planning permission that allows it to use the property for different purposes — the public sector will share in the profit.

If the special purpose vehicle changes its contractual status, and, for example, the property is sold on, the public sector would again have opportunities to claim back any additional profit. Contractual structures are in place to ensure that the public sector gains from any additional benefits that the company may make during the period of the contract.

Mr Thompson: With your indulgence, Chairman, I would like to respond to another of Mr Dallat's comments.

I am 100% certain that there will be change in the Civil Service in the next 20 years. The first PFI deal of this nature was done in Great Britain, and it involved the then Department of Social Security in Great Britain, which is now the Department for Work and Pensions. The contract was agreed in the early 1990s, and it has run for 12 or 15 years now.

During the period of that contract, the Department of Social Security changed dramatically because it merged with the old Department of Education and Employment to form the Department for Work and Pensions. That was a massive change, and the contract to deal with it was renegotiated.

In its report on that process, the National Audit Office made it clear that the contract was a fantastic deal for the Department because it allowed it to incorporate the new — and totally different — Department. There is no doubt that there will be changes; however, an ample number of precedents has been set to allow us to deal with those changes positively — even to the satisfaction of the National Audit Office.

Mr Dallat: I wish to inject an element of positivity. The SDLP is concerned that decentralisation has not been front-loaded into Workplace 2010. Like other political parties, we have also expressed our concerns and made suggestions for the project, about which you already know. Do you understand how the SDLP is amazed that decentralisation was not a key factor in the process? Could recentralisation emerge from it, given the flexibility of the private contractor?

Mr Thompson: The contract is not about decentralisation or recentralisation; it is about providing a new working environment. It must allow for decentralisation, but I am not aware of any plans for recentralisation in the greater Belfast area. The contract can be used positively as and when decisions on decentralisation are made. When that happens, we stand ready to use this contract positively so that we can contribute.

Mr Dallat: I am sure that you are aware of the disappointment that was felt in the previous Assembly when the Department of Education offered to transfer from Bangor to Belfast, but the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety did not respond to that offer. Following the example of the National Assembly for Wales, which facilitated the transfer of approximately 500 Civil Service jobs from Cardiff to Aberystwyth, is there not an absolute need for some sort of directive? Are you aware of the massive regenerative effect that that has had on an area of Wales that has suffered as a result of economic decline in sectors such as farming?

Mr Thompson: We have had some good experience of those situations. I was in charge of the project to set up the pensions centre that brought over 300 jobs to the Carlisle Road area of Derry, resulting in tremendous regeneration. Therefore I have had personal involvement in that sort of process. As civil servants, we must be ready to move quickly when political decisions are made, and that is what we want to do.

Dr Birnie: In 2005, a figure of £200 million was quoted in the outline business case. Has that been revised since?

Mr Thompson: Not formally, but we look at the costs and benefits at every stage and then revise them. We have not revised the outline business case. However, post evaluation, when we have greater clarity on the process and before we move into the final stage, we will revisit those figures so that it is clear that we have an affordable project that meets our requirements.

Dr Birnie: Will a new, more up-to-date figure be released into the public domain?

Mr Thompson: Yes.

Dr Birnie: It is an immensely difficult task to project costs and benefits over a 20-year period, and, like any venture of that nature, that task is vulnerable to assumption. I hope that a sensitivity analysis would be conducted to see by how much those projections are subject to risk. If the projections are subject to risk, is £200 million a central estimate? If so, what is the worst-case scenario, and, at the other end of the projection, what is the best-case scenario with regard to the net gain or net loss to the taxpayer?

1.00 pm

Mr Thompson: I will pass over to Tommy in a moment, as he may have more detailed information, but I agree that a sensitivity analysis is essential. The key risks are set out and the project team considers the potential cost of each. In fact, the estimated £200 million saving includes the costs associated with a series of identified risks. That is a median-case, not the best-case, scenario. That is how things are done.

Mr O'Reilly: As regards the overall figures, each option is broken down into its key components and a series of sensitivities is applied. For example, if construction costs are set at £120 million, we would apply sensitivities to determine what would happen to that figure if labour costs were to rise by 20% per annum or if the cost of materials changes.

As Chris said, £200 million is the median figure. While compiling the outline business case and as part of the evaluation process, we are stress-testing the work to ensure that we have a thorough understanding of the potential costs. That work will roll forward into the revised business case, which we will draft after the evaluation has been completed.

Dr Birnie: What is the worst-case scenario?

Mr O'Reilly: For which option? Remember, we are talking about a series of options.

Dr Birnie: The preferred option.

Mr O'Reilly: If we apply the key sensitivities to the PFI option, we should not end up in a position that is worse than the public-sector comparator — assuming that the public-sector comparator remains stationary, because if we apply the same sensitivities to the public sector comparator, its position will alter too. Applying the major sensitivities to the preferred option shows that it is still value for money for the public sector.

Dr Birnie: Is all of that analysis included in the published outline business case?

Mr O'Reilly: Much of it is, but it is work in progress.

Dr Birnie: May I press you again on the important issue of clawback? In a case in England a private contractor for a group of buildings sold the contract on and made a profit of about £300 million. What percentage of clawback are you talking about?

Mr O'Reilly: We will negotiate that with the provider. We have included our position on clawback in the draft contract, and all the bidders have been asked to comment on it in their bids. The final position will be the subject of negotiation, but we want to move to a position that is much more favourable to the public sector.

Dr Birnie: How much does dispersal cost per job?

Mr Thompson: It is impossible to give a general figure. An evaluation of the dispersal to Derry — the one before the dispersal to Carlisle Road in the city — is in the public domain. The cost per job depends on several factors, such as how many staff would move to the new location. The bricks-and-mortar cost is only one element of a sizeable cost. People will argue that the resulting social benefit makes it a cost worth paying. However, that is a matter for political debate. When we have concrete proposals, those can be clearly costed.

Dr Birnie: It is not unreasonable to assume that the cost-per-job move could be at least £20,000. Additional staff relocation costs may push that figure up towards as much as £100,000 per job.

Mr Thompson: I do not want to comment on specifics. One can make some assumptions based on the PricewaterhouseCoopers (PWC) work, which is in the public domain. However, should the Executive want us to, we could take a couple of specifics and give options on how that would be done in various scenarios and produce costs.

Mr Newton: Would the percentage clawback be agreed only when the successful bidder is notified and not while the contract was being negotiated?

Mr O'Reilly: We have given the four bidders a draft contract that sets out our views; they have been asked to comment on acceptability. They are being driven through a competitive process. In the next phase, we will move to agree most, if not all, of the terms while we are still in a competitive environment before the contract award. In that sense, the bidders have to deal not only with what they would like to do from a commercial viewpoint but with what their competitors may be doing. Through that process we get maximum value for the public sector. Ultimately, however, the contract is only with one bidder.

Mr Thompson: We could end up negotiating with two different bidders to get to their absolutely final positions, which may be different. We would take those into account in the final evaluations.

Mr Newton: That is slightly different from what you said to Edwin. I had picked up that the clawback would be discussed with the successful bidder, rather than as part of the negotiation process.

Mr O'Reilly: Perhaps I did not explain it properly.

Mr Newton: Am I right in thinking that 59% of Civil Service jobs are situated in the greater Belfast area and that greater Belfast comprises 60% of the population of Northern Ireland?

Mr Thompson: We have provided members with a table showing the location of public sector jobs, but I am not an expert in this area.

Mr Newton: One of your colleagues quoted those figures last week.

Mr Thompson: Neither figure —

Mr Newton: If we assume that those figures are correct, or nearly correct, why are we talking about decentralisation at all?

Mr Thompson: It is a political issue, and one which I —

Mr Newton: Is it purely a political issue?

Mr Thompson: The issue has economic, political, staff and public service elements.

Mr Newton: We are discussing an economic package. You were upfront about the economic benefits; but the decentralisation aspect is a political issue.

Mrs O'Rawe: My questions have all been whittled down because we have already covered issues concerning consultants, decentralisation, the PFI procurement saving of £200 million and whether conditions would be attached to contracts constraining the sale of office accommodation during the contract. What will happen when the contract expires?

Mr Thompson: A considerable proportion of our accommodation is leased, so when a lease runs out, we decide whether to apply for an extension, to make a different deal or to move out of the building. At the end of that period we have complete flexibility as to what we want to do. Who knows what the Civil Service will look like at that time?

Mrs O'Rawe: Could the property revert back to the Civil Service?

Mr Thompson: No. The ownership will pass to the private sector. These are office blocks, not buildings of significant cultural value. I should make that clear.

The Chairman (Mr Poots): Time is going by, but we could have a couple more questions.

Mr Doherty: Section 16 of the Department's submission entitled: 'Workplace 2010 & Public Sector Job Location Position Paper by the Department of Finance & Personnel' states that:

"All future decisions on the location of public sector jobs will therefore be subject to equality screening and to consultation on the outcomes of the screening."

The emphasis is on "All future". Does that mean that the proposals have not been subjected to such screening and consultation?

Mr Thompson: It does not. Workplace 2010 has been subjected to the most rigorous equality screening and full equality impact assessment that I have ever seen. That was carried out independently, and we have consulted widely. The Department has organised forums for people to give their views. It has taken views in writing and from the political parties. All those views are being combined in a final equality impact assessment that will be produced in the New Year.

Mr Doherty: Therefore nothing is to be read into the words "All future".

Mr Thompson: No. That was specifically included to take account of the RPA.

Mr Doherty: Will the report be made available to the public?

Mr Thompson: It will be a public document.

Mr Dallat: In paragraph 8 reference is made to the benefit to the local economy in determining the successful bidder. I am sure that every member, even Robin, will agree that economic prosperity is not evenly dispersed across the North of Ireland.

Decentralisation of the Civil Service is but one means of trying to redress the inequality — and perhaps even the injustices — of the past. How decisive will it be in determining the successful bidder?

Mr Thompson: It will not be decisive. There are several criteria, but decentralisation will not be one of the main areas for evaluation.

Mr O'Reilly: There are two different aspects. In how it applies the different criteria the Department is bound by European procurement law. It is now unlawful to take into account local issues, such as where jobs are based or benefits to local communities, which were taken into account under the old regulations. The Department does, however, take into account benefits to the local economy and to the social fabric of Northern Ireland through the sustainable approach that bidders are adopting. Each bidder is obliged to set out details of how they approach corporate responsibility and their commitment to local producers and firms. That is one of the subcriteria that the Department asks about. However, benefits to the local economy cannot be considered at a higher level.

Mr Dallat: Were I a senior civil servant or a fully paid up member of a posh golf club in Belfast, I would not need to worry.

Mr O'Reilly: Pass.

The Chairman (Mr Poots): On that happy note, the subgroup will break for lunch. I am sure that, together with the NIPSA presentation, the Department's submission will contribute significantly to the subgroup's final report. I thank you both in the meantime.

(The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey) in the Chair.)

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): You are welcome. Can you please introduce yourselves?

Mr Brendan Harron (Irish National Teachers' Organisation): I am Brendan Harron, a senior official with the Irish National Teachers' Organisation (INTO). I am standing in for Frank Bunting, our Northern secretary.

Ms Avril Hall-Callaghan (Ulster Teachers' Union): I am Avril Hall- Callaghan, general secretary of the Ulster Teachers' Union (UTU).

Mr Mark Langhammer (Association of Teachers and Lecturers): I am Mark Langhammer of the Association of Teachers and Lecturers (ATL).

Mr Seamus Searson (National Association of Schoolmasters Union of Women Teachers): I am Seamus Searson, the Northern Ireland organiser for the NASUWT.

Mr Langhammer: Thank you for the opportunity to address the subgroup. I have provided members with a pack in case they are short of weekend reading.

The Association of Teachers and Lecturers is a union of 160,000 members from across the UK. It is a relatively small union in Northern Ireland. Although it has members from all sectors, the majority are concentrated in the grammar school sector; consequently, there has been a fairly robust debate on the issues.

I will make three points: the need for balanced intakes as the guiding principle for school admissions; how to reduce the high-stakes nature of transfer decisions that are taken at the age of 10 or 11, and to urge members to consider a delay; and to stress that what happens in school plays a relatively small part in explaining variations in education performance.

The ATL supports school intakes that are balanced in terms of social class and ability. There is reasonable academic consensus, and I have given members a considerable number of references in the file, showing that balanced intakes produce the best overall performance — not necessarily the best for those at the top or the bottom, but the best overall performance. Broadly speaking, the influence of one's peers and an atmosphere of aspiration help to achieve that, in addition to encouraging the retention of good teachers in schools. In Northern Ireland, however, a balanced intake is not easy. Crudely speaking, there must be either very large schools or some form of social engineering to achieve that.

Large schools tend to envelop well-off areas, disadvantaged areas and those in between, and because Northern Ireland is a rural country with a range of sectors, it has become Balkanised in its education system and tends to have relatively small schools. Notwithstanding the recommendations of the Bain Report, that is an obstacle.

In terms of social engineering, Ulster folk — Protestant, Catholic and Dissenter alike — tend to grate a little and do not sit easily with schemes of social engineering.

The ATL concurs with George Bain that the growth of integrated education at secondary level may bring about larger schools that, in turn, may help to achieve a balanced intake.

One small measure on admissions that the ATL asks members to consider is for a quota, or target, or some means to incentivise schools to take children who receive free schools meals. I think we could thole that as a society.

With regard to deferred, or delayed, transfer, for some time the ATL has been averse to making any detailed admissions criteria at the age of 11 because it is convinced that that misses the point. The age of 10 or 11 is too young to make life-changing decisions. Parents face high-stake decisions for their 10- and 11-year-old children, and we support the Education (Northern Ireland) Order 2006, which recommends that key education decisions be made at the ages of 14 and 16. If decisions on key pathways are to be made at the ages of 14 and 16, logically, those are the ages when transfers, or at least fluidity, between schools should occur.

We support and recommend the concept of middle schools, or junior schools, not because we are obsessed with institutions, but because we believe that they would be a useful institutional way of providing for a delay in transfer. We do not like to close down young people's options.

Delaying transfer, with or without junior high schools, is a popular option. The BBC 'Newsline' poll this year, and successive Northern Ireland Life and Times Survey reports since 2003, have indicated that between 63% and 69% of parents support delaying those major education decisions. I do not want to bat your heads with statistics. However, the ATL believes that that figure includes people who are for and against transfer.

With regard to the effect of education, the ATL cautions against overestimating the degree to which schools can affect performance. There is significant academic consensus that up to 85% of the variation in pupils' performance is down to factors outside school, such as parental support, culture, income and social class. That is not to say that schools have no influence — they do. However, even the school improvement campaigns estimate that although effective schooling does have an impact, it does not have a huge effect on variations in performance.

I will not address the issue of pupil profiles; I will rely on my colleagues to do so, because we agree on the issue. I thank the subgroup for its time. I understand that some members will speak at an ATL seminar on 12 January 2007, at which we will explore the grounds on which consensus might be reached.

10.00 am

Ms Hall-Callaghan: I want to pick up on what Mr Langhammer said and elaborate on pupil profiles. I welcome the opportunity to address the subgroup. I want to emphasise the Ulster Teachers' Union's continued opposition to any form of academic selection. That has been the union's consistent policy for many years. We are delighted that the subgroup wants to examine what will happen after the termination of the existing transfer procedure.

The UTU views the pupil profile as an excellent tool, when it is used properly. However, if it is not used in the way that it was intended, it could become a dangerous weapon. Indeed, if the pupil profile were to be hijacked and turned into a selection instrument, all the good work that teachers have already done to develop it could be lost.

The pupil profile is simply an extension of the kind of ongoing assessment that teachers already make about pupils in every school. Its standardisation will benefit us all. It should give a broad and balanced picture of a young person's strengths and interests and of what he or she has achieved to date across a range of curricular and extra-curricular activities.

Teachers are concerned about the workload implications, and my colleague Brendan Harron will pick up on that. However, I am sure that those obstacles can be overcome through the appropriate negotiating machinery. Teachers, particularly those in the primary sector, welcome the prospect of a wider curriculum at the top end of the primary school. They will embrace the pupil profile as they have embraced many worthwhile initiatives over recent years because they consider it as a way to ensure that parents have the fullest possible information to advise them of the best pathway for their children.

I must emphasise that teachers will not allow themselves to be put in the situation where the professional advice that they give will be used in a selection situation. In fact, teachers have indicated to the UTU that if any pressure is put on them to do that, they will refuse to co-operate.

The UTU is convinced that even if the pupil profile were not finalised on time — and I understand that it has run into difficulties — it is still possible for teachers to supply sufficient information to advise parents of their children's strengths and weaknesses, because that, after all, is one of a teacher's professional competencies.

In addition, the UTU concurs with the ATL that there is an imperative: there is a radical change in the public's perception of transfer at the age of 11. It is a high-stakes decision at the age of 11 and it is too early for that decision to be taken. The concept of lifelong learning has impacted on traditional views on the time frame for education. With regard to career pathways and important choices for children, the time is right to shift emphasis from the age of 11 to the age of 14.

I hasten to add that even at the age of 14, it should be an elective rather than a selective system. That change of emphasis would reduce the impact of the pupil profile at the age of 11, if there are any concerns about the fact that there might only be a couple of years of profiling for the first intake going through. That would take a bit of pressure off the situation.

The public sector in Northern Ireland is facing an unprecedented period of change. Schools must, and will, change. Rationalisation is an inevitable fact, whether we like it or not, and the traditional institutions, particularly the grammar schools, must adapt to customer demand. When so many aspects of our lives are client driven, it is incredible that in this one very important area of life we still allow the institution, rather than the customer, to make the choice.

Before I turn to the admissions criteria, I would like to raise the important issue of funding. One challenge will be to ensure that collaboration between providers is not hampered by a system whereby schools are competing for funds based on pupil numbers. That matter must be radically overhauled to suit the needs of our new system.

Many people see the choice of admissions criteria as critical to the success of future post-primary arrangements. The Ulster Teachers' Union agrees with the four broad categories outlined in the consultation document, and I have supplied the subgroup with the union's full response to that document.

Not all schools will wish to use all the approved criteria, and the Ulster Teachers' Union firmly believes that the tie-breaker is the only compulsory criterion that should be included.

Family-focused criteria are important and should feature as a high priority, and the geographical criteria support the idea of a school serving a local community. The Ulster Teachers' Union want to ensure that, where possible, young people are not denied access to their local school, if that is their preferred choice.

We are perfectly happy with either of the tie-breakers that are listed — the random and the geographical criteria. If we were forced to choose between the two, we would narrowly opt for the geographical criteria on the basis that that would serve the interests of local community schools.

The Ulster Teachers' Union is strongly apposed to the selection of pupils by means of interview or entrance test. Compulsory criteria should apply to all schools, and there should not be any optional interview or entrance test.

As I said earlier, pupils should be choosing schools, not vice versa.

Finally, I wish to make a heartfelt plea on behalf of teachers. Please act with urgency to submit a consultation document to the teachers' unions as soon as possible. Teachers will do all in their power to implement policy, but they need time to prepare for it. At present, teachers are in a state of limbo. They need direction, and they must be reassured that there is no going back to the 11-plus or anything like it, and they need to know what lies ahead.

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): Thank you. We have another two presentations to hear, so I will hold questions until the end. I am conscious of the time and that members are keen to ask questions, so I ask witnesses to please keep their presentations as precise as possible. There will be a question-and-answer session after the presentations.

Mr McNarry: Members have been asked to declare their interests for the record. Do any of the panel have interests to declare? For example, do any of them work for somebody else or are they members of boards, and so on? It would be useful to have a little background. We know who the witnesses are officially representing, but they may be members of other groups or boards.

Mr Langhammer: I will declare my interests. I am a director of Monkstown Boxing Club, a life member of Crusaders Football Club and —

Mr S Wilson: I would be ashamed of that.

[Laughter.]

Mr Langhammer: I am proud of it this year, Sammy.

I am also a member of the Irish Labour Party, and I serve on its national executive.

Ms Hall-Callaghan: I am not a member of any political party, nor am I on the board of any school.

Mr Searson: I am the same.

Mr Harron: Likewise.

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): We will move to the next presentation.

Mr Harron: I represent the Irish National Teachers' Organisation, which has approximately 6,500 members in Northern Ireland. The INTO has been, remains, and always will be, opposed to academic selection, and we welcome its cessation after 2008.

The INTO supports the whole thrust of the reorganisation of post-primary education. We envisage the situation, post-2008 and on a rolling-out basis, in which the post-primary school a child selects will be increasingly irrelevant. The context in which the INTO wishes to address the subgroup on the two questions is as follows: the new curriculum; and the implementation of the Entitled to Succeed policy, and the entitlement framework through which every 11-year-old child — regardless of the post-primary school they choose — will be offered a broad and similar education up to the age of 14, and that all children, at the age of 14, will be able to choose from a healthy balance of 24 vocational and academic subjects for GCSE, and 27 subjects for A level.

The INTO supports the concept of a pupil profile, and, as Ms Hall-Callaghan said, it is merely an extension of what presently exists. We have made several comments on pupil profiles in our briefing paper and in responses to consultations on the issue. The pupil profile must be manageable: it is not at present. In September, I read an independent evaluation of the pupil profile commissioned by the Council for the Curriculum, Examinations and Assessment (CCEA), which stated that it was not fit for purpose and not manageable by teachers.

The pupil profile must be manageable, and it must be fit for purpose. Those are the two conditions on which the INTO will give its full support to the profile. It takes a teacher one hour to complete a profile on one child; therefore, it takes 30 hours for a class of 30 pupils. That raises the issue of when teachers will get the time, or be released, to complete the profiles?

The INTO has made it clear that if pupil profiles are to be used as a selection tool, teachers will not complete them — they will not co-operate — and that has been accepted by the Department of Education and the CCEA. That must be made clear.

At present, the pupil profile is not designed to be used as a selection tool, and it could not be used as such because it is not completed in a secure situation. The INTO will withdraw its co-operation on pupil profiles if they are tinkered with to make them suitable for selection purposes.

In my briefing paper, I have also said that it takes too long to complete pupil profiles. The timing needs to be adjusted. The lack of computer facilities for the testing is a major-league problem. Primary schools do not have adequate hardware, and we are not content with the solution put to us by CCEA that we should do what is done in Scotland — that a busful of computers should be driven around primary schools, which people would board in order to do their tests. That is not the answer.

There should be simple, clear and centrally drawn-up admissions criteria for entry to post-primary schools in Northern Ireland. It does not matter which school a child chooses. There should be a centrally drawn-up list of feeder schools for all post-primary schools, and pupils should be accepted into those schools on the basis of how close they live to them. If there is a need for a tie-break situation between pupils, it should be based on random selection on a Northern Ireland-wide basis. Tie-breaks should be administered centrally to ensure that schools are not setting up their own methods of decision-making.

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): Thank you. We move to Seamus Searson from the National Association of Schoolmasters Union of Women Teachers.

Mr Searson: The current events in Northern Ireland provide a real opportunity for change. We need to welcome that change and move forward. The establishment of the Education and Skills Authority in April 2008 will provide us with an opportunity to move the entire education system along and help every child reach his or her full potential. This is what the reorganisation of post-primary education is about.

I will not go into great detail. We agree with many of the points that my colleagues have raised. I will simply raise the issue and focus on the criteria. The reorganisation of post-primary education is neither a simple nor easy task. We must be aware of the downsides of any reorganisation, however. The paper that I circulated focuses on one or two of the problems that the criteria can throw up.

The NASUWT is the largest teachers' union in Northern Ireland, and our membership is drawn from across all the different education sectors. The paper was finalised after a lengthy discussion period about the process with our members.

10.15 am

As has been mentioned, there must be a code of practice for school admissions that covers all of Northern Ireland. The paper states that consistency and equity in the schools admissions process should be made clear. As I said, the Education and Skills Authority will have an important role in that regard and must ensure that the arrangements do not disadvantage, either directly or indirectly, particular social and minority ethnic groups, children with disabilities or children with special educational needs.

I wish to mention parental choice, a term that is often bandied about. The concept of parental choice does not fit in with what is needed for the future, which is an effective and co-operative relationship between parents and schools. The notion of parental choice is often misleading because people believe that they have a choice when, in reality, they do not. Often, it is the schools that make the choice rather than the parents. The present system creates competition, which, in turn, fosters tensions, and that works against greater co-operation.

I will quickly mention one or two aspects of family-focused criteria. If the system were to concentrate on family-focused criteria, where priorities are given to pupils whose siblings already attend particular schools, there is a possibility that children living close to those schools will be denied places. Although that is an important factor, it must not become the major determining factor. That is one of the issues that we are considering.

We are cautious about the use of geographical criteria, because the catchment area of a school may not reflect the local community. If tie-breakers are used, they need to be quite clear, open and transparent so that people can see what is happening. Furthermore, the use of tie-breakers should be a fairly straightforward process.

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): I thank you all for your presentations. I will now hand over to members, who will ask questions.

Mr Donaldson: My question is for Ms Hall-Callaghan. If I were a working-class Protestant child living in Benson Street in Lisburn, which is almost equidistant from Lisnagarvey High School, Laurel Hill Community College, Friends' School, Wallace High School and Forthill College, which school would be considered my local school? Which school would be the community school that would serve me in a selection tie-breaker?

Ms Hall-Callaghan: I do not know Lisburn well enough to comment on that. However, I presume that the people who live there would relate to a particular school and would know which school they wanted their children to attend.

Mr Donaldson: I am not talking about the school that a pupil would want to attend; I am talking about the tie-breaker situation. You have suggested that, in the event of a school being oversubscribed, a tie-breaker that is based on geographical location should be used.

I gave the example of a child who lives equidistant from the five secondary schools that I mentioned, two of which are grammar schools, three of which are secondary schools. What would happen in the event of a school being oversubscribed? Let us say that the child wants to attend Wallace High School, but it is oversubscribed. Which school will be considered that child's local community school for the purposes of the tie-breaker? My example could apply to Magherafelt, Londonderry or anywhere.

Ms Hall-Callaghan: If a tie-breaker is used, the process of how various factors will be measured must be set out. Generally speaking, however, a child will not be exactly equidistant from two schools.

Mr Donaldson: Are you sure about that?

Mr S Wilson: It could come down to a distance of 5 feet.

Mr Donaldson: I could take you to a place in Lisburn that is almost exactly equidistant from five secondary schools. In that case, which would be my local school?

Ms Hall-Callaghan: Almost equidistant?

Mr S Wilson: Are you suggesting that the school that a pupil will attend could depend on whether that pupil lives 5 feet away from one school or 5 feet away from another? Is that not a bit daft?

Ms Hall-Callaghan: No, it is not. A decision must be made in some way. What I said was that I would be happy with a tie-breaker situation or with random selection. Schools should be equally good and, therefore, it should not matter which school a pupil attends.

Mr Donaldson: Lisburn, which is in my constituency, is a large urban area with five good schools, and I deal with the admissions appeals procedure every summer. I could name — but I will not — the schools that most parents in Lisburn would choose to send their children to. Three or four of those five schools are substantially oversubscribed.

Wallace High School and Friends' School are located in a middle-class area. Under your policy, more families would move into that area to be close to those two schools, which, I guarantee, would be oversubscribed every year. The result would be that working-class kids would lose out — and those kids want to go to those schools, believe me; I have sat with parents who have appealed against decisions. Both schools that I mentioned take in kids from working-class backgrounds. In my constituency, the working-class kids would lose out because their parents would not be able to afford to move close to the schools in order to benefit from your proposed tie-breaker.

Also, if I lived in a rural community such as Moira, Ballinderry, Aghalee, Annahilt or Hillsborough, how would I gain from that policy, when the decision comes down to a tie-breaker and the urban kids win every time?

Ms Hall-Callaghan: We are coming at this from the wrong angle. Mr Langhammer and I emphasised that the choice at the age of 11 is not the important choice. We are also trying to promote the idea that all schools are good schools. Why would parents opt for Wallace High School or Friends' School, for example? All those schools in Lisburn should be attractive to parents.

Mr S Wilson: Do you ever read any inspectors' reports?

Ms Hall-Callaghan: Yes, all the time.

Mr S Wilson: The inspectors' reports do not say that every school is a good school. It is totally naive to say that.

Ms Hall-Callaghan: It is not naive to say that. It is what we are working towards. Teachers in Northern Ireland are excellent and very well qualified. We need to establish a system in which they can operate properly. The system is wrong at the moment.

Mr Donaldson: We agree with that, but we disagree on the method of achieving that objective. The system that you advocate would discriminate against far more children than the 11-plus does currently.

I have not had an answer to my reasonable question about how rural kids will be provided for in this geographical tie-breaker situation. Rural children will be discriminated against if the decision comes down to a tie-breaker. There are very few secondary schools in the middle of the countryside, so rural kids will lose out. I do not know what that will mean as regards equality and section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998.

Urban areas contain a multiplicity of schools. Perhaps in many towns there is only one school and the decision is simple, but in other towns there is more than one school. A postcode lottery will discriminate against many pupils and will not create a fair system. In fact, it will create a very unfair system.

Ms Hall-Callaghan: I live in the middle of nowhere, in the area that Mr Donaldson mentioned, and I did not have any difficulty in getting my child into the school of her choice.

Mr Donaldson: That may happen at the moment, under the current system.

Ms Hall-Callaghan: At the moment, yes.

Mr Donaldson: If the system were the postcode lottery that you advocate, would you still be of the same mind?

Ms Hall-Callaghan: I do not think that I would have any difficulty.

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): I do not want to stifle debate, but we need to move on.

Mr Donaldson: This is an important point.

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): I appreciate that, but a number of members want to ask questions. If we can get the first round of questions over, there will be time for more comments.

Mr Donaldson: I am finished with this issue.

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): If other members do not jump in and ask questions on the back of your time, there may be more time.

Mr Donaldson: Absolutely.

Mr McNarry: You should take him literally: he said that was finished.

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): Mr Wilson's time is now cut because he made two comments during Mr Donaldson's time.

Mr S Wilson: They were short questions, and I did not get an answer to either of them. [Laughter.]

Mr Donaldson: With respect, if geographical proximity were used as a tie-breaker, there is no way that Ms Hall-Callaghan's child, living in a rural community, would benefit from a system that dictates that the closer a child lives to a school, the better the chance of getting into that school in the event of that school being oversubscribed.

It defies logic and reason to suggest that if I live in a rural community — and I do — that my child will have an equal chance of getting into a school that is oversubscribed when the tie-breaker is based on proximity to the school. If you can show me any area in Northern Ireland where such a tie-breaker benefits the rural child and not the urban child, I will look at it.

Ms Hall-Callaghan: I live close to the Dickson plan area, and there is never any difficulty in getting children into the junior high school in Lurgan.

Mr S Wilson: I have two questions. We can probably get a fairly quick answer to the first one. No one this morning has dealt with the reality of the situation, which is that after 26 March 2007, if the Assembly is up and running — and since members have been lobbied publicly and privately by all of your organisations to get the Assembly up and running, it seems that you are keen for that to happen — the Secretary of State has said that academic selection will still be here unless the Assembly decides otherwise. Given the cross-community nature of the Assembly, that situation is unlikely to change.

Given that we all want devolution, we will have to deal with the reality of academic selection being here. Can you give us some indication as to what form of academic selection you would like to see in those circumstances, or will the UTU simply opt out of the debate?

Mr Harron: My understanding is that the current situation will end in 2009, and the slate will be wiped clean. New arrangements from 2009 will have to be put in place by the Assembly or by the Minister. Therefore, we are not going to opt out of anything.

I have been teaching for 32 years in post-primary education. I believe that unless all the reforms have been put in place as regards the curriculum, the Entitled to Succeed policy and the entitlement framework have been a lie. Ms Hall-Callaghan is correct — from 2009 onwards it should not matter which school is being selected at age eleven, because children, regardless of whether they live in rural or urban areas, or east, west, north or south, are going to be guaranteed a menu of 24 subjects at GCSE and 27 subjects at A level.

Mr S Wilson: I do not know if you are trying to avoid the question or have not understood the question.

Mr Langhammer: I am happy to answer.

Mr S Wilson: I will always get an answer from you.

Mr Langhammer: It might be the wrong one.

Mr S Wilson: I wish to emphasise that academic selection will still be on the menu after 26 March 2007 — it will still be available. We have heard what you would like to see in an ideal world, but that is not likely to be the case unless there is no devolution. I assume you all want to see devolution as quickly as possible, because you have all lobbied us to that effect. Members would find it helpful if they knew what kind of academic selection the UTU could live with.

Mr Harron: None whatsoever. We have no time for academic selection.

Mr S Wilson: Why?

Mr Donaldson: Will you break the law?

Mr Harron: I do not see the connection between not wanting academic selection and breaking the law.

Mr McNarry: You said earlier that if pupil profiling became part of a selection method, your members would not work it.

Mr Harron: Yes.

Mr McNarry: In response to Mr Wilson's question about academic selection, you said, "None whatsoever." What instructions will you be giving your members that we can take back to the parents to tell them what they will be likely to face from your union members?

Mr Harron: Parents are not likely to be facing anything from our members. I said that the INTO's policy always has been, and always will be, to oppose any form of academic selection. However, that does not mean that we as professionals will not operate whatever system is in place. There is no question about that. We are professional teachers — regardless of what we have to deal with, we will deliver.

As regards the ideal world that Mr Wilson referred to, I emphasise that the Department of Education has been telling us for the past five or six years that the new curriculum, the new Entitled to Succeed policy and the new entitlement framework are coming in. I have believed the Department for 10 years that this would happen.

Mr S Wilson: Never believe officials from the Department of Education. We learned that a long time ago.

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): Other members and witnesses wish to speak.

10.30 am

Mr Langhammer: My answer to the first question will be as brief as possible. I am not clear that the position is as you described. It is clear that that part of the Education (Northern Ireland) Order 2006 has fallen, with the result that academic selection has not been outlawed. I am also clear that the 11-plus will end in 2008. That does not mean that an alternative procedure is in place: it has not been made clear whether academic selection or another procedure must be used. Given that academic selection has not been banned and that the 11-plus will fall, I understand that we are facing a vacuum — we are not automatically considering different forms of academic selection.

Mr S Wilson: Schools will have the ability to make their own decisions.

Mr Langhammer: I agree with Mr Wilson's point about not believing Department of Education officials. With the aim of advising our members, I wrote to the Department to ask whether a school or a group of schools could implement their own tests in the absence of another procedure. The Department clearly stated that that would not happen. I do not know whether that is lawful, but that is the Department's view. However, I am happy to pass that letter to the subgroup.

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): Perhaps the discussion can continue outside, but I wish to move on. Mr McNarry, you can speak next, but I ask you to be conscious that other members have not spoken yet.

Mr McNarry: OK, boss, I will see what I can do.

Mr S Wilson: Is that the Chairperson's official designation? [Laughter.]

Mr McNarry: She is bossing us about, so I decided to call her "boss".

If a vote were taken in the Assembly tomorrow, you would see here and on the opposite Benches a mirror image of how the parties would go through the lobbies. We will not be able to address the issue in a satisfactory manner as long as that situation pertains.

Your association is a big hitter; it commands a lot of media attention and produces lovely glossy brochures and propaganda. I wish to turn your attention to the recent findings of the House of Commons Public Accounts Committee on literacy and numeracy. In everyone's estimation, that report was shocking and disturbing. As a group that broadly supports the 2006 Order, can you confidently say that it will preserve Northern Ireland's standards of academic achievement and address our record of educational underachievement?

Are you willing to say that what you support will improve the situation to such an extent that you will back the reforms totally? You are on record as saying as much.

Mr Harron: Yes.

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): I like short answers.

Mr Harron: Those who support academic selection and the grammar schools seem to be in denial. I have been a grammar schoolteacher for the past 16 years. Forty per cent of pupils who leave school at age 16 do not have adequate literacy and numeracy skills. When will the penny drop with people that academic selection is one of the major causes of that? I also taught for 16 —

Mr McNarry: Where did you find that statistic? The report did not say that.

Mr Harron: The report said that —

Mr McNarry: That is a gross nonsense. Selection has nothing to do with that misrepresentation. I am asking you whether the reforms that you support and for which you are lobbying will change the situation. Forgive me; I respect the organisations that you represent, but when I meet individual teachers, I do not hear from them the same things that come out of your offices.

Mr Harron: I taught for 16 years in a secondary school in an underprivileged area and another 16 years in a grammar school. Therefore, I have seen the system from both sides. The report said that 40% of pupils in Northern Ireland leave school at age 16 —

Mr McNarry: Of course it said that. However, it did not blame that on academic selection.

Mr Harron: You asked me for my view, and I am saying that one of the major causes of inadequate literacy and numeracy is that the vast majority of those pupils leave from our non-grammar schools.

Mr McNarry: Does that mean that the reforms are a panacea for curing all that?

Mr Harron: We in INTO wish that politicians would go the whole way and create a fully comprehensive system. However, by removing academic selection and making all schools equal, all pupils are treated the same. When there are no longer two tiers of education, the standards attained by all pupils will rise and the percentage of pupils who leave without proper numeracy and literacy skills will decrease.

Mr McNarry: Where are we on that issue? On one hand, members of the panel say that all schools are good, but the Bain Report states that they are not.

Ms Hall-Callaghan: I said that the UTU wants to move towards a situation in which all schools are viewed as good schools. There are many good schools and some that could be improved. We must work to change the public perception. There is much work to be done on education. The public perceives grammar schools to be the good schools, and that is not necessarily the case.

Mr McNarry: Let us not go into the question of grammar schools. I am asking you whether the reforms will improve the current situation, particularly in relation to underachievement, and whether they will maintain the current levels of excellence that are attained.

Ms Hall-Callaghan: We hope so. At the outset of any process, no one can predict where it will lead.

Mr McNarry: You are saying, though, that the system is broken and you want to fix it.

Ms Hall-Callaghan: Yes; it is broken and we want to fix it.

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): If members would ask questions rather than making speeches, they might get more answers.

Mr D Bradley: I welcome the members of the panel and thank them for their contributions.

The INTO contribution included some reservations about the concept of the pupil profile. This afternoon, the subgroup will have a chance to address those problems with the CCEA — and we will endeavour to do so, because it is an important issue.

Mr Langhammer, you said that ATL's preference is for pupil transfer to take place at age 14 rather than age 11, and several other contributors concurred. On what basis would the transfer procedure operate at age 14?

Mr Langhammer: I must be honest: we have grave difficulties with some aspects of the 2006 Order. On balance, we support it, but I am not pretending that the union's debate about it has been anything other than robust. Ultimately, we felt that anything other than widespread consensus was not good for Northern Ireland's education system. However, in a fairly intense debate, there is not that level of consensus. ATL's view is that children develop at different ages and that those aged 10 or 11 are too young to take definitive decisions about career paths or particular types of school.

We are not hung up on the idea of junior high schools, because some schools could develop junior schools within them. However, we are clear that if there is to be a move towards a more skills-based curriculum in which children take key education decisions at the age of 14 and 16, it is important that they not be locked out of schools. For instance, if my youngster goes to a particular school at the age of 11 and realises by the age of 14 that he or she wants to go in a particular direction that is best supported by a different school up the road, there should not be a situation whereby that school is simply full.

If the key decisions are to be taken at age 14 and 16, as stated in the 2006 Order, we must provide for transfer or fluidity between schools. Crudely, people have said that the system is like the Dickson plan, and perhaps it is slightly similar. The failure of the Dickson plan is that it is not uniformly applied and people can get round it. However, ATL clearly supports the Department on the part of the 2006 Order that states that it is better for pupils to take key decisions at the age of 14, rather than when they are 10 or 11.

Mr D Bradley: Ms Hall-Callaghan said that if the pupil profile were not completely developed, teachers from the UTU would be prepared to give advice to parents on which post-primary school would be best suited to their children. Would INTO members be prepared to do that also?

Mr Harron: No. We do not believe that it is the job of primary school teachers to advise on which post-primary school pupils should go to — and I think Ms Hall-Callaghan said the same.

Ms Hall-Callaghan: I did.

Mr Harron: As primary schoolteachers, we would advise parents on the strengths and weaknesses of their children but we would let the parents make the decision on which post-primary school their children should attend.

We have not yet mentioned the specialist schools pilot programme. The first tranche of 12 schools started the programme last year, and the selection process for the next tranche is under way, although I do not know how many schools will be involved. As I said before, on paper it should not really matter which school a pupil chooses, because in five, six or 10 years' time, as the programme is rolled out, all schools will have specialisms of some sort — including the five schools in Lisburn to which Mr Donaldson referred. Thus, if a pupil profile says that the child has a particular bent towards the arts, sciences, or vocational studies, the pupil can choose a school with an appropriate specialism. We must look to the future on this issue. We would not advise teachers to give pupils advice on which school to attend.

Ms Hall-Callaghan: I would like to confirm an earlier point, Mr Bradley. I did not say that teachers would advise pupils on which school to choose. I said that they would advise on the strengths and abilities of the children.

Mr McNarry: How do you dodge a question from a parent —

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): David —

Mr McNarry: If a parent is told how strong a child is, can he or she go to Regent House?

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): David, with respect, I am chairing the meeting. I will let Barry ask a question now.

Mr McNarry: Sorry, I was just getting carried away.

Mr McElduff: I welcome the specific and targeted way in which each of the contributors addressed the terms of reference.

It has been said that the pupil profile is an excellent tool, if used properly. How can it be used properly? What type of information do parents tend to want to hear?

Mr McNarry: Can my child go to a grammar school — that is what they want to hear today, Barry.

Mr McElduff: Are teachers concerned that pupil profiling might add to their already bureaucratic burden? Is that a real concern? How might the profile be used properly?

Mr Harron: INTO's policy is that children's test results should not be included in pupil profiles. Despite teachers' expertise in telling parents how their children are doing, parents tend to focus purely on test scores and do not look at what is written about their children. In the models and prototypes that are being experimented with in the pilots, a good deal of information is written about pupils under a whole raft of educational strengths and weaknesses — but parents simply focus on the scores. For example, the profile may say that a pupil's age is nine, but his reading age is 10 or six or whatever. We are concerned about how that information is shared with parents.

Workload is very important. I talked to a school principal in Mr McElduff's area who is involved in the pilot, and she told me that she has a class of 30 pupils and only two computers in the classroom. The profile takes an hour to complete, and if two pupils are working on the interactive tests, the rest of the pupils must be cleared out of the room.

There are logistical problems, as adequate computer hardware is needed to allow pupils to do the interactive tests. Primary-school teachers normally take about 30 minutes to write a report on a pupil. The pupil profiles that are now being experimented with take twice as long. I hope that the CCEA will tell the subgroup this afternoon that it plans to make the process more manageable by slimming it down, which will free up teachers' time. I also hope that it tells the subgroup that it will provide the hardware resources needed to enable the pupils to carry out the computer interactive tests.

Ms Hall-Callaghan: Mr McElduff asked what form the profile will take. There is much more to a child than academic ability, and the profile must reflect all a child's competences. Although some children are wonderful at drama, arts, music and other such subjects, the current profoundly academic structures can make them feel as though they are failures, when, in fact, they are brilliant in those subjects in which they excel.

The purpose of the profile should be to reflect the full breadth of each child's ability.

Mr S Wilson: May I ask the witness about that last point?

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): Quickly, please.

Mr S Wilson: You said that although the pupil profile would not be used as a selective tool, it would be the basis on which parents chose the pathway for their children. Consider the example of a child who is either wonderful at art or brilliant at football. That is so subjective. What use is that to anyone?

Ms Hall-Callaghan: It is not subjective. At football matches it is obvious which children can play well and which cannot.

Mr S Wilson: Therefore, you do not believe that the words "brilliant" or "good" are subjective terms. You might think something is brilliant, whereas I might think that it is rubbish. Those terms are subjective.

Ms Hall-Callaghan: I think that you are splitting hairs.

Mr S Wilson: I am not splitting hairs at all.

10.45 am

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): If there are no more questions, we will move on. I want to let Barry finish.

Mr McNarry: Are you allowing him another question?

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): No. Witnesses are waiting and the subgroup is in danger of exceeding its time limit. When we make the switchover, members can talk briefly to witnesses.

Mr McNarry: With all respect, Chair, this is a subgroup of the Committee on the Programme for Government. The whole thing has been set up for the benefit of the public. Will witnesses follow me outside so that I can hold a conversation with them? That is just not practical.

Mr McElduff: The question that I wanted to ask was about the additional transfer arrangements that would apply to children who have a statement of special educational needs.

Mr Harron: There is a section in the consultation paper on compelling individual circumstances. INTO supports the retention of those considerations. Those children should be supernumerary to the school's quota of pupils. Compelling individual circumstances should be used only rarely. Children with statements of special educational needs should be given special priority and INTO believes that they should be supernumerary to the school's quota.

Ms Hall-Callaghan: I refer Mr McElduff to our document, which has a full section on that.

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): With respect, David, members agreed this agenda at the last meeting. Witnesses were agreed. There is a time limit. I suggest that if members have further questions, they should forward them to the Committee Clerks, who will contact the organisations to request written answers.

Mr McNarry: Mr Searson has not contributed, and I have one small question for him. Surely, if we are all here —

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): If you work with me, I will work with you.

Mr McNarry: If you will work with me, may I put the question?

Mr McElduff: The proposal is that the question be now put.

Mr McNarry: Mr Searson, can you give your views on the importance of setting and streaming in post-primary education?

Mr Searson: Teachers work hard to improve the ability of all children. That has a bearing on my earlier point about the 2006 Order. Present practice does not work for all the children of Northern Ireland, and the 2006 Order is a means to improve practice. Particular points arise with regard to setting and streaming, and teachers will need to work with particular children. That might start at 11 years of age, 13 or 14. It will vary from child to child and from school to school. Schools will need to determine what is in the best interests of each child and how that is operated.

Mr McNarry: Are you working in that direction at the moment?

Mr Searson: Yes.

Mr McNarry: Thank you.

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): Thank you for coming. I should say that members might have further questions for you. I trust that your doors will always be open.

The subgroup was suspended at 10.50 am.

On resuming —

10.54 am

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): I ask members to take their seats. The witnesses should introduce themselves, after which they will have a total of 10 minutes to make their presentation. I will then open the floor to members' questions.

Sir Kenneth Bloomfield (Association for Quality Education): I shall begin by introducing myself. In common with a lot of the witnesses who appear before you, I wear many hats. However, we are all involved in one way or another with the Association for Quality Education (AQE), which is a coalition of interests that are concerned with the future of our education system.

I shall begin by making a few points of principle. First, I am not sure that the selection issue, important though it is, is really at the centre of our education problems. I acknowledge that although there are many education problems in Northern Ireland, we have records of substantial achievement, including good performance at A level and GCSE, a high representation of underprivileged communities in the universities, and so on. On the other hand, we have heard a lot about areas of obvious underperformance: clearly, something must be done about that. AQE does not think that such underperformance is attributable wholly to the method of selection.

Calling ourselves the Association of Quality Education does not mean that we think that grammar schools represent the only excellent part of the education system; that would be an extremely arrogant point of view. We must remember that we would not have the record of performance of entry into higher education without the excellent performance of many of the non-grammar schools.

AQE endorses views that, as we understand it, the population at large has expressed repeatedly. In a democracy, those views should not be ignored. A very consistent result has emerged from at least six separate Government-conducted polls, saying that on the one hand people do not like, do not trust or do not accept the 11-plus as a method of selection, but that, nevertheless, they want to retain some method of academic selection. It is important to listen to the voice of the people.

Secondly, we are conscious of the assurances that a number of the Ministers who have held the education portfolio in recent years have given about these matters. People have been assured that the proposed changes to selection methods do not mean that grammar schools will disappear, and that they do not mean that comprehensive education will be introduced in Northern Ireland. However, we confess to a degree of scepticism about that.

For our part, we accept that we should go along with the fact that the Northern Ireland population has said that the 11-plus system of selection should go. However, it would be possible to replace it with a more reliable system that would be acceptable across the education sector. We should be looking for widespread acceptability in the same way that we are looking for wider consensus. Clearly, we are looking for as much consensus as possible throughout the education system. We do not want to impose unreasonable burdens on the head teachers of primary schools, for instance; we must be sensitive to their views.

I wanted to make those points at the start of our presentation. First, we should listen clearly to what people have said about this matter, and, secondly, we should take at face value the assurances that successive Ministers have given us, while exploring how those can be made a reality.

Mr Marcos Patterson (Association for Quality Education): I am a parent with two young children, one in primary 4 and one in primary 3, who will be directly affected by the changes. I have a couple of comments about the strengths of the current system. Our system produces examination results that are much better than those in Great Britain, and it produces better outcomes with regard to social inclusion than the education systems do in other parts of these islands. We attribute that success to the diversity in Northern Ireland.

Statistics show that social deprivation tends to be linked to poor examination results. We have more social deprivation here, and yet our examination results are better than those in Great Britain. For example, the 2004 figures show that 60% of pupils in Northern Ireland got five GCSE passes ranging from A* to C — the figure for England is 54%, and in Wales it is 51%. Northern Ireland has more pupils getting A grades, including in subjects such as English and maths.

We hear a lot about the myth of the long tail of underachievement in regard to social inclusion. That long tail of underachievement does not exist in the sense that every education system has a tail of underachievement. Northern Ireland's situation is no worse than that in other parts of these islands. It is better, certainly, in some senses than in England. For example, if we consider the figures for free school meals, 33% of students who receive free school meals in Northern Ireland get five GCSE passes ranging from grades A to C, while the figure for England is 26.1%, which is very much lower. The people at the bottom end of the social scale are actually doing much better in our system.

There has been a lot of concern about people on the Shankill Road, and there have been a lot of crocodile tears on the issue. It is a very important issue, but the facts have often been distorted. The Public Accounts Committee pointed out that the 11-plus is not a problem there. The statistics for 2001 show that 5% of the students got five GCSE passes at grades A to C — that applied to three people. The figures went up by 300% the following year when 12 young people got five GCSE passes with A to C grades. If we are going to blame the 11-plus for the results in the Shankill area, we will have to credit it for the superb results in the New Lodge area, where social deprivation is very similar.

We think that those successes come from teaching pupils in schools with other pupils of similar abilities. The diversity of the schools system allows us to have, on average, smaller schools. It is great to have secondary, grammar, faith, interdenominational, comprehensive and Irish-medium schools. Tá spéis agam féin i scoileanna lánGhaeilge. Eighty-eight per cent of parents secure a place for their child in their first choice of school.

We do not have a private sector, unlike other parts of these islands. Basically, most children get the type of education that parents choose for them. We have a successful system, social inclusion and diversity.

Mr Billy Young (Association for Quality Education): I am the head teacher of Belfast Royal Academy. I have cut some of what I wanted to say, as I am aware of the time.

First, what we want from a new system — and have wanted for five years — is money directed to the source and not wasted: £1.5 million has been wasted on consultations and reports.

Secondly, we want an honest acceptance of our strengths and successes, an honest attempt to tackle the weaknesses, imaginative tackling of underachievement, real support for primary schools in disadvantaged areas, a system that hits all the criteria mentioned in our paper, a system of transfer that will satisfy 88% of the people — as the current system does — and something that matches the will of the public as expressed in the Northern Ireland Continuous Household Survey.

Four useful tie-breaker issues were mentioned in the survey, including community-based criteria and geography. However, if they were included as main criteria, it would result in local comprehensives. People have to be honest and say that that is what would happen. We will also see, as has happened, that parents would move their children to successful schools. The family-focused issue would be useful as a tie-breaker, but if it were applied to a school — as I would apply it — it might affect one third of children applying to the school. What happens to the other two thirds that would be affected by community-based criteria? Again, the answer is local comprehensives.

11.00 am

Random selection is, again, a useful tie-breaker, but it if were applied as a whole, people would not apply to those schools more than a certain distance from their homes.

The profile cannot be used for selection. The system that the Governing Bodies Association would like to elaborate on and improve is computer-adaptive tests (CATs), which would address the criteria that we have listed in our paper. It would minimise coaching and much more. Therefore, we have proposals for a new system that would be much better than the present one.

Mr Finbarr McCallion (Governing Bodies Association): I am the secretary of the Governing Bodies Association. The association represents and works with 73 grammar schools in Northern Ireland, of which 53 are voluntary grammar schools.

I thank you for the opportunity to come here. One is never supposed to begin with an apology, yet I think that we owe the subgroup an apology. Although we have spent about 10 years trying to reach a solution, we do not yet have one. We are coming to ask the subgroup to create one, as Members of the Assembly are more likely to be in the business of finding solutions to difficult problems. We hope that, with the experience that members have had, they may be able to help us to find a solution to this problem.

To date, we have been involved in two side-by-side arguments. One is about comprehensive education. When comprehensive education was introduced in England, Scotland and Wales, every political party supported it. Its introduction presented great problems, but it was established. Members might be surprised to know that every political party supported comprehensive education. During her time as Minister of Education, Margaret Thatcher converted more grammar schools to comprehensive schools than any other Minister of Education, including the sainted Mr Crossman.

Afterwards, the Conservative Party changed its mind. Look at what David Cameron is doing today. He leads a party that wants grammar school education. He admits that there is no political consensus, and, therefore, he has warned his party not to reach too far. He has advised the party to deal with what it can deal with in order to sort out the problem as best it can. No doubt, he wants grammar schools by stealth.

We believe that the new system in Northern Ireland should offer people a choice and a chance to change. Some grammar schools might be willing to operate on a more comprehensive basis; certainly, there are secondary schools that want to become comprehensive schools. Why is it that only four secondary schools in Northern Ireland are allowed to select pupils? What is so special about Lagan College, Slemish College, Holy Cross College in Strabane and St Patrick's Co-educational Comprehensive College in Maghera? Why should every secondary school and every grammar school not be allowed that choice? Why do we not allow the parents to make the decisions?

There are good grammar schools in Northern Ireland. There are good comprehensive schools and there are good secondary schools. How do we know that? We know because the parents want that system to remain. I trust parents. They need help and guidance, but I trust them. Surely Northern Ireland can get to a situation where, with children of nine years of age, one can have a decent idea of where they will be when they are 13 years of age. That is what must be done to advance towards a solution.

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): Thank you for your presentation and for keeping within the time limit. In the first instance, I will allocate each member five minutes in which to ask questions. Depending on the length of your answers, they may be able to ask further questions at the end. In the spirit of fairness, I will start from this side of the table because we started at the other side earlier.

Mr McElduff: I welcome the delegation. I am concerned by Mr Patterson's reference to the myth that is the long tail of underachievement. I seek general comments from the panel on that. The House of Commons Committee of Public Accounts' report, 'Improving Literacy and Numeracy in Schools (Northern Ireland): Second Report of Session 2006–07' (November 2006) seems to bear out that there is a long tail of underachievement, in that 40% of 16-year-olds leave school with inadequate numeracy and literacy skills. Is that the case or not?

Secondly, how would grammar schools deliver the new varied and vocational life-skills curriculum?

Mr Patterson: May I clarify the long tail of underachievement? It has been suggested that, in the past, Northern Ireland results — at the bottom end — were much worse than those of other parts of these islands, where GCSE and A-level examinations were taken.

The point that I strove to make — perhaps I was not clear enough — was that, at the bottom end, Northern Ireland results are very similar to those of other parts of the United Kingdom. For example, in England, the number of pupils who leave school without any GCSEs is 5%; here it is 4%. The suggestion that grammar schools create a long tail of underachievement, while alternative systems do not, is incorrect.

Sir Kenneth Bloomfield: Mr McElduff's point about the curriculum is important. It would be an absurdity to suppose that we would ever have one set of schools that are purely academic and another set that are purely vocational. In future, every individual will need to have a mix of those skills, but that mix will vary according to particular aptitudes.

People often talk of children's sense of failure when they do not get the 11-plus and do not go to grammar school. Part of that stems from the fact that, in many ways, the non-grammar schools compete in the same races as the grammar schools in skills to which they are not necessarily very well adapted.

I see the possibility of parallel systems in which the emphasis in grammar schools will continue to be on academic subjects — for example, the hard sciences, which will be very important for our economic future — but, of course, there will have to be a vocational element as well. Similarly, other schools will place an emphasis on vocational subjects, but their students will also need language skills, and so on. I do not therefore see a terribly stark divide. However, at the moment the difficulty is that post-primary education submits virtually all children to the same hurdles, irrespective of their aptitudes. That does not serve them terribly well.

Mr McCallion: Sir Kenneth makes a good point. It is foolish to pretend that there are not children for whom our system does not work well, but that is true of every single education system in western Europe. Even those systems that have twice the amount of money invested in them as ours still have problems — those systems do not work for many of the children who go through them.

Our curriculum is very grammar-school driven. Huge numbers of comprehensive schools in England offer a diploma in business administration, but virtually no secondary school in Northern Ireland does because CCEA does not offer it.

We must think ahead. The great problem — and I will admit this; I have been a protagonist in this matter for the past 10 years — is that we have argued about grammar, secondary and comprehensive schools, but we have not argued for a curriculum that matches children to their futures and gives them opportunities. I want schools to be free. Schools are driven by their governors, parents and teachers, and they will do what is best for their children. However, it would be madness to return to the situation of the 1950s when secondary schools were forbidden to do the old Senior Certificate. We will not go down that road; we want to do the reverse and offer opportunities.

Mr Young: Given the time of year, it might be appropriate to quote from Isaiah, chapter 11, verse 6, leading up to the prophecy about the birth of Christ:

"and a little child shall lead them."

Over the past five years, we have been saying that the focus should have been on the little child in disadvantaged areas — on the Shankill Road or anywhere else. We have heard promises that money will be invested. Poor literacy and numeracy skills have been mentioned, and certain people have said that grammar schools are responsible for that. However, primary schoolteachers — who are doing a superb job — have for years been crying out for real support at primary-school level. As the subgroup will know, it is possible to identify reading difficulties in primary 1 and primary 2. However, time and time again, things just rattle on in primary schools, and the matter is not handled until much later.

I take the comment about literacy and numeracy, but the key to solving this problem is to start where it really matters. The Reading Recovery programme has achieved wonderful things, but it can continue to do that only if the personnel are there to deliver it.

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): Thank you. There will be time later for follow-up questions.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh maith agat, a Chathaoirleach. Tá céad míle fáilte romhaibh go léir.

You are very welcome, and thank you for your input.

I have great respect for the work of grammar schools. I attended a grammar school for two years and studied for my A levels there. I certainly appreciated the tuition and the high level of academic standards at that school, just as I appreciated the high level of academic standards at the secondary school that I previously attended.

Sir Kenneth began by mentioning that although the majority of the people who responded to the Northern Ireland Continuous Household Survey were against the 11-plus, they were in favour of academic selection. That is a contradiction. In Northern Ireland, although approximately 12 methods of academic selection have been tried, none has been found to have been satisfactory. I wonder whether it is time that we learned a lesson from that. I noticed also that the survey showed that the majority of the parents questioned expressed the view that they should be allowed to choose which post-primary school their children would attend. Perhaps we should give more weight to those statistics.

I am very much in favour of grammar schools continuing to deliver their current academic curriculum. I am not so sure about academic selection. For example, it is often claimed that academic selection benefits working-class communities by providing them with social mobility. However, some of the figures suggest that academic selection is unfair and discriminates against working-class communities.

In 2000, the study published by Peter Daly and Ian Shuttleworth of Queen's University showed that 84% of children from professional families and 79% of the children of clerical workers attended grammar schools. In contrast to that, only 23.5% of factory workers' children, and a mere 13.2% of children whose fathers were unemployed went to grammar schools. Those figures suggest that academic selection does not provide social mobility and is not good for working-class and disadvantaged communities. They suggest that the opposite is the case.

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): I remind members that they are restricted to five minutes each.

Mr S Wilson: Sir Kenneth has 30 seconds in which to answer.

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): He has about two minutes.

Sir Kenneth Bloomfield: I will leave Mr Patterson to address the statistical point.

There is no greater misnomer than the phrase "parental choice". There will not be parental choice, merely parental preference. In many cases, proximity will apply, and parents will not be able to get their child into the school of their choice. Undoubtedly, that will be the case.

Mr Bradley makes a fair point about the need for an alternative to the 11-plus. We would be in an absurd situation, having —

Mr D Bradley: Excuse me, I did not say anything about an alternative to the 11-plus. I said that I am unconvinced that selection is good for working-class children.

Mr McCallion: May I deal with this issue?

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): Please deal with it briefly because there are other members waiting to speak.

Mr McCallion: Where did our middle class come from? On the whole, the people who make up the middle class in Northern Ireland are former grammar-school children.

Mr D Bradley: I agree with you. Back in 1948, and for perhaps 20 to 25 years after 1948, the 11-plus provided social mobility for many working-class people. My former party leader is on record as having said that he benefited from sitting the 11-plus. However, things have moved on, and what was intended to encourage social mobility in 1948 now militates against it.

Mr McCallion: I was the principal of Aquinas Diocesan Grammar School, and when it opened, the vast majority of its children came from lower-middle-class or working-class backgrounds. The difficulty is that there are significant numbers of parents who have gained from the grammar school system, and they want their children to gain from it too.

I want a system that will allow all children to gain. There are secondary schools that are doing fabulous jobs. When I was the principal of St Colm's High School in Twinbrook — Twinbrook is not an area that is famous for being rich — I helped, with the assistance of John Allen and Imelda Jordan, to improve that school to a point where many of its children could move on to a grammar school. That is something of which I am proud. In fact, when I attended a recent function at Rathmore Grammar School, a young girl was presented to me to shake my hand. She asked whether I remembered her: I did not. She informed me that when she was a third-year pupil at St Colm's, I became the school principal. She told me that I had given her a chance. Her words made me so proud that I have no hesitation in telling the members of the subgroup that my head was as big as this room.

11.15 am

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): To maintain a sense of fairness, we must move on. There should be time at the end of the session for further discussion. I ask members to respect the five-minute time limit. They may have a chance to ask further questions later.

Mr McNarry: Our new task is to identify whether selection is necessary. Part of our remit is to compile a report bringing forward alternatives to selection, and we would appreciate your help on that. The debate is deadlocked; it is stifled, and we must move on from that. As I said earlier, if the Assembly were to vote tomorrow — and it would not be by choice — one side would go into one lobby, the other side would go into the other lobby, and we would come out as deadlocked as we are now. Therefore, any help on alternative processes would be much appreciated in the short time that we have now, and beyond.

In an earlier evidence session this morning, a senior union official said that academic selection had contributed to underperformance, as identified by the shocking numeracy and literacy figures in the Committee of Public Accounts' report. I would welcome your comments on that matter.

At an evidence session last week, officials from the Department of Education said that there was a significant role for historical feeder primary schools in a schools admission policy under the proposed new arrangements. What experience have you or your colleagues had of the patterns emerging from feeder schools? Are the admissions criteria for historical feeder primary schools easy to identify?

Sir Kenneth Bloomfield: I am chairman of the board of governors at the Royal Belfast Academical Institution (RBAI) in the centre of Belfast. Historically, we have drawn our pupils from a wide area. At present, there are somewhere in the region of 135 feeder schools represented there. In many cases, some of those schools have sent only one or two pupils, and four or five schools provide a large part of the intake.

The last thing that we want to do in Northern Ireland is to create a series of educational ghettos. It is a bad idea to fixate on a neighbourhood and an immediate community that does not present the opportunity for people from different places to mix. That is why I am so antipathetic to making proximity the prime criterion for school admission. Such a criterion would be educationally and socially wrong.

Mr McCallion: Through our involvement with the grammar school sector, we will do all that we can to help. We understand the difficulty of the task that members have been set; it is awful. If it were easy, we would have done it long ago, but we are stuck.

Apparently, we have a numeracy and literacy policy. Why, therefore, do the Government hand out money to five education and library boards that merrily go off and do whatever they choose? The North Eastern Education and Library Board, the South Eastern Education and Library Board, the Western Education and Library Board and the Belfast Education and Library Board are all different. If there is a problem, and it has been identified, is it not acceptable to assume that there should be a solution? We know that the solution is to tackle numeracy and literacy sensibly. It is wise to establish the present situation and decide what has to be done, constantly monitoring the results.

Why has there not been an inspector's report on the £40 million spent on the numeracy and literacy strategy? Did the inspectorate never write a report? I doubt that that is the case; rather, I think that it was never published. Marion Matchett is a competent chief inspector and a robust, tough individual. I do not believe that she and her officials sat there and did nothing. If you throw £40 million at something without making effective and efficient plans for what it will be spent on, there will be problems.

It looked like a good idea at the time, and I do not want to criticise the individuals who were responsible. I know that certain schools made fantastically good use of that money. However, I would not want to suggest that it only happened because of the 11-plus or that it does not apply in England or Scotland.

The Republic of Ireland has a quasi-comprehensive system. I use that word very advisedly. Twenty per cent of the young people in the Republic of Ireland do not sit the Leaving Certificate examinations. They leave school before they do the Leaving Certificate. In Northern Ireland, 5% leave with no qualifications. Is that a system that we want to go towards? Listen to the Ministers in the South and read the Skills Research Initiative (SRI) report; they know what the problem is. The whole of western Europe has this problem. We need to raise the matter of the people at the bottom, and we need to focus on that. When we talk about the 11-plus, we are not focusing on those children. Let us get this argument out of the way. We are asking members to help us to solve it.

Mr Young: May I make two brief points? To blame grammar schools or academic selection for the problems with literacy and numeracy is nonsense. Primary 1 and primary 2 teachers can identify problems at that stage. As Sir Kenneth and Finbarr McCallion have said, there is much more that can be done at that level. It is totally wrong to lay it at the academic door.

It is, of course, possible to identify feeder schools. We have on average some 50 feeder schools from a very wide catchment area.

Mr McNarry: In which area is that?

Mr Young: Belfast Royal Academy has about 50 feeder schools from a wide catchment area. It is possible to identify them, but in addition to that one has to identify the children with, perhaps, the intellectual gifts to benefit from the academic curriculum that we are offering. Feeder schools alone would not be sufficient to provide that.

Mr S Wilson: I have just three questions. You may not be able to answer them all today, but perhaps you would write to us. Some of the questioners this morning and the trades union representatives who were here have already posed the argument that we want to retain the academic ethos in the grammar schools. Can you explain how that could be done without academic selection? If academic selection, as we understand it at present, is to be done away with, what do you need from any report available to parents or teachers that would ensure that youngsters who want to go to a grammar school and want to benefit from the academic ethos — which everybody says they want to preserve — make best use of the opportunity?

Secondly, we are not looking at this in a vacuum. There will still be the possibility of academic selection after 26 March 2007. Can you outline what you mean by computer-adaptive testing? I know that we could get a paper on that.

Thirdly, if the political parties cannot agree on a form of reporting or selection that can be applied universally to schools, what would the view of the grammar schools be towards the possibility of testing or assessing youngsters and having their own arrangements for making those decisions? Academic selection would remain, but only for those schools that wanted to use it.

Mr Young: A variety of things could happen. The first that was suggested, of course, was the pupil profile, but if a profile is used for selection, it will end up being bland. It will put primary schoolteachers on the spot. The system that we are currently investigating, and will probably hang our hat on, is computer-adaptive testing. If we adopt any other system of testing, should it be Key Stage 2, National Foundation for Educational Research (NFER) tests or standardised tests, it will result in the same sort of pressures that the 11-plus imposed. Computer-adaptive testing is done on a computer. It can be done in primary 5, primary 6 or primary 7, and done as often as the young people like. It meets many of the criteria that we mentioned. In other words, it is not a sudden-death thing. It can be used by primary schools to determine what level a young person is at. It would give a score from -3 to 0 right up to $+3$ — so it gives different levels. It can be done at different stages and as often as young people like, and there is no time limit. Therefore, pupils can, in a sense, be relaxed about it.

Mr Wilson said that there is a problem about reaching agreement. Although we need to investigate the computer-adaptive system further before hanging our hats on it, if we assume that schools go down that road, the system could be used in a variety of ways. For example, if a school wished to take a strict approach, it could choose children who achieve a score of 2 or 3. For those who wish to use the system more loosely — that could be done. Finally, schools that do not want academic selection could use the system to determine the individual needs of young people.

It will be very difficult to reach a compromise that is agreeable to everyone, but something similar to the computer-adaptive system — a system that does not put pressure on primary schools — could identify the gifts and strengths of young people and could be used by different schools in different ways.

We still require a presentation on that, although that will happen soon, but after that, we will probably choose that system. It does not put the pressure on primary schools, as the current tests do, but if there is to be selection, there must be some form of testing. The issue is about how it can be done without creating the current pressures.

Mr S Wilson: Some witnesses have suggested that it is possible to maintain the academic ethos of a grammar school without testing.

Mr Young: That would be impossible. The ethos may be retained for a while, but within seven years all grammar schools would become comprehensive schools, and, depending on criteria, they may become local comprehensive schools.

People continually say that we must look to the future and not to the past — they have not looked to England, where comprehensive schools have been a disaster. It would be very difficult to identify a young person's potential for grammar school from a profile.

Mr McElduff: Is it fair to say that the tests are unproven?

Mr Young: I wish to make one point. The computer-adaptive system has been proven in the United States. For young people, there is a competitive element. If they are successful at one level, they move on to a slightly harder one, and so on. The level they reach becomes a useful tool that is used by teachers to identify strengths and weaknesses in the student.

Sir Kenneth Bloomfield: We are not thinking only of the schools; we are trying to think of the children. There is nothing more miserable than the condition of a child who gains admission to a school where he or she is unable to cope. If there are too many of those children —

Mr D Bradley: That happens now.

Sir Kenneth Bloomfield: Either they are not able to cope, or the school has to reorganise its teaching resources. That affects the capacity to continue offering subjects such as the hard sciences, which underpin the Northern Ireland economy.

One reason for abolishing the 11-plus is that schools are obliged to be more prescriptive than they would otherwise choose to be. Every year, schools like ours have to turn away children that they would ordinarily be happy to accept, and who would be perfectly capable of coping with what those schools can offer.

Mr Donaldson: You said that certain selection criteria might be used as tie-breakers. I am concerned about the possible development of a postcode lottery if geographical location is used as a tie-breaker, especially where a number of schools are in close proximity. Belfast Royal Academy and the Royal Belfast Academical Institute would fall into that category. If academic selection were not available as a transfer criterion, and there were schools that were over-subscribed, how would that be dealt with?

Sir Kenneth Bloomfield: If academic selection were abolished, the Department of Education would produce an acceptable menu of entry criteria. Individual schools would then select approved criteria from that menu. Important questions would then arise about the order in which those criteria were addressed. For schools such as ours, the last thing we would want is to be confined to a tightly circumscribed geographical area. Ultimately, if hardy came to hardy, we would prefer random selection to proximity to the school.

11.30 am

Mr Donaldson: If academic selection were retained but there was no political agreement about the method, how would grammar schools feel about introducing their own selection procedures?

Mr Young: If academic selection were retained and nothing else was agreed, grammar schools would happily use their own procedures.

Focusing on what Mr Bradley said earlier, however, I emphasise that I have a very working-class background. If there is a problem with coaching now, there is no doubt in my mind that if schools introduced their own tests, that problem would increase, possibly tenfold. It is important to identify the young people who can cope with the grammar curriculum. Of course, we would provide our own tests. However, we have to emphasise that if we did that, young people from poorer areas would probably be disadvantaged.

Mr McCallion: I want to add an important point. We have discussed bright and academically successful children. Let us consider for a moment those children who are not academically successful in primary school. At present, if they were placed in grammar schools, the necessary teachers would not be available to manage them. New teachers would be needed. How would that be managed?

First, teachers would have to be taken away from minority subjects. Physics, chemistry and biology would probably survive, although interest in subjects such as German and other modern languages would decrease — those are the low-uptake subjects. We would have to go to secondary schools and poach their good remedial teachers. Let me be clear about remedial teachers: as the principal of a secondary school, I can tell you that they are among the most talented teachers. I consider myself to be a reasonably confident teacher. However, for me, the idea of going into a class of 10 or 15 children who have the attention span of a click of your fingers is impossible. I team-taught with people in those schools. There are a limited number of those very talented teachers, who are, at the moment, concentrated where they are needed. Another group of teachers is concentrated on teaching the difficult sciences, high-level English, maths, and so on.

If you want an example of a really good teacher, one is sitting here — Sammy Wilson. Education in Northern Ireland has lost Mr Wilson as a teacher. He was a leader. He will laugh, because I am going to embarrass him. He was a talented teacher; people recognised that about him. However, if I had been his principal, I would not have let him near the first-formers. He would have been a star with the fifth years and the lower and upper sixth; they would have thought that he was wonderful. He would have worked them to death. However, if he were put among the first years, it would not have been so good. That is a fact: teachers are just not meant to teach every year group.

If you were to put me in a primary 1 class, I could not cope. The seats are too small, the kids are too tiny, and their heads are buzzing. I am too old — I was too old when I was 21 years of age. You must choose horses for courses.

Mr McElduff: I notice that Sammy has been silenced. [Laughter.]

Mr McCallion: Is that a record?

Mr McNarry: Roy Beggs Jnr in East Antrim is going to talk to him. [Laughter.]

Mr Young: Differentiation is the key. Any teacher will tell you that in order to pitch lessons appropriately and stimulate pupils in the same classroom, it is not easy to separate the bright ones from those who struggle. One of the strengths of the current system is that top-class grammar schools and top-class secondary schools cater for two different groups. Secondary schools deal with the children who Mr McCallion talked about — those young people who struggle and who need extra help.

Secondary schools also identify the late developers. That is extremely important, particularly for males, who can develop as late as 14, 15, or even 17 years of age, some even after they have left school. Secondary schools have the academic stream that allows those children to make progress. That is one of the system's strengths.

I want to return to several issues that Mr Bradley raised about the 11-plus. Perhaps there will be a chance to do so later.

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): There will not be a chance later. Five minutes are left before the meeting is suspended. I want to do a quick round up with members, so — I had a good education — that is one minute each. [Laughter.]

Mr McNarry: Can you imagine her being a teacher?

Mr D Bradley: I do not accept, nor am I convinced by, your argument that grammar schoolteachers cannot teach children of varying abilities. After all, all teachers in Northern Ireland receive similar basic training. If you do a degree and then do a postgraduate certificate in education, you are just as qualified to teach in a secondary school as in a grammar school. In addition, I am not convinced by the argument that grammar schools contain homogenous groups of pupils. They do not; that is far from being the case.

We could say that at one time the grammar school sector took about a quarter of the supposedly top pupils. However, last year 13 grammar schools drew less than half of their intake from this group. For example, at Campbell College only 37·4% of new pupils had grade A. At St Joseph's Grammar School, Donaghmore, the percentage was 38·4%; at Cambridge House it was 25·7%; and at Hunterhouse it was a mere 10%. What is happening, possibly through a process of demographic change, is that grammar schools are gradually becoming all-ability schools, and the teachers in those grammar schools are coping very well with that expanding range of ability. If they can do it now, surely they can do it in the future.

Mr Young: Chairperson, I thought we were here to give some answers, not to listen to lectures.

Mr D Bradley: Chairperson, that was a question. The witnesses have put certain points to us.

Mr McCallion: Can I run the question the other way round?

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): May I remind you that I am the principal of this school? Mr Bradley is entitled to add a comment.

Mr McNarry: It is either 100 lines or a whacking, Dominic?

Mr Patterson: For a number of years, over 90% of children accepted into grammar schools have had an A or B in the transfer procedure. The suggestion that grammar schools are becoming comprehensive schools is complete nonsense. There are a couple of schools in which the intake has gone down to pupils with a C, but we are talking about a small number of schools. Over 90% of pupils taken into grammar schools have an A or a B in their transfer test — that does not denote a comprehensive intake.

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): May I just remind you that this is being recorded in evidence, and if you want to make a written submission to any of the comments that the members have made, feel free to do so.

Mr McNarry: I see now why Dominic did not want the Catholic head teachers to be attending these sessions — they might have given him a bit of a shock.

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): It is 45 seconds now.

Mr D Bradley: I take it that they are represented here by Mr McCallion, if I am not mistaken.

Mr McNarry: Can the witnesses quickly address the impact of falling rolls and school closures on the reforms, bearing in mind that the reforms may eventually dispose of selection of any kind? What is the match-up in terms of the children, who Sir Kenneth rightly identified as the most important aspect of this?

Mr McCallion: One of the problems is that we have done nothing for 10 years. We have argued, and we have not thought of the issues. Our population is now back to where it was in 1985. We should have done something. In 1985, voluntary grammar schools came together and agreed to take cuts in their numbers. That is where the quotas came from. What has happened since? Nothing, except that we have opened integrated schools which have taken children out of the system. If we are going to have a selective system, we are going to have to come to an agreement about selection and about intakes. That is life. It is hard. It is going to be very difficult, but it is life — no free lunches.

Mr McElduff: To be directly specific to the terms of reference, I am anticipating that academic selection will have gone in the future. Has the grammar school sector given any thought to aptitude testing at the key stages of children's education to enable them to be placed on the basis of subject choice?

11.45 am

Sir Kenneth Bloomfield: Setting is carried out in many English comprehensive schools. Interestingly, at one of our meetings, the principal of a grammar school said that people talk all the time about the sense of failure that children feel when they do not pass the 11-plus. She wanted to assure us that a pupil in a comprehensive school who is in the bottom set for all subjects has no less a sense of failure than a pupil who has failed the 11-plus. Whether we like it or not, some pupils will do better than others.

I am conscious that, yet again, selection is dominating the education debate. However, the real problem lies elsewhere: at primary level. It lies not in poor teaching but in the conditions in which our children are taught in primary schools. If, by 11 years of age, a child has no motivation or interest in learning, it is possibly too late to do anything about it.

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): If anybody wishes to comment on that, they should feel free to do so in writing.

Mr Young: I want to ask what Mr McElduff meant by his question; I would like to answer it properly. Was he referring to aptitude tests that pupils take before they start secondary school or tests that they take when they are there?

Mr McElduff: I was referring to tests that they take when they are there.

Mr S Wilson: All this morning's evidence suggests that those who support the move away from academic selection towards pupil profiles do so on the basis that profiles will give the ultimate parental choice. Parents will be able to choose a school based on a report that will enable them to make the best choices for their youngsters. Against the picture of falling school rolls, will the inevitable outcome of pupil profiles mean gains in pupil numbers for the schools that are correctly or incorrectly perceived to be the most successful — your schools — while the secondary sector loses out? If people have freedom of choice, they will choose grammar schools.

Mr McCallion: Some parents will do that. The situation in Great Britain must be considered. Who would want to be principal of a school that is six times oversubscribed? Hundreds of children are being turned away from such schools. That will happen here: people will begin with the school that they perceive to be number one and ricochet their way down a list until they finally find a slot. What method is that for placing a child in a school?

Mr McNarry: Are you referring to good schools and bad schools?

Mr McCallion: Yes, schools that are perceived as good schools or bad schools, handy schools, schools that are far away, schools that offer T-shirts if you go to open days — it will not matter.

Mr Donaldson: Thank you for your submissions. My question relates to comprehensive education. I went to Kilkeel High School, which is a comprehensive school. Given the locality, comprehensive education was the only available option. Should there be a one-size-fits-all solution? In places in which there is oversubscription, should we consider area-based solutions that could include academic selection?

Mr Young: One strength of the current system is the variety of schools that are available. I am not against comprehensive schools as such; various types of school here are doing really well. Mr Donaldson hit the nail on the head when he asked whether we want a one-size-fits-all solution or separate solutions for separate situations. Study after study in the Republic of Ireland has found that parental choice is a myth: it leads to confusion and to the oversubscription that Mr Donaldson and Mr McCallion mentioned.

Sir Kenneth Bloomfield: I wish to return briefly to the point that I made at the beginning of the session. The Department of Education has repeatedly assured us that there is no threat to grammar schools, that there is no intention to introduce comprehensive education to Northern Ireland and that there is no search for a one-size-fits-all solution. We want substance to be added to those assurances to make them credible, because we do not think that they are credible.

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): I thank the witnesses for their presentations.

Mr D Bradley: I have a point of information. Mr McNarry said that I objected to the Catholic grammar school heads —

Mr McNarry: Quote me correctly; I did not say that. I said that I could now understand why you did not want them. That is different.

Mr D Bradley: Can I correct that? I knew that this group of witnesses, and Mr McCallion in particular, would be more than able to represent the views of all grammar schools.

Mr Young: I would like to say one thing to everyone: no successful business would put pressure on so many variables at the same time. The 11-plus, the Bain Report, the review of the curriculum, the review of public administration, and the review of procurement have all contributed to the uncertainty of the last five years in the education sector. The Bain Report should have happened first, followed by the curriculum review. We must think of teachers and pupils in the primary schools, where there is a very serious vacuum. Something must be done.

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): Thank you for giving up your time this morning, and thank you for your presentation. We have a lot of people to see this afternoon, and that is why I am pressing the pace. If you feel that you need to respond further to any of our comments or questions, feel free to do so in writing to the Clerks.

Sir Kenneth Bloomfield: We thank you for the opportunity to come and talk to you; we appreciate it.

The subgroup was suspended at 11.46 am.

On resuming —

11.48 am

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): I welcome the new witnesses to the Subgroup to Consider the Schools Admission Policy. In a moment I will allow time for introductions and presentations. Members will then be free to ask questions.

We have been struggling with time all morning, because there have been more questions and comments than expected. If I push you, it is for that reason and because a number of evidence sessions are scheduled for this afternoon.

Mr Jim Clarke (Council for Catholic Maintained Schools): I was nearly going to say good afternoon, but it is definitely still morning.

My name is Jim Clarke, and I am the deputy chief executive of the Council for Catholic Maintained Schools (CCMS). I was also a member of the Costello Group. I understand that Stephen Costello was invited today but was unable to attend; I will make a comment or two on his behalf.

It does not make sense to consider pupil transfer in isolation from everything else that is happening in education. CCMS does not consider education to be an end in itself. However, it is important that there be coherence and connectivity in education policies throughout the education system. Perhaps equally, if not more, important is the link between the education system, society and the economy. I commented on that point, particularly with respect to the economy, in my paper to the subgroup

The Costello Group faced the same issues, and I suppose some people were surprised that we actually came up with a solution. We did it by establishing principles and drawing practical outworkings from those principles. We tested everything that was proposed against those principles.

I would like to remind the subgroup of those principles. There should be equality — each young person should be valued. All education should be high in quality. The curriculum should be relevant, in order to motivate learning. There should be effective access to education, with appropriate support to allow everyone to fulfil his or her potential for lifelong learning. There should be the flexibility to provide a range of choices, with information and advice available to guide those choices — whether it is for parents in the early years of their children's education or students in later years.

The education service should promote tolerance and reconciliation through understanding and respect for diversity, not only from a religious or political perspective, but in relation to the social differentiation in our society. It should be based on the principles of partnership, and the education service should foster effective partnerships. That makes sense in the context of the education of children, not the preservation of schools per se.

Schools exist to meet the needs of pupils. We must examine that point carefully in the context of a range of issues, not least the fact that a recent report on literacy and numeracy highlighted those who are disadvantaged in education and the link to those who are disadvantaged in society as a whole. The question is how we ameliorate that situation in the context of social justice.

As regards the demographic downturn, there are 2,000 fewer pupils in schools this year than at the same time last year, which follows a trend that started in 2002.

The Government have accepted the broad principles contained in the Bain Report, which proposes area planning, something that we should consider in relation to resolving some of the pupil transfer issues.

I mentioned the need for coherence and connectivity of policy. We cannot look at demographics, the Bain Report and area planning without looking at transfer, admissions and transport policy, because another strand of the Bain Report was that we need to get better value out of the education service by not spending money on things that do not affect the child in the classroom.

Before we start talking about transfer procedures, there is a question that must be asked. Sir George Bain has said that Northern Ireland has more schools than it needs, and perhaps schools in places without children. The question is: what kind of post-primary arrangements will there be? Until that question is answered, the issue about the kind of procedures that should be in place for the transfer of pupils at age 11, 14 or any other age cannot possibly be addressed.

In particular, with reference to rural areas, should we always be looking at the structures we know? Can we not consider ages four to 14 or ages seven to 14 in certain areas, because the curriculum model we now have, via the Education (Northern Ireland) Order 2006, is creating core skills, which are really in the middle part of the education cycle between the ages of seven and 14. This is about a skills curriculum, and about coherence within that skills curriculum. We need to ask what kinds of post-primary arrangements should be put in place to facilitate that.

Finally, we also need to look at things such as the pupil profile and remember what the intention was. The pupil profile is a document that guides pupils, parents and teachers in identifying and meeting children's learning needs over a period of time. It was never designed to be a tool to aid selection. It was designed to reinforce assessment for learning and build on good practice in the classroom.

So, those are some of the issues. I have no doubt that there are other issues about admissions arrangements that you will come to in the course of your questioning.

12.00 noon

Mr Uel McCrea (Association of Head Teachers in Secondary Schools): I am Uel McCrea, Headmaster of Ballyclare Secondary School, a non-selective school with just over 1,000 students. I am also Chairman of the Association of Head Teachers in Secondary Schools, which is an association of principals from controlled and maintained schools throughout the five education and library board areas in the Province. I have provided the subgroup with a paper that attempts to set out our position on the inclusion of academic selection as part of admissions criteria.

Our association, although it represents non-selective schools throughout the Province, is not primarily concerned about the preservation of our schools or our type of school. Our main concern, and I know this is shared by many, is that we really wish to have the child at the centre of our focus. The reason for our very existence, as Jim Clarke said, is that schools are there to provide the educational opportunities that will meet the diverse needs of children, with their wide variety of talents and abilities, at each stage of their development.

We want to see young people from Northern Ireland better qualified, more confident and more competent in their skills than ever before. I quote Jeremiah 29:11, where God says to his people:

"For I know the plans I have for you, plans to prosper you and not to harm you, plans to give you hope and a future".

That is what we want for all our children — a hope and a future. We believe that if that is what we are interested in then we are not living in the 1950s, we are moving into the twenty-first century.

There is no reason for academic selection at the age of 11 — children simply do not need it. It is a device to facilitate a ranking order so that a particular type of school can select its intake. That is all it is. Why do we want to separate children artificially at the age of 11? What benefits are in it for them?

I can see why the grammar schools wish to have a pecking order, but what is the cost to the children — the children we serve? What are the negative effects on the primary school curriculum? George Buckley is with me today. He is the parent of a child at my school, but he is also headmaster of a primary school in Magherafelt, and I will let him speak on that point.

My paper clearly states our view that academic selection completely distorts the curriculum. It focuses our minds on things that do not primarily address children's needs. There are now new proposals for computer-adaptive tests (CATs) — we have not learned the lesson that CATs will do exactly the same thing. For 40-odd years we have tried different methods of separating children artificially at the age of 11. They have all been doomed to failure. Now we are told that there is another system comprising 27 tests for children in primaries 5, 6, and 7. The simple question I ask is — why? Why do we do that? Why do the children need to do that? It is simply because certain types of institutions want to have a pecking order.

Education is not about pecking orders: it is about giving everybody hope and a future. Personally, and as an association, we believe firmly in all-ability schools — the Scottish or the Finnish models — but we accept that it seems as though we will not achieve that. The Education (Northern Ireland) Order 2006 gives us the opportunity to formulate an education system that meets the needs of all children and young people and creates a solid foundation for a learning society. When academic selection at the age of 11 is abolished, we can improve choice and flexibility for all pupils.

We believe in the formation of partnerships. We will build on the strengths of existing schools, including grammar schools, which are not threatened by the Education (Northern Ireland) Order 2006. Those partnerships will enhance educational opportunities and, if they are strategically placed, as the recommendations in the Bain Report suggest, we could form local networks of institutions and learning communities and offer a comprehensive range of courses and provision. All children would have a minimum entitlement regardless of where they live or their social-class backgrounds. We should not shut off possibilities for young people, rather we should ensure that they continue to learn and develop and gradually take decisions — along with their parents — on the sort of education and training that they would like and to which they are best suited.

The pupil profile, to which Mr Clarke referred, is designed to help parents and children to choose the most appropriate pathway. It is not meant to be a means whereby a particular school can choose its intake or deal with oversubscription. Mission criteria that best suit local networks of schools, including grammar schools and colleges, can be chosen from the broad categories outlined in the consultation document. Those local partnerships can be given the responsibility to develop appropriate criteria that best suit their community and students.

We cannot retain the present system. It is a socially stratified schools system suited to the 1950s. I do understand, however, why it was created in the 1950s. We need a system that promotes the skills of all our citizens, puts Northern Ireland at the top of the schools' league, encourages entrepreneurship and ends false distinctions between academic and vocational study.

Mr George Buckley: Good afternoon. Mr McCrea asked me to come along to give a parent's perspective. I am a product of the secondary school system. I am a past pupil of Ballyclare Secondary School, and I went through the selection procedure. I have two daughters; one proceeded through the grammar school system, and the other is in the secondary school system.

From a parent's perspective, selection is fine if the child achieves the grade to which he or she aspires, which applies to around 25% of children. However, the impact of a grade that does not allow the child to go to the school of his or her choice can be devastating. Parents see at first hand that their child's self-esteem is damaged when he or she is separated from friends of six or seven years of age. Regardless of having been told that a B, C or D grade is not a failure, society, children and parents regard those grades as failures, and the damage caused can be long term.

As a parent, I question why our children are put through that trauma. My two girls, because of the superb teaching that they have received, will probably end up receiving third-level education in the same place, and I am not quite sure why the selection system needed to separate them at 11 years of age.

Wearing my other hat, I operate within the school system as a primary school principal. Politicians have commented that there is a little distortion in year 7. That is not correct. There is a distortion in the primary curriculum for years 5, 6 and 7, and it is devastating. Our teaching is geared towards the selection test. We do not teach a differentiated curriculum to those children who select the test, and I tell parents that. Parents are under tremendous social pressure, because it is social engineering.

We do not differentiate. Children are taught at level 5, often above their individual ability level. They suffer as a result, and they are frustrated. That teaching method is contrary to the educational principles that have been set out for primary schools, yet schools have to teach in that way because the examination is competitive. Children go through that procedure in years 5, 6 and 7.

The revised curriculum, which has just been launched and which contains a foundation stage, is an enriched curriculum that will operate from year 1 up to year 7. That new curriculum will not dovetail into a system of selection. Neither the in-service training nor the structures that are being put in place for the pupil profile lend themselves to such a system at the age of 11. Therefore there is a huge anomaly.

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): Members may now question the witnesses. However, I would appreciate it if they adhered to their five-minute time limit. For fairness, I will start with the DUP this time.

Mr Donaldson: Gentlemen, you touched on the implications that the Bain Report will have for the reconfiguration of the education system. Given Northern Ireland's changing demographics, I accept that that change will occur. In light of that review and its consequences on the reconfiguration of post-primary education — never mind primary education — is now the right time to change the transfer procedure? Should that change now be put on hold and a temporary arrangement put in place until we see the outcome of the Bain Report and how the system will be reconfigured? Is now the right time to make those decisions about which the subgroup has to make recommendations?

Mr U McCrea: Perhaps Mr Clarke would like to comment on the strategic view; I have no comment to make.

Mr J Clarke: This is absolutely the right time. Earlier this week, Maria Eagle indicated that the Department of Education would take immediate action on the Bain Report proposals rather than wait until the Education and Skills Authority is established. The subgroup should bear in mind the comments that have been made about the curriculum. A new curriculum will be rolled out from next September, and, as I said earlier, we must ensure that we have coherence and connectivity in education policy.

Area planning recognises an area as a cogent unit. It involves ascertaining pupil numbers in an area, and it considers the kind of educational structures that are needed there. That may mean acknowledging that in some areas there are not enough schools and that in others that there are too many. Therefore relocation of schools may have to be considered.

However, area planning must be addressed within the right context. We need to know the kind of post-primary education into which we are transferring children. Until we know that, some of the other issues that we have discussed are irrelevant. We need to know what we are moving towards, and, as Uel McCrea said, parents want to make genuine choices.

As a community, we need to make real choices. As I have said, we must stop looking at education as the preserve of some and not the preserve of others or as an end in itself. We have to create a much closer link between our education system and our economy. If we want to buy people into the idea of a prosperous Northern Ireland, we must have an economy that underpins that concept. At present, there is considerable debate about the attitude of the Protestant community to education, and the results in the House of Commons Committee of Public Accounts' report question that.

Our educational success is another factor. Some 50% of our people go to university, but our economy can employ only 20% to 23% of graduates. Where do the rest go? We are exporting them. However, we may also be creating an even more insidious problem: people with degrees are working at sub-degree level, doing jobs that they could have obtained with GCSEs. That is not the best way to buy a community into the value of education. Our education system must therefore play into our economy.

The Bain Report has several strands. Besides addressing area planning, it considers school funding. Much of what we do, particularly transporting kids from one area to another, takes money out of the classroom. Therefore to answer your question, we must consider the big picture. Bearing in mind the work that has been done in the Catholic sector, with the agreement of education and library boards and other school providers, we could move quickly to area planning.

12.15 pm

Mr U McCrea: We are probably 50 years too late. However, that is a personal view. As a school principal for 20-odd years, I have seen youngsters coming in every year, and I know the damage that selection has done to them. My heart bleeds for them, and I say that this is wrong. I do not believe that an academically capable 11-year-old will lose anything by not having academic selection as one of the criteria for admission. I honestly believe that with all my heart. In the best interests of children — and long term, in the best interest of our Province — we should remove selection.

Mr Donaldson: Supposing that an academically gifted child ends up in an underachieving school on which inspection reports indicate that there is a problem. How does that benefit that child?

Mr U McCrea: There are examples of very good practice. I could take you to Birmingham, for example, where a group of educationalists came together and simply said that they did not want any sub-standard schools in their area. They share expertise to ensure that every child in the area gets an education of a very high standard. There is no doubt about the quality of teachers in Northern Ireland. We already know that they are better qualified and, I would say, have a greater commitment. We simply cannot allow the scenario that Mr Donaldson described to happen. Therefore, in partnership with others, we must ensure that that academically gifted child gets a first-rate education and that nothing blocks his or her way. Moving towards this system will not hinder a child like that.

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): I wish to remind witnesses that they should feel free to forward any other information that could be relevant to the subgroup. If we have time at the end, members will ask questions.

Mr S Wilson: I have a question for each of the panel. First, Mr Buckley talked about separating children at the age of 11. It is inevitable: we had a submission this morning from one of the teachers' unions, which claimed that if we go for area-based schools, we could have youngsters separated on the basis that one house was in one place and another was 5 yards away. Separation at the age of 11 is going to happen where there is a choice of schools and oversubscribed schools.

You also mentioned the distorting effect of testing on the curriculum. Is it not your job as a principal to manage that? If you believe that the curriculum is being distorted, it is up to you to ensure that that does not happen.

I do not like talking about people's personal choices, but you said that you chose a grammar school for your daughter. Were you not making a choice about the differences in schools when you made that decision?

My question for Jim Clarke is on the matter of choice. Mr Clarke was a member of the Costello Report team, and the main thrust of Costello at the time was that parental choice would be central when determining which schools youngsters went to. How can parental choice be exercised without producing the result that Mr McCrea described in which there is an artificial pecking order? People have perceptions about "good schools" and "bad schools", which will not disadvantage some secondary schools. The alleged emphasis on parental choice could result in some good secondary schools going to the wall while some bad grammar schools might be preserved — the exact complaint that Mr McCrea made in his submission.

Mr Buckley: I acknowledge that. We have experience from both perspectives at first hand. We had a child who was a so-called success in the transfer selection procedure. She got an A grade in the competitive examination, so we directed her down the route that the system indicated.

It must be remembered that academic selection was imposed externally. Primary schools have been forced into competition: our children are competing against other primary schools to get into the top 25% of primary-school pupils who are accepted into grammar schools. Our parental body is under pressure as a result and requires that we ensure that pupils are as ready as possible to compete in that examination.

There is no intrinsic educational advantage in sitting a selection test, because the same material is covered over and over again, with the result that children eventually stop learning and become exam-wise. The distortion of the curriculum comes from the system, not what happens in the school.

Mr S Wilson: If that were true, one would expect there to be a far higher rate of failure among pupils who have got into the school of their choice after having gone through that process, and there is no evidence of that.

Mr U McCrea: That is another myth. In the 1950s, the intake of grammar schools was about 20% of pupils; in the North Eastern Education and Library Board the intake is now 45%. The tail of the issue needs to be considered. For instance, the last statistic that I read was that 95% of grammar-school pupils were getting five or more GCSEs. If we assume that 45% of the total academic range of pupils is accepted into a grammar school, 5% of those pupils are getting fewer than five GCSEs. Forty-five per cent of the ability range goes to the so-called academic schools. However, of the next 20%, for which schools such as mine cater, 100% get five or more grades A* to C.

It is a myth that academic selection is a wonderful system. I have yet to meet a foreign gentleman or lady who has viewed our system and thought that it was so fantastic that they wanted to replicate it in their part of the world.

We must be realistic and wake up to the figures. The Department can produce figures that, with respect to Mr Wilson, question that assumption.

Mr S Wilson: You mentioned five passes at GCSE. I must say that one in 20 hardly represents the distortion that Mr Buckley mentioned.

Mr U McCrea: No, no, no. With respect, Mr Wilson, you have misinterpreted what I said. I was talking about the 20% of pupils who fall into the next ability range; I was not talking about our own standards — where 50% of youngsters get five or more GCSE passes — but the ability range. I am talking about the assertion that if we did not have our own selection system, somehow standards would fall. Teachers in both types of school are doing a fairly good job. Quite honestly, however, it is a false notion that separation is necessary in order to maintain standards. That argument does not hold water.

Mr J Clarke: To reinforce that, it should be remembered that there is a common curriculum, which will continue; there is no division in our curriculum. It is nonsense to separate; it is also nonsense to subvert the primary-school curriculum to carry out what is essentially an administrative exercise in transferring children.

Sammy Wilson asked about parental choice. The Costello Report talked about parental choice in the broadest sense: allowing all children — including the most academically able — to have the choice of a curriculum that they value.

The Council for Curriculum, Examinations and Assessment (CCEA) commissioned NFER to conduct a cohort study into attitudes to the curriculum. The first thing that the study found was that there are about 11 different curricula. The study also found that children, particularly those in grammar schools, were demotivated by the curriculum and that many aspects of the curricula that reflected their learning styles were diminished because they were not regarded as academically elite subjects.

Our community, our society and our economy do not require people with academically elite subjects; they require a broad range of skills, some of which will be determined to be academic, others as applied. We need to enable everyone to follow whichever pathway suits their needs. Parental choice is about a type of school in Northern Ireland, not a particular school; by “type”, I mean a Catholic school, an integrated school, a state school and so on. In the context of area planning, all those needs should be met.

The aspirations of schools to deliver particular kinds of curricula should be agreed in the same way as the Birmingham model, which Mr McCrea described. That may mean that some grammar schools continue to offer courses that are primarily academic or vocational. However, it should be remembered that the Education (Northern Ireland) Order 2006 makes it clear that there should be access to 24 subjects at Key Stage 4, and 27 subjects at post-16, or a broad selection at least, to every pupil. That policy is underpinned by the notion that opportunities should be created — not closed.

Mr S Wilson: You have redefined parental choice. Your interpretation is different from that in the Costello Report, and that is interesting.

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): I must interrupt. We are working to a time limit and, as I said earlier, if witnesses wish to provide any additional information, they should feel free to do so.

Mr McNarry: The debate is passionate, and I welcome your deep interest. During previous evidence, a witness said that he had been working on this matter for 10 years and had not yet succeeded. I am a newcomer to the debate, and I think that if someone has worked at this matter for 10 years and has not succeeded, he needs his ass kicked. The problem is that we have not really been trying to find a solution. Everyone has been setting up his own little empire. That worries me, because we have now boxed ourselves in. We have backed ourselves into a stalemate. The Assembly is not going to be able to address the problems that people think it can solve, and it is mischievous of the Government to put the Assembly into that position.

Having said that, I think that members should not give up. The subgroup has a particular remit, and a key role to explore the possibility of consensus on a schools admissions policy. You are the third group of witnesses that the subgroup has heard, and on the basis of that, we have not a hope in hell of succeeding. With all due respect, all members have heard is your side, their side, and somebody else’s side, and this, that and the other.

We know that the pro- and anti-selection debate is divisive, and remains so. I would therefore be grateful if you could not simply adopt those standpoints, but give the subgroup some idea of where you think you could be flexible, where you think that there might be compromise in your ideals or where we could help to build a post-debate consensus. The debate is over, and it has been interesting to listen to, but I have heard most of it before. We want to try to move on from that.

Finally, I would like to hear your opinion on whether 14 is a more significant age in a young person’s education than the age of 11. That has come across from what has been said. Does that have implications for how the transfer procedure should be approached, or for school admissions philosophy?

Mr J Clarke: I am sorry that what you have heard from us sounds as though we are defending a position. Essentially, this is a political issue, and I have been asking why matters have not moved on. The issue would have been resolved by now had it not been for political intervention. Let us be clear about that.

Mr McNarry: Political intervention from where?

Mr J Clarke: From the St Andrews Agreement. The date in the Education (Northern Ireland) Order 2006 was clear. That date has now been moved forward again. Educationalists have reached solutions on selection, and had taken the view that, over a 10-year period, the Costello recommendations were the way forward.

Mr McNarry: With all due respect, educationalists are like lawyers and consultants. We hear from one group, then another, and, as I say, you all have your little empires. We must move on from that, because you have not succeeded. My priority is children’s welfare. The report that you referred to investigated underachievement. Grammar schools seem reasonably sound, according to that. Below grammar schools, however, we find good and bad schools.

Mr J Clarke: No, we do not. We find schools that do a good job with the pupils that they admit, and the circumstances in which those pupils come to those schools. I have sent a paper to all the education spokespersons on how additional money might be spent. One of the matters that I have stressed in that paper is that we must focus on year 0 to year 7 in order to prevent failure in the education system.

That is a fact. Mr Buckley has provided a very clear picture of what primary 5, primary 6 and primary 7 are like. We create failure and we force children through arbitrary thresholds when they reach a certain age. There is sufficient evidence to show the differential between a child born in June and a child born in July, and who happen to be in two different year groups. We need to face the realities.

I have tried to steer this debate away from the narrow view of transfer and selection. In essence, I agree with you — those arguments are gone.

12.30 pm

Mr McNarry: The subgroup's remit is to look at the admissions policy, and also to look for options and alternatives.

Mr J Clarke: As a potential Government, you also have a remit to look at the purpose of the education system.

Mr McNarry: We do not have that remit.

Mr J Clarke: We cannot ignore the realities of how the education system fits in relation to our social and economic development. Members should find out what needs to be done to secure the best possible education system. The notion of selection and transfer is irrelevant, in the first instance. We must first build the system that we want, and then find out what mechanisms are needed to make that system work.

Mr McNarry: Are you saying that the reforms that you support will maintain the excellence that we have on one level and will also improve the poor results? Do you really believe that?

Mr J Clarke: Absolutely. Paper 13 of the Department of Education's review of public administration (RPA) proposals looks at school improvement, and it places a duty on every school to engage in a continuous process of improvement. One of the reasons for that is a recognition that many of our schools — secondary and grammar — are coasting along and are not adding value. We could do so much more.

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): I asked everyone to keep to a five-minute time limit, and so far everyone has used seven minutes. If anyone has anything else to add, they should hand their comments to the Committee Clerks.

Mr D Bradley: I have a question for Jim Clarke, and if either of the other two gentlemen wish to comment, they are more than welcome. Mr Clarke, you mentioned area-based planning. Can that be reconciled with catchment areas, and would such an arrangement assuage the anxieties that people have about postcode lotteries and rural disadvantage?

Mr J Clarke: First, the catchment area should be the area plan. It does not make sense to have an area plan if it is not regarded as the means by which the education of children will be managed in that area. Secondly, if those areas are large enough, and they should be large enough — in our sector, and looking at post-primary education, we have about 20 to 24 areas across Northern Ireland — they could be easily mapped into other sectoral areas as well, and that should provide a catchment area. Everyone in that catchment area should have the same general right to a level of education. While Mr Wilson may feel that my definition of parental choice departs from the Costello Report, we must look at parental choice within the context of the Bain Report. Catchment areas and the area plan are integrally linked.

The Department is charged with two tasks: first, cutting the amount of money spent on school transport in the current spending round and, secondly, coming up with a new policy. The policy should be area based, and that would result in economic savings.

Mr D Bradley: Since you are standing in for Steve Costello, tell us whether the Costello Report was a good compromise among competing educational interests.

Mr J Clarke: We did not set out to compromise. We set out to look at a future educational structure for Northern Ireland. We took all the interests and balanced them by testing them against principles and coming up with proposals. However, that did not mean that we were not changing the system; we were changing it for everyone, and we were mindful of the changes that were taking place at the time on the development of the new Northern Ireland curriculum, which was skills based. We were also cognisant of the development of the pupil profile; we were trying to get connectivity into our educational system.

Mr McElduff: How do you define an area? Mr Donaldson was very specific about situations pertaining to Lisburn. I am looking at it from an Omagh or west Tyrone perspective. For example, Castlederg is a natural social or cultural pathway to Omagh, and yet could be allocated elsewhere. How would you deal with such anomalies? Castlederg is technically in the Strabane district, but is a natural social and cultural pathway to Omagh.

My second question is about pupil profiling. What sort of information do you think parents want or need to inform them about their child's ability? What type of information do they tend to seek?

Mr J Clarke: I will take the first question. As I said, definition of areas will require careful consideration. Within the Catholic sector, CCMS has used the diocese as the base; however, it recognises pupil movement across diocesan boundaries, and structures have been set up to examine that. We believe that those could easily be mapped onto what George Bain has talked about with regard to district council areas. I am not sure whether he was referring to 26 or seven councils, but I assume that it was 26. We could organise that, but we would have to address the questions that you have posed before the areas could be defined.

It must be recognised also that there may be overlaps. Habits of pupil movement build up, sometimes as a result of the road network in particular areas. At a specific level, CCMS considers Holy Cross College in Strabane to be a school for the future. At the moment it is a bilateral school, but it is an all-ability school. It is area-based; however, we recognise that children from Castlederg, which is in that district, are more naturally inclined to travel towards Omagh. We have taken that factor into account in looking at the long-term enrolment of that area. That is area-based planning.

It is significant that the Western Education and Library Board is now engaged in a similar process in relation to the controlled grammar school in Strabane. That is area planning in operation.

Mr U McCrea: Although there has not yet been broad agreement on admissions criteria, learning communities are already becoming established, within which different sectors are co-operating. I know, as a member of the North Eastern Education and Library Board, that that is happening throughout the board area. There is a classic example of cross-sector co-operation in Ballycastle. In Coleraine and Ballymoney there is also a coming together of schools in different sectors. In my own area, Ballyclare, the two schools are co-operating on a common agenda to enhance 16+ courses. Next year, God willing, one of our courses will be health and social care at advanced vocational level. That course will be on offer for the first time.

Those are natural progressions for educationalists, and they give the lie to the notion that we are building our separate empires. My school has been oversubscribed for the past five or six years. What interest would I have in —

Mr McNarry: Do you rank the pupils in your school?

Mr U McCrea: There is nothing in this for me personally. It is about educational opportunities, and I believe that educationalists can work together in the best interests of children, even though they may approach the issue from different angles. We believe in non-selective, all-ability schools, but we are not getting that. Our position is already compromised. We believe that the Scottish system works best; however, we accept that we are not going to get that, so we have to work together for the benefit of children.

Ms Ruane: Go raibh maith agat. You are very welcome. I thank you for your passion. I love to see that — it is great. Your passionate interest and your sense of equality are qualities that are needed in the education system.

I speak both as a parent and as a politician. I grew up with the system that operates in the South of Ireland. Transfer was not an issue; it just happened. No one talked about it. Parents made choices with their children. By and large, the right choices were made, although they were based on many different factors. I am not as worried as others seem to be about change, because change is creative if it is managed well. We can co-operate to manage change well, and we will do so.

There is a border, and my question is about catchment areas for those living in border areas. How will that be dealt with? I have a personal as well as a political interest in this. My children go to the nearest school, which is in Newry, although we are resident in Louth. What changes can be made to admissions criteria to help those in that situation?

You mentioned distortion of the curriculum. The first time my child said to me, “I hate school” was when the school started planning for the 11-plus, and it broke my heart. The key years are nought to seven and then seven to 11 years of age. How do you see the new system stopping that distortion in the primary schools?

Mr Buckley: The idea is that the new curriculum will be skills-based. Assessment is nothing to fear; assessment for selection is where the difficulties arise. Primary schools are all about summary and formative assessment of the children from year one right through to year seven. We do not have a difficulty with developing the children within a skills-based curriculum, developing them as individuals, focusing on their strengths and assessing them.

A comment was made earlier about ranking. We know exactly where our children are in relation to each other; that is not the difficulty. The difficulty is when it becomes competitive to suit the needs of a grammar school and when the children are selected on that basis. The focus of this curriculum is not on the needs of an individual area or sector, it is on the needs of the children. Assessment, and knowing exactly where our children are at the age of 11, will not be a problem.

Ms Ruane: Do you have a problem with Key Stages 1 and 2?

Mr Buckley: No.

Mr J Clarke: Your question on admissions is an interesting one. It is certainly one way of reversing the demographic downturn. The answer to your specific question about Louth, however, is a matter for European countries and how they deal with the issue of crossing borders.

CCMS sees admissions criteria as an artificially constructed problem. If we engage in area planning and produce schools to meet the needs of the area, many of the difficulties that we have experienced will be diminished. I accept that that is not going to happen overnight, but we can make significant progress.

The Department of Education has stopped all building proposals until they are reassessed. They are going to be reassessed within the context of an area plan. When we have that plan, we will know where things are headed and we can quickly move children into an arrangement that points ahead to the new structures. The sum of £3.3 billion has been notionally allocated by the Strategic Investment Board for rebuilding the schools estate over the next number of years. We have to ensure that that money is well spent to create schools for the future, not schools for the past.

The other aspect of your question about the curriculum is that it enables children to develop at their own pace. It is important to recognise that. I know that proposals exist for an alternative to the transfer test, such as CATs. As I understand it, CATs comprises 27 tests of 35 minutes each, taken over three years. Fifteen of them are taken in year seven and the rest divided between year five and year six.

I ask you as politicians: is that electorally logical? Could you sell that to parents? Could you say to them: "We are going to put your kids under pressure for no reason other than to help them move from one building to another."? As Mr McCrea said, our focus is not on buildings; it is on children, and the focus on choice is on the subjects that meet their needs. We should not be forcing kids beyond their learning capacity until they are ready. In the paper that I sent to the party education spokespersons, I said that we should start challenging the cultures that exist in our society.

The pupil profile will help teachers to know when a child is ready to learn certain things. The evidence from the enriched curriculum, as it is emerging, is showing the underlying creativity of children in their capacity to learn — not when people think they ought to learn, but when they are ready. If that means that a child has to repeat a year — fine. If yet another year has to be repeated, it should automatically begin a resourced, bespoke special needs programme for those children.

The big question is: why are 25% of our children transferring with literacy and numeracy deficits? It is because we create failure. Let us stop creating failure.

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): I am going to allow members to have a brief round-up. I remind members that they agreed this agenda. All I am doing is trying to ensure that we stick to time.

Mr Donaldson: Mr McCrea, you mentioned the benefits of a comprehensive, all-ability system. I went to a comprehensive school — Kilkeel High School — and the comprehensive model was introduced there due to the isolation of the area; it was the best option for the area. I am, therefore, not against the provision of a comprehensive model when it is chosen as an area-based solution, but there is no one-size-fits-all solution. Are you saying that comprehensive, all-ability education is the one-size-fits-all solution for Northern Ireland, or are you prepared to make provision for locally based solutions, which might include some form of academic selection, in cases where schools are oversubscribed? Is there any way that such provisions could be accommodated in the future system?

Mr U McCrea: The comprehensive model was ideally suited for Kilkeel, but it is also suitable for Ballyclare, because the children in Ballyclare go to all-ability schools until they are 11. What mysteriously happens to children when they are 11? They can be educated together until they are 11 because the parents or grandparents — along with the children — decide between Fairview Primary School and Ballyclare Primary School. Each of the schools may offer a different ethos or style, and no one questions the choice of school that is made for a child up until the age of 11. However, when the child is 11, something mysterious happens and the children from Fairview Primary School and Ballyclare Primary School are told that they have to go in one of at least two different ways. Why should that be the case?

Mr Donaldson: That might also happen in the system that you are advocating, because if a school is oversubscribed it may not be able to take all of the children who want to go there. Mr Buckley's daughters may still have to go to different schools, because of oversubscription. Is it not correct that comprehensive schools stream children as well? Therefore, there is a form of selection for 11-year-olds in comprehensive schools.

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): I will not allow another debate to start. If members or witnesses have questions or comments, please forward them to the Clerks. Sammy, please be brief, or you will get 100 lines.

Mr S Wilson: For understandable reasons, Mr McCrea and Mr Clarke have tried to downplay the role of the 11-plus — as it is now — but it was not for purely administrative reasons. Mr Buckley admitted that he has seen a difference between two schools. He had the choice to send his daughters to Ballyclare Secondary School or to a grammar school, and he did not send both of them to Ballyclare Secondary School. He obviously recognises that there is a difference between the schools, and that is why he decided that one daughter would go to one school, and that the other daughter would go to the other.

Costello recognised that there were differences among schools, and his report mentions different pathways for different children through different schools. Mr McCrea also recognises that there is a difference

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): Sammy, please be brief.

Mr S Wilson: Yes. Mr McCrea recognises that things happen in his school that do not happen in Ballyclare High School, and vice versa. Therefore, the 11-plus is not merely an administrative arrangement; it is a process that decides what school a child may choose. Is that not the case?

Mr U McCrea: I would love it if you would work in our school for a while.

Mr McNarry: He has been offered a job in another school.

Mr Donaldson: Only in the second form. [Laughter.]

Mr U McCrea: I wish that you would talk to parents such as Mr Buckley, whose second daughter is a lovely girl and who is doing well with us.

Mr S Wilson: Perhaps Mr Buckley can tell us about that.

Mr U McCrea: There are instances when children are artificially separated on the basis of some sort of pecking order. There is no need for that. All children will be entitled to the same curriculum, and they will be doing the same examination at GCSE. They will be competing for the same jobs, but no one will publicly declare that they achieved a particular grade at age 11 just so that it could be used by certain schools as a means of dealing with oversubscription. We can deal with oversubscription, but we do not have to resort to making a statement about the child.

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): We are not starting another debate.

Mr S Wilson: In that —

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): Sammy, I remind you again that I am the principal.

Mr McNarry: The subgroup will be considering computer-adaptive tests. What is your opinion on those?

Mr J Clarke: As I have already said, they are unproven, they will place even more pressure on children, and they might — as is the case with the current transfer test — distort the curriculum.

Mr McNarry: Are computer-adaptive tests not just as unproven as what the Government are forcing on us? Does the same argument not apply to other types of pupil profiles?

Mr J Clarke: Those are not predictive tests; they are mainly diagnostic tests. Diagnostic tests are there to find out the learning strengths and deficits of a child, and we absolutely support them.

The research into pupil profiles has recognised that many teachers are using standardised tests, but do not know what those tests are telling them. That is the focus of the training programme, alongside the roll-out of the new curriculum and assessment regime.

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): I will take three questions together, and the witnesses can answer them as best they can.

Mr D Bradley: Do you agree that the all-ability model, far from being the one-size-fits-all solution that some people claim is, in fact, the opposite? That model has the flexibility to deal with pupils of varying abilities, talents, interests and capabilities, from supported learning right through to A level. Is it not the case that selective education creates a narrower model that has far less flexibility?

Mr McElduff: Can I seek clarification that computer adaptive testing would amount to 27 tests of 35 minutes each over primaries 5, 6 and 7?

Ms Ruane: North/South co-operation is part of the Good Friday Agreement. We have the North/South Ministerial Council, which includes the Minister for Education and Science in the Twenty-six Counties and the Minister of Education in the Six Counties. Education is a specially designated issue and should concern arrangements between the two member states. Both Departments, North and South, should work together when examining catchment areas. Otherwise, we are wasting resources, and that is short-sighted. I agree with what was said about CATs. That is unbelievable — if you were a parent, you would have to go on strike.

Mr J Clarke: None of us are saying that we are for a mixed-ability learning environment. We are interested in differentiation in terms of choice, learning styles, and pace for children of all abilities. Schools organise themselves in different ways. Some schools, mainly grammar schools, use mixed-ability organisations. Many utilise bands and sets, which means that a pupil could be in a top group for one subject and a lesser group for another.

Mr D Bradley: By all-ability, I meant a non-selective model.

Mr J Clarke: Yes; it is non-selective, but we should be focusing on the notion that children make choices that meet their particular needs. I made the point about coherence and connectivity. Everyone can be under the one roof, but can follow different strands. I am not committed to labels such as “comprehensive”, “all-ability” or “one-size-fits-all”. I am committed to looking at needs. When we had the notion of specialist schools, we were talking about meeting the needs of areas, which will differ, perhaps due to their economic profile. That is another form of differentiation that we need to build into the curriculum. We are trying to bring children through an education system so that they fit into society and the economy in later life.

Mr U McCrea: I am a firm believer in all-ability education in the primary sector and in the post-primary sector. I believe that one can differentiate within the system according to children’s needs. Schools must change as the needs of the children change. We must adapt and change. We cannot be fixed and expect children to fit our model; we must adjust our teaching approach to the needs of the children.

The Chairperson (Ms S Ramsey): Thank you for your presentation. If you have any other comments to add, you can forward them to the subgroup. If members wish to ask further questions, the Clerks are willing to forward them.

The subgroup was suspended at 12.55 pm.

On resuming —

1.32 pm

(The Chairperson (Mr W Clarke) in the Chair.)

The Chairperson (Mr W Clarke): My name is Willie Clarke, and I am an MLA for South Down. Welcome to Stormont. I want to do a bit of house-keeping first. Will all members and witnesses please turn off their mobile telephones?

I want to make it clear that I have no professional interest in the education sector. The first group to give evidence is from the Council for Curriculum, Examinations and Assessment (CCEA). Perhaps you would introduce yourselves.

Mr Gavin Boyd (Council for the Curriculum, Examinations and Assessment): I am Gavin Boyd, chief executive of the CCEA. On my right is Richard Hanna, my senior manager in charge of the pupil profile project. On my immediate left is Dr Charlie Sproule, the senior manager in charge of curriculum and assessment policy and on my extreme left is Robert Shilliday, my communications manager.

The Chairperson (Mr W Clarke): Perhaps you will give a short presentation, after which I am sure that members will ask questions.

Mr Boyd: CCEA has provided the subgroup with a short paper. However, it may be useful if I spend a couple of minutes talking about the pupil profile and explain what it is, and what it is not.

The pupil profile is a standardised annual report supported by informed teacher judgement. It builds on the best practice that already exists in classrooms. It supports the current statutory requirement on schools to provide parents with an annual report. The standardised format seeks to ensure that an annual report is provided in the same format across all primary schools, which is not currently the case.

In future, the difference will be that schools will be required to have a meeting with parents early in the school year to discuss each child's specific attributes and learning programme for the year ahead. That meeting will be informed by the previous performance of the child in the school, by the teacher's observations of the child early in the new term and also by two new diagnostic assessments in literacy and numeracy.

I will explain what is meant by diagnostic assessment. We are well used to assessments or end-of-term/end-of-year tests, which are designed to tell us how a child has performed. Diagnostic assessment is designed to tell us how a child has performed in a particular assessment and why. There are several component elements in literacy that contribute to a child's performance in reading. By analysing the child's performance in each of those components, we can identify if there are any particular issues for that child and use appropriate strategies to improve that child's performance.

One of the essential themes of that approach is to ensure that we improve outcomes for children and that we seek not just to identify where children are in terms of their performance, but also seek to improve their outcomes by supporting them where we have identified particular needs.

I could talk for the rest of the time on pupil profile, but it would be better if I handed over to you and your colleagues.

The Chairperson (Mr W Clarke): Thank you, I appreciate that. Members will want to spend some time on this. I remind members that any questions should relate to the pupil profile. I will start with members to my left. Caitríona Ruane apologised that she had to leave for a short time, so Barry McElduff will start.

Mr McElduff: Does the council have a view on CATs? The South of Ireland uses a report-card-template system. Has any scrutiny been done on the effectiveness of that system?

Mr Boyd: We do not have a single view on CATs. The diagnostic tests, which I mentioned in my opening remarks, are computer-adaptive tests. Computer-adaptive tests is where the system, or the computer, looks at the answers that candidates give, sees how they are responding to particular questions and decides on the next question or the next series of questions. The diagnostic assessment that we plan to use for literacy and numeracy are computer-adaptive tests.

There are other circumstances in which we use computer-adaptive tests — for example, in testing skills. We could talk to you in some detail about that. We have also looked, in considerable detail, at the use of computer-adaptive tests in other jurisdictions.

Mr McElduff: Is there any specific thinking on the effectiveness, or otherwise, of the report-card-template system in the South, which helps parents make informed choices about their children's future?

Mr Boyd: No, we have not done any specific work on that, but we would be happy to have a look at it.

Mr D Bradley: The subgroup met with representatives of the teachers' unions this morning. Some of them expressed serious reservations about the development of the pupil profile. For example, they claimed that the profiles, as they are at the moment, are not manageable. The profiles take 60 minutes for each pupil — work that could previously have been done in 30 minutes. They also said that there are presentational problems with boxes and graphs; the timing of the tests is not appropriate; there is not sufficient hardware in the schools to carry out the computer tests; and the testing is too disruptive for the class and it takes too long to carry out. The tests themselves demonstrate improved accuracy, but the concept of awarding scores flies in the face of the thrust of the revised curriculum. They based some of those claims on a report that you commissioned, which was published in September.

Mr Boyd: I will make some initial comments, which Mr Hanna will follow up. First, in line with all our advice to the Government and with all the policies that we seek to develop, we conduct trials widely. We are keen to ensure that the advice that we give to the Government has demonstrably worked in schools in Northern Ireland.

Secondly, I want to split the pupil profile itself, which is the standardised annual report, and the methods that we use to produce the profile. Currently, schools are required by law to provide parents with an annual report in respect of their children. The pupil profile is another form of annual report; of itself, it is no more onerous than previous reports and can be completed manually. In other words, if teachers choose to write reports by hand, they can do so.

The specific comments about the manageability of the reports — for example, that they take an hour to complete — relates to the use of a computerised report writer. Some teachers do not feel comfortable using computers to write reports, and there are other issues about hardware and manageability.

Before I hand over to Mr Hanna to comment on the use of a report writer, I want to point out that, in order to ensure the quality of the information and advice that we give to the Government, we engaged BDO Stoy Hayward to carry out an independent evaluation. We will receive the second part of that evaluation next week, and all the information will be placed on the CCEA website in due course.

Mr Richard Hanna (Council for the Curriculum, Examinations and Assessment): Mr Boyd made a distinction about the physical completion of reports and administering the diagnostic tests. We have used two report writers. One was included in the evaluations and trials of pupil profiling in order to inform our own judgements and opinions about the functionality of the report writer.

A second report writer is used through the service provided to schools by Classroom 2000 (C2k). That report writer has been very successful with regard to functionality, but we recognise that teachers have concerns about it, because it has been the first time that they have used this type of technology to prepare reports. Traditionally, those teachers would have handwritten reports.

We have now conducted two trials for administering diagnostic assessments through the interactive computerised assessment (InCAS) system. The purpose of the trials was to identify teachers' concerns, manageability issues, and so on. Through those trials, concerns were expressed about the length of time that the tests take to administer and the access to hardware in schools, which we accept.

We have evidence from schools that do not have many computers in classrooms that have managed to administer the tests very successfully, albeit that that has been challenging in respect of classroom management, and so on. We are aware of the issues in relation to the use of report writers and are working with our colleagues in Classroom 2000 in an attempt to alleviate any, or all, of the manageability pressures.

Mr McNarry: May I welcome the witnesses to the subgroup.

The subgroup heard three presentations this morning, two of which rejected CATs and another that supported such tests. In the context of the overall education debate, is it likely that there will be an argument over the type of CATs that will be used in schools? Will the purchase of the hardware required be put to tender, or will a strict recommendation be made that a particular type of hardware must be used?

We know that the Order does not provide for profiles to have a role in the transfer procedure. Is there a role that profiles could play after transfer decisions have been taken? Can you elaborate on that and on how you view any assistance that would be given to a post-primary school in the delivery of educational provision?

1.45 pm

Mr Boyd: Mr Chairman, in relation to the CATs and the particular assessments that are to be used in schools, we are very keen that the same assessment tool is used in all schools. The reason for that is that we want to ensure that there is complete comparability of information across the system.

Mr McNarry: Does that mean that you will be recommending a tool?

Mr Boyd: We have recommended a tool. We have been working very closely with Durham University, which is acknowledged as one of the world leaders in the area of literacy. The interactive computerised assessment system (InCAS) tool that Mr Hanna referred to earlier is Durham University's computer-adaptive literacy test, which has been built out of years and years of experience of the standard reading test that it ran before.

Mr McNarry: Is that it? Under European law, there have to be open tenders, and it seems to me that this would be quite a lucrative contract for someone. Who are the handling agents for the Durham tool that you mentioned? To be blunt about it, to avoid suspicion, will your organisation derive any monetary gain from the purchase of this?

Mr Boyd: No. Nor will we be involved in the purchasing process. Our role is to develop advice for, and to give advice to, the Department. The procurement agent in these circumstances would be Classroom 2000, which is the service provider for IT in schools.

Mr McNarry: I asked about that because I do not think that the Department has been great at managing its money. I will say that; you do not need to comment.

Mr Boyd: I am trying to look blank, Mr Chairman.

Mr McNarry: I would be sensitive to the aspects of procurement. There are rules that we have to go through in the Assembly, particularly when approving systems that include hardware and tools. I want to be clear that, while you may make a recommendation, the Department is under no duress to accept it if some other methods are suggested for consideration. Is that a correct assessment?

Mr Boyd: Factually, the situation is that Ministers and the Department make all the decisions; we provide advice. A range of other parties can provide advice or may be asked to provide advice. However, all decision-making resides ultimately with Ministers.

Mr McNarry: Have you any comments on the role that profiles could play after transfer decisions?

Mr Boyd: If I could put this in the wider context, the profile has been developed to travel with a child throughout his education. It is not designed specifically in relation to transfer; it is meant to provide good-quality information to inform decisions all the way through a young person's education. There will be, therefore, a profile in Key Stage 3 and a profile in Key Stage 4. They will differ, but the principle will be the same. It is there to inform decision-making.

Mr McNarry: There is no way that you would envisage profiles being used for selection purposes?

Mr Boyd: The profile is not designed to put children in rank order, whereas the current transfer test does precisely that. Our intention is that the profile will have good-quality information, but it is not designed as a selective tool.

The Chairperson (Mr W Clarke): I will allow other members to speak, and, if we have some time left, I will allow further questions.

Mr McNarry: This is a new Chairman we have, and boy it is great. [Laughter.]

Mr S Wilson: Mr Boyd, you have used the word "standardised" on three occasions so far. Do you mean "standardised" as defined in the format that you have included at the back of your paper?

Mr Boyd: Yes; however, “standard” is probably a better word than “standardised”.

Mr S Wilson: I ask that question because there is no way that the reports, in their present format, could be regarded as standardised across comments or across schools. This morning, we heard a witness from a teachers’ union say that, for example, she might state that someone was brilliant at drama. It was felt that that was an objective assessment, but do you accept that, in their present form, there is no way you could use the reports to compare teachers’ comments within a school, let alone between schools?

Mr Boyd: I am not quite sure that I understand the context of the question. The purpose of the profile is to provide a full picture of each child.

Mr S Wilson: For example, suppose I have two youngsters at two different schools, and the reports are meant to guide me. One report states that my youngster is very good at maths, brilliant at English, and excellent at drama, but the other, from a different teacher, in a different school, says that my youngster there is not bad at maths, all right at drama, or whatever. How can I use those reports as a guide in deciding which school my youngsters should go to, given that there is absolutely no guarantee that the comments are relative or mean the same thing when they come from different teachers?

Dr Charlie Sproule (Council for the Curriculum, Examinations and Assessment): Some comments that teachers will use will be drawn from comment banks. They relate to levels of progression, so teachers will be able to refer to levels of progression that relate directly to the curriculum content for mathematics, communication or information and communication technology (ICT), when making their comments.

Mr S Wilson: The ability to draw comments from a comment bank does not mean anything. You and I could draw comments from the same comment bank about Jeffrey Donaldson, and you could —

Mr Donaldson: He knows me too well. [Laughter.]

Mr S Wilson: Well, perhaps I know him better, so the comments could be radically different.

Mr McNarry: He would probably prefer Dr Sproule’s assessment.

Mr S Wilson: Levels of progression — the very term that you have used — tend to be vague. I am simply saying that the purpose of the reports, even if it is not to guide schools, is to guide parents, and it is a very vague instrument, is it not?

Dr Sproule: You may be overlooking the quality-assurance element involved in teachers’ judgements. It is not simply down to individual teachers making judgements. Those judgements are supported by external moderation arrangements, and so forth, and are supported by statements on levels of progression. Therefore, judgements are not made on the whim of an individual teacher.

Mr S Wilson: The fact that you mentioned levels of progression indicates that it is not specific and that it is open to interpretation.

I wish to address another point, which Dominic Bradley made earlier. You have been working at this matter since 2003. You received a report from BDO Stoy Hayward and, after three years of development, we are still hearing the type of comments that have been made today: “not fit for purpose”; “not manageable”; “insufficient hardware”, and so forth. You have heard all of that from Mr Bradley, so I am not going to repeat it. If, in three years, you have only reached the stage where you are getting what I would describe as fairly fundamental criticisms, how on earth do you ever expect the reports to be effective from 2007?

Mr Boyd: First, it is a necessary but perhaps slightly painful part of any evaluation process that one learns hard lessons, so I do not mind getting pretty hard feedback.

Secondly, I will return to what I said at the beginning. I shall split this up into easy pieces. Many of the comments that were made on manageability do not relate to the report itself but to the processes that we use to produce the report.

We have identified that hardware availability is an issue in some schools. So, despite the money we have spent on integrating IT into the education system, some schools are finding it very difficult to put young people through their assessments using the existing hardware.

There are two responses to that. First, we will put the point to the Department, and it will take the additional hardware provision very seriously. That is the first response, and it is an investment decision.

Mr S Wilson: We are talking about September next year.

Mr Boyd: There will be a significant roll-out of the Lot 6 refresh programme in C2k, which will start at the beginning of the new year and be completed by next September. That is a huge additional investment that will be going into our schools between now and then.

Mr S Wilson: I want to take up that point. Given that you have already told the unions about that roll-out, will you accept that you are not too confident about the roll-out because you are talking about buses with computers going around schools?

Mr Boyd: I will put that one in context presently. Mr Hanna referred to the fact that approximately 100 primary schools — almost 10% — and over 5,000 children were involved in the latest evaluation.

We identified a number of schools with manageability issues and another group, with precisely the same resources, in which there was no manageability problem. Therefore it is a question of us disseminating good practice — how some were able to manage while others were not.

We discovered that despite significant investment in IT, some teachers are not comfortable using it, and that was why it was taking some of them more than 60 minutes to produce reports. However, according to the evaluation, even those teachers admit that once the system is up and running and they become used to it, the process should be considerably quicker in future.

Mr S Wilson: You are telling me that we will have a pupil profile, which will still contain subjective comments from teachers, regardless of the assurances that have been given. You are also saying that many schools do not have the hardware, and that even if they did, teachers are not comfortable using it and will therefore need to be trained.

Furthermore, we have not even talked about how we can ensure that parents, whom we expect to be able to interpret this material, will know how to interpret it. You propose that everything will be done by September 2007 — is that realistic?

The Chairperson (Mr W Clarke): Please answer that question and then we will move on to Mr Donaldson.

Mr Boyd: I take issue with every element of Mr Wilson's statement, and it would take me quite some considerable time to go through it.

Mr S Wilson: I am only quoting your own words to you.

Mr Boyd: You may be quoting my words, but not in their original order, which makes all the difference.

The Chairperson (Mr W Clarke): I think that I heard some Ulster Scots in there as well.

Mr Boyd: I apologise, Chairman. If I had the time, I would give you a very detailed rebuttal to just about every element of Mr Wilson's statement.

Mr Donaldson: Thank you gentlemen, you are very welcome.

You indicated that computer-adaptive testing is not an appropriate means for academic selection or for testing pupils so that schools and parents can make decisions. However, under the legislation that was passed after the St Andrews Agreement, academic selection will be retained in Northern Ireland if there is devolution by 26 March 2007.

Last week, the Department of Education told the subgroup that it has not conducted any research into alternatives to the 11-plus should academic selection be retained. Has CCEA conducted any research into alternative forms of testing for academic selection purposes, and has it informed parents or schools of its intentions?

Mr Boyd: First, we have not commented about appropriate ways to make academic selection. That is not our business; it takes us into political territory.

My comment about computer-adaptive tests was that we are using them to support teacher judgement and reporting in the pupil profile. The straightforward answer to the second part of your question is, no.

Mr Donaldson: Therefore, there is no research available from the Department or CCEA on alternatives to the 11-plus? Have you been asked by the Department to conduct such research?

Mr Boyd: No.

Mr Donaldson: Are you content to leave it to the politicians to make that decision, or would CCEA be prepared to look at alternative forms of testing in the event of academic selection being retained?

Mr Boyd: CCEA operates under political direction, so if Ministers ask us to carry out such work, we would do it to the best of our ability.

Mr Donaldson: Are you aware of any models in European countries or elsewhere where there is a form of academic selection and an alternative to either the computer-adaptive test or the 11-plus?

2.00 pm

Mr Boyd: We have not carried out any research looking at alternatives to the current transfer procedure.

Mr Donaldson: Are you, or any of your colleagues, aware of any models that we might look at from your professional work?

Mr Boyd: I cannot think of any system in the world where children are tested at the age of 11 in order to transfer them from primary school to post-primary school.

The Chairperson (Mr W Clarke): We have some time left; I will give each member a couple of minutes again.

Mr D Bradley: I would like some clarification on CATs. You said that the CATs that you use is a diagnostic instrument. Is that right?

Mr Boyd: What I said was that the CATs test that we are using is a diagnostic instrument. That is not to say that all CATs are diagnostic.

Mr D Bradley: That is the distinction that I want to make. We had the Association for Quality Education here this morning, and its members were advocating using CATs as a means of academic selection. Is that a totally different computer program from the CATs that you are using for the pupil profile?

Mr Boyd: We have not seen a lot of detailed information, but as I understand it that is a pure test of knowledge.

Mr D Bradley: I just wanted to make sure that there is no confusion between what you describe as a CAT and what someone else describes as a CAT.

Mr Boyd: We are simply describing a process in which a computer uses a bank of knowledge to identify the next appropriate question to ask a candidate — if the candidate is doing well, the computer asks a harder question; if the candidate is not doing well, the computer asks a less hard question — until the system can identify the level at which that candidate is operating.

Mr D Bradley: I am just trying to make a clear distinction between two different forms of CAT.

With reference to what Mr Wilson said earlier regarding the comparability of comments on pupil profiles, if teachers are using comment banks — pre-written statements which can be drawn upon by teachers to describe a level of attainment that a pupil has reached — then surely they are comparable right across schools in the North of Ireland?

Mr Boyd: I have two comments to make on that. First, comment banks are provided to ease the burden on teachers when they are filling in reports using a computerised system. In fact, if you look at traditional non-computerised teacher reports, you will see that most teachers actually draw on their own comment banks; in 30 reports that a teacher has written on one class you will see similar comments appearing in groups of reports.

Secondly, it is very important to note that all teachers' comments included in a pupil profile will be informed professional judgements. They will be informed by reference to levels of progression, which are quite detailed statements of attainment, specific skills, attributes and achievements. Dr Sproule has teams of people working hard on that at the minute. Teachers make reference to those levels of progression when they are filling in reports.

We will have in place, as we already have with Key Stage testing, a system of moderation that ensures that there is a level of comparability across the system.

Mr McElduff: Perhaps I misunderstood, but the impression I got from the teachers' unions was that more general statements would not be recorded in the pupil profile scores for literacy or numeracy; rather, there would be a more holistic development of the child. Yet I see that there is a fair bit of scoring recorded in the pupil profile. Do scores not act as a tool for a form of selection?

Mr Boyd: Scores in themselves cannot act as selection tools; the issue is what people choose to do with those scores. The papers that we have submitted to the subgroup show how children's reading and mathematics outcomes would be recorded over time. To use fairly common terminology, we have set those outcomes in the context of reading and maths age. We are used to primary schoolchildren being assessed and being told that they have a reading age of seven and a half or seven and three quarters. That objective information is derived from the diagnostic assessments that are included in the reports and that are meant to be discussed with parents annually.

Mr McElduff: I am seeking a restatement of the purpose of the pupil profile, which is to inform parents.

Mr Boyd: That is exactly right.

Mr McNarry: David Woods, a senior official in the Department of Education, said at last week's evidence session that:

"Parents and teachers in the schools that have undertaken the pilot generally reacted positively to it ...

Teachers were generally content with the pupil profile. At an early stage, they expressed fears about its being an additional burden. However, since it is meant to replace the annual reports that schools already provide, there should be no extra burden ...

People have issues with parts of the pupil profile, but the Council for the Curriculum, Examinations and Assessment has been adjusting the format of the profile to address those concerns."

What adjustments are ongoing? Have teachers and parents found that the profiles add quantitatively to children's educational experiences?

Mr Boyd: The simple answer is yes. The BDO Stoy Hayward evaluation of the pilot reported very high levels of parental acceptance, particularly in relation to meaningfulness. For example, 84% of parents agreed or strongly agreed that the pupil profile provided them with a clear description of their child's progress throughout the school year. Some 96% strongly agreed or agreed that the information that the diagnostic assessments provided was useful.

Whenever we design reports that are meant to be of use to parents, it is very important that they tell us that they understand them and that they find them useful. That means that we can continue to work on the presentation of that information.

Mr McNarry: Did you begin with CATs, or have they just been introduced? Are you getting parental responses to those?

Mr Boyd: We have been working on that for some time. Mr Wilson has reminded us that we have been working at those for two and a half years; indeed, they have always been part of the process.

Mr McNarry: It has taken longer than inventing the wheel. [Laughter.]

Mr Boyd: There is a serious point, however. Presentation of information is very important, and we continue to work on that. One of the lessons that we learnt from the most recent evaluation was that teachers were concerned about the amount of time and effort that it took to fill in the reports. As a result, we reduced the scope of the reports. The work is ongoing.

Mr R Hanna: The iteration of the pupil profile report that is in the subgroup's paper has been refined over time as a direct result of the evaluations that we —

Mr McNarry: I was asking whether work on the report is ongoing. Are you still adjusting it?

Mr Boyd: We will continue to work on its presentational aspects until it goes live. In fact, I make no apology for continuing to work on those aspects as far into the future as we can see. If parents say to us that they do not understand certain aspects of it, we will work on changing those.

Mr S Wilson: I want to come back to standardisation, because I am getting more confused.

According to Mr Boyd, standardisation will be introduced, because there will be a bank of comments that could be open to interpretation by different people. However, Dr Sproule says that those comments will not be open to interpretation and that there will be different levels of progression. Given that this report has 17 different sections and that some of those have five subsections, how many levels of progression will there be for each of those sections?

If, for example, there are five different levels of progression, against which one of the comment banks will be used, how confusing will that be for teachers? Will there be levels of progression for each of the 25 sections, and how many levels of progression will there be? Can you explain how teachers will be able to ensure that their comments are standardised? For example, will the system be able to ensure that David McNarry assesses a youngster in exactly the same way as I would? Will it be able to ensure that children are not treated differently because some teachers take either a harder or easier approach than others?

Mr Boyd: Dr Sproule will deal with the detail of your question. However, I want to come back to the point about comment banks, because I am not sure that I have made myself clear. The comment banks will be a series of computerised records on which teachers may draw to make the writing of their reports easier. Teachers can choose not draw on the comments; they can choose not to use the computerised records. The computerised comment banks are not part of the standardisation process: they are there to make life easier for teachers.

Mr S Wilson: That approach will make standardisation even less likely, because teachers will be able to make different comments. In fact, words mean different things to different people. We had an example this morning where one of the representatives of the teachers' unions talked about using the word "brilliant" on the report. "Brilliant" could mean something totally different to me than it does to you. That is my point exactly: how can these reports be used to make an assessment when they are open to so much subjectivity?

Mr Boyd: Dr Sproule will deal with the detail of that issue. However, please bear in mind that pupil profiles are simply building on the best practice that exists in our schools. I am sure that Mr Wilson does not mean to, but it almost sounds as though he is asking whether any of the information contained in school reports over the past 20, 30, 40 or 50 years could have been trusted. I know that that is not what he means to say, but we are seeking to demonstrate that we have built a higher level of utility to support the system. The report system will be supported by levels of progression, by assessment units and by all the other tools that teachers can and do use in their daily practice.

Dr Sproule: The levels of progression are not a new measure. They exist and are used by primary and post-primary teachers to inform their judgements. The levels of progression that we are revising will apply to reporting performance in the three cross-curricular skills of understanding maths, communication and using ICT.

Mr S Wilson: Therefore, those levels of progression will not apply to 14 sections, meaning that teachers will not receive guidance for nearly 60% of this report. That means that each of those sections will be wide open to subjectivity. Therefore, even with the levels of progressions, an element of subjectivity remains.

All I am trying to get at is that if these levels of progression are to be used as guidance for parents, they will be virtually useless. Is that not the case?

Dr Sproule: The levels of progression relate to the basic skills of literacy, numeracy and ICT. The report reflects the fact that some of the other aspects on which parents would wish teachers to report, such as personal development, do not lend themselves to such strict measurement. The report refers to whole pupil development along with more specific development in certain skills.

Mr S Wilson: I would like a yes or no answer to this question. Given your comments about the lack of hardware and teacher training, the fact that no explanation has been given as to how parents will be prepared for this system, and the work that Mr Boyd has said remains to be done, will a fit-for-purpose pupil profile be ready by September of next year?

The Chairperson (Mr W Clarke): Yes or no, Mr Boyd?

Mr Boyd: Yes.

The Chairperson (Mr W Clarke): Sammy, are you happy enough with that?

Mr S Wilson: Yes.

Mr Donaldson: Sammy mentioned parental preparation, which is crucial because the whole purpose of the pupil profile is to inform parents. These documents are much more complex than I envisaged and, following today's exchange about subjectivity, the levels of progression do not appear to be very clear-cut. What are you going to do to inform parents about, and educate them on the role of, pupil profiles?

2.15 pm

Mr Boyd: First, I refer back to the most recent evaluation, which involved 5,000 children and their parents. We picked up on what parents do and do not like, and on what they know and what they need to know. Secondly, a huge programme of assessment conferences for teachers will take place in January. Although I do not know how many teachers will be involved, I can tell members that there will be 47 conferences.

Mr R Hanna: The conferences will involve well over 1,000 teachers.

Mr Boyd: We intend to build on the relationship between parents and teachers. Think back to the process that I described at the beginning. The idea is that a teacher would meet with parents early on in the year to discuss, for example, Jane. The teacher would outline what the school knows about Jane, her strengths, the areas in which she might need help, and how the school proposes to provide that help. The suggested approach might involve Jane's parents sitting down each night to read with her. That system would work effectively if Jane's parents were to take that information on board, along with the other interaction that they have with her teachers. We all rely on guidance from primary schoolteachers to make the right decisions for our children.

Mr Donaldson: We do, and I accept that. However, the advent of the pupil profile changes the nature of that guidance, making it much more crucial than it is today. This may be an unfair question to ask CCEA, but I will ask it anyway: does that not leave teachers more vulnerable to pressure from parents who have a preconceived outcome for their children? Let us face it, parents will, in many cases, have selected the ideal school that they want their child to attend well before they enter the pupil-profile process. Is there not a danger that parents will put pressure on teachers as to how the profile is prepared? In the end, the parents take the final decision, but, nevertheless, they do have the right to give the pupil profile to a school. I am concerned that this could result in pressure being put on teachers.

Mr Boyd: This is getting into territory that is a little bit away from our home base. Our objective is to ensure that the best quality information is available in the profile. The situation at the minute — given that pupil profiles were not designed to be a selective tool — is fundamentally different from the situation that pertained in 1978, 1979 and 1980, when children transferred on the basis of primary school decisions or, in the couple of years when there was no transfer test, information from teachers. That led to the situation that Mr Donaldson identified. Indeed, there were one or two incidents where teachers had to move home. This situation is different because pupil profiles are not designed to be a selective tool.

Mr Donaldson: I have one final question. How do you feel pupil profiles will help parents and children from the most disadvantaged backgrounds?

That process tends to be of more benefit to parents from an affluent background than to parents from a disadvantaged one, who might not have had the best educational experience themselves.

Mr Boyd: That is an important question. There is no way that we could answer it in a couple of minutes, but I would be happy to come back to the subgroup on the matter. That issue takes us a little bit beyond our territory. However, when advising Ministers on other issues, we have pointed out that there are circumstances in which young people need multiple interventions, particularly those from disadvantaged areas or from socially difficult backgrounds.

The Chairperson (Mr W Clarke): Each member may ask a question, after which the witnesses can sum up their answers.

Mr McNarry: I was struck by a thought when listening to Jeffrey's line of questioning. Surely there is bound to be a risk of a parent mounting a legal challenge against a pupil profile if, having disclosed their child's profile to a head teacher, their child then receives a rejection letter from the school? What indemnity is there in such an event? How can the matter be foolproofed? That is a serious issue, as rejection could shape the child's future. What happens if the parent does not accept the pupil profile?

The Chairperson (Mr W Clarke): Mr Boyd, can you please take note of that question?

Mr Boyd: Yes.

Mr McNarry: Can he not answer it?

The Chairperson (Mr W Clarke): He will answer it at the end.

Mr D Bradley: Does the pupil profile have sensitivity to children with special needs?

Mr Boyd: Yes, and we have carried out additional work on that.

Mr D Bradley: Can you elaborate?

The Chairperson (Mr W Clarke): That question can be answered in the summary.

Mr S Wilson: I want to follow on from Jeffrey's point. It is not enough for Mr Boyd to say that Jeffrey's question is very important but that he does not have time to answer it now. I do not accept that this issue is not CCEA's responsibility. Mr Boyd, you must have some idea about this if CCEA is to achieve the Government's objective. If CCEA is placing in the public domain a report that is meant to be for the guidance of parents, it must have some idea of how to make it accessible to them. As Jeffrey pointed out, it will be more accessible to some parents than others, depending on their educational experience, their knowledge of how the schools system works and their interest in their youngsters' education.

That will add to the timetable, so we should at least be told how CCEA believes that it can be achieved. What plan will CCEA put in place to ensure that the report is accessible and that it is not full of gobbledygook that a teacher is left to explain at a parent-teacher meeting? I know from experience that the parents of the youngsters whom teachers most want to reach often do not attend such meetings.

The Chairperson (Mr W Clarke): I thank members for their questions. I now ask the witnesses to sum up.

Mr Boyd: I will deal first with the question on special needs. Some additional work has been carried out with special needs teachers to adapt the profile to make it relevant to young people with special needs without reinforcing feelings of underachievement. We will happily provide additional information.

Mr McNarry's question about pupils being rejected because of their pupil profile goes beyond our competence, but I do not know how such a circumstance could arise if the profile is not to be used as a selective tool.

Mr McNarry: I asked about the potential for legal challenges.

Mr Boyd: I am trying to envisage how circumstances involving a pupil profile would be different from circumstances involving a third-form report or the primary 6 report that children receive. These reports will show teachers' professional, informed judgement, backed up by objective information. The grounds for challenging a profile are no different from the grounds for challenging the reports that schools issue now.

That is my first reaction to the question, but I would be happy to get back to Mr McNarry on that.

Mr McNarry: If you would.

The Chairperson (Mr W Clarke): Mr Boyd, could you furnish the subgroup with any additional information by the middle of next week?

We now move on to Sammy's question.

Mr Boyd: I was not trying to dismiss Mr Donaldson's question in any way, shape or form. I was trying to react to your direction, Chairperson, because I sensed that time was moving on. Parental involvement is hugely important to the entire community, and CCEA has put in place tools that will allow it to improve the educational outcomes for all young people.

However, putting those tools in place will not work without the strategies to support them. There will be an extremely detailed programme of support, including the sort of parental support to which Mr Donaldson referred. There are already one or two schools in Northern Ireland in which that happens. The need for that support is recognised.

Mr Donaldson: You will be giving the subgroup a paper on that, Mr Boyd?

Mr Boyd: That sounds like a request.

The Chairperson (Mr W Clarke): Thank you very much for your contribution, Mr Boyd, and congratulations on your appointment as chief executive of the new Education and Skills Authority.

Mr McNarry: Crawler.

The Chairperson (Mr W Clarke): I also thank members for their patience. Mr Boyd, is it possible to furnish members with copies of the pupil profile evaluation report?

Mr Boyd: Yes; as soon as we receive it, we will happily do so.

The Chairperson (Mr W Clarke): Thank you very much to all your team.

The subgroup was suspended at 2.26 pm.

On resuming —

2.35 pm

The Chairperson (Mr W Clarke): The subgroup will hear three presentations; therefore, each session will take 20 minutes, including questions. It would be good to have an hour, but, unfortunately, our time is restricted. Each party will ask one question. Representatives of Comhairle na Gaelscolaíochta are unable to attend, but they will give the subgroup a detailed submission.

The delegation is most welcome. If Mr Wardlow would give a brief two- or three-minute presentation, we may have time for questions.

Mr McNarry: Is this not the fifth session? Should we not be hearing from the Transferor Representatives' Council? Has that been changed?

The Committee Clerk: Yesterday the agenda was reshuffled, and a new version was issued this morning. Please take a copy.

Mr McNarry: When will we hear from the Transferor Representatives' Council?

The Chairperson (Mr W Clarke): We will hear from that group at 3.10 pm.

Mr S Wilson: Could we not be integrated with someone else? I want to be separate. [Laughter.]

Mr Michael Wardlow (Northern Ireland Council for Integrated Education): Equal and separate.

I am so small that, had you told me that the seats were so low, I would have brought a cushion. You could have raised me up in hire purchase.

It is good to have the opportunity to speak to members. I have given the subgroup a paper that contains brief overviews of the two main subject areas. However, I have only three or four minutes to highlight some aspects of those.

My first point is with respect to the general overview. One cannot discuss the pupil profile and admissions criteria without considering the planned changes to education. I do not mean the implications of the review of public administration alone; I am referring to 'A Shared Future' and the Bain Report, which was published last week, and the statement that Maria Eagle, the Minister with responsibility for education, issued in response to that. In that statement, she announced that 95 projects will be frozen. At the moment, everyone is trying to find out what is happening. Ultimately, however, education will change profoundly: we all know that.

In considering pupil profiles and the admissions criteria, admission will be to a different type of school than that which we have been used to. However those matters are agreed, they will probably be part of a much better, and wider, collaborative arrangement.

Therefore, admissions and pupil profiles should not be thought of as a high-stake changing of schools at the age of 10 or 11.

My second point is that integrated schools, about which I am speaking in particular, are distinct from others simply because there are relatively few of them. Their catchment areas, therefore, tend to be much wider. For example, Integrated College Dungannon has a catchment area of a 30-mile radius. When I discuss that later, members should be aware that integrated schools do not have local catchment areas.

I turn now to the two main issues: pupil profile and admissions criteria. The Northern Ireland Council for Integrated Education (NICIE) broadly welcomes the pupil profile. We have been following its development and evaluation by the Department of Education and the Strategic Advisory Group. Although this is not the appropriate time for philosophical argument, I need to make it clear that most integrated schools are all-ability schools. The exceptions to that are two schools that have chosen to select a cohort of pupils. The fact that, in some integrated schools, 70% or more of pupils consistently achieve A to C grades confirms, to our satisfaction, that all-ability education can be delivered.

The council has stated in its paper its reasons for not wanting the pupil profile to be used for any form of selection. It was never designed for that: selection means ranking a child at a particular age, on a particular test, to go to a particular type of school. Schools, on the other hand, are more concerned with knowledge, experience and attitude. Given that the pupil profile reflects those concerns, it could not be used for a one-off ranking process.

For the same reason, the council is not in favour of computer-adaptive testing; it is also a selective process. I can discuss that later, if members wish. The council would like the subgroup to refocus slightly and ask why pupils should consider any high-stake changes of any sort at the age of 11. The council would like the subgroup to focus on the age of 14 and to consider how selection might proceed at that age. That might involve academic selection, but it could also involve election, because children are more mature when they are 14 years of age.

Teachers have some concerns about the pupil profile. They fear, for example, that parents might want to influence teachers unduly so that they put particular subjects on a pupil's record. The council has also spoken to a number of parents who feel that the profile needs to be readily accessible and easily read because sometimes teacher-speak does not always translate easily for parents. Time and resources must be applied to that. The council's evaluation highlighted those points.

The second aspect was admissions criteria. Our response has been that far too many admissions criteria are used as selection tools. We are in favour of a drop-down menu that contains compulsory groups. For example, our overview paper mentions elements such as geographical location, feeder primary schools and family connections. We argue that those criteria should be compulsory but that there should be an option to choose from within them. In fact, it should be the same for every school. We want to do away with interviews and other forms of specialist admissions criteria.

The overview paper highlights some methods that schools currently use to select pupils. The methods used by grammar, integrated and secondary non-integrated schools are very different. We argue that a drop-down menu would streamline the process. Schools should be able to select from a common criteria menu. Our argument is that compelling individual needs should be very much reduced.

When the survey was carried out two years ago, post-primary integrated schools had 50% more statemented pupils than the other sectors. Our schools would not want to close the doors on, or have a quota for, special-needs children. We accept that schools should not be required to have more than 2% to 3% of their total intake made up of special-needs children. The quota should not be supernumerary. However, schools can accept more special-needs pupils, and they should be resourced accordingly, if that is the case.

The final page of the overview paper details the four different areas of criteria. We consider aspects such as family criteria and, for the integrated sector in particular, it is important to have family connections at the top of the list of criteria. All our schools use family connections; most use the criterion of the eldest child in a family already attending the school, followed by another sibling. Second families, adoptive families and step-families must also be considered in that regard.

We argue that a child who has attended the school, but who has since left, should also be counted as a family member. That is not only to consider second families, but to allow for the fact that, on some occasions, there was no integrated school available for an older child to attend.

Community-based and local criteria have been problematical for us, simply because we are not sure what that means for an integrated school that has a catchment of 60 feeder primary schools, for example. That is one area that needs to be debated. We are concerned about nominated feeder primary schools and parish schools because they run contrary to the Shared Future agenda.

Furthermore, if a state or Catholic-maintained school, for example, wants to move towards becoming integrated, but is situated in a single-identity community, which 94% of public housing areas are, how on earth would community balance be achieved? For NICIE, community balance is a key factor. Using local criteria as part of the overall admissions criteria needs to be put in the context of community balance. In fact, we still need to select children on the basis of community balance.

If a tie-breaker is required to be used as a selection tool, NICIE uses a randomised alphabet through computer sorting. The feedback survey that was carried out in 2005 found that the majority of views supported that process, with one or two exceptions. We advocate the use of randomised selection on pre-published surnames, which would change every year. When the way in which tie-breakers work is considered, it does not actually cover many schools at present.

The big problem is that significant numbers of schools are oversubscribed. In the academic year 2004–05, almost 100 schools were oversubscribed. Almost all grant-maintained integrated schools are oversubscribed, so admissions criteria are something that must be viewed in the new context of collaborative arrangements. That will mean that children will not have to take a high-stakes test that brands them as certain types of learners from the age of 11.

The Chairperson (Mr W Clarke): I ask members to ask succinct questions. There will be three minutes allowed for each question and answer, but that should include two minutes for the answer. As we want to hear complete responses, members should not make long speeches when asking their questions. We will begin with the DUP.

Mr S Wilson: My question is to seek clarification. Mr Wardlow said that he does not want specialist criteria. He also mentioned academic selection. Does attending an integrated primary school not count as specialist criteria?

Mr Wardlow: To be frank, our problem is that we are stuck in a situation where there are around 20 integrated post-primary schools, yet there are 40 integrated primary schools. There are not enough integrated post-primary schools. One issue is to ensure that parents who have chosen integrated education for their children from the age of four can rely on systemic integrity throughout. If a child does not sit a transfer test and writes off the opportunity to go to a grammar school, we want to be able to offer that child the potential to finish his or her education in an integrated school.

Integrated primary schools do not count as feeder schools in the sense that they are not locally based, but we want schools to be open to the possibility of accepting children from other schools. Around 50% of kids come from integrated primary schools, so I do not want them to be closed.

Mr Wilson said that he felt that attending an integrated primary school counted as specialist criteria, and I understand that view. We are trying to highlight the fact that 800 pupils were turned away from integrated secondary schools last year, and we want to try to do something about that.

Mr S Wilson: It is not that I consider attending an integrated primary school to be a specialist criterion, but it cannot be denied that that is a specialist criterion in so far as it can apply only to pupils who have attended integrated primary schools. How do you justify using that criterion when you want to deny grammar schools the right to use specialist criteria?

Mr Wardlow: Let me answer very quickly; perhaps it is my use of the language. The specialist criteria to which I referred include interviews and extra-curricular activities, which are used by 50 or 60 schools. Selection is not a specialist criterion; it is a fundamental criterion that transcends specialism. However, if you are saying that it is the same as attendance at an integrated primary, we would have to differ philosophically on that.

2.45 pm

Mr S Wilson: That is not just my interpretation; anybody would accept selection as specialist. There is one point that you have not addressed. Given the political arrangements, we are still likely to have academic selection after 26 March 2007 as the basis of at least some transfer from one school to another. What means might be put in place to facilitate that?

Mr Wardlow: There are two issues — how to address the admissions criteria and how to set the test. I am fundamentally against selection of any sort. The potential to select still exists, but the admissions arrangements do not, so we have to create those arrangements and the test. The parties agree that selection should continue; however, NICIE recommends that if selection must continue, it should happen when pupils are 14 years of age. We should consider how to assess the capability of a child of the age of 14, not in a high-stakes test but in some way that we have to work through. I do not have a simple answer. It should not be a two-Friday test; at the age of 14, it is more serious than that.

Mr McNarry: I mean no disrespect, but I have been here since 9.30 am and have heard nothing new; the debate is going nowhere. People are adopting rigid attitudes, and I suspect that you will not change yours. I want to ask two questions. Do you rank pupils in your schools and how do you rank them? Secondly, to be more positive, how can we build a post-debate consensus on admissions criteria? Where will we take matters? We need to hear something new — you are meant to be innovative and all things to all men in education.

Mr Wardlow: I am not sure what is fact and what is opinion, but I shall assume that most of what you say is opinion rather than fact.

Mr McNarry: That is your opinion; I am only giving it back to you.

Mr Wardlow: Since I am not sure what you mean when you ask how we rank — whether you mean by set or by streaming — I will explain both very simply, because it answers your two questions. The boards of governors of Lagan College and Slemish College have decided to select a certain number of pupils. I am against it, and NICIE opposes academic ability as a form of selection.

Mr McNarry: Do you punish them in any way?

Mr Wardlow: I suspect that there has been a misunderstanding. We are a charity: we have absolutely no control over any school. We exist to give parents access to integrated schools. There is a debate in the sector among the schools about selection. Personally, I do not accept academic selection even in part.

Some of our schools, such as Shimna Integrated College, do not even put pupils into sets in stronger or weaker subjects until the third year. Other schools will set, which means that if a pupil is strong in English, he or she will be put into a stronger English class. However, to the best of my knowledge, none of our 20 post-primary schools uses streaming, in which pupils are placed in a stream based on some sort of academic ability and remain in that stream for every subject.

We have come up with new ideas on the post-admissions criteria. Our paper stated our fundamental opposition to selection at the age of 11, and I suggest that the debate should refocus on the age of 14. That is new, and consensus is possible. First, we could look at some form of empowerment for pupils at the age of 14 in a new collaborative arrangement under the Costello and Bain Reports to consider how we get that choice at the age of 14. Selection is one of those issues. With respect, Mr McNarry, that is new.

Mr McNarry: I am glad of the newness, although choice at the age of 14 is hardly new. The NICIE paper states that the organisation favours pupil profiles; however, if a school does not set or stream, what are the profiles for?

Mr Wardlow: I am sorry; I have answered you incorrectly. The schools do set, but they do not stream. For example, if your child comes in —

Mr McNarry: However, you are not in favour of either.

Mr Wardlow: No. That is where there is misunderstanding. I do not accept the high-stakes test at 11 years of age — selection through academic ability. It is fundamentally important that children reach their potential, but I do not accept that that should be done by selection at 11 years of age.

With regard to children who have different abilities in a school, I accept that there is absolutely nothing wrong or contradictory in allowing a child whose English is stronger than his or her French, for example, to be put in a more able English class. That child may not be as strong in three or four other subjects. However, the whole idea of trying to set children is to allow the less able to progress upwards. There is currently a debate on that issue in all the education sectors. I am fundamentally opposed to sending children to a particular type of school and deciding whether they are academic or more suited to a vocation at 11 years of age.

Mr D Bradley: Mr Wardlow, you mentioned earlier that you had been tracking the progress of the pupil profile. Are you satisfied with the progress that has been made to date?

Mr Wardlow: Part of what I receive comes from the Strategic Advisory Group, of which I am a member. As a parent, I am not satisfied that the pupil profile is at the stage that it ought to be. Several pilots have been carried out, and the results will roll over to the next evaluation. I would prefer to be further down the line with profiling. However, progress has been made on the new, more straightforward form. The original form was much more complex. The expectation on teachers to complete the profiles in 35 to 40 minutes is unreasonable. Teachers must be trained in how to complete profiles.

Teachers still believe that they will have to make decisions for parents about which schools their children should go to. That is not a teacher's role. The relationship between the parent and the school — particularly the primary school — must be specified. Furthermore, young people say that they want to see post-primary schools earlier. They have said in the responses that they want to find out what the post-primary schools look like. However, they are not allowed to do so until the year before they are due to leave primary school.

The pupil profile is only one issue. My fear is that it will become yet another issue like class averages. I do not believe that class averages should come into the matter. That is the carrot-and-stick approach.

Mr D Bradley: You said that you were strongly opposed to the high-stakes decision at the age of 11 and that 14 is a more strategic age for making choices, choosing pathways, and so on; and that selection may be in the mix.

Mr Wardlow: Purely pragmatically, I agree that we must be mature, have a debate and not allow fundamentalism to get in the way. I am, therefore, happy to debate the matter.

Mr D Bradley: By the age of 14, a child could be studying 12, 13 or 14 subjects. What type of test do you envisage for 14-year-olds?

Mr Wardlow: I am not sure. We must consider how the stage between the age of 11 and the age of 14 will look. The Craigavon model has been mentioned. However, that model leaks because young people can get out and go to grammar schools. There is, therefore, no hermetically sealed homogeneous unit that can be examined.

There is enough creativity in Northern Ireland to prevent us from always having to borrow the educational philosophies of others. There are plenty of us, and we are mature enough. I welcome being able to talk to the subgroup again because I have missed that. It sets the standard that the subgroup can have such debates where I must put my philosophy to one side for the greater good of young people.

Mr McElduff: My question is about the admissions criteria and the tie-breaker that will come into play. Will proximity to the school be introduced earlier than the tie-breaker with regard to integrated schools?

Mr Wardlow: Our integrated schools do not have proximity criteria. Part of the problem with that is exactly what I referred to earlier. Many integrated schools have a catchment area of perhaps a 15-, 20- or 30-mile radius. Proximity has never been an issue. Our integrated schools are, in fact, fundamentally opposed to proximity criteria in any shape or form.

Mr McNarry: Is it true that you are going to buy a bus company?

Mr Wardlow: I may have to buy two in order to have a community balance.

The council believes that random selection that is based on pre-published surnames, with "Mac" surnames included as well, is a better way. The survey seems to agree with that.

Mr McElduff: It is interesting that the Ulster Teachers' Union, I believe, preferred the geographical criteria to the randomised criteria. Your view is that criteria should be randomised without any reference to proximity.

The Chairperson (Mr W Clarke): Caitríona arrived late at the meeting, and I had said that each party would have one question. However, Caitríona can have the rest of the time that is available, if Barry agrees. There is one minute left

Mr McElduff: I will give way.

Ms Ruane: Thanks, Barry.

One of the issues that you mentioned was special needs. What are the percentages?

Mr Wardlow: A survey of integrated post-primary schools that was carried out in either 2003–04 or 2004–05 — I cannot remember which year — found that on average 50% more children are on statements in integrated post-primary schools than in other comparable schools.

Ms Ruane: That interests me. How do those children get on as they get older?

Mr Wardlow: I could give you individual examples of young people who have come to school with low self-esteem — most of whom are included in the mainstream. At Integrated College Dungannon, where there are 30 of those young people, or Shimna Integrated College, where there are 35, my experience is that the majority of those young people are well rounded, get extremely good results and outperform what they are predicted to achieve. However, there are exceptions to that.

Ms Ruane: The work that you are doing is very interesting.

The Chairperson (Mr W Clarke): Michael, thank you for your contribution.

The subgroup was suspended at 2.56 pm.

On resuming —

2.59 pm

The Chairperson (Mr W Clarke): You are welcome to the Subgroup on the Schools Admission Policy. You may introduce yourselves and follow with a short presentation of around three or four minutes.

Ms Dorothy Angus (Department of Education): I am from the equality, inclusion and pupil support division of the Department of Education, and my colleagues are Irene Murphy, who is head of the special education branch, and John Leonard, who is from the open enrolment transfer procedure branch.

I will begin with a summary of the paper that we have provided. My colleagues attended the subgroup meeting last Friday, and some members expressed interest in special educational needs (SEN). The short paper that we have provided sets out the current arrangements for the provision for children with SEN. Approximately 3% of the school population has a statement of SEN, and about 16% have some learning disability.

We have set out the interface between SEN and the current admissions arrangements in particular, bearing in mind the subgroup's terms of reference.

Children with statements are considered for post-primary placement outside the usual arrangements to ensure that they are placed in the school best suited to their needs. Other children with SEN follow the usual procedures but with an opportunity for their special circumstances to be considered.

The paper also refers to the ongoing review of special educational needs and inclusion. I can outline the process of that review, but, as indicated in the paper, the outcomes have not yet reached the stage that would allow them to be explored with members.

Will I continue?

The Chairman (Mr W Clarke): Does everyone have a copy of the paper? We will take questions from the floor.

Mr McNarry: The subgroup was specific in its acknowledgement that it could have been better informed on special needs. It is something that, sadly, is neglected in the plethora of papers that come at us.

The session has been interesting up to now, and I am sure that you will continue to make it so. Pupil profiles have been highlighted in many instances. How can children who have SEN adapt or respond to the equipment that pupil profiles will demand of them? Or should there be different tools from the pupil profiles for children who have special needs, and, if so, would there be a parental reaction to that?

3.00 pm

Ms Angus: The pupil profile is a standardised form of annual report, and the intention is that it will apply to the majority of pupils. However, CCEA is developing an alternative format for reporting to the parents of pupils who have multiple learning difficulties. To achieve that, it is consulting principals, teachers and parents on the most suitable format. The SEN dimension will, therefore, be considered.

The statement reflects the child's ability and needs. The pupil profile will build upon and complement that. Computer-based tests form part of the pupil profile, and there will be provision to modify or disapply those for pupils for whom they are not appropriate. That is my understanding, having spoken to colleagues who work in that area.

Mr McNarry: Will the Department of Education work with parents on those modifications? I am particularly interested in the equipment involved.

Ms Angus: I am sorry that I cannot give you a detailed answer, because CCEA is developing the pupil profile. However, my understanding is that CCEA will consult principals, parents and teachers to adapt the profile so that it is suitable for children with special educational needs.

The Chairperson (Mr W Clarke): Are you happy with that, David?

Mr McNarry: I am not sure that CCEA is qualified to modify specialised equipment. The pupil profile is a different matter; I am talking about the tools and equipment that are used. If a standard piece of equipment needs to be modified, the pupils who use it and their parents should be consulted. Can you assure me that CCEA is doing that?

Ms Angus: I am not sure what you mean by tools and equipment.

Mr McNarry: The computers.

Ms Angus: Are you referring to the computer-based tests?

Mr McNarry: I mean the use of the equipment or machinery for assessment purposes. Mr Boyd talked about diagnostic tests in which pupils hit buttons to answer questions. If they get a question wrong, the computer moves them on to the next question, which is not as difficult. If they answer a question correctly, however, they move up to a more difficult question, etc. Does that clarify what I mean?

Ms Angus: My understanding is that CCEA will modify or disapply the use of those tests, but I expect CCEA to work with experts in the Department, principals and teachers. I believe that an individual from the teaching profession has been seconded to CCEA to work on the pupil profile, but I cannot be absolutely sure about that, Mr McNarry. I hope that that is helpful.

Mr McNarry: It is.

Mr Donaldson: The Special Educational Needs and Disability (Northern Ireland) Order 2005 and the new arrangements to encourage and facilitate children with special needs who want to attend mainstream education mean that any changes in the wider remit of education and, in particular, the transfer procedure, have some impact.

Are you saying that, in relation to the transfer of children with special needs from primary to secondary education, statementing will still have primacy over the pupil profile when informing parents, schools, and education and library boards (ELBs) which school is most appropriate for a child's needs?

Ms Angus: The statement of special needs is the more detailed of the two documents that will be available to parents, children, schools, ELBs and everyone involved in deciding how children transfer to their new schools. Therefore, under the current arrangements, the statement has primacy.

Mr Donaldson: I must declare an interest. I am a governor of a special school in Lisburn.

The statement would have primacy, but is there an academic content in the statementing process?

Ms Irene Murphy (Department of Education): I will outline the statutory assessment process. The education and library boards, as currently formed, have a statutory duty to assess children, who may then be statemented. That statutory assessment must formally take advice from parents, schools, the child, health professionals and other education professionals. That is then considered in the round. The assessments that the boards' educational psychologists undertake have an academic element that covers English and mathematics and considers the results of psychometric testing.

Mr D Bradley: There is a special category in the proposed admissions criteria called "compelling personal circumstances". Is that directed towards children with special needs?

Mr John Leonard (Department of Education): No, it is a provision in the legislation that will enable pupils with compelling individual circumstances, such as looked-after children and children with severe medical conditions, to be placed in suitable local schools.

Mr McElduff: Some people argue for academic selection at the age of 14 rather than 11. If that were to come about, how would the education interests of children with special educational needs be protected?

Ms Angus: Those are hypothetical circumstances that have not been considered, but, at the moment, there is a process in place for children with special educational needs to transfer at age 11. A process would be put in place to look after children with special educational needs if the transfer process was changed to age 14. I do not foresee any major difficulties, but that matter has not been considered in detail.

Mr Donaldson: I wish to return to the use of psychometric testing as part of the statementing process. I appreciate that the purpose of that is different from a transfer test that grades a child. Nevertheless, when a child reaches the age of 11, or whatever the age is under the new arrangements, what is the process? If a child has been statemented in primary school and is at the point of transfer to secondary education, presumably you undertake a reassessment and decisions are then taken about the school to which the child will transfer. Will you describe that process at age 11, and explain the factors that determine which school the child transfers to?

Ms I Murphy: When a child is in primary 6, his parents will be considering the options for post-primary education. The parents liaise with the school, and the school liaises with the education and library board. Detailed psychometric tests may not need to be applied, but there will certainly be a review of the child's work in class, in conjunction with the class teacher and the parents, and consideration is given to the child's and parents' aspirations. If it is felt that the parents and the child want a grammar school education, as it is now, the education psychologist will be asked to review the documentation and make a decision on whether further testing is required.

The result of that testing, along with all the other work that the child has done over the past number of years, will be taken into consideration by the psychologist. That is the advantage of the system for children who have statements: rather than a one or two-day test, the child's all-round achievements are considered.

Mr Donaldson: It is a combination of continuous assessment and testing?

Ms I Murphy: Yes.

Mr Donaldson: Thank you. That was very interesting.

Ms Ruane: We always hear about how children with special needs "hold back" those children who have "different or higher abilities". As experts in this field, what are your opinions on the benefits of children from all ranges of ability studying together? In particular, what are the benefits for those children who are not viewed as having special needs?

Ms Angus: I do not believe that it is within our remit to express any personal views or to comment on policy. We can give members guidance on how many children are in mainstream schools, if that would be helpful. Did the question refer to children who are educated in mainstream schools as opposed to special schools?

Ms Ruane: My point goes slightly further than that. In certain countries, the school of thought is that educating children of all abilities together benefits and enriches all those children. In the North, however, the education system is divided, and some sectors believe that children with special needs hold back the other children. I understand that you cannot give personal opinions, but studies show that children who do not have special needs benefit from being educated alongside those children who do.

Ms Angus: Ms Ruane has referred to the policy of inclusion. The Government's policy is to include all children in mainstream schools. However, parental choice is important, and a growing number of parents are choosing to send their children to mainstream schools. Of those children with special educational needs, 65% attend either mainstream schools or special units attached to mainstream schools. Therefore, the policy is to educate children with special educational needs with other children. The availability of parental choice means that some parents still choose to send their children, depending on their needs, to special schools.

Ms I Murphy: The policy provides for measures to meet the continuum of need and to fit with the current legislative requirements. It is a mixture of considering the needs of the child, the wishes of his or her parents and the education of other children. In comparing two children with similar needs, one could be more comfortable at a special school, while the other would be better placed in a mainstream school. That is why current policy allows for a continuum of provision coupled with parental choice.

Mr D Bradley: At what stage is the review, and when will it be completed?

Ms Angus: The review of special educational needs is at its development stage. As the review will cover a wide-ranging and complex area, one of its initial characteristics has been a lot of pre-consultation work to determine people's opinions of what issues should be included. We have started to develop a model, but proposals are not yet far enough developed to have received ministerial clearance. A fair wind permitting, we hope to have the new policy in place by the late summer. Of course, special educational needs are governed by legislation and, if legislative changes are required, the implementation of the new policy will depend on the legislative timetable and developments in the Assembly. That is the timescale to which we are working.

The Chairperson (Mr W Clarke): On behalf of the Committee, I thank Ms Murphy, Ms Angus and Mr Leonard for their contributions.

The subgroup was suspended at 3.14 pm.

On resuming —

3.30 pm

The Chairperson (Mr W Clarke): You are all very welcome. We will have a brief presentation and then take one question from each of the parties, followed by a supplementary question. The session should last approximately 20 minutes.

Rev Dr Lee Glenny (Transferor Representatives' Council): It will be helpful for you to know who we are and whom we represent. We are here as part of the executive of the Transferor Representatives' Council (TRC), which seeks to serve on behalf of the Church of Ireland and the Presbyterian and Methodist Churches, which in the 1930s, 1940s and 1950s largely handed their schools over to the state, so that they became Church-related schools instead. Under that name, we were involved in the governance of schools with members on each board of governors and on the education and library boards.

I am the Methodist secretary for the board of education, and my colleagues are the Rev Ian Ellis, the Church of Ireland secretary of the board of education and the Rev Robert Herron, the Presbyterian secretary of the board of education.

Rev Ian Ellis (Transferor Representatives' Council): Thank you very much for the opportunity to speak to you and to share and touch on some of the general issues around the post-primary arrangements that have been proposed. We are acutely aware that since we submitted all our responses to the draft Education (Northern Ireland) Order 2006 last year, the process has moved on in some ways yet seems to be standing still in others.

The matters of pupil profiles and admissions criteria were consulted on, based on the assumption that academic selection would be excluded as a criterion, but now, since the passing of the 2006 Order and the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006, it is no longer clear that that will be the case. Perhaps we can get some clarity on that soon.

It is our understanding that an incoming Minister of Education would have to establish very quickly the context for admissions arrangements, whether it be a selective system or not, and to come forward with some kind of regulations about those admissions criteria.

I want to say something briefly about where our Churches stand on the issue of academic selection to try to help you see our stance. We considered the decision to abolish academic selection very carefully indeed. We believed, as many do, that it has been a blunt instrument to determine a child's abilities, aptitudes, career destinations, and so on.

We balanced that criticism with an acknowledgement of the very high achievements in schools in Northern Ireland, but we also had to take seriously the other criticisms of the selective system's negative effects and, most notably, the disadvantaging effects that it has had on children from deprived and disadvantaged backgrounds — in particular, it seems, children from working-class Protestant backgrounds. Among other reports, this week's report from the Committee of Public Accounts shows a clear differentiation in outcomes for children from those backgrounds.

We are also acutely aware that academic selection is an issue on which people are divided. I know that the parties are divided on this issue, and there is a division of opinion within our Churches, too. As members of the education boards and the TRC, we have tried to take a balanced view. We decided that, on balance, transfer by informed parental election was a better way forward. We have listened to the views of many who support academic selection and fear a lowering of standards. Many people are unconvinced that the proposed system will work, and we have, on many occasions, pointed out to the Department that it has failed to demonstrate with enough conviction that the system will work in future.

Our paper outlines some of our opinions on pupil profiles, admissions criteria and other general issues. We do not know how much detail the subgroup wants to go into on each of those areas.

We feel that a pupil profile would be a helpful tool. The Northern Ireland Continuous Household Survey has shown that most parents feel that it would help them to choose the best pathway for their child. Although the pupil profile has been well tested and piloted, no real information about the outcome of those tests has been placed in the public domain. Such information has been promised, but we have not heard much about it. Disclosure of that information would help to boost public confidence.

As the Department has not yet issued the promised regulations, it is difficult to see how the admissions criteria will work. If distance is used as a criterion, that will affect rural areas as review of public administration policy papers suggest that transport costs will be charged in future. There are likely to be many disputes about exact calculations of distances and who is eligible and who is not.

Our paper includes comments on the education system that we feel is needed. It must be adaptable and flexible, and it must allow for people's development later in life. Pupils who find that their education path does not work out as planned should be able to have their needs met in an adaptable system.

Oversubscription is also an issue. We have no research estimates about the likely future levels of oversubscription and which areas are expected to be oversubscribed. It seems that it will be a problem in areas such as Belfast and greater Belfast, but less of a problem elsewhere in the Province.

I am simply touching on issues; I am not sure which topics the subgroup would like to expand on.

The Chairperson (Mr W Clarke): No doubt members will draw out the issues in their questions. We will start with Mr McNarry this time.

Mr McNarry: You are very welcome. It is good to see you. I noted the Rev Dr Lee Glenny's point about how the Churches disposed of their schools long ago. Perhaps in his report, Sir George Bain will recommend that the Churches be given the ability to re-purchase some of those schools and put them back into community use. It would be great to see the Churches consider playing such a role in the future of education.

The TRC paper is very interesting, and it raises issues that have crossed all our minds. It comments that the council would like "honest and accurate feedback" on pupil profiling to be placed in the public domain — I am sure that that is not suggesting that what we might get is dishonest or inaccurate feedback, but I will leave that for the council to answer. How can such feedback be placed in the public domain? As politicians, we have information on these results, but is the problem that the council and the wider public does not have it?

Rev Ian Ellis: I was hinting at wider public confidence that the pupil profile will do what it says on the tin.

Rev Dr Lee Glenny: To follow on from that, Angela Smith made a statement in December 2005 in which she said:

"Our key aim is to ensure that pupils, parents and teachers have confidence in the Pupil Profile."

There are vague details about pupil profiles in the public domain and they have not been brought forward as they should have been.

Mr McNarry: I concur; the issue is about information and communication. How can that be addressed? If the wider public were in receipt of information on the pupil profiles, how could their confidence be gained, bearing in mind what you know about pupil profiling and how it will be developed?

Rev Robert Herron (Transferor Representatives' Council): It would have been interesting to see how parents would have used pupil profiles if they had had them before academic selection vanished. We are in a difficult situation because we have no idea about the choices parents will make. As the Rev Ian Ellis said, we can see major problems with possible over-subscription to schools in the greater Belfast area, whereas, in the west — where I come from — the difficulty for some schools is in surviving.

Mr McNarry: Paragraph 3.2 of your paper is interesting. It states:

“the present selective system has diminished the esteem of non-grammar schools... Even if a non-selective system is agreed, a prolonged investment of resources would be required.”

What do you mean by “prolonged investment of resources”?

Rev Ian Ellis: My view is not one that is shared by all. I believe that the selective system has counted against secondary schools in particular; they have lost the oxygen required to survive. A secondary school pupil in the 1960s and 1970s would have been in a mixed environment with many pupils with a wide range of abilities. Many children did well through the system. Even though they may have failed the 11-plus, they got good qualifications and achieved reasonable levels of attainment.

The selective system has sucked many able pupils into grammar schools, which means, ultimately, that the range of abilities of those children attending the secondary schools is narrower. That is what I mean when I say the schools are being starved of oxygen — the oxygen of wider-ability pupils.

Secondary school head teachers say that the loss of more able pupils has had many effects. It has removed role models, pupils whom other children might look up to, and those with leadership qualities who might inspire others. The wider mix of pupils has been diminished through parental choice and the transfer system.

Mr McNarry: Is parental choice not a key point in this case? Parents voted with their children’s feet.

The Chairperson (Mr W Clarke): Could we have a yes or no answer?

Rev Ian Ellis: The other thing is the reduction in the numbers.

Rev Robert Herron: Pupil downturn is a major issue, and if I am allowed the time, I will give you an example, because it will be useful for everyone to hear. For the past year, I have attended meetings with the governors of a high school and grammar school in Strabane. The situation there is that two thirds of the pupils in the controlled sector are going to the grammar school and one third — about 200 pupils — is going elsewhere. Therefore, the high school does not have enough resources or pupils to offer the broad curriculum required. In such cases, not only are teachers being made redundant every year due to the downturn in pupil numbers, the grammar school is continuing to fill its complement. Pupil downturn has a negative impact on schools, and it affects the morale of the teachers and pupils.

Mr S Wilson: I am confused. You began by saying that election was better than selection and that — further to that — the pupil profile would be helpful in that regard. However, you are now saying that in the west, where there are plenty of places, parents can elect whatever school they want for their children. You have, therefore, got exactly what you said in paragraph 3.2 that you did not want — the diminished esteem of non-grammar schools and their decline.

The policy that you advocate seems to be in line with current Government policy. If that policy were to be adopted, is there not a danger that the situation in Strabane that you described will become even more commonplace? That is that parents will elect schools that are deemed as, or perceived to be, good schools. Is there not a further danger that some good secondary schools could be diminished as a result?

3.45 pm

Rev Robert Herron: Where there is a limited number of pupils, it is a question of balancing parental choice against keeping a viable school. What are schools to do when their numbers are continually falling? That is the experience right across the west of the Province.

Mr S Wilson: Would a better option be simply to continue with selection but to make it clear that, if a selection system will operate with one route for academic education and another for vocational or general education, the number of places in academic schools will be limited to protect the other schools, as you suggested? Is that not a better way of managing the situation than simply allowing parents to select the school that they want?

Rev Ian Ellis: I agree with part of what you say, Mr Wilson. Somewhere along the line, grammar schools have lost their raison d’être. As I understand it, grammar schools were established to encourage academic rigour and to develop analytical thinking and the skills that are needed for professional jobs. As the years have gone by, however, their role has expanded, and grammar schools have become popular, good schools that provide a good education. Perhaps the solution would be to restrict grammar schools to what their primary purpose ought to be.

Mr S Wilson: Would that not be a step back towards selection rather than election?

Rev Ian Ellis: The difficulty with having a test as a selection tool is that it favours advantaged pupils, that is, those whose parents can afford to pay for their children to have extra tuition to prepare for a test and those parents who aspire to send their children in that direction.

Mr S Wilson: You said that schools take youngsters down a particular educational route. In the absence of educational assessment, how on earth would youngsters be selected? You now seem to be arguing for the retention of grammar schools, albeit with limited numbers.

Rev Ian Ellis: Our argument is that selection should not happen at the age of 11, as it is perhaps not the best age to make such an assessment. The new proposals, and the thinking of many people, seem to favour the age of 14 as a key pathway decision time. At that age, pupils can bring something to the decision-making process themselves. I do not know whether we all have 14-year-olds in our families, but they can easily say what they want to do. It is important to hear that voice when making a decision on whether a pupil will study French verbs or something more vocational.

Mr D Bradley: I note your concern about the admissions criteria and the effect that they may have on children from a rural background. You are anxious that a situation may arise in which such children would be discriminated against. Is a possible solution to draw catchment areas as widely as possible and use random selection as a tie-breaker?

Rev Ian Ellis: I have a feeling that we could end up using tie-breakers very quickly. The different proposals contain a variety of criteria. Some focus on effectively drawing a circle around a child and finding the nearest appropriate school; other proposals draw the circle around schools or suggest that schools identify the predominant feeder schools.

That could disadvantage children who have to travel a very long distance to school. Do we really want our children to have to travel for more than one hour to get to school? We need much more thinking and research into how the regulations and criteria could disadvantage children who have a long way to travel.

Mr McElduff: Dominic Bradley asked a good question, which concerned the understanding of rural communities. I had in mind a similar question about whether academic selection is randomised or geographical. However, I shall ask another. Does the Transferor Representatives' Council draw a direct connection between the system of academic selection and underachievement on the part of many pupils?

Rev Ian Ellis: We have to conclude that there is a systemic problem with academic selection, which enables those who are capable and well resourced to do extremely well and achieve some of the highest results in the UK. By "well resourced", I do not mean money; I mean pupils whose parents will encourage them and take them forward. However, as we mentioned earlier, we have also received notice that many children are underachieving. It seems to be a systemic effect that when large groups of children who have been failed by the system are brought together, there is nothing to motivate them to achieve higher standards.

I was interested to read that many members, in their political comments on the report, said that there is a poverty of aspiration. How can we improve that? As I suggested at the beginning, part of the solution concerns the mix of pupils in our schools. Beyond that, we must also tell children — in our case, Protestant working-class children — that education is a route forward. It seems that many Protestant families in impoverished areas see education as a turmoil and a travail; whereas many Catholic families seem to see it as a transport and a route to a better life.

I believe that much work needs to be done to change that poverty of aspiration. Resourcing is also part of the solution: we need long-term investment.

Ms Ruane: There is a real issue with the Protestant working-class community, and that is something that we, collectively, have to look at. However, although some sections of the Catholic community see education as a way forward, huge sections of it are being left behind. We should not be under any illusion: the Catholic working-class community is not benefiting from academic selection. We must work on that matter collectively. However, traditionally in Ireland, even in the most rural and disadvantaged areas, education was seen as a pathway, although not everyone had that pathway.

Rev Robert Herron: That is difficult to measure. There is plenty of evidence to demonstrate a clear correlation between social need and academic achievement. However, sometimes this matter comes down to a personal family situation. I have three children, two of whom were selected and one of whom was not. Perhaps members have been in a similar situation. I drop my three children off to school each morning, and one of them wears a uniform that represents the words: "I didn't make it." Not only do we say to children that they failed the 11-plus, but we then put a uniform on them for the next six years just to remind them.

The Chairperson (Mr W Clarke): I will allow two more questions of one minute each.

Mr McNarry: It is very difficult in a session such as this not to make throwaway remarks, but we must not simply dismiss underachievement in Protestant areas by saying that academic selection has had a great bearing on it.

The three of us on this side of the table work very closely with the Protestant working class, as I am sure you do. In identifying the deprived areas, we must ask ourselves why they are deprived, how they became deprived and what the areas are like. They are known as the interfaces in Belfast. The grandparents of today's children were not attending school, so there are two generations whose parents and grandparents have not contributed in the home to benefiting their children in the way one would expect to be normal two miles away on the Malone Road. I do not dismiss the idea of aspirations, as that is a positive aim, but we cannot write off underachievement as the cause of a test that children do not aspire to pass.

Rev Ian Ellis: Of course it is much more complex than that. The conflict has a lot to do with it, as does the social and geographical setting. We think that the problem with the system feeds into those factors and exacerbates and ingrains the differences that already exist.

Mr Donaldson: Gentlemen, you are very welcome. Robert, I will pick up on the last point that you made, as it was a very powerful one about your three children. I know that that is replicated in many families and homes across Northern Ireland. My difficulty, however, is that in some areas, schools will still be oversubscribed. In the area I represent, Lisburn, I can see immediately that at least three of the schools will be even more oversubscribed than they are today. There will still be good schools and better schools — I do not like to call any school a bad school — in the public consciousness for years to come. Purely because of demographics and year of birth, and so forth, those situations will continue to arise; the problem you are talking about will not fully be overcome by the new arrangements.

Is there not the possibility of another unfairness arising, in that a pupil may find that they did not get into a school simply because of where they lived rather than because of their educational or academic ability? Dad is a farmer, they live in the countryside, the proximity rule is applied as a tie-breaker, and they lose out. Are you not in danger of replacing one unfairness with another? Is there not some other approach to this that strikes a better balance?

Rev Robert Herron: This is balancing one unfairness against another. I sit on the board of governors of a grammar school, and we are already applying the criteria about family and geographical focus and being community-based — after academic selection. There is unfairness now.

Rev Dr Lee Glenny: Thank you for that. We would like to emphasise the importance of the end of Key Stage 3 and the question of the esteem of secondary schools. If that esteem is raised and there is a common curriculum at Key Stage 3 with flexibility and adaptability so that at the end of Key Stage 3, a child will have greater maturity and a greater opportunity to be aware of his gifts and talents, and a change of school can be appropriate. If those elements are built into the system, some of the inequalities of the first three years can be negated.

The Chairperson (Mr W Clarke): Thank you very much for your contribution. On behalf of the subgroup, I would like to wish you all a very enjoyable Christmas and a peaceful new year.

Rev Dr Lee Glenny: We appreciate the opportunity to be here and to share ideas. We realise that you have big responsibilities in front of you and we too wish you every blessing as you seek to find an equitable and helpful way forward for the children of this and future generations.

Mr Donaldson: If you find a Solomon out there, please send him in.

[Laughter.]

The Chairperson (Mr W Clarke): Thank you.

(The Chairman (Dr Birnie) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Members, the witnesses are from the Northern Ireland Manufacturing Focus Group (NIMFG) and Amicus. Basil McCrea is the chief executive of the NIMFG, Jim Donaghy represents Amicus, and Mr Forbes is the chairman of the NIMFG and a director of Forbes Furniture.

Good morning, gentlemen. I welcome you to this meeting of the subgroup. Thank you very much for attending.

I thank you for your submission, which has been very helpful. The subgroup's prime focus is to take questions, but if you would like to make a short introductory presentation, that would be helpful.

Mr Basil McCrea (Northern Ireland Manufacturing Focus Group): Thank you very much, Chairman. We are grateful for the opportunity that has been afforded us. I have circulated copies of an opening statement, so people may have already read it in addition to our submission, but I will read through it for completeness.

The major issue that we want to talk to the subgroup about is the competitiveness of Northern Ireland plc. A study by the Economic Research Institute of Northern Ireland (ERINI), which was published in January 2006, suggested that Northern Ireland plc was, on balance, competitive. Although the study accepted that we had higher energy, freight, fuel and insurance costs, it also noted that we had lower property and labour costs. One might say that what you lose on the swings, you gain on the roundabouts.

If one goes into the report in detail, however, it paints a picture of manufacturing as an economic subsector. The report identified labour as being cheaper in the Republic of Ireland for manufacturing, and industrial property as being cheaper in six regions of the United Kingdom. Therefore the manufacturing sector must grapple with all the disadvantages without having any of the offsetting advantages. We are at a competitive disadvantage on every conceivable measure. Industrial derating was the one and only saving grace that we had. Without it, even our best and most profitable companies are moving out of Northern Ireland, and they are moving out at a certain rate. We want to bring that fact to people's attention.

Some commentators have pointed out that rising employment levels show that the phasing-out of industrial derating is not a big issue. The general problem is, however, that we are losing high-value — high gross value added (GVA) — manufacturing jobs and replacing them with part-time and low GVA jobs. Productivity — the key measure of economic success — is falling rather than rising. That is what we should be considering.

Manufacturing is not doomed; it is not a lost cause. That is one issue on which we want to be strong. Some people have suggested that the textiles industry is a lost cause. Actually, we have some very good companies that are doing very well. They can compete and they will compete in the world market; however, they will not do so from Northern Ireland. Our problem is that, instead of putting the investment back into Northern Ireland, we are putting it elsewhere.

Manufacturing currently employs 90,000 people.

The recent report by PricewaterhouseCoopers, commissioned by the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Industry, contained the scenario that Northern Ireland would lose 40,000 jobs if the manufacturing sector were to lose foreign direct investment (FDI) and local investment. That represents 40,000 jobs out of a total of 90,000 jobs, because for every job lost in the manufacturing sector another would go in services as well.

There is a wealth of academic information supporting our case. The subgroup will also be aware of the recent employment figures, which show that while employment is rising manufacturing is falling. That is happening now.

We would also like to point out to the subgroup that phasing out industrial derating is a short-sighted and counterproductive policy. The Government will not raise the £80 million predicted because the manufacturing sector will react to that cost pressure. It will relocate, reorganise or close down. The £80 million will not come in, and it is not a question of the manufacturing sector not paying it; the money will have to be found from somewhere else.

If one loses a workforce, one also loses VAT, income tax, national insurance and corporation tax. We have asked for industrial rating to be frozen at the current level of 25% — and we know that the Assembly has debated the issue. We are not saying that the manufacturing sector will not pay its way. We are more than happy to do so — but perhaps “happy” is overstressing it a bit. We are prepared to make our contribution, and we already make a big contribution. However, if that contribution goes much higher, manufacturers will not be able to compete here, and they will leave.

We have also identified, through the ministerial working party that some of you will be aware of, that unlike other economic issues that Members might be faced with, industrial derating does not have any state aid issues. That is an important point, because it means that the issue is something that Members are in a position to deal with.

We have a very broad church of support, in particular, our good friends from Amicus, and we have discussed how we might address the very serious skills shortage in Northern Ireland. It is easier for businesses to bring people from Lithuania, or Latvia, because when people here are trained, they leave as soon as they are trained. There must be a way to address that issue, and we would like to put a proposal on the table for discussion. It is something we have not fully worked out yet. However, if we were to see a positive engagement over the rating issue then we might engage in a private sector led retraining initiative. The details have been mentioned in our submission.

Finally, Northern Ireland has the lowest rates of economic activity in the UK. A stated requirement of Government is to reduce dependence on public sector employment. However, one of the big questions we have to ask is: where we are going to find real jobs for those people? The manufacturing sector, with its breadth of opportunities, has a real role to play here. We are prepared to step up to the mark and work with Members, but we need a clear signal from our elected representatives that they are prepared to act decisively on an issue for which they have responsibility. We would very much like to work with you, and we will answer any questions that you may have.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Thank you very much. Could we start with Sinn Féin?

Mr Raymond McCartney: Thank you, Basil, and your colleagues, for coming. You have made a presentation to Sinn Féin before, so I am familiar with some of the issues.

What is the relationship between industrial rating and job losses? Do you have any figures for job losses? What impact would capping at 25%, 30%, 35% or 50% make on job losses?

Mr B McCrea: We predicted that there would be 30,000 job losses within the next three to four years. Subsequently, that figure was backed up, although we did not know it at the time, by the PricewaterhouseCoopers report, which suggested that the loss would be 40,000 jobs. The real issue is one of confidence. The manufacturing sector feels that there is no point in trying to do anything at the moment. If we had a signal that we were going to be listened to that might change.

When we were engaging with the working party, we did not say that the rate had to be set at 25%; we said that between 0% and 100% there must be an optimum level. We were prepared to have research carried out to determine the figure. We have asked, however, for a freeze at the current level until we get the research. We will accept whatever figure the research comes up with.

Twenty-five per cent is probably the level at which we can say that we are being listened to and the rate can be set. We are not being definitive, but we are using 25% as a working assumption.

Mr Raymond McCartney: If the economic base strengthens over time, do you envisage that the rate could increase?

Mr B McCrea: We would be happy with that. There are several issues; it is about competitiveness. If we can address the cost issues, such as electricity, we can accept an increase in the rate. The workforce must be properly rewarded. The average wage here stands at about 80% of what it is in other areas. NIMFG would like to see an increase in manufacturing pay across the board so that a decent wage can be earned for a decent day's work, and we want to contribute to the building of a better manufacturing base.

Mr Raymond McCartney: You may or may not be aware of a current document, which is a study of reinvestment in the Twenty-six Counties. There is a suggestion that tax revenue cuts are not properly reinvested; they are seen as an incentive. Has NIMFG examined that? What is the relationship between the benefit of derating and reinvestment?

Mr B McCrea: There is a concern that big government spends a lot of money, but not in the right direction. Part of it is the private sector's responsibility in that it cannot just carry on complaining; it has to get involved. When we examined our skills initiative, we wanted to refocus some of that money and deal with some issues. NIMFG strongly believes in a partnership between local government, the trades unions and the business owners.

It is worth saying that typically, our members are indigenous people, though we do have some very large manufacturing concerns as well. Those people tend not to interact very well with Government agencies that come in and tell them how to run their business. However, like anyone in Northern Ireland, if you know how to talk to them in the right way, they will respond positively. There is an issue about a better-focused attempt at getting resources into that area. The current initiatives are not working; though we can see them, we cannot get them. NIMFG would be happy to work with you and take lessons from anyone else, whether in the Twenty-six Counties or Scotland or Wales. The question is whether we can get best practice, and we are a forum for that type of work.

Ms Ritchie: I shall concentrate on the small business relief scheme, because the subgroup has to make proposals that look forward to what an incoming Executive could do upon restoration of the Assembly. What is NIMFG's view of the small business relief scheme, which applies in Scotland and England, but has not been applied in Northern Ireland? Were the scheme to be applied here, would it bring a benefit to the manufacturing sector?

Mr B McCrea: We are not against rate relief for anybody. Small business schemes have a different dynamic. We have the highest proportion of employment in large companies of any UK region, so the people who are really facing a problem are those will have a bill of between £50,000 and £60,000 and up to £1 million. Those types of numbers really affect the decision-making process.

When rates are being set, they are subject to the old 80:20 rule; that 80% of the rates are lifted from the top 20% in the sector. If you were to argue whether it is worthwhile collecting rates from people who only pay £2,000 or £3,000, it could also be argued that it costs £2,000 to £3,000 to collect it — and it is not helping.

The matter of how to get employment growth and competitiveness, which you will want to address, concerns activity slightly above the level of small business areas.

How much impact would a saving of £2,000 a year have? Nobody wants to pay £2,000, but it is the scale of things that is important. Most of our members will lose £30,000 to £40,000, which is effectively the managing director's salary. I am sorry if that is prevaricating a little, but the bigger issue is with the next tier up. However, we understand why the small business sector will take any assistance that can be given.

Ms Ritchie: I know that you have already been involved in the subgroup with the Minister and that you got some amelioration as a result. What outcome would you want to see from the planned review of industrial rating, in April 2007, for the next financial year?

10.45 am

Mr B McCrea: We want to see an ongoing cap at 25%. We are prepared, if the evidence is there, to negotiate around that. The unions would like it to be set at zero, and they have made their position quite clear. When you look at the wider issues, such as corporation tax and various other matters, the one big advantage of industrial derating is that it is doable, and doable now — although it is not particularly easy to get your head around that. Other issues, however welcome and good, come with more baggage. This is something that can be done immediately, and the manufacturing industry would respond very warmly to all of the other social issues that need to be addressed.

Ms Ritchie: Does that mean that you would view the 25% as your upper limit, or your cap?

Mr B McCrea: We said that we were prepared to consider an additional 5%, provided that it was ring-fenced. We have spoken to colleagues in further education colleges, in Amicus, in Belfast City Council and many other councils about this subject. There is an opportunity to do something different, but it may cut across other issues that the Department for Employment and Learning (DEL) is doing, so we cannot say anything yet. However, the simple answer is that 25% is the upper limit that we can afford to pay, but we would engage to see if there were something extra that we could do for other issues. The two are separate, but we are not saying no to the second.

Mr Cree: You mentioned in your report the competitive disadvantage that manufacturing would have as result of industrial rating. Can you summarise why that would be the case? What other problems do manufacturers face in Northern Ireland that are not faced in other parts of the UK?

Mr B McCrea: Our most significant problem is the geographic distance from our markets. We have to freight in most of our raw material, do something with it, and then freight it back out again. Northern Ireland manufacturers are also faced with higher insurance and electricity costs. It was suggested that we might get some relief from higher electricity costs, but, unfortunately, that £30 million a year fell foul of state aids. We also have higher manufacturing and labour costs, plus 5%, compared with the Republic of Ireland. Although office costs are cheaper here than anywhere else in the British Isles, industrial premises are more expensive.

There is hardly any area in which we have a competitive advantage — even with regard to skilled labour, we are bumping along at the bottom. It is hard to get labour as we have relatively low levels of unemployment now, but high levels of economic inactivity. We cannot get in the people that we need.

When everything is stacked up, even established indigenous companies are saying that Northern Ireland is no place to do business. Since I have the opportunity, I will say that, as regards corporation tax, the typical industrial rates bill would be four times whatever the saving might be if corporation tax were at the Republic of Ireland level. For example, if you paid £40,000 in corporation tax, you would save £20,000, whereas your rates bill would be £100,000 to £120,000.

There is a huge disparity about which factors are significant.

Mr Cree: The Government have told us that not introducing industrial rating will cost a future Executive millions of pounds. What is your response to that? Furthermore, would the training levy to which you refer in your evidence be voluntary or statutory? Would it be similar to that operated by the Construction Industry Training Board (CITB)?

Mr B McCrea: We made it clear to the Minister that the issue was not about having the money anyway: the Government will not raise £80 million. Moy Park Ltd has moved from having three plants in Northern Ireland to one, and Harland and Wolff, which had made up almost 10% of the entire rateable value, revalued and reduced its bill from £10 million to £1 million. Factories in Strabane are closing down, flattening sites and building houses. If industrial rating is introduced, the gap in the budget will still be there, and the money will have to be found somewhere else. We are saying that if the rate is capped, some money will be produced and industry will work with the Government. However, the gap is already there regardless of what will, or will not, be done.

The skills levy should be compulsory — a statutory requirement that will require primary legislation. We are content to go along with that, provided that other Government issues such as the European Regional Development Fund (ERDF) and the European Social Fund (ESF) are brought together so that it can be done properly. The difference that that will make — and we will all appreciate this as we are all from Northern Ireland — is that spending our own money will give us a powerful incentive to ensure that it is spent correctly. That is why what we are trying to do is similar in concept to the CITB levy. It will be a question of bringing to the fore people who know what skills they want, rather than saying that we have a good scheme and that people can have it if they want it. Assuming that the other issues were resolved, we would accept the skills levy as a compulsory, statutory obligation.

Mr Weir: Thank you for your presentation; you have made a very compelling case.

Mr Cree talked about skills and the potential difference in revenue. The levy would have to be compulsory because no business would put itself at a competitive disadvantage by paying a levy voluntarily. I appreciate your point that it is not possible to extrapolate what would happen based on the level of current payments were we to move towards 100% industrial rating because the best companies will reduce in size accordingly.

What would a 5% levy yield for a skills fund?

Mr B McCrea: The predicted tax take is £80 million. If the cap were placed at 25%, £20 million would be raised. An additional 5% of £80 million, which is about £4 million, could be raised.

Forgive me if those numbers are not completely accurate — the calculation depends on the base figure — but it is approximately £4 million or £5 million. We would like that to be private sector funding so that it could be matched with European money or other skills that might be brought in. A pot of money — perhaps £10 million — might be accumulated.

Mr Weir: Further along the line, towards 100% saturation, the situation could reach a tipping point. That gives us a useful indication. The subgroup needs to consider whether there should be a cap, and where exactly it should be set. Marginal costs will be important to that decision.

The Subgroup on the Economic Challenges facing Northern Ireland discussed a related topic when hearing evidence from Willie Wright of Wrightbus Ltd. Does your group have a view on the calculation of rate liability? For example, due to the nature of the Wrightbus Ltd enterprise, it is obliged to operate extensive premises: one does not sit at a desk to make a bus. No matter how it is organised, such an enterprise will occupy a large area of land. On the other hand, more intensive businesses will occupy a lot less space. Irrespective of what percentage the rate is pegged at, does your group have a view on how it should be calculated? Can NIMFG offer the subgroup any advice or highlight particular recommendations that the subgroup should make?

Mr B McCrea: How to calculate the percentage at which the rate should be pegged is at the core of the problem. For example, various uses can be made of a slab of concrete. One company might use the slab to manufacture concrete blocks — or as Government would call them “non-ferrous mineral products” — of which Northern Ireland companies sell a lot, apparently. That company would put the blocks in the sun to dry. In that way, it could make a certain amount of profit from that concrete slab. However, if another company were to situate that concrete slab on the Boucher Road, with cars parked on it, that company might derive a more substantial profit. Equally, the concrete slab could be used, for example, to provide office accommodation for the computer industry. As I mentioned, Northern Ireland has the cheapest office accommodation in the British Isles. Therefore, the amount of profit that might be derived from using the concrete slab to provide office accommodation would differ to what could be generated were it to be used by a manufacturing enterprise.

Industrial derating has been around for a long time. Northern Ireland’s industrial development has thrived in spite of the Troubles of the past 30 or 40 years. Even for the manufacture of high-volume, high-weight, marginal products, Northern Ireland was not a bad place to do business, because companies did not have to pay rates. Pull away that advantage, and all the enterprises that have been encouraged to develop here will be jeopardised. Mr Weir mentioned Wrightbus Ltd, but other companies would be affected. Food processing, which is Northern Ireland’s biggest single industry, is in the same category. Although hen houses demand a big space requirement, they operate on relatively tight margins. With the end of industrial derating, food-processing firms may be wiped out.

To cope with that, we would like the subgroup to state that this process should stop now and to invite manufacturers to engage in a way forward. We have agreed with the Department of Finance and Personnel that proper research can be carried out, namely a sector-by-sector analysis to discover the right way forward. At the moment, manufacturers feel that no one really cares any longer. They feel that they have been written off. Were Government to engage with Northern Ireland’s manufacturers, they would contribute where there are opportunities to do so. Where there are problems, NIMFG would do what it could. We do not want our biggest and best companies to leave Northern Ireland because of an oversight.

Mr Weir identified correctly the nub of the problem, and Willie Wright did well to highlight it. Northern Ireland has good companies, such as Wrightbus Ltd, and we must keep them in the Province, rather than them relocate to America.

Mr Weir: I presume that the companies involved — whether in food processing or in manufacturing, such as Wrightbus Ltd — will be hit hardest because of the physical size of their premises. At the outset, they are likely to be rated at a higher percentage than other businesses.

Furthermore, it is important to address concerns that the additional burden of rates will force some companies to physically downscale, get rid of plants, and so on.

11.00 am

For those companies, the option of closing down a particular plant and selling it on to be converted into houses is potentially more profitable than a more work-intensive alternative.

Therefore greater research needs to be done into the impact that rating would have on various sectors and into the general signal that it would send out.

Mr B McCrea: There is no linear relationship between the physical size of buildings and the profit that is made, even though the rates assume that there is.

My colleagues will be able to provide more anecdotal evidence, but I can tell you that a large employer of around 800 or 900 people in Belfast has already sold its land to housing developers because it can make much bigger profits and can use those to relocate to a country such as Bulgaria. That is happening everywhere. The economics are such that they deter anyone from getting involved in manufacturing here: it would not be the right thing to do. That cannot be helpful.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Before there are any further questions, I want some clarification on your response to Margaret Ritchie’s question. I understand that derating is not bound up with state-aid and EU restrictions; we have had it for many years, and it was in place before the UK joined the then EEC. However, I have been advised that DFP’s view — the subgroup will be able to question its officials directly later — is that a cap at 25% or, indeed, at any other level that is ultimately chosen, is likely to be “notifiable” to the Commission. Is DFP correct, or is it being overzealous in its interpretation of European rulings?

Mr B McCrea: I am slightly surprised that you say that. Our understanding is that DFP’s legal opinion is that there are no state-aid issues with regard to industrial derating, in the sense that if it is frozen at 25% and there are no complaints, there is no issue. Even if a complaint is made that is subsequently upheld, all that needs to happen is that one starts the escalator from wherever one has got off. Therefore no penalties or anything else are associated with it. It is a reasonable chance to take. One cannot say that there are no issues, because who knows whether there will be legal concerns? However, DFP’s communication with us indicates that state-aid issues are not a significant factor. We must, therefore, have clarification on that point from DFP.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Does the subgroup have any further questions?

Mr Girvan: I want to thank the NIMFG for attending. What impact has the current introductory system had on job numbers?

Mr B McCrea: Obviously, there is a lag between a decision being made not to invest any more and a company chuntering on for a couple of years until its wheels fall off. We want to emphasise that people say that there will be no movement —

Mr Girvan: Are you saying that the problem will not occur this year?

Mr B McCrea: The problem is approximately two years down the line, but we started two years ago.

One issue with this campaign is that, although consultation exercises have taken place, it will only be when people receive their first bill that they will say, “This is terrible — I can’t pay it.” They will then see with clarity that, although they are paying 15% now, in seven years’ time they will be paying 100% — they will not need to be fortune-tellers to work out what their bills will be then, and they will immediately look for alternatives.

Statistics published this week show a downturn in the number of manufacturing jobs. There will be high-profile job losses such as those in FarmFed; however, none of those losses are specifically due to the change in industrial derating. It cannot be said that that is the single factor involved. The issue is about overall competitiveness, with employers saying, “This is not working for us”.

The biggest problem that we face, and my colleagues will confirm it, is that many investment projects are on hold, with companies waiting on the decision on industrial rating. If the answer is positive, people will invest more; if it is negative, they will leave. We are on the brink. In our campaign, we said that there needed to be a decision by Christmas; otherwise it would be too late. We have reached that point now.

There will be thousands of job losses over the next two or three years. Jim Donaghy is the chief shop steward of Amicus and has an overarching role throughout Northern Ireland. What is the job situation, Jim?

Mr Jim Donaghy (Amicus): The impact of the loss of industrial derating will not take place two years down the line — it is happening now. Over the past few months, there have been around 200 job losses in the Lisburn area alone. That level of job losses cannot be sustained.

Over the past three years, I have participated in six sets of redundancy negotiations. I have had to sit in offices and see grown men almost in tears because they are losing their jobs. I am not prepared to witness that any longer. The loss of industrial derating is having an impact now. Companies are selling off their land, compacting their manufacturing, getting rid of people — putting them on the scrap heap — and using a smaller workforce, which is working harder to achieve the same production levels. The job that is lost through legislation introduced by the Government is one job too many, and it is unfair to the people who voted for that Government.

Mr B McCrea: None of us has a problem with increasing productivity — that is the right path to go down. However, there are health and safety issues involved when a company becomes too small.

The process starts with consolidation, followed by the building of a factory elsewhere, and then the company moves away. As Jimmy said, the impact is happening now, and we know that many redundancies are in the pipeline.

Mr Girvan: What is your view on the small-business rate-relief scheme that operates in Scotland and England? Would that be of help, or is it a waste of time?

Mr B McCrea: There are 5,107 companies that will be affected by the loss of industrial derating, and, of those, 3,000 will have a rates bill of less than £3,000 per annum.

That has an impact if you are a smallish firm, for which much of that is not significant, but it is not where the bulk of the money is coming in from, so we are not convinced that they could not be helped in other ways. We are not trying to put anyone’s good ideas down; however, there is a problem with the bigger manufacturing firms where there is lots of space, but relatively small profits per square foot. That is the area that is hit the hardest and where we need the most help.

Mr Raymond McCartney: This is a follow-on question from Peter’s. Which type of company comes under the most pressure if derating is removed?

Mr B McCrea: Food-processing companies. It can be done in various metrics, but if you take the number of employees as one bit, people who employ between, say, 25 and 400 employees tend to have large overheads but not a huge turnover.

There are 5,000 companies affected; we have said that 3,000 are small so that is a separate issue. However, of the 2,000-plus companies that we think are the issue, the top couple of hundred are big and profitable and able to do OK — they probably have grants and supports. They certainly have the resources to tackle those things. Therefore there is an issue with them as a body as well.

However, it is the unsung heroes — the people who are just making cow gates, for instance, or very important things that are going on in the local economy — who are the ones who are taking all the pressure. A lot of them, as Patsy will say, are on the periphery or in mid-Ulster. Those people are the backbone of our economy, and they are the ones that have a big problem.

Even for the very big ones, the problem is not about affordability — some people cannot afford this, others can. However, the most rational question is this: we are Fintech in Dungannon, owned by Mexicans, so what are we doing on this side of the border, or even in Ireland?

At the top end are hard-nosed accountants looking at you crossly and saying that this is not the right place to be. On the next tier down are the home-grown, indigenous people, the fast-growing economies, the growth-people coming up and struggling because they cannot afford it. The range is a wide one.

Mr Raymond McCartney: Therefore, in your view, a graduated, or different, approach for a different type of company is not the way out of this?

Mr B McCrea: You can analyse the sector and determine what happens in food processing. Consider Lakeland Dairies, which has a big plant in Newtownards and Cavan. Where is the next set of investment going? If only one plant is continually invested in, the other will eventually be closed down.

Therefore, I am saying that all of the food-processing, steel, furniture and concrete block manufacturers are on the wrong side of the weight-to-volume- to-profit ratio. As we said earlier, the whole of our economic development has gone down that road. We wanted a simple solution. The beauty of having the cap at 25% is that it would allow a genuinely level playing field, and the economy would then take over. That would be a good first step.

However, if a really profitable sector that ought to be paying something is discovered in a future analysis, it might be looked at. The one reason we have not gone down that route, which you can check with DFP, is that it is our understanding that we are not a state-aid issue, provided that we do not change the existing formulation in any way.

If we said that we do not think that the cold stores that were built for beef intervention are manufacturing, and if they are taken out of the loop, the scheme changes and becomes “notifiable”, and I am quite sure that those people who were receiving relief but are not longer getting it, will make a complaint.

The issue is that you must stick exactly to what you have got; the benefit is that it is doable now and produces maximum good. It is the 80:20 rule in reverse, in that most of the people that you are dealing with are the big manufacturers.

I am sorry if that was a complicated answer.

11.15 am

Mr Raymond McCartney: It was fine. My next question is for Mr Donaghy. Was the loss of 200 jobs in the Lisburn area solely due to the end of derating, or were other factors involved?

Mr Donaghy: Yes, it is down to the end of derating. The company that made those redundancies is selling off land.

Mr B McCrea: Will you explain the numbers for Montupet?

Mr Donaghy: In the past three years, employment at Montupet has gone down from over 1,000 workers to just over 500. The company has sold off quite a bit of land and moved its wheel-production operation to France. We tried to stop that move but could not because it is not economically viable to make wheels here. As a result of that move, the company has made redundancies and half of the factory is being cleared out and will be put up for sale.

Mr B McCrea: What is Montupet’s rates bill?

Mr Donaghy: It is between £800,000 and £1 million. That may not sound much for a company in that industry, but, in fact, it is. However, companies will not pay such rates bills. Instead, they will restructure, which is a polite way of saying that they will get rid of 60 people in order to pay the rates.

I reiterate the point that the end to derating will cost jobs. It may not cost any MLAs their job, but it will certainly cost my members’ jobs, or even mine. We cannot keep going down that road.

Manufacturing in Northern Ireland is in deep trouble. In the past, 180,000 people were employed in manufacturing jobs; today, that figure is 90,000. Basil mentioned 30,000 jobs. That figure is wrong, and I will tell you why: for every two jobs lost in the manufacturing industry, one will be lost in the service industry, because the money will not be going into the Treasury to pay for it. Basil is wrong, as there could be a total of 60,000 job losses, depending on how many manufacturing jobs are lost.

Please let me explain the situation, as it is a very serious issue for trades unions. We did not take the decision to join the NIMFG lightly, because being trades unionists — I do not want to use the word “bosses”, but I am sure that you know what I mean —

Mr Raymond McCartney: Go ahead; use it.
[Laughter.]

Mr Donaghy: We seriously considered joining the NIMFG and thought about whether the group was aimed at employers trying to get a fast buck and get more money in their back pockets. However, it must be said that we are in complete agreement that the introduction of industrial rating will cost a massive amount of jobs. We need to stop it. We believe that the NIMFG has been too polite in saying that it will negotiate from 0% to 100%. It should have said that negotiations would start and end at 0% because, as I said, the loss of one job is too many.

Mr Raymond McCartney: That is the flexible approach.

Mr Donaghy: It is called negotiating.

For us, it is important to keep manufacturing at its current level. It is also important that we maintain a sensible head and realise that there are people who may be able to pay industrial rates and those who may not. Only the people who can pay rates should have to pay rates, but how can they do that without getting rid of jobs to pay them? It must be across the board. If the corporation-tax rate is stuck at 25%, that is it. We are totally against it.

Mr B McCrea: I am sorry to interrupt, but Patsy Forbes has been sitting here for a while and has not had a chance to speak.

Mr Raymond McCartney: We must hear from the bosses.

Mr Patsy Forbes (Northern Ireland Manufacturing Focus Group): I am indeed sitting here, and I am extremely cross. My company employs 65 people in a place on the shores of Lough Neagh that always used to be called the asshole of nowhere. It supplies furniture to schools in Northern Ireland, England and down South. I am proud to have started the company 40 years ago, and I am now trying to get my son into the business. If I were to do the right thing, I would knock the whole thing down to build houses, because the land is in the building zone.

We sit here, however, and try to convince people like you. You should be ashamed of yourselves, because you live in Northern Ireland, and you know the position. Why are you not giving us your full support, instead of adding pressure to our margins? Our margins cannot take it: they are getting tighter and tighter, and you are allowing that to happen. We have come here to put our case before you — as we have been doing for some time — and, as far as I am concerned, we are not getting very far.

As chairman of the Northern Ireland Manufacturing Focus Group, I talk to people who are concerned about the matter. I am simply stating facts that the subgroup needs to know. Members of many different parties are around the table today; however, their supporters are not at all happy with some of the things that are being said. Do not forget that I defend MLAs at all times, but I am fighting for the people who speak to me. Perhaps something can be done for the good of manufacturing in Northern Ireland to create more jobs, or at least, to maintain existing jobs. However, a lot of companies have told me that they have new buildings to construct but that they are holding off doing so. They ask me what is happening and what they should do, and I advise them to hold off, because something will happen. I can name those companies, and I can even name companies that are prepared to leave mid-Ulster and go down South. That is the real situation.

Mr B McCrea: I am far too polite for this game.
[Laughter.]

Given that people have genuine concerns and frustrations, I brought my two colleagues with me today. People feel that the situation is not sensible and is counterproductive. They want to do the right thing, and they have tried, at every juncture, to approach people in the right way. The point has been made that when water charges are imposed, employees will have to pay; when rates are increased, employees will have to pay; and when industrial rates are increased, employees will have to pay. That is because businesses operate within certain margins.

I will describe what happens when a company wants to sell chickens to Tesco. Tesco tells the company that it insists on an annual 5% reduction in the price. To achieve that, the company must invest. If the company then goes back to Tesco and asks whether it can increase its prices because of an increase in rates, Tesco will simply say that it is sorry for the company's trouble but that it will buy its chickens from Brazil.

Our margins are being squeezed from the top and bottom. The only way to deal with that — because the situation is not hopeless — is to invest. However, if companies are considering investment in automation, skills, product development and all the good areas in which they are supposed to invest, they simply ask themselves whether it would be better to do it here or in Limerick, in Poland or wherever.

NIMFG is grateful for the opportunity to explain to the subgroup what is happening. Had we a representative body with which we could work and to which we could explain the issues, it would transpire that everyone wants the same things: decent jobs, decent wages, decent skills and enough money coming in from the corporate sector to enable development in other areas.

Frankly, people are leaving in their droves, and those who come here are the ones who care. The rest simply leave, saying that it is not their job to run the country.

I hope that the polite side of NIMFG has also made a useful contribution.

Mr Forbes: I have one question, Mr Chairman. As chairman of the Northern Ireland Manufacturing Focus Group, what am I supposed to tell my members? When I tell them that I was at Stormont, they will say, "What are the views there? What way are things going?" Can anyone tell me what I should be saying to those people?

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): That is a fair question, and it is a hard one to answer. Until devolution returns, the role of this subgroup is to produce recommendations in the hope that the direct-rule Administration will listen. Sadly, there is no guarantee of that. You talked about telling it the way that it is. Unfortunately, that is the way that it is from our point of view.

Time is moving on. Margaret has the final question.

Ms Ritchie: If I may be so bold, I wish to say that the members of the subgroup sympathise. However, control of those matters is not in our hands as yet, and, if it were, things might be different.

I have a two-part question. How many jobs have already been lost due to industrial rating? Apart from the 25% cap, what other policies would you like to see a devolved Administration introduce to assist the manufacturing sector and job creation here?

Mr B McCrea: If I were to put a figure on that, I would say that about 5,000 jobs are affected. That is quantification. There are 5,000 jobs that are at risk or that could have come into being but did not. A lot of money is spent addressing the problem — people understand the problem with lack of skills. However, the majority of the money does not get to where it supposed to go. That may be because people will not apply for it.

Everyone says that R&D is the way forward. Northern Ireland gets £20 million from the European regional development fund (ERDF). What do we do with that money? F G Wilson is given £1.2 million. The same amount is given to Seagate. We give money to the same people — to companies that are already getting a package of £45 million. We do not engage properly.

I can give an example of a man in Ballymena who built a mushroom-picking machine that is now in use around the world. He did not get one grant for it. If he had gone to the various agencies and tried to explain that he thought that there was a market for mushroom-picking machines, they would have laughed at the idea.

Local representatives know people like Patsy and Jimmy in their own constituencies; they know that they are the people who make things happen. You must talk to them and find out what they would like to do and find a way to get the resources that they need to go and do it. Then they will rebuild the economy. Talk to people in the further education colleges and tell them that we need welders and plumbers. None of us can afford to train one person. The minute that people are trained, they are snaffled by someone else.

There is market failure. We need a collective in which each member trains one welder, for example. Then there will be a pool.

That is the form of integrated government that we would like from local representatives. We would like to see better management of resources and a closer relationship with the wealth creators, and with the employees, who also create the wealth, while working together with our social partners in the unions and the local councils. That is the best that you can do for us. You have the opportunity to divert resources in the right way.

We recognise that, in the past, manufacturing kept its head down. I do not wish to make too strong a political point, but if manufacturers put their head above the parapet, one of two people came to see them: either the income-tax inspector or someone even worse. [Laughter.]

Let us simply say that it was not a good idea. However, now all sorts of legislation that may seem good — on the environment or other matters — is being passed without any understanding of the impact that it will have on the economy. Therefore we are now saying that we will engage with politicians.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Gentlemen, thank you very much for attending, for your written submission, and for answering all those questions. We will certainly reflect carefully on your comments, particularly as they come from the coalface of the manufacturing sector. We wish you well in all your work. Have a happy Christmas and a good holiday.

Mr Forbes: Thank you.

Mr B McCrea: Thank you, Chairman. I wish to put on record that, although we have demonstrated some passion while talking to you, we are aware of the support and engagement that we have had from the political parties and from members of the subgroup. We are very grateful for that and we are more than happy to talk in other places and at other times. We appreciate your help.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Members, we shall now hear joint evidence from representatives of Help the Aged and Age Concern.

I shall introduce our witnesses. They are: Elaine Campbell, head of policy for Age Concern; Pam Tilson, political affairs officer for Age Concern; Duane Farrell, head of policy research and communication for Help the Aged; and Michelle Bagnall, policy officer for Help the Aged.

You are all extremely welcome. Thank you for your written submission, which members have already had sight of.

Time is short, but we would certainly welcome any brief introductory remarks. Then, with your agreement, we will move to questions.

Mr Duane Farrell (Help the Aged): We would like to make a brief opening statement. I welcome the opportunity to speak to locally elected politicians. It is the view of both of our organisations that devolution delivered results for older people when we had a local Assembly. We look forward to a time when a devolved Assembly can again look after our older population.

Help the Aged and Age Concern support the principle of rating reform, because it will lead to the redistribution of the rating burden. Those who can afford to pay more should do so, and those who cannot afford to should be protected. The debate should be viewed in the context of poverty. Poverty in Northern Ireland's older population is a serious issue, with 20% of older people living on or around the poverty line. A local academic, Prof Eileen Evason, has claimed that we underestimate the seriousness of pensioner poverty in Northern Ireland and that disabled older people are having their disability benefits included as a means of income, when they are actually required for meeting their extra living costs.

Lady Hermon recently asked a question in the House of Commons on the levels of pensioner poverty. She was told that between 2002-03 and 2003-04 there was a 2.8% increase in the number of older people living in poverty. That equates to approximately 8,200 pensioners. We, therefore, view the debate on rating reform in the context of poverty. Help the Aged and Age Concern are committed to addressing the issue of pensioner poverty, and both organisations recognise that new rates bills together with water charges and energy price increases are due next year. Those costs will have considerable adverse impact on older people who are living in poverty and on low incomes.

There are many priorities, but the key priority, pension reform, is outside of the auspices of this subgroup. Pensioners must have a decent, liveable income, and I urge the Assembly, direct rule Ministers and MPs to lead the charge in Westminster. In the interim, we do not want to see any older person being pushed further into poverty.

We have identified some priorities that do fall within the remit of the subgroup.

We must ensure that older people are not pushed further into poverty, and additional rate relief should be provided to mitigate the impact of the introduction of new rates bills. There also needs to be ongoing monitoring of the introduction of the new rating system, and we will be working with all parties in that regard. Benefit take-up is key to the additional rate-relief element, and a benefit take-up strategy is inherently important. There must also be effective communication to older people about any changes in the rates bills. Those priorities must be addressed.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Thank you. Mr Weir will begin the questions.

Mr Weir: Your submission made a strong case for the reduction of 25% for single occupancy that would put us into line with what happens elsewhere, and there is merit in that. Considering that the Minister said that he intended to receive submissions from parties and others so that he could reduce any potential relief quickly, have you any other ideas on rate-relief schemes for pensioners and what they would cost?

Ms Elaine Campbell (Age Concern): Help the Aged and Age Concern have been working with the DFP on a scheme, and the Department has laid out a number of options. I know that its officials will be speaking to you later today. One option that has been agreed in principle is an increase of the personal allowance, and there are several ways in which that could be done. Single-pensioner households are worse off than pensioners who are part of a couple, so the personal allowance could be increased from 10% to 15%.

Mr Weir: What do you mean by the personal allowance?

Ms E Campbell: That is income per week. An increased personal allowance that is allocated per person would have a greater impact on lower income pensioners, particularly those who are at the near benefit level. The Department has informed us that that would cost between £3 million and £4 million per year.

The proposals are not finalised, but Help the Aged and Age Concern feel that, in principle, that is possibly the best way forward. However, we include the proviso that the first year or two of the scheme should be monitored and evaluated to check whether it is the most effective use of money and whether it is capturing the pensioners most at risk of poverty. If that is not the case, the scheme must be reviewed to see what more can be done.

Mr Weir: I appreciate that this is a work in progress and that you may be reluctant to be too definitive about the matter. However, it would be helpful if you could pass that information on to the subgroup as soon as you receive it. It would also help us, as politicians, to argue the case for pensioners.

I want to mention communication and the need to ensure that there is widespread take-up of whatever reliefs happen to be available. I presume that, like me, you have concerns about the fact that there appears to be proposals to cut the number of pension credit advisers throughout Northern Ireland. That would have a detrimental impact on pensioners. Depending on what rates relief system is eventually agreed, that could lead to take-up being reduced.

Ms Pam Tilson (Age Concern): Absolutely. Both Age Concern and Help the Aged have grave concerns about that. We are particularly concerned that the Department for Social Development's advice strategy of last year, 'A strategy for supporting delivery of voluntary advice services to the community', tends to move away from specialist advice, focusing instead on the provision of advice centres in geographical areas. Organisations like ours provide specialist advice on a regional basis, including advice on benefit take-up, and we have particular expertise in benefits for older people. The local advice centres may not necessarily have that kind of expertise, and often they refer a person with a particularly complicated benefits query to the Help the Aged "Senior Line" or the Age Concern advice line. The whole advice strategy is focused on geographically based advice hubs, and it does not recognise the value of, and need for, specialist advice.

Benefit take-up will affect eligibility for the affordability tariff scheme for water charges — people who are entitled to social security benefits will also automatically be entitled to the affordability tariff. A strategy must be implemented to ensure that people are aware of that and that they take up benefits, and the agencies involved must be properly resourced.

Ms E Campbell: Despite the fact that the rates bills will not be payable until next April, our advisers are telling us that there is already a huge increase in the number of callers worried about rates bills, and, of course, water charges. That is a very pressing concern at present. The advisers expect that, after January, the number of calls will increase even more sharply.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Thank you. That was very interesting.

Mr Cree: Both organisations propose a 25% discount on rates for single-pensioner households rather than a universal discount. Can you explain the rationale behind that proposal? It seems a bit unfair on households with two pensioners, neither of whom may have savings or private pension funds, and one of whom may be a carer.

Mr Farrell: Again, I return to an earlier point that poverty is experienced most acutely by single pensioners, primarily female single pensioners. They are most likely to have broken National Insurance contribution records, and, if their partner or spouse died, they would have only a reduced, rather than full, entitlement to their occupational pension. That is the rationale behind our proposal.

I can give the subgroup figures from the extensive research carried out by Prof Eileen Evason, who has produced some alternative lines on poverty, which take into account disability and disability benefits. According to those alternative lines, 75% of single female pensioners are living below the poverty line.

Any strategy must clearly target resources at those who are in most need of them.

Mr Cree: In identifying that particular vulnerable group, do you not accept that you are, to an extent, sacrificing the other one, which also has a great need?

11.45 am

Mr Farrell: Part of our understanding is the fixed costs that are faced by any household, whether it has one income or two. I will try to find figures on the disparity between single pensioners' incomes. It is the equivalent of around £70 each week on average. Although I acknowledge the point that the member makes, and in a utopian universe we would be able to provide protection for all, we must work in the context of a £4 million pot. We have worked with DFP to examine how that can be targeted most effectively. Therefore, that is the basis of our view.

Ms Ritchie: At present, the Government do not have any provision for a hardship scheme. I suppose that they have based that on the assertion that the relief scheme that they want the subgroup to concentrate on will be sufficiently comprehensive. However, there are already people in the poverty trap who are just above the eligibility threshold for benefits. Duane has already referred to those people. How would you envisage the development of such a hardship scheme if one were to be introduced?

Ms E Campbell: Those who are worst off will benefit from the new scheme, in any case. We hope that amending the personal allowance will catch those people who are just on the line or slightly above the benefits threshold. That is why it is so important to ensure that monitoring and review is carried out within a year to two years of the scheme's introduction. If, by that point, it were decided that a significant number of pensioners had not been captured by the scheme, we would consider how to rectify that.

Ms Ritchie: On the issue of capping, I noted that the aim is that it will have minimal impact on the rates bills that are issued to low-income families. Can that aim be elaborated on?

Mr Farrell: We acknowledge that we support the redistribution of the rates burden, and we believe that those who can afford it should pay more. Any introduction of a capping arrangement should have a negligible impact on lower-income households. The figures show that £1 million would be lost in any new capping arrangement. Low-income households should not be forced to pay extra in order to meet the burden of that redistribution.

Ms Ritchie: What is the estimated uptake of any relief schemes of which pensioners can currently avail?

Ms E Campbell: We have attempted to get statistics from several sources. Unfortunately, comprehensive statistics on benefit uptake are not available. It is particularly difficult to get statistics on those issues, particularly in the owner-occupier sector for housing benefit. We have examined that area in our work with DFP. We have had considerable difficulty.

Mr Farrell: With regard to housing benefit, we have a small amount of information. If we use pension credit uptake as a proxy to the attitude of older people towards claiming the benefits to which they are entitled, between 39,000 and 74,000 pensioners in Northern Ireland are entitled to pension credit, but are not claiming it. That is equivalent to between £95 million and £221 million.

We recognise that means-tested benefits do not work for older people. We also acknowledge that the Government are investing in uptake strategies. Our top line is that it is about providing a decent pension for everyone. For older people, there are issues of dignity and of accessibility to the benefits to which they are entitled. Older people continue to live in poverty. That tells us that means-tested benefits do not work. Although that does not indicate how older people feel about the rates rebate in particular, it tells us how they feel about other benefits.

Mr Raymond McCartney: For our information, do you have any figures on how many older people are paying rates?

Mr Farrell: If you bear with me, I am sure that we have something here.

Mr Raymond McCartney: Perhaps we could return to that.

Ms E Campbell: I will address a point that Leslie raised. We were asked what the average income was. The information that we have is that the average single pensioner's median income is £146 after housing costs. The average pensioner couple's equivalent is £274. That is the net median.

Mr Cree: They are averages, though?

Ms E Campbell: Yes, they are averages.

Ms Michelle Bagnall (Help the Aged): That is the median figure, which is different from an average.

Mr Cree: There are exceptions in each of the groups. I am concerned that those falling below the average would be missed. Pensioners as a whole are a needy group, but it would be wrong to focus solely on the average or median figures.

Ms Tilson: May I return to what Margaret said about benefit up take? It is worth remembering that both rates relief and housing benefit are tapered benefits. One might qualify for as little as a 10p per week rate rebate or housing benefit, but each is a "passport benefit", providing access to the affordability tariff for water charges or to a new rate-relief scheme. The problem is that a lot of people think that their rebate will be for only a very small sum, and that it is not therefore worthwhile filling out a complicated form to claim it. They do not realise that a 20p per week rate rebate would qualify them for other benefits.

Ms Ritchie: Thank you.

Mr Farrell: Raymond, to return to your question, I am sorry that we do not have that information to hand, but it is something that I can send to you subsequently.

Mr Raymond McCartney: Do you sense or have any analysis to show that this becomes a greater burden as people get older?

Mr Farrell: Yes, indeed. We know that as people get older, they tend more to live on a fixed income. Age discrimination means that older people cannot find employment when they want it. A significant proportion of older people rely exclusively on the state pension and means-tested benefits as their sole means of income. An important statistic, from memory, is that over 50% of pensioners live on less than £10,000 per annum. I hope that Michelle will be able to confirm that figure. The logical conclusion is that people living on a fixed income have less disposable income as they get older, and, therefore, water charges and energy price increases become more of a burden to them.

Mr Raymond McCartney: That is related to Leslie's point. Where there is a needy group, there should be relief. Part of the subgroup's task is to make recommendations. We need to consider relief for people as they get older. I should declare an interest — both of my parents are in their eighties.

Mr Cree: I thought your declaration of interest was for yourself. [Laughter.]

Mr Raymond McCartney: Relief for older people, perhaps at age 60 or 65, is an excellent idea.

Ms E Campbell: As we pointed out, when a household becomes a single-pensioner household, there is a sharp decline in money available. A number of the fixed costs do not change, but when there is only one person, rather than two, attempting to meet those costs, he or she will find it difficult.

Mr Raymond McCartney: Margaret touched on capping. Have Age Concern and Help the Aged explored the alternatives?

Mr Farrell: To be frank, we have been concerned with the low-income aspect of the rates debate. We have not researched the options available with capping. Our priority is to ensure that older people living on low incomes are protected.

Mr Shannon: Chairman, I apologise for my absence this morning. I had a disability living allowance appeal to attend and I missed the first session. My question follows on from Mr Raymond McCartney's comments about those who are already in receipt of benefit. I hope that you will send us the promised figures quickly. They will give us an idea of how many will not benefit from a rates rebate.

You have spoken about the 25% discount in relation to single-occupancy pensioner households. Do you consider that that discount is sufficient to help those who are not in receipt of income support and are therefore excluded from other benefits?

If the figures are correct, how much will a reduction of 25% really mean to people who are trying to deal with the potential added costs?

In addition to that, and further to Leslie Cree's point, in my position as an elected representative I have come across, on numerous occasions, people with tiny pensions — perhaps between £11 and £15 a month — that, to be truthful, are absolutely crap. Those sums are meaningless and keep those people outside the benefit circle, so that they are ineligible for income support. There will be some people who fall outside of your figures, and I wish to ensure that we get to them. People who are close to but not yet in the poverty trap will fall into it, and there will be no relief system for them. There are several questions that arise from those points, and I am keen to hear your opinion.

Finally, is there any system, other than the 25% single-occupancy discount scheme, that might be better?

Mr Farrell: Help the Aged and Age Concern are national charities that operate throughout the United Kingdom, and we are looking to learn lessons from our colleagues in Scotland, Wales and England where a 25% single-occupancy discount scheme already exists.

For us, the rationale behind the 25% scheme is that, where there is a fixed set of costs to be met, fewer services will be used by the single-occupancy household with one income than by the one next door where perhaps four or five people live and there are multiple incomes. That is common sense. We are aware that, for those people, there is a near-benefits threshold. That is a steep shelf for those who are £1 over the capital or allowance limits, and, in the end, they may pay a significant amount towards their rates bill and lose the support that those schemes are designed to give. The rate-relief scheme that was part of rating reform captures those people who are near to benefit thresholds and makes the shelf less steep. Developments that have taken place between the previous rating system and the new reforms will ably cater for that near-benefit group.

Ms E Campbell: We try to be pragmatic. We realise that there is a limited pot of money available and that the new rate-relief scheme will act as a passport to reduced water charges when the affordability tariff is applied. Therefore, we take the view that there must be a system in place that is adequately funded and sustainable over the coming years.

Ms Bagnall: Mr Shannon, you asked about the impact of the 25% discount. When different methods are used to calculate a person's eligibility to benefits, the difficulty lies in assessing and applying that across the population. In the pensioner rate-relief working group, we asked what the effect would be when the discount was applied to all pensioners in Northern Ireland — would it affect 10% or 60%? We hold the view that a 25% discount, if it were an addition, would, of course, help. However, an impact assessment is difficult because there is a limited amount of data to link an individual in a household to the capital value of that house, and to the income and benefits that the household receives. That is the challenge.

Mr Shannon: Over the past few weeks, it has come to my attention that the number of pension advisers is about to be reduced.

Mr Weir: I asked that question about 10 minutes ago. Obviously, the Member was not listening.

Ms E Campbell: We are aware of that problem, and it is a concern.

Mr Shannon: My apologies; I was reading my notes.

12.00 noon

Mr Farrell: Help the Aged and Age Concern are involved in a benefits take-up pilot scheme called A to B — access to benefits — and through that we have researched older people's attitudes to benefits. That point builds on what I discussed with Margaret. Older people prefer speaking to independent advisers; they do not necessarily trust giving Government advisers details of their savings.

Mr Cree: I wonder why that is.

Mr Shannon: I have information to the contrary. You could not get better people than the pensions advisers in Downpatrick and Newtownards. They are there to assist pensioners, and they are open and helpful. It is unfair to say that there is a lack of trust. The two pensions advisers that I know have been very good.

Ms Ritchie: They work for the Social Security Agency (SSA).

Mr Farrell: Let me clarify my point. I was not slighting pensions advisers; I am reporting the perception that older people have about feeling more confident and comfortable speaking to independent advisers. Help the Aged has just participated in several focus groups in Newry, Larne, Belfast and Enniskillen. When the subsequent report from those meetings is signed off, I will have no problems in sharing it with the subgroup.

The feedback from that work indicates that older people perceive that trust is an issue. That is no slight on Government pensions advisers. However, older people do not feel entirely comfortable giving Government advisers information about their incomes and savings. They feel that speaking to such people would upset any benefits that they already receive.

I can forward the subgroup the report, which is in the process of being signed off.

Mr Shannon: I would appreciate having those figures. Most of the people who come to me need help with money, so they are happy to discuss what they have, which, quite simply, is nothing.

Ms E Campbell: Age Concern and Help the Aged prefer that people get as much advice as possible. Some clients who use our services telephone with a query on one issue, but other issues emerge in the conversation. Once they have one sympathetic telephone call, they tend to telephone back with other concerns. It is not that one organisation is necessarily better than the other: they both fulfil a very important role for older people. Therefore we would not be happy if any advice lines were cut.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Thank you. What is your view on the £16,000-savings threshold?

Ms E Campbell: Research indicates that not many pensioners have savings of over £16,000. The DFP working group explored that issue and considered different options, and it found that not many people have savings of that amount.

Mr Cree: Michelle Bagnall referred to research undertaken by Help the Aged. What impact will the new rating system have on pensioner households? When considering such matters, do you take on board other issues, such as the incoming water charges?

Ms Bagnall: When a new rates bill and water charges are applied, the assumption is that they will have a negative impact on existing poverty levels. However, given the limited data that is available for households in which capital value is linked to income, statistics and specific research cannot say conclusively what that impact will be. Therefore that conclusion is based on the assumption that the householder already has a limited income. A certain percentage of households are already below or near the poverty line. An added bill would therefore have a negative impact.

Mr Cree: Those comments can be made in the abstract.

I have been involved in several cases in which people have been desperate.

Mr Farrell: Absolutely.

Mr Cree: I cannot see how they can manage. How many specific examples of those types of cases do you have?

Mr Farrell: We have anecdotal evidence, not a research document.

Older people we talk to tell us constantly that they have to choose between heating and eating: they have to choose whether to put food on their plates or turn on their heating systems in the winter months. Help the Aged conducted a perception study of elderly people and excess winter deaths. That found that during the cold winter months, they turn off their heating, they stay in bed longer, and they wear outdoor clothes inside to avoid turning on the heat. Therefore people are forced to make the choice between heating and eating.

My research on the new targeting social need (New TSN) strategy and the subsequent 'Lifetime Opportunities' document revealed other problems. In one case, one woman's husband had a continence problem, and providing fresh underwear for him was a difficulty. Problems such as being able to afford underwear for a partner who is incontinent is a real issue, and they need to be understood. That is the kind of everyday issue that we take for granted.

Older people are faced with very real lifestyle choices. Anecdotally, we know that the £200 winter-fuel allowance is not spent on fuel at all but on Christmas presents for the kids or grandchildren.

Again, those issues have arisen in our dialogue throughout the year with elderly people. However, that anecdotal evidence is not robust enough to be presented as research.

Mr Cree: Do you have any information about illnesses, for example, that may be attributed to people's low-income and high-cost situations?

Mr Farrell: Statistics from the Office for National Statistics (ONS) and the Northern Ireland Statistics and Research Agency (NISRA) show that there have been 1,994 excess winter deaths of older people in the five years since the start of 2000. This year has been the worst, with 456 such deaths. Cold exacerbates existing conditions; therefore, there is difficulty comparing winter to summer deaths.

Ms Tilson: Moreover, Age Concern has done quite a bit of UK-wide research on the minimum income that is required for healthy living. As well as incorporating the ability to keep one's home warm, in proper repair and affordable, healthy living addresses being able to afford a healthy diet and having access to transport.

Mr Farrell: We can leave some of that information with you.

There is not a huge amount of data on pensioners' savings. However, the family resources survey reveals that the proportion of single pensioners who hold savings of more than £16,000 is very small.

Mr Raymond McCartney: We are meeting with representatives from the Department of Finance and Personnel this afternoon, and I know that you are on the working group with those people. Hansard is also recording this dialogue, so you have to be careful about what you say. How do you find the relationship with those departmental officials? Is it a good group? Do you feel that you are being listened to?

Ms E Campbell: Working on it has been very productive.

Mr Farrell: We found that the departmental officials were willing to listen to the issues. The people involved have been really committed to our view, which is that rates should not push people further into poverty.

Mr Raymond McCartney: Are you invited to their Christmas party? [Laughter.]

Mr Farrell: Tell them to put the money into rate relief — do not invite us to the party. [Laughter.]

Ms Tilson: Our relationship with them has been markedly different to the dealings that others have had with some of those who have been involved in the water debate.

Ms Ritchie: We note that you are doing this work with the Department, which has said that a short paper outlining a number of options is being prepared. Is that draft paper nearing conclusion?

Is the working group considering a single person's discount scheme for pensioners or a deferment scheme?

Mr Farrell: Deferment has not been on the table during this process. Indeed, there is a lack of information about deferment. Legislative provision has been made for it, and Help the Aged is keen to be part of that debate.

At the start of our work with DFP, we were instructed that our discussions would be based on the existing housing-benefit infrastructure, and, as such, the 25% single-occupancy discount could not be considered. However, we remain quite committed to such a measure. The evidence shows that poverty is disproportionately experienced by single people. On that basis, we still advocate a 25% single-occupancy discount.

The paper is very near completion.

Ms Bagnall: The paper will go before the Minister either today or tomorrow. We signed off a final draft at the beginning of this week. I am not sure when it will be available to the subgroup, but DFP was to sign it off during the week.

Mr Farrell: It is important to consider the question of the proposed enhanced pensioner relief of £4 million a year. That relief needs to be a long-term commitment; it should not be a one-year or two-year commitment over the next few years to mitigate the impact of the new rating system.

Ms Ritchie: Therefore it should be a long-term commitment of £4 million.

Mr Farrell: Yes, on an annual basis.

Mr Cree: We have grave reservations about means testing, which you obviously share. Are there any fair alternatives to means testing that would allow people to get a little more?

Mr Farrell: Help the Aged is of the view that a citizen's pension, based on residency as opposed to contributions, should be introduced. That would acknowledge the impact on those people — specifically women — who have broken contributions records. A citizen's pension should be set at a decent standard of living so that it would obviate the need for means-tested benefits. Money that goes towards means-tested benefits would be put into the pensions pot and, as a matter of right, people would be given a decent standard of living.

As an aside to that, research published by the Joseph Rowntree Foundation in 2005 states:

"the minimum income that people over 65 ... would need in order to live in a healthy way was £123 a week for a single person and £193 a week for a couple. These figures, which exclude rent or mortgage and rates, are therefore after deducting housing costs."

The average single pensioner's income falls short of this by £23, and pensioner couple's by £7.

That reinforces the point that means testing is not working. The money that goes towards means-tested benefits should be put into the pensions pot. People should not get a pension of £83 that is topped up by benefits but, as a matter of right, a pension provision of a minimum of £115 a week. However, I recognise that the ability to do that falls outside the auspices of the subgroup.

Mr Cree: You have stated that there is little evidence of single-person millionaires.

Ms E Campbell: Yes, very little evidence.

Mr Shannon: Just Peter Weir. [Laughter.]

Ms Ritchie: You said that with a certain level of confidence.

Mr Weir: It is much more likely to be you than anybody else, Jim.

Mr Cree: The fact that there are not many single-person millionaires may not come as a surprise to the Minister, as one of the reasons that the Minister gave was that the single-person's discount scheme could perhaps create many such people.

Ms Stanton: This question may have been asked already. Through your meetings with the Department, has it been made clear that bids made under the comprehensive spending review 2007 will cover the sum that Margaret mentioned?

Ms E Campbell: Yes, as far as we were aware. When the group began convening, we were told that there was a pot of money of approximately £4 million. We need to devise a scheme that meets the greatest need and covers the greatest number of people but that falls within that monetary range.

Ms Stanton: Then again, you will fall short of that task because there is not a high uptake of benefits among older people.

12.15 pm

Ms E Campbell: Yes. I am not sure that you were here when this was discussed earlier. It will be important that monitoring and review mechanisms are built into the process from the beginning. Those mechanisms should also be funded to ensure that, if only £2 million appears to have been spent, the reasons for that could be found. For instance, it will be possible to review questions such as why only £2 million was spent; whether the scheme captured the correct number of people; and whether fewer people were entitled to the scheme than was originally envisaged.

It is hoped that those mechanisms will be built into the process. Any necessary changes can be made in the first year or two of the scheme's operation.

Ms Bagnall: Help the Aged's submission strongly recommended communicating information to pensioners about their entitlement to rate relief or to enhanced measures. It is important that that information is properly targeted. We must examine innovative ways to send information to pensioner households.

The Pension Service sends a pack to all householders approaching pension age that contains specific information and an invitation to claim. That is a good opportunity to insert other information to help claimants to determine whether they are entitled to additional rate relief and, indeed, other benefits. As Mr Farrell mentioned earlier, many people are entitled to pension credit but do not claim it. Our paper suggests that there are new ways to communicate those entitlements and enhanced measures to pensioners.

Ms E Campbell: Age Concern is committed to the advice line, so that when callers ask about rate relief, our advisers can use that opportunity to inform callers of additional benefits that they may be entitled to, such as the water rates affordability tariff. We must ensure that our organisations are sufficiently well informed to pass on information as soon as it becomes available.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Help the Aged and Age Concern are both represented on the working group. Do you feel that that group is sufficiently representative?

Mr Farrell: As well as Help the Aged and Age Concern, Prof Eileen Evason, who is a professor of social administration, sits on the group. Inasmuch as any small, focused working group that is trying to complete a month's work to deliver £4 million can be, it is representative.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Thank you all very much for appearing before the subgroup at relatively short notice, and for providing written submissions and answering all our questions. The subgroup will have much to reflect on and include in its report. I hope that the report will be ready in a couple of weeks — we are also working to a short timescale. We wish you well for the holiday — when it comes.

Mr Farrell: The same to yourselves. Thank you very much.

The subgroup was suspended at 12.18 pm.

On resuming —

1.21 pm

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Good afternoon. I welcome the Northern Ireland Fair Rates Campaign. Thank you for your written submission. Would you be happy to make a relatively short opening statement and then take questions from the subgroup?

Ms Anne Monaghan (Northern Ireland Fair Rates Campaign): Yes. Thank you for inviting us. The fair rates campaign was established in September 2006 as rates bills came through people's doors. As you know, there was public outcry. The general public are not expert at reading draft legislation or consultation documents and were fairly ignorant about the new system and its implications.

The system had to be reviewed and amended as it was 25 to 30 years old.

However, the shock to most people came from finding that the system was markedly different from that which exists in other parts of the UK. I will go through five or six points and then we will be happy to take questions. My colleagues are experts in other areas.

Ratepayers are confused about what happened recently in the House of Lords and the position taken by Lord Glentoran. Minister Hanson insists that the cap of £500,000 — and we disagree with that level — and the additional relief for pensioners are dependent on the Assembly. That is not the Conservative Party's understanding of the situation, nor is it our understanding of the House of Lords debate, and we have copies of the relevant Hansard reports. Indeed, we have copies of correspondence from the Minister to the Conservative Party, which is markedly different from that which he sent to local politicians.

We thank the parties for the help that they have given to the campaign. We understand that all parties are, in some shape or form, broadly in agreement that the system is out of line with the rest of the UK in a number of areas.

There is a cap of £212,000 in Scotland, £425,000 in Wales and £320,000 in England. Our gross domestic product (GDP) is 85% of that of the rest of the UK, and our salaries are markedly lower. We cannot understand why there is no cap in the discrete capital value system for Northern Ireland. Indeed, if the Government continue to argue that they cannot treat regions differently in respect of corporation tax, why is Northern Ireland being treated differently as regards rates?

That is one argument. We are arguing for a cap at £300,000. A cap at £500,000 only benefits approximately 2,400 ratepayers — those at the top end of the spectrum.

We believe that a cap at around £300,000 would be more reflective of the Northern Ireland economy, and would cost ratepayers — at the top, rather than at the bottom end of the income spectrum — only a few pounds extra.

We oppose the lack of single-household relief, which exists in the rest of the UK. If that were introduced in Northern Ireland, it would affect 13% of households.

We oppose the lack of a second-adult rebate in the proposed Northern Ireland system. Such a rebate operates in England, Wales and Scotland. For example, if a widow has a son or daughter at university, she can claim a second-adult rebate because there is no second adult financially contributing to the household.

We are concerned about the position in the legislation regarding disability relief and relief for students. We believe that the relief measures for students would actually benefit landlords. Having worked with students for four and a half years, I know that students do not generally claim relief measures such as rates relief. They are more likely to claim student loans, whereby money will go into their accounts quite quickly.

In the Holyland area of Belfast alone, £2 million will be lost to the economy, and that will not be to the benefit of students. I spoke to National Union of Students/Union of Students in Ireland (NUS/USI) officials yesterday. They said that they had received no indication of how the system might benefit students. Landlords are supposed to write to students to alert them to any benefits. I question how many landlords will actually do that.

The 25% relief for those who are disabled applies only to people who have had their homes modified. That is a glaring discrepancy. We have questions on the grounds of section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 on how the new system will operate for protected groups. In the last consultation, which took place over the summer period, the consultation paper recognised that the information on how the system will affect section 75 groups is not available. That information is not available because the new system is not yet in place, and that information is to be provided through the continuous household survey after one year.

We are asking the Assembly to seek clarity from the Government on what should happen if the Assembly is not restored on 26 March; to seek clarity on the points I have outlined about the cap, single-person household relief, second-adult rebate, etc; and to address our concerns on the section 75 implications of the proposed measures.

If the system comes into effect this year, we nevertheless believe that it should be reviewed after a year, and that the review must be based on the data gathered in the continuous household survey, which will by then be available.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Thank you. We move to questions.

Mr Raymond McCartney: Do you have any information about how the caps set in Scotland and in England were determined? Was it an arbitrary figure?

Mr Cree: Have you provided the exact figures?

Ms Monaghan: Yes; those are the exact figures. I do not know how those caps were determined. That is the problem; we cannot find out how they were calculated. We understand that the cap at £500,000 in Northern Ireland has been determined on the grounds that no one will pay more than £3,000 per annum. No one pays more than that in the rest of the UK. To strike that balance, they set the cap at £3,000. That does not take into account incomes, rising house prices and other economic factors in Northern Ireland.

Mr Raymond McCartney: If a house belongs to an investor, is it classed as a single-person household, or is that determined by occupancy?

Ms Monaghan: It is determined by occupancy.

Mr Raymond McCartney: This morning, we heard from Age Concern and Help the Aged. They pointed out that, in their experience, few pensioners had savings of over £16,000. What is your view on the issue of savings?

1.30 pm

Mr Michael Kelly (Northern Ireland Fair Rates Campaign): I spoke to Eileen Evason about that matter. Eileen has been dealing with people on benefits for most of her life. However, I do not think that she has any concept of the number of people living in south Belfast or parts of Derry whose houses have rocketed in price or of the amount of savings that they have as a result. We spoke to several people as part of a small survey and found that the £16,000 savings threshold is always queried. If the Government want all old-age pensioners to benefit from the 50% extra relief, raising the savings threshold to £32,000 would be one way of doing that.

Ms Monaghan: We have concerns in that regard. The Government said that they would set aside an extra £4 million for relief if an Assembly were up and running. However, the Conservative Party would argue that something different happened in the House of Lords.

We are concerned about benefit uptake among older people, completing forms and other issues. The Government are not reducing the taper so that everyone benefits automatically. They are, however, setting aside £4 million for extra relief, of which perhaps only £2 million will be availed of. Our concerns are why £4 million is being set aside on top of £7 million — which again, is dependent on the Assembly being in existence — instead of reducing the taper, which can be done at the touch of a button.

Mr M Kelly: The Government reduced the amount deducted from excess income from 20% to 12% to help all housing benefit applicants. If the Government want to help pensioners and maintain a 50% increase in rates relief, that 12% deduction from excess income should be reduced to 6% for pensioners. That would really make a big difference.

It is up to the people with the computers to determine the total impact. However, Raymond has worked out a rough idea of what the spreads would be if the cap were reduced, the minimum cap in the examples being £300,000. That information is in our submission. The submission also outlines the cost per household for the rest of Northern Ireland and other important information.

Mr Raymond Farley (Northern Ireland Fair Rates Campaign): My information is from the Northern Ireland housing statistics for 2004 -2005. As Anne said, the average weekly wage in Northern Ireland is around £477 per person; the average UK weekly wage is £601. That means that UK wages are 26% above our wages. That is a vast difference.

Table 6.9 in the Northern Ireland housing statistics for 2004 and 2005 gives the average weekly spend per Northern Ireland household as £377. In the UK, the average weekly spend is £434 — people in UK are obviously earning more money. The difference of £57 is not too vast. However, there is a difference between what is being spent and what is being earned; that is, disposable income. Weekly disposable income in Northern Ireland is £99, and the UK average is £166; that means that people in the UK have 68% more disposable income than people in Northern Ireland.

If rates increase, people in Northern Ireland will not have as much money as those in the rest of the UK. Therefore, Northern Ireland should be considered a special case. Ministers are always being quoted as saying that Northern Ireland rates are lower. The figure of £670, which is the average rates bill in Northern Ireland, is always bandied about, as is the figure of £1,200, which is the average rates bill in the rest of the UK. The inference is that the Government want to raise rates in Northern Ireland to a similar level.

If rates in Northern Ireland are raised, it will account for an extra £11 from everyone's weekly income, which will reduce the average weekly disposable income to £88. The average weekly disposable income in the UK is 89%. In other words, people in the UK will have almost twice as much free income as people in Northern Ireland, if rates here are raised to the UK level.

Ms Monaghan: We can leave that issue with the subgroup because there is a great deal of information to take in.

Ms Ritchie: Welcome to the subgroup. Your submission stated that, if deferring the Order were not considered, local politicians must review the legislation in a year's time. Your submission states:

“as we believe among other things, the Equality Impact Assessment was not properly carried out.”

Can you explain how and why the equality impact assessment was not properly carried out and, more importantly, what is required?

Ms Monaghan: The continuous household survey data are not available, as the system would have had to be operational for a year. Once the continuous household survey has been done for a year, the data will be available to reflect the differential between key groups. The consultation flagged up that there may be a differential impact upon Protestants, disabled people and older people. Members will be aware that there is concern about how that will affect the asset-rich, cash-poor elderly.

Another of our concerns — and why we are asking for a deferral — is the Government's claim that the changes are revenue-neutral. If they are revenue-neutral, why not defer the implementation of the Rates (Amendment) (Northern Ireland) Order 2006 for a year so that the Assembly can debate and vote on it. We could do a “mock-up” to see how the Order would affect certain sections of society.

Mr M Kelly: The equality impact assessment said that the continuous household survey was available to assist in the analysis of the existing system; however, it was not available to assist in the analysis of the new capital value system. The Northern Ireland Fair Rates Campaign wrote to Brian McClure, who is in the policy division of the Department of Finance and Personnel, to ask him to take another look at the issue. We also asked him to consider not just the continuous household survey, but the family resources survey of the Department for Social Development. The Department should consider income and tenure and then decide how many people would benefit as a result of the rate reform — that was a constant cry of Mr Hanson. If the Department employed the family resources and continuous household surveys to analyse the new system, we would find a great many flaws in the figures that have been bandied about.

Ms Monaghan: We are also concerned that the system will maintain ghettos and benefit dependency. Rather than encouraging people to become homeowners, the system will deter people, because they will not receive rates and water relief. On 7 December 2006, the ‘Belfast Telegraph’ reported on Government underspend and borrowing in 2005-06. We understand that the underspend came about because Departments had not expected the 19% regional rate increase of 2005-06 and that consequently they had no clue about how to spend the money.

Mr M Kelly: “The fact that the continuous household survey was not available for the various capital-value models” — four were considered, but only one was picked — “may explain why a differential impact is not detected”. The survey was available when analysing the old system but not the new one, so a differential cannot be assessed for the section 75 groups — except religion. It is important that that be picked up on.

Ms Ritchie: In point 12 of your submission you ask that the cap should be for a specific time and not increased at the next revaluation. Why is that necessary? Why should an incoming Executive adopt such a position?

Ms Monaghan: It creates confidence and security in the market and for home buyers. We are concerned that when a new revaluation comes into effect in 2012, rising house prices will continue to push bills up. England and Wales have had their systems in place since 1993 and Scotland since 1991. Why should there be a revaluation for Northern Ireland in five years' time?

Mr M Kelly: The Government have given themselves two options for increasing the rates. If they get into difficulty with the percentage of the district and regional rates that they apply every year, all they have to do is raise the cap so that they can hit us both ways.

Ms Ritchie: Can you provide us with details on relief for students rather than landlords, disabled people, regardless of their home modifications, pensioners and single persons?

Ms Monaghan: To be effective, relief for students — and for pensioners — must be automatic. A system has been put in place for students so that they automatically receive cash in hand to go some way towards paying their rates bill. However, the system must be automatic. Landlords will not apply rates relief for students, because rates and rent are not separated in the bills that students receive.

Why should being classified as disabled be dependent on one's home being modified? People whose disability is blindness may not need their homes modified, as they do not have to be in a wheelchair. We in the Northern Ireland Fair Rates Campaign are concerned that the Government are already targeting recipients of disability living allowance to weed out those who should not receive it. The rates relief system could work in tandem with that, so that only genuine cases would receive it.

Rates relief is set at only 25%: it is not full relief. The system for receiving rates relief should be automatic, but the Government put the onus on the ordinary person to claim. Although there may be a perception in Northern Ireland that everyone claims, we in the Northern Ireland Fair Rates Campaign are concerned that the elderly, the disabled, etc are less able to claim through the system than are others.

Mr M Kelly: In his preamble to the amendment to the Rates (Amendment) (Northern Ireland) Order 2006, David Hanson said that “targeted consultation” on landlord liability was being carried out. He made that statement on 3 July 2006, but we have yet to see the results. If the subgroup wants more information on landlord liability, it should look at the targeted consultations on standardisation in the social rented sector and on landlord liability.

Ms Ritchie: Thank you.

Mr Cree: Mr Kelly, you referred to the Northern Ireland Fair Rates Campaign’s proposed affordability cap for pensioners. Will you give the subgroup details about how that would work and whether you envisage that being means-tested?

Mr M Kelly: It should follow the water-reform affordability tariff. The Northern Ireland Fair Rates Campaign proposes a 3% cap for those pensioners on very low incomes. In other words, they would not pay more than 3% of their income on water charges and rates. I do not know the extrapolated figures or how much that would cost, but it would affect about 150,000 pensioners in Northern Ireland, unless I am mistaken.

Why not apply the 3% cap? The Government will not adjust the three tapers, which are savings, the percentage of accessible income and the tariff on savings. For someone with savings, the tariff on income is set at £1 in every £500. We propose halving that to 50 pence per £500. If the Government want to maintain the 50% relief for pensioners, they could adopt that proposal.

If they reduced the taper from 12% to 6%, the Government would not need an affordability tariff. When we asks David Hanson for information, he always responds by citing examples, so I will do the same. There are two pensioners living in identical houses, one in the country and the other in Belfast. The house in Belfast is in a property hot spot and has a rateable value of £300,000. The house in the country is not in a property hot spot and has a rateable value of £150,000.

If the person in the country has an income of £14,000 and the person in Belfast has an income of £9,000, the person in Belfast will pay £104 more in rates than the person in the country.

1.45 pm

That situation would not apply only to pensioners. Consider young executives, some of whom live in the Belfast area, and some of whom live beyond Omagh.

If members do the calculations, as we have, on the available information, they will see that if someone has a £14,000 income in the country and another person has a £9,000 income in Belfast, the person with the £9,000 income will pay £104 more, assuming the same set of circumstances.

Ms Monaghan: There is an additional concern about those who fall just outside the benefits system. The rates burden is not based on ability to pay; it is based on the capital value of one’s home, which could have been an inheritance, or could have been bought 40 years ago. We have heard people from Newry and other places on the radio, saying that they were given a plot of land on which to build a big house. The capital-value system does not reflect ability to pay.

Mr Farley: Further to Anne’s argument, if one considers social housing, people may not wish to move out of their comfort zone. For example, people who live in social housing pay rates at 19% of their rent. If one looks at the Housing Executive’s website, one can quite easily work out the level of rates that will be paid. Occupants of all Housing Executive homes, no matter where they are in Northern Ireland, always pay the same amount for the same house. Therefore those who live in a three-bedroom detached Housing Executive house with a garage, no matter where it is, will pay about £570 a year in rates, because their bill is calculated as a proportion of their rent.

John Semple’s review of affordable housing noted that some social-housing homes have been sold for something in the region of £250,000. That means that if occupants moved out of Housing Executive status and owned their houses, they would move from paying £570 in rates to nearly three times that amount.

Ms Monaghan: That takes us back to the point about maintaining ghettos and the situation whereby people stay in the benefits system, when we should be trying to help them to get out of the benefits system.

Mr Cree: You mentioned your preference for a rateable value cap at £300,000. Research suggests that that would benefit about 2% of households. On the figures that you have provided, that cap would cost about £14.60 per household. Do you not think that that replicates the regressive aspects of the council-tax system?

Ms Monaghan: Do not get me wrong. Although we agree that the system had to be reviewed, we do not like the new scheme at all. However, if the Government are intent on pursuing it, which they are, we disagree with the cap at £500,000. If there is to be a cap, it should be at £300,000 or thereabouts, and it should be in place for at least a generation. Although the cap may affect only 14,000 households now, by 2010, as house prices rise, it will affect a higher proportion of the population.

Mr Farley: If you extrapolate the current trend in house prices, which have gone up by 45% since 1 January 2005, they will approximately double by 2010, and the cap would therefore affect about 136,000 households by then.

One moderately simple way to deal with the cap is to consider the multiplier that is used to calculate one's rates from the capital value of one's home. That multiplier is currently set at 0.0059. If that multiplier were changed to 0.006030, it would generate exactly the same amount of money, with a cap at £300,000, and people at the lower end would not be penalised. The Government's documentation claims that 55,000 houses fall into the bottom band of £0 to £50,000. The rates bills for those homes would change from an average of £148 to an average of £151 under the system that I have described. Therefore the bunch at the bottom end would be protected by the mechanism of simply adjusting the multiplier, and the people at the top end would pay more.

Mr Blayney: I wish to address the point that Anne made about the prospect of maintaining a ghetto mentality.

We must offer folk the opportunity to develop in the community and to invest in society. They should be able to watch their kids go to school, and to hope that their hospitals will be better and their streets will be clean. They must have the opportunity to develop their homes, and that is why we suggest a £300,000 cap. People who are suffering in the community must be given the opportunity to grow out of it, and they should be allowed to aspire to making an investment in the community. That is crucial.

Mr Weir: Thank you for your presentation. We strongly support a cap on the rates. I would like a good deal of financial information, so you may have to get back to me on some questions.

First, you have provided figures that show the impact on each household in Northern Ireland of setting the cap at different levels. I am not looking for a direct response to this question, but I would be grateful if you could provide us with figures for the total net income for the full system across all of Northern Ireland rather than simply per household.

Ms Monaghan: The Government say that it will be the same — about £450 million a year. They say that they are simply redistributing the burden.

Mr Weir: I appreciate that, but we have been told that the "cost" in lost revenue would be £500,000 or £1 million, be that through redistribution or whatever.

Ms Monaghan: The suggested figure is about £1 million.

Mr Weir: Presumably there are corresponding figures that would give a total figure for all the households in Northern Ireland were the cap to be set at £300,000. I suspect that you cannot tell us those figures now, but I would be grateful if you would send them to us in writing.

You mentioned revenue streams and the idea of fixing a £300,000 cap for a generation. What impact would that have year on year? You have already told us that, by 2010, you reckon that about 136,000 homes will be affected by the £500,000 cap.

You also proposed several additional relief measures, some of which are reasonable enough and some of which will bring us into parity with other parts of the UK. What would be the cost of a 25% rebate for single-person households? Are there any estimates of the potential costs of a 25% rebate for all disabled people, not simply those who require home modifications? Furthermore, what is your assessment of the cost of providing a second-adult rebate?

You also mentioned the different capped levels in the other three jurisdictions of the UK. We are told that the reason that the cap has been set at £500,000 is that the maximum bill will be about £3,000. Like you, we get that thrown back in our faces. I appreciate your point about the cost of living and average incomes in Northern Ireland, but do you have figures to show the maximum charges in each of the other three jurisdictions? For example, if the cap in Scotland is fixed at £212,000, I suspect that the maximum charge there would be a good deal less than £3,000. It would be helpful if you could give the subgroup that information.

I will play devil's advocate on my next point. You mention the concern that revaluation would lead to increased bills. If revaluation were to be carried out on a cost-neutral basis, surely there would not be increased bills across the board. It would, in fact, result in a further redistribution of bills. Thus bills would increase disproportionately only in areas in which the price index of houses had grown quickly. Homeowners in areas in which the price index has increased at a rate lower than the Northern Ireland average would find that their bills would reduce. I would like you to deal with that point.

Finally, what is your view on the proposed transitional-relief period? Although it is better to have some form of transitional relief, many of us feel that a period of three years will provide for a sharp rise and that a longer period may be more appropriate. Perhaps you could deal with the final two points now and provide information on the others later.

Mr M Kelly: Transitional relief is a con; it is just softening the blow. Many people who have not really looked at their rates bills are thinking that they will not be as bad as others are making out. In the second year, they will be saying, "Hold on a minute", and when they receive their full bills, there will be war.

Ms Monaghan: There may not be a war. [Laughter.]

We will come back to the subgroup on the questions asked. A key issue is about redistribution, which is available via the maximum cap set at £500,000. Raymond has already explained how that would impact on people at the upper end; namely, £3·46 for every house in Northern Ireland.

Rates raise about £450 million. The Government have set aside £7 million for pensioners, and that will not be means tested or based on ability to pay, and another £4 million if the Assembly is restored. That sum of £11 million, as a proportion of £450 million, is not a huge amount to be giving back to those who need it most.

Essentially, rates pay for services, and the single-person discount was introduced in the rest of the UK because single people like me, who live alone, do not use the same services as a family comprising 12 or 14 people. This is not a personal issue, because my rates bill has reduced slightly. The principle of the system is wrong.

Mr Weir: A spurious argument was thrown back at us regarding the single-occupancy rebate: the Minister suggested that such a rebate would benefit millionaires who live alone.

Ms Monaghan: I am not one of those.

Mr Weir: I appreciate that. However, you mentioned those on low income, so, to kill off the argument that the rebate would benefit people on high income who live alone, would you envisage a situation where someone on a very large income who lives alone would not benefit from the single-occupancy rebate?

Ms Monaghan: That is why we are saying that there should be means testing. We are prepared to negotiate around the figure of 25% rebate for single-person households. People earning more should pay more than those who earn less. However, this is also about services, and we are worried that it is connected to the review of public administration (RPA), that is, paying for those services that will fall under the control of the super-councils.

Thus far, the system has not reflected the regional rate or the district rate. The district rate has not been struck for 2006-07 yet. People are receiving estimated bills, and some are shouting: “Whoopee, this ain’t that bad.” However, they have not received their final rates bills yet.

We have been told by those responsible for rating policy that a single-person discount set at 25% would cost £14 million. If the discount were means tested, people like me would not receive it, and the cost would not be as great. However, some single people living alone are struggling to pay their bills. Means testing would ensure that the cost would be redistributed among those who can afford to pay. At the moment, the system does not take ability to pay into account.

Mr Farley: Your other point was in respect of the revaluation of houses in 2010. Last year, there was an out-of-the-blue 19% increase in the regional rate.

Mr Weir: That was nothing to do with revaluation.

Mr Farley: That is correct.

Mr Weir: It was an attempt by the Government to place a greater burden on taxpayers.

Mr Farley: Unless we are instructed in solid-gold-plated writing that the regional rate will not be affected, we will not know what will happen. No one has been told what will happen. We are assuming that the regional rate will not be affected, and that there will be a redistribution of wealth in the 2010 revaluation.

2.00 pm

Mr Weir: Any Government can try to get something in by the back door by raising the regional rate. However, if that is achieved purely through revaluation of property, although the overall rates bill for most people will increase, the rates base will also increase, and the rate to be struck by councils would reduce correspondingly. It would be a multiplier of sorts on one side of the equation.

Mr Farley: Income tax was introduced to pay for the Napoleonic wars. Those wars were won long ago, however, income tax has kept on going in order to raise revenue.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Yes, it was meant to be temporary.

Mr Farley: There are other issues that have to be paid for. Stan will know about them.

Mr Blayney: One crucial matter has not yet been mentioned. There were 35 years of troubles during which direct-rule Ministers made all the spending decisions. None of the normal taxes that we have talked about — income tax and VAT — was spent appropriately on our infrastructure. Three years ago, the Chancellor gave us a gift of £200 million to make a start on a 10-year investment plan. That plan has a significant impact on the rates bill, and we estimate that it will cost each ratepayer approximately £110 a year. Had that money been spent appropriately, as capital out of national taxes, we would not be bearing the current burden, because we would have good infrastructure.

We are now having to address 35 years of neglect by direct-rule Ministers, and local taxpayers are paying for that. That did not happen in England; investment there was paid for by national taxes. We are being asked to take out large loans that we have to service and repay, and that will amount to 14% of the capital costs. A further 23% of those costs will come from private finance initiatives (PFIs), and only 63% will come from national tax funding. We estimate that that will be at a cost of £110 a year on each taxpayer's rates bill as we reach the end of the 10-year cycle. I do not understand why we should be treated differently from England.

Mr Farley: The costs are ongoing, because it seems as though the capital is not being repaid and the loan is constantly rolling on. Is that correct?

Mr Blaney: There is a suggestion that the loans will be for 25 years and the PFI schemes will be for 35 years, and there will have to be a modicum of return of capital as we get close to the end of those cycles. The Northern Ireland Audit Office (NIAO) report of 7 December 2006 identified that point — that the reinvestment and reform initiative (RRI) has been mismanaged by the national Ministers' and local Departments' ability to take forward the projects. We are concerned that loans are being drawn down and that no appropriate management is being put in place to deal with them.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): What are the implications of the Burt Report and the forthcoming report from Michael Lyons? What is the implication of the way the authorities are reacting to them?

Mr Blaney: The Burt Report suggested applying a 1% multiplier to capital values: Northern Ireland's is 0.59% plus the water rate addition, which is almost the same as applying 1% to capital values. Therefore, it almost seems as though Burt was emulating the mechanism being offered to us.

Ms Monaghan: It would not surprise us if Sir Michael Lyons suggests a similar system for England and Wales. We are arguing that if the system is to be revenue-neutral during the first year, it should be deferred for a year so that appropriate models could be put in place to analyse the effects that it will have on the groups listed in section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998.

Mr Blaney: It is only because of the cynical 19% increase last year that cover has been given to keep year one static. The Burt Report was tossed out within two hours of being brought to the Scottish Parliament.

Ms Monaghan: Jack McConnell, the Labour Scottish First Minister, was having none of it.

Mr Blaney: It was quite clear that the folk there did, surprisingly enough, understand very rapidly what 1% meant. The difficulty is that our population has never had a chance to comprehend the composition of rates and water tax — both as a property tax coming out to almost the same multiplier.

Mr Shannon: You refer in one of your presentations to raising the savings threshold to £32,000. Do you have an idea of how many more people that would bring into the system for rates relief? The theme running through your presentation is that you do not want to see the rates system based on house valuations.

Is there a more suitable alternative? You have also referred to a banding system, which is similar to that in the rest of the UK, and a lot of your other suggestions are along the lines of what is happening in the rest of the UK. Perhaps that is the way you wish to see us go.

Ms Monaghan: The way in which we are going is the way that the direct-rule Ministers dictate. We have not had a say in the matter. We are basing our campaign around a similar system in the rest of the UK, and we do not think that that system is great. There should be a system based on ability to pay and not on the capital value of a home. However, that might require an additional means-tested local tax. I know that the Assembly does not have those powers, and, interestingly enough, the Scots have them but choose not to use them. If this is the system that we are going to have, it should be deferred for a year until we see how it works out.

If capital value is to be used, it should be means tested; however, we do not think that capital value should be used. What a person pays should be based on earnings. The other system is another way of introducing means testing into the system. It is the Government's crude attempt to raise revenue, and revenue should be raised through what a person earns and ability to pay.

Mr Shannon: You mentioned the threshold being raised.

Ms Monaghan: The people who carried out the review of rating policy would have those figures.

Mr M Kelly: Yes, it would have to come from people with the statistics.

I have the application form here. There is no way of determining how many people have lifted the application form and thrown it to one side because of the £16,000 bar. I know a lot of people who would have around £20,000 to £25,000 in savings, which is not a fortune these days. Those people would not be entitled to a great whack of relief, but they would be entitled to some.

Mr Shannon: Some people would qualify.

Mr Blaney: The crucial thing is that if they have only £25,000 and are suddenly hit with an extra £1,000 in charges each year, they will soon be down to £16,000. It is, essentially, a Labour Government savings tax, where people are instantly drawn down to £16,000 before they can get relief.

Ms Monaghan: If the taper were reduced from 12% to 6%, pensioners would qualify automatically, regardless of their income.

Mr M Kelly: Some pensioners would qualify — not all of them, but most would.

Ms Monaghan: Yes, most of them would. A lot of people in Northern Ireland — particularly pensioners — use the space under the bed as their bank, and that has been reflected in robberies. Confidence in the system would increase if the taper were reduced. We have to base our campaign and our arguments around the system proposed by the Government, because there is no other ball game. That is why we are asking the Assembly to take it away, defer it for a year and then look at it. That could not happen between 2002-06, because the Assembly was not in place. The Assembly must take this issue on board.

We have not moved into the area of water rates. Previously, £134 per annum of every rates bill went on water. Other people are fighting those battles. The Assembly needs to start afresh and look at the whole issue.

Mr M Kelly: Mr Chairman, I want to make one last point on the option of deferment for pensioners.

In the written submission, I have listed many of the questions about equity release. The Government intend to operate an equity release scheme. If they decide to go down that route, they will probably introduce regulations. Deferment would be a good idea for people who do not have a next of kin. The equity would come from their estates, but it would need to be decided whether the accumulated rate arrears would come out before the Chancellor of the Exchequer had deducted capital-gains tax, or inheritance tax had been taken. There would be a big difference between the two possibilities.

If the Chancellor were to take his 40% of the excess, and arrears were to be deducted from the remainder, it might not be possible to recover the arrears in full. The question would arise as to whether the person to whom the estate had been bequeathed would be liable to pay the difference. That is an issue that would need to be considered. However, deferment is an option that might be appreciated by people who inherit high-equity houses.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): This will have to be the last question.

Mr Cree: Mr Blayney, is £1.5 billion the total amount?

Mr Blayney: If the capital investment amounts to £6 billion, it would be at least £1.5 billion. However, a significant proportion of that — 63% — will be funded from national tax. The rest will be funded by a combination of PFI and loans. The £1.5 billion is purely national-loan-fund money. It is a direct loan from the Treasury, and it will have to be serviced through the 25-year cycle. It is a direct loan.

Mr Cree: That is interesting. It almost mirrors the backlog in capital investment in the Water Service.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): That is true.

Mr M Kelly: Will the subgroup provide us with a list of questions to answer in writing?

Mr Weir: We could provide a list of questions. Several of them will relate to the statistics. Part of the subgroup's remit is to evaluate rate relief and to decide whether the subgroup backs all the proposals, some of them or none, and to what extent. Any decisions need to be taken on the basis of having a reasonable level of information as to net costs, and so on. I have asked several of the relevant questions reports.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Could you repeat the costing requests?

Mr Weir: That would be useful. Perhaps someone could take a note of them.

Ms Monaghan: They are second-adult rebate; single persons; the net revaluation; whether it is cost-neutral or further redistribution —

Mr Weir: I would not worry too much about the cost-neutral aspect.

Ms Monaghan: Single person; single adult —

Mr Weir: Single person; single adult; the extension of the disabled persons' element; the cost of the £300,000 cap; and the long-term projected costs, in that the measures could be frozen for a generation. It was mentioned that an income stream over £136,000 would probably be the upper limit. I appreciate that there are other measures that could be introduced to counterbalance those. I am simply seeking an idea of what each measure would cost.

Mr M Kelly: Lord Rooker said in Parliament that the Rate Collection Agency (RCA) was introducing a new range of measures to make it easier to claim housing benefit. We would like to know what they are.

My second question is for David Hanson. A 25% single person's tax reduction was introduced in England. Why, therefore, will he not introduce such a measure in Northern Ireland?

Mr Blayney: 'Reinvestment and Reform: Improving Northern Ireland's Public Infrastructure: Report to the House of Commons by the Comptroller and Auditor General for Northern Ireland' was published on 7 December. We received a copy too late to include our comments on it in our submission. However, I have a one-page summary of it, which I will leave with the subgroup.

Ms Monaghan: The Government claim that the system is revenue neutral; the current rates system raises £450 million, and the new rates system raises the same sum — so why should there be any objection to a fresh reconsideration of a means-tested rates system for Northern Ireland that is based on ability to pay?

2.15 pm

Mr M Kelly: With regard to systems, we may not have to worry about that. I have it on fairly good authority that the system might not be operational for 1

April and that unpaid bills for which warning letters and threats of court action should have been delivered by September have not yet been issued despite the fact that it is almost Christmas. There should be an examination of the Rate Collection Agency's new computer system at Airport Road. It is not doing its job.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): On that note, I want to thank you on behalf of my colleagues for your attendance and submission and in anticipation of the written answers on particular financial matters that you will provide. The subgroup wishes you well. Happy Christmas.

Ms Monaghan: Thank you. Same to you.

Mr M Kelly: Is there a time limit on the written answers? Do you need them quickly?

Mr Shannon: Before Christmas day or next week sometime. [Laughter.]

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): The subgroup needs the written answers by the first week of January, because it must publish its report by 18 January.

Ms Monaghan: What is the procedure? Does the subgroup present the report to the Assembly when it has been published?

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): The subgroup presents its report to the Programme for Government Committee first. If the Committee is content with the report, which it probably will be — unless it wants to amend it to some extent — past practice was for the Assembly to debate the report. Although that happened in the past, it may not be the case in the future. However, that is the procedure.

The Committee Clerk: I imagine that the practical matter of dissolution on 31 January will be as significant as any other, as reports are being published by six or seven different subgroups. There may not an opportunity to debate all of them.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): That is true.

Mr Weir: It might be that debates will be truncated such as they were this week when there were two two-hour debates on Monday and Tuesday and five days of meetings. I assume that the Programme for Government Committee will not want a report to sit gathering dust.

The Committee Clerk: The Programme for Government Committee must consider subgroups' reports so that it can inform a new Executive and make recommendations for the Programme for Government. The witnesses, in their written answers, should endeavour to focus their points and costings on that.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): That is a fair point. Thank you very much.

I welcome our next witnesses to the meeting. They are Mr Brian McClure, head of the Rating Policy Division, and Mr Leo O'Reilly, the budget director of the Central Finance Group, both representing the Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP). Good afternoon, gentlemen.

Thank you for coming, and for your written submission, which members will find in their information packs.

We have been allowing witnesses the opportunity to make some brief opening remarks before answering questions.

Mr Leo O'Reilly (Department of Finance and Personnel): I shall make a short contextual statement. The reform of the rating system was predicated on the understanding that the existing arrangements contained anomalies and depended on an outdated system of valuation based on rental values.

Having completed a lengthy period of research that had begun in 2000, the Government concluded that they would introduce a new rating system from April 2007, which would be not only more transparent, but easier to understand than the existing arrangements.

The reform programme is aimed at introducing a rating system that distributes the burden among Northern Ireland householders in a way that the Government feel is fairer; it is not a new tax. Around 25% of households in Northern Ireland currently receive assistance with their rates bills, and 20% of households pay no rates at all due to low income. Under the new arrangements, the Government intend not only to maintain those levels of relief but, for the first time, to introduce new systems of relief for ratepayers.

The final piece of legislation to give effect to those reforms was made at Privy Council on 14 November. The new system introduces capital valuation of domestic properties and a new range of reliefs for ratepayers, including a new low-income-related relief scheme, transitional relief for people whose bills will increase by more than 33%, full relief for those in full-time education and training, and a more generous and simpler relief scheme for people who have had to modify their homes because of a disability. The new relief scheme will provide assistance over and above that which is currently awarded under the statutory housing benefit scheme, which, of course, applies across the UK.

Several powers have been included in the legislation to allow relief to be directed to particular groups and to adjust the level of required assistance. That is an important legislative mechanism, which allows a restored Assembly to adjust and tailor the system as it sees fit, without the need to introduce new primary legislation. In other words, adjustments to the existing arrangements can be made under subordinate legislation.

Under the terms of the St Andrews Agreement, and in advance of restoration, the Government made a commitment to work with the political parties and key stakeholders to introduce a maximum cap on rates, and to examine the possibility of further relief for pensioners on low incomes. Work on that matter is in progress, and I understand that the subgroup has already heard today from Help the Aged on that issue.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel, David Hanson, will write to the main political parties shortly, outlining his proposals for delivery of those additional reliefs, including about £4 million per annum in additional relief for pensioners. The Government have also agreed to arrangements for a valuation cap on the new relief scheme.

Finally, a new independent valuation tribunal will be established to provide a new and additional appeal mechanism for those who wish to challenge the assessments of their property valuations.

Although there has been a small but vigorous campaign of opposition to the proposed changes, the Government firmly believe that the new system will be fairer for the people of Northern Ireland, will benefit more people — particularly those on lower incomes and in vulnerable groups — and will provide greater reliefs than are available under the present arrangements.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Thank you. We move to questions from members.

Mr Shannon: May I ask a couple of questions, or only one?

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Most members have managed to make the most of their time. I will indulge you as long as the number of supplementary questions is not excessive.

Mr Shannon: You say that the new rating system is fair. However, all today's witnesses — and, to be honest with you, my constituents — say that the new system is anything but fair. Pensioners in particular tell us that it will place a financial pressure on them that they have not had to deal with before. Suggestions have been made about increasing the savings threshold and about single people's incomes. It has also been suggested that pensioners who are just outside the benefits threshold might fall into a gap. We discussed that this morning, and I am concerned about it.

Despite your submission, I am not convinced that the new system is fair; neither are the people that I represent. How do you respond to those concerns?

Mr O'Reilly: I will ask Mr McClure to speak about the range of additional reliefs and, specifically, the reliefs for pensioners and those on low incomes, which are under consideration. The new arrangements will redistribute the rates burden: some households will pay more; others will pay less. Moving from a system based on 1960s rental values to one based on capital values causes a redistribution of the rates burden to those who live in higher-value properties. However, that is not always the case. I can explain it in more detail if you want.

It is being described as a fairer system because the Government believe that it distributes the rates burden more fairly.

Mr Brian McClure (Department of Finance and Personnel): The present system distributes the rating burden among householders based on 1960s rental values. Therefore the tax base is all over the place; there has been no revaluation since the mid-1970s. Indeed, the evidence used in constructing the valuation list then was taken from the late 1960s. The revaluation on a capital-value basis will redistribute the rating burden; it will not in itself raise more revenue. Many people pay much more than they should under the present system; the new system will redress the balance.

The revaluation exercise — which has not been carried out for more than 30 years and which is long overdue — will change the basis of valuation. The Government recognise the need to provide reliefs over and above the statutory housing benefits system. I will try to explain the proposed rate-relief scheme and the enhanced pensioner-relief scheme in order to alleviate people's concerns.

May I give you an example of the sort of relief that is available under the present statutory scheme, what will be available under the proposed rate relief scheme, and under the enhanced rate-relief scheme? Take the example of a single pensioner aged between 60 and 64 who lives in a house with a capital value of £150,000 and a rates bill of £900. Under the existing housing benefit system, the income of such a person in order to qualify for relief would have to be £10,430 a year or less; the rebate on their rates bill would be £86. Under the new rates-relief scheme, they would get £412. The maximum eligible yearly income will increase from £10,430 to £13,500.

That is what is proposed under the new rates relief scheme.

As part of the St Andrews Agreement, the Government have made legislative provision for an additional £4 million specifically targeted towards pensioners. Enhanced pensioner relief is one of the proposals that we considered with Help the Aged and Age Concern. The Government wish to share the detail of that with the political parties, and it is hoped that that will be communicated in writing this week. The enhanced provision will increase the rates bill to £518 and increase the maximum eligible yearly income to £14,320. It will make a significant difference to the statutory housing-benefit scheme.

2.30 pm

Unlike some council tax abatements and concessions, the Government wish the package of relief measures to be introduced in Northern Ireland to be predominantly based on ability to pay. It is impossible to give a ready reckoner explaining how the measures will affect every individual, because every household is different and every individual's circumstances are different. However, it will use the same levers as the housing-benefit system but will provide more generous income thresholds to allow the relief to be delivered to where it is most needed.

The Department considered the savings limit, which has been mentioned, with Help and Aged and Age Concern in respect of delivering enhanced pensioner relief. Those organisations, which were advised by Eileen Evason, who is an expert in this field, took the view that that was not the best way to deliver more relief to lower-income pensioners. The Department took that view into account when formulating the proposals. It is hoped that a proposals paper will be sent to the political parties this week once it has been cleared by the Secretary of State.

Mr Shannon: I am aware of very few people who would qualify for any reductions. I represent Strangford, where housing prices are rising — as they are rising across the Province — by £150 a day. I am not sure how many people will qualify for those benefits. It poses a great question for me.

I want to ask about lessons learnt elsewhere. Does the Department have any plans to revisit policy decisions in light of recent developments in Scotland and England? I am referring to the Lyons Inquiry and the Burt Inquiry.

I also want to ask about the agriculture sector, which is mentioned in the Department's submission.

Mr Raymond McCartney: That is one question that covers about 40 subjects. [Laughter.]

Mr McClure: Forgive me if I miss anything.

We do not know what the outcome of the Lyons Inquiry will be because the report has been delayed until March. The Chancellor of the Exchequer announced that he wanted other reviews to align with the findings from the Lyons Inquiry. We do not expect to hear anything, and they are remaining tight-lipped as to the possible contents of the report of the Lyons Inquiry.

The Burt Inquiry was an independent inquiry in Scotland and its outcome is currently under consideration by Scottish Ministers. That inquiry is of interest, but the package of reform measures that the Government are proceeding with in Northern Ireland were worked up in the light of local consultation. There is nothing in the findings of the Burt Inquiry that has taken the fancy of Government and that they would seek to replicate in Northern Ireland.

Mr Shannon: An interim report of the Lyons Inquiry has been published. Can you answer in respect of that?

Mr McClure: Yes. However, that report focuses more on the structure and role of local government than on reform of council tax.

Mr Shannon: This question may have been asked already. In light of that answer, will the Department be happy to revisit policy decisions once it has a chance to consider the interim report? That is what we want to know; not whether the Department will wait for the outcome of the final report. If aspects of that report are different from the Department's policy, will the Department be prepared to reconsider them?

Mr McClure: That is a decision for Ministers. We have examined the interim report, and Ministers do not believe that anything in it has any resonance with what is happening in rating reform in Northern Ireland. There are likely to be points of interest in the final report, but we will not know what that report will contain until March or April 2007.

However, the answer to your question is yes; I believe that Ministers would take into account any outcome of the Lyons review. Nevertheless, our understanding is that any recommendations of the Lyons review would not be implemented until after the next general election. Therefore, any fundamental change in the funding of local government is likely to be two or three years away: it will not happen in the short to medium term.

Mr Shannon: I wish to ask a question on agricultural-occupancy clauses, which is a matter that I am familiar with. There is currently no provision within the rating system to address that important factor.

A house in the countryside may be valued for rates purposes at £300,000. However, if that property is subject to an agricultural-occupancy clause, it is immediately devalued. People can get a loan on those properties only from the Ulster Bank and the Halifax. I have sought opinions from three different estate agents, all of whom have said that there must be a 50% reduction in the value of such properties because they will not sell on the open market for £300,000. Those properties will only sell for £150,000, because of the agricultural-occupancy clause.

The rates system gives every working farm a 20% reduction, but the valuation with an agricultural-occupancy clause may be 50% lower. That matter must be looked at. If someone cannot sell a house for £300,000, it is not worth £300,000. If someone can only sell a house for £150,000, that should be its rateable value. The Department has not taken that issue on board, and that concerns me.

My colleague Edwin Poots and I have raised this matter at another level. We have asked the Department to revisit its regulations on this matter. You happen to be here today, so this is a chance to ask you the same question.

Mr McClure: That is a good question. Every house must be valued against a set of statutory assumptions that relate to whether a house has a freehold, whether it is a vacant possession, etc. The exact saleability of every property interest in Northern Ireland is not what is assessed for taxation purposes.

Every house is valued against that set of statutory assumptions. As Mr Shannon said, one of those assumptions means that particular clauses are not taken into account. After consulting with the Ulster Farmers' Union and other representative bodies the Government considered that the policy that they have introduced is a fairer way of dealing with the matter.

For example, if the Government decided that they wanted to allow a percentage discount for a particular planning restriction or clause in a deed, it would have an unequal impact between the more modern bungalow-type farmhouses, and traditional farmhouses. Most of the older traditional farmhouses are not subject to the restrictions that Mr Shannon mentioned. Therefore, the more modern houses would be subject to a discount and the older farmhouses would not. The Government believed that it was fairer that all farmhouses in Northern Ireland should receive a discount. The rationale is that farmers, of course, cannot really choose where they want to live; they have to live with the land.

That is the rationale for the reduction, which, I hasten to add, currently applies under the existing system based on net annual value (NAV). A more generous reduction is provided in relation to capital value.

The level of reduction is a matter entirely for the Commissioner of Valuation; it is not set out in the legislation. However, not only did we consult on the policy, but the Valuation and Lands Agency consulted with the Ulster Farmers' Union in relation to the level of that reduction.

Mr Shannon: The Ulster Farmers' Union, of which I am a member, has a bit of a problem in listening to its members. As a result, it is not always reasonably astute about what its members are saying. About 2,000 or 3,000 households in the whole of the Province would probably qualify for the reduction.

I have spoken to officials from DFP, and I am happy to say that they seemed sympathetic. I hope that you people at the higher level will also be sympathetic to the request. Please look at it seriously. A house worth £300,000 will only be worth £150,000 if it has an agricultural-occupancy clause. A 50% rates reduction for houses that have agricultural-occupancy clauses would go a long way to resolving the issue.

Mr Cree: The subgroup also has to deal with non-domestic rates, and that is an issue that we are concerned about. Your paper — for which I thank you — states that the extra revenue generated from the gradual removal of derating will be available for investment in public services and infrastructure. That is a fine statement, and I hope that it is true. Has DFP calculated what the revenue impact will be if Northern Ireland firms go out of business due to the ending of industrial derating?

Mr McClure: You have met representatives from the Northern Ireland Manufacturing Focus Group (NIMFG) today; I am sure that they will have mentioned the PricewaterhouseCoopers study on the issues facing the manufacturing sector. The numbers employed in the manufacturing sector have been steadily declining for some time. It has been profiled, and it is expected that the sector will continue to shrink in any case, due to wider market pressures from around the world.

We have taken account of the fact that the manufacturing sector is reducing in size. It is the Government's assessment that the ending of industrial derating will not cause any significant closures in the manufacturing sector. However, following consultations in a working group with the NIMFG and Amicus, the Government have agreed that next year's rating level will be at 30% rather than the planned 35%, and that is pending a full review of the policy planned for April 2007.

The Government do recognise the serious concerns of industry, and they have already agreed to review the policy next year. That will be done thoroughly, involving consultations not just with NIMFG and Amicus but also other industry groups.

Mr Cree: Do you have actual figures for the likely further decline of the manufacturing sector?

Mr McClure: I do not have them to hand, but I will write to the subgroup with those projections. We have had as open an engagement as possible with NIMFG, and we have shared our projections with them. I am more than happy to share the information with the subgroup.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Are you saying that you are not building in any additional decline specifically driven by the reduction in manufacturing?

Mr McClure: That is correct.

The Chairperson (Dr Birnie): Leslie, please be concise.

Mr Cree: I have two questions on domestic rates. I am sure that you are aware of DSD's press statement of 23 November in which it was estimated that between 5,000 and 24,000 people in Northern Ireland who were entitled to housing benefit were not claiming it. What does that mean for the rates relief scheme?

With regard to the appreciation of house values and future revaluations, what assurances can the Department give that the formula will be adjusted downwards to reflect the increases in market values in future revaluations?

2.45 pm

Mr O'Reilly: I will answer the first question on non-claimants, and Brian will deal with the more technical question on revaluations.

The Government are aware that not all reliefs are being taken up, particularly in the privately owned sector. There is a much higher take-up of reliefs in the social-rented sector. Early in the new year, the intention is to put together an information and publicity campaign to ensure that people are made aware of the available reliefs. When the new system is introduced, the Rate Collection Agency (RCA) will send information to all householders to remind them about the existing reliefs, and to explain the relief scheme and whether they qualify for it. The RCA is aware of the issue and has plans to improve understanding across the community of the availability of relief because, even under the existing system, there is not full take-up of reliefs.

Mr Cree: I am pleased to hear that, and I hope that the information sent out will be better than the leaflet on water charges, which poses as many questions as it answers.

Mr McClure: The RCA recently developed a detailed take-up strategy for the existing housing-benefit scheme. The twin aims of the strategy are to simplify the claims process for claimants with entitlement and to improve communication partnership arrangements with ratepayers, the advice sector and the Social Security Agency (SSA). We have discussed the issue with Help the Aged and Age Concern and will continue to do so.

Increased take-up of housing benefit is a win-win situation for everyone. It means that more money comes into Northern Ireland but, more importantly, people in need receive the benefits to which they are entitled. Everyone must do his or her level best to ensure that take-up improves. The RCA developed its strategy in consultation with the voluntary sector, and details will be announced early in the new year. The strategy will be included in the proposals paper that will be sent to the political parties this week. It is an important issue and central to ensuring that those in need get what they deserve.

Mr Cree asked whether the formula related to the appreciation in house values will change. The formula is that house values multiplied by the rate equals the rate bill. If house values rise, the rate should reduce accordingly because of the change in currency. It will probably reduce by more than that because, as a natural consequence of new houses being included and improvements to property being made, the tax base enlarges naturally every year. The 15,000 to 20,000 new houses built in Northern Ireland every year are added to the tax base. Therefore if the same levels of revenue are raised from the rating system, there should be at least a corresponding reduction in the rate.

However, revenue raised from the rating system depends on the Budget decision of, I hope, the Assembly or the Government and the individual budget decisions of the 26 district councils. Although those processes are related, they are separate.

Mr Cree: I am concerned about the propensity for the rate to increase dramatically due to perceived demand for other capital and revenue projects. The rate, therefore, is open-ended.

Mr McClure: Yes, but the increase in house prices at the next revaluation scheduled for 2012 should lead to at least a corresponding reduction in the rate in the pound — all other matters being equal. That is not the small print but the large print.

Mr O'Reilly: A simple point, sometimes missed, is that rates and council tax are different from income tax. The Government set a particular rate in the pound for income tax. However, they do not say that should they achieve £X billion of revenue, they will stop charging people income tax. The rate in the pound charged for rates is driven by an initial decision taken by Government or district councils on how much revenue they want to raise. Therefore the rate in the pound flows from that decision. It is not an open-ended revenue-raising system: the revenue required is decided first, and that determines the rate in the pound for individual rates bills.

Mr Cree: Mr Farley from the Northern Ireland Fair Rates Campaign told the subgroup earlier that income tax was introduced as a temporary measure during the Napoleonic wars. We have suffered from it ever since.

Ms Ritchie: I have several questions, but they are all part of a larger one.

First, what cost implications are associated with student relief? Secondly, there seems to be confusion about the methodology used in calculating non-domestic rates. Would you clarify that?

We understand that the Northern Ireland Fair Rates Campaign has asked DFP for an analysis, by income and tenure, of the proportion of households that would be better off as a result of rating reform. I understand that DFP suggested the use of the continuous household survey and the family resources survey to inform that analysis. Has there been any outcome?

Mr McClure: The final question is the easiest. Yesterday, the Northern Ireland Statistics and Research Agency (NISRA) published on its website an analysis using information from the 2001 census, which has been linked to most of the capital values. NISRA has managed to link around 550,000. The sample is much more comprehensive, and the impacts, as regards tenure, are there for everybody to see. However, the analysis cannot link with income.

DFP, along with colleagues in the Department for Social Development (DSD), has done some work linking the Northern Ireland family resources survey, which is a survey of about 1,800 households in Northern Ireland that is carried out regularly, with the capital values. We will be advising the Northern Ireland Fair Rates Campaign of that work, and we will also advise the subgroup if needed. The work is ongoing, but I would be happy to come back to the subgroup with whatever information we glean as and when we get it.

Non-domestic rates are calculated by multiplying the net annual value of a property by the rate in the pound. As you well know, there are two rates in Northern Ireland — regional and district. Does your question relate to the actual valuation assessments?

Ms Ritchie: Yes.

Mr McClure: The last revaluation of non-domestic property took place in 2003, and the basis of that valuation is rental value as at April 2001. For consistency, all valuations are done to a single valuation date. The Valuation and Lands Agency (VLA) carried out those assessments. There are about 75,000 non-domestic properties, and VLA has been doing the revaluations fairly regularly.

Anything that would affect the rental value of a property would affect the net annual value — even the quality of the finish. The net annual value of a shop could be affected by location, size, what services the building has and how convenient it is. Everything that would affect the value of the property would be reflected in its net annual value. Does that answer your question?

Ms Ritchie: That is fine at this point.

Mr McClure: There is no simple formula involved — everything is taken into account. VLA undertakes those valuations.

You asked about the cost implications of student relief. DFP's estimated cost for that is £3 million to £4 million. We predict that up to 3,000 households will benefit from that relief, and that is the figure on which we are currently working.

Ms Ritchie: In the Secretary of State's proposals that will be forwarded to the political parties, is there any reference to a hardship scheme?

Mr McClure: No. That was considered earlier in the process, in the 2002 consultation paper, 'Review of Rating Policy'. Given the package of other measures, Ministers considered that that was not necessary. There is a hardship scheme for the non-domestic sector, but, at this time, the Government do not plan to introduce a hardship scheme for the domestic sector. However, that, as with every policy, must be kept under review.

Ms Ritchie: Being a representative from the rural community, I have a final point concerning farm dwellings. Article 24 of The Rates (Amendment) (Northern Ireland) Order 2006 proposes a discount on buildings used for agricultural diversification projects. The imposition of rates could negate such initiatives in rural areas, and, in many instances, negate diversification as a supplement for agriculture incomes. Is it possible, in certain circumstances, to exclude such buildings from rates to assist a beleaguered agricultural community?

Mr McClure: Yes, it is possible to legislate. Rating is entirely a devolved matter. Subject to issues of state aid, a local Assembly would be entitled to review the policy and come up with a more generous relief. However, as with all forms of relief, everyone else would have to pay a little more.

Ms Ritchie: Presumably you have not calculated the cost implications of that.

Mr McClure: We have calculated the cost implications for the scheme that is going ahead, and a regulatory impact assessment was published. It would not be too taxing a process to produce some estimates for you. It depends on where you draw the line, and what you want to include. The present scheme is for buildings that are currently considered agricultural and, therefore, not valued, never mind rated, but if they do fall into a use that means that they are rateable, then there is a 50% rates holiday. That is what the farm diversification scheme proposes, but it is possible for an Assembly to review that and to consider a different percentage or a complete rates holiday for a period.

You will be aware that there are issues concerning unfair competitive advantages for new entrants. Established entrepreneurs could find themselves in competition with people who are not paying rates, but it is possible to review that.

Mr Raymond McCartney: We have heard evidence from various groups today. The Fair Rates Campaign said that the equality impact assessment was not properly carried out:

"We say that the EQIA was not properly carried out because the Continuous Household Survey (CHS) was not available to assist the analysis of the single capital value system which was subsequently chosen as the new model to calculate our rates."

Do you have any comment on that?

Mr McClure: A final equality impact assessment was published, but, in addition, the Department is committed to carrying out further work. Part of that further work includes the work that NISRA has undertaken, and that was published yesterday. The original work was a spatial analysis examining how section 75 groups were represented in different district council areas. The NISRA analysis is much more sophisticated and goes as far as to include household areas. One of the pieces of data collected through the census is section 75 grouping, so it was possible, at least for the main groups, for that work to be done, and it has now been published.

The Department believes that it has fulfilled its statutory requirements, and in continuing to monitor the equality impact of the policy, it is, in fact, exceeding them.

3.00 pm

Members may know that before the draft Order was debated in Westminster, Michael Copeland, a pensioner, sought leave to apply for a judicial review. One issue listed on the affidavit was that the Department had not conducted a proper equality impact assessment. Leave to apply for a judicial review was not granted, and no criticism of the Department was made. The courts, therefore, have considered the issue.

Mr Raymond McCartney: My second question relates to an issue that Margaret mentioned. Domestic rates come under the umbrella of a fair system. At present, there is a fixed number of dwellings in Northern Ireland. Roughly how many people would benefit from a reduction in rates? If, for example, 100,000 households pay rates, would 75,000 benefit under the new system?

Mr McClure: Do you want exact figures as to how many households would benefit? Bare statistics, showing the impact on households, have been published. However, we do not have access to the potential number of households that would benefit. Such statistics are not available to us.

Mr Raymond McCartney: At present, rates bills are fixed; under the new system, that will change. I am looking to know how many households would pay less. That is what most people want to know.

Mr McClure: I will find that information.

Mr O'Reilly: While Brian is looking for that precise figure, I should point out that there is an interaction of two factors. Individual household rate liability might be reduced by the transition from the existing system to the new system. Those are the figures that the Minister termed "winners and losers".

On top of that, two other factors interact: since the Government plan to increase overall rates bills by 6% next year, that gain will be offset. The bill may be reduced as the rates system changes, but it will also increase because of the overall 6% increase in average bills across the Province.

The second factor that has a bearing on the issue is the circumstances of the individual households. Those circumstances determine whether the households are entitled to transitional relief and whether they are entitled to the various benefits that interact with rates bills. Although it is relatively easy to use the Noble index to provide figures for multiple deprivation by household, it is more difficult to take account of the circumstances of individual property owners.

Mr Raymond McCartney: You mentioned a paper that has been forwarded to the Secretary of State's office and that will be sent to the political parties. Does the paper contain a timeline? To whom it will be sent?

Mr McClure: The paper should be sent to party leaders this week. It is with the Secretary of State. I am not quite sure how it will be released. All the groundwork with Help the Aged and Age Concern has been done. There is an agreed proposals paper, which will be sent out along with the letter.

I have found the information that Mr McCartney asked for. I cannot provide absolute figures at the moment, but I will send them to the subgroup. The majority of ratepayers will experience a reduction in their rate bills as a direct consequence of the revaluation, assuming revenue neutrality. Some 68% of ratepayers will either face a lower bill or pay less than an extra £1 per week. Fewer than one fifth of ratepayers will face increases in rate liability of more than 25%. Transitional relief will be available to those who face an increase of more than 33%.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): May I ask that the letter to the party leaders be copied directly to the subgroup? We would, otherwise, have to wait another day or so for it to come through to us.

Mr O'Reilly: We will check with the Minister; however, that issue is connected to the political process. Matters that arise from the St Andrews Agreement, for example, normally go to the party leaders.

Mr Shannon: Could the letter be with the subgroup the next day?

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): As Jim says, it would be helpful if it were with the subgroup the next day.

Mr O'Reilly: It is in all our interests for it to be with the subgroup quickly.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): What legal advice has DFP received about any state-aid compliance issues that relate to having some sort of cap on the increase in manufacturing derating? Is there an issue with the European Commission? We have received conflicting statements about that.

Mr McClure: I do not want to be unhelpful, but I do not want to say too much about that. If the issue were debated too openly, people could be hindered in what they want to do in the future.

DFP's assessment, however, and that of its legal advisers, is that there is a risk that any change in derating would not be compliant with EU state-aid rules. However, DFP believes that the consequences of non-compliance in either repayment or in the risk of fines are not high. Therefore there could be an acceptable risk.

Member states examine the tax regimes of other member states. Therefore state-aid compliance would not be a major inhibitor, if I may put it that way. DFP believes that there is a risk that such a cap might not be compliant but that the consequences of non-compliance are not major.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Is the £4 million that has been set aside for extra relief measures since the St Andrews Agreement included in the Northern Ireland block, or is it additional? Where will that money come from?

Mr McClure: Given that the Secretary of State has already announced a 6% regional-rate increase for the coming year, there is no possible mechanism for recovering that from other ratepayers. That, I believe, is the long-term aim. That will represent a loss to the departmental expenditure limit in the coming year.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Does that mean that it will come from within the block?

Mr McClure: Yes.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): What about thereafter?

Mr McClure: That will depend on what Ministers — local or direct-rule — wish to do.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): That is interesting.

Ms Stanton: I want to ask Leo a quick question about the take-up of benefits. Given that a publicity and information pack campaign about benefits is to be launched, I wrote to the Minister a while ago asking what specific effect that would have on elderly people. The campaign against fraud that was occurring a while ago meant that old people were becoming too scared to collect their benefits. I was told that that would be taken into consideration when the review takes place.

Will resources be set aside, not only for publicity and information but for a substantial number of extra welfare-rights personnel who will provide outreach assistance and go into people's homes? It has been recognised that older people have a sense of pride when it comes to such matters. Therefore welfare-rights personnel must be able to go to older people's homes and sit down with them. Of course, that must apply to other people as well as to the elderly.

Mr O'Reilly: As Brian has mentioned, there are several angles to that. The RCA has responsibility for such matters, as does the Housing Executive through its work as the administrator of the housing benefit scheme. However, more important is the SSA, because it has its own benefits-awareness personnel. DFP wants to plug into those networks.

Ms Stanton's point about elderly people is particularly relevant. Low levels of take-up often occur with them, possibly for the reasons that the member mentioned, or simply because there is an apparent reluctance among elderly people to take up benefits, particularly those who are in the private, owner-occupied sector.

There is a lower level of take-up in that sector. The Housing Executive seems to have a better contact system, which means that it can identify those people who are entitled to benefits much quicker.

Mr McClure: I cannot talk to the detail of that issue, but I do know that the RCA hopes to improve its partnership arrangements with the advice sector and other Government bodies, such as the SSA, so that it can work with them to improve targeting.

Ms Stanton: The Department will insist that extra money be there to employ welfare-rights personnel.

Mr McClure: As I have said, I cannot talk to the detail of that issue, but if members wish, I will follow up on that point. I need to consult with those who are involved with the take-up strategy. It does not fall within my remit, but I know that they want to improve capacity building to ensure improved take-up. However, I will write to the subgroup on that point.

Mr O'Reilly: As Brian suggested, the basic housing-benefit arrangements provide a win-win situation for all of us. If people claim their national benefits, there is no loss to Northern Ireland. Therefore it is in everyone's interest that people claim their benefits.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): This may be the last question. What consideration has been given to proposals, which I think have come from both the Federation of Small Businesses (FSB), and, to some extent the Northern Ireland Manufacturing Focus Group (NIMFG), that part of rating liability be transferred to a dedicated fund for, for example, training? In other words, instead of companies paying rates at 35%, the margin between 25% and 35%, or between 25% and 30% would be paid into a dedicated training fund.

Mr McClure: Amicus and NIMFG made that suggestion late in the industrial derating talks with the Secretary of State. It has been discussed with Minister Hanson, who has since written to Maria Eagle, the Minister with responsibility for the Department for Employment and Learning (DEL) and the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (DETI). The proposal is currently with the Ministers.

The Government are interested in the proposal, and I think that they would like the NIMFG and Amicus to engage with the Skills for Business Network to formulate firmer proposals. At the moment, they have an outlined proposal. Ministers are interested, but there needs to be further engagement on the matter. The proposals were discussed at a recent NILGA (Northern Ireland Local Government Association) meeting with the Minister, so it has been raised at several meetings.

I have one more point. I know that the Minister will write to Basil McCrea and NIMFG on that subject in the new year.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): We have time for one more question.

Mr Clyde: I have only been at the meeting for a short time, but I want to support all that Jim said about farm dwellings. The policy affects the area that I represent, which is similarly rural to Jim's constituency. That policy should be given sympathetic consideration.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): That was another reference the agricultural-occupancy clause.

Are there any remaining questions?

Mr Cree: The small-business relief scheme was turned down this year, but it will be considered again next year. I believe that it works well in Scotland. What are your thoughts on it?

Mr McClure: The small-business relief scheme was introduced in Scotland in 2003 and in England in 2005. When its effectiveness in Scotland was reviewed, the outcome was not entirely positive. Therefore I assume that the Government wanted to wait for the scheme to bed in in England before its possible introduction in Northern Ireland. A second review has been agreed for 2007.

A recent development has been the FSB proposal for a rates-reinvestment fund, which would be associated with small-business relief.

The FSB is lobbying Ministers on that, so it is a live issue. It is possible that the review of industrial derating will be coupled with small-business relief.

3.15 pm

Mr Cree: It is; they are indirectly linked.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Thank you both very much for attending and for your written submission. We may need further elaboration on the statistics, and we would be grateful for your assistance with them. I wish you well for the holiday and for the future.

Adjourned at 3.15 pm.

The subgroup met at 10.35 am.

(The Chairman (Dr Birnie) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Mr Hewitt, welcome to the subgroup. Thank you for the written submission from the Economic Research Institute of Northern Ireland (ERINI). The comprehensive spending review (CSR) and the Programme for Government provide the terms of reference for this subgroup, and it aims to identify spending priorities and efficiencies for the next three-year period. Perhaps you will make some initial comments and then take questions from the members.

Mr Victor Hewitt (Economic Research Institute of Northern Ireland): Mr Chairman, thank you for the invitation. I am pleased to be here this morning. I apologise for the paucity of paper. The information in the public domain about the CSR process in Northern Ireland is limited, compared to the information available on the CSR process in the United Kingdom as a whole. I could find no information of any great use on the Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP) website — the people who are actually running the thing — whereas the Treasury has an entire website devoted to the subject. However, I will do my best to suggest areas into which the subgroup may wish to probe further. It is a tribute to the subgroup that it is meeting, because the process could continue to the summer with nothing coming into the public domain until the last minute.

This is the second comprehensive spending review. The first occurred after the Labour Government came to power in 1997. At that time, the Chancellor decided to stick with the spending plans of the previous Administration for two years and to use that period to conduct a comprehensive review of expenditure requirements for the United Kingdom as a whole. That comprehensive spending review reported in 1998, which is virtually a decade ago.

As the title suggests, a comprehensive spending review is an opportunity to look more fundamentally than is normally the case at the pressures that face the public sector over a longer period of time. Studies have been commissioned by the Treasury to consider long-term trends that fit the background of public services in the UK on matters such as demographics, globalisation and climate change.

The first CSR coincided with a change to the public expenditure regime. For centuries, the public expenditure regime was cash based. It operated in terms of the money that was spent in cash. Then two things happened: the classification of public expenditure changed; and a new planning regime was brought into existence. That planning regime introduced the concepts of the departmental expenditure limit (DEL) and annually managed expenditure (AME). The departmental expenditure limit is an attempt to fix expenditure, usually for three years. Expenditure must be controllable to do that with any degree of confidence. Annually managed expenditure is essentially volatile. It is demand led. A classic example is benefits — people who qualify are entitled to benefits. That fundamental distinction was introduced, and we had a DEL/AME split in the block at that time.

Essentially, the rule was that one could not move spending from annually managed expenditure to departmental expenditure limit, or, generally, vice versa. Therefore, departmental expenditure limit became the focus of what could be done in Northern Ireland.

Departmental expenditure limit here is adjusted by way of the Barnett formula, which gives Northern Ireland a population share of any change in a comparable programme in the rest of the UK — essentially in England, which is the benchmark. It is important to understand that the formula makes adjustments at the margins. It does not calculate the entire baseline, which is a historical construction, adjusted each year according to what is happening in comparable programmes in England.

If a lot of money goes into areas with which Northern Ireland is 100% comparable, we will get our population share of that change. If it goes into areas with which we have low comparability — the classic example would be defence — we will not get a share. Many assets in England, primarily water and sewerage, are no longer in the public domain, so it is important to understand how the mechanism works.

Annually managed expenditure is examined twice a year. It is obtained on a use-or-return basis: one gets what is needed, but surpluses cannot be retained or used for other types of expenditure — they are ring-fenced.

The expenditure regime changed in 1997, and there have been further changes between then and the current CSR. The greatest change has been the move from cash-based budgeting to resource budgeting, which is common in the private sector. In resource budgeting, expenditure is scored on an accruals basis — in other words, it is assigned to the period in which it occurred, even though payments may be made outside that period. An example would be electricity bills, where payment for the last quarter of a year would not be received until the first quarter of the following year. For accounting purposes, such expenditure would be assigned to the period in which it was incurred.

Resource accounting and budgeting has been the most fundamental change in the public expenditure regime, and it has taken quite a long time to bed in — even now, some people struggle with it. Anyone outside the system will struggle to understand what is going on, as all sorts of strange things begin to appear, such as impairment charges and cost-of-capital charges. However, the basic idea is relatively straightforward.

There are two budgets; a resource budget — the current expenditure budget, which pays for doctors' and nurses' pay, etc — and a capital budget, which is for investment. The link between the two is via a mechanism known as the capital charge. Capital charges exist to remind people that when the public sector makes an investment, it denies those resources to the private sector. Therefore there is an opportunity cost of making that investment in the private sector. A capital charge is therefore imposed on the amount of capital that is used up and denied to the private sector.

The trick is that that capital charge does not sit in the capital budget any longer; it goes into the resource budget and competes with all the other claims on that budget. If you are investing a great deal in capital, you had better be sure that you are likely to get a productive return on it, because you will be charged against your resource budget for the capital investment that you have made. If you were to build a large headquarters in the middle of a town, where property prices are expensive, you would pay for it considerably through pressure on resources that are needed for other purposes. That is the basic operating mechanism.

The Barnett formula is the major mechanism by which our underlying departmental expenditure limit is adjusted over time.

10.45 am

The regional rate is the largest and most important source of revenue available to Northern Ireland. That has only become embedded into the public expenditure system since the period of devolution. Prior to that it was considered a financing item rather than an expenditure item. Other sources of income include the sale of assets and a borrowing function that we secured with the Treasury. If one meets certain requirements — and those requirements keep bouncing around and become more onerous over time — one can borrow £200 million a year. However, it will have to be paid back and should be used to fund capital.

One needs to be careful about aligning the borrowing term with the life of the asset that is being funded. For example, if one takes out a 25-year loan and buys an asset that will last 10 years, for the next 15 years one is paying for an asset that gives no return.

The presentation of efficiency savings is important and worth mentioning. Efficiency savings do not increase the overall quantity of resources available; they take away resources from inefficient uses and make them available for front-line services. They do not increase the overall envelope of money available. That efficiency saving comes from the existing baseline, and the baseline does not grow because of the savings.

When looking at efficiency savings in an overall context, it is not helpful to take the additions you may get from the departmental expenditure limit through the Barnett formula and the sale of assets and add on the efficiency savings as if they were an additional pot of money that has become available over and above the existing baseline. That is something to look out for: it would not be good practice to do that. However, that does not mean that efficiency savings are not a valuable means of funding. They fall into two categories. The first is that of savings made by more services with the same resources. For example, the Health Service can deliver more operations with the same amount of resources that it has at the moment by operating more efficiently. That is a straightforward use of the term. The second category, which is more important in the budgeting situation, is of so-called cash-releasing efficiency savings. That means you do the same with fewer resources. What you save in terms of the resources is released as cash and can be recycled into something else. For example, if the Health Service does the same number of operations at a lower cost, that money can be released and transferred to build a road or to fund another activity. Efficiency savings can be tricky.

There is little information available on the pressures on the block grant. The other things to watch for are uncovered pressures. There will be a number of reviews with expenditure consequences. The biggest of those is the review of public administration (RPA) where there will be upfront costs of adjusting from 26 to seven councils. There will be redundancy payments because that is the only way to get efficiency savings in the long term. I am not sure how much of that is covered in existing expenditure plans; however, we know it is coming.

The other issue is revenue foregone — and in that case we are talking about water charges. When you see the process in the round, you realise how important relatively small things like water charges are. What we will get through the Barnett formula and the CSR in many instances will barely meet pay and price pressures.

To achieve service development, a Department must rely on self-help, rather than money from Whitehall. The Department must sell assets, obtain efficiency savings — particularly cash-releasing efficiency savings — and obtain other receipts, which might include additional rates, as a result of the ending of industrial derating and the introduction of water charges.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Thank you; that was very helpful. We move to questions from members.

Mr Cree: I am particularly interested in the matter of savings, and I am not sure that I have really got my head around that matter yet. The Secretary of State has said that he will set a target for annual efficiency savings of 3% for Northern Ireland Departments. Is that achievable? If so, how will those savings be spent?

Mr Hewitt: Such savings are generally achievable; the question is whether they are achievable without damaging services. A classic example of that occurred in the late 1980s and early 1990s, when, year after year, the National Health Service was required to make cash-releasing efficiency savings to the benefit of the rest of the system. Over time, the cumulative effect of such cutbacks caused a great deal of damage to the Health Service. One must be realistic about this matter — public services are, first and foremost, people-based. Efficiency savings means fewer people, which, in turn, often means lesser services. To some extent, such efficiencies are illusory.

When a Department has been deemed to have made cash-releasing efficiency savings, its budgetary allocation will be reduced accordingly. Those savings will be returned to the centre and reallocated during the budget process.

Mr Cree: Departments have a serious ongoing problem with capital expenditure, and they do not achieve targets. How should that problem be addressed?

Mr Hewitt: Project management lies at the heart of that problem. To some extent, that is also a legacy of past practice. If one does not do something for a long period, one loses that ability, and it takes time to regain it. If we have not built roads for ages, and we suddenly start a large road-building programme, we will not have available the necessary skills. We have to build up those skills over time.

Moreover, we have made the capital programme quite complex. The strategic investment programme involves the blending of conventional expenditure — straightforward block payments for construction — with non-conventional finance: public-private partnerships (PPP) and PFI, whereby a Department effectively enters into a contract with the private sector to raise capital, which is repaid over a period of 20 to 25 years. We have started down that path, but the contracts are very complex. Lawyers are asked to think about everything that can possibly go wrong.

There is a lovely story about the consideration of the building of a school under PFI. Lawyers asked what would happen should an aircraft crash into the school, and two days were spent working out how such an event would be dealt with. A solution was found, and negotiations were about to move on when a lawyer halted proceedings by asking what would happen should that event occur twice. Negotiations can, therefore, go on for a long time. Underspend of capital has been a serious issue for almost a decade now.

Mr Cree: That is so for all Departments, is it not?

Mr Hewitt: Yes. What is not spent in one year can be carried forward into another under the multiple-year system.

You can ally that to borrowing. The Comptroller and Auditor General's report on the strategic investment programme and the reinvestment and reform initiative (RRI) borrowing states that in fact, we have borrowed money that we did not use. He did not put a figure on it, but that is an expensive business because it means that you have borrowed money that you are going to be paying back over 25 years, and it is sitting there. We should not get ourselves into that situation.

The brief answer is that capital has become much more complex. The private finance initiative, for example, started off as a great idea. However, we ran into contractual problems. Then the Office of National Statistics and the Audit Office made a classification change. The original idea was that PFI projects would not be on the Government's balance sheet. That was one of the advantages of doing it that way; you did not have to find capital cover. The reclassification brought a lot of schools back onto the Government's balance sheet and meant that it was not worthwhile to do it that way.

We have started and stopped, and there are complexities in the middle. What we probably need is a period of relative stability so that we can actually go and get things done. For roads, it takes six years from conception to laying the first stone; that is one of the reasons why the Westlink seems to have taken forever.

Mr Weir: The Comber bypass took 31 years.

You are right to highlight the importance of the capital underspend. I previously served on the Finance Committee of the Assembly, and each quarter we were faced with vast amounts of underspend on the resource side. Departmental officials consistently told us that it was a one-off for whatever reason. Yet the one-offs seemed to come up every quarter.

On the capital side there is a whole series of problems. There are problems with borrowing, as you have indicated, and there are problems with public expectation. Whenever the public hear of large-scale capital announcements and then absolutely nothing happens, it creates problems at various stages. Any Executive would be trying to make special cases to the Treasury at Westminster for investment because of special circumstances. If at various stages in the financial year we have underspent large amounts of capital or resource underspend, it becomes more difficult to argue for more money. Are there any lessons, perhaps from outside Northern Ireland, which we can draw on to try and solve that problem?

Another concern under devolution was the Executive programme funds, which were supposed to be very innovative in nature. They were supposed to produce fresh thinking and cross-cutting themes. Disappointingly, in reality we saw the same bids that had failed to get funding under departmental allocations come up again in the Executive programme funds. There is a question mark over how effective that was.

In your report you attach great importance to the Chancellor's suggestion of an innovation fund. What action can be taken to make sure the innovation fund does not repeat the mistake of the Executive programme funds, with a repetition of those bids that would have been funded had there been more money about?

Finally, you have made reference to education and health in your document. Because of the inefficiencies in the education system, highlighted by Bain, there is almost a contingent side that we might call "invest to save". I can see how you could make a suggestion in relation to that.

You said that the levels of growth in health are unsustainable. Are you simply saying that the level of growth cannot be maintained or that, in real terms, there would be either a reduction or a freezing of health expenditure?

11.00 am

Mr Hewitt: I will deal with your last point first. We have been in an extraordinary public-expenditure period from about 2000, when the taps were turned on and money started to flow in significant quantities. Where supply is sticky — where it is difficult to ramp up production — and demand increases dramatically, there will be some additional production but prices will start to rise. For example, it is difficult to conjure up houses when demand increases, and so the price of houses rises. Public services are not that different.

We have doubled the amount of money on health provision over a six-year period, and it has been impossible to absorb that into additional services; therefore much of it has gone into pay and prices. Doctors' contracts are one example: we have doubled the salaries of doctors and reduced the amount that we ask from them through the new contract.

When the system has ramped itself up in the expectation that it is going ahead with 6%, 7% or 8% real growth each year and then the tap is suddenly turned off, the adjustment back down will be quite painful. That can be seen most dramatically in hospital provision in England, where many services are now under considerable pressure. I suspect that that will also be the case in Northern Ireland, unless the rest of the block is stripped to maintain expenditure on health.

Northern Ireland has only two big battalions for expenditure — health and education — and health is by far the biggest at about £4 billion. Merely to keep services going each year would require an increase of at least 8%. There is no use in looking at general inflation when talking about health expenditure; inflation on health expenditure is often in double figures. In order to get that sort of money flowing into the Health Service year after year when the overall block is growing by about 1% or less in real terms would mean stripping money from elsewhere. That will not be realistic in the longer term. Health provision will have to adjust to a leaner diet.

Mr Weir mentioned the Executive programme funds, which were an interesting experiment in which to be involved. They had a variety of origins, one of which was to address cross-cutting themes as a genuine issue — for example, children. A second, and probably more political, origin was to encourage Departments and parties to work together on issues by dangling money in front of them.

Mr Cree: Did it work?

Mr Hewitt: It did not work particularly well. The children's fund took for ever to come into creation, and the Secretary of State has now reinvented it.

Bids were also mentioned. What I found amusing at the time was that Departments said that the money taken out of their baseline would wreck their delivery, and they listed all the services that they would have to sacrifice in order to make available the money for the Executive programme funds. However, when it came to bidding money back, Departments did not bid back the services that they said they would have to close in order to develop the programme funds.

The biggest problem is one that people do not appreciate: our structures are not designed for cross-cutting operations. We have departmental structures — or silos — across the system with responsibilities for particular issues.

We were asking the Departments to communicate with one another, to work out a common plan and to deliver against a cross-cutting theme, but we did not have the administrative apparatus to achieve that.

The only sensible way in which to deliver something such as an innovation fund would be to allocate responsibility to one Department and to ensure that all other Departments were subservient to that Department on delivery. However, it is quite difficult to have a system in which the permanent secretaries of 11 Departments are saying that, because they are ultimately accountable for their resources, they do not want them in someone else's hands. There would be difficulties in practice.

Mr Weir: Are there any lessons to be learned from outside, particularly about capital underspending?

Mr Hewitt: Probably not, apart from lessons in simple, hard-grind management.

Interestingly, as I mentioned, we have end-year flexibility, which operates on the block and which has not been cascaded down to Departments — they do not carry forward underspends each year automatically. Such decisions are made at the centre, and Departments have to make a case for retaining underspends.

There are pluses and minuses in retaining such a position. However, the Treasury has been looking at filtering down end-year flexibility to Departments in Great Britain and giving them responsibility for delivering outputs rather than managing inputs into the system.

Ms Ritchie: I have a two-part question. First, the final page of your submission says not to forget the Northern Ireland Office (NIO). You referred to the fact that its funding is a reserved matter, which lies with Whitehall, and that a restored Executive and Assembly would have to take such funding into account. How would a prospective Executive and Assembly deal with that type of funding?

Secondly, in the section on priorities, you refer to transportation, employment and the old chestnut that is investment in skills levels. Given that economic growth is a priority during the period of 2006-08, and that the Department for Regional Development is undertaking a review of the regional development strategy (RDS), what are the principal concerns about how we address economic growth?

Will the review of the RDS have a significant impact in addressing economic growth and deficits in transport infrastructure? Moreover, what other measures would you like to see addressed?

Mr Hewitt: I thought that it was worthwhile to flag up the NIO issue, because it is almost never mentioned. It is possible that if the Executive come back into office during the CSR period, they will inherit the functions of the NIO, or a significant proportion of those functions, including policing, justice and prisons.

It is very much in MLAs' interests to have some idea of what is happening to the NIO in the CSR because — and I am not saying that the Treasury would do it — if the NIO were to be stripped to the bone before it were handed over to the Executive, that pressure would have to be absorbed by the block. Therefore it is in your interest to find out how the NIO is faring.

I emphasise that the NIO is a Whitehall Department and is not covered by measures such as the Barnett formula. When it comes back into the block, it will be covered, and we will receive some consequential on what is spent on policing or prisons in the rest of the UK, but any shortfall will have to be made up from the block, and other services will have to give way, depending on priority. I put that down as a marker. It is well worth keeping an eye on the NIO.

Ms Ritchie mentioned priorities and the transportation strategy. That cannot be entirely divorced from the overall investment strategy for Northern Ireland (ISNI). The original ISNI was a collection of departmental wish lists sewn together and presented as a strategy: there was no great coherence to it. Subsequently, the Departments have tried to work on that. We did some work with the Strategic Investment Board (SIB), and we asked what type of investment would be most likely to contribute to economic development. The answer to that tends to be investment in networks of one form or another as opposed to investment in social capital or, to some degree, the environment.

The major example of a network is the road network. Of course, that is not the only network — telecommunications and energy networks are also important. It is a matter of looking at the issue from the right perspective. If we start from the perspective that networks are important, we must identify the truly strategic networks that must be open to us. We must also identify where we need to be able to move our goods and services to and from. As Northern Ireland is on an island, the obvious answer to that is to use the ports: either the traditional seaports or the airports.

That approach can be generalised into a concept for economic development — the need to connect with the rest of the world. This island has a total population of about 5 million, and our part has a population of about 1·7 million. If we are to make our way in the world, we must connect with the world. When we start to think in those terms, priorities fall out almost automatically. We must have good physical and electronic connections with the rest of the world. We must prioritise and identify where we can get the most connection for a given amount of expenditure. That does not mean that every class-B road should be stripped or not maintained, but we must acknowledge that certain roads are much more important than others to the movement of people and resources.

Mr O'Dowd: In the autumn, a revised investment strategy will be produced for consultation in tandem with the CSR. Since the publication of the first investment strategy, SIB has highlighted escalating capital costs, capacity problems and the need to provide for the revenue consequences of new infrastructure developments. What are your views on that and on private finance initiatives (PFIs)?

Mr Hewitt: Everyone who works on a capital project starts out with relatively optimistic views about what can be done, but, as time goes on, costs almost inevitably increase. That is in no way a new phenomenon. It was originally envisaged that the work on Belfast City Hospital would cost about £7 million, but it ended up costing £77 million. Granted, the work took some time to complete, but project optimism — or, as economists call it, optimism bias — is endemic in the system.

The Treasury has tried to overcome that optimism bias by issuing its Green Book on economic appraisal guidance, but it is almost inevitable that the cost of any capital project will escalate, and for many different reasons. For example, IMD Little prepared a report on the railways in Northern Ireland, and an investment programme for railways was put in place. However, as work on the programme progressed, new issues and health and safety requirements had to be taken on board. Thus the overall bill for renovating the railways system — a very modest system — increased dramatically. Good planning up front is vital, and much of that is simply down to project-management skills.

You asked about PFI, Mr O'Dowd. I do not know whether you recall its origins. In 1992, the Conservative Government were strapped for cash. The recession meant that a great deal of money had to be spent on benefits and none was available for capital projects. The Government, therefore, came up with the idea of bringing in the private sector to deliver capital projects that the public sector would lease over time. The idea took off, and what was intended as a relatively modest initiative was introduced to all sorts of areas in which it caused difficulties, such as running prisons, the provision of hospitals, and so forth.

11.15 am

The basis of the PFI deal is that the private sector take forward certain projects. However, it will carry the risks only if it is rewarded for doing so; it will not undertake finance projects for nothing. With PFI deals, it is essential to ensure that risk is placed where it can best be managed. The private sector will accept a high level of risk but will demand a large return for doing so. If projected costs are calculated incorrectly, the public sector ends up with assets that, even though they are redundant, must be paid for over a long time.

One example is Balmoral High School, which was one of six schools in the pathfinder programme. The pupil projections for Balmoral High School turned out to be hopelessly wrong because of a change in the area's demographics. Nonetheless, the building has been constructed and the contract is in place. Unless the contract is buried, and that would be expensive, the public sector will be paying for an empty school for the next 25 years. Those who are involved in conventional expenditure can also get their projections wrong, but they probably have more room for manoeuvre because land can be sold off. However, that cannot be done when there is an existing contract.

PFI has its place, but its role was overstated at the time of its introduction, and a new more level-headed approach is now being adopted. The private sector can bring much to the party through delivering capital on time. PFI schools, for example, tend to be built much more rapidly and to budget, because there is every incentive for the private sector to do so. When I gave a presentation on PFI in Belfast city hall, I remember saying that not too many such buildings would come from PFI deals — and they will not. PFI deals tend to produce buildings that are utilitarian and manageable, because that keeps the cost down. Therefore all the schools that are being built under PFI have basically the same outward design. Unless Government are prepared to pay the additional money, PFI will not provide buildings such as Belfast city hall or the Customs House.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): As you probably know, Victor, this subgroup's terms of reference are to identify priorities for spending in the CSR. The Subgroup on Economic Issues, to which you have been the adviser, works alongside this subgroup. Its report has identified a set of investment priorities. Will you quickly summarise the subgroup's suggestions and your views on its identification of priorities?

Mr Hewitt: Much of its suggestions relate to the network theme that I mentioned and include, for example, many road projects. The Treasury would not be particularly concerned about any individual road in which the Assembly may have an interest. The Treasury would say that the upgrading of a particular road is a matter for a devolved Administration. It would say that if the Administration want to allocate money to such a project, that is fine. I included the batch of examples in my submission to the Subgroup on Economic Issues to illustrate what could be done should additional funding be secured.

However, the real objective is to secure that additional funding from the Treasury rather than tie it to specific measures. Indeed, you would not wish that to happen. It would be unconstitutional for the Treasury to be involved at that level of detail. As far as economic priorities are concerned, the major one is probably roads investment. There was an issue surrounding investment in education — in higher education rather than in schools — in the strategic investment programme, about why so much money was being invested in schools at a time when the numbers on school rolls were falling by between 30,000 and 50,000.

There was a noticeable gap in particular areas when our list of priorities was set against those of the South's national development plan. We are spending much more on basic education in schools in comparison with what the South is spending, whereas it is spending much more on roads. Our economic priorities are concerned mostly with the roads network and on increasing our knowledge ability. You come up against the perennial problem that there is no single, overall driving objective in Government — there is responsibility across a range of issues. Provision must be made for people's education and health and for driving the economy. The amount of direct expenditure that goes into the economy is now small in comparison with the other programmes.

Mr Cree: This is probably a simple question to answer. The Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP) has told us that any additions from the Chancellor's package will be needed to fund general pay and price inflation. Is that accurate? If so, what are the implications for public expenditure under a restored Executive?

Mr Hewitt: That is probably realistic, depending on what assumptions the Executive have made about what they will get. The Chancellor's package with regard to the departmental expenditure limit has essentially flatlined. There has been no change in real growth. It has been maintained at the same level, which goes from around 8.5% to 9.2%. In my calculation, I assumed that there would be around 0.8% of real growth, an increase of about 3.5% per annum. There are different ways of presenting that. I simply presented it by showing what real growth will be in 2010-11 compared with what it will be in 2007-08, which will be about £900 million.

That can also be presented cumulatively. The Executive would receive another £300 million in the first year, £600 million in the second year and £900 million in the third year. Therefore £1.8 billion would be the overall total. However, when one considers the general wage pressure, an uplift of 3.5% is not a huge amount. Although the block is not all for wages, a large proportion of it is. It will certainly not come in at 3.5%. Most of that money will be absorbed by pay and prices. Most of the service development that the Assembly will undertake will be through self-help measures, such as increases in rates, water charges, sales of assets, efficiency savings where they can be found, and so on.

Ms Ritchie: One priority that was mentioned was employment. Northern Ireland has the problem of regional inequalities in employment. How do you envisage an incoming Executive and Assembly dealing with that?

Mr Hewitt: There are issues surrounding scale. For example, Fermanagh has a population of only some 50,000 people. In some respects, the scale of the problem in Fermanagh, in absolute terms, is manageable. In areas where the population is denser, the problem is greater. The way forward is to tune areas to their natural competitive advantages. Fermanagh will not be hugely attractive to inward-investment companies. However, its future could lie in the development of high-value-added tourism services, because that would be playing to its strengths.

Areas that are closer to the coast are probably more attractive to inward investment. Those areas would have to play to their advantages — their infrastructure and the quality of available labour. Systems must be tuned to opportunities.

Inactivity is a huge problem. Northern Ireland has an inactivity rate of about 29%, as opposed to approximately 21% in the rest of the UK. It is really tragic that so many young people who are not in third-level education are inactive. To solve that problem requires a major effort, but we cannot do it all on our own. The benefits system must be tweaked, but that is beyond our control.

It should be a major priority to get those people re-engaged with the labour market, for their own good as much as for the good of the general populace.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Victor, thank you for your written submission and for answering our questions. The session was extremely comprehensive and helpful, and we wish you and ERINI well. A happy new year to you.

Mr Hewitt: Mr Chairman, a happy new year to you also. If ERINI can do anything further for you, we are more than happy to help.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): I welcome Seamus McAleavey, the chief executive of the Northern Ireland Council for Voluntary Action (NICVA), and Frances McCandless, its director of policy. Thank you for your written submission and for coming here today. It may be a tall order given the time limitations, but the subgroup is trying to identify priorities for spending and investments, cost pressures and efficiency savings. Perhaps you could begin with a short statement, bearing in mind the subgroup's terms of reference on the comprehensive spending review, and then take questions from members.

Mr Seamus McAleavey (Northern Ireland Council for Voluntary Action): Mr Chairman, thank you very much for inviting us to address the subgroup. We welcome the opportunity to do so.

NICVA's remit is to deal with issues concerning disadvantage, and that is reflected in our written submission. The current UK comprehensive spending review is even more important than those of the past and is likely to have far-reaching consequences. As Mr Hewitt and others have noted, the Government have trailed the fact that public expenditure will be tightened. That does not mean that there will be a reduction, but there will be less money to go around — Mr Hewitt has already mentioned issues such as wage inflation. Some parts of the Government believe that those measures should apply at higher levels.

11.30 am

Northern Ireland receives most of its money through the Barnett formula — a few extra pieces come from the rates, water charges if they are introduced, and the Peace programme. There is not a lot of room for manoeuvre.

Departments are examining the scope for efficiency savings. That gives cause for concern because Northern Ireland does not carry out that activity very well. Quite often, efficiency savings translate into cuts, with budget directors reducing expenditure and dropping items that are considered to be peripheral. NICVA does not think that the track record is good and has made representations to the Minister on the issue. We have got a commitment that the Department of Finance and Personnel will test the proposed efficiency savings. That is an important issue that the subgroup should monitor.

The CSR in England has paid quite a lot of attention to the voluntary sector's involvement in the delivery of public services. That needs to happen here, because we are behind in that regard.

NICVA broadly agrees with the Secretary of State's cross-cutting priorities. Public expenditure covers a wide area, and there is a danger of everything becoming a priority. We are not saying that the outgoing items are not of any value or have been completed, but we feel that the four incoming items are very important.

NICVA gave evidence to the Subgroup on the Economic Challenges Facing Northern Ireland and has said a fair bit on the subject. Most people feel that there needs to be some sort of transformational change in the economy of Northern Ireland if the economic situation is to be improved.

NICVA's focus is on disadvantage; our sector has lobbied Government strongly on creating an effective anti-poverty strategy for Northern Ireland. We are pleased to see that being included as a cross-cutting priority.

As far as NICVA is concerned, the publication of 'Lifetime Opportunities' is only the beginning of the process. If the Government want to be strategic about certain issues, they need to set out their high-level objectives — what they are really trying to achieve — so that we ordinary people can understand what is happening and can evaluate whether those objectives have been achieved. The strategy document begins to set out the Government's key strategic thinking. However, policies need to be put in place to direct spending in order to address some of the issues and make the strategy work.

We would like to explain our position on domestic rating and water reform if that is acceptable, Mr Chairman.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Yes, but please be brief because we are concentrating on the CSR today.

Mr McAleavey: NICVA found the consultation exercise on domestic rating to be quite good. We support a system based on capital values. We believe that the power will rest with Members, if they are in Government, and that it will be for Members to decide how much is to be raised by way of rates. The proposed system provides a formula as regards apportionment.

There has been much discussion about capping. NICVA does not see a need for capping: rather, the issue is apportionment. Capital values have been increasing quite a lot recently. However, that does not necessarily mean that people should worry that their rates will double because the price of their house has doubled in the last five years. The charge will be determined by how much the Government need to collect. The proposed system is fairer. Many problems regarding apportionment have been created as a result of not having changed the system since 1975.

NICVA was not keen on the introduction of water charging. However, if that is to be the case then charging needs to be progressive. Our interest is in protecting the people who are least able to pay. Those principles are important. As the matter is associated with the RRI, Members' hands may be tied. However, people at the lowest end as regards ability to pay need to be protected.

NICVA has never been sold on the proposed model. Most people in Northern Ireland are against the privatisation of water services.

Our view is that the model should be one that is in social ownership. A not-for-profit company could instead be created. We believe that that model could be reconsidered. That has been done in Wales, and there have been similar moves in Scotland. We worry about the issues raised by the Consumer Council in respect of controlled assets and what might happen to those in the future.

The issue is incredibly complex, and many fear that the public's eye may be wiped in the process.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Thank you very much, Seamus and Frances, for your presentation. We will now take questions.

Mr Raymond McCartney: First, page 3 of your submission mentions how inefficiencies have been tackled by cutting frontline services. The submission goes on to deal with the making of efficiencies through administrative spending. Can you provide examples of costings that could help to demonstrate those efficiencies, if they were made in the way that you envisage?

Secondly, your submission states that NICVA believes that the anti-poverty and social inclusion strategy is a "good basis for going forward." Can you elaborate on that and on the strategy's potential impact?

Mr McAleavy: We said that, in respect of economic challenges, Northern Ireland was a very risk-averse place. The culture of life is dominated by the public sector because so much of the GDP goes through the public sector. Therefore, what the public sector does is very important.

We see a culture that is somewhat afraid of making mistakes and of being held to account as a result. That results in ever more administrative burdens and red tape. We know of voluntary organisations in receipt of public money that have undergone audits. Public money must be accounted for — there is no argument about that — but it must be done efficiently and effectively. The public audit culture is increasingly burdensome. It seems that that culture must always cost money. We know of incidents in which thousands of pounds have been spent in order to check on £100. A disproportionate amount of money is spent on auditing. That is not to say that auditing is not vital, but, in our view, there are bound to be many ways to streamline the process.

In relation to voluntary organisations, we have said that — and Government have agreed with us, although nothing has really happened yet — where there are multiple funders of service and voluntary organisations, one Department or agency should be responsible for audit. There is no need for five, six or seven organisations auditing organisations for relatively small amounts of money. That problem probably occurs across the system. The problem is not the cost of the Northern Ireland Audit Office, but the cost of internal audit systems.

Ms Frances McCandless (Northern Ireland Council for Voluntary Action): I will answer the second question about the anti-poverty and social inclusion strategy.

We warmly welcomed the anti-poverty and social inclusion strategy as a high-level plan that, at last, set out the problems in Northern Ireland and some long-term goals. That was the start of finding a way to discuss solutions. Our problem is that the strategy does not yet provide solutions and is very light on policies that might deliver those long-term outcomes. We welcomed the focus on the different stages of life: children and young people; early years; people in work or of working age, and older people.

Another problem with the strategy is the big focus on work as the route out of poverty. Many people of working age will never be able to access work, either because of disability or caring responsibilities. There is no recognition of the low-wage economy or of the other challenges that may be faced by people of working age.

We want the policy content of the strategy to be fleshed out. In addition, we would like to see a budget for the strategy and interim targets to be set that will take us towards 2020. There should also be a focus on key areas such as early years provision, economic inactivity and housing.

Those elements are very much tied in with Victor Hewitt's earlier comments. We cannot drive the economy forward or be a high-value, high-skills economy without putting money into early years provision at the earliest developmental levels and addressing the waste of the skills of those who are economically inactive — currently young people. Following John Semple's review of housing, something must urgently be done to address where the people who will be working in this so-called thriving economy will actually live.

Ms Ritchie: Seamus and Frances, you are very welcome. Bearing in mind that we must concentrate on the priorities for the comprehensive spending review and the fact that a certain emphasis has been placed on the need to implement a good anti-poverty strategy, from where should the funding for that strategy come?

Does NICVA perceive the need for a dedicated fund, which, therefore, would transcend all Departments, for the implementation of an anti-poverty strategy?

Mr McAleavey: In the past, we have commented on the ineffective elements of targeting social need (TSN) and, subsequently, new targeting social need (New TSN). Our main point was that although the scheme promised a lot, it did not deliver on that promise. Our belief was that the notion of skewing resources in Departments did not seem to be working: civil servants were accounting for their spending after the fact and were attributing that to TSN and New TSN. We told the Government that rather than promise the sun, the moon and the stars, they should provide an effective, adequately funded strategy.

The high-level strategy outlined in our presentation would allow the Departments to adhere to the cross-cutting theme of the comprehensive spending review by giving them the chance to announce their planned initiatives for the next number of years. For example, the Department of Education could announce its intention to invest in early years schemes. We highlighted fleetingly the fact that voluntary organisations on the Shankill Road carried out similar work under the Urban I programme. Those organisations received a small amount of money from a European peace and reconciliation fund, but when that funding ended, much of the programme had to end as well. The Government must be much more strategic.

We have been asked from where the Government should take the necessary money. Obviously, they must find the money in other areas of the Northern Ireland block grant. Certain measures and schemes must either be reprioritised or, because they do not come high enough up the agenda, cease to be funded. Alternatively, as everyone seems to think, the money could come from efficiency savings.

Aside from those options, the money could come from increased revenues, such as additional rates and charges. However, at the end of the day, that is for the Government to decide. They must determine what they should prioritise, from where they should take the necessary resources and how they should apply them.

Mr Shannon: Mr Hewitt from ERINI mentioned efficiency savings, which are referred to in the NICVA presentation also. The CSR target is £800 million. That is a massive amount of efficiency savings. I am keen to hear where those could come from. Mr McAleavey commented that there are savings that could be made. Is £800 million realistic?

Mr McAleavey: In anyone's terms, £800 million is a large amount of money. However, in a block grant of £16 billion, it is proportionate. Last year, £300 million of the Northern Ireland block grant was not spent. Some of that money might be rolled over to this year.

NICVA believes that there is no need for six, eight, 10 or 11 internal administrative Departments in Northern Ireland. The Departments could be combined. Of course, the Government are combining services such as estates management and human resources.

In an organisation the size of the Government, it is always possible to make efficiency savings. There is little doubt about that. However, NICVA fears that the culture has been about having less money to spend and what that money will not be spent on — rather than about efficiency savings. That has been NICVA's experience, and that culture must change.

Over the years, Northern Ireland's voluntary organisations — albeit on a much smaller scale — have achieved efficiency savings. They have squeezed out costs in their processes. Therefore, I am sure that anyone can do that.

Mr Shannon: I have some concerns about trimming funding from local services, resulting in the loss of a critical service to a particular section of the public. That practice should be discouraged and replaced with other options. For example, Mr McAleavey mentioned audits as an example of how savings could be made.

Another question, which I should have liked to ask the previous witness, but which I will take the opportunity to ask you since you are here, is in relation to bad debt. It is all very well to talk about the money that is going to be brought in through the rates and so on, but bad debt is something that has not been touched on this morning in the way that it should have been.

11.45 am

If you have money coming in on the left hand and bad debts on the right hand, sometimes the balance is not there. Do you have any figures on what the amount of bad debt flowing from domestic rates and water charges might actually be?

Mr McAleavey: I have no idea what the level of bad debts might be. Our view is that everyone should pay their way, within reason. I do not know what the level of bad debt would be.

Mr Shannon: It is something that I am concerned about, but if you do not have anything, that is fair enough.

Mr Cree: I want to pick up Jim's point about efficiency savings. You have expressed your concerns about public-sector efficiency savings leading to cuts in front-line services. To approach that from a different angle, does NICVA accept that there is a pressing need to address inefficiencies in the public service?

Secondly, in your submission you say that many people live in houses that they could not afford to buy at today's prices. You then go on to say that people generally live in houses that reflect their means. I find that a little confusing. It is a bit of a contradiction.

You also refer to the umbilical link between the anti-poverty strategy and 'A Shared Future'. That is a good example. Do you think that there is a similar umbilical link between social inclusion and economic competitiveness? I think that that is likely. How could it be reflected in the CSR?

I will end with a simple question in order to make you feel happy. Mr Hewitt talked about the lack of transparency in DFP's approach here as compared with the Treasury. Have you any concern about that?

Mr McAleavey: The Treasury has held 120 meetings with voluntary organisations in England. They set out what they had heard, and there were five key themes that came back to them. The Chancellor began to address that in his pre-Budget statement. Our focus is on the voluntary sector, but I think that that is happening across a whole range of things. We do not see that in Northern Ireland, so we are certainly weaker in the CSR debate.

I agree that there are bound to be inefficiencies in organisations as big as the Government, and they have to be addressed. It is noble, and it can be done, but we have not had a great culture of doing it.

As for the contradiction in relation to housing, we accept that people tend to buy the standard of housing that they can afford. However, houses gain in value, and people think that if they were buying the same house now they would not be able to afford it. However, the relative capital values remain the same. There is a formula. When I studied history at university, we looked at the Belfast census of 1905. We used rateable values of houses to broadly identify social classes. There is a relationship. It is not so much about the actual formula but how it is applied to raise the amount of money that you need from rates.

I see less of a contradiction there. There will always be anomalies — people who are much more asset-rich and cash-poor.

Rate relief is needed to address all such cases.

Ms McCandless: I shall answer the question about the link between social inclusion and economic competitiveness. We certainly see that link as it relates to wasted human capital, with 29% of the potential economic workforce sitting at home. That is a massive waste. Moreover, societies such as those in Scandinavia, which tend to be more equal and more socially inclusive, are incredibly successful. The economies of those countries are as open as that of the South of Ireland. More equal societies seem to result not in a worsening of economic competitiveness, but in its growth. We see social inclusion and economic competitiveness as very closely linked.

Societies that are more equal and inclusive tend to spend less on addressing issues such as road deaths, security, and crime in general. Those problems tail off as equality increases. There is much evidence from around the world of a direct correlation between those matters, so we are spending money on problems that other countries are not. We are not spending money on areas such as early years. We should be increasing that funding in order to make the most of the potential of each of our citizens, because that will help the economy to thrive.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): What do you think may be the implications of the comprehensive spending review for the community and voluntary sector? What do you see as some of the specific cost and spending pressures and other problems that you are likely to encounter over the next three years, and what would you like to get out of the comprehensive spending review?

Mr McAleavey: We had a brief meeting with the Minister for Finance and Personnel, David Hanson, who also happens to be the Minister for Social Development, and has responsibility for relations between the Government and the voluntary sector. We made the point that what had emerged from the consultation with the voluntary sector in England was not a million miles from the situation in Northern Ireland. They have found that the funding relationship has been broken. We think that it is worse here than in England and that that must be fixed. We need better mechanisms for accounting for public money. The audit problem is worse here. We need investment in skills development in the voluntary sector, and something should be done to try to build the asset base. That would help voluntary organisations to provide more public services. Those are some of the matters that must be addressed.

Our fears relate to efficiency savings. Often, budget directors see the services that voluntary organisations deliver on behalf of the Government as peripheral services that may not be required under a statutory duty. They believe, therefore, that they should get rid of those services at once. The irony — which I believe that some in Government have accepted — is that those services may well be the most efficient, effective and cost-effective. However, that just does not seem to matter. We have a real fear of losing some of the most efficiently and effectively delivered services.

Mr O'Dowd: I have an observation, rather than a question, which relates to the anti-poverty strategy. Victor Hewitt spoke about public expenditure, and he said that he believes that spending on the Health Service is going to reduce dramatically. I believe that such efficiency savings will also have a major impact on poverty. If front-line services are taken away from the Health Service, which is a major employer, areas of high deprivation will be worst hit. Let us take the Royal Victoria Hospital as an example. It is in an area of high deprivation, and employs many low-paid workers from that area, such as cleaners and catering staff. That is where efficiency savings will hit. That will follow through into the trusts, which, in turn, will hit people in the community and voluntary sector. What are your views on how we should tackle that matter through the Government's anti-poverty strategy? Have you raised that issue with the Government?

Mr McAleavey: You mentioned where cuts are likely to fall in the Health Service.

The Conservative Government of the early 1990s introduced efficiency savings. When those savings were being made in the health services, I remember spokesperson after spokesperson saying that they would not affect front-line areas such as the delivery of medical services. They fell in areas such as cleaning services, and, as Mr O'Dowd said, quite a lot of other low-paid jobs are hit by such cuts. Ultimately, the state of hospitals, infection rates and so on were the disastrous results of those savings, so it would be a disaster if we ended up in that position a second time around.

However, as we have been saying for years, some skewing away from acute services into preventative medicine is necessary. It takes a long time for people to get a return on such changes. We spend minuscule amounts of Health Service money on prevention and on building up people's health so that they will not make the expensive calls. Therefore we need to think about how we shift that focus. At the high end, health costs seem to shoot up for those who are very well paid. I believe that health inflation is somewhere in the region of 9% or 10%: something needs to be done about that.

We need to have an open debate in Northern Ireland about where we should put our specialist services and how we should access them. At the same time, we should debate our community services. Without that debate, health services will continue to eat up the budget, and we will continue to complain. As it stands, education and health are the two big pots. If one wants efficiencies, one could say that money is being taken from one of those pots to be given to the other. Where the block is concerned, the other Departments do not count.

Ms McCandless: The health arena is a good example of how efficiency savings are implemented. Indeed, we saw that occur a couple of years ago in that sector. An edict comes from the Department through the boards and trusts — and other intermediary funders that they might use — and eventually hits the voluntary and community sectors. There is no doubt that that translates as a straight cut. However, those are the services that do the most difficult work with regard to turning public health around. Therefore peer mediation is important in areas such as smoking cessation, getting kids to stay away from drugs, or getting women to participate in schemes such as Sure Start so that their kids have better diets. Those are the societal issues that are really hard to change; the Government do least well with those and our sector does best. Such schemes are most vulnerable to those kinds of peripheral cuts, so they are good examples of how cuts are being made in areas that appear to be the easiest in which to make savings. However, those cuts may affect the effective and long-term transformations that are needed to make the big shift towards public health and well-being and away from acute services and hospital beds.

Mr Shannon: Following on from what my Friend opposite said, I heard on the news this morning that health services across the water are being affected by cost efficiencies. One GP was sent letters telling him to cut back on his referrals and on the type of medication that he prescribes. Are those savings efficient? They may be savings, but I suggest that they are not efficient. That is just an observation.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Are there any more questions or observations? I would prefer questions.

Your written submission states that you support what you term the “transformational change” in rebalancing the economy towards expanding the private sector. You also gave evidence to the Subgroup on the Economic Challenges facing Northern Ireland specifically about the Chancellor's package. I do not know whether you have had time to look at that subgroup's report, but we wonder whether you have any comments to make on the sort of investment priorities that it identified. You perhaps heard Victor Hewitt talking about areas such as so-called networks, particularly for matters such as roads and some skills.

Mr McAleavey: We have not given that issue much consideration since we met that subgroup.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Frances, I think it was you who made the point previously — and strongly — that greater social equity and economic competitiveness are possible, and you cited places such as Sweden and Denmark as examples of that.

However, someone playing devil's advocate might point out that Sweden and Denmark are national economies, whereas Northern Ireland is a regional economy. Could you reflect on that point? There are certain policy instruments that we do not have at our disposal.

12.00 noon

Could you say a little about what you think might be the difference that devolution and restoration of the institutions could make in some of those areas, or whether you think that there are areas in which devolution might not make much of a difference? In that case, UK-wide social policy change will be necessary.

Ms McCandless: Clearly, the big issue is taxation. There is very little power within a devolved Assembly's grasp in respect of that, other than local taxation and charges. Various proposals and suggestions on local taxation have been on the cards over the years, as well as rates and water charges.

Dr Birnie is right to say that our hands are tied because Northern Ireland is a region, not a nation state. However, it is absolutely in the gift of the Assembly to provide excellent education and health systems. This region is small enough to garner the benefits to be had from sustainable development and growth technologies. In respect of those matters, there are benefits in being small, rather than a large nation state.

Particularly on education and health, there is absolutely no reason for a devolved Assembly not to provide a bonus by fixing the parts of the system that are currently broken. Parts of the system are excellent, and that is great, but we must fix the parts of the system that are currently not working in order to ensure that all children become potential achievers for themselves and for the economy. We must ensure that the health system brings the bonus of good health for our citizens, rather than being a constant drain on the public purse. As technology advances, that drain will increase as demands are made for new drugs and technologies. Education and health are the two primary areas in which the Assembly can trigger beneficial change.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): As there are no further questions, I thank you, Seamus and Frances, for your time, for answering our questions and for your written submission. I wish you well in your future work, and I wish you and your organisations a happy new year.

Mr McAleavey: Thank you, Mr Chairman. We gathered together the views of the voluntary sector and sent a copy of that document to individual MLAs. That paper addresses a very broad range of issues that members and their parties may wish to consider in the context of the next elections and what the Assembly does thereafter.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Elections concentrate the mind wonderfully. Thank you very much.

The subgroup was suspended at 12.02 pm.

On resuming —

1.16 pm

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Good afternoon, gentlemen. Welcome to the subgroup, and thank you for coming earlier than originally planned. The members of the Confederation of British Industry (CBI) Northern Ireland delegation are the director, Nigel Smyth; the chairman, Declan Billington; the vice-chairman, Brian Ambrose; and the chairman of the CBI Northern Ireland economic affairs committee, Alastair Hamilton.

Thank you for your written submission, which members of the subgroup have received. Once you make some brief introductory remarks, we will move to questions.

Mr Declan Billington (Confederation of British Industry): On behalf of the CBI, I thank you for the invitation to attend the subgroup. The CBI holds the CSR close to its heart, and we welcome the opportunity to put our position on record. Since we have already made a written submission, we will set the scene and move to the discussions.

Among the priorities of Government spending are the efficient and effective delivery of public goods and services and the prioritisation of public resources to deliver the best outcomes for society. Given that funding in Northern Ireland is fixed, the efficient delivery of public goods and services means that the more efficient we are, the more goods and services can be delivered.

The CBI believes that the CSR should focus on expenditure that creates economic growth and economic enablers. The question is: how can Northern Ireland raise its economic game? In particular, how can it achieve robust, productivity-based growth and an increased economic-activity rate? That will translate into more, better-paid jobs for our people, which will in turn alleviate the high levels of poverty that we have in Northern Ireland. Alastair will touch on those points shortly.

However, despite large historic increases in public expenditure, we have been disappointed nationally and locally in the outcomes. It is important that the CSR addresses the failure to deliver outcomes, even though money has been invested.

The Executive and the Assembly need to agree some key strategic outcomes, against which all policies should be measured to determine their priority in the Budget. The smaller the number of strategic priorities, the better.

It is important to focus on what is workable. Although new initiatives may be welcome, it is important to get the basics right first. One important issue that Alastair will touch on is the transformation of public services; our submission to the subgroup addresses that area in detail. Achieving greater efficiencies is very important. The number of civil servants in 2006 was 15% higher than it was in 1998.

We would, however, argue strongly against the blunt, across-the-board cuts that were introduced following recommendations in Sir Peter Gershon's review: 'Releasing resources to the front line: Independent Review of Public Sector Efficiency'. Efficiency savings should be focused on areas in which there are known inefficiencies. For example, Prof John Appleby's report, 'Independent Review of Health and Social Care Services in Northern Ireland', identified such areas.

There is also a need to ensure that there is administrative capacity in those Departments that will have increased workloads as they become involved in enabling economic growth. We must address the bottlenecks that inhibit economic growth — for example, planning. In short, we need to focus our resources on those areas that add value to the public and spend less money on those areas that add cost to the block. I will ask my colleague Alastair to add a little more detail, and then we will be happy to take questions.

Mr Alastair Hamilton (Confederation of British Industry): It is important to say a little about how we arrived at our submission to the subgroup. It is the aggregated view of all CBI members through its economic affairs committee — that is the point where we aggregate all the views. We have since checked that view against the national CBI view, and, by and large, it is pretty much in line with what is coming out of Centre Point but with a few specific focus areas for Northern Ireland. I want to take a few minutes to emphasise some of the detail in the points that we have raised — I know that you are keen to get to the questions.

Our submission covers three key areas: knowledge and skills; the physical environment; and the operational environment. In those three areas, we have tried to put forward views that take us away from step, incremental change into something much more dynamic and forward-thinking. Some, if not all, members will have reviewed the draft regional economic strategy and some its stated targets. The CBI has been forceful in saying that the drive in that strategy is very small. Some targets are set to increase by less than 1% over the next 10 years. That does not give us hope that we will achieve the dramatic economic change needed in Northern Ireland.

Therefore, it is in that context that we made our comments on the CSR, because we see that as a key plank in starting to deliver some of the economic benefits that are needed in Northern Ireland.

On education and skills, among our key points is the need for all school leavers to come out with numeracy and literary capability. In 2004-05, 41% of people leaving school did not have those skills, which employers in Northern Ireland consider essential. Similarly, science, technology, engineering and mathematics are the four key planks that we want to see coming out of third-level and fourth-level education. Again, we want to see emphasis on those areas.

On infrastructure, there are two key areas. We would like to see a lot of effort put into reducing journey times on strategic roads across the Province. Conversely, we would like to see an increase in the average road speeds in peak periods to in excess of 50 mph. That is in our submission.

A lot has been done over the past few years to try to improve our telecommunications infrastructure. The obvious next step is to build on the good programme that has been put in place in order to provide 100% broadband availability and to start to increase the speeds to up to 8 megabytes and 10 megabytes.

We want a programme put in place that will secure 10% a year export growth for enterprise in manufacturing and tradable services. That is achievable if we put in the effort and drive to make it happen.

Finally, on the rate of employment, it would be easy for us to get a little complacent about the very enviable position that Northern Ireland is in and perhaps to take the foot off the pedal. However, we need to drive even harder to increase employment, especially with the changes in legislation that allow older people to continue to play an active part in employment in Northern Ireland.

Mr Cree: Thank you, gentlemen, for your helpful and informative paper. There are a couple of points that I wish to query. Your submission referred to the bleak picture in respect of skills. On page 4 of your submission, the section titled "Public Expenditure Priorities" identifies three areas: essential, intermediate and higher skills. Should skills improvement be the number one priority for the CSR?

Mr Billington: In order to grow the economy, it must be. Fiscal incentives have been mentioned, but the right number of people with the right skills sets is needed to make successful, value-added, businesses work. A key pillar of that will be the skills set. As you have identified, our report states that we are coming up short at all levels. Indeed, to quote some other statistics, although there has been a 27% increase in education spending since 2001, we are not seeing the outputs from that. Although skills are important, and money is being spent, results are not being delivered. We must get the outcomes right. Young people must have the basic three Rs by the time they leave school, and we must deliver the right skills sets at all levels in order to support business and business growth.

Mr Cree: My other question refers to the section at the end of the report, “Managing environmental and natural resource issues”, which I found interesting. What is the economic or business case to ensure that environmental stewardship and sustainable development becomes a priority in the CSR?

Mr Billington: The world is moving towards using environmentally sustainable technologies. If we ignore that, we can expect that, over time, businesses will suffer as a result of failing to become energy efficient or to manage resources efficiently. Focusing on encouraging and developing sustainable technologies and enterprises prevents businesses from being damaged, but it also provides opportunities — if we are best in class at what we do. We can sell and export those technologies just as we sell and export other technologies. For example, there are companies in the CBI that are involved in water purification and recycling around the world.

Why can we not be leaders in energy management and energy efficiency? In every threat, there is an opportunity. Businesses must now work in the context of being environmentally sustainable. That cannot be ignored; it must be embraced.

Mr Weir: Thank you for your presentation. I have three questions. First, you outlined a full programme of public expenditure priorities. Have you given any thought to a ballpark figure of the cost of implementing that programme?

Mr Billington: I will pass that question to Nigel.

Mr Nigel Smyth (Confederation of British Industry): We have not addressed the cost for the education and skills sector, but for science and technology, we have given a figure of £40 million. The costs are largely deliverable from efficiency savings. All our responses recognise that there is a limited pot of money and that best use must be made of that money. There are significant opportunities to reduce costs and to re-engineer the public sector to save money in order to allow money to be spent. The majority of that could be incorporated in the efficiency savings.

Mr Weir: Secondly, you mentioned the pressing problem in the private sector of delays in the planning system. Those delays prevent private-capital programmes from proceeding. You also mentioned the problems in ensuring efficient delivery of public services, or the Government’s point of view on that. Allied to that, there have been significant departmental underspends year on year, particularly when moving from resource spending to capital projects in Northern Ireland. From the public’s point of view, capital projects seem to have taken an inordinate length of time, resulting in large underspends each year that must be rolled over. There is a much longer period for the delivery of certain capital projects than should be the case.

Do you have any advice as to how the CSR can tackle that problem?

1.30 pm

Mr Billington: I shall make some general comments and then pass over to Nigel. Some years ago, planning was identified as a serious issue; however, I see little improvement in that situation. Issues arise from time to time, but it is a point of concern.

I recently chaired a dinner of members of the construction industry and the SIB. Questions were asked about the situation in which many foreign nationals are working on building sites while fewer local people are being trained in modern construction apprenticeships. A representative of one large company asked how anyone could recruit and train people for a £20 million or £30 million project when it is delayed for a year. Who carries the labour costs for that? It goes beyond Government budgets not being spent in the year for which they were planned; it goes to the point at which employment and training opportunities for those people in more vulnerable areas of our society are being lost simply because we are not managing the planning issue. Planning is the roadblock that is causing a lot of problems for businesses.

Nigel has had several meetings with the SIB, and he might want to comment in more detail on how to remove some of those roadblocks.

Mr Smyth: Before I touch on planning, I should point out that Northern Ireland Departments have been weak on the procurement side and on skills traditionally, and we welcomed the creation of the SIB and the skills that it has brought into play.

Departments have also been weak on strategy, the classic example being education. Fifteen months ago, we challenged the Department of Education (DE), which was literally going to double its capital expenditure within 18 months, despite the fact that the terms of reference of the Bain Report had not even been agreed. We asked the Department how it could do that without even knowing what schools it was going to invest in. The result has been that companies have made bids, some of which have been pulled or are under review. That sends out all the wrong messages to the sector. There is a lot of work to be done on education, an area in which the problems are significant. However, good progress has been made on roads and water. There have been delays in health, but some major projects came through last year.

We have had a good ongoing dialogue with the Planning Service. We welcomed its introduction of a strategic planning division in the third quarter of 2005. The Planning Service needed to identify significant economic public-sector infrastructure projects and speed those through the system. It has done just that, although that has not been reflected by some of the key statutory consultees. The feedback that we are now getting from some of those consultees is that the introduction of the strategic planning division is producing results. A great deal of work on planning remains, but good work is being done that we need to build on and not set aside.

Mr Billington: May I add one more point? We talk about planning in general, but the Planning Service has statutory consultees. It is often said that the Environment and Heritage Service (EHS) is the late responder, significantly failing to meet its deadlines. In other countries, failure to respond is not considered a problem, as no response is presumed to be a clean bill of health, and the process continues. The EHS's response times must be addressed in order to alleviate planning problems.

Mr Weir: Thirdly, many of us were disappointed by the economic package suggested after the political parties met with the Chancellor, and I suspect that the CBI shares in that disappointment. One suggestion was for the establishment of an innovation fund. Given that support from Government has not always been invested as well as it should have been, what advice would you give on how the introduction of an innovation fund should be tackled? Where should it be targeted?

Mr Billington: In discussions with the CBI nationally, the message that I received was that the chances of winning an argument with the Chancellor would be much better if it was aligned to matters on which he is quite keen. He is bound to be more receptive to the idea of an innovation fund.

Mr Smyth: I would draw members' attention to what we have set out today. We have highlighted several priorities or initiatives. We are conscious that we do not want to go overboard, because costs go with those initiatives; this is building on existing work.

There is a concern that the number of postgraduates in the STEM subjects — science, technology, engineering and mathematics — is dropping when they should be on the increase. The amount of expenditure on R&D in engineering and technology in the South of Ireland is going up by vast amounts, while the opposite is the case in Northern Ireland.

Many small companies will not take the research route. However, they can be encouraged to take the innovation route by working on product development and support. To do so, they need to link in with their local further education (FE) college before they link in with a university.

Therefore there is a range of options, and we suggest that first-time engagement vouchers be introduced. We need to create more demand and make universities more responsive to that. Good work is being done; for example, a collaboration fund that has a lot of capabilities is being set up. However, the CBI believes that that fund is under-resourced.

The CBI has set out a great deal of ideas in its papers, and an innovation fund would be one such good idea.

Mr Billington: As Nigel has rightly said, a lot of businesses have small operations. That means that a relationship with a university or an FE college will be necessary if one wants to promote innovation. Therefore the mechanisms that enable that relationship to develop and the way in which the universities structure themselves in support of R&D and innovation are important. The way in which to do that is to create a critical mass of postgraduates in the university infrastructure.

The Republic is going down that route in a big way, and given the current planned level of expenditure for postgraduate degrees, including doctorates, I question whether Northern Ireland will be able to match it.

Ms Ritchie: I wish to ask three questions. The first deals with the regional transportation strategy and the structural roads' maintenance budget. I note that you say that a future Executive and Assembly must:

“deliver a five year ring fenced budget for structural roads maintenance at levels envisaged by the Regional Transportation Strategy”.

Given that the current budget for structural roads' maintenance has been left wanting and has considerable deficits, how could the Assembly make that a priority and deal with the deficit?

Secondly, I note that one of the CBI's main concerns is to make environmental and natural resources a priority. How would a future Executive achieve such an objective?

Perhaps you could answer those questions first — I shall then ask my third question.

Mr Billington: Those are interesting questions.

CBI members were annoyed about what happened with the maintenance budget. Although they were encouraged to equip themselves to support what was planned and to be prepared, they ended up investing in equipment to support the maintenance programme, only to find a substantially reduced spending programme available. Annual chopping of budgets to below the planned level carries not only a risk of not delivering a high-quality infrastructure but damages the businesses that will carry out the infrastructural repairs.

From that point of view, it is important that there is certainty that the businesses can plan — that is why we are talking about a five-year plan — and can see, equip and resource themselves for that level of business while knowing that it exists. That is why we are talking about ring-fenced funding and a five-year plan. Nigel may wish to comment further on the other points.

Mr Smyth: The key message is consistency. The maintenance budget had been rising for a few years. However, it was cut by about £20 million last year, although there is talk that it may increase. Unfortunately, it was an easy budget to cut. That sends out all the wrong signals. Many parts of the construction sector lack confidence. They do not look just at that budget but at the broader investment strategy in Northern Ireland. People question whether it will be deliverable. That is an unhelpful perspective overall, as one needs to create market confidence for the players.

Therefore a commitment is necessary. The CBI would like the figure for the maintenance budget to be £80 million to £90 million, but whatever it is, it would be helpful all round to have a firmly set five-year plan.

Ms Ritchie: Last December, the Northern Ireland Audit Office (NIAO) published its report 'Reinvestment and Reform: Improving Northern Ireland's Public Infrastructure'. That report made recommendations to improve the ISNI, as well as the departmental investment plans to enhance the delivery of that strategy. It also made recommendations to manage and fund the investment strategy.

I recognise that the report was released only recently. Although you might not have had the time to study it, you might wish to make some cursory comments that you could share with the subgroup that might inform our report.

Mr Billington: We have already touched on some of the issues. Businesses investing capital expenditure under the reinvestment and reform initiative (RRI) must be certain that projects will happen so that those businesses can plan and equip themselves. It must also be clear when those expenditure programmes will happen. Time and again, plans have not been progressed because of the way in which the Government have managed public finances. The publication of the Bain Report may have resulted in delays in the construction of schools. Planning delays and other issues that I have mentioned have created uncertainties that add substantial tendering costs to businesses. A business might not lose the tender, but the project may be withdrawn.

A new Executive must address issues that create planning uncertainty. Planning should indicate when a project will happen. Nigel spoke about the strategic planning and management of projects and about how there was a plan for schools expenditure before the publication of the Bain Report. The business community asked how the two could be reconciled. Inevitably, the plans that had been announced for schools expenditure were subsequently withdrawn.

Mr Smyth: For my sins, I read the NIAO's report.

Ms Ritchie: You are sad.

Mr Smyth: It was a most welcome report, and it was clear about funding, an area in which transparency is needed. We also had concerns about affordability. It is important for the Executive and the Assembly to make funding more transparent. That was one of the report's key recommendations.

The need for more detailed plans was also highlighted. Ten-year plans are all very well, but industry, which has to invest in skills and capability, is looking for detailed project planning over a two- to three-year period. The situation is changing. Capital expenditure was traditionally £650 million or £700 million; however, this year, if all goes well, we expect to spend £1.3 billion, which is a big increase. The private sector will not be found wanting, but its biggest concern — and ours — is the public sector's ability to deliver. The report is most welcome, because it raises those important issues.

Mr O'Dowd: Many of the points that I wanted to raise have already been covered, and I will not ask Mr Billington to repeat himself. However, I will ask for his views on the performance of the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (DETI). How well does that Department deliver? Does it have a sufficient budget? The question may be self-answering.

Mr Billington: The CBI focuses on outcomes. Our written submission has identified a need to support economic enablers. DETI has financial responsibility for Invest Northern Ireland. There has been much uncertainty about what money is available, year on year, and the first call on available in-year funding under the concordat between DETI, the Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP) and the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister (OFMDFM). That issue must be addressed not only annually but on a reasonable three- to five-year basis. That will enable DETI and Invest NI to go out and win investment for Northern Ireland, knowing that there is three years' funding to support it. There was much uncertainty in the private sector about what would, or would not, be supported, and that will have damaged investment.

Our written submission touches on other areas. We are concerned about the energy subsidy that was to have addressed stranded costs in Northern Ireland. Those costs make heavy-energy-intensive businesses uncompetitive, and we want that issue to be addressed. DETI has failed to deliver on that issue. The business community sees costs rising, and industrial rating is adding to those costs. Although the Government want to impose a new cost, they have not remedied the results of their past failures. That is an obvious quid pro quo and an area of concern.

The single energy market is also an area of concern. The regulator is under pressure to find adequate resources. He needs to work with his counterparts in the South to ensure that the single energy market works to the benefit of Northern Ireland as well as to the island of Ireland.

1.45 pm

What we are basically saying is that we have to make sure that the Department is adequately resourced. If we are arguing that the economy needs to grow, DETI's role will become much more challenging. It should be adequately resourced to support the work that it does in enabling the economy to grow.

I will pass on to Brian on tourism.

Mr Ambrose (Confederation of British Industry): To link back to Leslie's first point, about Invest Northern Ireland, if we do not manage to attract sufficient foreign direct investment, we do not need a lot of high skilled jobs. Dublin, which has seven of the world's top 10 pharmaceutical companies, draws everything out of the system. Unless Invest NI is geared up to deliver, we are not going to get any step change in anything. So the need for R&D and skills is very much linked to that.

Tourism can perhaps give us the quick wins that we are looking for. Tourism benefits every part of the economy and every part of the Province. Northern Ireland had two million visitors in 2006; there is no reason in the world for not getting that figure rapidly over three million. However, we will have to market ourselves and spend significantly more money doing so if we are to compete with everywhere else. We are not starting from a neutral base. We have an image to overcome. Tourism will have cross-party support and benefit the entire economy; however, it alone is not the answer.

While FDI is possibly the single biggest opportunity, tourism will be one of the most immediate attractions if we can step up our game significantly. That includes the infrastructure. There is no point in talking about Titanic unless there is something to look at, or in going to the Giant's Causeway unless there is a decent visitors' centre.

We need two other elements — marketing and skills. If we do not invest in people, they will not step up to the mark. If you get poor service in a facility where the company has not invested a dollar in training people, it is not the individual's fault. Marketing and skills are fairly critical.

Mr Shannon: You referred to a strategic planning body, which has been organised to respond to problems you have with delays. I have been told that in the rest of the UK you can get a response to a planning application within a month.

How much of a difference has this new strategic planning body made to the planning process in reducing the time and what time would you like to see it reduced to?

Mr Smyth: It is going to vary. Some that have gone through the strategic planning division within the Planning Service have included IKEA, Coca Cola Investment, some of the Water Service plans and other major public service infrastructure. They have certainly taken longer than four weeks. For very major schemes it takes a matter of months, but you would expect that with major schemes with environmental impact. We would welcome being able to get planning permission within three to four months for a very major scheme. Most of the current ones are taking years if not longer.

Our concern is that there is now a level below that. If we ask for permission for a factory extension, we are told that that is not strategic; it is straightforward. However, it is still taking from six to nine months, and it should not take that long. There are issues with statutory consultees and the EHS.

Last year we had a number of sessions with the EHS. John Cleland has done a report on it. It has been putting more resources in. It has now got a planning tsar to push forward the change. The good news is that its backlogs have dropped significantly, although we are still looking at fairly modest gains. Indeed, a target for planning within the corporate plan was one of the things we achieved last year for the first time. The EHS has a fantastic corporate plan for building houses and restoring castles, but there is nothing about planning, which is extremely important. From now on there will be a target for that.

It is very important that we keep up the pressure. There is certainly a resource issue. There has been a big increase in demand, and we accept that. However, Northern Ireland must have a system that can respond quickly. If the demand is there, resources should be available to address it. At the same time, planning fees have increased, meaning that a number of applicants are having to pay much more.

Mr Billington: In his question, Mr Shannon identified the need to benchmark the planning system in Northern Ireland against systems in other parts of the UK. Why should the process take longer in Northern Ireland? It should not. Benchmarking and target setting that require EHS to respond within a time that would be acceptable in the rest of the UK should be pursued.

Mr Shannon: Is the problem partly to do with the number of staff employed by the Planning Service or is it solely down to EHS?

It is not always big schemes, such as IKEA and Coca-Cola, which are held up. Before Christmas, I met a man who employs a number of people in an electrical business. He said that applications from small- to medium-sized companies were getting held up also. He also works across the water, and he gave me examples of the timescales that operate there. I am keen to see how those processes could be advanced here, although it might take major change.

Mr Smyth: In GB, the planning authorities are subject to targets and must process a certain percentage of applications within eight to 10 weeks. Very few applications in Northern Ireland would meet that target. Last year, we welcomed the modernisation of the planning process. Towards the end of 2005, we thought that we were starting to see some progress. However, at the beginning of last year, the Planning Service was swamped by single-house applications in the countryside, which distorted the whole system. Thousands and thousands of applications were submitted in the first quarter of last year, and the Planning Service would put up its hands and admit that that has distorted the system.

The number of people employed in the Planning Service, and in some of the other agencies, has increased substantially. The big issue is skills and experience. Nothing will happen overnight. Some staff in the Planning Service are moving to the private sector too, so there is an issue there. We have seen an increase in the economic activity rate and that has created a big demand. However, when the demand increased in the late 1990s, we were slow off the tracks and did not respond as quickly as we should.

Mr Billington: Government have put the people in to create the capacity. To my mind, there was a blip with the rural housing issue and the mad rush to beat deadlines. However, the Planning Service is adequately resourced now and needs to deliver.

Mr Shannon: The rural housing issue has moved on: there is no excuse for any delays.

Mr Smyth: During the last quarter of 2006, we heard that, for the first time, applications were starting to flatten out, if not decline. The Planning Service is getting rid of the backlog of rural housing applications. However, it caused enormous problems in the early part of last year.

Mr Shannon: Do you feel that the eight-week period is achievable in Northern Ireland?

Mr Smyth: Most of our members would be very happy if 90% of applications were processed in 12 weeks. EHS is allowed 30 days. At the moment, it is probably hitting a 60% to 70% return; EHS should have at least 90% of planning applications returned to the Planning Service within 30 days and although it is addressing the issue, it would admit that it is not hitting that target.

Mr Shannon: The Environment and Heritage Service has too much power, and that is part of the problem — in my opinion, of course.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): That is not necessarily the subgroup's view — [Laughter.] Are there any other questions?

Mr Cree: Surely the planning process is a cultural problem here. In the United States, it takes 30 days, and that is it. I do not know how that can be overcome in the short term.

Mr Billington: I wonder whether the problem is confused priorities between the statutory consultees and the Planning Service. People are afraid to take decisions for fear of criticism. There was a resource issue, and there was a blip in coping with the demand. As far as the cultural issue is concerned, I do not understand why it would take longer in Northern Ireland than anywhere else in the UK. That must be challenged. A clear ranking of priorities needs to be explicit to all those involved so that they are quite clear on the decisions that they have to work their way through.

Mr Cree: I have a question relating to the general economy. Northern Ireland is a regional economy and can benchmark itself against other parts of the UK. Which part of Europe would be relevant? Which country could we use as a best-practice example?

Mr Billington: Twenty-five years ago I would have said the Republic. It took decisions that took its economy in one direction, whereas we were constrained, and we are where we are.

Can you think of any, Nigel, because I cannot?

Mr Smyth: An obvious example of success that comes to mind is the Republic of Ireland. Finland has been fairly successful too from quite traditional sectors. Nokia did not exist in 1988; it came out of a forestry company that made furniture, trees and wellington boots. It is very successful.

Mr Cree: Sweden, for example, seems to me to have been quietly getting on with the job in a very good manner.

Mr Billington: Sometimes I think that plans that we make now will take five to 10 years to come to fruition. Sweden must have planned five to 10 years ago.

In my previous career with an American multinational, I saw Swedish companies offshoring to China and eastern Europe. Their economic success is due to the fact that their parent companies are still there — they still retain the sales, marketing and the know-how, the high value end, and because we do not have many large indigenous businesses, we cannot retain the value-added services. We are too small and so are not able to benchmark in the way that they can. Furthermore, we are unable to offshore the lower value added and retain and upskill the higher value added because we did not start from that point. Their businesses evolve – we did not have them to start with.

Mr Smyth: I think that you are looking ahead. Looking at the CBI's national response in the CSR, we are probably facing the most rapid changes ever. We think that we may have gone through a lot of changes in the past 10 years, but in terms of demographics, globalisation, technology, it is all ahead of us. However, Northern Ireland does have to raise its game in a number of ways.

This subgroup has said before and there is no doubt that political stability is the key — that in itself will give a major boost in terms of confidence and various other things. We need to do a major amount and actually look at our education system. We need to have a major increase in our young people's expectations and aspirations, which is why it is important that all political parties realise that the economy is a driver.

A lot of the issues that we are hearing today are relevant to the anti-poverty strategy. Our focus should be on young people. If we are going to stop some of our social problems, we need to give young people potential opportunities and good quality jobs, but they need to have the skills and the attitudes to work their way through them. It is a shame that one of the biggest current problems is actually getting people with those skills and attitudes. So we need to do a lot to raise the expectations of our young people.

Mr Ambrose: I work for a Spanish multi-national company, and I observed this kind of attitude when I was working in Spain. In Northern Ireland, we are pretty good at developing strategies and debating. However, Spanish companies put their money where their mouth is. You feel a similar energy in Asia. You do not have to question whether they are going to implement their strategies.

As Declan said in his introduction, we can learn from other regions. We should focus on output and results rather than draw up more strategies and heavy documents. By the time one strategy has come down, we have written another one with five-year targets. Do not underestimate the power of learning from people who go out there and do it. If we adopt that mindset, it could transform a lot of what we have been trying to do, and my experience in Spain has left me in no doubt that we can do it.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): With reference to what Brown has been saying, do you think that we have too much of a risk-averse mentality, particularly on the part of the public sector? Could that be part of the explanation for the slowness in the Planning Service: really it is in terror of being caught out having made making wrong decisions by planning appeals or the courts? Has that led to an overly defensive form of decision making? If that is the case, what do we do about it?

Mr Billington: Certainly the business community's perception is that there is a risk-averse culture generally in the public sector. In our submission, we identify areas in which we can motivate and elevate management in the public sector by having the right incentive packages and rewards as well as the right punishments for failure to deliver.

It works in the private sector, and I do not see any reason why implementing similar approaches should not work in the public sector.

Mr Ambrose: Recently, the CBI asked a senior civil servant what he would do differently if the Northern Ireland Civil Service were his company. The response was interesting. It was that the Civil Service should stop doing much of what it is doing, because it employs a limited number of people who are working hard and professionally to produce various reports or documents. However, while they are doing that they are not working on other matters. Perhaps taking a fresh look at some of the things that the Departments are being asked to do would free up those people to do much of what we have talked about in the last hour.

Mr Billington: Given the uncertainty of a new devolved Assembly and what that may entail and the criticisms or challenges that the public sector may face, a Programme for Government that is signed off and agreed by all political parties would give clear and unambiguous direction. The public sector would not have the excuse of having to satisfy five different masters; it would have to satisfy only one — the Programme for Government.

2.00 pm

Mr Hamilton: The previous question was on benchmarking. The problem is what to benchmark for. The CBI's key difficulty when engaging in the regional economic strategy and the CSR was to find people who had a vision of the future against which they could set the stretching targets that Brian described.

To use Dr Birnie's words, there seems to be a "risk-averse" approach to setting stretching targets, because failing to meet them could leave us open to criticism. A defence mechanism against that is not to set such targets — as opposed to considering what the future looks like based on a benchmark for an area with similar challenges and putting every effort into achieving a much smaller set of targets. Three or four pages of wide-ranging targets should be distilled into half a dozen key targets that will make a difference and realise a vision for the future. All our efforts should go into making that happen rather than into adopting a defensive position on the setting of targets.

Mr Cree: That is an interesting contribution, given that it is set against the background of people not being able to make their budgets year on year.

Ms Stanton: I welcome the witnesses from the CBI. Whether in relation to five-year plans or 10-year strategies, we keep returning to the issue of flexibility. That must be the key ingredient in ensuring more movement on the planning of solutions and strategies.

Nigel mentioned unemployment as one of the main factors in poverty. However, everyone knows that low income is an equal factor and must be addressed in any plans or strategies.

Mr Billington: That is an important point. A high-value-added economy, which means high wages, must be created. If Northern Ireland remains a low-value-added and low-skilled economy, there will be low pay and that leads to poverty. Even at that low-pay level, Northern Ireland will not be able to compete with the low level of pay in Poland or China. Therefore in whatever way it is considered, low-value-added businesses will struggle to compete and provide an income that lifts people out of poverty. The entire economy must become value-added, whereby skills command more money and deliver better results for businesses.

Mr Cree: I have a simple question that concerns many members. Twenty-nine per cent of people in Northern Ireland are economically inactive compared to 21% in the rest of the UK. What is the best way to solve that problem?

Mr Billington: There are several barriers to solving that problem. There are not enough highly paid, better-paid or value-added jobs to entice people out of the benefits system; people are also trapped by the costs of childminding and childcare. One agency stated anecdotally that a woman would need to earn £500 a week to be better off than living off state benefits. Not only would she have to forgo her benefits, she would also have to pay for childcare to enable her to go to work.

The third issue is that people in some parts of society lack skills and qualifications. If those people are not equipped with skills, they cannot enter, or return to, the job market. The big challenge lies in those deprived areas of society. I honestly believe that it is the toughest nut to crack: how do we upskill and motivate those people to enable them to return to the job market? When everything else is solved, that will still be the biggest and toughest nut to crack. It will not be easy, but we have to work at it.

Ms Stanton: Do you agree that people who care for the elderly, disabled people or children in their homes should be considered as employees rather than as being on benefits? The caring profession should be seen as a productive employment route. In that way, carers would not be stuck in the benefit trap.

Mr Billington: The work that carers do is certainly of benefit to society. Funding that work is a priority that must be managed within the Programme for Government. Spending money in one area means that money will not be spent in another, so it is a matter of balancing and managing priorities.

Providing more opportunities for more people through retraining and reskilling, including finding alternative employment for those on incapacity benefit who can no longer do the jobs that they once did, will reduce the budgetary burdens in other areas. That will enable better support to be given to those people who help the less well off in society and whose contribution is not currently being recognised.

Mr Ambrose: As Declan says, the benefit trap is a tough nut to crack. However, it would be unforgivable to continue to feed a system that allows a high percentage of kids to leave school without the basic skills that make them employable for most jobs. That area must be our focus if we are to avoid creating problems for the next generation.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): This point is somewhat related; do you predict an increase in the number of migrant workers coming to Northern Ireland? Currently, there are between 15,000 and 30,000 migrant workers, many of whom have arrived since May 2004. Will that continue to increase until such times as we, as a regional economy, learn how to tap into our so-called indigenous supply of labour? Arguably, we are not doing that at all well.

Mr Billington: At a conference on the economy, I listened to a presentation by a company used by local government to model outcomes. I hope that I can correctly remember two of the points that were made. Over the next 10 years, the company expects 67,000 new jobs to be created in Northern Ireland; we believe that 140,000 jobs are needed. The company believes that 40,000 of those jobs will be filled by migrant labour, simply because the jobs that will be available will be the low-value-added, low-wage jobs for which local people do not want to leave the benefit trap. Therefore, migrant labour is filling a gap.

The biggest risk to local society is if we do not upskill people caught in the benefit trap. If we fail to do that, or give them even basic skills, they will never be able to compete with people from abroad who have the necessary skills. Therefore, the onus is on us, as a society, to work hard to provide the skills that will lead them to employment.

Mr Smyth: Furthermore, migrant workers are spreading to more professional and technical areas of employment, such as postgraduate, pharmaceutical, environmental or planning work. Some jobs are certainly well paid, but because of the nature of the industry — for example, the food-processing industry — local people do not want such jobs. Therefore, we expect that the numbers of migrant workers will remain at the current level, if not increase modestly.

Mr Shannon: What is your opinion of working tax credits? Does the present system encourage people to get back to work or do changes to the system make it more advantageous for people to remain on benefits?

Mr Billington: That is an interesting question. Various business leaders have observed to me that the biggest barrier to working is having a family.

I have known people to walk away from jobs in which they earned £17, 000 or £18, 000 a year because they could not afford childminding fees. The tax credit is a help that allows people on certain incomes to better afford things. However, until a better way to address people's childminding needs is found, the fees that even those who earn £17, 000 or £18, 000 a year will have to pay to have two or three children minded will be a major barrier to their ability to continue working. Although tax credit is a contribution, it is not the silver bullet that is needed to help some parts of the community to become more economically active.

Mr Smyth: No research has been done by the CBI on that issue in Northern Ireland.

Mr Shannon: One of the problems with the tax credit is that until someone gets a nasty letter at the end of the year saying that a mistake has been made and he or she owes money, it looks good on the surface.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Thank you, gentlemen, for your attendance. The subgroup will consider your written submission carefully when producing its recommendations on the comprehensive spending review for Government. The subgroup hopes to produce its report within the next 10 days or so. It wishes the CBI, and its member businesses, well in the new year.

Mr Billington: Thank you, Chairman. I want to make a couple of closing remarks. At the start of the meeting, I said that outcomes were important. The CSR is a way to deliver outcomes. History has shown that spending money and adequately financing, among others, the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and the Department of Education does not necessarily deliver outcomes. I argue strongly that, having decided what the CSR's priorities are, as with any other Government policy, the focus should be on its management, implementation and delivery.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Those are important points. The subgroup will bear them in mind. Thank you very much.

Mr O'Dowd: Those issues may not necessarily be the prime focus with regard to health expenditure. The Appleby report stated there must be efficient management in the Health Service. However, it stated also that, compared with that in England, the Health Service here is underfunded.

Mr Billington: The Appleby report argues that despite the large amount of money that is being put into the Health Service, there is no increase in performance. One would expect that a large increase in funding would bring about an increase in performance. That does not take away from the fact that the Health Service may still be underfunded. However, if money is injected, one expects that there will be a result.

Mr O'Dowd: I do not argue with the point that it must be properly managed. I am merely pointing out that there are other issues.

Mr Smyth: The report highlights that spending on a range of benchmarks was a lot worse in Northern Ireland in a number of areas, so more money may be needed. We argue, however, that efficiency must be a priority.

Mr O'Dowd: No one is arguing that there should not be efficient management.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Thank you very much.

I want to remind members that the witnesses from the Department of Finance and Personnel will not make any opening comments. They believe that their letter and written submission is sufficient. I ask members to examine those documents. Members will also find the model questions on the tabled paper useful.

2.15 pm

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Good afternoon, gentlemen, and thank you for attending. I also want to thank DFP for its letter of 22 December 2006 and for its sizeable written submission. My understanding is that you do not intend to summarise the written submission but would prefer to go straight to the question-and-answer session. Is that what you wish to do?

Mr Leo O'Reilly (Department of Finance and Personnel): If I were to have made any opening comment, I would have spoken about the timetable and the framework. However, I suspect that the subgroup is already aware of those issues.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Yes, members are aware of those issues. I thank Leo O'Reilly and Richard Pengelly for attending this subgroup session.

Mr O'Dowd: With regard to the east-west split, there are higher levels of disadvantage west of the Bann, in the border counties and in certain urban areas. What work is DFP doing with the comprehensive spending review to help to eradicate that long-term trend?

Has the Department done any costings on the decentralisation of Civil Service jobs? I believe that a consultation document has been issued, or is due to be issued this month.

Mr O'Reilly: DSD's neighbourhood renewal strategy takes the lead for balanced development in different parts of Northern Ireland; our written submission contains some background information on that issue. DFP's role is to provide a funding channel. As the subgroup is probably aware, several initiatives that are focused on the north-west are being developed. Working with the Irish Government, some regional development initiatives in the north-west are already operational. Public expenditure implications have already been taken into account and are also being factored into future plans.

Does your second question refer to the dispersal and decentralisation of Civil Service jobs or public-sector jobs?

Mr O'Dowd: I refer to public-sector jobs and Civil Service jobs.

Mr O'Reilly: The member has anticipated correctly: a consultation document on that issue will be issued shortly. The reason that I asked about the distinction between Civil Service jobs and public-sector jobs is that, in the past, the focus has been on the location of Civil Service jobs. However, the RPA offers an opportunity to examine the distribution of public-sector employment across the region, its location and where different types of employment are situated. DFP wants to ensure that, when decisions are taken on the location, for example, of new headquarters or structures that will be introduced under the RPA, they are taken holistically and not on a one-by-one basis; otherwise, certain functions could end up being located in certain places by default.

Mr O'Dowd: I am not surprised to hear you mention neighbourhood renewal. No matter where I go to try to resolve a difficulty, the standard response that I hear is "neighbourhood renewal" or that I will have to wait until the RPA is finalised.

Surely DFP has a role in ensuring that money for which it is responsible is targeted at areas of deprivation. Indeed, now that the anti-poverty and social inclusion strategy has been published, the Department has a greater role in ensuring that the finances that it controls are used to eradicate deprivation.

Mr O'Reilly: There is a number of strands and levels of investment activity that can eradicate deprivation, disadvantage and regional disadvantage. First, there is an issue concerning the distribution of investment in infrastructure, and the Departments and the SIB are reviewing the timing and location of particular investments as part of the review of the ISNI.

Secondly, there are proposals and ideas on how to accelerate particular roads programmes in order to assist the process of improving regional infrastructure. Beyond that, self-targeting of resources will combat deprivation — for example, social welfare benefits, by definition, follow deprivation.

A third major way in which deprivation can be eradicated, and this links to Mr O'Dowd's second point about how advantage can be redistributed using public expenditure, is through the locating of public-sector jobs. As our background paper notes, more than half of the current expenditure goes on public-sector pay. That means that the spending power will lie wherever jobs are located across the Province.

Finally, we can target particular initiatives, such as neighbourhood renewal, which has been mentioned, to address specific local problems, usually over a fixed period.

Those measures can be effective in the short term. However, the way in which to secure long-term sustainable change using public expenditure, to the extent that that is possible, is through investment assistance; for example, through Invest NI; through targeting investment through the infrastructure investment programme; and through targeting and equal distribution of employment opportunities, using public expenditure to generate those opportunities.

The regional dimension to all those policy strands must take into account mechanisms such as section 75 and the consultation on the distribution of public-sector jobs under the RPA.

That is a brief summary of the broad strategic approach to be taken to address the issue.

Ms Ritchie: I have several questions.

I recognise that the NIAO report into the RRI was only published in December 2006, but has the Department formulated any reaction to that report? To date, has the Department taken any action on the issues raised in the report, particularly those on the ISNI?

Mr O'Reilly: Richard shall deal with your questions in detail.

The Department will publish a response to the report, which must be completed within a certain timescale. We are working on that response.

Mr Richard Pengelly (Department of Finance and Personnel): As members will know, NIAO reports are agreed with DFP. Some recommendations were agreed, and action was either taken on those before the report's publication or is under way. The substantive response must await any formal consideration of the report by either the House of Commons Select Committee on Public Accounts or a devolved public accounts Committee.

We are proactively moving forward on those issues that have been agreed with the NIAO. For example, recommendations were made on greater clarity of reporting issues to the Assembly and Parliament and on the overall management of borrowing.

Ms Ritchie: My next question relates to the overall Budget. The subgroup received a copy of the spending priorities by Department from DFP. We noticed that the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (DHSSPS) spending priorities cover major pressures across all areas. Hospital stock is poor, and there is a maintenance backlog.

The Bamford Review of Mental Health and Learning Disability (Northern Ireland) some time ago recommended a long-term Budget. What proposals are contained in the CSR for such a Budget? If there are no proposals, what can an incoming Executive and Assembly do to correct that? Another issue is free personal care, which arises from the Coughlan judgement of 1999.

A need to increase social housing to 2,000 units has been identified, but DSD has identified only 1,500 of those units. What does the CSR need to do to reflect that increasing need for social housing and to reduce waiting lists? What discussions have taken place with DSD to address that need?

Mr O'Reilly: I will make a generic point about those issues before commenting on each one. All expenditure pressures that have been identified in our papers will be, and are being, considered as part of the CSR process. Inevitably, the nature of that consideration means that choices must be made to balance available resources against priorities. That process will become much more intense over the coming months as we engage with Departments to work through more of the detail behind the issues that each has identified.

DHSSPS has already written to all Departments to engage with it on the findings of the Bamford Review, and meetings have been held to identify the implications of that review for the various Departments. The review team recently wrote to all permanent secretaries to remind them of the potential implications and to ask them to consider pressing the case in their CSR material for the necessary funding to enable the review's recommendations to be implemented effectively.

Ms Ritchie: For the housing units, read "thousands" instead of "2,000", which I originally said.

Mr O'Reilly: A response on the issue of free personal care was given to one of the Assembly's subgroups. That was also a recommendation in the second report of the Subgroup on the Economic Challenges Facing Northern Ireland. As far as I can recall, DHSSPS provided that response and made the point that the global allocation of free personal care can sometimes mean that resources to provide personal care to a whole range of people are used without regard to their ability to pay. Again, it is about choices and prioritisation. That response referred to the experience in the Scottish Parliament, which proposed the introduction of free personal care but is now reviewing its approach.

We are aware of the issue of housing affordability. There is also the interim Semple Report, which I think was published recently.

Ms Stanton: The interim review of housing affordability has just been published, yes.

Mr O'Reilly: As you know, a large chunk of the ISNI deals with a forward allocation for social housing. The questions to be asked are whether that allocation is sufficient to meet the level of need that has been identified in various reports and how we reallocate resources identified in the strategy to secure that additional level of investment. I cannot give a yes or no answer, because we are not yet at the point at which Ministers will be making decisions.

Mr Shannon: My question concerns water charges and rates. If we were not to proceed with water and rating reforms, what consequences would that have for the CSR?

I am not convinced that the RPA will produce lots of savings, but I am keen to get your opinion on that. During the CSR period, what will be the costs of implementing the RPA? Will any savings accrue? If so, where?

2.30 pm

Mr Pengelly: Over the CSR period, a phased introduction of water charging is planned. Currently, about £300 million a year of Northern Ireland's funding received through the Barnett formula is used to cover the costs of water and sewerage services. As you know, we get nothing for water through the Barnett formula, because water provision is a private-sector concern in England, so £300 million of the Barnett consequential that we receive — for example, for health and education provision — is diverted to pay for water. When the Government-owned company (Go-co) becomes self-financing, that £300 million can be diverted from provision of the water and sewerage services into other local priorities such as health and education. Obviously, that will be three years from now, when full charging will be introduced, but something in the order of £300 million a year will be available for investment in other local priority services.

Rate reform is not about reformulating policy to obtain additional revenue but about charges being better distributed, based on capital value rather than rental value. That will allow future decisions on rates increases to be applied more equitably; there have been perverse outcomes from previous rates increases. The revenue that an end to industrial derating will generate is built into the Budget process for 2007-08. Again, it is planned to roll that out through the seven years of the phasing out industrial derating. If that is not done, however, a funding deficit will have to be put right.

Mr Shannon: I find it hard to understand the rates issue. I have yet to meet anyone in my constituency who does not say that their rates are increasing. Some of the rates are increasing by 50% or 70% — there must be a terrible lot of people somewhere getting rates reductions. I do not understand your system. It is all very well to say that there will not be a big difference between the old and the new rates levels, but the people whom I represent in Strangford will notice a difference.

Mr O'Reilly: I was in attendance with my colleague Brian McClure at the meeting of this subgroup on 20 December at which that matter was discussed. It is one of those points for which I do not possess detailed information; however, if necessary, we can provide details about the number of properties and the changes in their rate liability. Precise data are available that analyse and break down the changes right across Northern Ireland.

Mr Shannon: The Boston Tea Party will be a picnic compared with the ructions that will occur in Strangford.

I asked a question on the RPA; will you answer that, please?

Mr O'Reilly: As you are probably aware, in January 2006, Deloitte produced an initial piece of high-level work on the RPA for the Government. Deloitte compiled a lengthy report that gave a preliminary estimate of the costs and savings that may arise as a result of the RPA. However, we are now refining and revisiting those figures. DHSSPS is the most advanced Department when it comes to developing costing scenarios. It has had plans on the stocks for several years; it has therefore developed detailed figures on costs and savings. Richard may be able to quote some of those figures.

Beyond that, we are still working with other Departments, particularly those in which substantial savings may be made. That work, which is part of the RPA's stream of work, is under way because we need to do such work on the issue for the CSR period. However, we have more detailed figures available for DHSSPS costs and savings.

Mr Pengelly: There is a range of figures for health spending. For example, in 2005-06, in accounting terms, DHSSPS had to take a provision linked to redundancy costs. It was reasonably certain that the costs were going to fall. Those costs were estimated at that stage at £23 million for the restructuring of trusts, although other costs will also be associated with that. On the question of the link between costs and savings, our rule of thumb on redundancy costs is that there is about a three-year payback period. Redundancy costs of about £23 million would therefore lead to an ongoing recurrent saving of around £7 million per annum. Many of the costs in health and education are associated with fundamental rationalisation: from many organisations to fewer organisations. Where there is redundancy, there will be a straight payback over time.

In areas in which service provision must be enhanced, the relationship between costs and savings may not be so clear. For future salary savings, it will not be about paying a lump sum to someone to make him or her redundant but about enhanced levels of service provision, particularly for the RPA. With the transfer of some services from central Government to local government, there is an opportunity for greater synergy, because the population that is targeted with the service transferred often has better links with services currently provided by local councils; therefore there will be efficiency savings.

We are working with Departments and we will engage with local councils to get a better feel for the detail of the roll-out of RPA and its associated costs and savings. That will be done with a view to ensuring that upfront costs have a defined payback period and that we achieve qualitative and quantitative savings.

Mr Shannon: Is it inappropriate for councils to consider building new civic centres when it has not yet been decided whether there will be seven or 15 councils? The RPA is ongoing. Do you have an opinion on that? I hope that you do.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): That may be an unfair question to ask of Mr Pengelly.

Mr Shannon: It is a serious question.

Mr O'Reilly: It is probably not for us to offer opinions on the matter. [Laughter.]

Both Richard and I sat on a finance subgroup as part of planning for the restructuring of local government, so we understand the point that Mr Shannon makes. The point has been made about existing councils incurring increasing levels of debt that will be transferred to the new structures. Take Magherafelt as an example: it has very low levels of debt, yet other councils, for the very good reason that they have been investing in services, have higher levels of debt.

Provided that an application for loan finance is within the specified powers of a local council, the Department of the Environment (DOE) cannot refuse it. Although DOE is monitoring the position, unless there is a difficulty, the Government are unlikely to intervene. In a sense, DOE and, to a certain extent, DFP act as postboxes, because loans are taken out from the National Loans Fund in the United Kingdom. Provided that loans meet the criteria, they are processed and the loan repayments start.

Mr Pengelly: The legislation requires that DOE approve any loan that councils take out for capital investment; however, as Leo says, such approval extends only to ensuring that councils have the legal authority to incur the expenditure — namely, that it is on services on which local councils should properly spend money. The greatest control is the normal framework of public accountability: ultimately the loan will be serviced from taxpayers' money, and publicly elected representatives must ensure that they seek value for money and accountability in the services that they provide.

Mr Shannon: Therefore councils should not take on debt if they know that it will become someone else's.

Mr Pengelly: If the debt is taken out with due regard to value for money and to provide a service from which the relevant ratepayers will benefit in future, it is not so much a matter of incurring a debt that someone else will have to pay, but rather asking those who will benefit to pay.

Mr Shannon: Certain people are not convinced of the advantages, let me put it that way.

Mr O'Reilly: We are aware of the issue, and there has been correspondence with Ministers about it.

Mr Cree: I have four questions. Richard mentioned the £300 million of Barnett consequentials that go towards paying for water services. Does that include the £50 million that was agreed in the green-dowry days of 1998?

Mr Pengelly: It is not hypothecated as such. In 1998, when water was privatised in England, a lump sum was paid to the English companies, and the Barnett consequential was £50 million, which was then added to the Northern Ireland block. However, that £50 million will not have grown.

Mr Cree: Is it payable annually?

Mr Pengelly: Yes, the £50 million is available to local Ministers to spend on whatever purpose, and it will not disappear.

Mr Cree: In paragraph 30 of your submission, you mention the potential for an "overly optimistic" scenario, in which any increases in public expenditure from the Chancellor's package will possibly be required for pay and price increase inflation, leaving only efficiency savings for spending priorities. That is the optimistic scenario. What would a less optimistic scenario be?

Mr Pengelly: It is not that we have a definitive range of precise calculations. We consider the numbers and types of inflationary pressures that are in the system, and the likely range of outcomes through the Barnett formula. On one reading, they seem broadly comparable, so they could offset each other and leave efficiencies available for other issues. However, at this early stage in the process, there is no precise science to that.

Mr Cree: Would you be concerned if a significant deficit was produced?

Mr Pengelly: That is what the early stages of the local Priorities and Budget process is about, and that is why we have not yet commissioned information. Information about likely inflationary pressures that Departments might identify before Christmas would be different from those that it might identify in the spring of 2007. The CSR outcome will become available in the middle of 2007, and Ministers will then take decisions about how those funds are to be allocated. Our experience has always been that it is better to leave the identification of those pressures until as close to that time as possible, so that the information on which those decisions are based is as up to date as possible. Inflationary pressures do concern us, and we could commission a huge amount of work to identify them, but by the time that Ministers come to take decisions that information will be out of date.

Mr Cree: Is it the normal philosophy to leave it until nearer the time?

Mr Pengelly: No, the philosophy is to do it at what we consider to be the appropriate time. It is not about putting off the commissioning of information. For inflationary pressures that will start in April 2008, it strikes us that to begin to identify them in 2006 would be premature. As you can see in the material from the Departments that is included in our submission, they are scanning the horizon for the sorts of issues that they will face. Precise figures will be generated in early to mid 2007 to inform the Budget process that runs from mid to late 2007. Our experience has always been that that is the better time to do it.

Mr Cree: I am probably handicapped, as I come from the private sector and am used to medium-term to long-term planning.

Asset disposal will be a big issue over the CSR period. Have you identified any specific areas and, if so, how much they are likely to realise?

Mr Pengelly: The figure that is quoted up to the end of the CSR period is based on individual departmental units that have reviewed their asset registers and patterns of disposals.

The Department of Finance and Personnel is currently turning that overall forecast of likely disposals, which is based on some empirical evidence, into details of individual assets and the timing of their likely disposal. The easiest example is social housing; we have a fairly stable pattern of disposal of social housing to owner-occupiers. That is obviously not pinned down to individual houses; we are trying to turn that overall forecast, which is based on previous patterns of disposal, into details of specific assets — that is one of the early parts of the work that we are doing on the comprehensive spending review.

2.45 pm

Mr Cree: Have you done anything specific on water reform? There are quite a lot of assets there that may become available very quickly.

Mr Pengelly: There is nothing specifically in the £1 billion that is linked to the assets of what will become the Go-co. However, we are absolutely clear that there will be a robust analysis of the assets that it holds and of what it needs to hold. Those assets, if and when disposed of, will benefit the block. They will not be sold off for the private sector to realise the benefit.

Mr Cree: Or to realise the asset value and offset it against the capital value?

Mr Pengelly: In the medium- to long-term, the water company will have a significant capital investment programme, which, in many cases, will be financed through lending by Government to the Go-co. Any asset disposals would reduce the need for Government to lend, and so would reduce borrowing charges and, hence, the charge to customers. Rather than Government having to lend money to the Go-co and use its capital expenditure, it would also free up capital for investment in other areas. The benefit will remain within the public sector in Northern Ireland.

Mr Cree: Many people will be concerned about the continuing problem of the underspend, which, I believe, was 18% last year. Do you agree that that is a serious problem that undermines public confidence in public expenditure programmes? In the light of the failure to date to adequately address underspending, what is now being considered by DFP as a means to address that problem?

Mr O'Reilly: I do not think that the overall underspend is as high as 18%. That figure may be linked to capital.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): The 18% is the capital.

Mr O'Reilly: Any level of underspending is obviously a matter of concern, and we acknowledge that. Given that one can never overspend, however, there will inevitably be a level of underspend. By the very nature of capital projects there is always an element of uncertainty and an element of slippage in the programmes from one year to the next that creates a level of underspend, but the Department would certainly not regard the figure of 18% as acceptable. It is not an excuse, but the reason for it is the substantial increase in the total level of capital investment that has taken place over the past few years. It has risen from roughly £600 million a year just a few years ago to over £1 billion a year. The rapid growth in the amount of investment that has taken place has meant that some of those programmes have slipped. The point we always make is that the money is not lost; it rolls over.

Mr Cree: I understand that.

Mr O'Reilly: Having said that, you are absolutely right. The figure is too high, and even if it is rolled over, it means that money was not used in year one or two that could have been used somewhere else to bring other projects forward.

Mr Pengelly: I am genuinely not trying to be overly defensive on this point, but we need to bear in mind that capital is measured by reference to a fairly arbitrary cut-off date — 31 March. If £200 million was planned to be spent on 20 March but was spent on 1 April, it would appear as a £200 million underspend. Sometimes the figures can mask the fact that while there is slippage, it may be slippage of a couple of weeks, and nothing significant. Having said that, 18% is not acceptable.

We have talked about the enhancement in the level of capital expenditure, and that has raised some capacity issues. Departments are dealing with a wider range of capital programmes than before. There is no question that while it is still not at the level we want to see, there are signs of improvement. We continue to work with the Departments and our colleagues in the SIB to enhance our ability to take those projects forward.

We are also working with Departments to get systems in place that will identify the possibility of slippage at an earlier stage. For example, if a Department were planning to take forward a project in the forthcoming year and realised at an early stage that it would not be possible to do so, then DFP could go to other Departments and accelerate projects due for funding at the tail end of the year. There is a range of measures in place to try and improve performance.

Mr O'Reilly: This year, DFP have commissioned a specific exercise, which is ongoing, to work with Departments to identify weakness in forecasting. Indeed, such weakness may be in the way the centre is managing the spending profiles in year; seeking to spot slippages that appear to be emerging, and using its power to redeploy resources accordingly. The issue identified is significant and important, and DFP is taking it seriously. There has been a lot of work carried out on this issue, particularly in light of the 18% figure you quoted from last year.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Further to Mr Cree's question, I wish to ask a question regarding capital underspend. I understand that work has been taken forward with PKF Consulting. What is the expected reporting date and will the report contain an action plan and targets?

Mr Pengelly: We have been discussing the emerging findings. I am not sure of a precise date for the report, but DFP is looking to bring this to a conclusion in the next month or so, if not sooner. The report will include findings, conclusions, and recommendations for the way forward although it may not include specific action plans. DFP will be preparing detailed action plans to take forward with Departments based on the conclusions and recommendations.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): I wish to ask questions based on your written submission. For example, as regards “Chart 9: Breakdown of Efficiency Savings by Gershon Classification”, I am unclear as to what “Gershon Classification” means. The chart shows that 26% of the efficiency savings have been classified as “Other”. What does that cover? The chart also states that 15% of the efficiency savings have been classified under “Procurement”. Does that mean that less is being procured; is it being procured more efficiently, or are we talking about a combination of the savings in other categories?

Mr Pengelly: I will run through the categories, leaving the category “Other” to the end. “Procurement” is about smarter procurement; it is the savings that arise from centralised procurement — economies of scale and better contract negotiation. “Productive” refers to productive time — getting more outputs for the same level of inputs, and better throughputs through better use of staff. “Corporate” relates to corporate overheads and efficiency savings linked to back-office administration and is closely aligned to the category “Administration” — it is a general squeeze on the corporate and administrative headquarters costs. “Transactions” represents streamlining transaction processing, particularly relating to benefits and enabling of benefit transactions. “Allocative” is a wonderful term, and it refers to prioritisation. In other words, as regards the overall efficiency with which the Government discharge their duty, is money being spent on issues that are not a priority, and therefore could it be used better elsewhere?

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Could that include a straightforward reduction in spending by the Government?

Mr Pengelly: That could happen if the case were clearly made that the spending was not in an area of priority and the money could be put to greater use in some other area of higher priority. As regards “Other”, I am sorry, but I do not have a detailed breakdown of that with me. However, it encompasses a range of small issues.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Your submission outlines 10 value-for-money reviews in the various Departments. Departmental efficiency delivery plans are also mentioned. Is there a tight connection between the two? Does a value-for-money review identify areas for improvement, and an efficiency plan set out how spending will be reduced in those areas over a certain period?

Mr Pengelly: In its approach to the comprehensive spending review, the Treasury tends to use terms such as “value-for-money review” and “efficiency delivery plan” interchangeably. Ministers here have taken the view that zero-based reviews of programmes should be objective assessments that take into account the ministerial priority of a programme and how it will be delivered. For such reviews to be objective, it would be strange to rule out at the start that more money should be spent on a programme.

For example, one value-for-money programme concerns social housing. The Housing Executive is working independently to increase, from 1,500 to 2,000, the number of new-build housing units each year. Value-for-money reviews fundamentally aim to identify the scope for efficiency savings and to do things smarter or better in order to deliver better outcomes. However, reviews may also identify areas in which good outcomes are forthcoming and further investment might help achieve the Government’s overarching priorities.

Efficiency delivery plans are designed to identify areas where robust efficiency savings can be achieved. They set out the detailed mechanics for achieving and capturing those efficiencies.

Mr Weir: I want to ask you about a couple of issues, in particular, the RPA. The RPA will probably have the largest single impact on the comprehensive spending review that is unique to Northern Ireland. It is certainly one of the biggest issues. I take issue with some of the things that you have said, such as on longer-term efficiency savings, the report by Deloitte that you mentioned, and the benefits of coterminosity in relation to delivery of services. However, I will leave those issues aside for the moment.

I wish to clarify something in your submission. Annex B of your submission relates to the value-for-money studies. Following the title of section 1(a), “Structural Issues – Review of Public Administration”, there is a figure in brackets of £200 million. To what does that figure refer?

Mr Pengelly: That is the likely overall cost of the health component of the RPA.

Mr Weir: Do other figures in brackets also refer to overall costs? For example, the figure of £2 billion appears in brackets after “Labour Productivity” in section 1(b). Is that the overall additional cost of improving labour productivity?

Mr Pengelly: No. That £2 billion refers to the current spend on labour productivity.

Mr Weir: Therefore, the £200 million in section 1(a) of annex B refers to the current health spend?

Mr Pengelly: Yes.

Mr Weir: A summary table at the end of annex B shows key spending areas and programmes. A figure of £300 million is shown for the RPA for 2007-08. Is that the overall estimated cost of the RPA?

Mr Pengelly: No. Again, that figure is the current overall spend in areas that the RPA will impact on, with the exceptions of health, education and the Water Service.

Mr Weir: I am trying to understand this clearly; forgive me if I am being obtuse. The £300 million is being spent on RPA-related areas. For the sake of argument, let us say that the RPA was not happening in 2007-08. Would that money be available elsewhere?

Mr Pengelly: When the Treasury began the comprehensive spending review, Whitehall Departments were informed that they must run a programme of value-for-money reviews. The Treasury anticipated that those reviews would cover something in the order of 40-50% of the current departmental spends.

3.00 pm

The table in members' packs identifies the areas that we are subjecting to value-for-money reviews. Of the total current spend, we shall review programmes to the value of £6,599.4 million.

Mr Weir: I would like to know what the figure of £300 million represents in practical terms.

Mr Pengelly: That is the cost of providing services in areas that are under review as part of the RPA. Part of that review will concern how those services are provided. If RPA were not happening, those services would still continue on their current basis.

Mr Weir: Can you provide any estimates of the projected cost of the RPA over those periods, other than what was produced by Deloitte?

Mr Pengelly: We are currently working with the Departments, rather than remaining focused on the Deloitte report, which was very much a strategic overview. We are now drilling down and we have the detail of all of the RPA-affected bodies and services. We are working with individual Departments to examine provision on a service-by-service basis, and to examine the cost of achieving change.

Mr Weir: Presumably, you are principally referring to the RPA as it relates to local government — a separate category from RPA activities concerning health and education. What else would the review cover?

Mr Pengelly: It would also cover areas such as urban regeneration and roads.

Mr Weir: Broadly speaking, it would mean the transfer of responsibilities?

Mr Pengelly: Yes. The figures that I have cited will not cover the cost that is currently incurred by local government.

Ms Ritchie: My question concerns the spending priorities of Departments. In particular, I refer to the Department of Regional Development and structural road maintenance. The paper that you have provided states that the public transport programme in Northern Ireland seeks to deliver the objectives of the regional transport strategy. One of the objectives of that strategy was to ensure that the network was maintained and that there was no depreciation in that asset. However, the allocation of funding to structural road maintenance has been reduced over the last few years. How does the Department intend, through the CSR, to address that matter?

As for management of the asset base, I understand that the Department will be receiving proposals for Workplace 2010 and bids in that respect. How will the future management of the asset base create savings, and how will it meet the needs for decentralisation?

Mr O'Reilly: I understand that Workplace 2010 has been examined by a separate subgroup. It would probably be safer for us not to say too much on that matter, because the experts and the detail have been with another subgroup.

Dr Birnie: That subgroup has finished its deliberations.

Mr O'Reilly: We can certainly address the other points. The point that was made on roads maintenance is factually correct; there was a reduction in the allocation for structural roads maintenance in the current financial year, but there is an enhancement for next year. We have not yet reached the £100-million-a-year figure that was estimated as necessary.

We are certainly aware of that issue. Public representatives raise that matter quite frequently, so it is high on the agenda of issues to be examined during the current comprehensive spending review. I cannot confirm that we will increase that spending to £100 million because, ultimately, that is not my decision.

Mr Pengelly: Structural maintenance has a link to underspending. Historically, initial budget allocations for structural maintenance have never reached the level that my colleagues in the Roads Service would like to see. However, the monitoring process has always offered the opportunity to make some further in-year reallocations made possible by slippage and underspend in other areas. That is an area in which we would happily praise our colleagues in the Roads Service because, more than any organisation in the public sector, when it asks for money, it has a record of delivering actual spend on the ground, if you will pardon the pun.

Ms Ritchie: Will the September monitoring round result in any further funding allocations this financial year for structural road maintenance?

Mr Pengelly: The proposals on that are currently with the Secretary of State.

This may not be specifically linked to Workplace 2010, but, generally, assets held by Departments have an associated cost as regards depreciation and cost of capital. Better asset management — reducing the volume of assets held — would give rise to recurrent savings, which would come back to Ministers for reallocation. There would be a tangible benefit.

Mr O'Dowd: Procurement policies were mentioned earlier. I will go back to my original point. If we take the Erne Hospital, which is probably one of the biggest economic units west of the Bann, will the CSR look at the procurement opportunities that the hospital will provide as regards local food manufacturers, producers, or service industries, etc, instead of what is happening now, which is that the cheapest contract is chosen?

From a social responsibility perspective, permitting such a procedure would target local industry, manufacturers and food producers as suppliers and would have a positive financial impact on the wider community.

Mr Pengelly: It is a difficult area. Ultimately, there is always a cheaper way of doing things. In cash terms, centralised procurement — procuring services on a Northern Ireland basis from suppliers outside the Northern Ireland marketplace — may enable you to pay less for services than if you went to local suppliers. However, against that there are tangible and intangible benefits from sourcing local suppliers. It would be for Ministers to take such decisions at the appropriate time.

There could be a situation in which there is a very clear value-for-money argument, together with an analysis, which could appear to be poor value for money because you would be paying more for the same services.

There is no general policy supporting the approach outlined by Mr O'Dowd. The example he uses would fall to colleagues in the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (DHSSPS) for determination. Although DFP advises Ministers on overall allocations and on strategic allocations for services, responsibility for service delivery would fall to colleagues in DHSSPS who hold the budget. It would be possible for them to work alongside colleagues in DETI on local economic development issues, where there could be a payback for both Departments through a specific course of action.

Mr O'Dowd: Is there a role for the CSR to look at the wider procurement policy?

Mr Pengelly: Yes. That could be taken forward as part of the process discussed earlier. It would be a very valid issue that could be considered alongside the other issues in the spring of next year, in the detailed analysis of how public expenditure should be utilised in the CSR period.

Mr O'Reilly: Procurement is subject to a fairly specific set of rules and regulations — particularly European procurement and competition rules for larger contracts. There is not a great deal of discretion.

Mr O'Dowd: That happens in larger contracts certainly. However, I am talking about smaller contracts in the service industry.

Mr O'Reilly: There are policies on competitive tendering even in smaller contracts. Our colleagues in central procurement directorate (CPD) could give the subgroup a lot more detail and background on that than we would be equipped to do if it wants to explore the issue further.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): CPD and the Equality Commission recently completed a report on guidelines on social issues in procurement. However, I do not know whether that would shed any light on this point. You are correct. European competition law limits what can be done to a certain degree.

Are there any other questions?

At the beginning of the session, Mr O'Reilly, when you were answering questions, you mentioned projects in the north-west, and that prompts a further question.

What discussions have there been between the Treasury and the Irish Government on so-called joint funding? If indeed there have been discussions on that issue, to what extent would any such funding be additional to the departmental expenditure limit?

Mr O'Reilly: I understand that one of your subgroups has taken evidence from representatives of the Irish Government, and that they confirmed that there are ongoing discussions between the Irish Government and the Treasury. Both DFP and OFMDFM have also been present at those meetings.

Furthermore, the Irish Government have indicated that they would consider contributing to specific projects in Northern Ireland in which there is a potential or manifest all-Ireland benefit. The Treasury has confirmed that any such allocations would be over and above anything that the Treasury and the UK Government would provide or any revenue that would be raised.

As I said, those discussions are ongoing. No specific amounts of money have been mentioned in those ongoing discussions, at least not in my earshot, although I have asked. Certainly there has been discussion about the potential for contributing to specific projects, including roads projects, but that is information that you are probably already aware of.

Mr Cree: Has the Secretary of State identified any priorities for the CSR?

Mr Pengelly: The current position in terms of a backdrop for Departments' initial thinking is the priorities that were established in December 2005 when the Budget was launched: economic development, high-quality public services, equality and diversity. Additionally, the Secretary of State has recently identified for Departments the overarching strategies such as sustainable development and the anti-poverty strategy. Departments must also factor the delivery of those strategies into any thinking about forward pressures and issues. We are also continuing to build on the priority funding packages that were announced — renewable energy, skills and science, children and young people. It is very much at a high strategic level.

The Chairman (Dr Birnie): Thank you for coming, and for your written submission. We wish the Department well in the new year.

The subgroup met in private at 1.11 pm.

The evidence session began at 1.16 pm.

(The Chairman (Mr Hay) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Hay): I declare the meeting open to the public. Minister, it is good to have you here. I know that you have taken time out of your busy schedule to be present. The subgroup welcomes that.

I assume that you know every member here. If not, we can go round the Senate Chamber and ask members to introduce themselves.

Mr Paul Goggins MP (Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State): As I look around, I am pretty familiar with everybody.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): From the outset, it would perhaps be useful if you outlined the Government's position on the draft Policing (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Northern Ireland) Order 2007. After you have made your introduction, I will call the parties in alphabetical order to ask a lead question and to identify the area about which questioning. It will be useful for officials and parties to record that.

Mr Goggins: Thank you very much, Chairman, for the welcome. At the beginning of our deliberations, I want to say that our thoughts are very much with the family of David Ervine at this difficult time.

I am accompanied by two NIO officials: Robert Crawford, the deputy director of policing division, and Steven McCourt, the head of policing policy branch.

They may be able to assist us this afternoon. The officials are at the subgroup's disposal and are happy to participate as members require.

The history of the draft Policing (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Northern Ireland) Order 2007 goes back almost a year to the day when my predecessor, Shaun Woodward, asked officials on 9 January 2006 to prepare an Order that would suitably amend and modernise existing legislation and, in particular, introduce amendments to the Police (Northern Ireland) Act 2003.

The Order contains several new measures. First, it provides new powers for the Chief Constable to designate civilian staff to certain functions. That breaks down into five categories of staff — investigating officers, detention officers, escort officers, staff custody officers and police community support officers (PCSOs). I want to make a few comments about the last two groups because I believe that they are of particular interest to members.

The model of working with staff custody officers is currently being piloted by the Home Office in nine different areas. We are keen to find out the results of those pilot projects, which, I am sure, will help to inform future policy and decision-making.

Considerable experience has been gained in England from the deployment of police community support officers. Although some of it is anecdotal, impressive evidence is building about the role that PCSOs can play, particularly at neighbourhood level.

From April of this year, 29 community support officers will be working with the police in my constituency. Community safety officers are very effective; they are highly visible and do not get drawn into the bureaucracy that sometimes takes police officers away from the streets. They are able to form relationships with the local community, which, again, is very helpful.

The first set of powers mentioned in the consultation document for the draft Policing (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Northern Ireland) Order 2007 will enable the Chief Constable to designate civilian staff to carry out those functions.

A second power allows for the streamlining of police trainee recruitment. As members know, all candidates currently in the recruitment pool must undergo the same level of medical and criminal checks, even though the vast majority of them are never appointed as police officers. We want to allow for the provisional appointment of candidates, subject to medical checks and criminal checks. Candidates will then be formally appointed if they pass those checks. That measure would mean that there would be 1,800 fewer checks every year, which would save about £500,000, and it would make no difference to the quality of the police officers appointed. Therefore, it is a sensible and practical measure.

The third power relates to the vetting of designated civilian staff, to which I referred earlier. It is, of course, important that recruitment standards for civilian staff are the same as those for police trainees. We will therefore be looking at criminal convictions, business interests and other relevant information about civilian staff as well as police officers. I hope that that offers reassurance to members.

The fourth power makes provision for the PSNI to address acute staff shortages by directly recruiting from other police forces. At the moment, direct entry into the PSNI is only through traineeship. We want to enable the Chief Constable to recruit experienced staff from other forces, if there is a need to do so. That is a sensible measure. I am sure that members are aware of the current shortage of detective constables, and we want the Chief Constable to be able to deal practically with that shortage.

The draft legislation contains a proposal relating to the new powers of double jeopardy, where were introduced in the Criminal Justice Act 2003. In fact, I was involved with the later stages of that legislation — it was my baptism as a Minister. Those new powers were introduced so that if there is new and compelling evidence that a serious crime may have taken place, the police can investigate it. In the past, when someone was acquitted of a crime, that was that, but these new powers change that.

In Northern Ireland, those powers apply to the police, but not to the Police Ombudsman, and we obviously want to resolve that inequity. If new and compelling evidence exists that a police officer may have committed a serious offence, we want the Ombudsman to be able to reopen the investigation if necessary. There are also some provisions about road closures and the ability to divert traffic, which are practical and sensible measures.

There are also new powers to enable the police to examine documents and electronic records to establish whether they contain evidence that somebody may have committed, or is planning to commit, a serious crime. The powers allow the police to remove those documents for a limited time.

Essentially, these practical measures will help the police in Northern Ireland to be more efficient and effective in their work. I hope that they will command the support of the subgroup, and I look forward to any questions that members may wish to ask.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): Thank you very much. Minister, I forgot to welcome your officials earlier, so I welcome them now.

I remind members to turn their mobile phones off. It would be useful if members could declare any interests before they ask their questions. I am conscious that some members are also members of the Policing Board.

Mrs Foster: I declare that I am a member of the Northern Ireland Policing Board.

I want to raise the issue of PCSOs. I have long complained about the resources available to the Chief Constable, his constables and the Police Service in general, particularly in rural areas.

On the face of it, I welcome the fact that more resources will be available to the Chief Constable. However, PCSOs should not be substitutes for police officers but should, rather, complement them. I say that for several reasons, not least because people will realise that PCSOs are not police officers. PCSOs from Lancashire Constabulary and Merseyside Constabulary have visited Northern Ireland to talk about their role. However, this is not Lancashire or Merseyside: it is Northern Ireland.

The criteria for the appointment of PCSOs are included in the legislation, which states that the Chief Constable will appoint:

“a suitable person to carry out the functions of a community support officer”.

I am interested to hear from the Minister what he understands by those criteria and whether further work will be done on those.

Mr Goggins: In many respects, the criteria of credibility and the standing of individuals will be the same as for those who apply to be police officers. After the Order has been passed, regulations will set out publicly and clearly the criteria that will be used to assess people's suitability to become PCSOs. Among those criteria are any business connections that applicants may have, which may be important if they are dealing with commercial premises or licensed premises. Checks will be made to ensure that their criminal records are clear.

Initially, the plan is to recruit 400 PCSOs over the first four years, 100 of whom will be appointed in the first year. PCSOs will be an additional resource; they are in no way a replacement for police officers. They will have a range of powers, but not the complete powers of a police officer, to assist policing effectively.

As Northern Ireland moves to ever more normal and peaceful times, the emphasis on neighbourhood policing is important. The Chief Constable often emphasises its importance — and rightly so — and the PCSOs will assist with that.

Mr Raymond McCartney: Is the Minister saying that PCSOs are not a replacement for the fast-tracking of the part-time reserve?

Mr Goggins: They are not a replacement for police officers; they are an additional resource.

Mr Raymond McCartney: What guarantees are in place to ensure that there will be no political vetting, and who will determine the vetting procedures?

Mr Goggins: The criteria used to assess the suitability of PCSOs will be clearly set out in the regulations. There will be no political involvement in the appointment of those staff. They will be assessed according to their skills and suitability for their role in neighbourhood policing, and normal recruitment procedures will apply.

Mr Raymond McCartney: The Minister said that he envisages that 400 PCSOs will be appointed. Is the money in place for those appointments?

Mr Goggins: Yes, money is available to recruit 400 PCSOs in the first four years. I reiterate that it is not a question of appointing PCSOs to compensate for a reduction in the number of police officers. The Government are not operating under such an equation; PCSOs are an additional resource.

Mr Attwood: The Minister and his officials are welcome. May I ask for some latitude, Chairman, to make one point to the Minister? At last week's meeting of the subgroup, the parties unanimously agreed that any outcomes from ongoing negotiations between the Government and any single political party that were relevant to the business of the subgroup should be brought to its attention. The parties argued for that to happen because the subgroup's terms of reference include the consideration of matters that relate to the devolution of justice and policing, the associated time frame, and so forth.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): Mr Attwood, I want to make it clear that members should focus on today's agenda. The member's point might be appropriate for another meeting. I want to be as liberal as possible and will try to be fair to everybody.

Mr Attwood: My point, which goes beyond liberalism, is that discussions are ongoing. If the outcomes of those discussions are not brought to the attention of the subgroup, it will have difficulty in moving forward on some of the matters that it is entrusted to progress.

The SDLP's view is that one critical issue, regardless of what is, or is not, happening with MI5, is that this subgroup will not have the authority to carry out its business unless issues such as discussions with parties are brought to its attention. Given the speculation about the negotiations around MI5, I ask the British Government to consider very carefully — as the Secretary of State is appearing before the subgroup tomorrow —

Mr Kennedy: Chairman, we are deviating substantially.

1.30pm

The Chairman (Mr Hay): I have already reminded Alex about that. I am trying to be fair to everybody, and it is important that we are fair to the Minister.

Mrs Foster: We could all make political points if we wanted.

Mr Attwood: I am not making a political point; I am making a point that was agreed unanimously by the subgroup.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): Alex, can we get back to the subject?

Mr Attwood: I look forward to hearing from the Secretary of State on that point tomorrow.

I have a number of questions. First, you said that the vetting for PCSOs would be the same, in many respects, as that for regular police officers. Will you confirm that the vetting will be of at least at the standard required for regular police officers in all — not many — respects?

Secondly, you, as Minister, will table legislation in due course legislation. Will you confirm that the work in developing the PCSO model will be led by the Policing Board and the PSNI, assisted by NIO officials and the Government? Two meetings are scheduled, one later this month and one in early February, which will be led by the Board and the PSNI to bring forward details on how PCSOs will actually work. There is a lot of experience in Britain about how they work and we will have to have an appropriate model for our circumstances. In taking this idea forward, it will be important to confirm that the implementation of policing change has, in many regards, been the responsibility of the Board, the PSNI and, where appropriate, the NIO.

I have other questions, but please take those to begin with, Minister.

Mr Goggins: If I came here every time that there was speculation in the press about policing and justice, we would have been seeing a lot of each other recently.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): We take your point.

Mr Goggins: I confirm that the standards of vetting and suitability of PCSOs, particularly in relation to criminal investigations and business interests, will be the same as that for police officers. I am sorry if anything I said cast doubt on that point.

Mr Attwood is absolutely right that the role of the Policing Board is critical. It is carrying out a lot of work, liaising with the operational side of policing and with officials in my Department. The work will, as Alex said, reflect a style of the PCSO that is suitable for Northern Ireland while building on the experience that we are gathering elsewhere. That is a very sensible way to proceed. My job, as Minister, is to make sure the necessary powers are in place. However, developing the model on the operational side is very much based on Policing Board involvement and leadership, and is for the Chief Constable, his officials and my officials to work on.

Mr Attwood: I have two more questions. First, you confirmed that funding over and above the PSNI budget line is in place for the first four years. What happens if the Board and the PSNI agree that, after four years, another 250 PCSOs need to be recruited? That may well be the case depending upon the experience during the first four years. Will that have to be the subject of a fresh bid or will funding have to come from the police budget at that time? Are the Government prepared to consider fresh negotiations on the release of moneys to fund the extra number of PCSOs needed?

Secondly, to go back to Raymond McCartney's question, when the board decided to go ahead with PCSOs it also agreed to proceed with recruitment of part-time reserves in four other areas. Ian Paisley Jnr will remember that.

Mr Goggins: Yes, I can confirm what you have said about funding for PCSOs. It is a case of working out the best and most appropriate model for Northern Ireland.

A fresh funding bid must be made after four years. The initial four-year budget for PCSOs is sufficient, but, beyond that, preparations will have to be made for any fresh funding, because by that time we could be two, or even three, spending reviews on from the current one.

Mr Kennedy: I declare that I am a member of the Northern Ireland Policing Board. Alex did not declare his membership, but I will do so on his behalf. I am friendly like that.

Article 7(2) of the draft Order provides for a proposed new section 30A(2) to be inserted into the Police (Northern Ireland) act 2003, which states that the Chief Constable may designate a person as a PCSO only if he is satisfied that he or she is a "suitable person". Who would be considered an unsuitable person for the position?

Mr Paisley Jnr: Anyone in this room, for instance?

Mr Kennedy: It is a serious question.

Mr Goggins: It is indeed. Anyone with a recent or serious criminal conviction would be an unsuitable candidate for a PCSO position, as would anyone whose conduct, although not criminal, might fall short of what is desirable or acceptable when setting norms and standards in public life and for communities. However, the criteria upon which judgements will be based will be made clear and will be contained in regulations that will be laid when the Order is passed.

In short, we expect PCSOs to be people of high standing, to have an honest background and to be a good calibre of human being.

Mr Kennedy: Thank you, Minister. Will the highly discredited and discriminatory practice of 50:50 recruitment be used in the PCSO recruitment process?

Mr Goggins: As long as 50:50 recruitment operates in Northern Ireland, it will be used for the recruitment of PCSOs. That decision has been subject to a separate consultation on the remaking of powers.

Progress has been made in recent years. A few years ago, there was 8% Catholic representation in the PSNI, but that has risen to 20% representation now. It is hoped that that figure will increase to 30% by 2010 or thereabouts. When that target is achieved, the 50:50 recruitment system will no longer be required, and when it no longer applies for the recruitment of police officers, it will no longer apply for PCSO recruitment.

Mr Kennedy: Minister, do you realise how unpopular the 50:50 recruitment system is viewed, particularly among unionists, who consider the system to be discriminatory. How can you justify its continuing use as a mechanism for the employment of PCSOs?

Mr Goggins: I know that it is an unpopular measure with some sections of the community because representatives from unionist parties and others tell me that regularly. However, I justify its continuation on the grounds that it is transforming the face of policing in Northern Ireland. As I have said, when Patten produced his report, there was an 8% Catholic representation in the police, and that has now climbed to 20%. It is predicted that that percentage will increase to 30% in three years' time. That huge step forward could not have happened without the special arrangements.

When all parties in Northern Ireland actively support the police and encourage people to join the PSNI, and when there is a minimum of 30% Catholic representation, normal procedures will be allowed to take their course. Everyone will be happy when that is the case. I justify the use of the particular recruitment system because of the special and urgent need that existed. The 50:50 recruitment system is having an impact, and I am pleased that helpful progress is taking place.

Mr Kennedy: Minister, you said that there would have to be fresh budget bids after the initial funding period has expired. I am not sure whether you mean that new and separate money will still be made available over and above that which is allocated to the Policing Board, or whomever is in charge.

Are you saying that a portion of money will be kept back and used specifically for that? Alex wondered whether more people would be employed as a result of that. However, on the issue of the basic funding of existing resources at that point, are you still saying that you will treat funding for PCSOs as a separate heading?

Mr Goggins: When the time comes for a comprehensive spending review, all aspects of public services will be examined in great detail. Therefore, if there is a case to be made for increased numbers of PCSOs, that case must be made within the bid that is contained in the review.

Mr Kennedy: I am not talking about additional numbers. I am talking about funding for the employment of PCSOs. Will that continue to be a separate heading and will it be separately funded in the manner in which it will be introduced?

Mr Goggins: It would have a separate heading, but within the overall policing budget.

Mr Kennedy: Would the Policing Board allocate appropriate finance to keep it going?

Mr Goggins: That would be a matter for discussion in the future, but there would have to be a clear bid.

Mr Kennedy: What is your view?

Mr Goggins: I was in the Home Office when PCSOs were first proposed, and, initially, there was great reluctance throughout the country. That attitude was transformed over a short period of time. Pump-priming money to get PCSOs started has come into the mainstream budgets of police forces, and that will be the case here. However, bids for the required level of resources must be made and justified, and I expect that to continue. It is important to emphasise that, at this early stage, we are proposing 400 PCSOs as additional staff, over and above what has already been agreed in the budget.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): Are there any other questions or issues to be clarified?

Ms Stanton: Who will define the criteria for vetting?

Mr Goggins: The criteria will be set out in regulations that will come from the Northern Ireland Office after the draft Order has been passed. There will be complete transparency in that, and those charged with the recruitment process will be required to adhere to those criteria.

Ms Stanton: How will human rights and equality be protected in that process?

Mr Goggins: All proposals in the draft Order have been tested under human rights legislation and have passed with flying colours. No proposals for legislation can be brought forward unless they meet all requirements of human rights legislation. This draft Order fully complies with those.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): Thank you, Minister. We now move on to streamlining of the police trainee recruitment process.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I apologise for being late. I was attending the debate on agriculture in another place, which, as the Minister can appreciate, is important.

Are these provisions not a move away from what Patten recommended, in that there was a deliberate effort to increase the number of part-time reserve officers? That has been limited, and we now have PCSOs.

Article 10 of the draft Order provides for the appointment of constables with special policing skills. That is a lateral entry provision. Will you confirm that the appointment of special constables will not be subject to the 50:50 recruitment process, as it was previously, and that the people who avail themselves of lateral entry will have sufficient skills to address the obvious gaps that have been identified in some areas in detective ability? Those gaps are due to the Patten severance arrangements, the effect of which was to get rid of skilled detectives.

Mr Goggins: Both those measures are sensible, practical changes that are being made to address specific needs that clearly exist. The arrangements for the appointment of constables with special policing skills are outside the 50:50 recruitment requirements. However, it is important that the Chief Constable is able to recruit and deploy staff with the relevant skills and qualifications to ensure that people across Northern Ireland know that the police are working in their communities to overcome criminality. It is important that the Chief Constable has those skills available. Therefore, the introduction of that measure is sensible, as is the streamlining of police trainee recruitment, which will mean that we actually save money. I said before that £0.5 million a year will be saved, with no difference in the end result of who will be appointed as police officers.

1.45 pm

Mr Paisley Jnr: I agree that the measures proposed in article 10 of the draft Order are sensible. Do you have any idea how many constables will be recruited under those measures? Many of those constables will be expatriates who could not get a job in the Police Service here and were recruited by English or Scottish police services, but who would wish to return to Northern Ireland. Do you have any idea how many will return in that way?

Can you also please elaborate on the terms “policing skills” and “specialist skills”? Can you identify where you believe the skills gap exists?

Mr Goggins: I will invite Steven McCourt to comment on the specific skills gaps that may have been identified in the last part of that question.

There are 97 vacancies for detective constables in Northern Ireland at the moment, and it is important that the Chief Constable is able to fill those gaps as soon as possible. We want to help him bring in people with skills and experience, and we can do that by introducing the draft Order.

Mr Steven McCourt (Northern Ireland Office): The criteria for those posts and the definition of “specialist skills” have not been defined in the legislation. It is up to the Policing Board and the Chief Constable to consider which criteria are necessary.

Mrs Foster: Is it up to the Policing Board to decide whether a gap exists that can be filled through the provisions of article 10 of the draft Order? Is that correct?

Mr Goggins: The shortfall that everyone has clearly identified — the Policing Board, the Chief Constable and myself as Minister — is in the detective constable post. That is the first area on which we will want to see movement. However, there may be other gaps in the future, and we want the police to be able to recruit appropriately.

Mr Kennedy: I would like some clarity on that matter. Are you saying that the measures enable the Chief Constable and the Policing Board to resolve the detail of that matter?

Mr Goggins: As I said, that power will be created through the legislation. The only way to be recruited into the PSNI at the moment is through the trainee programme. We want the police to be able to recruit officers above that level, where there is a gap.

We will create that power, but the practice of that power will be a matter, as Steven McCourt has said, for the Policing Board and the Chief Constable.

Mr Paisley Jnr: The draft Order also deals with the important matter of training. There is no doubt that police officers in Northern Ireland are trained to a very high level and, indeed, are subject to a much more extensive training course than their counterparts in other parts of the UK or in other parts of Europe. The Assembly has debated the important matter of the police training college. Are you in a position to say anything more about that or to respond to the issues that were identified in that debate?

Mr Goggins: I regard the resolution of outstanding issues on the financing of a police college as a high priority for the coming weeks. We have examined the projected costs in great detail to ascertain whether it is possible to reduce some of those costs and whether there may be other potential sources of income. It may be possible to develop joint training facilities. My officials are pursuing all of those ideas, and I will be the first to come forward with further details when I am able to do so. However, I have no further details to share this afternoon.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Do you have any idea when you will share that information with us? We all want Christmas to come early on that matter.

Mr Goggins: Christmas came a bit earlier than I was hoping.

Mr Paisley Jnr: It has come and gone.

Mr Goggins: I hope to be able to share some news with members soon.

Mr Raymond McCartney: I wish to return to a question that Ian Paisley Jnr asked. Can you confirm that 50:50 recruitment will not apply to detectives?

Mr Goggins: There will not be 50:50 recruitment of detectives as part of the specific recruitment process that we have been discussing. When the Chief Constable fills those 97 vacancies through recruitment from other UK forces, the 50:50 criteria will not operate. However, that does not affect the existing powers, the renewal of which, as members know, has been subject to consultation regarding the majority who enter through the trainee system or, indeed, new recruits through the PSCOs recruitment scheme.

Mr Raymond McCartney: Has that measure obtained the approval of the Policing Board?

Mr Goggins: That measure has the enthusiastic support of the Policing Board, which understands the need to fill the gap. I am sure that the board will want us to act on that as soon as possible. At the moment, that cannot happen because the law does not allow it. That is why we want to change the law.

Mr Raymond McCartney: Sinn Féin welcomes designation because it makes people accountable to the office of the Police Ombudsman. Which positions are exempt from designation, and why are they exempt? In particular, why is the Historical Enquiries Team (HET) exempt?

Mr Crawford: It is not a question of exemption. The point is that the HET is not directly employed by the PSNI. No specific exemptions are set out in the legislation.

Mr McCourt: Designation relates to five specific categories of designated civilians with limited police powers. Any civilians working for the HET will not be utilising police powers. They will not be designated.

Mr Raymond McCartney: Are members of the HET also exempt?

Mr Crawford: The officers working for HET are agency staff, not designated civilians. They represent a different class of official.

Mr Raymond McCartney: Why is that?

Mr Crawford: It was the quickest and simplest way to get skilled police officers into the HET posts. The draft Order relates to designated civilians generally.

We have not included anything in the draft Order about agency staff because we expect that the use of agency staff will decrease.

Mr Raymond McCartney: Do you expect to designate agency staff, or will they be exempt?

Mr Crawford: We have not looked at that.

Mr McCourt: One can designate civilians only in the five specific categories where the powers that they can exercise have been stipulated in legislation. We are talking about five specific sets of skills.

Mr Goggins: It is worth remembering that no civilian staff are designated at present. The powers are new and will be introduced very carefully.

I will give you a practical example. If the police are investigating fraud, the best people to carry out some of the detailed investigative work that is involved may not be police officers necessarily but those who are skilled in financial accounting and administration. Such people could be designated with certain police powers. For example, they could have the power to seek arrest warrants or action of that kind.

We are seeking to empower appropriately suitable civilian staff who may be working with, and for, the police. We will do that very carefully. We would not give all powers to civilian staff: only certain powers and under very strict conditions.

Mr Raymond McCartney: Could that include scene-of-crime officers?

Mr Crawford: It could, if they are given the powers set out in the draft Order.

Mr Raymond McCartney: Are they exempt now?

Mr Crawford: It is not a case of exemption. It is simply that they are not designated at the moment. In future, it is likely that they would be designated.

Mr Attwood: To make sure that everybody understands what is happening, I have a number of questions concerning the recruitment of officers from outside the PSNI.

First, when the PSNI is recruiting the potentially very small number of people who are needed, will it be able to recruit not just from Britain, but from the Republic of Ireland?

Mr Goggins: Yes.

Mr Attwood: Secondly, will that provision fall after two years unless the Policing Board unanimously agrees it?

Mr Goggins: Yes.

Mr Attwood: Is it the case that the first time the provision was introduced, approximately 18 officers availed of it?

Mr Goggins: Steven McCourt has confirmed the precise number.

Mr Attwood: Is it the case that the majority of the officers who applied under that provision were Catholic?

Mr Goggins: I cannot confirm that, but Steven may be able to.

Mr Attwood: I am stating for the record that of the 18 officers who applied under that provision when it was first introduced, and which consequently expired, the majority were Catholic.

Mr Kennedy: Chairman, could I ask a sensible question? [Laughter.]

Mr Attwood: Some of those matters —

Mr Paisley Jnr: On a point of order, Mr Chairman. Is it appropriate that we reveal the specific religious backgrounds of 18 identifiable officers who are known to have been recruited in a particular way? That is wrong, and the member should be cautious.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): As I have said to Mr Attwood, to be fair to the rest of the members and to the Minister, it is important that we stick to the agenda.

Mr Attwood: I am referring to the agenda. It is on the agenda to discuss the provision to enable recruitment of detectives for short periods.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): You are making an assumption.

Mr Attwood: No, I am not. I am asking questions to get on the record the facts surrounding the first such recruitment — and those are the facts on that recruitment.

I differ with the Minister's view that the board enthusiastically endorsed that measure. The board unanimously endorsed it, because that is the requirement for this variation and because it recognises that there is a shortfall of detectives — not because of severance per se, but, in our view, because of the mismanagement of severance by the former leadership of the police who let too many people go too quickly. However, that is neither here nor there.

Will that provision expire after two years unless the board unanimously asks for it to be extended?

Mr Goggins: Yes.

Mr Attwood: My third question relates to the changes in recruitment procedures governing police support staff. Will the Minister confirm — so that there are no misunderstandings — that rather than everybody being vetted as soon as they get into the applicant pool, only those who come out of that pool will be subjected to vetting and the other standards? That procedure is a consequence of the fact that recruitment has been so successful and that so many applicants have got into the applicant pool.

Unfortunately, however, there are not enough jobs in the PSNI on a year-to-year basis to satisfy all those who have attained the standards of entry to it.

Mr Goggins: I confirm that.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): Mr Kennedy will now ask questions. Unfortunately, I have to leave, as I need to be in another place. My good friend and colleague Mr Dawson will take over. Once again, Minister, you and your officials are extremely welcome.

(The Chairman [Mr Dawson] in the Chair.)

Mr Kennedy: Thank you, Mr Chairman. Mr Attwood referred to the previous arrangement and the 18 appointments that were made. Can the Minister, or any of his officials, confirm whether any of the successful applicants came from the Irish Republic?

Mr Goggins: We cannot confirm that this afternoon. However, I am more than happy to look at that and make sure that every member of the subgroup is aware of the —

Mr Paisley Jnr: None of them came from there; that is just a pedantic point.

Mr Kennedy: Ninety-seven vacancies in the complement of detectives that is available to the Chief Constable is a serious matter. Why have the Government allowed it to happen?

Mr Goggins: It is important to note that the Government have recognised that such a gap requires urgent action. That is why those provisions have been proposed. We do not know why that happened, but it did. We must grasp the nettle and ensure that the Chief Constable is able to recruit the staff that he needs. The important thing is to deal with the problem.

Mr Kennedy: Do the Minister understand the level of concern that there will be once this emerges into the public domain? The Government have somehow allowed the Chief Constable to be deficient of at least 97 detectives at a time when crime is rising.

2.00 pm

Mr Goggins: It is not fair to say that people have sat around and allowed the situation to develop. Recruitment gaps occur in all walks of life and in all elements of the public service. This issue has arisen, and it is important that it is dealt with. That is what we intend to do.

The Chairman (Mr Dawson): Good afternoon Minister.

Mr Paisley Jnr: The issue goes back to article 8 of the draft Order, which deals with recruitment. Under the current arrangements potential recruits must reach an elaborate pool, and once they have been selected for, they are given a medical examination. The potential officer might fail the medical and be out of the process. Would you consider reconfiguring that arrangement? Once a recruit has had a medical they are deemed fit for recruitment and go into the pool.

Mr Goggins: The Government propose a change that is based on the individual having met all the other competencies for recruitment as a police officer. They are established as a member of the pool and must undergo medical and criminal checks to remain a member. That means assessing many people who will not be appointed as police officers. The Government propose the provisional appointment of a police officer from the pool, provided that they satisfy the medical and other tests. If they do not pass those tests, we move on to the next person.

Mr Paisley Jnr: The Minister has identified important issues, but the process is expensive. It costs £12,000 to recruit an individual to the police — that is almost half a new recruit's salary. It costs the Government a great deal of money to get a potential recruit through the process only for that person to fail the medical. The individual will have paid for various aspects of the recruitment process and will have taken time off work — it is a big commitment, and the individual loses financially.

Mr Goggins: Recruiting staff in any public service, including the police, incurs expense. The Government propose a cheaper recruitment process that should save £0.5 million a year; it is a sensible, practical measure. Our proposal will not affect appointments and will make the process less expensive.

The Chairman (Mr Dawson): If members have no further questions on recruitment, we shall move on.

The third issue for discussion is additional powers for the Police Ombudsman and for the police.

Mrs Foster: In his introductory remarks, the Minister mentioned “new and compelling evidence” with regard to the double jeopardy rule and the Police Ombudsman. I read the memorandum but did not see the word “compelling”; the term was “new evidence”. I have concerns about double jeopardy at the best of times; however, who determines that evidence is new and compelling? Does the Police Ombudsman make such a determination or will criteria be laid down about when evidence is to be treated as new and compelling? There should be criteria, not somebody taking a subjective view about whether evidence is new and compelling.

Mr Goggins: The Director of the Public Prosecution Service (PPS) takes the decision. Under the normal provisions of double jeopardy, if the police believe that they have evidence that somebody committed an offence of which they have been acquitted, they must ask the Director of the Public Prosecution Service for permission to reopen the case.

Mrs Foster: Will the Police Ombudsman have to go through that process?

Mr Goggins: The Police Ombudsman will have to tell the Director of the Public Prosecution Service that she has new evidence and that the investigation should be reopened. The Ombudsman will have to persuade the Director of the Public Prosecution Service that the evidence is sufficient to warrant a reopening.

Of course people were concerned that introducing the new rules on double jeopardy would mean that the police would forever want to reopen investigations, rather than accept that the case could not be proved. Therefore there has to be that high hurdle; the PPS has to be satisfied that there is sufficient new evidence. There are reservations about that. However, I am sure that everyone will be pleased that, the availability of new DNA evidence means that a number of people who committed grave crimes, such as rape, and rape involving young children, can now be prosecuted, even though they were previously acquitted. That is only right. That may affect only a small number of cases, but where the evidence is available, it should be possible to reopen the investigation.

Mrs Foster: As in everything, there must be balance, and this is about a balance of rights. People should not be open to reinvestigation for years and years, but, if something is starkly wrong, reinvestigation is right.

Mr Goggins: It is also important to remember that it must be a serious matter. It has to involve a serious criminal matter, and that applies to the Police Ombudsman as well. A request can be made only in relation to a serious criminal matter.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Following up on that, is the definition of “new evidence”, therefore, evidence that has never previously been relied upon in a previous investigation or trial? Is that correct?

Mr Goggins: It has to be new evidence. It could be that the evidence existed before, but that the means were not then available to interpret it in a way that was helpful.

Mr Paisley Jnr: That would definitely make it new, so I accept that.

Mr Goggins: For example, an item of clothing that existed during the first investigation, but that can now be subjected to new DNA tests, may be able to reveal evidence the relevance of which was not then recognised. It was not as significant then as it is now, since new technology can enable us to interpret it more effectively. It has to be new in that sense. It cannot just be a regurgitation of old evidence.

Mr Paisley Jnr: The Minister will be aware that prior to establishment of the Criminal Cases Review Commission — the body that now sends cases back for appeals after there has been a trial — the Home

Secretary had the power to do that if fresh factors for new evidence were brought to his attention. Obviously, that was a very high threshold to attain. Is the Minister saying that that definition of “new evidence” is within that threshold? Is that what he means by “new evidence”?

Mr Goggins: It cannot be just a fresh look at all the evidence that was considered before. If that evidence was looked at, and the person was acquitted, that is that. The evidence has to be new. Indeed, that is true of cases considered by the Criminal Cases Review Commission, and it would be the case here. However, it is important to recognise a subtle distinction: the evidence may have already existed, but it was not possible to interpret it because DNA had not been analysed. Interpretation of DNA now means we can get more out of that evidence than was the case before. In such cases, the evidence reveals something new.

Mrs Foster: Will the Minister clarify that? It is sometimes argued that the evidence was there but that it was not brought forward, or that it was not argued strongly enough, or that it was not given due weight. Do those arguments not constitute new evidence?

Mr Goggins: That would not be new evidence.

Mr Raymond McCartney: As the Minister will be aware, the genesis of the draft Order was the consultation paper, to which Sinn Féin made a submission raising concerns, including, in particular, those about increased powers. One was on the lowering of the reasonable suspicion for the seizure of documents or electronic records. The second was about the 28-day detention period. In the light of that submission and of concerns raised by other people, have those reservations been taken account of?

Mr Goggins: The 28 days is in relation to the terrorism legislation, rather than the draft Order. Clearly, 28 days is the current position, although there are reviews of terrorism legislation. No doubt the issue will keep coming up for public and parliamentary debate.

As to powers to seize documents, that is obviously a matter to be approached carefully. We cannot simply have police officers going willy-nilly into people’s property, into their houses and business premises and removing items at will. However, where an officer has a reasonable suspicion that certain documents contain evidence that could sustain a prosecution of a serious matter, he needs to be able to access them, and — if it takes some considerable time to analyse the documents — to remove them, initially for 48 hours, and, by extension, for up to 96 hours.

The information may be on the hard drive of a computer or on extensive files. Sometimes it is necessary to remove files to examine them carefully, but that must be done proportionately. Any instance when evidence is taken away must be properly recorded, and, indeed, items that are subject to legal privilege are exempt from that. Therefore although there are safeguards, if it is strongly suspected that documents contain information, the Government believe that the police should have the power to remove those documents and to examine them thoroughly.

Mr Raymond McCartney: My party welcomes the increased powers for the office of the Police Ombudsman. The Minister will also be aware that the office has been given the power, on the direction of the Public Prosecution Service, to investigate misconduct by PSNI officers. In the light of recent criticism by the judiciary of the way in which some investigations were conducted, is the Minister aware of any referrals by the Public Prosecution Service to the Office of the Police Ombudsman?

Mr Goggins: Do you mean in relation to the double jeopardy rule?

Mr Raymond McCartney: No, just with regard to the general principle.

Mr Goggins: I cannot comment on specific cases that might have been referred.

Mr Raymond McCartney: My final question is on the collection of DNA and fingerprints from children. Is the Minister aware of the numbers of such cases and whether there is a procedure to destroy them, should it not be necessary to retain them?

Mr Goggins: Unless Robert Crawford has an accurate figure, I am happy to send the subgroup the exact numbers. I realise that a difficult judgement must be made with regard to children. However, children can sometimes do dreadful things. Having the fingerprints of a child who has committed a serious crime may solve that crime. I have spoken to the Chief Constable about that important matter, which he treats very seriously indeed. Nonetheless, if such information is available and a prosecution can be mounted for a serious crime, that is a proportionate response. However, the Chief Constable deals with the matter very carefully.

Mr Attwood: I want to revisit the issue of police powers. We share a sense that some of the past architecture of the legislation on terror offences in the North has been recreated. My party is concerned about the proposal to retain one-judge courts and about how that may develop.

I would like clarification on the police's power to examine documents. Take the example of a police officer who enters a premises to carry out a legal search and remove a document because he has a reasonable suspicion about that document. Can an officer remove such a document for further examination only when he has reasonable suspicion about it? That is what the Minister indicated. My understanding of the legislation is that a constable's powers will be much wider than that.

Mr Goggins: Let me ask Robert to clarify the details.

Mr Crawford: Reasonable suspicion is required under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, but it is not required in such a case.

Mr Kennedy: It is difficult to hear the witness.

Mr Crawford: Sorry, I will speak up a little. Reasonable suspicion is not required in that case because the purpose of the power is to allow a police officer to examine documents to determine whether he or she should have reasonable suspicion that they could be evidential or whether they contain information that would allow them to be seized under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. That is why the power is restricted to a specific time.

An example might be the seizure of complex financial records in a serious crime case, such as fraud, where it may not be immediately apparent to a police officer during a lawful search that the information could be evidential. The officer would still have to justify and substantiate his reasons for seizing documents. It is important to stress that the officer would also be accountable to the Police Ombudsman for his actions.

Mr Goggins: I want to clarify my remarks because it may be helpful to Alex. In practice, a police officer must have a reasonable suspicion that if he or she were to examine documents, he or she would find evidence in them that a crime has been committed. That is the accurate position, which is slightly different from that which I first intimated.

Police officers cannot go round seizing documents willy-nilly. There has to be a rationale behind their actions; they must be able to justify their suspicions.

2.15 pm

Mr Attwood: I appreciate that, but my understanding of the proposal is not the Minister's understanding. My understanding is that any officer would be able to enter a house and seize any document about which he has suspicions. That officer could, for example, seize a document simply because it is in a foreign language — or not even in a foreign language, but in another language; documents in a house in west Belfast could be in Irish, or, in a house in the Shankill, in Ulster Scots. Of course, if it turns out subsequently that there is something in that document, the officer can pursue the matter in the appropriate way. However, the provisions outlined in the draft Order would allow an officer to seize a document simply because he does not understand the language in which it is written. That raises the concern that the power could be interpreted so widely that officers will have a licence to do what they want when carrying out a lawful search of a house. The draft Order outlines the process that an officer must follow in order to satisfy himself after the event, but there is no standard as regards what happens at the time of the event. That is not a healthy way forward.

Mr Goggins: I do not think that we are a million miles apart. Mr Attwood says that the officer must have a suspicion; I say that that officer must act reasonably at all times, so it must be a reasonable suspicion that something in the document may give rise to the suspicion that an offence may have taken place or is about to take place. In practice, what matters is that we have a memorandum of operation that governs the actions of police officers so that they act proportionately and reasonably.

Mr Attwood: Is that provision currently reflected in British legislation governing England and Wales?

Mr Goggins: It is not; this provision is specific to Northern Ireland and reflects the ongoing need to ensure that we can deal with any situations that may arise.

Mr Attwood: Does that mean that we have a provision in the North that does not apply in England and Wales?

Mr Goggins: That is right.

Mr Attwood: Does that mean that an officer in the Metropolitan Police must have reasonable suspicion before he removes any documents during a search of premises, but, according to the Minister's interpretation of the provision, a PSNI officer would not have the same requirements placed upon his shoulders when carrying out a search of a house in the North. The terrorist legislation here is being repealed, yet this new Order is now being introduced. Why is the North being treated differently from England or Wales?

Mr Goggins: It is true that the Government have clearly had to strengthen UK-wide terrorist legislation and introduce new and more powers across the whole of the United Kingdom at a time when the security situation in Northern Ireland has been improving. We have therefore been in a position to reduce the level of terrorist legislation in Northern Ireland, which is why Part VII of the Terrorism Act 2000 will cease to have effect in July of next year. Nonetheless, we have thought this through very carefully, and we still feel that certain powers are needed to reflect the specific circumstances of Northern Ireland.

Mr Attwood: This is an important question. The terror legislation that was introduced in respect of international threat applies in Northern Ireland as it does in England and Wales.

The Minister outlined that paramilitary violence in the North is changing, to the extent that the Government are getting rid of some of the architecture of past terrorism, such as anti-terrorism legislation and non-jury courts. At a time when those measures are being removed, why are the Government according even greater powers to a police officer who enters premises to seize any document that he might want? That is inconsistent; there is tension between the Minister's analysis of what is happening in the North and his analysis of how the North compares to Britain.

Mr Goggins: I thought that I had made it clear, Mr Chairman, that although the situation is improving, the remaining threat must be treated seriously. Whether the threat relates to the investigation of bomb-making equipment or to the underlying organised criminality that may fund the remaining elements of a potential terrorist attack in Northern Ireland, the Government consider it necessary to give those powers to the police. The threat is diminishing, but it is still there, and the police must have the powers to deal with it. That is the Government's analysis of the situation, which is why we are introducing those powers.

However, that does not alter the fact that Northern Ireland is moving in the right direction on matters of security and towards a more peaceful society.

The Chairman (Mr Dawson): To be fair to other members who have been patient, we must move on.

Mr Kennedy: The Police Ombudsman's role will now include the investigation of police officers who were acquitted previously of an offence in cases where there is new evidence — again, the absence of the word “compelling” raises concern. Is there any timescale for such investigations or any time limits within which a former officer could be accused of, or charged with, any such offence?

Mr Goggins: There are no time limits. The question is whether there is new evidence. I must check, Mr Chairman, whether the word “compelling”, which is so ingrained in my consciousness, is used. As I explained to the subgroup earlier, my baptism as a Minister was when I was involved with the Criminal Justice Act 2003, and the words “new” and “compelling” are etched in my mind for ever.

The evidence must be new and sufficiently compelling to persuade the PPS that a particular case needs to be reopened. Therefore, in practice, the evidence will have to be new and compelling. That is my defence.

Mr Kennedy: Will that be written into law?

Mr Goggins: I will need to check the precise wording. The key word is “new”, but unless the evidence is also compelling, the case would not be reopened.

Mr Kennedy: Will the Minister check the precise wording and confirm that to the subgroup?

Mr Goggins: Yes.

The Chairman (Mr Dawson): As there are no further questions, I thank the Minister and his officials for coming to today's meeting. The subgroup appreciates his giving of his time. Perhaps members could have been a little tougher on him, but they were quite lenient, which is appreciated.

The Minister has promised to come back to the subgroup on some matters, and members look forward to receiving that information.

Mr Goggins: My officials and I will get a note to the subgroup as soon as we can.

The Chairman (Mr Dawson): That is appreciated. The subgroup will meet tomorrow at 12.00 noon.

Adjourned at 2.23 pm.

The subgroup met at 12.03pm.

(The Chairman (Mr William Hay) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Hay): I remind members and the public that the subgroup is now in open session.

I welcome the Secretary of State to this meeting of the subgroup. I know that you came at very short notice to be with us. There was certainly a clear consensus in the subgroup that you should be here to discuss with us your letter of 28 December 2006, which we recognise is on a very important subject.

We will allow you a few minutes for introductory remarks, and the parties will then have five or six minutes each to ask whatever questions that they feel are necessary. I also welcome your officials, and I thank you all very much for coming.

Mr Peter Hain (The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland): Mr Chairman, thank you. I am grateful for the opportunity to talk to the subgroup. Hilary Jackson and Rachel Miller have come along to help me to answer any question that you might try to trip me up with.

Given that this is the first opportunity that I have had to address an Assembly subgroup since David Ervine's death, I want to place on record at the beginning that I think his death is a tragic blow, not just to his family obviously, and to him, but to the whole of Northern Ireland's political culture. He was an invaluable part of that, and he helped to make the transition that we have seen put into effect. The best way in which we could salute his memory is to restore the Government here in Stormont on 26 March.

I would like to, if I may, correct a basic misunderstanding that I have detected in some of the public comments made by some MLAs on what the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006 actually means. When people talk about postponement of restoration on 26 March, or of the election, or a combination of both, they misunderstand the legislation. The legislation leaves no discretion for changing those dates. On 30 January there will be a dissolution of Stormont under the legislation either to have an election on 7 March, followed by a restoration on 26 March, or to close Stormont down for goodness knows how many years. It is a very clear choice — devolution on 26 March or dissolution. The legislation leaves no scope for any other option.

Since the subgroup invited me — and I thank it again for doing so — I shall address briefly one or two points about policing and justice. In particular, I shall discuss the letter that I sent to the subgroup over the Christmas break.

First, it is clear to me that all the major parties in the Assembly are committed to the principle of the devolution of policing and justice. Indeed, much is made in public debate about the DUP's position, and I shall quote from the paper that the party sent to the subgroup:

"However, the DUP has consistently indicated its support in principle for the devolution of policing and justice".

Therefore there is no party that does not agree with the Government that this is the desirable way to go in the future. Everybody wants the model for selecting the justice Minister, or Ministers, to be capable of commanding confidence right across the communities. There is no point in proceeding in any other way. The question of policing, justice, and the rule of law is so important and so sensitive that it must have cross-community support.

It remains my hope that the parties will be able to come to an agreement on the type of model that best meets Northern Ireland's needs. The paper was intended to aid the discussions that the subgroup was having on that model. It was also intended that it would set out a particular model, which, on the basis of the discussions I have had with the parties, is capable of meeting the concerns and aspirations of everybody who is represented at Stormont. Essentially, the proposal is that the long-term model for devolved policing and justice will be a single elected justice Minister in a single Department.

However, to ensure that there is a full sense of cross-community confidence in the new arrangements, I also propose that, at least in the early stages and years, the Minister should be supported by a deputy Minister. Those Ministers — a justice Minister and a deputy justice Minister, one from each of the two largest designations — will be elected by the Assembly on a cross-community basis before d'Hondt is run. Other Ministers, of course, would be appointed and would have been appointed in the likely time frame beforehand.

All those arrangements would be subject to review by the Assembly by 2011 in the way that has been set out by the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006. My intention in putting forward this proposal was to provide a focus for discussions in the hope that it would enable the parties to reach agreement on the model for appointing a justice Minister or Ministers. That remains my hope. It is my overwhelming preference that the model decided upon is determined by the subgroup and endorsed by the Assembly, in whatever form, and beyond that by the Programme for Government Committee.

In the event that agreement cannot be reached, the second preference is to have that model, or an alternative that the subgroup may wish to advise me on, and then to legislate to provide for either of those as the option that the Assembly could adopt. A variety of vehicles can facilitate that legislation. One could be by way of a Government amendment to the Justice and Security (Northern Ireland) Bill, which is currently before Parliament and which is due to go into Committee in the House of Commons at a later date.

In order to introduce the amendment while that Bill, if that is the chosen vehicle, is before the Commons, it would be my intention to make any necessary amendment either in the Committee Stage itself or at the Commons Report Stage, which could happen either at the end of January or in early February. It is important, therefore, that I know as a matter of some urgency what the subgroup's views are, so that I can take the necessary action and, hopefully, proceed to operate by consensus.

I know that there was concern about my issuing the letter to the subgroup during the Christmas break, but I did that because of our deadline. I appreciate that in normal circumstances it would not be ideal to raise such a significant matter during a break or recess, but I am sure that members will understand that the importance of the issue and the desire to reach a consensus was such that it was important for them to have an opportunity to look at the letter as early as possible.

I have read and heard all sorts of things about me imposing or forcing a justice Minister down the throats of the Assembly after it had been functioning for over a year — because it could only happen then. That would be a constitutional nonsense; it would not happen. That is not what I have got in mind. I intend to proceed by consensus. However, as the letter and associated model made clear, if there is wilful obstruction of the process, we will have to look at another way.

The idea that I would impose a Minister from any particular party and stuff that Minister down the throats of the Assembly — especially in such a sensitive area — is ludicrous and is a constitutional nonsense. I look forward to the subgroup's conclusions, which I understand intends to produce by 17 January. Given our timetable, that would be helpful.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): Thank you, Secretary of State. I remind members that the Secretary of State has to leave at 1.00 pm. I will call parties in alphabetical order.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Secretary of State, I welcome you to the subgroup's meeting. May I also take this opportunity to express the DUP's concern for the family of Mr Ervine. It is important that that is done.

Secretary of State, given that you do not have much time, I will cut to the chase. You said that there are twin pillars in the process. It is obvious that the Democratic Unionist Party has measured up and has not been found wanting in areas relating to power sharing. It is equally obvious that, to date, there has not been sufficient delivery on policing and support for the rule of law and the police from Sinn Féin. If that support is not delivered, the process will collapse. Make no mistake about it; if it does collapse, it will do so because of Sinn Féin's failure to live up to what it has got to do.

There are other issues, such as financial arrangements, that must be addressed by yourself and the Government. However, when all is cut and dried, there are twin pillars in the process, and Sinn Féin has not yet been able to support law and order. I repeat the view that you stated earlier: this is about delivery. There will be no progress until we get delivery from Sinn Féin.

I welcome the clarity of some of your comments, but I want to tease out some of the issues that are important to the DUP. Your paper was not helpful to this discussion. This morning, you said that your paper would aid a discussion and provide focus. If it has done that, fair enough. However, the details of the paper have not been helpful.

As you know, some people, in a juvenile way, have tried to make politics from your paper by suggesting that it was cobbled together in a dark, non-smoke-filled room — as the legislation now dictates — between the Democratic Unionist Party, Sinn Féin and the Government. I want you to confirm that my party did not play any part in such a conspiracy. I do not believe that such a conspiracy existed, and to play politics with such an important issue — as has been done in the weeks up to this discussion — has been unhelpful.

Turning to the main proposal, will you confirm that you have no plans, now or in the future, to change what is known as the triple lock in the Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 2006? Will you also confirm — and I believe you already have in your opening comments — that you will not impose a justice Minister over the heads of the people? As you said, it would be a constitutional nonsense — it would not work. We must refocus on realisable and realistic discussions. As you know, the DUP produced a detailed paper, which, although not the be-all and end-all of political papers, was put forward for discussion, and discussions should emerge from it. I hope that we can get back to that urgently.

12.15 pm

Mr Hain: I welcome those points. I noted four, and I hope that that is all of them. First, I welcome the fact that you and Dr Paisley have said that the DUP will not be found wanting, either on the issue of devolution of policing and justice and the time frame, or on the principle of power sharing, subject to —

Mr Paisley Jnr: Secretary of State, let us not get into the time frame.

Mr Hain: May I answer your points, and then, by all means, you can come back to me?

Mr Paisley Jnr: Your boss did this yesterday. Let us not put words into people's mouths on the time frame.

Mr Hain: I am not trying to put words into people's mouths. I have just taken your phrase about not being found wanting, provided that the second pillar of the St Andrews process — delivery on policing and the rule of law — is agreed. To be fair to Sinn Féin, the ardhomhairle, which met a little while ago, was crystal clear about wanting to take things forward. I understand that there are discussions going on within Sinn Féin and its appropriate decision-making bodies to take that forward. I am convinced that there is a desire in the Sinn Féin leadership, as there is in the DUP leadership, to make this process work and to have restoration on 26 March 2007, with the twin pillars of power sharing and support for policing and the rule of law in place.

As to whether there was some kind of conspiracy, I agree with you, Ian, that there was no conspiracy between the DUP, the Government and Sinn Féin. In the unlikely event of that being possible, it would be an interesting scenario. There was no such conspiracy. We looked at the DUP's paper, which was welcome, and we looked at the proposals from parties, including Sinn Féin, the SDLP and others, and we tried to distil from those contributions the model that we thought would fly best. That is the model that we have given to the subgroup.

The triple lock is so called because, first, the Assembly would have to decide on a cross-community basis to receive the devolution of justice and policing powers; secondly, the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, or perhaps the other way round, would have to table a motion to the Assembly; and thirdly, Parliament would have to vote for it. That procedure is set out in the Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 2006, and there is no proposal to change that, so it remains, as you put it, in place.

I have said what I have to say about imposition, and I am glad that that has been welcomed. I will try to explain why we have included that proposal. First, the statement on that is a further expression of the commitment that both Governments gave in paragraph 11 of the St Andrews Agreement. That states:

“default by any one of the parties following restoration of the Executive should not be allowed to delay or hinder political progress in Northern Ireland.”

In other words, if there were wilful obstruction, on an unreasonable basis, we would have to find an alternative way forward. I said that, in part, as an inducement for there to be no wilful obstruction by anybody of progress on this agenda. All parties are committed to the principle of the devolution of policing and justice — I quoted earlier from the DUP paper, for example — so it is just a fallback mechanism in case of gratuitous or wilful obstruction, it is an inducement to not do that.

I will describe some of the circumstances in which it might be necessary for the Secretary of State to have such a power available. I should add that we do not intend to exercise that power when we put this amendment before Parliament; it would be exercised in the event of a crisis that occurred well into the life of the Assembly. The Government have set a time frame for May 2008; we want the devolution of policing and justice to have taken place by then.

However, let us suppose, for example, that the Assembly chose a Minister in the way that I have suggested, or in an alternative agreed fashion put forward by this subgroup, but that that candidate's party leader tried — unreasonably — to block the appointment. Alternatively, the Assembly could decide that an appointment from a party outside the Executive, such as the Alliance Party, was desirable, or the Assembly could take the view that a distinguished person from outside the Assembly and who was acceptable to all the parties, should be the justice Minister in the early years of devolution. All of those ideas have been floated in recent months; ours is a proposal to try to break a possible deadlock on the issue. I hope that that clarification has been helpful, to Ian Paisley Jnr and to the subgroup.

Mrs Foster: There has been a lot of talk about wilful obstruction, which is a new term of art for us today. What do you mean by wilful obstruction? Is it when one party will not engage in the discussion, or is it something else? If, in your view, that wilful obstruction has taken place, can you see circumstances in which the triple lock, as we call it — the Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 2006 — would be changed?

Mr Hain: I see no circumstances in which the Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 2006 would be changed. All the parties, including the DUP, agree on the principle; the objective is clear. I am trying to envisage circumstances in which, despite that, there was wilful obstruction of the process and I might have to introduce fresh legislation to take those powers.

For the reasons that I have described, that is not what I want to do. However, there may be a lack of trust between the parties, either on the ability to deliver power sharing to which all the parties are committed, or on the willingness to deliver — and I stress deliver — support for policing and the rule of law.

If, following the ardchomhairle — to which all parties are committed in principle — that distrust poisoned the atmosphere, and wilful obstruction made it more difficult to implement what everybody is agreed on, those powers might be necessary; but that is well down the track. Let us try to achieve consensus, which is by far the best option.

Mr G Kelly: I welcome the Secretary of State, and I wish to put on record my personal condolences to David Ervine's family.

The DUP went straight to the blame game. The Secretary of State was asked here to discuss this model. There was a lot of discussion about whether he had the right to put it forward. Personally, I do not care. If the man or woman on the street — or anywhere else — has a model that will help us to move on, it is the job of the PFG to get that model.

I welcome the fact that we have another model to discuss. It is up to us. Part of our job was to produce a model. The difficulty is that this is 9 January; we have been given an extension until 17 January; but we have not reached agreement. We have very little time. If we fail, what are we to do? However, I want to move on.

In the previous PFG meeting we argued over whether this paper should be submitted. Let us get down to dealing with the details involved in this model, whether it is a Sinn Féin model, an SDLP model or a DUP model. Let us try to reach some sort of conclusion.

Frankly, it is about vetoes. There is a point at which it is OK for the DUP to say that it is a devolutionist party — its members say that ad nauseam. However, there is no evidence of that on the issue of the devolution of policing and justice. They talk about several lifetimes, or about putting it off for ever.

That does not signify a belief that a transfer or devolution should take place. We need an indication that that will happen, and if it does not, we need to find a way for it to happen. It might be through that letter, or by another method, but we need to find a way to assure the people of our community that they will be in charge of the democratic accountability of a police service that will hopefully serve them.

Referring to the paragraph in the letter that deals with the transfer, I am keen — probably in contrast to the DUP — that the British Secretary of State remains adamant that we find some way to make sure that policing and justice are transferred in this lifetime and not after several lifetimes. In other words, I want him to make a firm commitment to do that, whether it needs legislation. That is my first question.

Mr Hain: First, I agree with the substance of both your points. There is a short time frame, and that is why we must get our skates on. Mr Chairman, the earlier that I receive feedback from this subgroup, the better. That will be invaluable, because we have already started drafting and thinking about what a possible amendment to the Justice and Security (Northern Ireland) Bill might look like.

We will proceed with that legislative amendment, preferably by agreement, but if not, then necessarily by our best call of where we think consensus lies. I have called it as best I can in my paper on where I think consensus lies, but I genuinely would welcome cross-party agreement. If we get that, we will legislate accordingly.

Furthermore, it is important that there is clarity about the model so that we can make the necessary preparation for devolution. That is very important in every respect. On the time frame, both Governments' positions are very clear. We want devolution of policing and justice to be achieved by May 2008. That is why the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006 places a duty on the Assembly to report to the Secretary of State by 27 March 2008 on where things stand. That is very clear. That is the course on which we are set, and we hope that that will be achievable. Provided that there is the necessary delivery on policing and that all parties support policing and the rule of law, I — and the Prime Minister — believe that the timetable is achievable. The Prime Minister made an assessment last week, which was welcomed by the leader of the DUP, in which he said that the timetable was achievable.

Therefore we can find words and opportunities to poke each other in the eye and to disagree with each other, but the big prize here is a fantastic prize, which is making what happens in this Building work. It means that decisions will be made by all of you rather than by me. That is in our reach across the policy board and on the issue of policing and justice as well.

Mr G Kelly: Further to that, different sections of our community clearly have huge issues of trust. On that basis, Sinn Féin has argued that we need strong cross-community safeguards. Indeed, every aspect of the Good Friday Agreement argues for those safeguards. We have argued that the first sitting of an Assembly should introduce a model for ministerial oversight, at least in the short-term.

I know that the model that you have put forward is for a justice Minister and a deputy justice Minister. Sinn Féin, on the other hand, argues for a model that accepts two justice Ministers of equal authority, because we believe, and indeed all parties believe and argue, that that will clearly be an issue of deep worry.

Sinn Féin has argued that a model be agreed in the first sitting of the Assembly. We want strong cross-community safeguards that are consistent with the Good Friday Agreement to be included in that model. We have also argued for shared ministerial oversight, which would deal with the trust deficit — at least in the meantime — because at some point we will need to leave the issue of trust behind and instead rely on the fact that, in its absence, we can have agreements and contracts that people will stick to instead.

Therefore is there any reason for your going for a justice Minister and a deputy justice Minister instead of having two co-equal Ministers?

12.30 pm

Mr Hain: I have received two broad propositions from a variety of parties. The first, which Mr Kelly has today confirmed as Sinn Féin's preference, is to have two Ministers who would have joint status and be equal in every respect. The other is for a single justice Minister. However, given the lack of trust and the sensitivity that exists over this matter, it would probably be best to have a Minister from both the major communities — at least in the early years and, probably, during the first term of the Assembly, which would run to 2011. Of course, the length of the term would be for the Assembly to decide.

However, the deputy justice Minister would not — as it were — make the tea and do the photocopying; the deputy Minister would have, in every respect, a senior post and the share of responsibilities would be agreed between the Minister, the deputy Minister and the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. The deputy justice Minister would be invited to sit on the Executive and would have a genuinely important role.

The reason for not having two justice and policing Ministers — or whatever their final title may be — is that they would be dealing with an independent judiciary, an independent Director of Public Prosecutions, and the independent Police Service of Northern Ireland, which, through its procedures, is more accountable than other police force anywhere in the world. The idea that there would be, as it were, two Ministers to whom the Chief Constable would have to report equally would be a recipe for stalemate and logjam. It would be much better to proceed on the basis of a justice Minister and a deputy justice Minister. However, if there were a justice Minister and a deputy justice Minister, the deputy justice Minister would have a significant influence, and that would be recognised.

Mr Attwood: I also extend my condolences to Jeanette Ervine, her children and the wider Ervine family on David's death.

I welcome the Secretary of State. In one way, I welcome his paper because we needed a kick up our collective arses — and some arses, in particular, need a kick. The paper concentrates minds on the big issue when perhaps they were not so concentrated before. However, I have some problems — as, I am sure, the Secretary of State can imagine.

If the Secretary of State were to step back from this issue — obviously, there are a lot of politics around the devolution of justice — does he not find it ironic that, although the DUP will not give a date for the devolution of justice, Sinn Féin could be on the Policing Board tomorrow, with a lot more power over policing matters than a devolved Minister would ever have? Is it not ironic that Sinn Féin has made an issue of the devolution of justice, when any policing Minister would have a lot less power than a Sinn Féin member of the Policing Board? Does the Secretary of State not think that when we step back from this issue — regardless of the politics and profile surrounding it — it is ironic that the Policing Board, the Police Ombudsman, and the PSNI will continue to hold the powers over policing, and that those powers will not fall to a policing Minister?

Mr Hain: I find many things that are said in debates, or through points or postures from various party spokespersons, ironic. Of course, I could not possibly say that of anyone in the SDLP — that would be an outrageous suggestion.

I do not want to single out individual parties on this issue, however, Mr Attwood made an important point and, if I am right, Mark Durkan also made the point eloquently in the House of Commons a few weeks ago. A lot of power has already been devolved to the Policing Board and district policing partnerships. It would be an act of monumental folly if the whole process fell through due to the de jure completion of devolution of policing while forgetting the practical devolution of policing that has already happened. Should all the parties want to take their seats on the Policing Board they would find that the power there is quite significant.

Policing Board members have, in a sense, more influence than the Secretary of State over the Chief Constable in operational matters. That is, and has been, the situation for a number of years. Mr Attwood makes a powerful point.

Mr Attwood: Thank you for that. Your paper states that the deputy justice Minister will have lead responsibility. However, is it not the case that, as with any other junior Minister in the Assembly appointed under the Northern Ireland Act 1998, the deputy justice Minister will be subject to the direction and control of the justice Minister?

It would be interesting to hear if the Secretary of State intends to table legislation that will vary the powers of deputy, or junior, Ministers, or if the powers of the deputy justice Minister will be subject to the direction and control of the senior justice Minister and, ultimately, subject to agreement regarding those powers by the First Minister and Deputy First Minister and the justice Minister.

Secondly, if a party were to decide to go for the justice Ministry under the 50:50:50 cross-community voting model, which some people claim is consistent with the Good Friday Agreement but which is not, would that party have to make that Ministry its first pick? If a party is entitled to more than one Ministry could it choose the one it wants and try to opt for the justice Ministry later?

Thirdly, people say that there is tension between the Secretary of State's assertion that, at the moment, there are no circumstances in which the Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 2006 legislation — the triple lock — would be changed, and his assertion that he might legislate to take certain powers to himself to enable the appointment of justice Minister. Some people would say that that is a bit like riding two horses — that the triple lock exists but that it can be taken away.

The SDLP would be delighted if the Secretary of State removed the triple lock because it was never justified. How can he convince the members of the subgroup that there is no tension between those assertions?

Mr Hain: I formed my conclusions about a deputy justice Minister as a result of discussions with the parties. Although provision for junior Ministers already exists, I did not think that it was a helpful prefix in the context of a deputy justice Minister because we are talking about a person who would be of equal status, more or less, to a Minister. Such a provision would need to be made through the amendment that I intend to make because the deputy justice Minister would not be like a junior Minister. We need to examine the issue together and, if we proceed with this model, Chairman, the subgroup's views would be extremely welcome. The matter would be subject to agreement between the justice Minister, the deputy justice Minister and the First Minister and Deputy First Minister. We could proceed by consensus.

The position of justice Minister is an important post; it is a most sensitive area, as is shown by the number of problems that we have had over the past few weeks and months. I have outlined the way that we were planning to proceed.

Another important point is where the appointment of a Minister for justice and policing would fit into the d'Hondt sequence. As with the other alternative models that are provided for in the Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 2006, the appointment will be made outside the d'Hondt arrangements and before ministerial appointments are made. The Minister will be chosen by the Assembly on the cross-community 50:50:50 process that we have suggested. The party from which the justice Minister is chosen will have that office count towards its total number of ministerial seats under the d'Hondt formula, but it will not affect its first choice. If a Member from party X were chosen as the Minister for justice and policing, and that party were already in the Executive and was entitled to more than one ministerial post, its first choice would be unaffected, and the Minister for justice and policing would count as its second or third choice, depending upon which party it was.

I have been asked about the triple lock. That is provided for in the legislation. Parliament has decided that, and there is no proposal to change that, as I said to Mr Paisley at the beginning. I am trying to find a way forward. In the event of having to find a solution, I have signalled that it would be my intention, or the intention of the person occupying my position, to legislate to find a solution in the way that I have described, particularly in respect of some of the options that I have described, including a person outside the Executive, a person from a party outside the Executive, a person outside the Assembly, or some other kind of circumstance. If we did not have a logjam and a deadlock, created by an inability to find consensus here, we would not have to use legislation to find a solution.

Mr Kennedy: I also express my condolences to the Ervine family.

Secretary of State, both your letter and your model are being added to almost daily. On behalf of the Ulster Unionist Party, I must state that we feel that the process that you are engaged in undermines not only the work of this subgroup, but that of the Policing Board. Furthermore, it contaminates the political system. The party is concerned at the continued emergence of side deals and details.

This very day, there is an indication that the Prime Minister will be making a major statement, or issuing something tomorrow, on the role of MI5. The subgroup is unaware of the detail or content of that. That is how you are conducting business. You have even moved the goalposts in your model this morning. You now indicate that the deputy Minister for justice will, in effect, have equal status, which is not stated in your letter or in the model outlined on 28 December. It appears that you are searching about for anything that will give you a political lifeboat, and that is an unsatisfactory way to do business.

I have a number of questions for you, Secretary of State. Your letter reads:

"If that agreement cannot be achieved, however, the model as described in the attached paper is the basis on which I will legislate"

You have said that that might not be the most desirable position, but that you will clearly proceed on that basis and that if you do not enforce a Minister, you will certainly enforce the model. That would presumably include the devolution of policing to the Assembly by May 2008.

12.45 pm

Can you confirm whom you have been talking to in your discussions, which political parties you have spoken to and which, if any, have agreed to this model or these proposals? Have you had discussions with any parties in relation to the need for you to appoint a Minister for justice?

There was confusion again yesterday when articles by the Prime Minister were published in various well-known newspapers indicating that it was his view that the leader of the DUP had given an indication and had agreed a timetable for devolution of policing and justice. Is that your understanding? Is your view of that similar to the Prime Minister's, or do you side with the leader of the DUP? What is your view?

If a Sinn Féin ardchomhairle and Ard-Fheis approve its leadership's recommendations and the party moves on policing, I ask the Secretary of State whether he can confirm that the DUP has given sufficient signals that the election will proceed and that a devolved Administration will be established on 26 March, assuming — and it is a big assumption — that the DUP is the largest party; and that, consequently, there will be agreement that policing and justice be devolved in May 2008. Is that a yes or a no?

Mr Hain: Let me answer those questions in order. Without engaging in argy-bargy with you, Danny, which I have no desire to do, I want to point out that, in the past, the UUP has prided itself on being the reasonable party, as it were, that seeks to find a way through rather than create obstacles to progress. I do not find your contributions to be in that spirit, if I may say so.

Mr Kennedy: That is a badge of honour for us.

Mr Hain: Fine, but I reject absolutely your accusations and the rhetoric surrounding them that I am somehow undermining the subgroup, or, even more preposterously, undermining the Policing Board, by putting forward a model that is based on discussions between the parties, and that I am somehow contaminating politics by talking to parties.

I remind you that, when I sought to meet all the parties on Friday 15 December 2006 at Stormont, your party was unable to attend, although I understand that there were good diary reasons for its not being present. I will meet the UUP this afternoon, and no doubt that that will prompt somebody to say that a side deal is involved.

I meet parties, and talk to party leaders, all the time. I am more than happy to talk to your party or to its leader. If I had been able to meet your party on 15 December, it would have been able to contribute to the discussion. I reject flatly that there is any conspiracy to contaminate politics.

The Prime Minister is making a statement tomorrow on national security and MI5. I do not want to pre-empt that statement, because it is for Parliament to hear what the Prime Minister has to say rather than any other body, including, with respect, Chairman, this subgroup, for reasons that you understand.

I can say that the statement will address various parties' concerns, including, as it happens, concerns that the SDLP has raised about the respective future roles of the Police Service of Northern Ireland and the security service. I want to stress that they are separate organisations with distinct roles and separate channels of accountability. However, those organisations will obviously need to liaise closely, as happens right across the United Kingdom, in order to protect the community from international and other forms of terrorism, especially from al-Qaeda, which is a living and present threat. The new arrangements that the Prime Minister will describe tomorrow are meant to facilitate dealing with that threat.

On the question of moving the goalposts, I do not want to indulge in textual banter, but as it says in the model that we put to you:

"In addition to providing overall support to the Justice Minister, the Deputy Minister will have his or her own lead responsibilities"

— "lead responsibilities", not some kind of office-boy role —

"to be agreed between the Minister and the Deputy Minister and FM/DFM but including oversight of the implementation of transfer arrangements and new departmental structures."

That was a suggestion. Again, if the UUP or the subgroup has a better idea — well, that is why we are here and why we put the model forward.

Finally, you asked, essentially, whether we would achieve restoration on 26 March. As I explained earlier, there needs to be clarity of understanding that the legislation provides either for devolution on 26 March via an election on 7 March or for dissolution. There are no other possibilities, no question of postponement, and no other option is provided for in the legislation. Fresh emergency legislation would have to be introduced into Parliament to change that in any way. I put on record to the subgroup that there is not the slightest chance of that happening. I took an emergency Bill through Parliament only a couple of months ago; the idea that I would go back, with the Prime Minister's support, and say, "Please guys, we got the dates wrong, can we try again?" is preposterous. That will not happen.

I think that we are proceeding towards restoration on 26 March, provided that delivery is achieved on the twin pillars of commitment to power sharing and commitment to support for policing and the rule of law. There is every expectation that the DUP and Sinn Féin leaderships want to achieve that.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): Can you be quick with your question, Mr Kennedy?

Mr Kennedy: Mr Chairman, thank you for your indulgence. Just in relation to — [Interruption.]

The Chairman (Mr Hay): The Division bell has sounded. Can you ask your question quickly?

Mr Kennedy: Is the emergence of the Prime Minister's statement tomorrow an indication of further side deals between the Government and Sinn Féin, and will there be more to follow?

Mr Hain: As I said, we have talked for days and weeks and months with all the parties on all these matters; people have sought clarity, and we are giving clarity.

Mr Paisley Jnr: This is an important issue. It is a national intelligence issue, and we should not allow it to be kicked about in such a way that it undermines the community's confidence in the national — [Interruption.]

The Chairman (Mr Hay): I do not know whether members want to quit or not; if they do not, we can continue. However, the Secretary of State has to leave at 1.00 pm.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I would like clarification from the Secretary of State. The St Andrews Agreement was supposed to increase the Northern Ireland focus in national security by way of the national intelligence security committee, which, I understand, is an issue that is still being considered. Can you confirm that nothing will be introduced that allows for an independent oversight role in national security, and that political parties in Northern Ireland will be given a greater awareness of what is actually happening at national security level, which is a very different matter?

Mr Hain: The primacy of national security is an excepted matter. That will be absolutely protected. There is no question of different accountability arrangements. You will have to await tomorrow's statement for the detail, but I think that you will approve of it.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): Secretary of State, we will end the meeting there. I thank you for your presence today. This subject has generated some lively discussions among the subgroup. Speaking as Chairman, I think that there is unity of purpose to try to solve the problems.

Mr Hain: Thank you, Chairman. I am at your disposal in future if you need me.

The Chairman (Mr Hay): I thank you and your officials.

The subgroup met at 10.58 am.

(The Chairperson (Mr T O'Reilly) in the Chair.)

The Chairperson (Mr T O'Reilly): You are welcome to the Subgroup on Economic Issues. As usual, there is a tight schedule and a lot of questions to be answered. We will try to get as many questions in as possible, so I ask you all to be brief and to the point in your contributions. The Minister will begin with an opening statement.

11.00 am

Mr David Hanson (Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office): I thank the subgroup for the work that it has undertaken over the past few months and for giving me the opportunity to discuss some of the economic policy issues. The reports produced by the subgroup have been helpful to the Government, and I know that you have received the Government's formal responses to the recommendations contained in your reports. I am grateful for the chance to attend the subgroup and to answer members' questions on any of the issues in the reports as well as on the economic challenges facing Northern Ireland.

First, it is important to acknowledge that significant improvements have taken place in the local economy over the past decade. There is growing employment, with unemployment here well below the UK average. I believe that economic growth can continue in the present conditions.

In 1989, Northern Ireland's economic output was 74.8% of the UK average, and in 2004 it was 80.2%. Employment is at a record high with over 704,000 people employed, and manufacturing output in Northern Ireland has increased by 5.7% over the past five years while there has been a decline in manufacturing output in the rest of the UK. In 2005, Northern Ireland's economic growth was 3.8%. That is broadly in line with the UK average of 3.9%, which, of course, includes London and the south-east where there is considerable growth.

That does not mean that I am complacent, and neither should the Assembly or the direct rule team be. Northern Ireland is becoming increasingly competitive; it is becoming one of the most competitive regions in the UK, and it is supporting growth in those job areas. However, we must carefully examine what the challenges will be. The region also remains attractive to foreign investment. Despite accounting for only 2% of the UK population, Northern Ireland now secures approximately 10% of all foreign direct investment (FDI) to the UK.

The regional economic strategy for Northern Ireland — on which, I hope, the subgroup will be able to comment and the Assembly will be able to implement — will shortly be put out to public consultation. The strategy will acknowledge that more must be done in a number of areas. First, we need to do more to reduce economic inactivity. Secondly, more must be done to promote innovation and commercial research and development. Thirdly, we must ensure that the skills base of the workforce is raised. Fourthly, an economic infrastructure that is suitable for the challenges of the twenty-first century must be provided. Fifthly, Northern Ireland needs to reap the economic benefits of closer co-operation with the Republic of Ireland, the more traditional support with Great Britain and, importantly, a wider Europe over the next few years.

The regional economic strategy will set out the Government's commitment to focus on four key drivers that will help that economic vision. We will concentrate on skills, infrastructure, innovation and enterprise development. If the strategy is approved — and the Assembly will have a key role post any pending election to take matters forward — policy will be prioritised around those four key areas, and resources from the Department of Finance and Personnel will be focused accordingly.

It is also clear that there needs to be significant reform in the local economy and in public services. The emphasis of the review of public administration (RPA) was on local council reform and on reform in central Government. The Civil Service reform agenda will also deliver a radically different and more efficient public sector.

I hope that the Government will pledge themselves to and be committed to economic vision, but that cannot be done in isolation; the private sector also has a key role to play. The private sector in Northern Ireland must become more innovative and more outward looking, and it should have greater linkages with universities so that commercial research and development opportunities can be encouraged and exploited.

There is a shared agenda between yourselves and the Government in that there needs to be greater communication between business and education to facilitate the necessary upskilling of our workforce that your reports rightly point to. The experience in the Republic of Ireland highlights the importance that investing in skills has in creating a strong economy.

Many economic challenges lie ahead. Everyone wants a wealthy, vibrant economy that can compete in the global marketplace. We are going to face challenges from eastern Europe, as a growing economy, China, India and other parts of the old Commonwealth, and an increasingly global economy.

That means that this economy must become more innovative and entrepreneurial, and we need to ensure that the infrastructure and facilities are there to support business and trade. We need to ensure that our citizens have the skills, which, sadly, many do not — not only important skills for the future, but in many cases basic skills such as reading and writing — to ensure that they can participate in the workforce and contribute to building a strong regional economy.

It will be a big challenge for the new Assembly and Executive, but the challenge will be same whether the Assembly or direct rule Ministers take forward these proposals. We both share the same aim for this area.

To sum up, our focus on skills, innovation, enterprise and infrastructure is the correct way forward, but I welcome the subgroup's comments on that. In many regions of the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland the same agenda is in place. We must respond positively to those issues. We must ensure that we develop a sustainable Northern Ireland economy involving many public- and private-sector workforce issues. In particular, we must ensure that Northern Ireland becomes internationally renowned for its commitment to skills, education, science and innovation and that it has support from a modern infrastructure.

There has been much discussion on these matters, not just in the subgroup, but also in the Economic Development Forum, which I addressed recently. We must do more for the future.

A lot of key issues are being addressed, many of which are in the subgroup's reports, and which my colleagues and I are happy to respond to today. However, there are some important questions to consider, whatever happens in the future, and they are: how do we build on the manufacturing productivity gains in recent years, and how do we reverse the decline in private-sector productivity? How do we further expand into key areas of high-value-added financial and business services, when we grow from a small base with significant difficulties in Northern Ireland? How do we increase the level of process and product of R&D and innovation here? How do we encourage small businesses to grow and develop in an economy where more and more firms are becoming export orientated? How do we ensure that we increase in a service-dominated economy, where capital is paramount? How do we ensure that we attract, retain and develop a skilled workforce? Finally, how can we use the cities, and the skills in them, to enhance their contribution to economic growth?

It is a challenging agenda, to which the regional economic strategy will provide some solutions. I welcome the subgroup's comments and the consultations that will take place, and I hope that my officials and I will be able to deal positively with the points, Mr Chairman.

The Chairperson (Mr T O'Reilly): Thank you very much. That statement gives us some thought for questions. Before I ask George Dawson to ask the first question, I ask those accompanying the Minister to ensure that all mobile phones are switched off, as they interfere with the recording equipment, and we do not want to miss anyone's contribution.

Mr Dawson: I welcome the Minister and his colleagues. Despite the warm words this morning, the Government have previously described Northern Ireland's economy as unsustainable. This and previous subgroups have been looking for a radical approach to that, as opposed to the Government's approach, which seems to be "steady as she goes", change nothing and do little.

The Minister outlined a number of issues — inactivity levels, innovation, skill base, infrastructure and co-operation — with the key aim of reducing the productivity gap. If the Government hold to their stated policies, as outlined in the various responses to our reports, then what is an acceptable productivity gap between ourselves and the rest of the United Kingdom, and when will that gap be closed?

Furthermore, the Minister proposed a series of challenges about building productivity, expanding high-value-added jobs, etc. Our various reports approached those matters. We have presented a radical strategy to achieve what the Government are seeking to achieve.

On the Government side, however, that radical strategy seems to have been rejected. We want to know how the Government propose to answer the very questions that the Minister asked this morning.

Mr Hanson: As I said in my presentation, the Government's proposals seek to consider the infrastructure that is needed. We are looking at how we can invest in roads and rail and how we can invest within the terms of the investment strategy for Northern Ireland (ISNI). The strategy represents a major investment of £16 billion over the next 10 years; with the Chancellor's package, it will increase to £18 billion. The question is how the ISNI can be used to put in place some of the key infrastructures in respect of service and support mechanisms for industry in order to make us more productive and competitive.

At the same time, there is a strong focus on skills, which I mentioned in my contribution. We are considering dramatically increasing the number of apprenticeships over the next few years. By 2010, we plan to have 10,000 apprenticeships in place. We are considering introducing pre-apprenticeships in schools for pupils aged between 14 and 16 to try to get them involved and interested. We are establishing education programmes at primary and wrap-around care levels to ensure that we begin the long road to improving educational ability and attainment in schools over a long time.

We must also consider how Northern Ireland can be marketed as a real venue for some of the financial and business sectors on the island of Ireland, in the United Kingdom and Europe. We are undertaking a tremendous amount of work on skills development, infrastructure and investment. We are also looking at wider issues. I have considered the subgroup's suggestions; some of which we have been able to accept, others that we are able to consider, but there are some that we cannot accept. However, there is still a great role for us to work together. As you will know, George, those suggestions will be taken forward in the Assembly in due course.

Mr Dawson: Following on from that, I reiterate the main point of the question. When will the productivity gap between Northern Ireland and the rest of the United Kingdom be closed? The policies that the subgroup has put on the table have a clear time line, a clear set of targets and a clear date by when we believe that the productivity gap will be closed. What is your date for the closure of the productivity gap?

Mr Hanson: It is difficult to say in broad terms; I want the productivity gap to be closed as soon as possible and practicable.

Mr Dawson: That is all a bit motherhood and apple pie, Minister.

Mr Hanson: Yes, it is motherhood and apple pie. There are clear policies behind the regional economic strategy that consider those issues. When that strategy is published shortly, there will be clear time lines and targets to ensure that we achieve that.

It is a difficult situation because we are working in an economic climate that examines the entire range of those issues. However, I believe that the infrastructure investment that we are making in education will, over time, reduce the productivity gap with the rest of the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland.

Mr Dawson: Will the regional economic strategy put a date to that?

Mr Hanson: The regional economic strategy will be published very shortly. It is difficult for me to go into detail on what it will say until it is published. However, when the strategy is published for consultation, the Assembly and colleagues in business and in Government will be able to comment on it. There will then be an opportunity for a wide-ranging debate on the economy. I believe that the strategy's proposals will be widely welcomed.

Mr Dawson: If there is no date for the final achievement of closing the productivity gap, the regional economic strategy will stand in stark contrast to the subgroup's proposals, which contain clear dates and time lines. Government will have to wrestle with that difference.

Mr Hanson: I intend to publish the regional economic strategy in the next couple of weeks before the likely date of any purdah before an election. There will be a 12-week consultation period. The strategy has already been revised four times following discussions with the Economic Development Forum.

The strategy will be subject to consultation during those 12 weeks and may well be taken forward by the Assembly. There is an opportunity for the work of the subgroup to impact on the strategy. With our officials, the Secretary of State and I, as direct-rule Ministers, have made our best guesses as to that impact. We have put in place what we can do with the resources available — in what will be a tight financial situation over the next comprehensive spending review — to make a difference on the ground.

11.15 pm

Mr McNarry: I would like to take this opportunity to thank the Minister for assistance that he gave to some young people in Comber who had a housing problem. It was very much appreciated. Perhaps he has forgotten it.

Mr Hanson: Thank you. I never forget anything.

Mr McNarry: I want to deal with education and young people's involvement in the economy. My points are brief. The subgroup recommended that special attention be given to science, technology and engineering. Does the Minister accept that recommendation? How can he help to achieve it?

Mr Hanson: The subgroup made a number of recommendations. I looked at the important question of research and development. Another subgroup has mentioned tax credits as a key issue with regard to that. I agree that the rules on tax credits should be simplified, that their take-up should be promoted and that there should be more co-operation between universities and business on generating high-level skills.

The subgroup has recommended much that can be looked at by the Government and colleagues. The R&D base of industry in Northern Ireland needs to be widened. We must look at how we can develop new products and at investing in young people to get them interested in science and technology. By “young people”, I mean children who are now four- and five-years-old. We should try to get them interested in science and technology so that when they reach 16, 17 and 18 years of age, they begin their university education on a science and technology basis. We need to ensure that we have sufficient employment opportunities here to retain people who have that interest in science and technology and not lose them to the Republic, GB or Europe. Those are all major challenges.

There are many key points in the reports that I have assessed and acknowledged. Complete responses are before the subgroup. The Government have tried to support science through the education and library boards and through the curriculum, advisory and support services. We have tried to ensure that, through the Education and Skills Authority, there is an opportunity to put in place an effective science curriculum in schools. Those are key issues.

Northern Ireland will not compete effectively any longer on the basis of low labour costs. Rather, it will have to compete on the basis of innovation, skills, invention and what it can give, intellectually, to the development of products to increase their value.

Mr McNarry: I am glad that the Minister has picked up on the subject of four-to-five-year-olds. The subgroup can readily agree with what he says. My question asks, however, whether he is aware of work to kick-start that activity? One talks about these things, but someone needs to say: “Let’s do it”, particularly with regard to four-to-five-year-olds. Is anything underway?

Mr Hanson: My colleague wants to make a point.

Mr Wilfie Hamilton (Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment): My point is about science and stem subjects. The subgroup is correct to highlight the importance of those. It is essential that they are addressed in a holistic way and that there is a link through education back to four- and five-year-olds. It is important that it starts at that stage in life.

In his opening remarks, the Minister highlighted the need for a more integrated approach to the economy.

Whatever the subject area, it is important that every Government Department, agency, university, educational establishment and the private sector follow an integrated approach. Each knows what it can contribute and each will make that contribution. We need to move holistically and be responsive to have effect.

While there has been much work to date in the Department of Education, that Department has acknowledged to the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment and to other Departments that there is a need for a more holistic approach on stem subjects. It is absolutely vital that those subjects are protected and developed. An interdepartmental working group has just been set up to review how those subjects can best be promoted in the education curriculum. Business leaders will be involved to ensure that the systems put in place will meet business needs. That is an important process. It will ensure that, from the earliest stages of education, the needs of business will be catered for.

Mr McNarry: I am very pleased to hear about the interdepartmental working group. All political parties would like to be kept fully informed of the group’s progress.

Mr Hamilton: We can let you have the terms of reference.

Mr McNarry: Minister, the Bain Report has been published. Have the Government costed the financial implications of the report in the recommendations?

Mr Hanson: The Government broadly accept the recommendations of the Bain Report. My colleague Maria Eagle is working with the Secretary of State on an implementation plan for those recommendations. I am hopeful that she will be able to produce that shortly — by that, I mean before the end of the month.

That implementation plan will detail the recommendations that the Government will accept or reject. The implementation plan will include costings and discussion as to how to take forward Sir George Bain’s recommendations. I am confident that we will be able to produce the implementation plan in the next couple of weeks.

Mr McNarry: I hope that the Assembly will debate the Bain Report at 12.30 pm next Monday. As Minister Eagle has not been able to find her way here or to send any representatives to any of our subgroups, I hope that she or some of her personnel might be able to find their way into the Assembly to listen to the debate on the Bain Report. It should be interesting.

Mr Hanson: I wish to make two points on that issue. First, I am sure that officials will be in the Chamber for the debate. I am mindful, as are all direct-rule Ministers, that we are hopeful that the Assembly will take forward those matters. It is important that Ministers and officials listen to what is said in the Assembly.

Secondly, I am representing the Government as a whole, and I am happy to do that and to take back points to my colleagues.

Mr McNarry: I wish to make a final point about education. This subgroup has the support of the education subgroup and the Programme for Government Committee in asking for an additional £20 million for areas such as special needs, early-years development and underachievement. Would you, as Minister, support that?

Mr Hanson: I will certainly consider that. I have not had a great deal of information to date about the proposals. However, I will consider them and take it to my colleague Maria Eagle.

Mr McNarry: The proposals were mentioned in the subgroup's report. With all due respect, Minister, you have been up to speed on the questions that I have already asked. I suspect that you have had some sight of the proposals — perhaps not, but you are being very good. Those proposals are not in the printed edition of the report.

Mr Hanson: I was talking about the education subgroup's report; I have not seen that report.

Mr McNarry: The issue is discussed in the economy subgroup report.

Mr Hanson: Yes, I have seen the economy subgroup's report, but, to date, I have not seen the education subgroup's comments.

Mr McNarry: In principle, if I were to ask for £20 million for those areas of education — for which there is a valid case — would you consider supporting it?

Mr Hanson: Certainly, the Government will consider those matters in the recommendations and in the response that we will put before the subgroup. However, I am not in a position to give a definite “yes” or “no”.

Mr McNarry: I am not picking the issue above all the other recommendations, but at least three different bodies connected to the Assembly have supported that particular issue.

Chairman, that is all that I have to say about education. With your indulgence, I will come back after other Members have spoken.

The Chairman (Mr T O'Reilly): That is fair enough, David. Before I ask Mitchel McLaughlin to ask the next question, I wish to express my view on something that I am picking up in the meeting. Good questions are being asked about time lines, financial packages and about how plans for how things will be done are being considered. I would appreciate if issues could be tied down a little more, rather than going around in eternal circles and leaving the subgroup with no more definitive answers than when we began.

Mr McNarry: Sock it to him, Tommy. [Laughter.]

Mr McLaughlin: Good morning, Minister.

Mr Hanson: It is the duty and responsibility of Government, occasionally, to be evasive. [Laughter.] You will appreciate that shortly.

Mr McLaughlin: Normally, he is a quiet sort.

Minister, I welcome you and your officials. In prefacing my question, I welcome the focus on skills, infrastructure, innovation and enterprise to which you made a number of references in your presentation.

Will formal appraisal or economic modelling underpin the regional economic strategy? It is commonly agreed that the economy is clearly failing: current policies have not delivered the necessary solutions, the productivity gap has not narrowed, and there has been significant slippage in competition. Will the economic strategy demonstrate the unsustainability of current arrangements and set out, in formally validated evidence, the step change necessary to create a sustainable economy here? I am quite sure that members of the subgroup, and the parties to which they belong, are interested in knowing how we can bridge that gap.

Basically, unlike previous reports and strategies that have been rolled out periodically, will this strategy be sustained by scientific evidence that will demonstrate that it is the necessary step change?

I have a related question, but I would prefer to ask it after the Minister has responded to my first question.

Mr Hanson: As I mentioned in my introductory remarks, we will be seeking, through the regional economic strategy, to analyse the challenges that face Northern Ireland. We will focus on the four key areas in which we think assistance will be required. As I have mentioned, those areas are: skills enhancement; infrastructure; innovation; and promoting entrepreneurial activity.

The focus of the strategy will be to consider, with resources and as part of an economic model, how we can make a step change by concentrating on those four key areas. The strategy will set out the areas that require infrastructural investment, skills enhancement and so on. Therefore the draft strategy that is to be published next week will contain analysis and focus, and, through the comprehensive spending review, the resources that I mentioned will be focused on those areas over the next three years to ensure that we make a step-change difference.

Mr McLaughlin: That might be the case, but it needs to be a step change and not just the rhetoric of “we need”. Minister, you listed what we need under a number of headings, and every one of us will accept the “we need” part of that. However, we also need timelines and dates for the application of the additional resources that will make the difference — unless the strategy is capable of demonstrating that the resources have always existed and that there has been a failure of application. That seems to be the response to our requests for additional resources. I am trying not to stray into the second point, but it is directly related.

We want an Executive that can succeed. I can speak only for my party, which is determined to succeed in having a devolved Assembly and Executive. However, an Executive has to be capable of delivering its Programme for Government and dealing with, for example, the skills deficit and the infrastructural deficit and their implications. The strategy that is about to be unveiled must address how the Executive would be expected to do that within existing resources when direct-rule Ministers did not manage to do so over the past 30 years.

Mr Hanson: Mitchel, as you know, the discussions that were held with the Chancellor following the St Andrew’s Agreement laid out the finance that could potentially be available to the Assembly over the next few years.

Mr McLaughlin: With respect Minister, there is no step change in that.

Mr Hanson: At the moment, a minimum of £35 billion has been allocated for the next four years. We have a longer-term capital investment plan of £18 billion, which will be in the Assembly’s gift for the next 12 years. The package also covers an innovation fund, end-year flexibility and the retention of efficiency savings that will be made. Although the current funding situation will make the financial situation tight in Northern Ireland and in all parts of the United Kingdom for the next few years, people will still have an element of certainty in which they can plan. Following the consultation on the regional economic strategy, the incoming Assembly and Finance and Enterprise Ministers can look at allocating those resources to meet the step-change needs.

Considerable resources are coming into Northern Ireland — more than are coming into my own constituency — that will be committed for that certainty ahead of the comprehensive spending review, by the Chancellor, as part of the economic package.

11.30 am

Mr McLaughlin: The subgroup has not been convinced in any of its discussions, including its initial engagement with the Chancellor and subsequent discussions with the Treasury and the Department of Finance and Personnel, that there is evidence of the additional resources that are needed, other than welcome commitments of some certainty. Therein lies the conundrum. The expert testimony that the subgroup has received does not demonstrate that additional resources will be forthcoming. I want to use that as the introduction to my second question.

Mr Hanson: I want to put that into context. I am proud of the Labour Government’s investment in Northern Ireland’s public services and economy. Northern Ireland’s economy now has twice the level of funding than in 1997, when the Labour Party inherited Government. That level of investment will continue. The Chancellor has given a commitment that a minimum of £35 billion will be provided during the next four years and that £18 billion will be available for capital investment.

There is a strong capital investment programme in the ISNI, which will examine a range of public sector infrastructure projects in hospitals, schools, roads and investment. It will examine projects such as the Maze/Long Kesh development and other major infrastructure projects that will bring additional wealth and economy to Northern Ireland, and will, I hope, raise the game, so that we not only create important retail jobs but will add significant infrastructure jobs and create employment that will enable the economy to meet the challenges of the twenty-first century.

Mr McLaughlin: However, the Labour Secretary of State also says that the economy is unsustainable, even with all of that. There is also the productivity gap, which the Minister has not disputed. The simple conclusion is that the policies are not working. We must await the launch of the regional economic strategy which the Minister assures us will be underpinned by the necessary forensic evidence. In fairness, we must wait for that before we pass judgement. It is clear, however, that a political argument as well as an economic one must be addressed if there is to be sustainable devolved Government.

It seems that the necessary commitment of additional resources is not present. I will put that in the context of the single issue of water charges, which are deeply unpopular and on which there is cross-party unanimity. The issue is not about not paying a fair price for a public service. People are not saying that if there were openness and transparency, they would not support water charges. They are prepared to pay for public services. However, despite repeated calls from the subgroup and the Programme for Government Committee, the Government and NIO Ministers have given us stock answers and almost theological positions. They refuse to engage in discussion and provide the wherewithal.

If there is to be a devolved Administration, it is clear that, from the outset, the economic resources do not exist to deal with the legacy costs of 30 years of under-investment. Unless that message is put across to direct rule Ministers, and through them to their ministerial colleagues in the Treasury, the Executive will be condemned to failure.

Mr Hanson: There is an obvious disagreement between the member and the Government on water charges. The Government believe that water charges are necessary in order to raise the game and to provide the investment needed to improve sewerage, water quality, and so on. That is what the Government believe they must do. There has been a big gap in the capital investment required to modernise the Water Service to standards that one expects in the twenty-first century.

We are putting a tremendous capital investment programme in place to improve water services and to build new sewage facilities: they need to be paid for. Historically, we have had an open and honest disagreement on that, but I do not think that an appropriate contribution has been made to paying for such facilities.

I know that you share with me the wish that the Assembly will be in place by the end of March. When it is up and running again it can review its policies on those matters. We have passed Orders in the House of Commons, but, as I say, there is a disagreement between us on the issue.

The figures are £600 million in a capital investment programme over a three-year period, with £1.3 billion invested next year as we continue at this level of investment. Those are real, focused investments in the Water Service. They must be paid for, but they cannot be paid for from the resources that we have; we have had to look at ways of generating resources.

Mr Dawson: Before moving to corporation tax, I want to leave you in no doubt that more than one party at this table disagrees with the Government's economic policy.

Mr Hanson: I appreciate that, George.

Mr Dawson: It is an agreed position. No one, apart from the Government, has provided us with evidence that supports the Government's position. In fact, one eminent industrialist, Sir George Quigley, was open in saying that under no circumstances should an Executive be formed given the economic terms that have been outlined. That is the common view of the business community.

Mr McNarry: What constituency is he standing in?

Mr Hamilton: I wish to clarify a point. You said that the parties disagree with economic policy, and then you went on to talk about the economic package. I would like to think that there is a good deal more consensus on the economic policies that we are trying to develop in conjunction with the parties and the business stakeholders. I am not sure that the economic policy and the economic package are synonymous.

Mr Dawson: One certainly feeds into the other. If we do not have the economic package in place, we will not be able to deliver on economic policy for the people of Northern Ireland. I am sorry, Wilfie, that you take that view.

Corporation tax has been much discussed. The view of many who presented evidence to us — and members have discussed the issue around the table as well — is that the purpose of the variation in corporation tax is to attract high value-added jobs to Northern Ireland and to deliver on R&D in Northern Ireland. It is not, as the response from the Government tried to suggest, a way of reducing corporation tax. I want to put that on record.

The previous Minister with responsibility for the economy indicated that a reduction in corporation tax was possible and desirable. That was in response to a question from my colleague David Simpson in the House of Commons.

The Prime Minister, when he met business leaders in Armagh, said that he was prepared to look seriously at the request for a reduced corporation tax rate. Since then, Treasury officials have simply rehearsed the difficulties without presenting any solutions.

Will serious consideration be given to the request to reduce corporation tax? If you believe that serious consideration has already been given, is there room for further discussion on corporation tax reduction, either in the terms that we have outlined or in other terms?

Mr Hanson: As you know, George, I was at the meeting in Armagh with the Prime Minister and the Taoiseach when business leaders raised the issue; and I was present at 11 Downing Street with the Chancellor when it was raised as part of the discussions on the economic package. The Chancellor is still considering it; he has not given it a definite no. However, it is a non-devolved matter, even as regards my responsibilities in the area. I am afraid that I will probably disappoint you, as I will have to rehearse some of the difficulties again because they are significant.

The first difficulty is that, in a UK context —

Mr Dawson: There is no point in rehearsing them again; they are all on record. With respect, we are wasting time.

Mr Hanson: In that case, George, I cannot give you a definitive answer. I can say only that the Chancellor and the Prime Minister are aware of the concerns and the issues, and that the difficulties are severe.

Mr Dawson: The subgroup included corporation tax in the report because it wants to hear what consideration has been given to those associated difficulties and what are the solutions. The subgroup believes that there are solutions and is willing to engage with the Treasury in discussing them. However, the Treasury has not yet demonstrated a similar willingness. Is the Minister prepared to say that he will engage with the subgroup to look for solutions to those difficulties?

Mr Hanson: As long as I have the responsibility to consider such issues, I am happy to engage with the subgroup and the Assembly and to discuss them with the Treasury. However, there are severe problems with having one level of corporation tax in one part of the United Kingdom and another level of corporation tax in others. Certain areas, including my constituency in Wales, that have a lower level of productivity and face greater economic challenges than Northern Ireland would not receive the same reduction in the level of corporation tax — that might well result in jobs going from Wales to Ireland or another part of the United Kingdom.

There is a further difficulty on which I am happy to engage with the subgroup. Under current EU state-aid rules, a reduction in Northern Ireland's corporation tax rate would be extremely difficult. The Chancellor could make a case for such a reduction, and it could be discussed with EU officials. However, at the end of the day, EU state-aid rules are there for a purpose.

Although I have rehearsed the difficulties, I am happy to consider solutions because if, three months down the line, there is successful restoration of devolution, the Assembly would not be bound, as I am in part, to have collective responsibility for the United Kingdom. The Assembly can say what it wants and argue for what it wants. As a Northern Ireland Minister, as I will remain under the new arrangements, I will be a point of contact to discuss the issues that I will then raise on behalf of the Assembly in Cabinet Committees and with the Chancellor. I am happy to do that because the aspirations of the Assembly are legitimate and deserve positive consideration.

However, I return to the severe difficulties in relation to other parts of the United Kingdom, state-aid rules and the simple fact, of which Mr Dawson is aware, that 96% of companies and businesses in Northern Ireland do not currently pay the 30% corporation tax rate.

Mr Dawson: It is not a question of how a reduction would affect existing companies: it is about attracting new companies, as the Republic of Ireland has successfully done, and I could list the large corporations that have located there.

Is the Minister saying that if Northern Ireland changes only in the ways that he has specified — without any variation in the rate of corporation tax — it will attract significant numbers of large companies with foreign direct investment to Northern Ireland?

Mr Hanson: I am saying that the same factors that will be considered by those devising a new regional economic strategy should be taken into account.

Investment in skills, higher productivity, less reliance on a large public sector and the necessary investment in infrastructure throughout Northern Ireland — and members know the key areas as well as I do — can make Northern Ireland a productive and important place for foreign investors. There is already more foreign investment in Northern Ireland than in other parts of the United Kingdom.

I fully accept the difficulties caused by having different levels of corporation tax in the North and South and that the lower rate in the Republic of Ireland may be a factor that draws companies to Dundalk rather than to Newry. However, in a UK-wide context the Government have severe difficulties with any variations in the rate — although the Chancellor has certainly heard the voice of the Assembly.

Mr Dawson: If the Minister believes that what he is doing will make the difference, I want to see a commitment from the Government, in the regional economic strategy, that the levels of foreign direct investment in Northern Ireland will be equivalent to those currently being achieved in the Republic of Ireland. The subgroup will wait to see whether that commitment is included.

The Chairperson (Mr T O'Reilly): Time will tell.

Mr Dawson: Before moving on, much has been said about infrastructure. The subgroup is pleased by the welcome investment in that. Any new Executive will be caught in the linkage between borrowing and local taxation, as was the previous Executive.

In our view, an Executive should be able to repay on borrowing from any source, not only local taxation. Are the Government open to discussion on breaking the link between borrowing and local taxation? I am thinking particularly about the reinvestment and reform initiative (RRI).

11.45 am

Mr Hanson: I would be happy to discuss that matter with the incoming Executive.

Mr Dawson: There is little likelihood of an Executive's being successful unless packages are in place before it is formed.

Mr Hanson: I disagree. I believe that the Executive should be successful, irrespective of the introduction of any financial packages. In my view, the financial package is strong. Currently, the prospective Northern Ireland Executive have a much clearer indication of the financial resources that will be available to them than either the Scottish Executive or the Welsh Assembly.

We have promised to invest £35 billion over four years, together with a capital investment of £18 million. Other packages, including end-year flexibility and the commitment to ensure that asset sales and Gershon savings, if made, are kept in the Northern Ireland economy, are important factors around which a programme can be built.

Ultimately, all programmes are about prioritisation. We are giving a clear indication of what we think is available from central Government in that package. Within that, the Assembly will have to prioritise, and there will be times when it will have to make difficult choices, as we do now in Government.

Mr Dawson: I would not want you to be chided by the Chairperson, Minister, but on my earlier specific point, are the Government open to discussions on breaking the link between borrowing and local taxation?

Mr Hanson: I have said that I am happy to discuss that matter in general terms. If it is a matter for discussion in Mr Dawson's terms, before the formation of the Executive, I would be happy to discuss it with the appropriate Members of the Assembly. We are open to suggestions.

Mr McNarry: Would the Minister be open to standing for election on the basis of what he has just said? Would he seek a mandate in a Northern Ireland seat?

Mr Hanson: I am conscious that I am here as a Member of Parliament from the House of Commons, who was voted for by the people of north Wales. That is where my mandate lies as a Member of the UK Parliament. People who live in Northern Ireland are best placed to run its services, but the Assembly is not sitting, and that is why I am doing it. However, one of my other tasks is to make sure that the Assembly gets back up and running so that people who wish to seek that mandate can do so.

Mr McNarry: That is good, but it does not stop you from standing in the election next month.

Mr Hanson: The Government and my constituents in north Wales have plenty to keep me busy.

The Chairperson (Mr T O'Reilly): I would think so.

Mr Hanson: Thanks for backing me up, Thomas.

Ms Gildernew: The Minister mentioned skills. I have concerns about technological support for underdeveloped areas in new energy models, such as biofuels and anaerobic digestion. Such innovation would help to bolster the rural economy, which needs support.

Bearing in mind the shortage of university places, do the Government intend to provide more opportunities at third level and in the further education sector? Perhaps they could examine the model of the science and technology colleges in the Twenty-six Counties.

The LEADER programme has secured a great deal of investment and support for areas of need, and has assisted innovative companies. Invest Northern Ireland has been disappointing from that point of view; it has been unwilling or unable to examine underdeveloped areas and take risks.

My third point concerns public investment. The Minister mentioned water charges when he answered Mitchel McLaughlin's question. Some 120 jobs at the lower end of the pay scale are at risk at the Royal Belfast Hospital for Sick Children. A new PFI strategy is being discussed that will bring those workers — domestics, porters and other ancillary staff — under the control of the private company that borrows the money to build the new hospital.

That could lead to standards slipping and would not fit in with progression to a sustainable economy: it would put unrealistic demands on people who already work in the Health Service. If we are going to build a better economy, we must have the resources to do so. Mitchel McLaughlin is right; if the Executive do not have the proper resources, they are doomed to failure from the start, and as elected representatives, such initiatives are sending worrying signals to us.

Mr Hanson: The Government are keen to work with the sector to increase the number of university places available. One recommendation in the report produced by the Subgroup on the Economic Challenges Facing Northern Ireland was that the number of PhDs in five key technology areas should be increased. We are aware of a joint paper by the two universities, and we are currently discussing with them, as part of the comprehensive spending review, how we can increase the number of proposed PhDs and ensure that we fund that increase in due course.

We need also to consider how we can work with other sectors. There is a role for the private sector and voluntary agencies in helping to fund some of the placements that could help to expand university education.

My colleague Maria Eagle has acknowledged that there is a need to look very seriously at university places and increasing the number of student places. Recently, we issued a consultation paper on that subject, which highlighted that increasing the maximum number of students would have a financial cost to Government: about £6.7 million for each additional 1,000 places. However, it is worth considering, and we are establishing whether that increase could be resourced during the next round of the comprehensive spending review. No final decisions have been taken, but there is an opportunity and willingness to consider how we can expand the education base at university level, particularly in the key science and technology areas, to ensure a productive Northern Ireland economy.

Ms Gildernew also mentioned science, skills and alternative uses of fuels, biomass, etc. The Government have produced a science and skills fund, which covers a range of areas, and around £30 million has been allocated to the fund. Not all of that resource has been taken up, but we are certainly looking at how we can develop a range of alternative energy sources and new initiatives relating to biomass and wind energy, etc. It is important that the fund is developed and extended. The Government are trying to look at how that fund can be used productively — although I am conscious of making commitments that might well outlive my responsibilities in these areas. We are also keen to look at how we can maximise the benefits of university education across the island of Ireland. It is important to have much more North/South co-operation on education opportunities at university level, and that co-operation would help to develop the skills base of the island as a whole.

Ms Gildernew: What about Invest NI as regards risk-taking — compared to the LEADER funding scheme?

Mr Hamilton: Does that question refer to risk-taking as regards investing in rural areas?

Ms Gildernew: Yes, and being proactive in seeking to make investments. I have raised the matter with Invest NI and have been disappointed with its answers.

Mr Hamilton: Risk-taking is a difficult matter. The subgroup and politicians have raised the issue in the past — that the need for accountability does not always encourage risk taking. However, we need to be more flexible. For example, the Invest NI board and the permanent secretaries from several Departments will be looking at the extent to which Invest NI needs to rise to the challenge — and it does need to rise to the challenge. We need more investments and more higher-value-added investments.

However, it is not only a matter of promoting wealth creation; Government are also mindful of the need to promote the spread of wealth. We are trying to encourage a great number of investments in New TSN areas, something that is in Invest NI's corporate plan. If Invest NI could target that investment better, it should do so.

Invest NI has made such investments in some areas and been criticised because, on the face of it, they seem to be low-value-added. The practice of making certain types of investment in certain areas to encourage graduate retention and movement from economic inactivity into the labour market is important. Invest NI must do a mix of things: it needs to focus on high-value-added investments in certain places and other types of investment elsewhere. However, the balance must be towards higher-value-added investments.

Ms Gildernew: There must be a geographical spread in employment. I will talk to the officials at a later date about constituency issues.

Mr Hamilton: I would like to talk to you about that investment.

Mr McNarry: There she goes now, for goodness sake.

Ms Gildernew: I am not the one who mentioned Comber. [Laughter.] We will talk about that again.

Mrs Kerr: On the matter of additional places, it is not just at university level that business must exploit the emerging opportunities in new technologies. Evidence shows that places are needed at technician level — that is levels two and three. The challenge is to up-skill the workforce to ensure that they have the flexibility to take those opportunities when they arise, and to allow pull-through for people at lower levels, including the economically inactive. Next year's refocusing of the professional and technical programme will be part of that challenge.

The Chairperson (Mr T O'Reilly): Mr Dawson prosecuted the corporation tax question well. However, to add to your barrel of woes, given that you have committed to engage on the question of corporation tax, will you and the Secretary of State undertake to put pressure on the Chancellor to establish a working group to consider that specific issue? We requested that, through the Programme for Government Committee, in a letter of 4 January 2007.

Mr Hanson: The Secretary of State and I are in discussion with the Chancellor on a regular basis, and he is aware of the letter. His response will be forthcoming. Your letter, which was copied both to the Chancellor and to the Taoiseach, related to a number of matters, of which corporation tax was one. I am happy to at least raise those matters with the Chancellor. To put pressure on the — potential — next Prime Minister is difficult because, ultimately, he will be responsible for the dispensation of ministerial jobs. However, between the two of us, we will come to some conclusion on that matter.

Mr Dawson: David offered you a seat in Northern Ireland.

The Chairperson (Mr T O'Reilly): That is plan B. [Laughter.]

Mr Hanson: I am not sure which party I would stand for.

The Chairperson (Mr T O'Reilly): Well evaded.

Mr McNarry: Great changes in job provision have occurred in Northern Ireland. There are reduced opportunities for skills in heavy engineering and shipbuilding. The textile industry is virtually non-existent — to the extent that even 30 jobs in a small, niche textile company in Killinchy are under threat. It is serious when a niche factory struggles to compete on productivity. In agriculture, many farmers are having to take on an extra job to ensure that their homes and farms are kept safe, and it is worrying that few of their offspring express any interest in working on the family farms. What careers advice would the Minister offer to 14-year-olds today? How should they focus their education, whether towards academic attainment or skills training, with a view to being best prepared to enter real employment?

This subgroup has heard from young people, captains of industry and employers. It was clear from their evidence that we are producing a sizeable number of young people — setting aside the many who have no qualifications — who do not have relevant qualifications. I focused on 14-year-olds because their parents are beginning to ask what their children are doing at school and what their boy or girl should be doing, academically or in training, to get a job.

12.00 noon

It would be helpful to have some advanced pinpointing of the fields in which jobs will be found in 2010 and 2015. I know that the Minister takes a personal and genuine interest in that issue, although he will not live here or stand for election here. It would be helpful if we could tell 14-year-olds where to find the jobs of the future. People are using resources either to train in a skill for which there is no employment or to achieve an academic position for which there is no real work.

Mr Hanson: I have three teenagers, one of whom is 14, and a three-year-old. If they asked me what they should do in the future, I would advise them to look at what I term the new industries; to look at intellectual capacity in innovation, invention and development; to look at information technology (IT) skills because that is an employment field for the future; but not to look at — with due respect to people such as my father who engaged in heavy manual work — the older industries such as shipbuilding, which are not sustainable for the future.

We need to look at innovation. We need to be able to compete and be successful by inventing and developing technology. We need intellectual capital to support our future economy.

Some of the most successful companies that I have visited in Northern Ireland are considering innovation and creating products for the future. I visited some film companies in Belfast that are developing intellectual capacity to create the products of the future. They are bringing people into Northern Ireland to work in the film industry.

Mr McNarry asked me how I would answer a 14-year-old who questioned me about future employment. I would want to know what the child was capable of and what their natural skills and talents were. As a nation, we must compete, not, sadly, in production — China's millions of people can produce goods and ship them across the world more cheaply than we can, despite the resultant ecological damage — but in intellectual skills, design and marketing, and advanced IT. We must consider how to push the boat out even further by inventing and inspiring for the future. We did that successfully in the past.

Mr McNarry: I am glad to hear the Minister's views and I agree with them; it is good advice. However, can we attract the jobs to which we are directing children? Can we compete with other economies? After all, 14-year-olds all over the world will be chasing the same jobs.

Mr Hanson: We have to consider how Northern Ireland can position itself. It can work with its successful neighbour, the Republic of Ireland, to build on that country's success; it can co-operate with the United Kingdom on an east-west basis; and it can work as part of the wider Europe. I welcome the wider Europe. People from Poland and Lithuania are working in Northern Ireland, but, ultimately, that is a short-term transfer of labour to meet some of the skills deficits here. However, the wider Europe will include a great many opportunities to help to develop entrepreneurial skills, advice and infrastructure so that companies in eastern Europe can build their skills and manufacturing capacity to the levels that we expect.

Our focus should be on the development of skills that can be used in a worldwide market, and we should use those skills to build markets in eastern Europe. In order to make a difference, we should also work with our strong neighbour, the Republic of Ireland, and our strong partners in the rest of the United Kingdom.

Mr McNarry: Is the Minister saying that, if Northern Ireland is to retain its economic base, 14-year-olds should head in that direction? Should a devolved Government co-operate and collaborate with central Government and say that they need incentives and investment to build factories, for example, to train young people and to create jobs?

Mr Hanson: Yes, but Northern Ireland will compete on the basis of skills. I do not necessarily anticipate that factories will be built here. People could be based in Northern Ireland and service manufacturing plants or sell their intellectual property, throughout the world. Those are the advantages of living in modern times. I am only forty-nine and three quarters, and when I was at school, I was not even taught computer skills.

Mr McNarry: What age is the Minister?

Mr Hanson: I am forty-nine and three quarters.
[Laughter.]

When I was at school, we did not consider today's industries. Not only must we have the vision to examine the needs of 14-year-old pupils, but we must think about what five-year-old children will require in 20 years' time.

Mr Hamilton: The Minister has said that if, on the one hand, we can develop, from top to bottom, a holistic, focused and concentrated policy approach to innovation and science that includes private-sector responsibilities, we could do the same for schools and education. We could then build the supporting infrastructure.

Recently, Citigroup executives from the United States and England were in Belfast for the opening of the company's technology centre. They could not believe that, with our telecommunications facilities, work could be delivered from Northern Ireland to the US virtually in real time. In its report, the subgroup highlighted the importance of increasing the speed from two megabytes to eight megabytes; in the context of CSR, the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment wonders whether the speed could rise to 20 megabytes. If people have the right skills — and Northern Ireland has a modern telecommunications infrastructure that is the envy of Europe — perhaps the north-west could have a telecoms support network that could be connected to a telecoms hub. There are real opportunities. The question is will new fiscal policies and more money be made available? Regardless of that, we must use those resources we have well.

Mr Hanson: Intellectual manufacturing will generate wealth that will, in my view, sustain people in basic industries — the construction industry is one example — and support services.

We must also focus on the tourism market. For reasons that are known to all of us and that we do not need to rehearse, Northern Ireland has not been the great tourist destination that it could be. However, some places have the potential to be appealing tourist attractions, and the infrastructure is being put in place. A couple of days ago, my colleague Maria Eagle was in Derry to celebrate the completion of phase 1 of the walled city of Derry signature project. The Titanic Quarter is being developed as a tourist destination, which will create jobs in the service sector — in hotels and restaurants — and will contribute to a growth in the use of public transport.

Mr McNarry: There are great aspirations behind the Minister's positive comments, and I thank him for that. However, he needs to convince me that he is confident about sustainability.

Mr Burns: I support Mr Dawson's point that corporation tax is an important, but difficult, issue. However, other issues are even more difficult, and we will get over corporation tax.

When the Assembly is up and running, there will be joint ministerial trade missions with representatives from the Republic of Ireland. My fear is that if we cannot offer the same tax rates as the Republic of Ireland, people in Northern Ireland who live within a 25-mile radius of the border will want to work in the Republic.

Might east of the Bann become a great place for public-sector workers, such as those who work in Government offices and in hospitals, and so forth? Given that nobody who works in that capacity produces anything, could the public sector be caught up in the application of corporation tax? It is critical that that tax does not affect that sector.

What effect will the proposals have on reducing dependency on the public sector and lessening the need for Treasury subventions?

Mr Hanson: I am not in favour of reducing the public sector per se; I am in favour of developing the private sector so that the public sector becomes a smaller part of Northern Ireland's economy.

I did not join the Labour Party or go into politics to cut public spending or to reduce the amount of money that is spent on health and education. My mission is to ensure that we invest public-service resources appropriately in health, education and many other public services so that they become world-class provisions. We are trying to reform public services and to find different ways to deliver them.

However, the issue is not about reducing the resources that are spent. We need to ensure that the private sector grows so that the money that goes into the public sector from the total economy is reduced. It is unfortunate that there is still too much dependence on the public sector in Northern Ireland for job creation. The private sector needs to grow to ensure that people have the sufficient skills to increase their wealth and prosperity. That will mean that people west and east of the Bann will have a mixture of employment markets, including a good public-sector market in Government that provides jobs in hospitals, schools, libraries, transport and other good public-sector providers. In such circumstances, people will also have an opportunity to develop their economic capacity through any potential new industries while still being involved, wherever possible, in manufacturing in Northern Ireland. Therefore, a balance must be struck. The Secretary of State has said that the current balance is wrong. However, the strategy does not mean a reduction in the public sector overall but a growth in the private sector.

I know that we have covered corporation tax in some detail, but I accept that it is a difficulty. As I said earlier, if two people, one of whom lives in Dundalk and the other in Newry, want to set up a business in the greater Newry/Dundalk area, the different corporation-tax band might be one of the factors that drives them to Dundalk rather than to Newry. I accept that.

However, both members and I know that, particularly as the political process continues, people will work in Dundalk and live in Newry, and vice versa. That cross-border activity exists, and it is much easier to live and work in those circumstances than it was 10 years ago. When I went to Newry before Christmas, I saw a great deal of co-operation between people on both sides of the border on the infrastructure and on marketing the whole region. That co-operation is crucial, and not just where corporation tax is concerned. Although that is an important issue, the skills and the potential that that region can offer will attract jobs and industry.

Mr Hamilton: We could not let the meeting pass without saying that we fought the Irish Government tooth and nail for the 700 Citigroup jobs. Those jobs came to Northern Ireland because of the skills, education and the availability of the labour force here. Those jobs could have gone to Dublin, but they did not: they came to Belfast. That wee success story should go on the record.

Mr Dawson: Obviously, we all support the developments in, and promotion of, tourism. However, one of our previous reports noted our concern that, to date, those tourism projects have not been supported fully. That is one reason why we have asked for additional money.

In our second report, we had a strategic look at the roads' infrastructure. We did that partially to support tourism but also to develop the economy. We identified several roads over and above those that are in the existing development plans. The response to that work was the identification of the costs of those roads. However, there was no indication as to whether the Government thought that our suggestions on the upgrading of those strategic roads in the region had any merit. As David McNarry has been a bit parochial, the Minister will forgive me for mentioning that the A8 to Larne is one of those key strategic roads.

Mr McLaughlin: I want to know about the Derry to Dublin road. [Laughter.]

12.15 pm

Mr Dawson: All those that we have identified are key roads for the development of the economy and the tourism industry.

Mr McNarry: There is an election coming up.

Mr Dawson: Do the Government have a view as to the merits of our proposals?

Mr Hanson: I looked at the list of roads that are mentioned as requiring improvement in recommendation 8 in the subgroup's second report. I recognise that all politics are local and that, at the end of the day, politicians are judged on the roads as much as on anything else. We have a number of current road-transport plans, some of which mirror the subgroup's suggestions. Mr Dawson will have seen from the response to the recommendation that issues such as the dualling of the A6 from Derry to Dungiven, the A5 from Strabane to Lifford, and the improvement link between the A8 and the M2 to reduce delays at the Sandyknowes roundabout are already being addressed. In the budget for 2007-08, which I have recently produced, additional resources are being allocated to road development and road transport, and we will certainly examine the question of priority for the links that are mentioned in the subgroup's report.

I must say that it is important that the tourism revenue —

Mr McNarry: We are not getting an answer.

Mr Hanson: I cannot give a guarantee. We are almost in purdah. If the subgroup can secure a guarantee, we can go from there.

Tourism revenue has grown by 9% over the past year and currently contributes more than £500 million to the Northern Ireland economy. As I have said, the walled city of Derry signature project, the Titanic Quarter and the Giant's Causeway centre are just some of the key tourism infrastructure projects that we are developing. In Belfast, projects such as the development of Victoria Square, the north-west quarter and the Cathedral Quarter have tourism potential. They will bring in people from other parts of the United Kingdom, from the Republic and from cruise ships who will spend money in the city.

Mr Dawson: My key point was that, both in tourism and roads planning, we have identified sums of money over and above existing commitments, and over and above any Government plans to invest in those areas, thus generating a need for a greater package than is currently on offer.

Mr Hanson: Hopefully, Mr Dawson will have the opportunity to develop those projects very shortly.

Mr Dawson: With the additional money?

The Chairperson (Mr T O'Reilly): I appreciate that we are close to the Minister's time limit.

It has been announced that a feasibility study is to be conducted on a rapid transit system to link Belfast city centre with the Titanic Quarter. What is Government's preliminary view on funding arrangements for such a system?

Mr Hanson: The Government's view has been that many of the developments in the Titanic Quarter can ultimately be funded from the benefits of the private sector's setting up the area. The Government, as a partner, can facilitate that, and I am very hopeful that we will be able to attract people from the private sector who are able to put in place the financial support mechanisms to help with infrastructure costs for those areas.

The signature project for the Titanic Quarter very much depends on the current application for National Lottery funding. That would bring in significant resources that the Government may have to match. It would be a financial cost to us, but, in broad terms, I am hopeful that funding for the infrastructure will be secured from the private sector. It will make significant gains in due course from the business and residential arms of that development, and it is important that it contribute to the cost of the infrastructure.

Mr Dawson: It would be a pity, Chairman, if the last word from the Minister was that the future development of Northern Ireland's economy is dependent on a lottery.

Mr Hanson: Well, the signature project is dependent on National Lottery funding.

The Chairperson (Mr T O'Reilly): Mitchel has indicated that he wishes to ask one final question.

Mr Hanson: If it is a friendly one, I will take it.

Mr McNarry: He wants to know the numbers for this week's National Lottery draw.

Mr McLaughlin: I would contribute some of it to the economic package.

We have been given a lot of statistics, and the Minister was good enough to rehearse some of them. However, the underlying reality is that 500,000 people are economically inactive. I endorse strongly the Minister's comments about defending the public sector while growing the private sector and rebalancing the economy. What will the draft regional economic strategy say about targets to bring people out of the 500,000 economically inactive and into economic activity?

Mr Hanson: It is a key area, which is linked not only to the draft regional economic strategy, but to 'Lifetime Opportunities', our anti-poverty and social inclusion strategy, which the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister (OFMDFM) published in November 2006.

I am anxious to ensure that the economically inactive return to the workplace. Various Departments are looking at ways in which to introduce positive measures to get people off benefits and back into work. We are also looking at ways in which to ensure that people obtain the necessary skills to raise their income level. Like the subgroup, I am not satisfied that Northern Ireland still has very high levels of poverty, which are often centred in particular constituencies, or in particular wards in those constituencies.

The Department for Social Development (DSD), for which I have responsibility, is currently undertaking a major programme of neighbourhood renewal. The Department is trying to restore the social infrastructure through investing in areas with the highest unemployment rates and levels of deprivation. It is also looking to launch projects that will help to raise the expectations and quality of life of those people who are excluded from society.

As well as the issues that we have covered today, such as the economic infrastructure and economic possibilities, we must consider running benefit take-up campaigns. We must think of ways in which to get people off benefits and into work. First, however, we must look at ways in which we can provide people with the basic skills training for them to get jobs. Those plans form a key part of the Government's overall strategy to tackle poverty and social exclusion. We must ensure that all parts of Northern Ireland benefit from the wealth and prosperity that we hope to create, because it would be of no use if that wealth were to impact only on certain parts of Northern Ireland.

That wealth must reach places such as Mr McLaughlin's constituency and some of the Belfast wards. In particular, it must impact on those rural areas where large pockets of deprivation and social exclusion endure. To achieve that will prove a difficult test. We have had to prioritise, and we shall focus on 30-odd wards and neighbourhoods. However, I am conscious of the fact that, in order to tackle those social exclusion issues, we must undertake cross-departmental work.

Mr McLaughlin: The draft regional economic strategy will be silent on the issue of social exclusion, however.

Mr Hanson: No, it will not be silent on that issue. I see the strategy as part of an overall Government package. Yes, we are committed to creating the new jobs of tomorrow and to developing the economy of Northern Ireland, but work to achieve that will go hand in hand with our commitment to tackling social exclusion and to getting those people who currently do not benefit from the wealth and prosperity that there is here — for there is still great wealth and prosperity in parts of Northern Ireland — to contribute to, and benefit from, the community at large.

That will require cross-departmental work. The draft regional economic strategy, DSD's neighbourhood renewal strategy and OFMDFM's anti-poverty and social inclusion strategy are all drivers that will help to ensure that we not only create wealth but share it fairly in order that people have an opportunity to participate in society.

Mr Hamilton: The offices that run the pilot schemes to tackle economic inactivity have increased numbers back into the market fourfold and fivefold, so many of those pilots will be extended next year into a more general application.

The key point to note about the draft regional economic strategy is that it will soon be published for consultation. We have had to refine all the work on the question of targets. Not so long ago, the Economic Development Forum (EDF) was unclear about targets, but now it is more positive. The purpose of the consultation will be to agree collectively a document that we can all get behind in order to deliver what we think is required.

The Chairperson (Mr T O'Reilly): On behalf of the subgroup, Minister, I thank you, Leo, Wilfie and Nuala for coming along this morning to answer our questions.

If you or any of your officials wish to contribute any further information, the subgroup would appreciate receiving it before close of business next Monday.

Mr Hanson: I appreciate that the subgroup's time-scale is limited. Thank you for your hospitality today.

The Chairperson (Mr T O'Reilly): Our pleasure.

Adjourned at 12.23 pm.
