Executive Summary

Key aspects of the Bill

1. The Welfare Reform Bill consists of 7 Parts, 134 clauses and 12 schedules and is generally acknowledged as the most radical reform of the welfare system in a generation.
2. The stated aim of the Bill from an operational perspective is to make the welfare system simpler to administer and, from a customer's perspective, easier to understand. The key principle of the Bill is to make work pay by ensuring that a person will always be better off in work than on benefits.
3. Central to the Bill is the introduction of a new benefit called Universal Credit which replaces a wide range of existing benefits; the replacement of Disability Living Allowance (DLA) with a Personal Independence Payment (PIP); the introduction of a new sanctions' regime; and the establishment of a benefit cap, set at £26k per annum.

Key Issues

Process

4. During the course of the oral evidence sessions the Committee became increasingly concerned about the potential impact of the Bill on human rights and equality. Subsequently, at its meeting on 8 November 2012 the Committee agreed a motion under Standing Order 35 to refer the Bill to an Ad Hoc Committee on Conformity with Human Rights and Equality Requirements.
5. The motion was supported by the Assembly on 20 November 2012 and was then referred to the Ad Hoc Committee and the formal consideration of the Bill by the Committee for Social Development was suspended.
6. Prior to the formal Committee Stage resuming the Committee agreed a motion to extend the Committee Stage by two weeks, until 19 February 2013, and this was supported by the Assembly on 28 January 2013.
7. The Ad Hoc Committee reported to the Assembly on 29 January 2013 and the Committee resumed its consideration of the Bill on 30 January 2013.

Approach to recommendations

8. While the Committee agreed the general principles and aims of the Bill it had serious concerns about its potential negative impact, particularly on vulnerable groups. Therefore, in its engagement with stakeholders the Committee specifically asked what mitigating measures needed to be put in place in order to minimise the impact on the most vulnerable in society. In drawing up these recommendations the Committee was acutely aware of the arguments relating to parity with GB and the potential cost implications. While social security arrangements are devolved to the Northern Ireland Assembly, the costs (approximately £3bn per annum) are covered by the Treasury and are separate from the NI Block Grant.
9. The Minister made it clear to the Committee that any deviation from parity that had an associated cost would have to be borne by the Block Grant i.e. the Treasury would not make any additional funding provision to accommodate these changes. Therefore, any recommendations that had additional costs associated with them would have to be discussed and agreed by the Executive Committee.

10. The Committee acknowledged that it did not have a role in dictating the spending priorities of the Executive nor was it in a position to evaluate the spending priorities of other departments vis à vis the costs associated with its recommendations.
11. In that context, where the Committee made recommendations that had associated costs the Committee agreed to oppose those related clauses, without prejudice to the outcome of the Minister's discussions and individual positions that may be taken by Members at a later stage of the Bill process.
12. Members felt that this approach allowed the Minister the flexibility to engage with Executive colleagues on the potential to fund these recommendations and therefore offered the best possibility for adoption of a range of mitigation measures to address their concerns and those of stakeholders.
13. These measures are encapsulated in the Recommendations section of the report and are summarised below.

Summary of Recommendations

14. The Committee had serious concerns in relation to clause 4, shared by stakeholders, that where one member of a couple refuses to sign a Claimant Commitment as part of a joint claim, then no payment will be made to either partner. The Committee felt this was inherently unfair and recommended that the member who is willing to sign is treated as a single claimant.
15. Frequency of payments was repeated by stakeholders as a key area of concern, underpinned by comments regarding the potential ability of people to budget their benefits on a monthly basis. The Committee acknowledged the Minister's consultation on this issue which aims to develop criteria for more frequent payments to be made to claimants in exceptional circumstances. However, the Committee favoured a twice monthly payment by default with an option for monthly payments if requested. The Committee noted the potential costs associated with this but asked the Minister to explore with the Executive Committee how this recommendation might be funded.
16. The impact of this Bill on children and the disabled was raised on a number of occasions by stakeholders and was of importance to the Committee. In relation to clause 10 the Committee was concerned that the disability element of Child Tax Credit would be cut from £57 per week to £28 per week unless the child is receiving the high rate of care allowance or is registered as blind. The Committee acknowledged that the cost of retaining the Child Tax Credit lower rate was around £11.3 million per annum. However, it was supportive of the Child Tax Credit lower rate being retained and recommended this to the Minister.
17. Despite the assurance of transitional protection the Committee shared the concerns of stakeholders, particularly groups representing disabled people, about the removal of the Severe Disability Premium. The Department noted that if a Severe Disability Premium were to be introduced to Universal Credit it would cost in the region of £52.6m per annum if paid in line with existing benefit rules and rates, and also have additional administration costs as this benefit would not form part of the new IT system. However, given the concerns expressed by stakeholders the Committee believed that this option warranted discussion by the Executive.
18. The introduction of higher level sanctions under clause 26 raised significant concerns among stakeholders particularly the potential for loss of benefit for up to 3 years and the subsequent impact this could have on children. The Committee opposed this clause and recommended that the Minister explore the possibility of varying the sanctions regime.
19. The period of entitlement to contributory ESA is being limited to 365 days under clause 52. Members reflected on the fairness of paying into system for many years yet only receiving one year's payment and noted that the Minister shared their concerns. The Committee heard that the cost of extending this was approximately £3 million per month and recommended that the Minister discuss this issue at Executive with a view to making funds available to extend the period of contribution-based ESA to more than 12 months.
20. The Committee was concerned about the particular impact clause 54 would have on young people with disabilities. These concerns were echoed by Disability Action. The Committee heard from stakeholders that the cost of the current provisions was approximately £390k per year. With this in mind the Committee recommended that the current arrangements are maintained.
21. Clause 69 was of key concern to the Committee and all stakeholders viewed this as potentially having considerable and widespread impact. The NI Housing Executive noted that around 26, 000 of its tenants would be deemed as under-occupying their homes and NIFHA stated that 6,500 housing association tenants would also be under-occupying as a result of this clause and therefore subject to a reduction in housing benefit. The Committee noted that the Minister shared some of their concerns. The Committee opposed this clause.

22. The issue of split payments (i.e. a percentage of Universal Credit paid to both parties in a couple) was raised by a number of groups that had concerns that a single household payment could potentially have a negative impact on the financial independence of women; and therefore a potentially negative impact on children, given that it is still largely the case that the woman is the main carer and/or the second earner in a family. While the Committee had originally considered an amendment to address this issue, concern was raised about the potential for any amendment to the Bill to be too restrictive and therefore have unintended consequences. Therefore, the Committee decided not to pursue this, but instead recommended that the criteria that will determine the basis for split payments in exceptional circumstances which is currently being developed by the Department, should give priority to determining how payments can be made to ensure the financial independence of women, who tend to be the main carer or second earner, and therefore help protect the interests of children.
23. The new sanctions regime raised a number of concerns for stakeholders and the Committee questioned the Department about this on several occasions. The Committee was clear that it does not condone fraud or attempted fraud but it did have some reservations about the proportionality of proposed penalties. Therefore in relation to clause 109 the Committee believed that informal cautions should be considered as an option for minor cases, rather than an administrative penalty (£350) and in opposing this clause, made a recommendation to that effect.
24. The Committee was also concerned whether the level of the administrative penalties was too high for actual cases of fraud, an issue also raised by stakeholders. This concern was largely based on the impact that a sanction could have on a family as the result of the action of an individual. Specifically, the Committee queried whether the increase in the administrative penalty from 30% of the overpayment (as a result of fraud) to 50%, up to a maximum of £2000 was reasonable. The Committee was concerned with the level of the administrative penalty and asked the Minister to review these and therefore opposed this clause.
25. The Committee also discussed the potential to retain the option of a formal caution instead of an administrative penalty (clause 115) but on balance they believed that this could have long term serious implications e.g. impact on job applications. While the Committee agreed this clause it recommended that the concept of proportionality is used by the Department in determining whether an informal caution is more appropriate in certain cases of benefit fraud.
26. The Committee agreed amendments as per the report of the Examiner of Statutory Rules to ensure that the regulation-making power in clauses 33 and 91 are subject to the confirmatory procedure.
27. The Committee acknowledged the key role that the independent advice sector plays in providing advice on the benefits system to claimants and the potential increase in the demand for advice services as a result of the changes to the current system. The Committee noted that the Coalition Government has agreed a £65m fund, created by the Cabinet Office and the Big Lottery Fund, to support the advice sector across the UK between April 2013 and April 2015, as Universal Credit is rolled out. The Committee recommended that additional resources are made available to the independent advice sector, including local advice centres, in NI during this period and subsequent years, to ensure that all benefit claimants can access independent advice relating to the new system.
28. The Committee also recommended that the Department for Social Development:
 - take cognisance of the recommendations contained in the Ad Hoc Committee's report on the Bill's Conformity with Human Rights and Equality Requirements;

- establishes a monitoring programme to determine whether there is any adverse differential impact on any or all Section 75 groups; and
 - takes all necessary mitigation measures to address this impact.
29. The Committee acknowledged the on-going consultation on Maximising Incomes and Outcomes: a Plan for Improving the Uptake of Benefits and the progress made to date by the Department to ensure that claimants receive all the benefits they are entitled to.
30. However, the Committee recommends that a comprehensive, strategic approach is established on the basis of best practice to maximise benefit uptake for claimants, and that the Department do so in partnership with the voluntary and community sector as well as all relevant customer-facing public bodies.

Recommendations

Clause 4 - Basic conditions

31. Recommendation: Where one person in a couple is willing to sign a Claimant Commitment and the other member of the couple isn't, then the person willing to sign is treated as a single claimant.
32. The Committee believed that it is inherently unfair that where one person in a couple is willing to sign a Claimant Commitment and the other member of the couple isn't that no payment is made to either person.
33. The Committee noted that the Department believes the numbers disallowed in these circumstances will probably be very low although no costs have been attached to this recommendation.

Clause 10 Responsibility for children and young people

34. Recommendation: That the Child Tax Credit lower rate be restored.
35. The Committee shared the concerns raised by Disability Action, Citizens Advice, NICCY, ICTU and others about the impact that this clause would have on families with a disabled child.
36. The Committee noted that there are potentially 6,000 children who will receive more under UC (a severely disabled child will receive £353 per month compared to the current Child Tax Credit equivalent of £345 per month i.e. £9 per month more). The Committee also noted that 7,600 children will receive less under UC (£123 compared with the Child Tax Credit lower rate of £245 per month i.e. £122 per month less).
37. The Committee noted that the Minister shared the Committee concerns.
38. The Committee believed that protecting the most vulnerable people in society was a key aim of its scrutiny of the Bill and while it noted that that the costs associated with restoring the Child Tax Credit lower rate was £11.3million it recommended that the Minister discuss this issue at Executive with a view to making funds available to restore the Child Tax Credit lower rate and amend this clause accordingly.

Clause 12 Other particular needs or circumstances

39. Recommendation: That the Severe Disability Premium be retained.
40. The Committee noted that a range of stakeholders were concerned about the removal of the Severe Disability Premium and favoured the retention of the Premium in full.
41. The Committee noted the Department referred to the Coalition Government's intention to raise the weekly rate of the support component (equivalent to £34.05 today) in stages to around £81 per week "as resources become available".
42. The Committee was concerned that given the higher rates of disability in Northern Ireland this clause was likely to have a disproportionate impact on people here.
43. The Committee was also of the opinion that the reference to "as resources become available" was not specific enough to provide the reassurance they required to agree this clause.

44. Therefore, as with clause 10, the Committee believed that protecting the most vulnerable people in society was a key aim of its scrutiny of the Bill and while it noted that the costs associated with retaining the Severe Disability Premium were high (estimated at £52.6m per annum) the Committee believed that this option warranted discussion at the Executive.
45. The Committee supported the Minister in bringing the Committee's recommendation to the Executive Committee with a view to making funds available to retain the Severe Disability Premium.

Clause 26 Higher-level sanctions

46. Recommendation: That the Minister pursue the possibility of varying the sanction regime with DWP
47. The Committee heard concerns from a range of stakeholders concerning the potential impact of a three year sanction, in particular the impact on families as a result of one person's actions.
48. The Committee was assured that a three year sanction would only apply to claimants who are subject to all work-related requirements and who have deliberately and repeatedly avoided their most important responsibilities. The Department also confirmed that a person subject to a three year sanction will also have received at least two previous high level sanctions and the consequences of continued non-compliance will have been clearly explained.
49. The Committee requested that the Minister consider whether there was room for variation in relation to the sanction regime and the Minister agreed to pursue the possibility of varying the sanction regime with DWP

Clause 52 Period of entitlement to contributory allowance

50. Recommendation: That the Minister explore options to extend the period of contribution-based ESA to more than 12 months.
51. The Committee was concerned that the period of entitlement to contribution-based ESA will be restricted to 365 days.
52. The Committee noted that the Minister shared these concerns.
53. While acknowledging that the estimated cost of not implementing this measure was approximately £3m per month the Committee wished to explore the possibility of extending the period of contribution-based ESA to more than 12 months.

Clause 54 Condition relating to youth

54. Recommendation: That the current arrangements, where some claimants under 20 years old qualify for contributory ESA without meeting the usual paid National Insurance contributions, should be maintained.
55. The Committee was concerned about the particular impact this would have on young people with disabilities which was shared by Disability Action. The Law Centre and the NI Welfare Reform Group noted that the cost of the current provisions was approximately £390k per year.

Clause 69 Housing benefit: determination of appropriate maximum

56. Recommendation: That this clause is not implemented.

57. The Committee heard that should this clause be enacted, 18, 850 NIHE tenants (9,215 singles; 601 couples; 9,034 families) will be deemed as under-occupying by one bedroom and therefore subject to a 14% reduction in their housing benefit.
58. 7, 318 NIHE tenants (5,415 singles; 1, 047 couples; 856 families) will be deemed as under-occupying by 2 or more bedrooms and subject to a 25% reduction in housing benefit.
59. In addition, NIFHA informed the Committee that approximately 6, 500 housing association tenants would also be subject to a reduction in housing benefit as a result of this clause.
60. In total almost 33, 000 tenants will be subject to a reduction in housing benefit as a result of this clause. However, the Committee noted that considerably more people will be affected given that almost 10, 000 families will be subject to a reduction in benefit.
61. The Committee heard from the NI Housing Executive that they would not be able to provide alternative housing provision that reflects the appropriate needs of tenants should they opt to 'downsize' to mitigate the effects of a reduction in housing benefit.
62. The Committee also shared concerns of stakeholders that the segregated nature of our society may restrict options that people otherwise would have to move to areas where appropriate, but limited, housing may be available.
63. The Committee acknowledged that the Minister shares some of the Committee's concerns and noted that an inter-departmental group, which also includes stakeholders, has been established to consider options for dealing with the impact of 'size criteria' and is due to report in April.
64. The Committee recognised that the Minister was not in a position to unilaterally take a decision to implement the Committee's recommendation to oppose this clause given the associated costs (£18m) and the subsequent implications this may have for the NI Block Grant and, therefore, other Departmental budgets.
65. However, the Committee noted that the Minister was willing to take the Committee's recommendation to the Executive for consideration in the context of a re-examination of Executive spending priorities.

Clause 99 Payments to joint claimants

66. Recommendation: The exceptional criteria that will determine the basis for split payments should give priority to determining how payments can be made to ensure the financial independence of women, who tend to be the main carer or second earner, and therefore help protect the interests of children.
67. The Committee was keen to define how payments could be made to the primary carer or second earner where a joint claim is made. However, on discussion the Committee recognised that without more detailed consideration of how, in particular, 'primary carer' would be defined any proposed amendment could prove too restrictive, or perhaps have unintended consequences in respect of whether the person receiving the payment was the appropriate person to do so.
68. With that in mind the Committee acknowledged that clause 99 allows for payment to be made to a nominated person and that the Department can also decide to whom the payment can be made irrespective of any nomination by the couple.
69. The Committee also acknowledged that the Department was developing criteria with input from a cross section of representatives from the community sector and academia with an interest in the different types of proposed flexible payment arrangements and was due to report in April.

Twice Monthly Payments

70. Recommendation: That Universal Credit shall be paid twice monthly unless a single claimant or the members of a couple jointly opt, in making their claim, to be paid on a monthly basis.
71. The Committee shared the concerns of stakeholders that people who have been used to receiving benefits on a more regular basis may have difficulty budgeting should Universal Credit be paid on a monthly basis.
72. Stakeholders proposed that there should be a choice of payment i.e. weekly, fortnightly or monthly so that the system is geared towards the needs of the claimant.
73. The Committee noted that the Minister shared its concerns around the monthly payment and that many claimants need more frequent payments.
74. The Committee also acknowledged that the Minister was developing proposals to make more frequent payments to claimants in 'exceptional circumstances' and that a report on what the criteria for more flexible payment might be would be available in April.
75. However, the Committee felt that everyone should receive a twice monthly payment by default unless they opt for a monthly payment.

Clause 109 Penalty in respect of benefit fraud not resulting in overpayment

76. Recommendation: That an informal caution is an option where fraud has been attempted but no overpayment has taken place.
77. The Department has indicated that this scenario deals with intentional attempted fraud and that currently the only option the Department has is to pursue court action. The Department contends that this approach may not be a proportionate response either and that it feels that an administrative penalty is a more appropriate way forward where fraud has been attempted but not resulted in overpayment.
78. The Committee was concerned that this clause establishes an administrative penalty (£350) where a fraud has been attempted but no overpayment has taken place. The Committee felt that an informal caution may be more appropriate in certain cases.

Clause 110 Amount of penalty

79. Recommendation: That the Minister reviews the level of the administrative penalty.
80. Where there is overpayment as a result of actual fraud the Committee heard that the administrative penalty will increase from 30% of the overpayment to 50%, up to a maximum of £2000. The Committee also heard that the claimant is free to decline the offer of an administrative penalty and go through the courts.
81. The Committee was concerned with the level of the administrative penalty and asked the Minister to review this.

Clause 115 Cautions

82. Recommendation: That the concept of proportionality is used in determining whether an informal caution is more appropriate in certain cases.
83. While the Committee agreed to this clause it believed that an informal caution might also be an alternative in minor cases.

Assembly Control – Amendments to clauses 33 and 91

84. Recommendation: That the Committee makes an amendment to Clause 44 and 93 to ensure that the regulation-making powers in clauses 33 and 91 are subject to the confirmatory procedure as per the recommendation of the Examiner of Statutory Rules report.

Independent Statutory Advice

85. The Committee acknowledged the key role that the independent advice sector plays in providing advice on the benefits system to claimants and the potential increase in the demand for advice services as a result of the changes to the current system. The Committee noted that the Coalition Government has agreed a £65m fund, created by the Cabinet Office and the Big Lottery Fund, to support the advice sector across the UK between April 2013 and April 2015, as Universal Credit is rolled out. The Committee recommended that additional resources are made available to the independent advice sector, including local advice centres, in NI during this period and subsequent years, to ensure that all benefit claimants can access independent advice relating to the new system.

Maximising Benefits

86. The Committee acknowledged the on-going consultation on Maximising Incomes and Outcomes: a Plan for Improving the Uptake of Benefits and the progress made to date by the Department to ensure that claimants receive all the benefits they are entitled to.
87. However, the Committee recommended that a comprehensive, strategic approach is established on the basis of best practice to maximise benefit uptake for claimants, and that the Department do so in partnership with the voluntary and community sector as well as all relevant customer-facing public bodies.

Introduction

88. The Welfare Reform Bill was introduced to the Northern Ireland Assembly on 1 October 2012 and referred to the Committee for consideration in accordance with Standing Order 33(1) on completion of the Second Stage of the Bill on 9 October 2012.
89. At Introduction the Minister made the following statement under section 9 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998:
90. “In my view the Welfare Reform Bill would be within the legislative competence of the Northern Ireland Assembly”
91. The Bill as drafted contains 7 parts with 134 Clauses and 12 Schedules.
92. The Bill makes provision for Northern Ireland corresponding to provision contained in the Welfare Reform Act 2012 (c. 5). It is part of the on-going process of welfare reform and modernisation of the benefit system and has been described as the biggest reform of the welfare system for a generation.
93. The major proposal in the Bill is the introduction of a new benefit, to be known as Universal Credit, which will replace existing benefits for people both in and out of work. The Bill also makes provision for a new benefit, Personal Independence Payment, which will replace the existing Disability Living Allowance.
94. During the Committee Stage the Committee held 22 meetings to consider the Bill and related issues.
95. The Committee had before it the Bill, the Explanatory and Financial Memorandum as well as the Report from the Examiner of Statutory Rules on the Delegated Powers. The Committee also considered the report from the Ad Hoc Committee on Conformity with Human Rights and Equality Requirements.
96. At its meeting on 8 November 2012 the Committee agreed a motion under Standing Order 35 to refer the Bill to an Ad Hoc Committee for consideration of the human rights and equality implications of the Bill.
97. The Assembly supported this motion and the formal Committee Stage of the Bill was suspended from 20 November to 29 January 2013.
98. At its meeting of 17 January the Committee agreed a motion to extend its consideration of the Bill until 19 February. This motion was subsequently supported by the Assembly on 28 January 2013.
99. The Committee resumed its consideration of the Bill on 30th January 2013.
100. The Committee published a media sign posting notice in the Belfast Telegraph, Irish News and Newsletter and also wrote directly to a range of stakeholders inviting their views on the Bill. The Committee was specifically interested in hearing stakeholders’ views on mitigation measures that could be adopted to minimize the potential adverse impact of the Bill.
101. In response to its call for evidence the Committee received written submissions from 55 organisations and individuals. Copies of the written submissions are in Appendix 3.
102. The Committee took oral evidence from 31 organisations including the Department, in the latter case on several occasions.
103. The Committee carried out its formal clause-by-clause scrutiny of the Bill on 12 February 2013 and agreed its report on 14 February.

Consideration of the Bill

104. In response to its call for evidence the Committee received written submissions from 55 organisations and individuals. The Committee took oral evidence from 31 organisations including the Department.

General Principles and Aims of the Bill

105. The Committee agreed with the General Principles of the Bill that the benefit system should be simplified, that work should always pay and that people who are capable of working should be better off in work than on benefits. There was also wide agreement among stakeholders on these principles. However, the written and oral evidence revealed widespread concern among stakeholders about how the Bill would achieve this without negatively impacting on those currently on benefits. These concerns were largely shared by the Committee which sought to identify key issues and reach an agreed way forward to mitigate the impact of the Bill, taking into consideration the potential costs associated with any mitigation measures.

The Committee noted the following aims of the Bill:

- To make provisions and confer regulation-making powers for an integrated working-age benefit to be called Universal Credit, which, depending on the claimant's circumstances, will include a standard allowance (to cover basic living costs) along with additional elements for responsibility for children or young persons, housing costs and other particular needs.
- To make provision for changes to the responsibilities of claimants of JSA, ESA and IS in the period leading up to the introduction of Universal Credit and the abolition of income-based JSA, income-related ESA and IS (the interim period).
- To make changes to a number of other social security benefits.
- To set out the framework for a new benefit called Personal Independence Payment which will replace the Disability Living Allowance.
- To make provisions relating to the administration of social security benefits, including provisions relating to a cap on benefit payments; measures to deal with benefit fraud and enabling the Department to share data with other bodies.
- To make provision to implement proposals which support the principles of the Government's view that parents should be encouraged and supported to make their own family-based arrangements for the maintenance of their children wherever possible, rather than using the statutory maintenance scheme.

Limitations on the Committee's consideration

106. The Committee noted that the Bill was an enabling Bill with much of the detail left to the regulations and guidance, which have yet to be produced. In this regard they reflect the concerns of stakeholders such as the Law Centre which referred to having to work "in a vacuum without all the detail".
107. The Committee acknowledged that there were a number of 'unknowns' which, coupled with ongoing developments in GB, made it difficult to assess the potential overall impact of the Bill.

Human Rights and Equality Issues

108. During its consideration of the Bill a range of stakeholders such as the Human Rights Commission, NICEM, the Law Centre and NICCY raised concerns about the impact of the Bill on human rights and Section 75 groups such as children, older people, and women. Concern was also voiced about the potential unlawfulness of some provisions in the Bill that relate to EU nationals.

109. Given the importance of these issues the Committee agreed a motion, subsequently supported in the Assembly, to refer the Bill to an Ad Hoc Committee on Conformity with Human Rights and Equality Requirements.
110. That Committee made a number of recommendations relevant to the work of the Committee for Social Development in scrutinising the Bill and indeed a number of those recommendations are also reflected in the recommendations contained in this report.
111. In light of the Ad Hoc Committee's recommendations and concerns of stakeholders, the Committee has made a specific recommendation in respect of human rights and equality issues to ensure that monitoring the impact of the changes takes place and to ensure that mitigation measures are subsequently put in place.

Part 1 Universal Credit

112. As the cornerstone of the welfare reforms Universal Credit (UC), as dealt with in clauses 1 to 44, was a key element of the Committee's consideration. The Committee acknowledged that UC will replace means-tested benefits and tax credits for working-age adults.
113. The Department also explained that UC would help people back into work by introducing a taper so that they receive support commensurate with their earnings but that the entitlement to UC will be tied to a range of work-related requirements that the claimant would have to adhere to.
114. The Committee acknowledged these aims but had a number of concerns about how these would be achieved at a practical level. These concerns were shared by stakeholders.

Clause 1 Universal Credit

115. The Committee noted, clause 1 subsection 3 (a)-(d), that this may include, depending on circumstances, a standard allowance, an amount for responsibility for children or young people, an amount for housing costs and amounts for other particular needs or circumstances.

Clause 2 Claims

116. The Committee noted that a claim can be made by a single person or, in the case of a couple, jointly. This clause also gives the Department the power to make regulations which can determine the circumstances in which a member of a couple may make a single person claim.
117. The Committee noted a number of comments by stakeholders under clauses 1 and 2 but these are dealt with under later clauses such as clauses 69 and 99.

Clause 3 Entitlement

118. A single person must meet the Basic Conditions and Financial Conditions to be entitled to UC.

Clause 4 Basic conditions

Mixed-age couples

119. The Committee shared the concerns of the Law Centre, NI Welfare Reform Group and Age NI in relations to clauses 3 and 4; Entitlement and Basic conditions respectively. In particular was the concern that where one member of a couple is over pension age and the other is under it they will be placed on UC and not Pension Credit. Concern was also raised that this could potentially have ramifications for the all-work requirements detailed in clause 22 i.e. a retired person in a mixed-age couple might be subject to various work requirements in order to receive the payment.
120. The Department subsequently confirmed that in such a circumstance the person above retirement age would not be subject to work-related requirements.

Claimant Commitment

121. The Committee expressed serious concerns about Clause 4 – Basic conditions. In particular the situation where one partner refuses to sign the Claimant Commitment and, as a result, neither partner receives a payment despite one person being willing to sign the commitment.
122. The Department reiterated that one of the basic conditions under clause 4 is for joint claims and in this circumstance each claimant will need to accept a Claimant Commitment and was clear that “if either eligible adult in a couple refuses to accept their Claimant Commitment then the claim for the other eligible adult will also end”. The Committee believes this to be fundamentally unfair to the claimant who is willing to sign the Claimant Commitment.

123. The Minister subsequently responded that while he recognised the Committee’s concerns, allowing a separate claim under such circumstances would be a break in parity and have associated costs although the number of people affected by this is expected to be very low. The Minister therefore did not consider that a legislative change was appropriate.

124. However, in its clause-by-clause consideration the Committee did not agree the clause as drafted and recommended that in the case of a joint application, where one person refuses to sign the Claimant Commitment the payment shall be made to the person who is willing to sign the Claimant Commitment and that the Minister should discuss the cost implications with the Executive.

Temporary Absence from NI

125. The Committee questioned the circumstances in which temporary absence from NI is disregarded – clause 4(5). It queried whether the existing rules on habitual residency will be carried forward and if so will additional safeguards, such as clear guidance, be introduced to protect citizens born in Northern Ireland who move abroad and later return to the UK. The Department confirmed that existing rules on habitual residence which apply to income-related benefits will be carried forward into UC. The Department added that there is no definitive list of factors which determines whether a person is habitually resident but rather that each case is considered individually with all relevant factors taken into account. In addition there is guidance in the Decision Maker’s Guide for staff dealing with these cases.

126. The Committee did recognize that the change in relation to the conditions relating to absence from home, depending on the circumstances, might be more generous than at present but that overall there were likely to be winners and losers as indicated by the Law Centre.

Third Party Verification

127. The Committee was concerned that where a person due to extenuating circumstances cannot provide all the required documentation to make a claim then there should be provision made for third party verification, in lieu of required documentation (including identity documents), so that the claim can be made.

128. The Committee welcomed and accepted the Minister’s assurance that that the current practice allowing third party verification for vulnerable claimants will carry forward and that such claimants will still be able to make a claim and have their money paid either via a bank account (if held), or via the Simple Payment service which is aimed at claimants who don’t have access to a bank account.

16/17 year olds registered on training but not placed

129. The Committee was concerned that 16 and 17 year olds who have come out of care or who are registered for training with the Employment Service but have not secured an immediate placement should also be added to the list of specified groups, to mirror the current provision for discretionary hardship payments under Jobseeker’s Allowance.

130. The Committee noted the Minister’s response that those 16/17 year olds on the Training for Success programme are paid a non-means tested Education Maintenance Allowance of £40 a week while in training and this is unique to NI.

131. The Committee also noted in the Minister’s response that 16/17 year olds in these circumstances would be eligible for assistance, providing they met criteria, from the proposed Discretionary Support Scheme only where they are estranged from their family and householders in their own right in circumstances where they meet loan/grant eligibility criteria.

16/17 year olds coming out of care

132. The Committee noted the Minister's response that Discretionary Support will be extended to 16/17 year olds by exception – i.e. where the applicant is estranged from their family and potentially a householder in their own right. The position for those in care is that these cases should be dealt with outside of the social security system.

Clause 5 – Financial conditions

133. Entitlement to UC will be dependent on a claimant's capital and income. This was of concern to a range of stakeholders including NIPSA, Citizens Advice and the Law Centre as currently there is no upper capital limits applied to pension credit or tax credits. It is the aim to introduce a capital limit of £16,000 i.e. those who have savings above this limit will not be eligible for UC. The Committee accepted that this would potentially affect older claimants who have had more time to save towards retirement. In relation to this the Committee noted that a number of stakeholders referred to the Joseph Rowntree report, Monitoring Poverty and Social Exclusion, which noted a rise in pensioner poverty in NI whereas there was a decrease in pensioner poverty in Great Britain.

Clause 6 Restrictions on entitlement

134. The Committee raised concerns about the number of 'waiting days' i.e. a person may not be entitled to UC for a short time despite meeting the conditions of entitlement. The Department confirmed that this was to avoid the administrative costs associated with making awards for very short periods of time and that the clause ensured that the waiting time under subsection (2) of this clause cannot be more than 7 days.
135. The Committee was concerned about the impact this might have on passported benefits that are based on entitlement to UC but was assured that the award notice should give them that underlying entitlement. The Department confirmed this would be addressed in regulations and in passported benefits.
136. The Committee sought reassurance from the Minister that there shall be no loss of passported benefits as a result of clause 6.
137. The Committee welcomed the Minister's reassurance that the notification/award notice will make it clear that an underlying entitlement exists to enable claimants to be able to access passport benefits.

Clause 7 Basis of awards

138. The Committee notes that this clause provides that an award of UC is to be payable in respect of an assessment period. The Committee addresses the issue of frequency of payment in Clause 99.

Clause 8 Calculation of awards

139. NIPSA had a general concern that the proposed benefit cap (£26k) will disadvantage larger families. This issue was also raised by members of the Committee who were concerned that this equated to social engineering; also referred to by NICCY and the Women's Ad Hoc Policy Group. However, other members argued that a working couples' decision to have a family often includes whether they are in a position to financially support a child and this should apply to those on benefits as well. In addition, some members referred to the general principle that it should not pay to be better off on benefits than in work and that a net income of £26k represented a much higher income than the average gross NI income.

140. The Committee also raised a question about what constitutes earned income and highlighted the position of Citizens Advice that statutory sick pay and statutory maternity pay should be treated as earnings. The Department confirmed that this would be the case.

Clause 9 Standard Allowance

141. The Committee raised the scenario that where the person nominated to receive the UC is placed on remand whether the Bill allows sufficient operational flexibility to enable the housing benefit element of UC to be separated and thereby enable the rent to continue to be paid. The Department confirmed that Clause 9(3) of the Welfare Reform Bill allows for circumstances where an award will not include a standard allowance, for example, a standard allowance will not be included for prisoners on remand but an amount for housing costs could be included in an award for such a claimant. The housing element will be protected for up to 6 months due to imprisonment.
142. The Law Centre raised a particular issue relating to the potential restriction of certain EU nationals to entitlement to the standard allowance that could result in EU nationals being paid lower rates of benefits than those payable to UK and Irish nationals. This was one of the key issues that led to the Committee supporting a motion to refer the Human Rights and Equality aspects of the Bill to an Ad Hoc Committee.
143. The Committee also heard that UC introduces a new feature for the self-employed which means that they will be deemed as having a minimum income which will reduce entitlement to UC. The Committee raised this with the Department and was informed that UC Regulations will require claimants with self-employed income to report it to the Department on a monthly basis via an online tool. The Committee noted with concern that at the time of consideration DWP had not yet indicated what the minimum income level would be and was concerned that this would prove to be a disincentive for people to continue in, or attempt self-employment.
144. The Department maintained that reporting on a monthly basis will ensure the award is reactive to fluctuating income. The Department also noted that comprehensive advice and guidance will be available for self-employed customers and Decision-Makers.

145. The Committee sought clarification on the impact that the introduction of UC would have on claimants who are responsible for children or qualifying young people. In addition the Committee raised concerns highlighted by Disability Action, Citizens Advice, NICCY, ICTU and others about the impact on families with a disabled child. Specifically, there was concern that the disability element of Child Tax Credit would be cut from £57 per week to £28 per week unless the child is receiving the high rate of care allowance or is registered as blind.
146. The Department stated that the Child Tax Credit will be replaced by a new child element that will be paid in addition to Child Benefit. However, the Committee noted that there will be one rate for the first child and a reduced rate for the second and subsequent children but this will be detailed in regulations.
147. The Department also confirmed that the maximum amount of UC is to include a child element called a Disabled Child Addition for each dependent child which, the Department stated, will be similar to the current disability premiums under Child Tax Credits. Therefore there will be two rates (lower and higher) of disabled child addition:
- (i) lower rate disabled child addition will be awarded for a child who receives any rate of either component of Disability Living Allowance (mobility or care) apart from the highest rate of the care component; or

- (ii) higher rate severely disabled child addition will be awarded for a child who receives the highest rate of the care component of Disability Living Allowance or a child is registered blind.
148. The Department further stated that under UC it is intended that there will be greater support for the most severely disabled children.
149. The Minister subsequently responded that while he understood and shared the concerns of the Committee, any decision to increase or vary the Disabled Child addition was a clear breach of parity and will have an estimated cost attached circa £11.3m with additional administration costs.
150. The Committee believed that protecting the most vulnerable people in society was a key aim of its scrutiny of the Bill and while it noted the projected costs associated with restoring the Child Tax Credit lower rate it was not content to agree this clause as drafted and therefore recommended that the Minister discuss this issue at Executive with a view to making funds available to restore the Child Tax Credit lower rate and amend this clause accordingly.

Clause 11 Housing costs

151. Throughout the Committee's consideration of the Bill housing-related issues were some of the major issues that were brought to its attention. It should be noted that the provisions of the Welfare Reform Bill relating to housing are being considered at a time when details regarding the NI Housing Strategy and the restructuring of the NI Housing Executive have yet to be developed. The Committee is therefore concerned that while the Bill will impact on over 30,000 social housing tenants (in respect of under-occupancy) mitigation measures have yet to be determined.

Direct payments to tenants

152. One of the key issues raised, particularly by housing groups in their written submissions, was the proposal to have housing credit paid directly to tenants as opposed to landlords. These groups including the NI Housing Executive were concerned that this would result in increased rental arrears. Housing Associations in particular were concerned that this might affect their ability to raise money to build more social housing. This issue was addressed by the Minister in his statement of 22 October in which he stated that housing credit would continue to be paid directly to the landlord. At the time of the announcement the Committee welcomed this change of position as did the housing groups. However, the details of how this payment will be made have yet to be decided.
153. The Committee has been informed by the NI Housing Executive that it has approximately 26,000 tenants who will be subject to the size criteria provisions relating to housing otherwise known as the under-occupancy rule. The NI Federation of Housing Associations also informed the Committee that 6,500 of its tenants will also be subject to these provisions.
154. The Committee was concerned that people will be unable to pay their rent and be without an option to move to alternative accommodation given that the appropriate housing stock is not and will not be available for the foreseeable future. The Committee therefore has serious concerns that despite knowing in advance that approximately 33,000 tenants in the social housing sector will be deemed to be under-occupying their homes, and therefore have their housing credit reduced by up to 25%, the Department has yet to devise a strategy to deal with this situation.

Support for Mortgage Interest (SMI) and zero earnings rule

155. The Committee also raised its concerns with the Department over the proposed approach to Support for Mortgage Interest. The Law Centre highlighted that a person in receipt of SMI would lose this support as a result of the "zero earnings" rule. The Committee heard that this meant that if a person receiving SMI accepts any paid work, however minimal the hours and payment, then they will lose SMI. The Department subsequently confirmed this to be the case. The Committee believed that this is contrary to the stated aim of the Bill i.e. to encourage people off benefits and into work.

156. The Committee noted the costs associated with retaining SMI would be £18m (number of claimants (10,438 x average of IS and JSA amounts (£33.21) x 52 weeks) and there would be additional costs associated with clerical/administration due to the IT system not being able to perform this calculation due to divergence from GB.
157. The Committee also noted that the Minister was not supportive of any proposal to depart from the policy intention.

SMI waiting period

158. There was also concern that the current arrangements for SMI, particularly in relation to the waiting period for receipt of this support, would change from 13 weeks to 39 weeks. However, in his autumn statement on December 5th 2012 the Chancellor announced that the waiting period would remain the same and the working age capital limit would also remain at £200,000 until March 2015.

Under-occupancy and separated parents

159. The Committee raised concerns about how the 'under occupancy' rule would affect separated parents who share custody of their children. The Department stated that where separated parents have a spare bedroom to accommodate their children they may have their housing cost element reduced as they will be deemed to have a spare bedroom. The Department further explained that UC will be awarded to the person with whom the children normally live but where custody is shared the parents will be encouraged to decide which of them receives the payment. In the situation where the parents cannot decide this then the Department will make that decision based on who has the main responsibility for the children.

Under occupancy and foster carers

160. The Committee also raised this issue in the context of foster careers. However the Department confirmed that while foster careers are allowed to claim the housing costs element for the housing needs of their own families, fostered children living with them are not taken into account when calculating the size of the accommodation required. In other words, a household which has an extra room for a current or potential foster child would be treated as under-occupying.
161. The Department informed the Committee that the financial support that foster carers receive from social services helps them to meet the costs associated with caring for foster children and this support is disregarded in full for the purposes of Housing Benefit. Officials went on to explain that if foster children were to be included in the household, then the fostering allowance would also have to be included as income. However, disregarding foster children in the assessment and then disregarding the fostering allowance as income is normally more beneficial to the claimant.
162. While the Department also indicated that the Discretionary Housing Payment Fund would be available to help foster carers whose housing costs are reduced, the Committee was concerned that a reduction in housing costs would deter potential foster carers and that the discretionary payments was not a long term solution to this issue.
163. The Committee noted that an inter-departmental group, which also includes stakeholders, has been established to consider options for dealing with the impact of 'size criteria' and is due to report in April.
164. The issue of 'size criteria' is dealt with more specifically under clause 69.

Clause 12 Other particular needs or circumstances

Removal of Severe Disability Premium

165. Citizens Advice, Disability Action and Mencap NI all raised concerns about the removal of the Severe Disability Premium and all favoured the Premium being retained in full. The Equality Commission also questioned why the Severe Disability Premium was not considered within this clause under the extra elements to the Standard Allowance. The Department also informed the Committee that those claimants in receipt of Severe Disability Premium will have transitional protection for as long as that transitional period lasts.
166. The Minister noted the Committee's concerns but responded that this was a parity issues with significant costs attached to doing anything differently within the social security arena. He noted that if a Severe Disability Premium were to be introduced to UC it would cost in the region of £52.6m per annum if paid in line with existing benefit rules and rates (number of claimants currently in receipt 17,000 x current annual rate of premium £59.50 x 52weeks) plus additional administration/clerical costs.
167. While the Minister originally indicated that he was not prepared to consider an amendment to restore the Severe Disability Premium, the Committee believed that protecting the most vulnerable people in society was a key aim of its scrutiny of the Bill. It also noted that that the costs associated with retaining the Severe Disability Premium but the Committee believed that this option warranted discussion at the Executive.
168. The Committee recommended that the Severe Disability Premium be retained and the Minister should therefore discuss this option with the Executive.

Support for parent with childcare responsibilities

169. The Committee also queried whether there would be scope under this clause to support a parent with childcare responsibilities, particularly those who rely on informal childcare arrangements with relatives. The Department, and indeed the OFMDFM Policy and Economic Appraisal of the Options for the NI Childcare Strategy (September 2010), accept that there is a reliance by parents in NI on informal childcare. However, current Tax Credits and benefits (with the exception of DEL funded work programmes/training schemes) do not cover informal childcare payments. The Department acknowledged that while clause 12 does provide for childcare payments in order to get the childcare element the child needs to be in registered childcare. Regulation 36 of the GB Universal Credit Regulations gives details of registered childcare.
170. Therefore families with a registered childminder will be able to recover childcare costs in UC as follows - 70% of up to £760 for one child or £1300 for two or more children per month. The Department advises that this is in line with current arrangements under Tax Credit. It differs from current arrangements in that there will be no restriction on the minimum number of hours to work under UC.
171. The Committee was informed that currently the Department for Employment and Learning (DEL) pays for assistance with informal child care to a lone parent, or a partner of certain benefit customers who are looking for work on the Steps to Work programme. The feasibility study for the new employment programme, Steps 2 Success, states that childcare costs should be borne by the provider and a consultation exercise is currently underway.

Clause 13 Work-related requirements: introductory

172. This clause defines what 'work-related requirement' means and lists the specific groups which a claimant may fall into. While some comment was made by stakeholders on this clause they relate more specifically to subsequent clauses and are dealt with there. However, the NI Welfare Reform Group did suggest that when considering these requirements the Department should regard for the prevailing economic conditions and how they may impact on the claimant's ability to meet those requirements.

Clause 14 Claimant Commitment

173. The implications of one member of a couple refusing to sign a Claimant Commitment, when a joint application is made, were raised again by the Law Centre, NIPSA and the Equality Commission. The Department position that UC will not be paid to either claimant in these circumstances applies.
174. Members supported the view of Citizens Advice that the Claimant Commitment must be more balanced with the Department taking into account the experience, skills and individual circumstances of the claimant when drawing up this document. The Department indicated that all these issues would be taken into account when agreeing the Claimant Commitment with the customer.
175. In response to a question on the support to be given to claimants in their search for work the Committee was informed that the Department for Employment and Learning has agreed to adopt the Department for Work and Pensions' Transforming Labour Market Services (TLMS) system which will provide a comprehensive tool for claimants to use to search for work. The Committee was also assured that specific barriers to employment, such as literacy and numeracy issues, are currently identified by DEL and its contractors and claimants may be referred for an assessment and training to address these barriers to employment. A wide range of tailored provision will be available from short courses to work placements etc.

Clause 15 Work-focused interviews

176. The issues relating to this clause concerned reasonableness and proportionality when drawing up Claimant Commitments subject to the claimant's individual circumstances as stated by STEP

Support for vulnerable people

177. Disability Action raised concerns about the support that will be given to disabled people to meet commitments.
178. The Committee agreed that all necessary support should be given to the most vulnerable people to allow them to attend a work-focused interview. The Department stated that Employment Service Advisers working with clients on Incapacity Benefit and Employment and Support Allowance have received specialist training, over and above that received by Employment Advisers who are dealing with JSA clients.
179. It was noted that this training would also include awareness of the full range of disabilities including sensory, physical, mental health and learning disability; and that this would also include practical sessions on how interviewers should interact with clients depending on the nature of their disability and how disabilities impact on the individual's behaviour and attitude towards employment. The Committee was advised that in addition to this, the Department's Disability Employment Service provided a Support Model Service to these teams. The Support Model team consists of Occupational Psychologists and experienced Disability Employment Managers who have worked with disabled clients for many years.
180. The Committee queried how long a claimant would have to submit 'good reason' for not attending a work-related interview. The Department confirmed that it will be noted in guidance to Decision-Makers that the claimant should always have the right amount of time but that it is anticipated that the current rule of 5 working days should be the default.

Clause 16 Work-preparation requirement

Assessments

181. The key issue for the Committee relates to subsection 4 which requires a person with limited capability for work to take part in a work-focused, health-related assessment. This was also raised by the NI Welfare Reform Group and the Law Centre. The Department advised that this was under consideration by DWP.
182. The Committee has serious concerns about health assessments in general as they relate to the reforms. The Committee referenced the problems with the Work Capability Assessments and in particular the high percentage of successful appeals.

Work placements

183. The Department also addressed a concern of the Committee that work placements may actually result in job substitution. Each employer proposing to offer a work experience placement is required to sign a formal agreement with the Employment Service confirming that there are no current vacancies in the area of activity in which the placement is offered, that there have been no redundancies within the organisation within the last 3 months and that there has been no displacement of existing employees as a result of the placement. Work placements will also be monitored to ensure there is support for the participant and that the placement is operating within the broad principles of the scheme.
184. The Committee also noted that specific training e.g. up-skilling, relevant to a claimant's previous occupation can be considered under a Claimant Commitment.

Clause 17 Work search requirement

35 hours per week work search

185. The Committee recognised the need to require claimants to search for work. However the Committee questioned just how realistic it was to expect claimants to spend 35 hours per week searching for work, particularly under the current economic circumstances when there are limited job vacancies.
186. The Committee sought reassurance that the job search requirement would take into account the number of jobs available in the local market and the caring responsibilities of claimants, and that these would be reflected in the job search commitment.

Barriers faced by disabled people

Responsible for child under 13

188. The Committee noted that where the claimant is a responsible carer for a child under the age of 13, the expected number of hours per week will be compatible with the child's normal school hours including the time it takes the child to travel to and from school.

Voluntary work

189. The Committee received clarification from the Department that for claimants carrying out voluntary work, the work search must remain their primary focus. There will be no restriction on volunteering but the claimant will be expected to carry out a search for work with a discount of 50% of the time spent volunteering. For example, if a claimant volunteers for 20 hours per week but is deemed that they should spend 20 hours looking for work then 10 hours will be discounted and they will have to spend only 10 hours looking for work.

Clause 18 Work availability requirement

190. The Committee sought clarification on the requirement for claimants to be ‘immediately’ available for work and what derogations there may be for this. The Department clarified that where a person is already in paid work they are allowed up to 48 hours to attend an interview or until their notice period has expired to take up a job. The Department also highlighted that where a claimant has caring responsibilities for a child or a disabled person they will be allowed up to one month to attend an interview and one month to take a job.
191. The Committee reiterated its concerns, shared by NIPSA, Citizens Advice and others that the opportunities for increasing the number of hours worked, or finding suitable paid work, is severely restricted in the current economic environment.

Clause 19 Claimants subject to no work-related requirements

Health assessments

192. This clause again relates to health assessments. An individual's work capability will continue to be established through the Work Capability Assessment (WCA) currently undertaken for the Employment and Support Allowance. The Department stressed that the WCA looks at the functional effects of an individual's condition rather than the condition itself.
193. While the Committee acknowledged this, Members highlighted the impact that these health assessments had on individuals and referred to personal experiences of representing individuals at appeals at which the original decision was overturned.
194. The Department stated that claimants are assessed against 7 mental health descriptors and 10 physical descriptors and the information required to determine if a person has limited capability for work, is any information detailing the individual's ability to perform certain defined duties. The outcome of the WCA is determined by a Social Security Agency Decision Maker taking into consideration information provided by the claimant and the Medical Support Service provider, Atos Healthcare. As part of the decision making process customers complete a medical questionnaire (ESA 50) and are asked to provide supporting medical evidence. In going forward this will continue to be the process.
195. The Committee was of the opinion that medical records should have primacy in the health assessment process and that it should not be an allocation of points based on a tick box exercise.

Clause 20 Claimants subject to work-focused interview requirement only

196. The Committee noted that that this clause will apply to claimants who are responsible carers for a child who is aged at least one and is under a prescribed age (not less than 3). The Committee also noted that regulations may also specify other claimants who fall into this group.

Clause 21 Claimants subject to work preparation requirement

197. This clause determines those categories of claimants who will be subject to work preparation and work focused interview requirements only.

198. The Committee noted that a claimant in this group may not be required to look for or be available for paid work, for example as a result of a physical or mental health condition or if they fall into another description as prescribed in regulations.

Clause 22 Claimants subject to all work-related requirements

199. The Committee heard that the requirement of this clause will apply to those claimants who do not fall into one of the previous three groups.

Potential impact on EU workers/jobseekers

200. Of particular concern to the Committee was an issue raised by the NI Welfare Reform Group, NICE and the Law Centre regarding the treatment of EU workers or jobseekers. The Committee heard opinion that placing EU workers or jobseekers in the 'all work-related group' was clearly discriminatory and likely to be unlawful.
201. The Committee considered these concerns in its deliberations to refer the Human Rights and Equality Requirements of the Bill to an Ad Hoc Committee.

Clause 23 Connected requirements

202. The Committee noted the provisions of this clause e.g. requiring a claimant to attend an interview at a particular time and place or requiring the claimant to provide evidence that requirements are being met.

Clause 24 Imposition of requirements

203. The Committee welcomed this clause which provides for regulations to prescribe circumstances in which specific requirements must or must not be imposed on certain claimants.

Victims of domestic violence

204. In particular, the Committee noted subsection 7 which allows claimants who have been victims of domestic violence to be given a 13 week exemption from any work-related requirements. This was welcomed in principle by STEP but the 13 week period was thought to be too short.
205. The Department highlighted that in case of domestic abuse there will be other provisions such as splitting the payment within the household for claimants. There will also be a facility to provide additional assistance with housing costs including provision to consider costs for both the normal and temporary residences.
206. The Committee also noted that the definition of domestic violence will be the same as that in the current JSA regulations and will cover emotional, psychological and financial abuse as suggested by STEP. The Department also advised that the regulations will extend to address victims of hate crime.

Clause 25 Compliance with requirements

207. The Committee noted that under this clause regulations may set out the conditions under which a person will be treated as having met the requirements placed upon them.

Clause 26 Higher level sanctions

208. The introduction of a new sanctions regime raises significant concern among a wide range of stakeholders. The Equality Commission urged restraint in the blanket application of these sanctions and recommended that each case is examined on its own merit taking into account the Department's equality obligations under Section 75 and the Disability Discrimination Act 1995.

3 year sanction

209. The Committee and stakeholders expressed serious concerns about the potential for a claimant to lose UC for up to three years. The Committee questioned if this might potentially lead to destitution and therefore breach human rights requirements.

Impact on family

210. The Committee questioned whether sanctions applied to the main applicant would impact on the rest of the family, particularly children. The Department indicated that the sanction would not affect the child or housing elements where a claimant is entitled to the maximum standard allowance (i.e. earnings have not reduced their award). However, where this is not the case the sanction may reduce the housing or child elements. The Department has stated that where there is a reduction in payment the claimant will have to manage their budget and use other income such as earnings to meet their housing or other costs. The Committee questioned whether a person already potentially living at a subsistence level would be able to do this.

Lack of childcare strategy

211. The NI Welfare Reform Group highlighted that there is no childcare strategy in place in NI and it is widely accepted that there is a lack of accessible and affordable childcare. It therefore proposed that sanctions should not apply to a claimant who does not have guaranteed and predictable access to childcare. The Department noted that access to childcare would be taken under consideration as part of the guidance issued to Decision-Makers.

Good reason

212. The Department emphasised that higher level sanctions would only be applied if the claimant could not provide 'good reason' for not meeting 'their most important requirements' e.g. which might include not accepting a job offer, misconduct or dismissal. The Committee confirmed with the Department that the Decision-Maker will consider each case on its own merits and that guidance will be developed to allow the Decision-Maker to consider what circumstances might constitute 'good reason'.

Impact on children

213. The Women's Ad Hoc Policy Group were particularly concerned about the impact on children as a result of the new sanction regime and again referred to their proposal (under clause 99) to pay UC to the second earner/carer or to split payments according to financial circumstances.

Potential ineffectiveness of sanctions

214. Citizens Advice made the general point, supported by some Members of the Committee, that there is little evidence to show that sanctions are effective in moving people closer to the labour market and that the new sanctions regime is therefore contrary to the purported aim of the Bill.

Accessing hardship payment

215. Where, after a sanction is applied, a claimant cannot meet their basic requirements they can make a claim for a hardship payment. The Committee noted that hardship payments are recoverable.
216. While the Minister indicated that any variation in the sanctions regime would be a breach of parity the Committee opposed this clause and recommended that the Minister discuss with DWP the scope for varying the sanctions regime.

Clause 27 Other sanctions

217. The Committee noted that these sanctions relate to failure to meet a work-related requirement or requirement under clause 23 without good reason and that any failure which is sanctionable under clause 26 cannot also be sanctionable under clause 27.
218. The Department also confirmed that a work search and work availability requirement will be limited to Northern Ireland and that travel time will be limited to within 90 minutes of the claimant's home.

Clause 28 Hardship payments

Recoverability of hardship payments

219. The key concern for the Committee was the apparent default position of hardship payments being recoverable. Stakeholders such as Citizens Advice, STEP, the Law Centre and the NI Welfare Reform Group recommended that they should not be recoverable as this is, in effect, an additional punishment and likely to cause additional difficulties for claimants.
220. The Committee had sympathy with these views and suggested that the Department highlight the circumstances, provided for in 28(1)(f), where hardship payments are recoverable.
221. The Committee also noted that the payments would be made in equal installments commensurate with the period of sanction and that hardship payments would be demand-led.

Clause 29 Concurrent exercise of certain functions by the Department for Employment and Learning

222. The Department confirmed that should the Department for Employment and Learning be dissolved a Transfer of Functions Order will set out how the functions of that Department will be carried out.

Clause 30 Delegation and contracting out

223. Some Members were concerned that this was a prelude to privatisation of the benefits system. NIPSA was concerned that this would lead to the privatisation of both front-line and back office functions.
224. Disability Action was concerned that where contracting out of services did take place that contractors had the appropriate skills and experience in working with disabled people in gaining and retaining employment.

Clause 31 Supplementary regulation-making powers

225. The Committee noted that Schedule 1 provides for a wide range of regulation-making powers relating to UC.

Rules on savings

226. The Law Centre referred to the indication that rules on savings were not going to be changed significantly and this was welcomed by the Committee.

Vouchers

227. The Committee also questioned the Department on paying all or part of an award by means of a voucher.

Potential unlawfulness of schedule 1 paragraph 7

228. The Committee also noted concerns from the Law Centre about the potential unlawfulness of schedule 1 paragraph 7 which allows for EU workers with a right to reside to be placed into the all work-related requirement group rather than any of the other groups.

Clause 32 Supplementary and consequential amendmentsProvision of other benefits

229. The Committee noted that this allows the Department to make other regulations under Schedule 2. These relate, among other things, to amendments to allow some UC claimants to receive other benefits such as free school meals or legal aid.

State Pension Credit/Work-related requirements

230. Of particular concern, raised elsewhere in this report, is paragraph 49 of Schedule 2 which amends the State Pension Credit Act 2002 so that a member of a couple who has reached the qualifying age for State Pension Credit may not receive that credit if the other member of the couple has not reached the qualifying age and the possibility that the older partner may be subject to work-related requirements.
231. The Department has confirmed that, in such circumstances, the person who has reached the qualifying age for Pension Credit will not be subject to any work-related requirements but that the couple will have to apply for UC.

Clause 33 Powers to make supplementary and consequential provision etcImpact of future regulations

232. The Committee made the general point that supplementary subordinate regulation may make greater changes than was originally anticipated and asked how this might be addressed.
233. The Department advised that in this scenario regulations may be considered by the Executive but it depended on the degree of change proposed. It also suggested that equality screening might also identify such changes and be dealt with accordingly.

Clause 34 Abolition of benefits

234. The Committee noted the benefits to be abolished under this clause and asked if it would be possible to identify actual savings realised by the new system, compared to the current system. The Committee was advised that monitoring and evaluation would take place that would also include estimated cost savings.

Reinstatement of Child Tax Credits

235. The Department noted that the call from some stakeholders to reinstate Child Tax Credits for childcare to 80% (from the current 70%) would cost approximately £17 million and equated to an extra £12 per claimant. The Department also noted that this was an excepted matter and therefore not under the control of the NI Executive.

Clause 35 Universal credit and state pension credit

236. The Committee confirmed that 'housing credit' equated to 'housing benefit' and that questions relating to this credit would be the same as they currently are.

Clause 36 Universal credit and working-age benefit

237. The Committee was assured by the Department that the hardship payments would match need.

Clause 37 Migration to universal credit

238. The Committee noted that this clause gives effect to Schedule 6. Members questioned the process by which the migration from current benefits to UC would proceed but were informed that while this is likely to be on a phased basis the details have yet to be decided.

Clause 38 Capability for work or work-related activity

Physical and/or mental condition

239. The Committee received confirmation from the Department that reference to 'physical or mental condition' under this clause should read 'physical and/or mental condition'.

Requirement for individualised assessment

240. The Committee noted comments from the Equality Commission that any assessment process established for the Working Capability Assessment, as a result of this clause, should result in fair, appropriate and individualised assessment processes and practices.

Primacy of medical evidence

241. The Committee also reiterated its view that medical evidence should have primacy in any medical-based assessment. The Department acknowledged that medical evidence would be taken into account but that other factors such as assessing what functions the claimant can perform will also be important.
242. The Department further clarified that as part of the mandatory reconsideration of decisions, all medical evidence submitted by the claimant would be considered.
243. The Committee acknowledged that the establishment of a mandatory reassessment of a decision prior to the formal appeal stage offered the opportunity to introduce full medical evidence to support a claimant.
244. The Committee was therefore reassured by this approach.

Clause 39 Information

245. The Committee noted this clause.

Clause 40 Couples

Clarification on polygamous relationships

246. The Committee noted that polygamous relationships are not recognised under this Bill.

Ex-partners living in the same house

247. The Department stated that guidance for Decision-Makers will include how to deal with a situation where a relationship breaks down but the ex-partners choose to continue living in the same house.

Clause 41 Interpretation of Part 1

248. The Committee noted the definition of terms listed under this clause.

Clause 42 Pilot schemes

249. The Committee noted with concern that there were no plans to conduct pilot schemes in NI and that it was intended to extrapolate the results of GB pilots to NI.
250. The Committee raised the issue of the specific circumstances relating to NI such as the higher rates of disability, lack of childcare provision and housing issues and questioned the validity of extrapolating the finding of GB pilots to here. In addition, Members were concerned that the provisions of Section 75 would not be addressed in such pilots.
251. The Department indicated that inclusion in a pilot scheme is an expensive undertaking but that interim learning reports from DWP would be made available; and that research has been commissioned into the impact of certain provision on the housing situation in NI.
252. The Committee expressed concerns that Northern Ireland has not been included in any pilot schemes to date and was of the view that the objectives of the pilot schemes, as defined in the Bill may be too restrictive.
253. The Committee believed that future pilot schemes should include Northern Ireland where appropriate. The Committee acknowledged that the Minister will write to Lord Freud conveying the Committee's views about the inclusion of NI in future pilots so that NI demographics can influence the application of learning from any such pilots within GB.

Clause 43 Regulations

Housing costs

254. The Committee noted this clause, in particular subsection (6) which allows for regulations relating to housing costs. In particular, the Committee noted that there will be no change from the current position where local housing allowance rates are based on eight broad market rental areas and each month, the Housing Executive monitors rent in an area and decides the local rate for that area.

Clause 44 Assembly control

255. The Committee noted that in the first instance regulations made under specified provisions will be subject to the confirmatory procedure and subsequently by the negative resolution procedure.

256. The Committee agreed an amendment to this clause to make the regulation-making power in clause 33 subject to the confirmatory procedure as recommended by the Examiner of Statutory Rules:

At end insert -

(c) regulations under clause 33

Part 2 Working Age Benefits

Clause 45 Claimant commitment for job-seekers allowance

257. A number of concerns raised under Part 1 of the Bill were reiterated by stakeholders.

Privatisation of public services

258. NIPSA objected to the use of the term “other person” in line 12 of this clause as it suggests a third party outside of any government department assuming these responsibilities.

259. The Committee agreed to seek assurances from the Minister that this clause does not provide for privatisation of services delivered by the public sector.

260. The Committee accepted that the purpose of this clause was to enable DEL to be able to use Work Service and Training Providers, including voluntary and community sector providers, as is currently the practice.

261. The Committee therefore accepted the Minister’s assurance that there are no plans to use this clause to privatise services delivered by the public sector.

Clause 46 Interviews

Remote interviews

262. The Committee sought clarification on the explanatory note associated with this clause which stated that claimants may be required to participate in interviews that are conducted remotely. This was described by the Department as a ‘future proofing’ exercise to allow it to conduct interviews by means other than face-to-face meetings, but indicated that there were no immediate plans to do this.

Clause 47 Sanctions

Misconduct

263. The Committee questioned how ‘misconduct’ that led to the loss of employment would be defined and how sanctions would be applied if the claimant lodged an appeal. The Department stated that sanctions would apply until the outcome of the appeal was known and if the appeal was upheld then the sanctions would be removed and the claimant reimbursed.

264. The Department emphasised that they considered sanctions to be a deterrent not a punishment.

Clause 48 Procedure for regulation-making powers

265. The Committee noted this clause.

Clause 49 Consequential amendments

266. The Committee noted this clause.

Clause 50 Claimant responsibilities for jobseeker's allowance

Claimant-specific approach

267. The Committee again noted comments from Citizens Advice that relate to the need for a specific focus on the claimant to help them meet their Claimant Commitment and to help them back into work. The Department also noted these comments.

Clause 51 Dual entitlement

268. The Department confirmed the Committee's view that this clause 'tidied up' aspects of the 2007 Welfare Reform Act.

Clause 52 Period of entitlement to contributory allowance

269. This clause limits an award of contributory ESA to a period of 365 days.
270. Some Members were of the view that the aim of this clause was to simply reduce the cost of the benefit system and were concerned, as were a number of stakeholders, that despite possibly paying into the National Insurance scheme for years, a person will only receive contributory ESA for one year. It also noted that where people have been in receipt of Contributory ESA for 365 days they will cease to receive this payment and will move to other, reduced, benefits.
271. The Committee discussed the possibility of these changes not coming into place until those claimants subject to the changes were notified of them i.e. the 365 day period would begin only when claimants had been notified.
272. However, the Department advised the Committee that there were significant cost savings associated with these measures. These are £36.5 million in 2013-14; £51 million in 2014-15; and £62.2 million in 2015-16. The Department clarified that these are the result of saving on costs that would be incurred where individuals are compensated by income-related Employment and Support Allowance.
273. The Committee noted that the Minister shared the Committee's concerns around the time limit associated with contribution-based ESA and also acknowledged the cost of not implementing this measure.
274. However, the Committee was not content to agree this clause as drafted and recommended that the Minister explore the possibility of extending the period of contribution-based ESA to more than 12 months.

Clause 53 Further entitlement after time-limiting Appropriate checks to confirm status

275. The Committee highlighted to the Department the concern of stakeholders that there should be appropriate checks to ensure whether a claimant should be in the ESA Support Group and therefore not subject to the time-limit; and that appropriate advice is given in relation to their change of circumstances where they are subject to the time-limit.

Clause 54 Condition relating to youth

276. The Committee noted that until this clause comes into operation there is provision under paragraph 4 of Schedule 1 of the Welfare Reform Act 2007 for claimants, on the basis of youth, to qualify for contributory ESA without having to meet the paid National Insurance contributions. The Committee noted no new claims will be allowed when this clause comes into operation.

277. The Committee was concerned about the particular impact this would have on young people with disabilities which was shared by Disability Action. The Law Centre and the NI Welfare Reform Group noted that the cost of the current provisions was approximately £390k per year.
278. The Department stated that almost 97% of those people to whom this provision currently applies will not be affected by the change and that new claimants may qualify for income-related ESA.
279. The Minister's response indicated that there was an equality issue in that no other contributory benefit waives its conditions of receipt for any other age or client group. The Minister also noted that claimants will have access to income-related ESA if they do not have sufficient income or savings to support themselves. The Minister therefore did not believe that there was a strong enough case for making exceptions as this proposal puts young people on the same footing as other groups and treat them in the same way in relation to entitlement based on paid National Insurance contributions.
280. However, the Committee noted the relatively low cost, indicated by stakeholders, of retaining this provision. The Committee was not content to agree this clause as drafted, but recommended that the Minister discuss this issue at the Executive Committee with a view to making funds available to maintain the current arrangements.

Clause 55 Claimant commitment for employment and support allowance

281. The Committee noted the Department's position that beyond accepting a Claimant Commitment there is no change to the current requirements and that where a person is placed in the support group the content of the commitment will be minimal.

Commitment should be claimant-specific

282. As noted under Clause 4 - Basic conditions, one of the conditions that must be met for the entitlement of an award is the acceptance of a Claimant Commitment.
283. Stakeholders, such as NIPSA and Citizens Advice, again referred to the lack of balance in relation to the Claimant Commitment i.e. obligations are placed on the claimant but not the Department.
284. Citizens Advice called for an amendment to the Bill to ensure that the Claimant Commitment is based on the skills, abilities, knowledge and experience of the claimant. However, the Committee noted the Department's previous response that all Claimant Commitments would be drawn up in close consultation with the claimant and tailored to address their specific circumstances as well as the job market.

Support for disabled people

285. The Committee also highlighted concerns from stakeholders about the support required for disabled people to obtain and retain work. The Department acknowledged these concerns and envisaged support tailored to people's needs.

Clause 56 Work experience etc.

286. The Committee noted paragraph 287 of the Explanatory and Financial Memorandum that any requirement imposed on a claimant to undertake work experience or work placement will need to be reasonable in the claimant's circumstance.

Clause 57 Hardship Payments

287. The Committee noted that hardship payments will not be recoverable for Employment and Support Allowance claimants.

Clause 58 Claimant responsibilities for employment and support allowance

Open-ended period

288. The Committee noted that this clause introduces a range of claimant responsibilities in respect of ESA, as clause 50 does for Jobseekers (Northern Ireland) Order 1995. The Committee questioned whether the term “open ended period” referred to in paragraph 294 of the Explanatory and Financial Memorandum meant ‘indefinite’ and the Department confirmed this.

Concerns about delegating and contracting out

289. The Committee also noted that NIPSA reiterated its previous concerns regarding delegating and contracting out – section 11(L) and the potential for this to lead to job losses in the public sector.

Clause 59 Entitlement of lone parents to income support etc.

Lack of childcare

290. The Committee raised concerns about the work-related activity requirements associated with this clause that lone parents may face despite the absence of accessible and affordable childcare.
291. However, the Department replied that a lack of childcare would be considered as a mitigating factor. It is anticipated that there will be clear guidance regarding a lack of childcare provision and entitlement under this clause.

Clause 60 Claimant commitment for income support

292. Again, the Committee acknowledged the general points made earlier in respect of Claimant Commitments and notes the aim to tailor these to the claimant's circumstances.

Clause 61 Entitlement to work: jobseeker's allowance

293. The Committee noted this clause.

Clause 62 Entitlement to work: employment and support allowance

294. The Committee noted this clause.

Clause 63: Entitlement to work: maternity and statutory payments

295. The Committee noted concerns from the Law Centre in relation to clauses 61-63 that these clauses create new requirements for claimants to have an entitlement to work in order to obtain contributory JSA, ESA and statutory maternity, paternity and adoption pay.

Part 3 Other Benefit Changes

Clause 64 Injuries arising before 5 July 1948

296. The Department indicated that the overall aim of this clause is to remove redundant legislation from the statute book.
297. The Department confirmed that rules relating to 'unforeseen aggravations' - where injuries arising from an accident cause health issue later in life – will remain unchanged.
298. This was noted by the Committee.

Clause 65 Persons under 18

299. The Committee noted this clause.

Clause 66 Trainees

300. The Committee noted this clause.

Clause 67 Restriction on new claims for industrial death benefit

301. The Committee noted the Department's clarification that Industrial Death Benefit is payable only when the death occurred before 11 April 1988, and that claims for deaths that occurred before that date are no longer being made. Deaths that occurred after that date are dealt with through Bereavement Benefit.

Clause 68 Determinations

302. The Committee shared concerns with ICTU regarding the right to request an accident declaration to be abolished. However, the Department stated that it is currently possible to make a claim for an industrial accident without a previous declaration being made. Furthermore, the Department also confirmed that employers must keep an accident book as a legal requirement and this can be a source of evidence should a claim be made subsequently.

Clause 69 Housing benefit: determination of appropriate maximum

303. As noted under Clause 11, the aim to apply a maximum level of housing benefit generated concerns among a wide range of stakeholders.

Size criteria/under occupancy

304. The key concern for the Committee relates to the 'size criteria' referred to in paragraph 337 of the Explanatory and Financial Memorandum. This will apply to the calculation of housing benefit for working age tenants in the social housing sector and will be dependent on the number of additional bedrooms in the property. Where the property is deemed to have 1 extra bedroom the housing benefit will be reduced by 14%; where there are two extra bedrooms this will be reduced by 25%.
305. The Committee heard that upwards of 32, 500 tenants in the social housing sector will be deemed as under-occupying and therefore subject to a reduction in benefit.
306. The Committee heard from the NIHE that around 26,000 of their tenants will be subject to these provisions, 7000 of whom will be deemed as under-occupying by more than one bedroom. However, the NIHE was clear that it did not have the appropriate stock to match tenants' needs i.e. it could not facilitate this number of tenants who might want to downsize in order to avoid a reduction in housing benefit.

307. The Committee therefore shared the concerns of the Housing Policy Forum and others that tenants will be penalised by having their benefit reduced without other viable options being presented. NIFHA also felt that the under-occupancy penalty was unfair and had the potential to cause real hardship to many low-income families. The Committee recognised that if these tenants are unable to increase their income then they will have to make up the shortfall from their existing benefits.

308. The Committee noted that the Minister shared some of the concerns expressed by the Committee around the issues of housing and under-occupancy and that he recently raised the issue of under-occupancy and the housing situation in Northern Ireland with Lord Freud. However the Minister also noted that any departure from the proposals will have a significant cost impact to revenue streams in the region of £18m per annum.

Requirement for appropriate housing stock

309. A number of stakeholders proposed that this clause should not be introduced until there is the appropriate type of housing stock to allow people to move to smaller homes. Others such as NICCY and Save the Children advocated an exemption for households with children. A fairer approach to housing benefit was also called for by the four main churches.

Restriction on moving as a result of community background

310. The Committee also noted concerns about the restrictions on moving to more suitable accommodation given the segregated nature of housing in NI and that choice is likely to be particularly limited in rural areas.

No exemptions for foster carers of disabled

311. Some stakeholders, including CIH, NIFHA and MENCAP, highlighted their concern that disabled people and foster carers were not exempted from the size criteria rule.

Size criteria rules will only apply to claimants of working age

312. The Committee was advised by the Department that the size criteria rules will only apply to claimants of working age. Any claimant over the qualifying age for State Pension Credit or with a partner over that age will be exempt from the size criteria rules.

Standard of private rented sector option

313. The Committee raised concerns with the Department regarding the standard of accommodation available at the bottom 30th percentile of private sector rents and the aim to set local housing allowance by reference to the lower of either the CPI or the bottom 30th percentile of private sector rents. This may force people into the lower end of the private rental market and possibly a lower standard of accommodation.

314. This was a key issue for the Committee. Given the potential widespread impact of the size criteria rule the Committee did not agree the clause as drafted but recommended that the Minister discuss this with the Executive.

Clause 70 Ending of discretionary payments

Clause 71 Purposes of discretionary payments

Clause 72 Determination of amount or value of budgeting loan

Clause 73 Community care grants

315. The Committee noted that clauses 70 to 73 deal with the abolition of the discretionary part of the Social Fund and that the details of the replacement for the discretionary support scheme have not been finalised. The Committee will be consulted on proposals in due course.

Clause 74 State pension credit: carers

316. Members questioned how “regular and substantial caring responsibilities” would be defined and whether the current prescribed minimum of 35 hours per week would be changed. The Department responded that this definition would be detailed in regulations but the intention was to extend this definition beyond people entitled to carer’s allowance.

Clause 75 State pension credit: capital limit

Prescribed amount

317. The Committee noted concerns that entitlement to State Pension Credit will be subject to claimants having capital below a “prescribed amount” and that this has yet to be determined.
318. The Department confirmed that there would be a mechanism to appeal against the Department’s evaluation of assets.

Part 4 Personal Independence Payment

Clause 76 Personal independence payment

319. This clause sets out the basic conditions of entitlement to PIP, the constituent components of the award and the residency requirements that apply.

Anticipated savings

320. The Committee noted that the Treasury Report produced at the time of PIP stated the aim was to save 20% over the projected expenditure of DLA and was concerned if this target would influence Decision-Makers in the Department. However, the Department did state categorically that there were no such savings' targets for individual Decision-Makers and each decision in respect of PIP would be made on a case-by-case basis.

Assessment

321. NICCY called for the establishment of an "expert group" to examine the new assessment for PIP and this should include psychiatrists and pediatricians as well as other experts in childhood disability.

Free independent advice

322. Stakeholders also strongly advocated that claimants should have access to free independent advice, noting that currently there is a waiting time of several weeks to get advice from the independent advice sector.
323. Of key concern to stakeholders was the assessment process associated with PIP which relates to clauses 77, 78 and 79.

Time allowed abroad

324. The Committee was concerned that the period of temporary absence (to be set out in regulations under clause 76(3)) set at 4 weeks, was too short. The Minister confirmed that this period had been extended to 13 weeks following public consultation.
325. The Committee welcomed this change and noted the Minister's reassurance that he will continue to raise the issues of both the number of claimants and the higher number of claimants in NI with mental illness with DWP Ministers.

Clause 77 Daily living component

Descriptors

326. Disability Action raised concerns about the descriptors associated with the daily living component listed in paragraph 359 of the Explanatory and Financial Memorandum and felt these should be amended to reflect the true context in which people with disabilities live.
327. The Committee noted that these descriptors were not on the face of the Bill but will be in the regulations and asked the Department if the higher rate of mental health issues in NI would be taken into account in drawing up the descriptors.
328. The Department advised the Committee that there had already been extensive consultations on these descriptors but that the Minister had written to the DWP Minister and secured a commitment that all views and concerns expressed from Northern Ireland during the most recent consultation exercise would be given careful consideration as DWP evaluates what further changes need to be made to the Personal Independence Payment assessment criteria to ensure that they are a fair reflection of disabled peoples' needs.

Clause 78 Mobility component

329. This clause sets out the basic entitlement conditions that apply to the standard rate and enhanced rate that claimants must satisfy.

Ability to plan and follow a journey

330. The Committee was concerned that in any assessment process the ability of a person to plan and follow a journey should be considered. This was an issue also raised by NIPSA. The Department confirmed that this would be covered under subsection (4) and referred the Committee to paragraph 367 of the Explanatory and Financial Memorandum.

Impact of condition on entitlement

331. The Committee also clarified a point raised by STEP regarding subsection (7) where a person eligible to the mobility component is deemed not to be entitled to it as a result of their condition. The Department confirmed that this would be in extreme circumstances, outlined in paragraph 371 of the Explanatory and Financial Memorandum, such as the person being in a coma or vegetative state and therefore considered not in a position to benefit from mobility assistance.

Clause 79 Ability to carry out daily living activities or mobility activities

Assessment process

332. Stakeholders highlighted the problems relating to the current Work Capability Assessment process associated with ESA, and the need not to simply duplicate this process in respect of PIP assessment.
333. The Department was keen to emphasise the difference between ESA and PIP and that the assessment for PIP will focus on the ability to carry out key everyday activities, the challenges people face and the support they need, rather than on the functions linked to a person's ability to work, as is the case with the Work Capability Assessment.
334. The Department advised that PIP would be paid to people regardless of whether they are in work and that they were seeking to learn from the experience of delivering the Work Capability Assessment to ensure that the PIP assessment is right from the start. To that extent the Department stated that the independent review of the WCA by Professor Harrington would be considered and that his recommendations, where appropriate, would be fully taken into account.
335. The Department also advised that the contract for the PIP assessment will include an annual review, monthly performance reporting on service levels and that penalties will be in place for scenarios in which thresholds are breached.

Clause 80 Required period condition: further provision

336. The Committee heard concerns that a claimant must satisfy the conditions for PIP for three months before the date of entitlement and for 9 months afterwards and that this compares with 3 months and 6 months for DLA. However, the Department subsequently confirmed that this had been changed, following consultation, to 3 months and 6 months respectively.
337. The Committee welcomed this change.

Clause 81 Terminal illness

338. This clause was noted by the Committee.

Clause 82 Persons of pensionable age

339. This clause was noted by the Committee.

Clause 83 No entitlement to daily living component where UK is not competent state

340. This clause was noted by the Committee.

Clause 84 Care home residents

Clarification on supported housing

341. The Committee sought clarification on whether claimants in Supported Housing will receive the daily living component of Personal Independence Payment. The Department confirmed that Supported Housing was not defined as a 'care home' and that these people would continue to receive their payment.

Definition of 'care home'

342. The Committee also clarified that the definition of 'care home' does not extend to establishments such as hostels where people might receive support services and the Department confirmed this to be the case.

Clause 85 Hospital in-patients

343. Hospital patients will continue to receive their payment for the first 28 days that they are in hospital, mirroring the current rules on DLA.
344. The Committee noted that the Equality Commission had recommended that the mobility component for adults is brought into line with the extended timeline provided for children (12 weeks) under this clause. However, the Department pointed out that PIP does not apply to under 16 year olds and that extension to 12 weeks for children under 16 is a condition, and recognition of the additional special needs they may have for support from their parents while they are adjusting to hospital life.

Clause 86 Prisoners

Avoiding duplication of funding

345. The Committee had raised concerns about the daily living component not being paid to someone on remand who is subsequently released. The Department stated that stopping payments to people on remand was not a reflection on a person's presumed innocence but rather focused on avoiding double provision.
346. They noted that DLA and PIP are intended to contribute towards the extra costs associated with disability. Disabled prisoners have their disability-related daily living and mobility needs met by the Prison Service or through healthcare provided by health and social care trusts. They therefore highlighted to the Committee that to pay PIP on top of that would be to duplicate public funding.
347. The Committee noted that payment would continue for the first 28 days as per clause 85.
348. The Minister indicated that the policy intention to treat those people on remand or who have their conviction quashed in the same way as people are treated who go into hospital and that is a fair and equitable approach.

349. The Committee was content with this clarification.

Clause 87 Claims, awards and information

Fixed term awards

350. Disability Action raised concerns about the fixed-term approach to determining awards. The Department replied that the aim was to introduce more regular reassessments into Personal Independence Payments to ensure that ongoing benefit decisions reflected any changes and remained accurate. They noted that the majority of awards for Personal Independence Payments will be limited to an appropriate fixed term and that under the current system, the majority of fixed-term awards are given for up to two years.

351. The Committee noted that subsection (3) allowed decision-makers to determine when a fixed-term award would be inappropriate in accordance with Departmental guidance.

Clause 88 Report to the Assembly

352. The Committee was concerned about the time by which the Department had to report to the Assembly on the operation of assessments for PIP with the first laid within 2 years and the second within 4 years. The Committee believed this was too long.

353. However, further clarification from the Department revealed that there would not be sufficient numbers of people gone through the system within a shorter timeframe suggested by the Committee to make the report meaningful.

354. The Committee also acknowledged that the data on the impact of the new criteria on existing claimants would not be available by June 2014.

355. The Committee was advised that the Department could continue to update the Committee on progress made with people moving to the new system and provide any briefings as requested.

356. The Committee was content with this approach.

Clause 89 Abolition of disability living allowance

357. The Committee noted this clause.

Clause 90 Amendments

358. The Committee noted this clause.

Clause 91 Power to make supplementary and consequential provision

359. The Committee noted this clause.

Clause 92 Transitional

360. The Committee noted this clause.

Clause 93 Regulations

361. The Committee noted that in the first instance regulations made under specified provisions will be subject to the confirmatory procedure and subsequently by the negative resolution procedure.
362. The Committee agreed an amendment to this clause to make the regulation-making power in clause 91 subject to the confirmatory procedure as recommended by the Examiner of Statutory Rules:

Clause 93, page 65, line 26

(c) regulations under clause 91

363. The Committee noted this clause.

Part 5 Social Security: General

Clause 95 Benefit cap

Amount of cap

364. Subsections 1 to 3 of this clause allow regulations to establish a cap for the total amount of benefit that a claimant can receive and is referenced by the average earnings of working households in Great Britain. It is anticipated that this cap will be £350 for a single person and £500 for couples and lone parents.

Number of households affected by cap

365. The Department noted that approximately 620 households in NI would be affected by this cap. Members did discuss the argument that work should pay and that households getting benefits should not receive more in benefit than the average working household receives in pay.
366. While the number of households affected by this is small the Committee and stakeholders were concerned about the potential impact on these claimants. Members noted that this cap would impact on large families given that Child Benefit is included in the list of benefits (See Appendix 6) covered by the cap and NICCY's contention that 6,500 children will see their families lose money.

Risk of homelessness

367. Stakeholders, such as Housing Rights Service, had concerns that this cap would increase the risk of homelessness as the cap will be applied through deductions from Housing Benefit payments. The concerns were also shared by Citizens Advice who questioned whether alternative, affordable housing options would be available given the pressures on the housing sector in NI.

Private rented sector

368. CIH referred to the fact that NI has the highest levels in the UK of families with four or more children and also noted that there is a much greater dependence on the private rented sector to meet housing need and that these rents are higher than in the social housing sector.

Higher disregards

369. While the Department noted that the disregards associated with UC would act to encourage people into work and keep more of what they earn, the Committee highlighted that the current economic conditions were such that finding employment would be very difficult and people would be subject to hardship as they will have to make up the shortfall in rent from their other benefits.

Clause 96 Benefit cap: supplementary

Additions to excepted benefits

370. Members raised the issue of additional benefits that could be added to the list of excepted benefits namely, Carer's Allowance, widow's and bereavement benefits and contributory-based ESA.

Carer's Allowance

371. In particular, it was noted that while Carer's Allowance is viewed as an income-replacement benefit it places restrictions on the amount that carers can earn and that the comparative hourly rate is less than the minimum wage.

Right to appeal

372. Citizens Advice highlighted concerns about making an appeal against an award however the Department clarified that every aspect of the award is appealable except the benefit cap itself.

Clause 97 Claims and awards

373. The Committee noted subsection 4 of this clause amends section 5(1)(g) of the SSAA 1992 so that a one member of a couple may make a claim on behalf of both members jointly.

Financial independence for women

374. The Women's Ad Hoc Policy Group again noted that this had the potential to return to a male 'Head of Household' model and impact on a woman's financial independence with potential consequences for the provision of support to children.

Clause 98 Powers to require information relating to claims and awards

The Committee noted this clause.

Clause 99 Payments to joint claimants

Budgeting and payment options

375. The Committee heard from Advice NI, the Law Centre, NICCY and others that people who have been used to receiving benefits on a more regular basis may have difficulty budgeting should UC be paid on a monthly basis.
376. Stakeholders proposed that there should be a choice of payment i.e. weekly, fortnightly or monthly so that the system is geared towards the needs of the claimant. The Department responded that officials within the Universal Credit Programme are currently developing a Customer Preparation & Budgetary Support Strategy.
377. This Strategy will determine the types of budgeting advice customers may require, the development of suitable banking products (transactional banking products) and the types of alternative payment arrangements that may be required for those customers who will have difficulty budgeting from a single household monthly payment. It is anticipated that this Strategy will be launched in advance of Universal Credit although the level of resources to be dedicated to these activities have yet to be assigned.
378. The Department also stated that Paragraph 4 of Schedule 2 to the Welfare Reform Bill amends the Social Security Administration (NI) Act 1992 to allow the Department to carry forward the existing arrangements that apply to other benefits in respect of claims and payments of Universal Credit i.e. allow payments more frequently. The Department stated that this will be more fully developed in forthcoming regulations.

Agreed payment flexibilities

379. In addition, the Department noted that the Minister had announced on 22 October 2012 that that Lord Freud had agreed to payment flexibilities. These were;
- Housing element of Universal Credit paid directly to landlords rather than customer;
 - Payment of Universal Credit may be split between two parties in the household; and
 - Payment of Universal Credit may be payable twice each month.
380. The Committee noted that this statement appeared to reflect provisions of the existing legislation. Furthermore, the Committee noted that the Minister intended to conduct a consultation on these elements to determine the criteria that customers will have to meet before the payment flexibilities will be applied.

381. The consultation process was launched at an event on 15 November 2012. Two further events were held on 17 January in Derry/Londonderry and 22 January in Belfast.
382. An Oversight Board has also been established, chaired by the DSD Permanent Secretary, with input from a cross section of representatives from the community sector and academia with an interest in the different types of proposed flexible payment arrangements.
383. The Oversight Board will contribute to the final report which will be prepared by the Permanent Secretary. This is expected to be completed by April 2013.

Option of twice monthly payments

384. NICCY and Save the Children were of the view that claimants should have the option of fortnightly payments without having to meet any additional criteria and that this would protect the most vulnerable claimants and their children. However, the Department indicated that the Decision-Maker will take these issues under consideration on a case-by-case basis when reaching a decision about frequency of payment.
385. The Committee also raised concerns about the provision of mainstream financial services to claimants and asked what discussions the Department has had with the Northern Ireland banking institutions to ensure that appropriate financial products are available to UC claimants.
386. The Department clarified that the DWP Universal Credit Programme has been in discussion with the British Banking Association and that the NI UC Programme has been involved in these discussions. A UK-wide procurement exercise has since been launched to select banking products suitable for UC customers and NI is within the scope of this procurement exercise.
387. The Committee noted that the Minister shared its concerns around the monthly payment and that many claimants need more frequent payments.
388. The Committee also acknowledged that the Minister was developing proposals to make more frequent payments to claimants in 'exceptional circumstances' and that a report on what the criteria for more flexible payment might be would be available in April.
389. However, the Committee felt that claimants should receive a twice monthly payment by default unless they opt for a monthly payment. While the Committee was presented with costs for payment flexibilities (£24m) it had concerns about the accuracy of these costs.

Split Payments

390. The Committee heard from stakeholders that the aim of having one household payment would potentially negatively impact on women.
391. The Women's Ad Hoc Policy Group told the Committee that this approach failed to appreciate the impact of a woman's reduced access to income including vulnerable women suffering financial and other domestic abuse.
392. This group, as well as NICCY and others, strongly advocated that the default position should be to pay UC to the second earner or carer in the household where the main earner is working. The groups premised this on the fact that UC is designed to reward the primary earner and the primary earner in households is normally the man, although they acknowledged that on occasion it may be the other partner.
393. It was the group's contention that clause 99 of the Welfare Reform Bill would allow this and indeed the Department's response to a Committee question confirmed this to be the case.

394. The Department stated Clause 99 of the proposed Welfare Reform Bill amends the Social Security Administration Act 1992 to allow for regulations to specify that couples may nominate which partner should receive the payment of benefit.
- It further gives the Department the power to make an intervention and determine to which member of the couple the payment may be made, irrespective of whom the couple has nominated.*
- Further, this clause also allows the Department to split payments of Universal Credit between partners.*
395. However, it was clear that this decision would not be based on the choice of the claimant but rather, as per frequency of payment, the Decision-Maker will consider the claimant's financial circumstances and any vulnerability factors e.g. any relevant health issues before deciding on whether and how the payment should be split.
396. The Women's Ad Hoc Policy Group also proposed that where neither couple is working UC should be paid as a split payment by default.
397. The Committee heard, and had sympathy with, the argument that this was a return to the 'male, head of household' model and that as a result women would lose financial support and economic independence and therefore suffer from financial abuse – a recognised component of domestic abuse.
398. Similar points were made by NICCY who stated that "research has shown that when money goes directly to the mother, it is more likely to be spent on children than when it goes to the father" and that this could result in a breach of children's rights under the UNCRC. NICCY strongly supported operational flexibility to ensure that the child element of the credit is paid directly to the primary carer and this would better serve the rights and lives of children.
399. The Committee wrote to the Minister proposing the following:
- UC payments are, by default, paid fortnightly;
 - in the case of a joint application payments are made, by default, on a split basis; and
 - in a joint application where one person is in paid employment, the payment is made, by default, to the second earner/primary carer.
400. The Committee acknowledged that on 22 October 2012 the Minister announced payment flexibilities including split payments and payment frequency. However, the Committee also noted that these payments would be subject to criteria, developed in consultation with public and voluntary sector representatives, and that a report would not be available until April 2013.
401. The Committee was keen to define how payments could be made to the primary carer or second earner where a joint claim is made. However, on discussion the Committee recognised that without more detailed consideration of how, in particular, 'primary carer' would be defined any proposed amendment could prove too restrictive, or perhaps have unintended consequences in respect of whether the person receiving the payment was the appropriate person to do so.
402. The Committee was not content to agree this clause as drafted and recommended that the Minister discuss with the Executive the Committee's preferred option of twice monthly payments by default and that the criteria that will determine when payments are made on an exceptional basis should give priority to determining how payments can be made to ensure the financial independence of women, who tend to be the main carer or second earner, and therefore help protect the interests of children.

Clause 100 Payments on account

Clarification on Social Fund

403. The Department confirmed that this was not related to the replacement of the Social Fund. This clause was noted by the Committee.

Clause 101 Power to require consideration of revision before appeal

404. The Committee questioned the Department on the requirement, in the first instance, for a reconsideration of any decision before an appeal can be made. The Department noted that the aim was to reduce the number of appeals and the costs associated with these, by dealing with these through a reconsideration of the decision by other departmental officials.
405. NIPSA indicated that this approach is already standard practice but the Explanatory Memorandum states that, in practice, many people make an appeal from the outset.

Application of time limit to hear appeal

406. The Law Centre advocated that a time limit should be applied to the Department to ensure the appeal is heard in a timely fashion, but the Department replied that while there are operational targets for the Department to provide appeal submissions to the tribunal they cannot impose a time limit on the tribunal.

Clause 102 Electronic communications

407. The Department clarified that this clause was not related to data protection issues but rather it makes it possible for the Department to include in regulations provision for electronic communications in relation to claims to benefit, notification regarding claims to benefit and notification regarding change of circumstances, rather than having to go through a separate Order under the Electronic Communications Act (Northern Ireland) 2001.

Clause 103 Recovery of benefit payments

408. The Committee raised concerns about the recovery of payments from a claimant where the overpayment was not their fault. In particular the Committee was concerned about scenarios where the repayment may be detrimental to the claimant's health.
409. The Department noted that where reasonable evidence is available that the recovery of an overpayment would be detrimental to the health and/or welfare of the debtor and/or their family, particular criteria would need to be satisfied in order to waive recovery of the overpayment. The also noted that this criteria would be in the guidance for Decision-Makers.
410. The Committee noted that the Minister's response indicated there are particular criteria which must be satisfied before any decision to waive recovery of an overpayment is made and that the Department would consider the "Overpayment Recovery Guidance", to see if any additional clarification is needed for Decision-Makers.

Clause 104 Deductions from earnings: other cases

411. The Committee questioned the level of recovery by this method. The Department stated that there was a maximum of 25% of earnings that could be recovered to repay overpayments but that all the circumstances of each case is taken into account before the level of recovery is determined. If the person is faced with greater hardship, a lower deduction would probably be more appropriate.

Clause 105 Application of the Limitation (Northern Ireland) Order 1989

412. The Committee noted that under the current rules a 6 year time limit exists for recovery of a payment. This clause provides the clarification that the Department may recover social security overpayments and social security debt by means other than court action and amends the relevant Acts to ensure that time limits for recovery do not apply.

Clause 106 Powers to require information relating to investigations

Clause 107 Time limits for legal proceedings

Clause 108 Prosecution powers of the Housing Executive

413. The Committee noted these clauses.

Clause 109 Penalty in respect of benefit fraud not resulting in overpayment

414. Some Members had concerns that this clause introduces a penalty of £350 even though an overpayment has not occurred. Both Citizens Advice and the Law Centre shared these concerns particularly the possibility of hardship being caused to family members.
415. The Committee had concerns around the intention to commit fraud and how the Department would distinguish between actual intent to defraud with a genuine mistake on the claimant's part.
416. However, the Department pointed out that this was to address deliberate, attempted fraud i.e. providing false information on an application form with the intention of getting benefits that the person would otherwise not be entitled to. The Department also pointed out that the average level of fraud is around £4000 and that the £350 penalty is to act as a deterrent.
417. The Department indicated that this scenario deals with intentional attempted fraud and that currently the only option the Department has is to pursue court action. The Department contends that this approach may not be a proportionate response either and that it feels that an administrative penalty is a more appropriate way forward, where fraud has been attempted but not resulted in overpayment.
418. The Committee acknowledged this argument but did not agree the clause as drafted but asked that the Minister consider an informal caution as an alternative option.

Clause 110 Amount of penalty

419. The Committee noted that where an overpayment has been made as a result of fraud the penalty will be £350 or 50% of the amount overpaid, whichever is greater, up to a maximum of £2000. As noted in clause 109, where there is no overpayment the penalty will be fixed at £350.
420. The Department emphasized that attempted fraud was not about people making mistakes on their form; it was about intentionally providing false information in order to obtain benefits which they would otherwise not be entitled to.
421. The Minister stated that administrative penalties provide an alternative option for claimants and in some cases may be a much more appropriate solution.

422. The Committee opposed this clause and recommended that the Department review the levels of penalty under this clause.

Clause 111 Period for withdrawal of agreement to pay penalty

423. This clause reduces the “cooling off” period for a person agreeing to pay a penalty to avoid prosecution from 28 days to 14 days. This is the period during which a claimant may withdraw from an agreement to pay a fine in lieu of prosecution.
424. The Committee asked the Department to reconsider increasing this period as a longer period would give claimant’s the opportunity to seek independent advice.
425. The Committee welcomed the Minister’s decision to increase the ‘cooling-off’ period from 14 to 28 days.

Clause 112 Civil penalties for incorrect statements and failures to disclose information

Fixed penalty

426. The Committee noted that this clause introduces a fixed penalty for negligently making incorrect statements or for claimants who fail, without reasonable excuse or good reason, to disclose information about their claim. In each case a penalty would only be imposed if an overpayment has been made.

Impact on third party verification

427. Members were concerned about how this would be imposed where third party verification is required. However, the Department confirmed that the applicant would be subject to the penalty not the third party.
428. Citizens Advice had particular concerns about this clause but the Department advised that the claimant will be given an opportunity to explain the errors on their form and where there is good reason a penalty will not be imposed.
429. The Department explained that the aim of this clause is to reduce the financial loss from claimant error and achieve greater compliance.

Clause 113 Benefit offences: period of sanction

430. The Committee was concerned about the potential disproportionate approach under this clause. For example, while the Committee recognised that serious fraud offences deserve prosecution and possibly a prison sentence, subsection 11A(a) also introduces a new 3 year loss of benefit sanction. The Committee therefore sees the potential for a person to be subject to a long benefit sanction and a sentence of the courts.
431. The Minister noted the Committee’s concerns but indicated that the aim is to deter people from attempting serious fraud. The Committee acknowledged that this will apply only to cases of serious fraud i.e. cases of over £50,000, fraud of over 2 years, fraud involving identity fraud or a sentence imposed of 12 months imprisonment or over.

Clause 114 Benefit offences: sanctions for repeated benefit fraud

432. The Committee noted this clause.

Clause 115 Cautions

433. The Committee discussed the nature of cautions and the option of accepting a formal caution rather than an administrative penalty.
434. The Committee noted that the Department would tend to offer the administrative penalty at the lower end of the fraud scale as a first option; prosecutions for amounts greater than £2000 and cautions in-between these two.
435. The Department indicated to the Committee that a person may see a formal caution as the better option, as opposed to an administrative penalty, or vice versa. However, the Department emphasised that a formal caution takes place at the end of an investigation into alleged fraud and the Department has found that fraud has in fact taken place.
436. This caution goes on to a person's criminal record and this may have ramifications for employment prospects, travel etc. A formal caution is not therefore a simple verbal warning.
437. The aim of this clause is to remove cautions for benefit offences and replace them with more severe administrative penalties or prosecution.
438. The Committee had originally considered opposing this clause but on clarification it noted the potentially serious impact of a formal caution on a person's record and therefore agreed this clause.

Clause 116 Information-sharing in relation to provision of overnight care etc

439. This clause was noted by the Committee.

Clause 117 Information-sharing in relation to welfare services etc

440. The Committee noted the Department's point that it is public bodies that share information and that this is dictated by data protection legislation.
441. The Department noted that it is sharing data with the Department of Education for the purposes of providing welfare services; for example, free school meals.

Clause 118 Unlawful disclosure of information

442. This clause was noted by the Committee.

Clause 119 Sections 116 and 118: supplementary

443. This clause was noted by the Committee.

Clause 120 Information-sharing for social security or employment purposes etc

444. This clause was noted by the Committee.

Part 6: Miscellaneous

Clause 121 Supporting maintenance agreements

445. The Committee noted that it had responded to the Department's consultation on Supporting Separated Families and this was forwarded to DWP.

Clause 122 Collection of child support maintenance

446. The Committee noted that the aim of maintenance agreements is to help separated families reach and maintain voluntary arrangements. The Department confirmed that where voluntary arrangement breakdown the parent-with-care is entitled to come to the Department to seek payment enforcement.

Clause 123 Indicative maintenance calculations

447. This provides parents with the option to receive an indication of the amount of maintenance which would be payable under the statutory child maintenance scheme if an application were to be made. It does not create any liability to pay maintenance.
448. The Committee noted that any maintenance agreement entered into was based on the circumstances at the time of agreement and that the circumstances of either, or both parents, could change over time.

Clause 124 Recovery of child support maintenance by deduction from benefit

449. The Committee noted this clause.

Clause 125 Fees

450. The Committee noted that this clause does not introduce fees.
451. The Department confirmed that no decision had been taken on introducing fees and that the clause is about specifying where there would be a waiver for fees and that if fees were to be introduced, there would be a review within two and a half years.

Clause 126 Exclusion from individual voluntary arrangements

452. The Committee noted and welcomed the arrangement that parents who are declared bankrupt will still have to meet the debt on their child maintenance.

Clause 127 Use of jobcentres by sex industry

453. The Committee noted this clause.

Clause 128 Reduced fee for dog licences

454. The Committee noted this clause.

Clause 129 Orders of Secretary of State under Administration Act

455. The Department clarified that clause 129 amends section 165 of the Social Security Administration (Northern Ireland) Act 1992 by adding the Secretary of State to the list of persons and Departments that can make regulations and orders under that Act. It corrects an unintentional outcome of the Tax Credits Act 2000 which amended section 165 and narrowed the scope of the power and prevented the Secretary of State from making regulations or orders by statutory rule
456. Reciprocal agreements between the UK and a number of non-EU International relations are an excepted matter under schedule 2(3) to the Northern Ireland Act 1998, and the power to make the necessary order rests with the Secretary of State under section 155(1) of the Social Security Administration (Northern Ireland) Act 1992.
457. The relevant provisions would cover any future order relating to reciprocal agreements between the UK and a number of non-EU countries to assist in the satisfaction of conditions for entitlement to various benefits. As international relations are an excepted matter under schedule 2(3) to the Northern Ireland Act 1998, the power to make the necessary order rests with the Secretary of State under section 155(1) of the Social Security Administration (Northern Ireland) Act 1992.
458. In this context the Department explained the need to restore the original position to provide for the Secretary of State to make regulations and orders under the Act by statutory rule, and that the Northern Ireland Welfare Reform Bill was the only available vehicle to do that.

Part 7: Final

Clause 130 Rate relief schemes: application of housing benefit law

459. While the Law Centre and Citizens Advice raised concerns about the future of the rate relief scheme the Department advised that the Executive has agreed to preserve the existing entitlements for up to two years and fund any shortfall out of public expenditure for an interim two-year period.

Clause 131: Repeals

Apologies: None

10.06am The Chairperson declared the meeting open to the public.

9. Apologies

Apologies were as indicated above.

4. Welfare Reform Bill

The Chairperson asked the Clerk to clarify an issue with Clause 115 of the Welfare Reform Bill. The Clerk highlighted that during deliberations it was the Committee's intention to agree Clause 115 as it recognised the potential serious impact of a formal caution on a person's record. The Clerk also highlighted that the Committee may have not agreed this Clause in error and should have agreed Clause 115.

Agreed: The Committee agreed 115 as drafted.

The Chairperson advised Members that as the Committee was not content with a number of clauses as drafted it has the option of registering formal opposition to the question that these clauses stand part of the Bill.

Agreed: The Committee agreed to register formal opposition on these clauses.

The Committee considered a Departmental amendment to the Welfare Reform Bill. The Committee noted that the proposed amendment will introduce a new clause to allow the Department to provide discretionary support in the form of direct financial award or the provision of goods and services and to bring forward regulations providing further detail. The Committee recognised the benefits of such a clause and were therefore content with the new clause as drafted.

The Committee agreed the main body of the report:

Recommendations, read and agreed;

Introduction, read and agreed;

Consideration of the Bill, read and agreed;

Clause-by-clause scrutiny of the Bill, read and agreed; and Executive Summary, read and agreed.

Agreed: The Committee agreed that it was content for the Report to be printed as the Fifth Report of the Committee for Social Development.

This session was recorded by Hansard.

1. The Chairperson: We have with us this afternoon four officials from the Department: Anne McCleary, Michael Pollock, Martina Campbell and Colm McLaughlin. Thank you all for being here.
2. I remind Committee members that we are here to hear a briefing from the Department on how it views the general principles of the Bill, in advance of Tuesday's Second Stage debate. It is not a debate on the merits or demerits of the Bill; it is not that type of discussion. I remind members that, this morning, we strayed from the discussion into the rights and wrongs or whatever else of the policy, as opposed to dealing with the Bill itself.
3. Anne, I welcome you and your colleagues. I will leave it to you to take members through the principles of the Bill.
4. Ms Anne McCleary (Department for Social Development): Good afternoon. Thank you to the Committee for the opportunity to brief you on the high-level principles contained in the Welfare Reform Bill for Northern Ireland, which, as you are all aware by now, was introduced by the Minister on Monday past. The Bill's Second Stage is scheduled for Tuesday 9 October, with Committee scrutiny scheduled to commence the following day. Therefore, it is opportune for us to meet the Committee today to outline the legislative process thus far and what happens next, and to take the Committee's views on issues of particular concern, which, hopefully, we can address during its clause-by-clause scrutiny of the Bill.
5. Before I go on, I want to introduce, or possibly reacquaint members with, the individuals supporting me. Martina Campbell and her team have responsibility for universal credit, and no doubt this will not be Martina's only appearance before the Committee. Michael Pollock's team has overall responsibility for the Bill, its drafting, and so on, and, in particular, for working-age benefits, which will ultimately migrate to universal credit. Again, I am quite sure that this is not going to be the first and only time that you see Michael. There are others involved in this across the social security policy and legislation division, including my colleague Colm McLaughlin, and from the Social Security Agency (SSA) and elsewhere. For example, the child maintenance and enforcement division is involved in what is the most radical shake-up of the welfare reform system since its inception.
6. I will start by briefly going through what is in the Bill. The first thing is the creation of universal credit, which, as you know, will replace the key working-age benefits. Secondly, we have the creation of the personal independence payment (PIP), which will replace the disability living allowance (DLA). Thirdly, we have reform of the social fund. Fourthly, we have housing benefit reforms. Fifthly, we have the introduction of a benefit cap. Sixthly, there are changes to the employment and support allowance (ESA); that is, the one-year limit on the payment of contributory ESA. Seventhly, we have new conditionality

- and sanctions powers. Finally, there are new powers to deal with fraud. Those are the key changes contained in the Bill.
7. It is important to look at the context and at why the reform is necessary. There are a number of reasons, the first being sustainability. The system has, quite simply, become too expensive. The second reason is simplicity. The system, as I am sure you are all aware from your constituency business, has become too complex. Thirdly, it needs to be targeted. We need to ensure that resources are focused on those who are most in need.
 8. We then have personal responsibility. We want to ensure that those who can work are helped to move towards work, and not trapped in benefit dependency. We want to make sure that the system is fairer. We want to make the system fair for not only those who receive the benefits but those who fund it; in other words, the taxpayer. Finally, there is the infamous parity. Northern Ireland simply does not have the capacity to run or fund its own social security service. Cost is around £4.6 billion a year. That is effectively the same cost as the health service in Northern Ireland. Therefore, that is the kind of money that we are talking about and the context that we are dealing with.
 9. I mentioned the next steps in the legislative process, but let us focus particularly on the Committee's role, by way of scrutinising the Bill. I suppose that what we as officials hope to get from today's session is an appreciation of particular aspects of the Bill that members have questions around so that we can tailor our approach for future briefings to facilitate Committee scrutiny and address the issues raised. On that point, I want to say that we are very appreciative of the Committee's decision to sit on additional days. I think that that is very helpful for all concerned.
 10. At the outset, I point out that the Bill is essentially an enabling Bill, which sets out the broad policy direction and will subsequently allow for the detail around the policy intent to be set out in regulations. We are beginning to see the process work through for the GB legislation at Westminster, which gained Royal Assent in March this year. Hopefully, the outworkings of that will be useful in the Assembly and for the Committee's deliberations.
 11. The Bill is set out in seven Parts, ranging from the introduction of universal credit in Part 1, through changes in working-age benefits in Part 2, to Part 7, which deals with the generalities of repeals, interpretation, and so on. We envisage that there will be something in the order of 25 sets of regulations flowing from the Bill, many of them containing a number of provisions. By any stretch, that represents a significant workload for all concerned, including the Committee — in fact, particularly the Committee — and, in some cases, the full Assembly, as some of the regulations will be confirmatory and, therefore, must be debated in the Assembly within six months of coming into operation. In that regard, as I said, it is extremely helpful that the Committee has agreed to additional sessions.
 12. As you will be aware, we are aiming to achieve Royal Assent for the Bill by March of next year. To manage the regulations, we plan to group them into three packages, depending on their operational date. I think that we have already provided some papers to the Committee explaining that approach.
 13. In advance of today, we also provided Committee members with an outline paper that touches on some of the headline topics in the Bill. If members are happy, it may be useful to run through that paper quickly. We can take any questions that members might have after that.
 14. The Chairperson: OK. We are happy enough to continue on that basis.
 15. Ms McCleary: Take a look at the document headed "Annex A". It contains the information that we will go through. The background there to universal credit —
 16. The Chairperson: Is it annex A or annex 1?

17. Ms McCleary: In my pack, it is annex A.
18. The Chairperson: We have it as “Appendix 1”.
19. Ms McCleary: It is headed
“Briefing for Social Development Committee on the general principles of the Welfare Reform Bill”.
20. The Chairperson: It follows Anne’s covering letter.
21. Ms McCleary: OK. Let us start with universal credit. The background is the overall policy intent, and that, as no doubt you have heard before, is:
“to address poverty through tackling worklessness and benefit dependency. The underlying principle is that work should always pay and that people should be better off in work.”
It continues:
“Universal Credit will replace a complex system of working-age benefits and credits with a single set of rules.”
22. The grid compares the current system with the new universal credit. I do not want to go through each and every aspect of it, but you can see that it is about reducing the number of benefits from 30 to just one. It looks at improving work incentives and conditionality, because there are concerns:
“some benefit claimants are capable of working but have no obligations to look for work.”
23. That is not about forcing them to work but about moving them closer to the workplace.
24. Next, it states:
“Payments are paid to different adults in a household and for various periods.”
25. Therefore, this is about streamlining that entire process.
26. Universal credit is a working-age benefit that replaces income support, income-based jobseeker’s allowance (JSA), income-related ESA, housing benefit, child tax credits and working tax credits. The upper age limit is the age at which one becomes eligible for state pension. We know now that the first claims for universal credit will start, as currently planned, in October 2013, and then there will be a migration for a number of years after that.
27. Entitlement will be based on households rather than on individuals. Universal credit will be paid monthly, the idea being that it replicates a wage, as most wages are paid monthly. That is about smoothing the transition into work and making it easier for people to move into work.
28. We then have the support that will be available, including budgetary advice and help. Entitlement will be based on information already held, and this is where we get into the HM Revenue and Customs (HMRC) information. Information on those who have earnings from employment will come in from HMRC. We will use real-time information to try to make benefit calculations as accurate as possible.
29. There will be a single taper rate and a simple system of disregards, based on people’s particular circumstances. The idea of that is that people can see more clearly that they will be better off in work. Therefore, they will be able to look at that and make those decisions.
30. The real-time information will also mean that universal credit payments can be gradually reduced as earnings increase. It will make that system easier. Taper rate is expected to be set at around 65%. In other words, 35 pence in every £1 earned would be kept. That means that someone would be £35 better off for every £100 of net earnings that they have. That is a distinct advantage by comparison with the current system.
31. Standard allowance is the core cast component of any universal credit claim. It is intended to help with ordinary living expenses. On to that basic amount, additional amounts will be added to provide for particular circumstances, such as the number of children, childcare costs, persons with disability in the household and housing - costs. They are like building blocks. Each of those building blocks will be added to the core cash component. An amount will be included for those who are responsible for children, and an additional amount will be paid if a dependent child or qualifying young person is disabled. That is consistent with the objectives of simplicity and affordability. That will replace child tax credit and take over its role as the main source of extra support for children in low-income families either in, or indeed out, of work. As now, child benefit will remain separate. Therefore, child tax credit will be a part of universal credit, but child benefit will continue to be separate.

32. Support with the cost of childcare will be available to all lone parents and couples where both members are in work, regardless of the number of hours that they work. Families will be able to recover childcare costs of 70% for up to £760 for one child or £1,300 for two or more children. That mirrors the current arrangements under the tax credit system.
33. The housing cost element will cover similar types of payment liabilities as are covered by the current housing benefit and support for mortgage interest schemes. Claimants who are tenants in the social rented sector and who underoccupy their properties will have their housing benefits payments limited. The size criteria will replicate that which applies to claimants in the private rented sector.
34. People will remain registered on the system for two years after their claim has ended. That means that they will not have to wait for vital support if they lose their job or cannot work for a period owing to ill health.
35. Following universal credit in the Bill, we have the benefit cap. As you are probably aware, the cap will be limited to around £500 a week for couple and lone-parent households and £350 a week for single households. Those amounts correspond to the level in GB,
- even though earnings are in fact lower in Northern Ireland.
36. It is important to remember that there are exemptions from the benefit cap. Those exemptions are for war widows and, particularly importantly, for households with a member in receipt of DLA, personal independence payment, attendance allowance, industrial injuries benefit, the support component of ESA or the limited capability for work or work-related activity element of universal credit. Therefore, the benefit cap will not apply to a significant amount of people in Northern Ireland.
37. Current figures suggest that 64% of households will have the same or an improved — higher — benefit entitlement. However, for those who do not, there will be a transitional protection package to ensure that there are no losers as a direct result of the move to universal credit where circumstances remain the same. If somebody's circumstances change, that will make a difference, but if they remain the same, transitional protection will assist that person.
38. The other factor is conditionality groups, of which there are four: full conditionality; work preparation groups; those who are keeping in touch with the labour market; and no conditionality. You have a description of who meets what criteria in your papers.
39. Relevant to the conditionality groups are sanctions. One of the features of the Welfare Reform Bill is strengthened conditionality supported by a new system of financial sanctions. The sanctions are there to provide greater incentives for people to meet their responsibilities. Under the existing JSA sanctions regime, the consequences of failing to comply with requirements are not always clear. For example, if a person refuses a reasonable job offer, he might get a sanction of anywhere between one and 26 weeks. The new regime will make it far clearer as to what anyone should expect in that circumstance. Prior to the introduction of universal credit, the JSA and ESA

- sanctions regime will be revised to align themselves broadly with the universal credit sanctions model and will feature four levels of sanctions: high; medium; low; and lower still. No one will be sanctioned if no work is available, and sanctions will apply only if a job is available, the claimant has been offered it and he or she does not take that job. The level of sanction will depend on which conditionality group that person is in, and there is a table in your papers that explains all of that.
40. It is proposed that a new, one-year time limit will apply to people who claim contributory ESA and are placed in the work-related activity group. I stress that that will not apply to those who are in the support group for contributory ESA. For the most severely ill or disabled people who will be in the support group, work is not a viable option for them, and they will not be affected by this. Therefore, the time that they are entitled to the benefit will not be limited.
41. I move on to fraud and error. People who fail to report or are negligent with their benefit claim will now face a financial penalty as well as recovery of the overpaid benefit. The current administrative penalty and cautions will be replaced with a new minimum administrative financial penalty, and cautions will be replaced by a new minimum administrative financial penalty for benefit fraud or 50% of the amount overpaid whichever is the greater up to a maximum of £2,000. They will also have a loss of benefit for four weeks. Again, that is intended to deter. It is not about penalising; it is about deterring from fraud in the first place.
42. I move on to the personal independence payment, which will replace DLA for people aged between 16 and 64. The rationale is quite clear. DLA has not been fundamentally reviewed since it was introduced in 1992. It has become hard to understand, and it is certainly very complex to administer, as I am sure you are all aware. There is no systematic process for checking that awards remain correct. As we all know, medical conditions change. They can either improve or they can worsen, so we need to make sure that there is a systematic process. We also need to target our support at those who most need help. It is worth noting that, in 2010-11, spending on DLA was £754 million, a significant amount of money.
43. PIP is a new benefit. It is payable to those who meet conditions that will be set out in regulations. Those conditions are expected to include: being resident and present in Northern Ireland; having a physical or mental condition that limits or severely limits their ability to carry out daily living or mobility activities; and having had the disability for a qualifying period of three months, with the prospect of remaining disabled for the next nine months — that is the prospective test. Claimants will be assessed on their ability to perform nine daily living and two mobility activities. A claimant who has a terminal illness may be entitled to benefit without having to satisfy either the qualifying period or a prospective test. Again, we have two components: a daily living component and a mobility component. Each component will be payable at either a standard or an enhanced rate, and that will be set out in regulations.
44. The majority of awards will be for a fixed term, and there will be a process to regularly review the awards to ensure that they remain correct. The SSA will retain responsibility for decision-making, but decisions will carry a right of appeal. A key part of the reform is that decisions will be based on an assessment. You will be pleased to hear that there will be a shorter, two-part claim form.
45. With PIP, it is always important to remember what it is there for. DLA has reached the stage where people sometimes forget what it is for. It is not there to replace income; it is there to help people with their living costs caused by their disability.
46. PIP will consider the impacts that the person's disability has on that individual's ability to perform a range of everyday tasks. The assessments will be carried out by a third-party provider.

- The criteria are still being developed, but they have been consulted on. They will take account of physical, sensory, mental, intellectual and cognitive impairments. They will consider that individual's ability to carry out the activities over a period of time and those that apply for the majority of the time, for example, in cases where a person's condition fluctuates. I am sure you are aware that that has been an issue during the consultation.
47. A key part of the assessment process for claimants will be the face-to-face consultation with a trained health professional, and that will apply to the majority of claimants. Separate consultations on the assessment criteria and the detailed design of personal independence payment have been undertaken in conjunction with the Department for Work and Pensions (DWP). The formal response to those consultations will be published in due course.
48. Those are the key changes coming through in the Welfare Reform Bill as proposed. The timetable for the Bill, as I am sure you are aware, is that from June 2013, new claims will start to be received. In October 2013, there will be a natural reassessment; in other words, where there has been a change in circumstances or where the claims come to an end. From January 2014, there will be managed reassessment, through which 1,000 cases a week will be reassessed by March 2016.
49. That concludes what I wanted to say. We are happy to take questions. In particular, we are interested to know the issues in relation to which the Committee has a particular interest so that we can provide as much assistance to you as possible in your scrutiny role.
50. The Chairperson: Thank you for that, Anne. I remind members that, first of all, I want you to address whether you are satisfied with the presentation you have got this morning as to what the Bill is supposed to be doing. It is not a discussion on whether you like it or not, or any element of it, or think that it is wonderful. It is a matter of whether
- we are satisfied with the explanation given on what the Bill is supposed to do. That is the first thing. Are we happy enough with it? Do we think there is anything in this paper that we need further understanding about? It does not matter whether you agree with the Bill's intention or not. I am taking that as a yes.
51. Again, then, the potential thing here would be if there was something specific about the Bill. I am not sure how we can do this, Anne, because a range of issues have been debated at length around the table over quite a number of sessions. That is as it should be. We are certainly not going to get a consensus in the Committee that we agree on a, b and c. Perhaps if members have specific concerns that they want the Department to consider, they should just itemise them. You do not need to elaborate on them; just identify what the fundamental issues are. We do not expect a to and fro about whether we agree or do not agree.
52. Mr Copeland: Thank you for your presentation. I have seven points that I wish to seek clarification on, and I am quite happy to take the replies in writing. First, I would like some explanation or information on any differences that exist between our proposed legislation and the current legislation in GB. I would like clarification on the arrangements for direct payments; in other words, that they will be the same as those enacted by DWP. If they are not, I would like to know what the differences are. Is the Department content that you have exhausted all potential areas of operational flexibility? Will the facility for permitted work for people in both categories of ESA continue to exist in its current form? I would like some indication on what the net reduction in the cost of the welfare bill will be at the end of this process.
53. I have a theoretical point, for which I apologise. I foresee that a large number, or a potentially large number, or an unknown number of people who currently consider themselves to be unfit for work by virtue of disability or illness will be classified as being fit for some - sort of work. Have any discussions taken place with the Departments that are charged with providing work to see whether work will be available? The most recent figures that I saw are that 66,000-odd people are looking for work and 5,417 available jobs. For me, that does not compute. I know that that is not a point about the Bill, but it goes to the core of this. I apologise for the length of those questions, and I would appreciate written answers at some stage.

54. Ms McCleary: We can come back to you on that. It is key to remember that the Bill is, generally speaking, an enabling Bill. A lot of the detail will be in the regulations.
55. Mr Copeland: I understand that.
56. Ms Martina Campbell (Department for Social Development): You said that you had seven points. You have given six, I think.
57. The Chairperson: I really have to caution, because we are going into detail that we cannot get into. This is about the principles of the Bill.
58. Mr Copeland: I understand, Chair.
59. The Chairperson: We just need to satisfy ourselves that we understand what the Department is saying about the principles. It does not matter whether we agree with them or not, and, with respect, we cannot really go into the type of detail that you tried to go into there now.
60. Mr Copeland: Apologies. It should have been six.
61. The Chairperson: Sorry about that, Michael.
62. Mr Brady: Thanks for the presentation; we were starting to miss you, Anne.
[Laughter.]
63. Ms McCleary: You will not be missing me in the near future.
64. Mr Brady: We are thinking of you, honestly.
65. Ms McCleary: That reassures me and does my heart good.
66. Mr Brady: I just want to make you feel wanted.
67. I have a few fairly general questions. You talked about the reduction from 30 benefits to one. Is it possible to check how many of those benefits will actually be abolished rather than reduced? For example, the young person's incapacity benefit, which replaced severe disabled allowance. With the industrial injuries benefit, unforeseen aggravation and all that will go out the window. You could maybe check those.
68. You mentioned the monthly payment. Within the past week, David Freud has said that, for a two-year period, people may be paid fortnightly. The premise is that people are paid monthly when they are in work. That is not the case here; most people are paid fortnightly. However, he did not go into detail on that.
69. The taper will be set at 65%, and people will earn £35 for every £100. To me, that may encourage employers to pay less so that they can get more benefit. I am not sure if that has been addressed.
70. You talked about childcare, and your paper says:
"This mirrors the current arrangements under the Tax Credit system."
71. The reason that that has failed, particularly for lone parents, is that your child has to be looked after by a registered child-minder. Is that going to persist, or will it be looked at? My constituency had one of the worst childcare provisions in western Europe when the survey was done. That can easily be checked.
72. How long is the timeline for transitional protection? Has there been any thought about the people who pay contributory benefits and who will only get ESA for a year based on the contributions? People will consider that grossly unfair.
73. You talked about the rationale for the change from DLA to PIP and said that there is no systematic process for checking that awards remain correct. I do not accept that. The periodic review was specifically introduced for that - purpose. I attended the briefings by the Department in the mid 1990s, and we were told that that was the purpose. I do not necessarily agree that it has become hard to understand and complex to administer, because that was a self-inflicted wound by the Department. Our report in the last mandate highlighted how the Department could change that.

74. The paper says:
- “Key part of the assessment process for claimants will be a face to face consultation with a trained health professional”.*
75. We went into a lot of detail on the work capability assessment and how it is fundamentally flawed. There is nothing to suggest that the assessment will be different.
76. Ms McCleary: A lot of this is to do with the regs, particularly in relation to things like the monthly payments and childcare, and I appreciate the issue of formal childcare as opposed to informal childcare. Those factors are still being looked at. Perhaps one of my colleagues can confirm the timeline for transitional protection.
77. Ms M Campbell: It is for as long as their circumstances remain the same. There is no cut-off.
78. Mr Brady: As we said previously, childcare in Britain is a statutory entitlement from the local authority. We do not have that here, and are unlikely to for quite a while.
79. Ms McCleary: That issue is being looked at.
80. Finally, from my perspective, the face-to-face discussions — referring now to PIP — as we very often remind people, particularly the media, there is considerable confusion about the difference between an assessment for ESA and an assessment for DLA or now PIP. They are for very different purposes, and there is a general lack of understanding about that. One is about whether someone is able to work or able to move closer to the workplace, and the other is about what that person needs to help them in their day-to-day life.
81. Mr Brady: Is that a fundamental change in the Department’s thinking? Initially, we were told that it was going to be much the same type of assessment by the same company.
82. Ms McCleary: We do not know which company will do the assessment.
83. Mr Brady: When you find out, will you let us know?
84. Ms McCleary: I am sure that you will be the first to know.
85. Mr Brady: I do not think that I will be the first, but I would like to be on the list.
86. Mr Durkan: Members who have spoken previously have touched on stuff that I have been thinking of. The lack of detail in the answers is really frightening, but I do not blame anyone for that. It is due to the fact that this is enabling legislation. [Inaudible.] We know very little about the content.
87. I have just one question specific to this, and it is on the benefit cap. Given that child benefit is separate from universal credit, is it included in the limits for the benefit cap?
88. Ms M Campbell: We will confirm that for you.
89. The Chairperson: That is an important issue. You do not have the information yet? That is what we are saying, Michael and Martina, yes?
90. Ms M Campbell: I do not have it with me. I am sorry.
91. Ms McCleary: We will come back to you on that.
92. Mr Durkan: It says:
- “The total level of entitlement to welfare benefits is to be limited to £500 a week”.*
93. It does not say that that is the total level of entitlement under universal credit.
94. Ms M Campbell: It is out-of-work benefits.
95. Ms McCleary: It is not a benefit. It is not part of the benefit system and,

- therefore we do not think it would be included, but we will confirm that.
96. Mr F McCann: Most of the stuff has been answered, and you threatened us all at the start not to take the debate to a place where it should not be.
97. I am interested in the transition setup. I know from previous periods of transition that, when the slightest change in a benefit kicks in, people are taken off it. I take it that that will still be the same? Once this starts kicking in, there will be very few people who will stick to the letter of the transitional thing. It will affect most people, probably, within a short period of time.
98. Ms M Campbell: Colleagues in the Department are working on what they call volumetrics, the number of people that they expect in each tranche of the migration over. As you say, yes, any change in a claimant's circumstance will trigger a review in benefit assessment which could end up in losing the transitional protection. That is correct.
99. Mr F McCann: My other point is about fraud and error. I see the sanctions that will be applied. Considering most of the error is done within the Department, what sanctions are being laid against people working in the Department?
100. Ms McCleary: That is a perennial question.
101. Mr F McCann: The other thing is — [Interruption.] Sorry, I thought I had that off. I think that someone at the back has rung me.
102. The Chairperson: We will talk among ourselves if you want to take your call there.
103. Mr F McCann: Thank you very much, Chair. I appreciate it.
104. My other point is about underoccupancy and the rules that have been set down there. I do not see anything in there that says — certainly in policy — that if houses or accommodation are not available to take up the slack of people in underoccupancy, they will not be penalised for it.
105. Ms McCleary: I think that the Department with its other hat on, in other words, the housing aspect of the Department, is looking at those kinds of issues, and we are working with them on it. However, underoccupancy is the housing change in all of this. It is important to remember, when we are talking about underoccupancy, that there are groups that are excluded from that, so that we are not going to be looking at underoccupancy in relation to pensioners. However, it is an issue that we need to look at.
106. Mr F McCann: It applies to people up to 65.
107. Ms McCleary: Yes. We need to look at that, and the Department is aware that there are issues around this.
108. Mr F McCann: When you say the Department is aware, are you saying there will be changes to this?
109. Ms McCleary: I do not know quite what the Department will do. Because we have responsibility for housing, in the social sector in particular, there are things that can be looked at from a different perspective, perhaps to ameliorate the situation.
110. Mr F McCann: The reason I raise that is that we are being given a briefing on what is going to happen. I would like a briefing with all the facts. It is difficult to do that —
111. Ms McCleary: Michael might be able to help.
112. The Chairperson: Fair enough.
113. Mr Michael Pollock (Department for Social Development): Underoccupancy is one issue that —
114. Mr F McCann: Mickey is calling me a cynic here.
115. Mr Pollock: I know, but it is an issue that impacts particularly on the housing sector. Most of the welfare stuff, because of the breadth of the reform agenda, will touch on the work of lots of Departments, whether that is Health or Education. What Anne is saying is - that the housing arm of our Department will be looking particularly at those issues. The Minister has already established that Executive subgroup on welfare reform. The types of issues that are exercising your mind are the type of things that will be raised at that type of forum to see whether the Northern Ireland Departments need to do something else to ameliorate or alleviate any difficulties in implementing the welfare reform programme along the way.

116. Mr F McCann: Michael, the only reason I raised it is because Anne raised underoccupancy in her presentation. It may lie in another part of the Department, but we are getting a departmental briefing here.
117. Mr Durkan: That is the thing. We are dealing with universal credit, so I do not think it is right that we are talking about different crowds, like the housing crowd and the social security crowd. I would very much like to hear from the IT crowd about the IT systems and costs. Universal credit deals with all those things.
118. You talked about the exemption for pensioners from underoccupancy, but that raises another issue. Say if there are a couple, and one of them is the nominated person to receive the universal credit, yet they are younger than the other person. When the other person reaches pension age, what effect does that have?
119. Ms McCleary: In relation to the housing aspect?
120. Mr Durkan: In relation to the housing aspect or other age-related benefits.
121. Mr Colm McLaughlin (Department for Social Development): That would go out to the housing aspect. In relation to, for example, JSA, the younger one has to claim JSA.
122. Mr Durkan: Yes, but say the younger person is already the nominated person, so they will be on JSA, and the older person, who is not the nominated person, then reaches pension age. What impact will that have?
123. Mr C McLaughlin: As far as I understand, the person on JSA has to claim for both, because he is the younger person. The person who is actually claiming has not reached the qualifying age, so that person has to be available and actively seeking work for JSA purposes. It is a joint claim.
124. Ms M Campbell: Where one half of a couple is of working age, the couple must claim universal credit and, therefore, be subject to the conditions applicable to universal credit.
125. Mr C McLaughlin: It will be the same for JSA.
126. Mr Durkan: Including underoccupancy?
127. Mr Pollock: Including the housing cost element of universal credit.
128. Ms M Campbell: All of the elements.
129. Mr Brady: Obviously it would be easier to sanction the person if they are claiming the JSA benefit, because it will be sanction-led. It would look better, from the Department's point of view, if it sanctioned the younger person rather than the pensioner. And you can accuse me of being cynical, but you tend to —
130. Mr F McCann: You are.
131. The Chairperson: Is there anything else any member wants to raise?
132. Mr Brady: Social fund has not been mentioned specifically. That is obviously something that is going to change dramatically here under welfare reform in general terms.
133. Ms McCleary: The bulk of social fund will move into the new universal credit. Then, we have the rest of it, what is known as the discretionary element of social fund, which will cease to exist. I think everybody knows that we are looking at proposals for a successor scheme for the discretionary elements of social fund. That is being looked at. I am quite sure that there will - be consultation on that as we move forward.

134. Mr Copeland: I apologise if this sounds slightly specific, but it does concern me slightly. A number of my constituents are not capable of oversight of their own affairs and have appointed people to do that for them. Will that system still be available? Are there any implications for that system arising from these changes?
135. Ms McCleary: As far as I know, the nominee arrangement will continue.
136. The Chairperson: As members have no other issues at this moment in time, I will make two wee points, Anne. First, I appreciate that it may not be possible, no matter how many people you have at the table, to have every answer, but I do think it important that, on the key things, we make sure that people are available to respond. Secondly, when we met the Minister, Tommy Reilly and other officials to discuss the Bill and its timetable, they stressed that there were issues; that for example, if we did not meet a deadline, things like the social fund would have no legislative authority to be paid out. They said that there are a range of issues like that, but I have not seen that range of issues. I have only heard from the Minister and Tommy directly that social fund, for example, would fall foul of us not meeting a deadline. Can we have that list? It is important.
137. Ms McCleary: I think that a letter has been sent to the Department asking for clarity on that. You will receive that information through that.
138. The Chairperson: I would have thought that that should be something you should be able to say, just like that.
139. Ms McCleary: Well, we can tell you that there are quite considerable and significant IT issues, where there is delay with the Bill. There are other issues. As you say, social fund is one area, along with the rates element of housing benefit, that will move out of the social security arena once GB has commenced its Bill on 1 April.
- In both cases, that funding will move from annually managed expenditure to departmental expenditure limit. So, there are significant funding issues around that that need to be looked at. All that needs to be clarified. There are issues, undoubtedly.
140. The Chairperson: I want to place on record that the Committee is going to devote quite a considerable amount of additional time —
141. Ms McCleary: We appreciate that.
142. The Chairperson: Thank you for that. That is important. We are going to make sure that the scrutiny of the Bill is very robust. All parties have already acknowledged that what they want to do is enable full scrutiny with stakeholder involvement. By the same token, although I am coming into this mandate afresh, I have heard arguments in the Chamber before to say that we need to get something done because of parity or because there will be no legislative authority. Then, lo and behold, six months later, we find that that did not apply, and that people had been rushed into making decisions. I am not saying that we are going to be rushed, because we are going to give this all the time that we need.
143. Ms McCleary: I am not sure that the imperative is around legislation. The imperative is around money. The existing legislation will continue to exist until such times as it is repealed or a scheme is abolished. The issue is more to do with money.
144. The Chairperson: That is helpful, Anne. We will await the formal response. Thank you very much.

145. The Chairperson: I welcome formally officials Anne McCleary, Michael Pollock, Martina Campbell and Margaret Stitt. Thank you very much for being here. You are very welcome. I hope that you get home a wee bit earlier this evening.
146. Obviously, the purpose of today's session is to deal with all matters that relate to universal credit, which is covered by clauses 1 to 44 of the Welfare Reform Bill. During this session, officials will outline that particular part in as much detail as they can. I remind members that the purpose of the session is not to debate the issues, but to have the Bill and that particular set of clauses explained and for members to explore the detail of that. On that basis, members may raise any specific issues with the officials.
147. As per our schedule, which members have agreed, we intend to have a number of these sessions to work our way through the Bill clause by clause. We plan to have formal clause-by-clause scrutiny of the Bill on 13, 14, 15 and 20 November. All of that is leading up to our explanations. Of course, in the meantime, we will have plenty of time as
- a Committee to debate our approach to those clauses. This is an information-gathering exercise in the first instance.
148. I, therefore, welcome Anne and her colleagues this morning. The floor is yours for your presentation to the Committee.
149. Ms Anne McCleary (Department for Social Development): Thank you very much for giving us this opportunity to talk to you about where the Bill is going. As the Minister said during the debate, the scrutiny of the Bill is particularly important. We welcome suggestions that members may have about where we in Northern Ireland go with the Bill. I stress that at the outset; it is particularly important.
150. We plan to take you through the universal credit clauses, discuss with you what the various clauses are about and what they are intended to do, and give you as much information as we can at this stage about any of the detail around it. At the previous Committee meeting that we were at, we discussed the benefit cap. A member asked whether child benefit was included in the benefit cap. At that point, we were unable to give you a definitive answer, so we assured you that we would check the position and revert to the Committee. We can now confirm that there is a list of benefits that will be taken into account on the NI Direct website. The Welfare Reform Bill does not give a list of which benefits are going to be included in the benefit cap, but the NI Direct website does. I will tell you very briefly what is there: bereavement allowance; carer's allowance; child benefit; child tax credit; employment and support allowance, except where it is paid with the support component; guardian's allowance; housing benefit; incapacity benefit; income support; jobseeker's allowance; maternity allowance; severe disablement

- allowance; widowed parent's allowance; widowed mother's allowance; widow's pension; and widow's pension age-related. Those are the benefits that are intended to be encompassed in the benefit cap. That gives you the definitive answer: child benefit is on that list. That gets that out of the way.
151. A number of other questions were asked, but they were for written answer. Those will be available shortly.
152. I will now introduce my colleagues, some of whom will be familiar —
153. The Chairperson: Anne, can we just leave that? A couple of members have indicated that they want to come in on the previous point. Sorry about that.
154. Mr F McCann: Thanks for that information. I do not know whether we can have that list of benefits rather than having to go to the website. Is it possible for that to be shared with us?
155. Ms McCleary: Yes, certainly.
156. Mr Copeland: This is a very small point, Anne, and it may seem pedantic. You gave a whole list of things and described them as benefits. We are now dealing with something called credit. What is the difference between benefits and credit? Why has the language been changed?
157. Ms McCleary: The simple answer is that I do not know.
158. Mr Michael Pollock (Department for Social Development): It is possibly something to do with the concept of incentivising people to work; you get credit for the hours that you work. It could be something to do with that policy rationale.
159. Ms Martina Campbell (Department for Social Development): It is also to do with the fact that the universal credit will be payable to people in and out of work. We will be dealing with a different type of clientele.
160. The Chairperson: If you are not in work, you are getting benefit, and if you are in work, you are getting credit. That is good; it is a nice difference. When we are going through the clauses, if members need to intervene, it might be useful to indicate that through the Chair. We will work on that basis.
161. Mr Douglas: Obviously, I have not been on the Committee for quite some time. I am delighted to be back, in some ways. Have all the clauses that we are going through been accepted in the rest of the UK?
162. Ms M Campbell: Yes, they are in law.
163. Ms McCleary: I will introduce my colleagues. To my extreme left is Margaret Stitt, who comes from the Social Security Agency and is involved in the operational side of this. We thought that it would be helpful for the Committee to have somebody with operational experience here in case there were questions around how that works out. Martina, whom you have met previously, leads on the universal credit aspect of the Welfare Reform Bill. Michael, whom, again, you know of old, is the Bill leader. Therefore, that is who we all are and what our individual responsibilities are. Martina will now take you through the clauses on universal credit.
164. Ms M Campbell: I refer members to the explanatory memorandum. Members may find it easier to understand than the clauses, so I propose to work between it and my brief.
165. Clause 1 establishes universal credit as a new benefit under the provisions of Part 1 of the Bill. Universal credit is a modern, simplified benefit that will be available to people who are in work as well as those who are out of work, instead of their claiming a number of benefits and tax credits from different sources. Therefore, I remind members that universal credit is replacing income-based jobseeker's allowance, income-based employment support allowance (ESA), income support, housing benefit, working tax credit and child tax credit.
166. The policy intention is that universal credit will be simpler to understand and designed to make work pay. The introduction of a single taper on

- earnings means that claimants will see clearly how their benefits, or universal credit, will adjust as their earnings increase. Therefore, depending on a claimant's circumstances, universal credit may include a standard allowance, as benefits do now, and additional amounts for children or young people, an amount for housing costs, and amounts for other particular needs or circumstances, such as disability.
167. Clause 2 deals with claims. It sets out the basic requirements for claiming universal credit. As members are aware, the intention is that people who are in a couple, whether they are married, in a civil partnership or cohabiting, will make a claim as a single person. Single people will be able to make claims individually in their own right. The concept of joint claiming is not new. It should be familiar to claimants of jobseeker's allowance and tax credits, which already provide for joint claims.
168. We will move on to clause 3 —
169. The Chairperson: Sorry, Martina. Can we deal further with clause 2? Michael has a query.
170. Mr Copeland: I just want to check whether the definition of a couple is gender specific.
171. Ms M Campbell: No. It includes civil partnerships and same-sex couples who live together. The arrangements are more or less the usual ones that are used to ascertain whether a couple, regardless of sex, is entitled to benefits.
172. Mr Brady: Sorry that I missed a bit there. I would like clarification that, although the couple — whatever the definition — can claim separately or as a single person, their benefit or income will be aggregated.
173. Ms M Campbell: Yes.
174. Clause 3 provides that claimants must meet basic and financial conditions to be entitled to universal credit. Clauses 4 and 5 make further provisions relating to that, so it is all linked. As I have said, universal credit is an income-related benefit that combines support for people both in and out of work. Therefore, claimants need to meet financial conditions — their earnings cannot be above a certain level — as well as basic conditions around residency and all the usual things.
175. Clause 4 sets out in more detail the basic conditions that must be met in order for people to be entitled to universal credit. Those cover things such as age, residency, education and, importantly, acceptance of the claimant commitment that sets out the person's responsibilities in relation to their award of universal credit. Universal credit will be a benefit for working-age people. Working-age people are defined as those at the age at which you qualify for state pension credit. It is available to people over 18. There will be some exemptions for under-18s, namely lone parents or people under that age who are disabled or estranged from their parents. That position is the same as it is now in benefit.
176. Where one half of the couple is over pension age and the other half is younger, we will require that couple to make a claim for universal credit. The reasoning behind that is that it is not fair that a couple in which there is a younger partner is not required to seek work. As members will be aware, the Government moved in 2011 to remove the default retirement age, and that means that people can continue to work for as long as they wish. We heard the arguments last night about work being good for emotional, physical and mental well-being.
177. As is the case now, people who are in full-time education will not generally be entitled to claim universal credit. That is because there are other means of support for full-time students. Clause 4 also introduces the basic condition that each claimant must accept a claimant commitment. That is a type of contract or agreement between the claimant and the Government that the claimant will take certain steps in return for being supported. The more detailed provisions relating to claimant commitment are in - clause 14, so we will talk about those later.

178. The claimant commitment will set out clearly what is expected of the claimant. It will be personalised to each claimant. We will talk about this later, but claimants can restrict their availability for work to fit in with their childcare arrangements and all of that. That is clause 4 in a nutshell.
179. The Chairperson: OK, Martina. Please pause for breath in case anybody wants to come in with a question. It is not compulsory to come in on every clause.
180. Mr Brady: You kind of answered the question that I was going to ask about the uniformity of the claimant commitment.
181. Ms M Campbell: Yes; it is personalised.
182. Mr Brady: It is in clause 14. Maybe I will think of something to ask you.
183. Ms P Bradley: The part about being resident in Northern Ireland refers to oil rigs, working on ships and stuff like that. What about Territorial Army soldiers? How does it work for them?
184. Ms M Campbell: If they are away on manoeuvres, they will be, as now, treated as residents.
185. Mr Pollock: There are provisions to allow for that.
186. The Chairperson: It was passed recently, as I remember.
187. Ms P Bradley: I thought that there was something — I remember hearing something about it; I just wanted it clarified.
188. Ms M Campbell: We are also looking at the case of claimants who are resident in the South of Ireland but work in the North of Ireland. They are contributing to our taxes. Those claimants are entitled to tax credits. Are there any other questions?
189. The Chairperson: No; you can move on. Thank you.
190. Ms M Campbell: Clause 5 is about the financial conditions. It builds on the entitlement provisions in clause 3 and talks about the income test. It needs to be considered in conjunction with clause 8, which is about how the award is calculated. The key aspect of universal credit is that benefit will be reduced on a tapering basis. Claimants will be allowed to retain more of their earnings. The proposed taper at the minute is that the claimant will be allowed to retain 35p in every pound, which is substantially more than they are allowed to keep at the minute. In a lot of benefits, for every pound they earn, they are knocked out after, I think, £10 or £12.
191. Mr Pollock: It could be as low as a penny. This is to do away with those sorts of cliff edges and to try to get out of the benefit trap whereby people do not find it worthwhile to go to work. It is designed to smooth out those rough edges.
192. Ms M Campbell: Sorry, Chair; did you want to ask a question?
193. The Chairperson: Have you finished your explanation of clause 5?
194. Ms M Campbell: Yes. I can take a question.
195. The Chairperson: We will let you go through all your explanation for the particular clause, and then there will be a brief stop for members to be brought in. A number have indicated. If we work on that basis, we can get it smoothly worked out.
196. Mr G Campbell: I would like to have had an example. I listened to Michael talking about the rough edges, but do you have a couple of examples of where changes, for somebody who is on a particular level —
197. Ms M Campbell: We can bring those back after lunch.
198. Mr Pollock: There were certainly some working examples.

199. Mr G Campbell: It would help if we could see a working, practical and reasonable example of the difference.
200. Ms M Campbell: We will bring that back to you after lunch.
201. Mr Copeland: In the case of a parent or carer who derives income from the child maintenance and enforcement division, would that be calculated as income?
202. Ms M Campbell: I cannot think off the top of my head. I will come back to it after lunch.
203. Mr F McCann: This may be in another part of the Bill, but if somebody applies for universal credit, is there an amount of money that they can have and that is disregarded before they can —
204. Ms M Campbell: Yes. I am going to come on to that now.
205. Clause 5 also puts a limit on the amount of capital that a claimant can have. Again, it is similar to the current position. Their benefits would be adjusted on a tapering basis. We can come back to this after lunch.
206. We will flick forward to clause 8. It sets out the way in which universal credit will be calculated. A maximum amount of universal credit is available. From that, you would deduct the amounts that need to be taken away because of earnings and any capital or unearned income from those people who are lucky enough to have trust funds, etc, or, perhaps, occupational pensions.
207. It also provides that the maximum amount of universal credit is calculated by adding all the elements together; that would be the standard allowance plus any amount for a child or young person, disability premium, housing costs, etc. It also includes an amount for childcare costs. Under universal credit, the Government are removing the minimum number of hours that a parent is required to work before help will be given with childcare costs. This is good news, which will, obviously, encourage many women to take up part-time jobs of less than 16 hours a week.
208. The Chairperson: Is that your explanation of the clause?
209. Ms M Campbell: That is more or less it, yes.
210. Mr Brady: I know that I asked you this question last week, Anne, but, perhaps, you will clarify the issue. At present, under working tax credit, an awful lot of parents are losing out on the childcare element because of the restriction on registered childminders. They are few and far between. Will that restriction be kept? If so, it will disenfranchise many people and will disincentivise them from going to work.
211. Ms M Campbell: This is a big issue. We are dealing with it within the constraints that the legislation allows. As the member knows, the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety's guidance is that a child should be with a registered childminder. As the member may be aware, the Department for Employment and Learning (DEL) already pays informal childcare costs when a claimant attends a programme organised within that structure. Our colleagues in DEL are consulting on their new programme, which I think is called Steps 2 Success. In that, they have considered the issue of informal childcare. They are considering putting a requirement on the training provider to make some kind of payment.
212. Mr Brady: It is obviously a child-protection issue and is, therefore, not to be minimised. There is a restriction on informal childcare, which historically would have been provided by a mother or grandmother. When I was in the voluntary sector, we actually tried to encourage people. I went out with social services when they were recruiting or trying to recruit people as registered childminders. The difficulty is that if your sister or mother looks after your child, she must also look after at least one other child who is not related to her, which is a huge responsibility. I know that it is a Health Department issue as well as an issue for social services. Has there been any real interaction or engagement with them? I know that DEL

- is taking what might be considered to be a sensible approach. Has there been any interaction?
213. Ms M Campbell: Yes. Colleagues in the Social Security Agency are represented on the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister's (OFMDFM) childcare strategy group. Certainly, in evidence from the economic appraisal that OFMDFM conducted a while ago on childcare provision in Northern Ireland, the whole issue of informal childcare was raised.
214. Mr Brady: I reiterate that child protection is paramount. It needs to be put first.
215. Ms M Campbell: Yes. Anecdotally, informal childcare is much higher in Northern Ireland, probably because, geographically, most of us do not move more than five miles from our home place.
216. Mr Brady: It is also because of the infrastructures of families and extended families.
217. Ms M Campbell: Absolutely; yes.
218. Mr Copeland: You spoke a few moments ago about the impact of some of these changes in assisting women to work extra hours on the basis of childcare. Is that gender-specific? A considerable number of fathers have charge of their children.
219. Ms M Campbell: No, it is not.
220. Mr Copeland: So, it works as well for fathers as it does for mothers.
221. Ms M Campbell: Yes.
222. Clause 6 provides regulation-making powers for restrictions on entitlement even though the basic and financial conditions are met. The regulations will set out the circumstances, and members will see those regulations. That includes particular groups of people, such as prisoners and people involved in trade disputes, and children leaving full-time care who remain the responsibility of trusts. As I said, details of the specifics will be set out in regulations.
223. The power might also be used to exclude people such as members of religious orders who are fully maintained by their order. It may also be used to remove entitlement for a short period. There will be a waiting period for entitlement. If you are unemployed or need the benefit for only three days, for example, the credit may not be paid because of the administrative cost of processing it.
224. Mr Copeland: Entitlement would be inappropriate in the case of prisoners, for example. Is there a potential clash if the prisoner is the designated head of household? Is there a likely scenario in which the family for which someone is the designated head of household could be deprived of income while that person is on remand or awaiting sentencing?
225. Ms M Campbell: The other person would make the claim in that case.
226. Mr Copeland: Yes, but there will be a lapse between the old claim being paid and the other person, in light of changed circumstances, being able to make the new claim. That will leave a void in which they may be deprived of income.
227. Ms M Campbell: They may be deprived of income but only while the claim is processed.
228. Mr Copeland: It is then dependent on how long the claim takes to process and on the impact.
229. Mr Pollock: There are a hardship provisions that will cover those sorts of eventualities.
230. Mr Copeland: All will be explained.
231. Ms M Campbell: It will be the same position as it is now when the head of household enters prison.
232. Mr Brady: Are those what were termed waiting days?
233. Ms M Campbell: Yes.
234. Mr Brady: They applied to everybody. Will that be the same?

235. Ms M Campbell: Yes.
236. Mr Brady: So, what we are really talking about is changing the terminology.
237. Ms M Campbell: Yes.
238. Mr Brady: So, nothing has changed in that respect.
239. Ms M Campbell: No.
240. Mr Brady: You are still depriving people of benefit for three days; that is really the point.
241. Mr Douglas: I read something — I am trying to find it — that stated that young people and education would be mentioned in this clause.
242. Ms M Campbell: Do you mean where those young people are part of the family and in full-time education up to the age of 19 or whatever?
243. Mr Douglas: Yes.
244. Ms M Campbell: They will be covered in the same way as they are now.
245. Mr Douglas: They will be specified.
246. Ms M Campbell: Yes, they will be specified.
247. The Chairperson: Clause 7.
248. Ms M Campbell: Thank you, Chair. I have so many papers here that I do not know whether I am coming or going.
249. Universal credit will follow the practice established in most existing benefits and tax credits, whereby benefit is assessed and paid for a specified period. The effect is to make payments more predictable and clarify when changes in circumstances should be taken into account.
250. Clause 7 provides that universal credit is payable in respect of each complete assessment period while the claimant is entitled. The clause also provides regulation-making powers to cover when an assessment period starts and to provide for payments of universal credit for shorter periods. In existing out-of-work benefits, the assessment period is normally a week, with a fortnightly payment cycle, but universal credit will normally be paid on a monthly basis as a monthly payment cycle will fit in with the usual cycle of earnings for people in work.
251. For those who are out of work, the whole policy intention of universal credit is that it will mimic a salary for paid employment and help to smooth the transition into work. Some households will need more help to budget. We heard a lot about that in the debate last night. Under the clause, the Department has the power to make payments more frequently than monthly, and it will use guidance to set out the circumstances under which it can do that.
252. Mr Brady: On the prescribed period; it might be mentioned later, but I want to check about habitual residence. Case law to date is fairly sketchy, because you become more habitually resident the longer you are here. For some offices, a person could be here for a week and the prescribed period could start within a week of the claim. For other offices, it could start within three months. It is a very arbitrary decision by decision-makers. Is this still going to apply? Essentially, we are talking about people who were born here, lived here and then moved to America or Australia to work. This came in, as you know, in 1995, under a Tory Government it has to be pointed out. You have to show that you are habitually resident. If you have children, they have to be registered at schools. If you are looking for a house, you have to be on the Housing Executive waiting list. Is that still going to be applied or will more cognisance be given to that? Will it be tightened up? What is that prescribed period? When do you become habitually resident? That is an issue, and it will become more so. I am making the point because a lot of our young people, because of a lack of work, have to go to Australia, in particular. At some stage, they may come back and have to claim benefit for relatively short periods. The habitual residence regulation is all about xenophobia; that is why it was introduced. There is no

- other reason. Is that going to be looked at? It may be dealt with later, but it needs to be flagged up.
253. Ms M Campbell: The intention is probably that the existing rules will carry forward. The basic principle is that what is not broken will not be fixed.
254. Mr Brady: The issue is that someone who comes in from the European Union immediately qualifies for benefit, but somebody who was born and reared here and goes away to work and then comes back does not qualify. That is quite difficult for them.
255. Ms M Campbell: There has been a lot of discussion over habitual residence. We will come back to you. It may not be today; I will certainly come back to that issue on Tuesday.
256. Mr Brady: It is really to get some uniformity.
257. Mr Pollock: It is probably the case that the residency conditions would carry forward in the same way that they are applied to the benefits today.
258. Mr Brady: The point that I am making is that there is no uniformity in the decisions of decision-makers. Somebody could be accepted as being habitually resident after they have been here for a week; somebody else might have to wait six weeks or three months. It is unfair. There should be uniformity; they need to say that they accept that someone is habitually resident after two weeks, three weeks or a month.
259. Ms M Campbell: That is a very good point about uniformity of interpretation of guidance. We want to make sure that the guidance is robust enough that there is —
260. Mr Brady: It is really to flag that up.
261. Mr Copeland: I want to test you on the statement you made a few minutes ago.
262. Ms M Campbell: “Test” does not sound good.
263. Mr Copeland: I will say “examine” then. I am not for one minute claiming to have heard correctly, but, if I am correct, you said that most people who work are paid monthly. Is that the case?
264. Ms M Campbell: I do have figures on this.
265. The Chairperson: Is that relevant to this particular clause, Michael?
266. Mr Copeland: You raised it, did you not, Ms Campbell?
267. Ms M Campbell: Yes, I did. According to the ‘Northern Ireland Annual Survey of Hours and Earnings 2011’, which was published in November 2011, 29% of employees indicated that their gross pay covered a period of one week, 4% indicated that it covered two weeks and 67% indicated that their gross pay covered a period of either four weeks or one calendar month. That is 67% of people in Northern Ireland from the period tested, April 2011, who confirmed that their salary was paid either four-weekly or monthly. That survey should shortly be updated.
268. Mr Copeland: Was any balancing exercise undertaken, because the vast majority of people who may be in line for universal credit will be those who work limited hours or who are on low incomes? I suggest that the vast majority of those, the people who would be most affected, are in the 29% that you referred to.
269. Ms M Campbell: Yes, the number of employees earning under £10,000 was queried. I will also submit these figures in writing. The group representing 67% is roughly 530,000 employees, and 142,000 of them were earning under £10,000. That comprised 11,000 full-time employees and 131,000 part-time employees.
270. Mr Copeland: What I am really driving at is the people who are going to continue to benefit — if that is the right word — from universal credit. In my opinion, the vast majority of them are low paid, and most are paid weekly. Those are the people who this will impact on, not the overall statistic.

271. Ms M Campbell: Yes, and that is why the Minister is on record as saying that he is looking at payment frequency.
272. Mr Copeland: We shall await the outcome of his deliberations with interest.
273. Mr G Campbell: On the point about more frequent payments, I can see the logic of preparing people to get into a work environment. Most people are likely to be paid monthly. I presume that a nucleus, a hard core, of people may prefer to get more frequent payments, say weekly. It may be the case that they are less likely to be more easily prepared for work and more likely to be welfare-dependent. Therefore, will that not lead to the more frequent payments over a reasonably short period becoming the norm because they have been used to that and because the offices that are preparing it understand that that will probably be the case for the foreseeable future? If you like, the exception becomes the rule. How will that work?
274. Ms M Campbell: Colleagues, including, in fact, Margaret, are involved in that work, so I will let her speak more on it. The Government, in the form of the Department for Work and Pensions (DWP), are developing a range of financial products, and people will be helped to work out budgets. Further work will be done with banks in developing specific banking products. I will let Margaret answer that.
275. Ms Margaret Stitt (Social Security Agency): As Martina said, DWP and the Social Security Agency are working very closely with banks at the minute. They are developing a range of products to support those people to cope with the transition.
276. There are three big changes on the financial side. First, the payment of the housing element will be made directly to the claimant. This has been agreed in GB. That will be the monthly payment and the single household payment. It is recognised that some people will need more help than others for all the reasons that you stated. The majority of people will be used to getting paid weekly or fortnightly. I do not have the figures, but quite a number of people are paid fortnightly.
277. We are developing a range of products to help people along the way. We intend to start quite early in the process, from the time that they speak to the personal adviser about job opportunities, and so on. They will probably be taken through an online tool that will tell them how capable or otherwise they will be to cope with the budgeting aspects. If the answers to the relevant questions flag up as amber or red, they will be given help.
278. Help could be a range of things. They could be signposted to various websites, for example. We know that this is not suitable for everybody, but it is one extreme. On the other extreme, people might have to be provided with face-to-face budgeting advice. A range of things is being developed. A couple of weeks ago, GB issued a prior information notice to the financial sector, and Northern Ireland was included in that. They hope to award the contract around April 2013. We are linked with them. Anything proposed has to be relevant to NI.
279. Mr G Campbell: The nub of this is that there will probably be a number of people — we do not know how many — who will go through all that signposting, assistance, direction and help but, at the end, still prefer, demand or be guided along the lines of the continuation of fortnightly or weekly payments. They need the assurance that the answer will still be yes after all that help.
280. Ms Stitt: We are not in any doubt that there will always be people who are paid weekly.
281. The Chairperson: Margaret, you might have referred to this, but are there discussions taking place with the banks here as well?
282. Ms Stitt: No, we are not having discussions with the banks here. It is being done on the mainland. Forty-

- eight or 50 financial institutions turned up to the information day last week, and Northern Ireland banks were represented among them.
283. Mr F McCann: I will be brief, because Gregory has asked the question. Could we get a list of the financial products you talked about? As Mickey said, you could call it wonga.com, as people will not be able to understand it. What we have to remember in all this is that people are already being paid at subsistence level. The only thing that financial institutions would be after is the tender and the money that it brings. They will not want to sit and explain to people who are getting £50 a week how they should spend that money over the week.
284. Ms Stitt: I need to check that out, because it is commercial at the minute. It is very early days. The information day was last week.
285. Mr F McCann: The other thing is that the vast majority of people here who are paid benefits are paid through the Post Office.
286. Ms Stitt: I know.
287. Mr Brady: That was a question I was going to ask. You mentioned banks; you did not mention the Post Office.
288. Ms Stitt: Post Office is there, too.
289. Mr Brady: People probably find Post Office accounts easier to access, because they use the Post Office for other reasons.
290. You say that there is a contract out for the “products”, whatever they might be.
291. Ms Stitt: A tender will be going out.
292. Mr Brady: So, a private company is going to come in and, essentially, talk to people about life skills and budgeting. Has any thought been given to the resources that might be put into the very vibrant and strong voluntary sector we have here, which is much, much better than what they have in Britain, that deals with those problems on a daily basis? Obviously, you are not in a position to say who is tendering. In my constituency, as part of Advice NI, Debt NI does tremendous work with a very, very small budget and only two workers. The amount of work that it does in relation to debt is phenomenal. It is about organisations like that. That is a wider issue, but the Minister has mentioned putting more money into advice services. It seems to me that the people who are better qualified are the people I am talking about, rather than Atos or its equivalent swanning in with a lot of money and not necessarily having the required effect.
293. Ms Stitt: I mentioned the banks, but I used that term loosely. It was all the financial institutions.
294. Mr Brady: In fairness, you did say financial institutions.
295. Ms Stitt: That includes credit unions, as Martina has just reminded me. Nothing is off the table here. We are in contact and in discussion with the voluntary and community sector. In fact, we are having a stakeholder event in a couple of weeks, at which we hope that the sector will help us in determining how we identify the groups of people who are going to find it most difficult to cope. It has all the experience, you are right.
296. Ms M Campbell: To conclude, it is important to remember that the legislation does have flexibility built in to it already for payment to be made on a more frequent basis in exceptional circumstances. Again, the Minister is on record as saying that the issue of payment frequency is one of the flexibilities that he is continuing to pursue with the Department for Work and Pensions.
297. We move on to clause 9, which is about the standard allowance. Clause 9 is the cornerstone of universal credit and allows for a standard allowance for each adult single person or joint claimants. The standard allowance is the core cash component of any universal credit claim intended to help with living expenses. On that, will be a number of building blocks; for example, housing cost,

- children, disability and childcare. There may be situations where no standard allowance is appropriate; for example, if the person is in prison. However, the person in prison, as is the position now, will be allowed help with housing cost, if it is a short-term prison sentence — for example, for not paying a fine — so that their house is protected. That provision will carry forward.
298. The rates of the standard allowance will be set in regulations. There will be separate rates, as now, for single people and couples and lower rates for young people. The normal rules will apply to uprating. Again, it is considered that the consumer price index is the most appropriate measure to use. I can confirm that the regulations setting out the allowances will be brought before the Committee and before the House for confirmatory procedure.
299. Mr Copeland: Just a possible anomaly. I was quite clear in my mind a few moments ago; it has become a bit more cloudy. Take the scenario where the male, for example, is the head of household and getting payments, and is the tenant of a private landlord, with the replacement housing benefit being paid directly to the landlord. If that head of household finds himself on remand or in prison, is there a mechanism by which the transfer of the entitlement for the payment of the housing element can be made from the prisoner, who has lost his entitlement, but who is the actual tenant of the property, to his partner, who may be living with him in the property?
300. Ms M Campbell: Whether there is a need to change would depend on how long he or she was going to be in prison. The remaining partner would be required to make a new claim.
301. Mr Copeland: Which could give rise to rent arrears?
302. Ms M Campbell: Possibly. That would depend very much on the situation.
303. Mr Pollock: There is cover, as Martina said, for circumstances where an individual is on remand, to ensure that there is no chance of them becoming homeless because they are on remand for not paying a fine or something like that. If someone is going away for a long period, the chances are that their tenancy is going to have to be looked at as well. The remaining partner would have to claim in their own right and look at the tenancy agreement.
304. Mr Copeland: Can a private landlord make direct payment a condition of the tenancy he offers people?
305. Ms M Campbell: [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.]
306. Mr Brady: On the point Michael made, if someone is on remand, it is my understanding that their tenancy can be protected for six months and, because of the nature of remand, up to a year. You would assume that if somebody was sentenced to a longer sentence, that would give time enough for the housing benefit aspect to be sorted out. That might not become a big problem. It has been my experience, over the years, that that is what happens. Some people can be on remand for two or three years, but, after a year, the whole thing would have to be considered in light of how long it was going to take. That might not be as big a problem as we think.
307. Ms M Campbell: Moving on to clause 10: responsibility for children and young persons. The clause provides for an amount to be included in the calculation for children or qualifying young people. To take the point that Mr Douglas made earlier, that would include young people in certain types of education. An additional amount will be payable if the dependent child or young person is disabled and consistent with the objectives of universal credit. This element of universal credit will replace what is now known as child tax credits and take over its role as the main source of extra support for children in low-income families. Child benefit will continue to be paid in the same way it is now, which is primarily to the main carer, usually the woman.
308. Integrating support for children with other elements of support in universal - credit will bring clear advantages by removing the need for parents to make numerous claims for all the different benefits: child benefit, child tax credits, working tax credits, etc. It is hoped that this will make the benefit simpler to understand, and make it easier for people to understand the advantages of either taking up work opportunities or increasing their hours.

309. The regulations will specify the rates for children and young people and the additional premiums. The regulations will be brought before the Committee and will be confirmatory. That is my explanation of that clause.
310. Mr Brady: When the child tax credit was introduced, it knocked a number of lone parents off income support [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] The child element was taken away. [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] They lost passport benefits.
311. You do not have the rates, presumably, because those are part of the regulations. Is there any idea at this time whether they will be equivalent to the current rates, because they are prescribed rates, presumably. We have no idea at this time what the rates may be.
312. Ms M Campbell: The rates have not, and will not, be finalised until closer to going live, but I expect them to be around the same as now.
313. Mr Brady: At the moment, child benefit is a qualifying benefit for a dependent child. In other words, you can get benefit, be that child tax credit or the old income support, for a child for whom you were getting child benefit. Is that likely to remain the case?
314. Ms M Campbell: I cannot confirm that, but I imagine that those conditions would carry forward.
315. Mr Brady: Is it possible to find that out?
316. Ms M Campbell: I will find that out for you. It may not be today, but I will get back to you next Tuesday.
317. Mr Brady: That is fine. They are reverting back to including it in universal credit. Child tax credit was administered by HMRC, so it will be back into social security.
318. Ms M Campbell: I am not sure about that one.
319. Mr Douglas: Martina, you mentioned additional premiums. Will you say a bit about that?
320. Ms M Campbell: They will be additional premiums for disability, other housing costs and such things.
321. I move now to clause 11 on housing costs.
322. Mr G Campbell: Chair, I have a housekeeping issue. I am conscious that officials said that they would come back in the afternoon on a number of issues that were raised earlier. That is understandable. I am also aware that a number of members have other Committee business in the afternoon. Are we likely to be quorate when the other information comes back?
323. The Chairperson: We are hoping to have this wound up by 2.00 pm. All the other Committees start at 2.00 pm, so, hopefully, we will have this completed. I am not cutting people, as this is obviously about making sure that we are clear on all the clauses. We are doing well, but I want to keep away from any running commentaries. I want members to stick to any clarification that they are looking for.
324. Ms M Campbell: We will also follow it up in writing, so any members who are not here will get the answer in writing.
325. Clause 11 is about housing costs, and it provides for an amount to be included for the support of housing costs within universal credit. It enables the award of universal credit to include such an amount if the claimant is liable to make payments on their home in the form of rent, mortgage costs or other housing-related costs.
326. As I said at the start, housing benefit will be abolished, and its rent element will be replaced by universal credit. The intention was certainly that that would - be paid directly to the claimant rather than to the landlord. The Minister is on record as saying that he is pursuing with DWP the issue of direct payments to landlords. The legislation, as drafted, allows for direct payments to landlords in exceptional circumstances, as it does for single payments and frequency of payments, but the volume of people who would require direct payments is the issue that we are pursuing with DWP

327. The reforms to housing benefit will enable people to afford suitable accommodation but no longer enable them to live in accommodation that is out of the reach of working families. It requires people to make choices about where they live. It will also start to tackle the problem of underoccupancy in social sector housing by creating a financial incentive, by means of a reduction in the benefit, to move into appropriately sized accommodation.
328. I think that that is about all I need to say there.
329. Mr Copeland: I have a question on household size. In many cases, the much-dreamed-of ideal family does not exist. You could have a whole mixture of children with shared parental responsibility, which is now where you get two weeks of the child benefit or seven days' child benefit in 14. Will all the things that actually reflect the reality of the world as it is, as opposed to the reality of the world that we would like it to be, continue to be the case? In other words, if you have a single person or a couple who have access to children, who may be from previous relationships, three days a week, what is the effective size of that household? Is it the size that it is two or four days a week? Or is it the size that it is on the three days when those children are there?
330. Has any work been done on defining exceptional circumstances? We have heard that phrase quite often, and you think that it would cover everything. However, in my experience, exceptional circumstances are fairly well nailed down. We have to reserve a judgement on the impact for people by the actuality or the definition of the exceptional circumstances. Have you had sight of that as yet?
331. Ms Stitt: Exceptional circumstances cover the three elements: the housing element, the —
332. Mr Copeland: Direct payments, head of household.
333. Ms Stitt: A support and exceptions working group has been formed in GB, and Northern Ireland is part of that group. It is its responsibility to try to define exceptional circumstances as far as it can and as far as is practical. As I said, we intend to work with the voluntary and community sector. At an event a couple of weeks ago, we heard of some of the circumstances that would fall into that category. Work is ongoing in relation to that.
334. Mr Copeland: If I understand you correctly, there is a working group in GB, of which we are a part.
335. Ms Stitt: Yes; absolutely.
336. Mr Copeland: I would have thought that the best place in which to examine exceptional circumstances pertaining to Northern Ireland is Northern Ireland.
337. Ms Stitt: Absolutely, but we will lead on from there.
338. Mr Copeland: Right; OK.
339. What is the answer to my question about what constitutes a household?
340. Ms M Campbell: Is that in relation to how a household is defined?
341. Mr Copeland: Yes.
342. Ms M Campbell: A household, whether it is the couple and their children — do you mean the size?
343. Mr Copeland: There are things that flow from this about shared parental responsibility, where the father is the parent with care, and where the mother is the parent with care. Then there are the relationships with partners and extended half families. It is quite safe to say that, for two or three days a - week, a couple and two children could be accommodated in a two- or, possibly, three-bedroom property. However, if you have another three children coming for three or four days a week, that is impractical. Is that factored in?

344. Ms M Campbell: Yes. I should have said that there will be regulations specifying more detail, and they will be brought before the Committee and are confirmatory. Therefore, those circumstances, where there are custody issues, will be specified in regulations.
345. Mr Copeland: I presume fostering or short-term fostering will be dealt with, as well.
346. Ms M Campbell: It will be the same.
347. Mr Copeland: Thank you.
348. Mr Brady: Martina, you mentioned suitable accommodation, so I presume that you were leading to underoccupancy. Housing stock was well debated yesterday. Will there be any definition about what is suitable or will it be kind of arbitrary? It was interesting that when Cameron was rationalising why they were not putting the mansion tax on, he was going on about people working hard and paying their mortgage, and he said that they should not be penalised for their house. However, many people here have worked hard and paid their mortgage and have ended up on housing benefit for various reasons. I am not sure how you can apply double standards. I am diverting slightly into a political rant. However, my point is like Michael's when he asked about the definition of exceptional circumstances. Will there be any sort of guidance or definition of what suitable accommodation is?
349. Mr Pollock: I think that there will be. It makes sense. These are not new circumstances. The underoccupancy clause and the supposed reduction in benefit that attaches to the underoccupancy of a particular property is a key element of this, but all the existing circumstances in housing and housing stock are not new issues. It is about how they are dealt with in the implementation.
350. Mr Brady: We hear a lot about underoccupancy. What about over-occupancy? That is one of the big issues for people who are in housing stress. Will a balance be struck where over-occupancy takes priority in the limited social housing stock for people —
351. Ms McCleary: Those issues are for our housing colleagues and for the Housing Executive —
352. Mr Brady: It will obviously impact to some degree on the housing aspect of universal credit. That is what I am trying to factor in.
353. Ms McCleary: There are huge issues around all this, and they are still being explored.
354. Mr F McCann: The Bill talks about a prescribed time for inclusion that will end after a prescribed period in which mortgage assistance may be paid. Is there any idea of how long that would be? Is it from the date of an application? Is there a period after that in which people would be paid? It used to be that you might have waited 18 weeks or 36 weeks.
355. Ms M Campbell: The whole issue of mortgage support was consulted on. I cannot —
356. Ms McCleary: Michael is more involved in that.
357. Mr F McCann: It would take you to be an expert in gobbledegook to understand the consultation.
358. Mr Brady: I thought that you were.
359. Mr F McCann: Mickey says that I am an expert in gobbledegook. Given the financial circumstances, this could have a serious effect on people with existing claims rather than those who make fresh applications for help.
360. Mr Pollock: It is the support for mortgage interest consultation that you are talking about, Fra. Due to the way in which the legislation is written,

- there is an exception that reduces the waiting time from 35 weeks to 13 weeks, but that was for a prescribed period; it was for two years or something of that nature. That was due to run out. I am not sure exactly whether that has expired yet and has reverted to 35 weeks' waiting, which is on the statute books.
361. Ms McCleary: We can check that out.
362. Mr F McCann: Would you do that, please? That is what makes some of this really difficult: it completely depends on the regulations that are coming out to give you guidance. You are dealing with stuff that you have no control over until you have a set of regulations in front of you.
363. Mr Copeland: If the state imposes a financial penalty for occupying a property in a condition of underoccupancy, should it not give some sort of consideration to redressing the balance on the other side of the equation and perhaps make some sort of financial incentive for those who suffer from over-occupancy? That might allow families to take properties that are bigger and, consequently, more expensive in the private sector, which would free up the social sector to allow families who have more need. It strikes me that there is a kick in the pants on one side of the equation and a pat of the wallet on the other.
364. Ms McCleary: I think that if you are talking about over-occupancy, you are effectively saying that there are more people in a property than is probably safe for there to be in it.
365. Mr Copeland: Yes; correct.
366. Ms McCleary: I am not sure that we should encourage that.
367. Mr Copeland: In many cases, that is the actual situation. It is the biggest impediment to availability in the social sector of appropriate properties at affordable prices. People can go to the private sector, where costs are much higher. To me, the equation would be that if people are going to be penalised for under-occupancy on the one hand,
- there should be some mechanism by which those who suffer from over-occupancy can be incentivised to move into a more suitable property without any financial —
368. Ms McCleary: Our colleagues in housing division have commissioned research into the current housing stock. There will be more information on that fairly shortly.
369. Mr Copeland: The problem is that they consider box rooms to be bedrooms.
370. Mr Douglas: Fra has already asked my question.
371. Ms M Campbell: I cannot remember whether I said this, but those regulations would be confirmatory.
372. We move on to clause 12, which deals with other particular needs or circumstances. The clause provides the powers to include additional amounts to reflect a claimant's personal circumstances. Subsection 2 lists three examples of such additional amounts for people with limited capability for work, people with limited capability for work and work-related activity, and carers.
373. There are situations in which people get additional support in the current system. It makes sense to carry those equivalent provisions through into universal credit. Quoted here are examples. It is not the definitive list. Clause 12 gives us the flexibility to make additional payments to other groups or in other situations as is necessary. For example, the additional amount for childcare would be set out in the regulations under this clause.
374. It is important to ensure that universal credit is flexible enough to provide a range of support for particular groups of people. That is what clause 12 aims to do. Again, the regulations would be confirmatory.
375. The Chairperson: OK. Thank you. If there are no takers, we will move on.
376. Ms M Campbell: Are there no questions?
377. The Chairperson: No. Fine.

378. Mr Copeland: Do you want one?
[Laughter.]
379. The Chairperson: Do not encourage him, Martina.
380. Mr G Campbell: You are on a roll. Keep going.
381. The Chairperson: Remember the rule of thumb: just draw a breath, but do not hold it.
382. Ms M Campbell: You told me off earlier for not drawing breath. Now, I have to draw breath. [Laughter.]
383. The Chairperson: Just draw a breath, but do not hold it for too long.
384. Ms P Bradley: He has changed his mind.
385. Ms McCleary: It has to be a quick intake of breath.
386. The Chairperson: Put yourself on the starting block whenever — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.]
387. Ms M Campbell: OK. We will move on to clause 13 — lucky for some. It deals with work-related requirements. It is an introductory clause. It provides the powers to include additional amounts in a universal credit calculation to reflect — sorry. I have not looked on yet. You took me by surprise there. [Laughter.] Sorry. My apologies, Chair.
388. Mr Copeland: You are easily surprised.
389. Mr Brady: He has that effect on most officials.
390. The Chairperson: We are digressing again.
391. Ms M Campbell: Individuals who are able to look for or prepare for work should be required to do so. That is fair. It is what the taxpayer would expect. People who are able to look for work or prepare for work should do so as a condition of receiving benefit. Those who fail to meet their responsibility should face a financial sanction.
392. This clause is the first in a series that will set out the requirements that may be placed on claimants and provide for the sanctions that may follow the failure to comply with those requirements. In particular, the clause introduces the term “work-related requirements” and sets out four different types: work-focused interviews, which would require the claimant to attend interviews periodically to see what work he or she may or may not be capable of; work preparation, which would require the claimant to attend suitable training courses; work search, which would require the claimant to produce evidence that they have been looking for work; and work-availability requirements, whereby lone parents, for example, would be able to restrict their hours of work to suit their childcare arrangements. Clause 13 goes on to explain that the requirements can be imposed on an individual depending on which of those four groups they fall into. As I said, they will fall into four groups: those with no work-related requirements who are not required to do anything at all, and they will get their benefit; those subject to work-focused interviews only, and the interviews may be monthly, six-monthly, or three-monthly, depending on their circumstances; those subject to work-focused interviews and work-preparation only, which is a little bit of both; and those subject to all the work-related requirements.

393. Those groups are broadly the same as we have at the moment. For example, those in the employment and support allowance support group for lone parents with children under one will fall into the group with no work-related requirements. We intend that lone parents with children between one and five years will be in the work-focused interview only group. Jobseekers receiving jobseeker’s allowance will be in the group subject to all work-related requirements, as you would expect.
394. This clause provides the context for the rest of the chapter on work requirements. That concludes my explanation.
395. The Chairperson: There are a couple of wee points there, just to clarify in the - general sense. It is indicated in a few places here that the first regulations will be by way of confirmatory resolution procedure. Does that mean that there will be other regulations following after the first, and on what basis are they subject to confirmation?

396. Ms M Campbell: Yes, for most, that would be the normal convention. With a Bill where there is a new policy, the first main regulations will be by confirmatory resolution, and subsequent regulations will normally be by negative resolution. That is ordinarily the case. If you flick to clause 44 or 45 — in fact, the explanatory memorandum probably sets it out as well — it will tell you the actual number of regulations that we are bringing through.
397. Mr Pollock: Clause 44.
398. Ms M Campbell: Clause 44. Do you want the list now?
399. The Chairperson: No, I do not want the list. I think that we need to go back to the Minister's original statement on this, because it was made very clear that these regulations — he did not say first regulations — will be by way of confirmatory procedure. I just ask you to reflect on that subject. It may well be the norm, but this is not a normal Bill.
400. Mr Pollock: I do not think that there is any subtext or anything like that. As Martina said, that is ordinarily the convention, because the first set will be the set that specifies all the particular groups, all the various exemptions and that.
401. The Chairperson: Fair enough. I was just flagging it up, because it could be an issue.
402. Mr F McCann: Some of my questions have been answered. However, this goes to the crux of the whole sanction. Over the past months, we have tried to tease out that whole thing, but all of it depends on the regulations of how and when sanctions will be applied. It is difficult to try to tease out the whole thing. All this is done on the premise that people will be trained for work that is there. There is no work there. Four or five people are chasing every job, and there is the impact that that has on people.
403. Mr Pollock: I think that you are right. As Martina said, the paragraphs that she is going through are putting things in context. However, in the broad context, this is where it all hangs together. If the interface between the personal adviser and the claimant is right and they get the right support, the idea is that they should progress on from there. If the implementation does not work in practice, then you get complications and people get sanctioned wrongly or feel that they are getting sanctioned wrongly, if they are slotted into the wrong work-related group in the first place. It all has to hang together for it to work through to the conclusion that we hope to reach.
404. Mr F McCann: A lot of it will — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] — direction. Mickey touched — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] — aspect earlier. It will all boil down to the direction that people are given. Every decision-maker and every personal adviser will have a different slant on what is in front of them.
405. Ms McCleary: That is where the guidance will come in. It is particularly important.
406. Mr Pollock: The personal adviser is at the front end of the process. As regards sanctions, the decision-maker should be at the other end of the process. It is about getting it right at the start.
407. Mr F McCann: I have dealt with some really strange and difficult cases in which people have been sanctioned.
408. Mr Brady: Just on the work-focused interview, I go back to the initial stages of welfare reform in 2007, which was put through by accelerated passage because we were told at the time that if we did not do that, people would lose their benefit. We were naive then. Thank God, we not as naive now. There was a lot of talk then about the training that client advisers were going to have.

- There has been a migration of 76,000 people from incapacity to jobseeker's allowance. Quite a proportion of them will be involved in these interviews. We have heard about autism champions and all of that and how people with bipolar can go in and be interviewed and be on top of the world but end up in bed for a month after it. Obviously you do not have it with you, but would it be possible to get some detail on the training that staff will get?
409. There is another thing that I am concerned about. When the actively seeking work requirement was introduced in the late 1980s or early 1990s, people were told that they had to show evidence. It is like this work search. Unscrupulous employers, certainly in my area, when I worked in the advice centre — people were going along to employers and saying, "I am looking for work. I want a job. Could you give me something to say that I have been with you?" Then they started charging them £10 or £20 for a letter. That is the reality, and this is the real world. Will all that be factored in? I know that it is not in regulations but that is the sort of thing that needs to be looked at as part of the guidance. It is a fact that that happened, and it continues to happen. It ended up that we were facetious about it. We gave people who had been signing on for a long time a wee leaflet to give to their box clerk saying, "I have been signing on so long that I think that I could do your job. Is there any chance of getting a job in the Civil Service?" It was just to make a point. That is the reality.
410. The Chairperson: Point made.
411. Ms M Campbell: Good point.
412. Mr Copeland: I want to clarify whether the current position regarding ESA and permitted work carries over to the new benefits and, if so, whether discharging the permitted work would be a viable excuse for not attending a work-related interview. As I understand it, there are several different groups of people on ESA, but let us take the —
413. Ms M Campbell: Sorry; are you talking about therapeutic work?
414. Mr Copeland: Permitted work. It is a mechanism that allows a person who is in the support group to work for 16 hours a week deriving an income of no more than about £100 £97.50. If you are in the support group, you can do that forever. If you are not in the support group, you can do it for 52 or 54 weeks or something like that. Will someone who is quite lawfully deriving the new benefit still be able to do permitted work? If they are summoned for an interview, will that interview be tied around the hours that they discharge? That could be 16 hours made up of two eight-hour days or whatever. As Mickey said, all this stuff is fine until it confronts reality.
415. Ms M Campbell: Absolutely; I take that point very firmly. I think that the answer is yes, but I will come back and confirm that. People who do voluntary work, for example, will be able to build that into their claimant commitment, provided that they are not working voluntarily full-time. Allowances will be made to allow people to continue to do voluntary work for all the right reasons.
416. Mr Copeland: With respect, voluntary work and permitted work are not the same thing.
417. Ms M Campbell: Absolutely; they are two different things. I will come back and confirm that, but I think that the answer is yes.
418. Mr Douglas: I have a question on the sanctions. [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] A member of my family has epilepsy. He may be going for an interview and may not have had an epileptic fit for weeks, but he could take one an hour before the interview. What, effectively, would happen with the legislation? When would the sanctions kick in?
419. Ms M Campbell: There would be good cause, obviously, and all those circumstances would be taken into account. Excuses such as bereavement and various other circumstances that

- we know happen to us all cannot be anticipated, and that will be considered by the claims adviser.
420. Mr Douglas: Is there a time span? Say that person did not report in that day or the next day, is there a week or some sort of timescale when they have to report or get a doctor's report?
421. Ms M Campbell: I am not sure. I will come back to you. However, I imagine that they would be expected to make a reasonable effort to notify the office.
422. Mr F McCann: My question has partly been answered, but I want to pick up on the good cause. I know that we have probably all struggled in trying to work out what "good cause" actually means. Have they ever come down with a —
423. Ms M Campbell: No. My advice is that you should not define "good cause" in legislation, simply because you could come up with circumstances today that would be accepted as good cause, but there could be something new and additional tomorrow. A fair assessment of "good cause" is common sense. It is about the relationship that the personal adviser will have built up with the claimant over time, and it is about the claimant's history in claiming, and whether they have complied with all the requirements to date, and this is, obviously, an unusual circumstance.
424. Although the guidance will give some examples of good cause, it is a common-sense approach. However, I take the point that members have made.
425. Mr Brady: It is too subjective to be definitive.
426. Ms M Campbell: Yes; absolutely.
427. We move on to clause 14, which is about the claimant commitment and the responsibilities that a claimant has to make. Clauses 45, 54 and 59 are also linked into the claimant commitment. The claimant commitment is a record of a claimant's responsibilities in return for receiving benefits. It is sort of like a contract. It will clearly set out what our expectations are of the claimants and the requirements that are placed on them for the receipt of benefit. It will also be clear about the consequences, and I refer to member Douglas's comment about the consequences of failing to meet those requirements. That will include a bit about sanctions.
428. We will require universal credit claimants to accept a claimant commitment as a condition of entitlement, regardless of which of the four groups they fall into. That is the groups that I talked about earlier — the work-focused only, work prep or work search. For those who do not expect to look for or prepare for work, the content of the commitment will be minimal, with just the requirement to inform us of a relevant change of circumstances.
429. For those whom we expect to seek or take steps towards work, the content will be a detailed list of the specific actions that they must carry out in return for benefit. For example, that could include the amount of time to be spent looking through job papers, the internet, etc, for vacancies; any specific jobs that they should apply for; any work preparation activities that would make it more likely for them to find work, such as attending a training course or registering with a recruitment agency or a website; and any interviews that they are required to attend at a jobs and benefits office. Alongside each action, the commitment will also include details of any sanction that will be applied if they fail to carry it out. This is about making it absolutely clear what the claimant must do and what will happen if they fail to do so. The claimant commitment will be revised as necessary, such as when a person moves between groups, because, obviously, the ages of parents' children will change and their availability will also change in line with school times. Therefore, they move between groups as their circumstances and responsibilities change or as their job search progresses. Member Campbell talked earlier about people who are so far down the spectrum and away from work. Those people will be required to take a series of steps to get themselves

- prepared, ready and closer to the job market.
430. The claimant commitment is about strengthening the link between people receiving benefit and meeting their responsibilities by helping to ensure that they fully understand what is expected of them. That, more or less, is clause 14.
431. Mr Brady: It is a two-way process. You mentioned access to the internet and job search — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] Will that kind of facility be available in the job markets?
432. Ms M Campbell: Yes. We are looking at providing more of those stand-alone terminals where the claimant can go in and look for jobs or complete the application form. Obviously, the whole emphasis on universal credit is digital online. The job markets will have more of those terminals available.
433. Mr Brady: The difficulty is that a lot of people who are unemployed and looking for work do not have access to that facility. Obvious, buying newspapers costs money.
434. Ms M Campbell: It does, but claimants can go to the library, where they can access newspapers and the internet. We very much recognise that not everyone has a computer. However, I read something last night that stated that 75% of people in Northern Ireland have broadband, and I will try to track that down and come back on that point.
435. Mr Brady: Is there anything in the contract that the Department will sign to ensure that it fulfils its obligation, or is it a one-way contract that is just signed by the client? A contract can work both ways. It seems grossly unfair if you were to sign a contract to say that you will carry out specific actions that are asked of you.
436. Ms M Campbell: Sorry, I have not seen a copy of the claimant commitment.
437. Mr Pollock: It is a claimant commitment.
438. Ms McCleary: The other side to it is the payment of the benefit.
439. Mr Brady: That is the difficulty. If claimants do not fulfil their commitments, they do not get paid, but if the Department does not fulfil its obligation, then it goes back to what is good cause or common sense. I worked in the Social Security Agency a long, long time ago, and common sense is not so common sometimes, and we need to bear that in mind. I am just flagging up a possible difficulty.
440. Mr F McCann: I have just a small point to make. Martina said that 75% of people have broadband. That does not mean to say that 100% of people have access to computers.
441. Ms M Campbell: I do not have it myself.
442. Mr F McCann: Where I live, not a lot of people are running about with iPads or have computers.
443. Ms McCleary: It is worth mentioning that training on IT is likely to be a factor in some of the claimant commitments as well, because that will be important to help people move into work.
444. Ms M Campbell: There is also a lot of work going on with colleagues in the digital inclusion unit, which I think is in the Department of Finance and Personnel, linking into that whole strategy, which is part of the Government's commitment to increase access to broadband and get people to become more digitally aware.
445. Mr Douglas: This clause is not just about work-related issues. Is that right? It is also about the claim. To go back to Gregory and Mickey's point, will this be like a legal contract, as such? The onus is not just on the claimant. To go back to Gregory's point, you agree that you would exhaust every measure, but it might come down to the fact that that person would not need to have to be paid weekly or fortnightly. Is that the sort of thing that would be in this?
446. Ms M Campbell: Yes.
447. Mr Douglas: Would it be a legally binding contract on both parties?

448. Ms M Campbell: I do not know about the status of it being legally binding. However, it is a commitment that the claimant will sign, and it sets out clearly the steps that both parties — the adviser and the claimant — have agreed that the claimant will take to get ready to work.
449. Ms Brown: Just on Mickey's point about the location of internet access and that, has any work or research been done on the use of mobile phones? I know that on pay-as-you-go and most phones, you have access to free Wi-Fi. There are hot spots everywhere. Although it is not ideal or as good as a PC or a laptop — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.]
450. Ms Stitt: I think that that is part of the work that the digital inclusion unit is undertaking. I know that a colleague of mine is linking in with that as well. It is being investigated.
451. Mr Copeland: Will those who find themselves directed to IT training be required to fulfil any basic literacy or numeracy skills? If those are found to be failing, will that level of training be provided?
452. Ms M Campbell: Yes, that will be part of the preparation. Obviously, where there are literacy or numeracy issues, as is the case at the minute, there will be a range of courses to suit each level of literacy and numeracy.
453. Mr Copeland: Would the jobs that they would be expected, consequentially, of being capable of doing be limited by their skills level at that time? In other words, would their physical availability for work limit them initially to jobs that are physical in nature, or would the literacy and numeracy and computer training that may prepare them for other types of work be done in parallel with that or separate from it?
454. Ms M Campbell: I think that it would all be done in parallel. They would be doing a number of things. Your commitment would change as your circumstances change. At the moment, you come in to me today, you have no literacy or numeracy skills or no IT skills, but you are strong, fit and healthy, and have no childcare issues, etc, and you are available to work full time, so you are quite happy to take a physical job or a job of another nature that does not require literacy and numeracy skills. However, as the situation is today, employers have the right to specify what requirements they need of an employee, and it would be up to the claimant to match that employer specification. Therefore, at the minute, if you are only available for work of a physical nature, your agreement will specify that you are looking for jobs in the following areas. At the same time, however, you may be attending a work preparation course that includes literacy, numeracy and IT skills. When you complete that course, your claimant commitment will be reviewed, depending on your level of attainment on the course. That is the whole point about the claimant commitment. It is a living document, and it is reviewed as your circumstances change. Does that answer your question?
455. Mr Brady: On industrial diseases — I am thinking of things such as dermatitis — I have had cases where people were capable of work and were sent along to a job market and then sent to the old government training centre, which would not accept them because they were an insurance risk. As regards the personalised contract, it goes back to Sammy's point about it being legally binding, because most contracts are regarded as legally binding. In this case, for instance, would the Department think that there was not good cause for not attending, and that it could break the contract in the sense that it would not pay the person's benefit? The only redress that the person might have would be to appeal, and that could take a few weeks. Would industrial disease-type issues be factored in, for instance, someone who has dermatitis? That person could work in certain circumstances, although they may have to wear gloves, cream, all of that. However, in the past, most employers simply saw them as an insurance risk, and if there was a reoccurrence, then

- I know that is kind of going into the devil in the detail stuff, but it has to be flagged up and considered.
456. Ms M Campbell: I cannot say for certain, but I assume that that is the situation at the minute. Where people have conditions that flare up from time to time, flexibility is built in.
457. Mr Brady: Common sense.
458. Ms M Campbell: Common sense; absolutely.
459. Mr Copeland: The vast majority of people feel that they have been through some of this. There are some cases where it does work, but they feel that they are going through a whole rigmarole and a process that will not end up with employment. Many years ago, my wife was injured at work; she was a police officer. At that time, she was on either industrial injuries or reduced earnings allowance — one of those odd ones. She was found not to be fit for her proper job but fit for other work. It gave a list: cinema usherette. There was not a single cinema in the city of Belfast. It was an insult to her intelligence and an insult to my intelligence. What I am dreadfully afraid of is that a lot of this stuff will end up as being an insult to the intelligence of people who may not be academically bright, but neither are they stupid. If this is going to have any credibility, it has to be rooted in reality.
460. The Chairperson: I do not know whether there is any response to that.
461. Mr Brady: To follow Michael's point, bingo caller used to be a favourite.
462. Mr Copeland: That was one of them : cinema usherette and bingo caller, and there was not a single cinema left in the city of Belfast.
463. Ms M Campbell: I think that it goes back to Mickey's point: It is about common sense and reality.
464. The Chairperson: The bingo caller one tempts a response, but I will refrain.
465. I was hoping to test whether we could have a discussion on a short clause
- clause 15 — but it is a couple of minutes to twelve so we will break for lunch for half an hour. I remind you that we have gone through 14 clauses out of 44, so I will leave it to you to judge progress.
466. Ms M Campbell: Back here at 12.30?
467. The Chairperson: Yes, please.
- Committee suspended.*

On resuming —

468. The Chairperson: I declare the meeting open to the public. We are now recording. I ask people to switch off any electronic devices.
469. We got as far as clause 14. I will ask the Committee Clerk to recap on where we are.
470. The Committee Clerk: This will be a brief recap, and it may not capture everything. We will liaise with the departmental officials following the meeting to see what issues they have picked up on and to compare notes. Hopefully, we will have a comprehensive list of issues and questions that will be addressed by the Department.
471. No issues were raised with regard to clause 1. As regards to clause 2, some issues were raised in respect of the gender specification of a couple. Mr Copeland raised an issue about aggregated income. No issues were raised with regard to clause 3.
472. With regard to clause 4, Mr Brady raised an issue in respect of the uniformity of the claimant commitment. Ms Bradley raised an issue in respect of a TA soldier. The Department said that it would look into the issue where a claimant resides in the South and works in the North. On clause 5, examples of financial provisions and clarification on income in respect of child maintenance, which Mr Copeland raised, were to be provided.
473. On clause 6, the question was asked about when a prisoner is head of a household and whether [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] might be required. That would depend on the length of sentence or whether the person is on remand.
474. On clause 7, the key issue was flexibility with regard to payments and also whether banking products had been developed and the role of financial institutions in that; that includes not only banks but post offices and credit unions. The role of the voluntary and community sector or the advice sector was also explored. Issues were raised about the number of people who are paid fortnightly or weekly as opposed to monthly. I may not have picked this up correctly, but of the figure of 530,000 people mentioned, 142,000 earn less than £10,000 a year. It was indicated that people who [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] are unable to pay are more likely to be paid fortnightly or weekly.
475. In clause 8, the big issue was the current requirement for childminders to be registered. The provision is that if a family member looks after a child, he or she must also look after an unrelated child. That issue is being addressed. DEL is looking into it, as is OFMDFM's childcare strategy group.
476. We move to clause 10. The question was asked whether claimants can still claim child benefit and child tax credits. Hopefully, that sums it up. Clarification was required on that and child tax credits.
477. Clause 11 relates to housing costs. This was a key issue on which there was lengthy discussion. Issues related to household size; how to calculate benefit for separated families with shared parental responsibility, and how that would affect foster carers. It also included some short-term fostering. That was subsequent to discussions in which one member raised the issue of how to define a bedroom, which led to discussion on box rooms being considered bedrooms.
478. There was a question on interest on the mortgage-support period, and clarification was required on whether it had expired; the 35-week to 13-week period was also discussed. There was discussion on under-occupancy and guidance on what constitutes suitable accommodation. Members raised the financial incentives in respect of over-occupancy: if people will be penalised for under-occupancy, should there not be incentives to address over-occupancy?
479. No issues were raised in respect of clause 12.

480. With regard to clause 13, the training of client advisers for work-related interviews was raised, as well as permitted work affecting claimant commitment. The Committee wants detail in respect of that. There is a period for submitting evidence in respect of good cause to avoid sanctions. That, too, was raised by members.
481. Mr F McCann: I hate to interrupt. However, I have raised the issue of permitted work at the Committee on numerous occasions. Obviously, people who are on benefits have to be available for work. Many people would like to volunteer to work in their local communities, and that is to be encouraged. If they do, will that be considered as work or as their being unavailable for work? Can that be checked out for us?
482. Ms M Campbell: I said that I would confirm that with regard to Mr Copeland's question. As you say, voluntary work is to be encouraged. It will be built into a claimant's commitment with regard to restricting his or her availability for work or it may satisfy requirements. It depends on the individual's circumstances.
483. Mr F McCann: Is there a list of restrictions on what they can or cannot do?
484. Ms M Campbell: I imagine that that would be specified in the regulations, although I am not sure. Voluntary work is permitted, and it will be taken into account as satisfying some of the claimant's requirements for work — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.]
485. The Chairperson: I do not want something to hold up —
486. Mr Copeland: I just want to add, with your permission, Chair, one adjunct to the under-occupancy issue about children who are not normally domiciled in the house. Will you also address the issue that, if there is someone in the house who requires care during the night because of mental or physical disability, that is excluded?
487. Ms M Campbell: That is covered.
488. The Committee Clerk: The last clause that the Committee got to was clause 14 about the claimant commitment. Issues were raised in respect of internet access for job searches. There will be access in job centres and libraries, and newspapers would be available there, also. Questions were also raised about the numeracy, literacy and IT assessment carried out to help people in their job searches.
489. An issue was raised as to whether industrial diseases would be reflected, and it was confirmed that they would be, as would any training subsequently provided in respect of IT, etc.
490. The Chairperson: Michael, you mentioned during the lunch break that some information that was sought earlier might be brought back. We will have that now as well.
491. Mr Pollock: OK, Chair. We can update the Committee on some of the points that were raised this morning. I have given the Committee staff a few work examples of universal credit assessment. They are based on existing benefit levels, as opposed to — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] Fra mentioned the support for mortgage interest. We checked with DWP colleagues over lunch as well. They have not yet — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] As I say, there is still discussion on the finances that will be required for that.
492. I mentioned the work examples. I think that it was Mickey who asked whether child benefit would be required as a qualifying benefit. It is not a factor for universal credit, but it may be a factor for some other passported benefits. Michael Copeland asked about housing costs and tenancies in respect of someone who is on remand or in prison. There are examples. One that was cited to me was about cases of abandonment, where the tenancy reverts. However, the basic principle is that housing benefit could still be paid to the person who - is left in the property. I hope that that helps.

493. The Chairperson: Thanks for that. We are ready for you, Martina.
494. Ms M Campbell: Thank you, Chair. We move to clause 15, which is about the work-focused interview requirement. This introduces the concept that a work-focused interview requirement may be placed upon some universal credit claimants. These interviews are designed to keep the claimant in touch with the job market and local labour market developments. They also give claimants the opportunity to explore steps that they might take, immediately or at some point in the future, to increase their chances of getting work, getting work that is better paid or increasing the number of hours that they work.
495. During the interview, the adviser will ensure that the claimant is aware of the help and support that is available to them. That could consist of literacy and numeracy courses or courses run by DEL, or simply access to online services to help them in the job market, or access to childcare and budgeting support. All claimants, except those in the group with no work-related requirements, may be required to participate in the work-focused interview. Those interviews normally take place once a year. For some people, they may take place more often, but that will be agreed with the claimant in their initial interview and any subsequent review interviews. That is the completion of clause 64, and regulations will set it out in more detail.
496. The Chairperson: We are talking about clause 15.
497. Ms M Campbell: What did I say? Clause 64? Sorry; it is paragraph 64.
498. The Chairperson: You are well ahead of yourself.
499. Ms M Campbell: I did not have enough coffee at lunchtime. [Laughter.]
500. The Chairperson: Unfortunately, we are not at clause 64. We will move on swiftly to clause 16. When we get the chance, run for it.
501. Ms M Campbell: Clause 16 is about the work preparation requirement. It requires that the claimant take actions that will increase their chances, now or in the future, of getting work, work that is better paid or increased hours. Therefore, all claimants who are fit and able to prepare for work should be required to do so as a condition of receiving benefit. It is likely that all but the most work-ready jobseekers will have some sort of work preparation requirement placed upon them, even if it is simply updating their CV or even drafting a CV, and help will be available to them to do that.
502. People who have been found, through the work capability assessment, to have limited capability for work but who are capable of work-related activity will also have some work preparation activity requirements placed on them. In those terms, many disabled people play a full and active role in the labour market, and there is evidence that work is good for people's physical and mental well-being; a great deal was said about that in the debate last night. There are still too many people on benefits who have been written off, and the Department is committed to increasing the number of disabled people in employment. We will provide better and more intensive support to help people to get off benefits and to find sustainable work.
503. Advisers will devise a tailored work preparation plan for each claimant. The details of that will be included in the claimant commitment, and the claimant can, obviously, challenge the adviser, and they will reach some kind of compromise.
504. As I say, examples of work preparation could include skills training, confidence building, drafting a CV, or work experience. Again, the regulations will set out other actions.

505. Mr Brady: When you hear that people have been “written off”, I always wonder who has written them off, because most of the people whom I have dealt with over the years certainly have not written themselves off. The system may do that. That is where the anomaly arises in all these so-called reforms, and we are really going to start paying attention to your condition.
506. The Chairperson: Keep it moving, Mickey.
507. Mr Brady: One thing that worries me about this is the undertaking of work experience or work placement. In my constituency, a store has taken eight young people on work experience. They get paid their benefit when they are working, and the employer gets free labour. People who were working there previously have been paid off. The employer gets x amount for taking them. That is worrying. It seems to me that there are not enough restrictions on the employer. If the kids or young people do not take the placements, they will be sanctioned; the employer will not.
508. This is not a recent phenomenon; it has been going on for 25 — nearly 30 — years. They introduced schemes whereby young people worked in hairdressers, which got £15 a week for taking them on. They paid them £10 a week, so they got free labour and an extra fiver. Nothing has ever really been done about it. That is an area that the Department needs to address, as employers seem to have free reign. Yet the young people who are expected to participate in these schemes will be sanctioned. There is no equality, and it is not equitable at the other end. That will have to be looked at.
509. Ms McCleary: That was discussed in the not so recent past. As we said then, work experience regulations, particularly for those who — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.]
510. Mr Pollock: It is something [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] DWP, in its work programme, or Steps 2 Success in DEL here in Northern Ireland. [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] They have fairly robust procedures to monitor the performance of a company. If it is the case that a company is substituting trainee experience for labour, there would be sanctions. [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] It works both ways, and if it works well, it works well for both.
511. Mr Brady: I want to make one final point on that. Any rules, regulations or agreements work only if they are properly enforced. Unfortunately, it is a one-way system, in that the person gets penalised but the employer, the would-be employer, or the putative employer — whatever you want to call them — does not, and that needs to be tightened up. There was the fiasco in Britain where —
512. The Chairperson: Sorry, Mickey, can we deal with the clause? Have you addressed your concern about the clause?
513. Mr Brady: Yes.
514. The Chairperson: I appreciate the importance of the matter, and I am trying to ensure that we get clarity on it.
515. Mr F McCann: To follow on from what Mickey said, this has a knock-on impact on what DEL provides. However, I have sympathy with what Mickey said. Local people with kids were doing a week’s hod-carrying work for a tenner. It needs to be stated clearly in regulations that there are strict rules to guide people when they take on employment. The jury is still out on whether it would be a work programme. However, the preparations for people going into work are interesting. Obviously, it is on the premise that work will be available. You mentioned four tools that are essential for getting people back into work. However, it needs to go a wee bit further.
516. The nature of jobs has changed, along with the traditional trades that people would have relied on. Has anything been built in that looks at the job market and the availability —

517. Ms M Campbell: Yes, it is based on the local job market.
518. The Chairperson: It is tailored and localised — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.]
519. Ms M Campbell: Clause 17 talks about the work search requirement. Jobseekers claiming universal credit will be required to take all reasonable action to look for work in return for their benefit. That is similar to what happens at the moment. The clause defines the work search requirement in two parts: first, a general requirement to take all reasonable action to obtain paid work; and, secondly, a requirement to take any particular action specified by an adviser, such as applying for a specific job or registering with a particular recruitment agency. That builds on the point that Mr McCann raised about the local job market. For example, if Tesco opens a new store and there are x number of jobs, people, where they are suitable, will be advised to apply for those jobs. Therefore, it is tailored to the local market.
520. Regulations will allow some claimants in certain circumstances to restrict their work search either indefinitely or for a particular period. That can be due to childcare arrangements or other circumstances. As I said, regulations will specify that. At the beginning of the claim or period of unemployment, claimants may be allowed to restrict their job search to their previous profession and rate of pay. However, the longer they are out of work, the wider their search will have to become, and they will be asked to accept a job of a lesser standing. Alternatively, the person's circumstances may mean that they can only do work of a particular type or work for a number of hours, for example, if they have young children, school hours, or a health condition that fluctuates and means that they can work only in specific types of jobs.
521. Regulations made under clause 25 will set out what we expect claimants to do in order to be treated as having taken all reasonable steps. Claimants will be required to spend as much time on job search and work preparation activities as the number of hours they are required to be available for work. For example, a claimant required to look for full-time work will be required to do job search and work preparation activities full time. If a claimant has to look for only 20 hours' work a week, they will be asked to do job-share search and work-preparation activity for only 20 hours. However, if they are full time, they will be expected to spend the equivalent time that they would work taking steps to get ready for work.
522. The exact requirements will depend on the claimant's circumstances and will be set out in the claimant commitment, which the claimant will agree. Essentially, claimants are to be encouraged to do all that they can to look for and find a job. That is the purpose of the clause.
523. Mr F McCann: You said that people will try as hard as possible to place them in their former profession. However, over time, some of the regulations that guide those professions change; for example, the work that they do with machinery may be upgraded. Would training to continue in their former profession be part of that?
524. Ms M Campbell: That could happen, with the adviser's agreement. DEL runs sponsored courses relating to manual lifting and health and safety in the workplace, for example.
525. Mr F McCann: I knew a guy who upgraded his work experience. He was probably called a plumber and then became a specialist heating engineer and dealt with certain machines. However, those machines are continuously upgraded. Therefore, you need to be retrained on the new machines that come out to allow you to continue with that work. Will that training be provided to ensure that people are kept up to date?
526. Ms M Campbell: I am not sure whether that type of specific training will be provided by DEL. Certainly,

- in discussions with the adviser, the claimant can ask for that to be considered in their agreement.
527. Clause 18 is about work availability. As I said repeatedly, we expect jobseekers to maximise their chances of moving into work, and so we expect them to be able to take up any offer of work immediately. There will be some exceptions to that rule, and those will be specified in regulations.
528. Where a claimant is allowed to restrict their work search, they will only be required to be available for jobs that fit within those restrictions; that will be people with childcare or caring responsibilities, for example. That means that, typically, at the beginning of a claim or period of unemployment, claimants will only be required to be available for work in their previous profession with a similar rate of pay. Alternatively, the claimant's circumstances may mean that they are only required to be available to work for a number of hours of a particular type. For example, work that fits around school hours, as I have just said, or work that would not aggravate an existing health condition.
529. As universal credit is an in- and out-of-work benefit, it may not be possible for some claimants who work to take up another job immediately if it would interfere with their current job. That could, for example, be somebody who works part time and is able to increase their hours, but has to do so by taking another job. In those circumstances, the requirement to be available immediately could be relaxed. Again, as I said, we would relax the requirement where there are caring responsibilities or where people are engaged in voluntary work. That completes that clause.
530. Mr Brady: Just on the question of availability, the guidelines and applying common sense. Someone whom I represented a couple of years ago was sanctioned because it was said that he was not available for work. However, the reason for that was that he was getting married [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] The ultimate test of availability would have been if a member of staff had walked up the aisle, tapped him on the shoulder and said, "You have a job."
531. Mr Durkan: Hard labour. [Laughter.]
532. Mr Brady: Well, some might argue that he would have been better going to the job.
533. The Chairperson: I think that he probably should have been sectioned. [Laughter.]
534. Mr Brady: I will not comment on that. I am just making the point that some strange decisions are made about availability. If there were proper guidelines in place, they may save people from a fate worse than —
535. Ms M Campbell: That is a good point. I would like to think that the Department has learned from examples of decision-making that lacked common sense.
536. Mr Brady: I hope so. I should point out that he is still married, as you will be glad to know.
537. The Chairperson: He must have had marriage guidance.
538. Mr Copeland: My question is a bit obtuse. Will any special arrangements be made for, or consideration given to, members of the Territorial Army or Reserve forces?
539. Ms M Campbell: Yes. That is being considered.
540. Mr Copeland: Will that ensure that if they are the head of the household, the entire mechanism could be put in place again when they return? Does the income that they provide during a period of deployment count?
541. Ms M Campbell: As far as I know, the existing arrangements, whatever they are, will continue.
542. Mr Durkan: In clauses 17 and 18, what geographical considerations were given to the availability of work and claimants' work search?

543. Ms M Campbell: The travelling distance is described as “reasonable”, and I presume that regulations will define what that is. Obviously, it will take account of bus routes, availability of public transport, whether the claimant has a car, etc.
544. The Chairperson: Did we not deal with a statutory rule recently in which the time stipulated was 90 minutes each way? We will move on.
545. Ms M Campbell: Clause 19 deals with claimants subject to no work-related requirements. The clause sets out the categories of claimants on whom work-related requirements must not be imposed and for whom financial support will be unconditional. That includes claimants whom we do not expect to be able to work or to prepare for work, or who will not, under any circumstances, be subject to work-related requirements.
546. As is the case now, people found to have limited capability for work and work-related activity, owing to a disability or health condition, or those with regular and substantial caring responsibilities for a severely disabled person, will not have any work-related requirements imposed on them. Claimants with responsibility for a child under the age of one will also not be required to meet any work-related requirements. In the case of a couple with children, the couple will be able to nominate which person will be treated as the responsible carer and, therefore, exempted from conditionality. However, the other partner will have to submit to conditionality.
547. Additional categories of claimant will be added to that group through regulations. We expect that to include claimants who are over the state pension age; women who are heavily pregnant or have just given birth; and claimants who qualify for universal credit in exceptional circumstances where they are in full-time education. As universal credit is an in- and out-of-work benefit, conditionality will apply to people in work who still receive universal credit up to a particular threshold. That threshold will be set at the equivalent of the national minimum wage. So, if claimants are working full time for 35 hours and are paid at the minimum wage, they will not be required to do any more, but if they are working full time and are paid less than that, they will be required to take steps.
548. Regulations will also provide that where a claimant in work continues to be above the threshold, but for a particular change of circumstances, they should remain in that group as long as those circumstances apply: for example, when a claimant’s earnings fall because of their taking maternity leave or being on jury service. We will use regulations to prescribe a comprehensive list of the circumstances in which a claimant would remain in the group subject to no work-related requirements.
549. Individuals whom we do not expect to work full time will face a lower conditionality threshold that reflects the earnings that they could accrue in the hours for which we would expect them to be paid. It is important that individuals who are able to look for work should be required to do so as a condition of receiving benefit. Equally important is that those unable to look or prepare for work, or who are in work and doing enough, should receive unconditional financial support. That concludes my explanation of that clause.
550. Mr Copeland: I just want to check the process by which the limited capability for work would be assessed and in whose opinion that would be limited.
551. Ms M Campbell: Sorry, I should have mentioned that when explaining the previous clause. An assessment will be conducted by a healthcare professional, who could be a GP, nurse or another specified person.
552. Mr Pollock: That is set out in section 60 of the Health Act 1999.
553. Mr Copeland: Is it envisaged that, at that time, healthcare professionals will have access to people’s full medical records, or will they just see people themselves?

554. Ms M Campbell: I do not know. I will get back to you on that one.
555. Mr Copeland: The difficulty is that there will be several opinions on every case. Generally, the opinion that counts in this case is that of the healthcare professional, who is probably the person least capable to take a decision on the basis of the information available to them. I am very curious about that point, because I know what kind of decisions have come through the current system. There seem to be a number of conditions, which, to be quite frank, healthcare professionals do not think exist. ME is one, and fibromyalgia is another. Despite clients arguing that they are incapable of work, someone else takes a decision, in the absence of medical records, that they are, and much flows from that. I await your written answer with interest.
556. Mr Brady: You mentioned education-related exemptions. One current exemption applies to a single or lone parent in full-time education — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] — qualify for benefit. Will that still be the case for someone who is in full-time education but also a responsible lone parent? The Bill refers to a parent being responsible, as in caring for a young child, and that, I presume, applies to children under the age of one. I wonder whether that will change, because it is an exemption that quite a lot of people avail themselves of currently. However, there is no specific mention of someone who is in full-time education and also the responsible carer of a child.
557. Ms Stitt: I think that Martina mentioned earlier that there would be some exceptions.
558. Ms M Campbell: They will be listed in the regulations.
559. Mr Brady: You mentioned education exemptions, but you did not —
560. Ms M Campbell: They will be specified in the regulations. I will have a look at what that involves and come back to you.
561. Clause 20 relates to claimants subject to work-focused interviews only. They will not be required to take on any other form of activity that gets them a job. They will fall into this category if they are the responsible carer; that is, a lone parent or a nominated carer in a couple with a child aged at least one but under three. We intend to set this at age five so that all lone parents and nominated carers with a child under school age are required to participate only in work-focused interviews. That mirrors the currently unused flexibility in income support legislation, which enables work preparation requirements to be imposed on lone parents with a child aged between three and five. We have kept that legislative flexibility in case it becomes appropriate at some point in the future; for example, if more is needed to achieve good employment outcomes when their child moves into early or full-time education.
562. In addition to parents with young children, the clause enables regulations to prescribe additional categories of claimants who will fall into that group and will, therefore, be required to participate only in an interview. We spoke about one such category earlier, which is that of foster carers, either single or nominated carers in a fostering couple who have a child in placement, or while they are between placements but intend to continue fostering up to a maximum of eight weeks. That will apply until their youngest foster child reaches the age of 16, or in exceptional circumstances where the foster child has proven care needs until they leave care. Where there is evidence that a foster child requires the full-time care of two adults, both members of the fostering couple will fall into that group.
563. The whole purpose of work-focused interviews is to keep claimants in touch with local labour market developments and to ensure that they are aware of the help and support available. These interviews give claimants the opportunity to explore the steps that they might take, either now or at some point in the future, to increase their - chances of getting into work, getting work that is better paid or increasing the number of hours worked. It includes encouraging parents to prepare for their child reaching school age, and, for foster carers, it could include signposting to support and considering how a return to the labour market might be balanced with existing responsibilities.

564. Work-focused interviews are a significant tool in supporting the Executive's aim of reducing the number of people living in poverty, particularly children, by reducing worklessness. That concludes my explanation of clause 20.
565. Mr Copeland: Will any allowance be made for parents, guardians or couples with a child who has an enduring recognised medical condition or a disability, such as attention deficit disorder or attention deficit hyperactivity disorder, where leaving that child alone for any period would generally be quite difficult?
566. Ms M Campbell: I would say that that would be built into the claimant commitment, but I will check. It may simply come down to common sense and the relationship between the adviser and claimant.
567. Mr Copeland: That is what frightens me.
568. Ms M Campbell: Margaret has just reminded that it could come in under that commitment if the child is considered disabled.
569. Mr Copeland: I presume that that is for both physical and mental impairment?
570. Mrs Cochrane: You say that you plan to set the age at five to take into account children who have not started school. I appreciate the idea behind that. However, for it to be really effective, it needs to go beyond Halloween of the first term. People are trying to settle their children in school at that stage, when they may be in class for only one or two hours. I do not know whether something as specific as that could be built in.
571. Ms M Campbell: That will be built in.
572. Clause 21 sets out those who will be in the work preparation group: claimants who will be subject only to work preparation and work-focused interview requirements and not exactly required to look for work. Claimants in this group will be expected to take reasonable steps to prepare for work and attend work-focused interviews. They may not be required to look for or be available for work. Claimants could be in this group if they are disabled or have a health condition that means that they have limited capability for work at the time. This group is equivalent to the work-related activity group in the current employment and support allowance. We are committed to providing better and more intensive support to take people off benefits and find them sustainable work. However, in return, we expect claimants who are capable of taking steps to prepare to return to work to do so.
573. Regulations may also allow us to put responsible carers with a child aged between three and five into this group. That power replicates our current flexibility in income support legislation. Advisers will have broad discretion when setting requirements and will devise a tailored plan for each claimant. This means that the nature and amount of work preparation could vary from claimant to claimant, but we will always be reasonable in the claimant circumstances. As I said previously, examples might include skills training, confidence building, work experience or help with preparing a CV. That concludes my explanation of clause 21.
574. Mr Brady: When we hear the word "discretion", we think, "Great, some common sense." However, my experience over the years has been that talk of discretion in the agency context means targets. What if you have an office in Newry, for instance, with client advisers, people going to work-focused interviews and discretion being used? Does everybody have to accept it when they do not qualify? We have to be honest about this: the Department functions primarily on targets and

- is target-led. It has been for a long, long time. So if you had sympathetic, and rightly so, client advisers who did not sanction people — we will come on to that in clause 26 — I wonder what would happen in an office where everything was wonderful, a utopia. Would the Department start to look at targets and say that perhaps not enough people were being sanctioned?
575. Mr Pollock: There are no targets on sanctions. There never have been; there never will be.
576. Mr Brady: I am a bit sceptical about that. I just want to make that point.
577. The Chairperson: I think that you have made your point. OK. Thank you. We will move on.
578. Ms M Campbell: We are at clause 22 — time flies when you are having fun, does it not? Clause 22 deals with claimants who are subject to all work-related requirements. Any claimant who does not fall into any of the previous three groups may be subject to all work-related requirements. This will be the default group for work-ready claimants, including parents with children over five years of age. Claimants in this group will be required to seek work and be available for work, as they would be currently under jobseeker's allowance. In some circumstances, that requirement may be waived temporarily; for example, if the claimant has a domestic emergency, such as flooding, or falls ill. Regulations will outline the circumstances in which that may apply. They may also be required to participate in work-focused interviews and carry out work preparation activities.
579. The Chairperson: OK. That is great. We will move to clause 23.
580. Ms M Campbell: Clause 23 deals with connected requirements. Therefore, it is wrapping up, if you like, all the previous clauses. It enables us to impose other requirements on claimants in connection with the main work-related requirements. Essentially, it enables us to require claimants to participate in interviews and provide evidence that they are complying with the requirements imposed on them. The requirement on the jobseeker is to demonstrate that he or she is actively seeking and available for work. Signing a statement to that effect is a key part of the jobseeker's regime. This power will also enable us to conduct all the other reviews and interviews that we hold with claimants at key points throughout their claim. Such interviews may be to deal with skills needs, adjust claimant commitments or review any limitations based on their job search activities as their circumstances change.
581. Evidence shows that regular contact with claimants helps to reduce the time that they spend on benefit. Regular and meaningful discussions with people about what they have been doing to find or prepare for work helps us to ensure that they fulfil their responsibilities. This clause also requires us to require claimants to report certain changes in their circumstances, such as leaving a job, that might affect the group that they fall into or the requirements placed on them. That is particularly important because the real-time information system that we will use to collect the details of their earnings details will operate retrospectively. Therefore, there could be a gap of up to four weeks between claimants leaving a job and our identifying that through the real-time information system. This power allows us to ensure that the requirement is placed on the claimant to notify us and keep us up to date as his or her circumstances change. That is the purpose of that clause.
582. The Chairperson: If members are OK with that, we will move on.
583. Ms M Campbell: Clause 24 deals with the imposition of requirements. We want to give advisers broad discretion to impose requirements that they think give claimants the best chance of finding or preparing for work. There may be certain requirements or actions that are not and will never be appropriate. The clause allows us to make regulations to put such matters beyond doubt, setting out particular circumstances in which - requirements or specific actions must not be imposed.

584. Restrictions drawn from current regulations include where imposing a requirement would go against a sincerely held religious belief or conscientious objection, as long as the claimant can show that he or she has reasonable prospects of finding work notwithstanding those restrictions.
585. The clause also enables advisers to take certain matters into account when setting up a work-focused interview or work preparation requirement. That could be used to ensure that any such requirements accommodate a person's current job, health condition or caring responsibilities. There may also be circumstances that justify claimants' exemption from having requirements imposed on them for short periods; for example, if they have just had a bereavement or domestic emergency. A specific example of that, which the Assembly debated yesterday before its debate on the Bill, was allowing claimants who have been victims of, or been threatened with, domestic violence to be given a 13-week exemption from any work-related requirements. That sums up clause 24.
586. The Chairperson: Thank you. We move on to clause 25.
587. Ms M Campbell: Clause 25 is about compliance. Claimants have to take all reasonable action to prepare for and look for work. Ultimately, what constitutes all reasonable action will depend on each case. We want to be clear about what we expect claimants to have to do in return for their benefit. Regulations under the clause will provide that only certain actions and a certain level of activity will be treated as taking all reasonable action. They will set out some matters that can be considered as contributing to reasonable action and any that cannot. That will set a benchmark minimum standard. For single claimants with no caring responsibilities, we expect that to be a full-time job search. We also expect that the actions taken must be those with the best prospects of finding work. We may also use that power to prevent abuse of the system by those who try to evade their responsibilities. So claimants who deliberately sabotage their chances of getting work by sending in the wrong CV or being unco-operative in an interview with an employer will not be considered to be actively seeking work and may be sanctioned. Claimants who are violent or abusive to jobs and benefits office staff during an interview will also be treated as not having participated. That concludes that clause.
588. Mr F McCann: We are starting to look into a group of clauses that includes sanctions. I think that some require an explanation of how sanctions will work in practice.
589. I understand the whole question of people being violent in local offices, and so on. However, there is a reference to claimants' behaviour or appearance. Will you explain that or give me an example of how someone's appearance can undermine his or her success in a job interview?
590. Ms M Campbell: I think that this is where a claimant answers no, or gives a stupid answer, to every question asked by an employer at interview.
591. Mr F McCann: Are you talking about body language?
592. Mr Durkan: It is behaviour.
593. Ms M Campbell: No, not body language.
594. The Chairperson: It is not about someone's physical appearance, as in whether they wear a shirt and tie.
595. Ms M Campbell: No, it is appearance in so far as whether they turn up to the interview intoxicated or in a state that means that they are unfit to be interviewed. It is what you would normally expect.
596. Mr Brady: What is normal?
597. The Chairperson: Some people's sartorial elegance would exclude them from all sorts of things.

598. Mr F McCann: Is there anything that lays out what this means? It may mean what you said, Martina, but it may also mean many other things. People may not be able to afford to wear a suit, shirt and tie for interview.
599. Ms M Campbell: No, it is not that.
600. Mr F McCann: I know people with tattoos on the side of their head or on their arms, and they were frowned on at interview. A tattoo is a personal choice.
601. Ms McCleary: Clause 25 makes no reference to appearance at all.
602. Mr F McCann: My point is that it does not say that it does not apply to appearance.
603. Ms M Campbell: The regulations will, I hope, contain more detail.
604. Mr F McCann: As Mickey says, it is common sense.
605. Ms M Campbell: Mickey's good friend, common sense.
606. The Chairperson: No doubt, we will return to this one again. We move on to clause 26.
607. Ms M Campbell: Clause 26 deals with higher-level sanctions. This provides for financial sanctions for those claimants who are subject to all work-related requirements and who, without good reason, fail to meet their most important responsibilities. We recognise that most people want to find work and will never be in the position of facing a sanction. The vast majority of claimants already comply with requirements. However, for the small minority who shirk their personal responsibilities, we need to have an effective sanction system that encourages responsibility and deters non-compliance. That links back to the overarching policy intent of universal credit. It is about making people take personal responsibility, making work pay and encouraging people into work.
608. Sanctions, especially for the most serious failures, are set at too low a level. Claimants are not always clear about the consequences of failing to meet their requirements. We want to create a clearer, stronger system that is easily understood by claimants and acts as a more effective deterrent to non-compliance. The clause provides for sanctions of up to three years for the most serious failures: failing to apply for a vacancy; failing to accept an offer of work; failing to take part in certain work placement schemes, such as work experience and mandatory work activity; and losing pay or employment voluntarily or by reason of misconduct. Those failures clearly damage a claimant's employment prospects, and it is only right that we have a sanction system that effectively deters such behaviour.
609. The amount of the sanction will be set in regulations. We intend to set a sanctionable amount that is broadly in line with the existing jobseeker's allowance arrangements: for example, a single claimant subject to a sanction is expected to have his or her benefit reduced by about £9 a day.
610. The sanctions period will be set in regulations, too. Those will come before the Committee and be subject to confirmatory resolution. We expect the sanction period to be three months for a first failure, six months for a second and three years for a third and subsequent failures. A three-year sanction would only ever be imposed where a claimant fails to meet their most important requirements on at least three separate occasions. We expect that to be applied to very few claimants. There will be some circumstances where shorter sanctions may apply; for example, when a claimant leaves a job voluntarily a week before their contract ends, but such cases would be the exception. If a claimant refuses to participate in work experience or mandatory work activity and cannot show good reason, they would get a three-month sanction. If, four months later, they were asked to apply for a job, and they refused to do so, and, as long as there is no good reason, their sanction would be for six months.
611. There are clear sanctions that are critical to incentivise claimants to meet - their responsibilities. Only in the most extreme cases of non-compliance will claimants face a three-year sanction. In the example that I have just given, the claimant would have to refuse another job or fail to meet another important requirement within 12 months of the second failure, and then they would be sanctioned for three years. As I said earlier, when a claimant comes in and they are discussing their work availability, their work preparation and work search requirements, that will all be built into the claimant commitment, and details of the sanctions that will be applied for failure to meet any of the agreed requirement will be set out clearly. The claimant will be made fully aware of what they are signing up to. That concludes the explanation.

612. Mr Brady: We are getting to the crux of the whole thing, which is sanctions, and that is what it is all about, although people might see it in other ways.
613. Over the years, I have dealt with cases where somebody was working and, for whatever reason, the employer accused them of misconduct. Obviously, that person would go in and make a claim and be asked whether they left voluntarily or were sacked. A form would be sent to the employer to give their reasons, and the person would also get a form, and a decision would be made on the basis of that. Again, we are back to guidance. You could get an employer who has something personal against somebody, and that person could be sanctioned. It could have been the equivalent of constructive dismissal, or something like that. It always seemed to me that the credence, in many cases unfortunately, was given to the employer, even in cases where the employee or the claimant was not at fault.
614. I have another question. I know that Michael was going to ask it, but I am going to ask it as well. In the case of the sanctions — three months, six months and three years — if that is the head of the household, and let us say that he has a wife or a partner and three or four children, does the partner have to make a fresh claim in her own right? Technically, they are regarded as a couple living together, and that creates difficulties around that, because they would still be treated as a couple. Is the family going to be sanctioned as well?
615. Ms M Campbell: No. Hardship provisions are built in, so the payment will continue.
616. Mr Brady: Will the same amount of benefit be paid to the partner and children? You think of a hardship payment as something temporary, short-term or crisis and not even subsistence level.
617. Mr Pollock: The individual's amount would be reduced. If I were the individual —
618. Mr Brady: Would it be like a split payment? There could be an argument where somebody who gambles or drinks or whatever would be taken out of the equation and the partner would get the equivalent of the overall benefit less a single person's amount, or something like that.
619. Ms McCleary: Something like that.
620. Mr Brady: That would need to be clarified.
621. Mr Copeland: The case would not be that the miscreant, if that is the right word, or the person who had been sanctioned continues to get the payments, on the basis of being head of the household, with his amount taken out?
622. Mr Pollock: They would continue to qualify for hardship payments in their own right. They would get access to hardship payments.
623. Mr Copeland: So, the person who has been sanctioned would cease to be head of household?
624. Mr Pollock: They would not qualify for benefit —
625. Mr Brady: Would the partner then be classified as a lone parent and get the lone-parent rate for themselves and the children?
626. Mr Pollock: Sorry, Mickey. Would what?

627. Mr Brady: The head of the household has been taken out of the equation. Would the partner who gets the benefit then be classified as a lone parent and receive the attendant premiums?
628. Mr Pollock: We are getting into the detail. I would not like to say yes or no. However, I would imagine that they would still be defined as part of a couple. The overall amount would —
629. Mr Brady: That is a technical detail.
630. Ms M Campbell: That detail will be in the regulations. We will have a look at the Department for Work and Pensions regulations that are available and come back to you on that on Tuesday. It may be that we do not have that level of detail. However, I might be able to give you some kind of high-level —
631. Mr Brady: Chair, I am not trying to be — well, I am trying to be picky because you have to be. I think that it is important to flag up these issues now for your sake as well as ours, because it gives you the opportunity to come back to us.
632. Ms M Campbell: Absolutely. I agree totally.
633. Ms McCleary: Basically, the idea is that the person who is penalised is the person who has not co-operated. The family should not be affected. That is the general direction of travel.
634. Mr F McCann: I want to go back to the issue of crisis payments. If, as Mickey says, the identified head of the household has moved out of the equation, and a person has to apply for money to survive, how long does it take? In some of the stuff that you have here, it looks as though the person will have to make a new claim for benefits. If the head of the household is out of the equation, there has to be a reassessment of benefits. Take, for example, somebody who has three children. That person goes into the office and says that their wife or husband has been sanctioned and they have to make a claim for benefits in their own right. The office tells that person that they are overloaded and offers them an appointment in four weeks' time.
635. Mr Pollock: I do not think that that will necessarily be the case, Fra. One point about universal credit, which the Minister mentioned yesterday, is that a person will be on the system for at least two years after. Therefore, all the details of the claim, whether it is for a couple or individual, would be on the claim.
636. Mr F McCann: It is a change of circumstances.
637. Mr Pollock: It is a change of circumstances. However, the details would relate only to one particular issue. [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.]
638. Mr F McCann: So, if somebody walks in, staff could press a button and find out that their eligible section of that money is £54 a week. They will just deduct the £54 a week and pay the rest. You know that it does not work like that.
639. Mr Pollock: No; it would not work like that necessarily. It would require some level of decision. However, in theory, it should work something along those lines in so far as the household claim for universal credit has been assessed at x amount, which is the total of your claim, your partner's claim, any allowance for housing costs, any allowance for [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] and any other additional premiums. If, as you say, someone is sanctioned because he or she did not comply with a requirement, that amount should be reasonably simple to deduct.
640. Ms McCleary: I do not think that there is any need to make a fresh claim.
641. Mr F McCann: For the purposes of that, could we find out?
642. Ms McCleary: We will come back on that.
643. Mr F McCann: Is "good reason" is the same as "good cause"?
644. Ms M Campbell: Yes.
645. Mr F McCann: So, the same would apply.

646. Ms M Campbell: Yes.
647. Mr F McCann: I have dealt with cases in which people have been sanctioned for a couple of weeks. I have actually gone to the office with them and argued their cases for crisis loans. Cases took, perhaps, five or six days to assess. By that time, the crisis was over and people did not get payments. I understand what you are saying. You are going by what is there to the letter. However, it does not work in offices.
648. Ms M Campbell: I know.
649. The Chairperson: We need clarification on the process when someone is sanctioned, whether it is for three months, six months or three years, and how that actually impacts on the other party to the claim.
650. Ms M Campbell: Clause 27 deals with other sanctions. This provides for financial sanctions for claimants who, without good reason, fail to meet certain work-related or connected requirements. The whole emphasis is on creating a clearer and stronger sanction system that acts as an effective deterrent to non-compliance. We also want a system that, in the case of certain failures, can incentivise claimants to re-engage quickly. Clause 26 provides for higher-level sanctions up to three years, and any failures subject to those sanctions cannot also be sanctioned under this sanction. You cannot have a double whammy. This clause provides the power to impose sanctions for other failures for an open-ended period and for a fixed period of up to 26 weeks, or a combination. As with the previous clause, the sanctionable amount will be set in regulations and will be broadly equivalent to the amount that will be sanctioned under existing benefits. To use the same example, a single jobseeker who fails to meet his requirements is expected to see his universal credit award reduced by £9 a day.
651. We expect to use the powers under this clause for three broad levels of sanctions. Medium-level sanctions will apply to claimants who are subject to all work-related requirements who fail to take all reasonable action to search for work or be available for work. The actual sanction periods will be set in the regulations. Medium-level sanctions will be four weeks for a first failure and three months for second and subsequent failures. Claimants who fail to meet particular work preparation requirements, such as participating in skills training, will face lower-level sanctions. Lower-level sanctions may be applied to claimants subject to all work-related requirements and claimants who are subject to work-focused interviews and the work preparation requirement only. Sanctions will also be applied to claimants in these groups who fail to meet connected requirements such as participating in interviews and supplying relevant information.
652. So, we intend to introduce two components to the lower-level sanctions, an open-ended component that will continue until a claimant re-engages with their requirements and a fixed component. The fixed component will last for one week for a first failure, two weeks for a second and four weeks for a third and subsequent. The purpose of the open-ended component is to encourage claimants to quickly re-engage. It will be clear to all that the quicker you re-engage, the shorter your sanction.
653. Some claimants will be only required to participate in work-focused interviews, and the amount of the sanction for claimants in this group will be lower than that for jobseekers and claimants with limited capability. Again, all the detail of this will be set out in regulations. That is my explanation of that. Again, these regulations will come before the Committee and be subject to confirmatory procedure.
654. Mr Copeland: I want to ask one thing.
655. The Chairperson: Then, are you going to go away?
656. Mr Copeland: I will be away two seconds. Is the time distance for travelling 90 minutes, or whatever it - is, within the territorial and geographic integrity of Northern Ireland, or does it include other neighbouring states?

657. Mr Pollock: Ninety minutes is 90 minutes. It depends what direction you go in.
658. Mr Copeland: I mean does it apply on both sides of the border, if work were available in another jurisdiction?
659. The Chairperson: You have to allow for check-in time at Heathrow.
660. Ms M Campbell: I do not think so. We will clarify that.
661. Mr F McCann: Part of this was asked earlier, and it is something that we have laboured on. People may suffer from different forms of mental illness and do not realise that they are ill. They could be bipolar, for example, and not recognise it. Is there anything to allow for that? People might get deeply offended that they are being sanctioned for something that they cannot do anything about.
662. Ms M Campbell: If they do not know that they are ill, how would the adviser know?
663. Mr F McCann: The point is that people have gone back to friends and family and told them that they had been sanctioned and could not understand why. When you phone the office and explain that the person is bipolar, the sanction is already in place.
664. Ms McCleary: The issue then would be whether the sanction could be removed once that representation is made. It is almost an informal appeal.
665. Mr Pollock: I would be amazed if a client adviser did not pick up on something such as that.
666. Mr Brady: That goes back to a question that we asked four years ago: what training will client advisers have to pick up on this?
667. Mr F McCann: That is the issue.
668. Ms M Campbell: We said that we would come back to you on that.
669. Mr Pollock: We do not expect them to be experts in all aspects. Their day-to-day job is dealing with individuals.
670. Ms M Campbell: Clause 28 is about hardship payments. Again, most of the detail will be in the regulations, which will be confirmatory and which will come before the Committee. This provision is to introduce a clearer, stronger sanction system under universal credit. It will be a system that is easily understood by claimants and which acts as an effective deterrent to non-compliance. Alongside improvements to the sanctions system, we want to maintain important safeguards. These include provisions to make hardship payments. Regulations under this clause will enable hardship payments to be made where any universal credit claimant has received a sanction and, as a result, is or will be in hardship. Many aspects of the system will be similar to the current arrangements under jobseeker's allowance. For example, in determining whether a person is or will be in hardship, we will continue to look at matters such as the resources available to the claimant's family or wider household. We will also take into account the risk that, without hardship payments, essential items such as food, heating and accommodation will not be available to the claimant or their family. These matters will all be set out in regulations.
671. In line with the current system, hardship payments will not be made automatically. Claimants will only be eligible for the payments if they make an application providing a statement of their circumstances and continue to meet their work-related requirements. Again, all this will be set out in regulations. We expect the rate of hardship payments to be broadly similar to current rates. This means that hardship payments would be equivalent to approximately 60% of the value of the sanction. So, a single jobseeker who would have been sanctioned £9 a day would have his award reduced by around £65 a week, and if he were to successfully claim hardship, he would - expect to receive a weekly payment of around £39. It is roughly 60% of the sanctioned amount.

672. We intend, however, to introduce some changes. We want to ensure that the existence of hardship payments does not undermine the deterrent effect of sanctions. Therefore, we intend to make hardship payments recoverable. We are also exploring options for time-limiting payments so that claimants who repeatedly fail to meet their work-related requirements cannot rely on hardship payments for the duration of their sanction. We recognise the need, however, to ensure that a robust safety net remains in place. Therefore, these changes will not apply to certain groups of claimants whom we consider to be most vulnerable, either through their own circumstances or those of a family member. For these purposes, we expect such groups of claimants to reflect those currently eligible for jobseeker's allowance hardship payments without being required to wait for 14 days from the beginning of the sanction period. This will be extended to cover anyone [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] This is about putting in place important safeguards to protect vulnerable people, and it is also about helping to incentivise claimants to meet their requirements while protecting the most vulnerable people and their dependants. That is my explanation.
673. Mr Brady: Why do you not call them crisis loans rather than hardship payments? They are exactly the same thing. You made an important statement about protecting vulnerable people. The fact that they are vulnerable may well be the reason why they are initially sanctioned. It goes back to staff assessing competence. Competence is a big part of why that person is actually failing. In a way, you have hit the nail on the head; if you are going to make provision for them being vulnerable, why sanction them in the first place?
674. Ms M Campbell: That is right. I keep saying that it comes back to the claimant and the relationship that they build up with the adviser. Through this regime, that relationship and trust will, hopefully, build up. The adviser will get to know the claimant and be aware of other factors —
675. Mr Brady: I accept that, and you have to pay tribute to social security and DEL staff who deal with this; you have some very good advisers. Their difficulty is that they may not be able to pick up on the nuances of a person's condition, a bipolar disorder being one such thing. I represent many people with bipolar disorders, and if you sat down and talked to them on a good day, they could fly to the moon; the next day, they would not be capable of doing anything. That is why I think that training is important.
676. Ms M Campbell: We will come back to you on that.
677. Mr Brady: I am not talking about medical training, just what is required to pick up on such things. The same applies when dealing with autistic adults.
678. Mr Pollock: In the past, we shied away from specifying things such as bipolar or autism; somebody else might say, "Well, I'm as bad".
679. Mr Brady: Somebody was just in a bad mood that day, and that could have been the staff. [Laughter.]
680. Ms M Campbell: Clause 29 allows the concurrent exercise of functions by the Department for Employment and Learning. It is really to reflect the difference in how jobs and benefits offices are structured here. It allows DEL to carry out functions in respect of the work-related requirement. That is it, plain and simple.
681. Mr Durkan: What might happen, given the uncertainty of DEL's future?
682. Ms M Campbell: If DEL is dissolved before the Bill goes through, the draftsmen will make provision to bring those functions into another Department, to DETI or wherever. If it is not dissolved by the time the Bill is passed, the transfer of functions order will carry the consequential - amendments to the Bill that will bring those functions into whichever Department gets those work search powers.

683. The Chairperson: OK; thank you.
684. Ms M Campbell: Clause 30 relates to the previous clause about DEL carrying out functions on our behalf. So, it is about allowing contracted providers in the private and voluntary sectors to exercise functions relating to imposing work-related and connected requirements. That is needed to deliver employment programmes, such as the new employment programme Steps 2 Success, which DEL is consulting on. A jobs and benefits adviser, using the power to impose work preparation requirements under clause 16, may require claimants to participate in a work programme. Work programme providers — these guys in the private or the voluntary sector — will then be authorised, through clause 30, to impose relevant requirements, such as work preparation or participation in a training course, on claimants.
685. Any functions that are contracted out in that way will be subject to the same restrictions that apply to jobs and benefits advisers. Providers will be able to impose only requirements that are appropriate to the claimant's circumstances and to the group that the claimant is in. So, if the claimant has been assessed as only being required to take work preparation steps, the provider cannot then require them to look for work or attend and interview for work at the same time. An important point is that the ability to impose sanctions cannot be contracted out. If the claimant were to fail to comply with any requirement that is imposed by the private person, the decision to sanction will be for jobs and benefits decision-makers.
686. Mr Brady: Fra and I were on the Committee for Social Development in the previous mandate. You mentioned clause 16, which we tried to have deleted because of the privatisation aspect. The then Minister for Social Development will remain nameless, but she told us that there was no need to change or delete it, because it was never going to happen. We tabled the amendment, and it was voted down. About four weeks later, medical support services became private. She spoke with a forked tongue, for want of a better expression. There seems to be an agenda to privatise. If I worked in the Social Security Agency, particularly in a local office, I would have serious concerns about the implications of this because it opens the door for large-scale privatisation. I know that you are talking about Pathways to Work and all that, but clause 30(2) states:
- “An authorisation given by virtue of this section may authorise the exercise of a function—*
- (a) wholly or to a limited extent;”*
687. The Department can authorise someone to do that. That gives a very wide remit, and that is worrying. I keep quoting Atos as an example, but it is a good example of a bad example, if that is the right way to put it. To me, that clause opens the door to privatisation. The staff must feel that, and I am not sure what consultation there has been. We have recently had meetings with NIPSA, and it is certainly not happy about this. It will affect not only claimants but staff.
688. Ms M Campbell: Of course, many of our staff will be our claimants because many of them will be entitled to claim universal credit.
689. Mr Brady: I accept that. When I worked in the social security office and family income supplements were introduced, a special section had to be set up for civil servants [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] The point is that they may well be going on to universal credit.
690. Ms McCleary: It may be the voluntary sector that becomes involved in this. We just do not know.
691. Mr Brady: That might well be the case, but that goes back to the whole issue around funding for the voluntary sector.

692. Ms McCleary: If the voluntary sector were to take on this work, it would not be doing so for the good of its health. It would have to be paid for it.
693. Mr Brady: It depends how much. It is semantics, but I wanted to flag that up. We have been down this road before about clause 16, and we are five years on from 4 June 2007, when this was first introduced. By 25 June, it was a done deal because it went through on accelerated passage.
694. The Chairperson: We have clarified what the Department's intention is. It is now 2.00 pm. We are scheduled to work until then, and I presume that we will be inquorate very quickly. I propose that we conclude at clause 30. We will return to that.
695. Martina, Anne, Michael and Margaret, thanks very much for your support and guidance. When we resume next week, we will recap where we are at. If members are broadly content with the way that we ran this session, we will do the same thing next week. Next week, we will have a brief recap from the Committee Clerk. If there is additional information that we could not get today, can we have that by next week? If members are happy enough, we will proceed on that basis.
696. There is one other item on which I will give notice, because it affects the Bill. In the Assembly last night, I mentioned considering invoking Standing Order 35. We cannot deal with that today or even tomorrow because it is a substantive Committee item. As it has not been invoked before, the Clerk, the Bill Office and the Speaker's Office will be consulting on that issue. We will deal with that as a substantive Committee item next week.
697. Mr Douglas: Will you clarify that it is not the case, as was suggested last night, that there will be a separate committee?
698. The Chairperson: This is the Statutory Committee, and, as I said, I do not want to open up the discussion because, in fairness and out of courtesy, I am just giving notice that I have asked officials to look at Standing Order 35. Ultimately, that question will be dealt with by a Speaker's ruling because it has not happened before. We will give a full report to members next week. I am serving a wee bit of notice that I am looking at this as a member. We will bring all the relevant information to the Committee when we have it.
699. Mr F McCann: Mickey raised the question earlier of bipolar people. Is there anything in writing about this Bill or the previous Bill, to which we put down an amendment in 2007, that details the training and its duration and quality that staff get to enable them to monitor people they see? There must be some guidance there.
700. Ms M Campbell: There is.
701. Mr F McCann: There is nothing there. I have spoken to a number of personal advisers over time, and, to be perfectly honest, they think that the training they get is a joke. In fairness to them, it does not equip them to deal with such situations. We can talk about what may be suggested in a Bill, but the actual outworking of this does not happen.
702. Ms M Campbell: The Disability Discrimination Act 1995 requires all employers to provide some level of training to all their staff on the requirements under disability legislation.
703. Mr F McCann: Could we have that?
704. The Chairperson: OK, because it is, I suppose, a substantive item for discussion at some point, so —
705. Mr F McCann: It was raised as part of today's discussions.
706. The Chairperson: That is not a problem.
707. Ms M Campbell: OK; thank you.
708. The Chairperson: Thank you very much.

709. The Chairperson: We will receive a briefing from departmental officials.
710. Mr Brian Doherty (Department for Social Development): Our presentation on social fund reform was part of our first presentation.
711. The Chairperson: Fair enough. That is why I said earlier that there was a bit of straying.
712. Mr Doherty: My apologies; I should have made that clear.
713. The Chairperson: OK, there may be another couple of questions.
714. Mr Brady: Thanks for the briefing on the social fund.
715. Quite a bit of the argument on Tuesday, which was regurgitated by many on many occasions, was that the Welfare Reform Bill not getting through would mean that the social fund would finish in April. However, what you are saying, Brian, is that there has to be a new scheme in place anyhow. Therefore I could not understand why, if there is to be a new scheme in place, people were rabbiting on, for want of a better expression, about the current social fund when it will be abolished anyhow. I tried to explain that, but we were there till 12.00 am, and I did not want to be there for another 12 hours.
716. The Chairperson: Keep it temperate, now. This is not Tuesday; this is Thursday.
717. Mr Brady: It was used as an argument, and I really could not understand why. I presume that there will be a new scheme, and it will not necessarily be based on similar lines.
718. Under the current social fund, if you apply for items and get a grant or a loan, you cannot apply for the same items within six months. Is that likely to be maintained?
719. Paragraph 3.5 of your briefing states:
"It is planned to introduce a pilot exercise to trial the direct provision of goods to customers as an alternative to cash payments. It is anticipated that this sort of provision could provide an opportunity to put in place competitive discount arrangements with suppliers."
720. In my experience, going back to the 1980s, that does not work. When the social fund was introduced after single payments, one furniture supplier closed down because it relied totally on such vouchers. One shop in Newry, which has a branch in Belfast and is quite a big furniture shop, had a sign in its window saying, "DHSS giros accepted." When I asked whether those were the only cheques accepted or could anybody go in with a cheque, they said, "Oh, yes." That was stigmatising people who were on benefits. Therein lies the problem.
721. Then you had a patronising attitude, whereby visiting officers or social workers would go into the shop with the person by the hand and tell them what to buy. I remember that they were selling Spanish cookers, where the grill was in the oven and did not work. I am using that as an illustration of the pitfalls so that we can avoid them. The idea that there is somebody who knows better than you what you should have in your house and that shops are making a - profit out of it needs to be addressed. This is an opportunity to avoid all that.

722. Mr Doherty: Under the proposals in the Welfare Reform Bill, the social fund will be abolished. Therefore from our point of view the issue is operational delivery: we need to have a scheme that we can deliver. As I said earlier, that provides us with an opportunity to do something for Northern Ireland that will not be delivered elsewhere in the UK. In England, any money that is dished out will be dished out to local authorities. Scotland and Wales are watching what we are doing before they decide how to proceed, although they have different approaches. There can be little doubt that, with effect from 1 April next year, subject to the Welfare Reform Bill being passed, the social fund will not exist. That would be terrible, given that it would take £30 million out of the pockets of very vulnerable people and out of the economy in Northern Ireland. Therefore, it is very important to us. I will let Leonora pick up on the items within the six months. We will look at white goods in a pilot scheme. You rightly raised issues, Mickey, about how that worked. In GB, an organisation called the Family Fund does something very similar. However, we will not be giving out cheques or vouchers. The simple payment system is being rolled out across the agency with effect from Monday past, so cheques will not be in existence from March of next year.
723. The pilot scheme has yet to be devised, but our intention is that if people told us that they needed a cooker, for example, we would use local suppliers to deliver a cooker. In this day and age, most such items come with a 12-month guarantee, whereas in the past, some people would come in within a 12-month period telling us that they needed three, four or five cookers. The new scheme avoids that and gives people support for what they actually need. Nevertheless, we have to have some discretion. We want to pilot it to see whether it works; if it does not, we will perhaps look at other things.
724. Ms Leonora McLaughlin (Department for Social Development): We have the same issue with items as we have with trying to spread the money and making sure that as many customers as possible are assisted. As Brian said, because of guarantees, we intend that there will not be repeat applications for the same item within a 12-month period, except in instances of disaster such as fire or flood, in which case we will make an exception.
725. We are aware of sensitivities about the goods and services pilot. A very strong theme came through in the phase 1 research, and there is no intention that customers will be stigmatised. The Family Fund, which operates in Northern Ireland as well, has a very good system whereby pre-paid cards are used in some instances, which allow customers a degree of discretion about the item that they get, so long as it is a cooker or fridge, for example. That is probably a good model that we can look to. However, it remains to be seen. As Brian said, we will take this on a small scale in the first instance.
726. Mr Doherty: The pilot will not be done before we land the scheme on 1 April; it will be done at some stage next year when we have worked out what shape we want it to take. It may be done in a small geographical area just to see how it works. That will not be landed on 31 March.
727. Mr Brady: I am not criticising examples of good practice or good models. It is really that the control, in a sense, is taken away from the person and they are told what somebody else thinks they require. I know that the Family Fund does good work and that there were people in the past who used the fund almost as a topping-up system, and that has to be watched. It goes back to the experience of staff who have been implementing the system for a long time.
728. Going back to what I said, this is a chance to be innovative and introduce a scheme that targets people who need it most. There will probably be tiers for the most needy up the scale. We were originally told that the social fund would be cut by some 10%. You are now saying - that that will not happen, which is good news.

729. Mr Doherty: Absolutely.
730. Mr Brady: It is still probably inadequate but better to have a 10% cut than lose it.
731. Mr Durkan: Mickey was saying that too many cooks spoiled the broth. [Laughter.] On the budget, the discretionary support policy is for the social fund as well.
732. Mr Doherty: It is for the discretionary payment scheme with effect from 1 April 2013.
733. Mr Durkan: Yes, sorry, in the new scheme to replace the social fund.
734. Mr Doherty: Yes.
735. Mr Doherty: It will keep the same budget as the social fund.
736. Mr Doherty: That is what the Treasury advised us, that we will receive —
737. Mr Durkan: You mentioned £30 million.
738. Mr Doherty: The total expenditure per year is £29 million for community care grants and crisis loans, and it is funded from two channels. The Treasury gives us about £16 million a year, which is part of its annually managed expenditure, and we keep about £13 million from what we recoup on the loans, with Treasury agreement. That is how you get the £29 million.
739. Mr Durkan: Some people who talked the other day about it being abolished said that it was, I think, £82 million.
740. Mr Doherty: Eighty million pounds is an accurate figure in that it is the entire social fund. However, we are talking about the non-regulated elements. The social fund also includes maternity grants, funeral payments, budget loans —
741. Mr Brady: Yes, funeral expenses, and discretionary and non-discretionary payments.
742. Mr Doherty: Discretionary and non-discretionary payments. That would be reflective of the total budget.
743. The Chairperson: That is all part of the debate, and we could debate that all week. If we do not pass the Welfare Reform Bill, we still have the current legislation. We have no void.
744. Earlier, I think that Angela or you referred to working with the community and voluntary sector on referrals in particular. Will you elaborate a little bit on that for me?
745. Ms Angela Clarke (Department for Social Development): Certainly. When developing the policy, some opinions were expressed that, when people appear in an emergency or crisis, we should force them to take advice from certain people. It is not about forcing people, but referring them and making them aware that there are particular agencies that could help them with advice. The important thing is to meet the immediate need there and then; that is what we have to do. We are also keen to make sure that people know where they can go to get good advice, which will, perhaps, help them in the future and maybe more so than with the immediate need that crept up on that occasion.
746. We know that there is a lot of concern about the advice, and we want to make sure that whatever advice is available is provided to the appropriate standards. The Department has done a lot of work with advice agencies over the past couple of years, and we have agreed a new contract quite recently. It is very much based on a partnership arrangement, and a lot more information is shared about the kind of people they see and the kind of issues that come up. That is then fed back to the Department. In some ways, we try to match how the money is spent against the areas that come for advice.
747. As welfare reform is such a huge issue and will cause so much concern, the Department has decided that the focus of the advice and the quite substantial amount of money that goes to the advice sector really needs to be on welfare reform. We want to make sure that there are staff on the ground. There will be support from the centre, but we want to make sure that the people who deliver on the ground are properly trained. We also want to see evidence of the kind of training they get and we want them to work very closely with the Department to understand what they should be training in. It is not just that. It is about trying to align better across the public services, so that we do not do that in isolation and work more closely with social services and with the people who support people. That may take a bit of time, but we have to bring it all together and make sure that the people at the centre are being supported with the proper advice.

748. Mr Doherty: If I could just add to that. Earlier, Fra wanted an assurance that the Social Security Agency would deliver the scheme. As part of our early engagement with stakeholders, the message came through fairly clearly that the advice sector did not want to play the role of delivery agent, and that it saw itself playing a different role. We very much respect that, and, as has been pointed out this afternoon, some people do not, necessarily, like to engage with government. Thankfully, that is not a huge number of people, but we must give those who do not want to engage an avenue.
749. The advice sector has a very important role to play in signposting people to the services it provides on a holistic basis, which we cannot provide. Citizens Advice or Advice NI deliver a debt service on behalf of the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (DETI), and people come to it for social fund moneys. Many people who are on benefits are probably better debt managers than, dare I say it, anybody in this room. They get very small amounts of money and know how to use it. Being able to divert or signpost them to the advice sector to give them other advice on the other things that are available will be really important, and the advice sector was very keen to play that sort of role. It could be that some people in our offices will do that for them. We have not quite worked that out. As Angela said, this is very much a partnership approach. We recognise the important role that the advice sector plays in supporting people through difficult times.

750. Ms A Clarke: Perhaps it is important to mention the new financial capability strategy that DETI is developing. We want to work very closely with DETI to ensure that it understands the kind of issues and business that we need support on. What DETI does has to be properly reflected across government.
751. Mr F McCann: I think that the advice services have been an unequal partner with the Social Security Agency as far as the level of funding they get is concerned. How much funding goes to that sector? I think that one Minister gave it an extra half a million pounds a number of years ago, and that may have been increased by the present Minister. Given the level of advice that is required for the changes that are coming, a substantial amount of money needs to be put in. The advice services are stretched dealing with that. Other groups also provide professional debt advice and a good service — the likes of the Housing Rights Service, which works with people who are losing their homes. Advice NI is a great organisation. Citizens Advice is a good policy organisation. Other groups are specific in the advice and work that they do, and they need to be considered, too.
752. Mr Doherty: As indicated, the Minister has that actively under consideration. However, the Committee will be aware, as you know, that our benefit uptake programme is delivered in strong partnership with Advice NI. Of the 25,000 people whom they would have contacted last year, debt advice is among much of the advice that they would provide to vulnerable people on very low incomes. I tend to disagree; I think that we have worked on a true partnership basis with the advice sector. It is a challenging partnership at times, but it is one in which we recognise that they have a very important role to play.

753. Mr F McCann: It is like a Big Brother partnership, sometimes. I think that that applies to most Departments.
754. Mr Brady: I have two points: you mentioned debt advice, and I think that Advice NI, which has a debt advice unit with just two people working in it, who do invaluable work, certainly in Newry, has just moved into Ballybot House, where I used to work.
755. Mr F McCann: Where is Ballybot House?
756. Mr Brady: It is in Newry, funnily enough.
757. Mr F McCann: Mickey worked there for 38 years.
758. Mr Brady: My point is that they do very good work. On another point: you mentioned people from the voluntary sector going into local offices. I am not sure whether that is a good idea, because of what, based on my experience of working in the advice sector, I call “brown envelope” syndrome. Very self-assured people who would come in to see me over the years would not open letters from the buroo. They could have contained giros; they could have been good news or bad news, but, historically, people in the North are suspicious of the statutory sector, particularly the buroo. That is just the way it is.
759. You worked in social security and so did I. A distance is needed, because, when I was in welfare rights, I was a kind of conduit between cash, being the buroo, and caring, being social services. So, you tended to get people coming in from both directions. I think that it is important to retain that kind of independence. I am not sure what the voluntary sector thinks of this at the moment, but it is just that, historically, people are suspicious. When I started in welfare rights, having just worked 100 yards up the street in the buroo, it took about six months or a year for people to accept that I was not one of “them” and was now one of “us”. It is just something to keep in mind.
760. Mr F McCann: I think that you are still one of them.
761. The Chairperson: When Mickey started, they were getting brushes for the chimney sweeps. [Laughter.]
762. Mr Brady: That was only for 10-year-olds.
763. Mr Doherty: It is a point that is well made. Although I believe that the trust and confidence that people have in the different services is considerably improving, with regard to the advice sector sitting in the office, it is something that we would look at in conjunction with the advice sector. It is more about making sure that it has access, if needs be, to our premises. Its groups are not in every area of Northern Ireland, but it is something that we will definitely look at.
764. Mr Brady: There may be a lot of vacant office space in local offices if things carry on the way that they are going, unfortunately.
765. The Chairperson: I am always curious when people say, “I am only going to ask one question”, and they then ask at least three. If people are content that we have explored this, may I thank Brian, Leonora and Angela for their briefings and for dealing with the variety of questions. This work is obviously ongoing. Thank you.
766. Mr Doherty: Thank you.

767. The Chairperson: I welcome Michael, Martina, Margaret and Colm, who are here to brief the Committee on the clauses and to answer questions on anything that you are not sure about. I remind members that, at last week's briefing session, we completed clauses 1 to 30, which, I am told, is very good.
768. If people are satisfied with the process that we used last week, we will continue to use it. Today, we will start with clause 31. Clause 44 is the last clause of Part 1, and, hopefully, we will swiftly move on to Part 2, which will deal with working-age benefits. We are keeping a record of these discussions, which will form part of the report. That will include some correspondence to the Department. Members will be aware that we asked questions last week and we got some answers, but we will raise those questions again. A copy of that correspondence is in your folders.
769. Martina, last week, there were some questions that you were not able to respond to, and there were some that you did give quick responses to, so
- thanks for that. Is there anything that you want to update the Committee on now? If not, you might be able to come back to it later, but there were some outstanding matters from last week.
770. Ms Martina Campbell (Department for Social Development): We have pulled together the written responses to three letters from the Committee, and they need ministerial clearance. We hope that we will get all three letters to you before the end of the week.
771. The Chairperson: OK. That is fine.
772. Mr F McCann: Obviously, we are scrutinising the Bill, but does that mean that every question we ask has to get ministerial clearance before it is answered?
773. Ms M Campbell: Any correspondence with the Committee always goes through the Minister. That is normal procedure.
774. The Chairperson: We got an answer to some of the issues that we queried last Wednesday morning.
775. Ms M Campbell: Most of your queries were answered on the day. There was only the odd one that needed confirmation of our understanding.
776. The Chairperson: It is really just down to the question.
777. Mr F McCann: We are just asking a question, Chair.
778. Mr Michael Pollock (Department for Social Development): Some of the questions that were asked and answered last week were brought up in correspondence from the Committee, so it is a formal record of all the questions that were asked at the meeting.
779. The Chairperson: So, if we do not write to ask for the answer, we will not get a written reply. We will get a verbal reply. OK, we will move on. I remind everyone

- that this evidence session is being recorded by Hansard. Your explanatory notes are in the memorandum in tab 2 of your Bill folder. I invite you to start with clause 31. We will go through the same routine as last time. We will deal with clause 31, get the explanation of it, and then Martina will take a moment to see whether anybody needs any clarification, and we can get that.
780. Ms M Campbell: That is fine. If you are happy enough, we will crack on.
781. Clause 31 introduces schedule 1, which allows the Department to bring forward regulations to cover some of the more detailed arrangements for universal credit. Schedule 1 is on page 97 of the Bill and page 20 of your explanatory and financial memorandum.
782. Schedule 1 contains supplementary regulation making powers. It relates to key definitions or areas where additional flexibility is needed. In the current system, the equivalent issues are all covered by regulations already. Paragraphs 1 and 3 of schedule 1 enable regulations to deal with detailed issues around couples and joint claims; for example, so that we could convert a joint award into one or two single awards where a couple breaks up or where one half of the couple —
783. The Chairperson: Sorry, Martina. I think members seem to be struggling to find what is being referred to. It is tab 2 of your Bill folder.
784. Ms M Campbell: Sorry. The explanatory memorandum may be easier for members to understand. I think, Chair, you said that it is at tab 2.
785. Mr Durkan: It depends where the member put it back last week.
786. Ms P Bradley: I put mine back in tab 3.
787. The Chairperson: It is the thick, stapled one at the back of tab 2, for those who did not interfere with its position. Page 20, did you say, Martina?
788. Ms M Campbell: It is page 20 in my version. It starts at paragraph 115. Schedule 1 is on page 97 of the Bill.
789. The Chairperson: Clause 31 is on page 19 of the explanatory notes, and schedule 1 is on page 20. We are working through the explanatory notes.
790. Ms M Campbell: The explanatory notes are slightly easier to understand. I am sort of working between the three; I am multitasking.
791. As I was saying, schedule 1(1) and 1(3) deal with issues around couples and joint claims. Last week, we talked about a situation where one half of a couple did not accept the claimant commitment. This schedule would allow us to separate the couple out and allow the half that would accept the claimant commitment to make a claim on their own account, but we would take into account the joint earnings.
792. Schedule 1(2) provides powers for linking rules, which may be needed, as now, in situations where there are short breaks between claims and that would otherwise result in unfairness. The simpler structure of universal credit should mean that linking rules are less of a feature than they are now, but the need for them still needs to be considered.
793. Schedule 1(4) contains powers to define in regulations what counts as income and capital, including the treatment of earned and unearned income and tariff income in respect of savings. So, as now, there will be a sliding scale where the claimants have savings in excess of £6,000 up to a maximum threshold of £16,000.
794. Schedule 1(5) provides for regulations to set out the circumstances in which a claimant is to be considered responsible for a child or young person and, therefore, entitled to additional support.
795. Schedule 1(6) provides what is essentially called a reserved power to pay certain amounts of universal credit by voucher. This has been discussed as a possible way of making payments for childcare, and although it is not the preferred option, it makes sense to have that facility and flexibility in the legislation. I should say that this is not

- about food vouchers but about childcare vouchers and, possibly, vouchers for other elements. The power relates back to clause 12. It is for particular needs or circumstances, which, obviously, would not include food.
796. Schedule 1(7) allows for regulations to provide for claimants who have a right to reside in the UK under EU treaties and who would otherwise fall within clauses 19, 20 or 21. Those clauses are about work requirements and detail the claimants who are subject to no work requirements, work-focused interview only or work preparation only. It is to make sure that they fall into the group in clause 22, which is that they are subject to all work requirements.
797. Schedule 1(8) enables regulations to define the term “good reason”. That is used in various places in the Bill, especially in connection with conditionality and sanctions. We do not, as we discussed last week, intend to prescribe matters to be taken into account when determining whether a claimant has good reason, but, again, it makes sense to maintain the flexibility to do so if necessary in future. “Good reason” — I probably do this a lot — is the same as “just cause” or “good cause”. They are moving to the term “good reason”. I lapse into the use of the term “just cause” because that is what it was in my day.
798. All the detailed aspects of universal credit need to be covered, and it is appropriate to do so in regulations. Of course, as I said last week, most of the regulations in the schedule will come before the Committee in the first instance and will be subject to confirmatory procedure. That completes my explanation.
799. Mr Brady: Paragraph 132 of the explanatory and financial memorandum states:
- “A determination as to whether a claimant has good reason is not appealable, as is the case under the current benefits system.”*
800. Presumably, the decision on whether they accept good reason is appealable.
- It is a bit confusing. Paragraph 132 also states:
- “Paragraph 8 provides for regulations to set out the circumstances in which there is or is not to be good reason and the factors which must or must not be considered when determining whether or not a person had good reason for a particular act or omission”.*
801. The acceptance or otherwise of good reason is not appealable, but presumably that will make it further to whether the person is disallowed or sanctioned. Is that appealable?
802. Ms M Campbell: That is appealable.
803. Mr Brady: That is confusing. Why did they not just say that you can or cannot appeal? Do you get my point? One decision follows on from the other.
804. Ms M Campbell: We can look at that and put some more clarification in there.
805. Mr Brady: In terms of good English, it is confusing.
806. Ms M Campbell: I get your point. It is a good one. We will look at expanding that further.
807. Mr Copeland: I just wanted to check that we can be sure that some sort of guidance will be given regarding the reaching of those determinations so that two people, on two different days, given similar circumstances, might not come up with an acceptance and a refusal.
808. Ms M Campbell: Yes.
809. Mr Copeland: How will that be enforced?
810. Ms M Campbell: Guidance will be issued to staff; there will be guidance for decision-makers. We hope that the guidance for decision-makers will be shared with relevant stakeholders, but that is still to be decided. It would make sense for that guidance to be shared.
811. Mr Copeland: Will we ever get sight of that guidance, so that we can start to understand how determinations and decisions are taken?
812. Ms M Campbell: If they agree to do that, yes.

813. Mr Copeland: Can you ask them?

814. Ms M Campbell: Yes. I am awaiting an answer from them on that.

815. The Chairperson: We will move on to clause 32.

816. Ms M Campbell: Clause 32 introduces schedule 2, which is about supplementary and consequential amendments. It is about making amendments to existing legislation as a consequence of introducing universal credit. As members know, there are very many references to existing benefits in legislation. That is legislation on not only social security but in other Departments, such as in the Department of Education for free school meals, etc. All those need to be replaced with appropriate references to universal credit. Schedule 2 covers all of the legislation that we are aware of at the moment that needs to be amended. It does not cover everything. I am sure that we have missed something. Therefore, clause 33 provides us with powers to make further amendments by regulation as opposed to taking up Assembly time by doing it through primary legislation.

817. Amendments to existing social security legislation will bring universal credit within the common set of rules for the benefits system as a whole: that will involve claims, claimants, decisions and appeals. The schedule also provides for the rate of universal credit to be uprated annually and for changes to the amount of benefit as a result of uprating, changes in earnings and certain routine changes to be made without a formal decision or fresh rights of appeal. The schedule also provides, for example, for information to be shared in order to investigate fraud and error, prosecution of fraud, recovery of social fund payments and for reciprocal agreements with other countries in relation to universal credit.

818. There are also numerous references to welfare benefits and tax credits in the legislation of other Departments. This enables entitlement to certain benefits through tax credits to be used as a test for low income. As I mentioned before, free school meals is one of the most obvious ones. A test based on universal credit as a whole will be wider than the current test, because universal credit will bring in people with earnings, as opposed to just those who are out of work and relying solely on out-of-work benefits. Therefore, you will be bringing in a wider range of people. As a result, the test for other benefits will need to be re-examined, and this provision will enable additional criteria to be attached or a power to prescribe the limitations to be applied. Therefore, it will be up to other Departments to look at that.

819. Finally, paragraph 49 of the schedule amends the State Pension Credit Act (Northern Ireland) Act 2002 to exclude couples in which one partner is of working age from claiming pension credit. That will end the anomaly that working-age people can be supported by the benefits system without any conditionality just because they have an older partner on pension credit. That concludes my explanation.

820. The Chairperson: Thank you, Martina. Has anyone anything to say about clause 32? Michael, did you want to go back to clause 31?

821. Mr Copeland: I would like clarification of the last answer about us getting sight or some knowledge of the process and the guidelines. You said, "If they agree". Who are "they"?

822. Ms M Campbell: We do not write the guidance. It is done by another section in the Social Security Agency, and we have asked them to share the guidance.

823. Mr Copeland: Will you then share it with us?

824. Ms M Campbell: Yes.

825. The Chairperson: So, clause 32 is complete.

826. Mr Durkan: I have a question about paragraph 146 of the explanatory and financial memorandum, which relates to couples. If one person has reached the state pension age and the other has - not, the younger person is still required to claim universal credit, but one household payment or not nominated person. What impact will that have on other legislation involving housing or under-occupancy? The couple will not be exempt because it will go with the younger person who has not reached state pension age. Is that right?

827. The Chairperson: Say that again, Mark?
828. Ms M Campbell: It concerns under-occupancy when one person is under pension age. You want to know whether they will be exempt from under-occupancy?
829. Mr Pollock: No, I do not think so.
830. Mr F McCann: I think that it would refer to the younger person as the head of household.
831. Mr Pollock: We will check it out for you.
832. Ms M Campbell: We will come back on that after lunch, if that is OK?
833. The Chairperson: We will move on to clause 33.
834. Ms M Campbell: We are whistling through them rightly. Clause 33 builds on the previous clause and schedule 2, which amends a wide range of other Acts and orders to reflect the changes introduced by the introduction of universal credit. As I said, the task of identifying all the changes needed to pick up every reference to social security legislation across the board is no mean task. Clearly, we expect that we will not have picked them all up. This clause allows us to pick up changes identified in the future by way of regulation and allows us to make consequential, supplementary, incidental or transitional provisions. It allows us to make amendments by regulations that are not of any significant policy impact. That completes my explanation of that schedule.
835. Mr G Campbell: The issue has been mentioned several times, and I know that this is the standard format of change by regulation. However, if something requires to be changed by regulation and an unintended consequence of that is more fundamental than you thought at first, how might the Committee and the Assembly deal with that?
836. Ms M Campbell: I suppose it depends on the unintended consequence and whether it would be within social security legislation or —
837. Mr Pollock: Or within the broader remit of the Executive to do something on the ground.
838. Mr G Campbell: I have nothing in mind, but I am thinking of a situation where, at first glance, you think that a change needs to be made by regulation because it looks to be quite minimal but then, on closer examination, appears that it will affect a more significant number of people than you originally thought. What would happen then?
839. Mr Pollock: Ordinarily, the first set of regulations under universal credit will be confirmatory, and that means that there is a six-month cooling-off period before the end of which the regulations will be debated in the Assembly. So, we will look closely to monitor the impact of the regulations on the ground. In circumstances where regulations are moved to negative resolution, you are generally talking about fairly minor changes. The consensus would be that you would not be changing anything in the social security system and that it would be for another Department or the Executive as a whole to do something, if minded to do so, if there was an unusual consequence of a regulation that was unforeseen at the time when it was drafted.
840. Ms M Campbell: It should be picked up by equality screening as well.
841. The Chairperson: No other member wants to speak. We will move on to clause 34.
842. Ms M Campbell: Clause 34 abolishes various benefits and tax credits that will be replaced by universal credit. As we have said previously, the current web of benefits and tax credits is very difficult - for claimants to understand and for us, as administrators, to explain. This can lead to errors and make fraud more difficult to detect, and, more importantly, it is very difficult for claimants to see how paid work will leave them better off. One of the fundamental aims of universal credit is to simplify the process and reduce error and to build claimant confidence by introducing a single and simplified system of support for people in and out of work. As a single payment that will be withdrawn at a single rate when a claimant has earnings, universal credit will also help claimants to see the advantage of taking a job.

843. The benefits to be abolished are administered by four different bodies, each with their own claim application procedures. The DSD is responsible in the case of income-based jobseeker's allowance (JSA), income-related employment and support allowance (ESA), and income support. The Northern Ireland Housing Executive is responsible for housing benefit. The Department of Finance and Personnel's Land and Property Services is responsible for the rates element of housing benefit, and Revenue and Customs is responsible for child tax credit and working tax credit.
844. In the case of the other benefits that this clause will abolish, universal credit will be administered by a single organisation, namely the Social Security Agency, with a single claim procedure providing a greatly improved service to claimants and lower administration costs. This clause paves the way for making that transition by providing for the abolition of help with rates under housing benefit. It also contains provisions for consequential amendments as a result of the abolition of benefits.
845. Mr Brady: Your comments on the reduction in fraud and error were interesting. I thought that the purpose of the Bill was to make it simpler for people to claim. Obviously, fraud and error is still subliminal in the thinking behind the Bill. That is not a criticism of what you are saying, but I think it illustrates the purpose of the Bill: rather than make it easier for people to claim and access benefits, the emphasis seems to be on reducing fraud and error, which, in fact, as we know, has been reducing here.
846. Ms M Campbell: It is very low.
847. Mr Brady: It highlights one of the differences between what happens in England and what happens here. I wanted to make that point, because you mentioned fraud and error specifically.
848. Mr G Campbell: I want to comment on fraud and error as well. Figures are available, and we have looked at them before. I think that it was Mickey Brady who, at a previous meeting, alluded to the fact that it was a declining problem. If we have the factual position with respect to the current scale of fraud and error, and allow a settling-in period for the first year, in which one would expect there to be teething problems, would it be possible in the second year, after everything had hopefully bedded in whatever route the Bill takes, to compare the level of fraud and error in those two years? You are saying that there should be an improvement. If we have the figures now —
849. Mr Pollock: That would be the rationale. There is a published figure in respect of loss. Someone can hang a pound sign on that in respect of fraud and error. It is published in the agency's accounts.
850. Ms M Campbell: It is in the report as well.
851. Mr G Campbell: Yes, but the point I am making is that most people would accept that, given the scale of the change in the first year, it is going to be difficult to compare like with like. We can allow the first year as a bedding-in year. However, in the second year, this Committee should be able to say that fraud and error amounted to x in 2011, for instance. You are saying that, as a result of the changes that we are discussing, you should be able to compare things in the second year and see an improvement.

852. Mr Pollock: It seems reasonable. You also have to determine what you are measuring. Are you measuring instances of fraud and error or are you measuring loss? Presumably, you are measuring both. So, you would have different comparators. You should be able to draw some reasoned conclusions over a longer period.
853. Ms M Campbell: We will be discussing fraud and error later. I think it is in Part 5. We will have the head of fraud policy with us then. Hopefully, he will be able to answer your questions more fully.
854. The Chairperson: If that is the case, are people content to leave any questions they might have on fraud and error until then? I am easy; it is up to you. If we are going to have the head of policy here, it might be useful to reserve the questions on that issue until then.
855. Mr Douglas: I have a more general point. This might have been answered already, so I apologise. Obviously, this legislation came through in the UK. There is the whole aspect of monitoring and evaluating the impact of the changes. What is the process, once the Bill is implemented in Northern Ireland?
856. Ms M Campbell: The Department for Work and Pensions (DWP) has committed to developing a programme of monitoring and evaluation, and the agency is working on developing a similar programme. The details have not been ironed out yet, because a lot of the detail still has not been ironed out in the regulations. Once that is finalised, we will come back to the Committee with the monitoring and evaluation programme.
857. Mr Douglas: Gregory made a very good point, because other things might go belly up somewhere along the line; there could be unforeseen circumstances.
858. Ms M Campbell: Later, I will talk about running pilot schemes.
859. Mr Copeland: This is another general point. You might feel that I am putting it into the mix in the wrong place. I am not sure if we have covered it or if it will be covered in the future. A substantial number of people, all of them retired, diligently tried to do what the welfare state suggested they did throughout their lives. They acquired occupational pensions and little pension schemes, and, as I said, a substantial number find themselves thrust into the morass of current benefits, with, in one case I have, an income of 75p above what is allowed. That 75 pence, which was acquired by diligence and by doing what they should have done for a very long time now militates against them. Will universal credit look at that injustice? This is what many people see it as. A lifetime was spent acquiring that 75p. However, all of a sudden, it is wasted. They might as well have drunk it, smoked it, or put it on horses, to be frank. Will this in any way simplify the process and overturn any of the injustice that lies there?
860. Ms M Campbell: If they are in receipt of an occupational pension, they are, presumably, over state pension age, so they are out of universal credit, unless the —
861. Mr Copeland: Not always.
862. Ms M Campbell: They will be out of universal credit, unless they have a younger partner. The occupational pension will be considered to be what is called unearned income, so it will be taken into account. Since the thresholds here for disregards are slightly higher a few more people should be let in, but I cannot promise. I know that there are some really tough cases out there with people being only pence over the limit, and it is heartbreaking. The system is not designed to catch all cases; it is designed to catch the majority.
863. Mr Copeland: I know that there are a substantial number of people who receive an occupational pension prior to pension age, as a result of the conditions of their discharge.
864. Mr Brady: Michael mentioned injustice. It seems to me that injustice and welfare reform go in tandem. Years ago, under the supplementary benefit

- scheme, a person who was over the limit by a small amount still had an underlying entitlement. It applied much the way that carers who are pensioners are now treated. I imagine that the policymakers would see that as a retrograde step, because it used to work in benefits 30 or 35 years ago. Then it was abolished. If you were over by £3 to £5, I think it was, you still had underlying entitlement. I am old enough to remember that. Most of you probably are not. I do not know about you, Michael. [Laughter.]
865. The Chairperson: Stop digging.
866. Mr Brady: That used to happen. It has not happened for a long time, and it is unlikely to happen. It would be seen as a retrograde step in the benefits system, but it worked when it was in place. It brought in the people Michael is talking about — those who are slightly above the threshold.
867. The Chairperson: Remember that we on this side are asking the questions; we are not giving the answers.
868. Ms M Campbell: I take the member's point.
869. The Chairperson: OK. Thank you for that. We will move swiftly to clause 35.
870. Ms M Campbell: Clause 35 sees housing benefit abolished, as we have talked about. Clause 35 introduces schedule 4, which provides for the addition of a housing element within pension credit. This is to protect those people who are getting pension credit but who do not qualify because they are both over state pension age. The clause is there so that there will be continuity of support for eligible pensioners' rent or housing costs.
871. As I have said, it provides for the addition of a housing element within pension credit and amends the State Pension Credit Act (Northern Ireland) 2002 to introduce the new housing credit. It will also do away with the need for pensioners to make two claims: one for pension credit and one for housing benefit. It sets out the general conditions of entitlement and provides for regulations to specify how the credit will be calculated, who will be eligible, what can be paid and the rules around income and capital.
872. The intention is that housing credit will broadly follow the current rules that apply in housing benefit, so most people will not notice any difference. For someone to be entitled to the housing credit element of pension credit, they will need to live in the UK, have reached pension credit qualifying age and be liable for housing costs that relate to the accommodation they live in.
873. The extent to which a person is liable for housing costs, what constitutes accommodation, how you treat temporary absences from home, for those people who are lucky to go to Spain for the winter, and how we calculate the amount of housing credit will also be included in the regulations. A person may be entitled to housing credit whether or not they receive the guarantee credit or savings credit elements of pension credit.
874. The schedule also allows us to specify that rates of support may differ by area. For example, different local housing allowance rates will apply in different parts of the Province.
875. In introducing the new housing credit, we will look for opportunities to streamline the benefit and align the rules where possible. That includes extending pension credit provisions to the housing credit wherever possible. That is mainly about the assessed income periods. That is pretty much it.
876. Mr F McCann: When all that is said, Martina, the housing credit is the same as housing benefit.
877. Ms M Campbell: Yes. That is it in a nutshell. I just thought I would blind you with science to see if you were listening.
878. Mr F McCann: You are making it easier for people to apply. Does that mean that they will automatically go on to it rather than having to apply for it?

879. Ms M Campbell: Those who are entitled to housing benefit at the minute will be migrated across, so they will be none the wiser. However, when new claimants come on stream and apply for their pension credit, that will take in the details of their housing costs, so it will be on one form. Hopefully, that should make it easier for pensioners.
880. Mr F McCann: Can we just dust down the old forms and change the name on the front of them?
881. Ms M Campbell: I did not say that.
882. Mr Copeland: If I remember correctly, the current housing benefit form includes a couple of questions that have always mystified me. The questions are “are you receiving any money as a result of Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease?” and “are you receiving any money as a consequence of compensation for being a Far Eastern prisoner of war?” For some reason, they are required to know that information. There are about seven questions, but those are the two that spring to mind. Is that likely to transfer on to the new form?
883. Ms M Campbell: I imagine so. Colm, do you know?
884. Mr Colm McLaughlin (Department for Social Development): A lot of questions on certain claim forms are designed to find out specifically the income that people are getting, because, as you know, for benefit purposes, certain income is disregarded. I do not deal with housing benefit, but perhaps those particular incomes are disregarded for housing benefit purposes.
885. Mr Copeland: Or “regarded”, as the case may be.
886. Mr C McLaughlin: The idea is to get the full picture of the income for the household.
887. Mr Copeland: That is the only form I have ever seen those specific questions on. I am just curious about how it would be transferred.
888. Mr C McLaughlin: Normally, claim forms ask for people’s income. When anything specific is asked, there is a particular reason for it. It could be because they will disregard that particular income for benefit purposes.
889. The Chairperson: I thought that if you were a prisoner of war, you could maybe [Inaudible.] Clause 35 has been covered.
890. Ms M Campbell: Clause 36 introduces schedule 5, which contains provisions relating to the overlapping relationship between universal credit and contributory JSA and ESA. As members will know, contributory-based benefits will still exist after universal credit comes into place, but income-related JSA and income-related ESA will be taken in with universal credit.
891. The schedule includes regulation-making powers to determine how much someone may be paid if they are entitled to universal credit and the contributory-based benefits, the treatment of earnings in those benefits, and how we will manage the relationship between the work-related conditionality and sanction regimes that apply to both benefits. Therefore, it is to try and simplify that relationship.
892. In schedule 5, universal credit is attempting to simplify the benefits landscape, but it does not replace all the existing benefits as I have already said. Paragraph 2 of the schedule allows regulations to be made where someone is entitled to universal credit and the contributory benefits. In those situations, it will be important for us to ensure that people are paid the right amount of benefit in the most straightforward way.
893. We intend to deliver new claims for the contributory benefits on the same IT system as universal credit. Under powers in this schedule, we can reduce the contributory payment where the person would be entitled to universal credit, so it is to avoid the overlapping benefit rules. From the claimants’ point of view, the amount of payment will be the same. They will not really notice any difference. It will be whichever is the higher element, whether it is the - contributory-based benefit or universal credit, that is what the claimant will get.

894. There is provision there to allow us to make regulations so that a sanction relating to the award of universal credit can be applied to the award of a contributory benefit and vice versa, and for sanctions relating to the award of one contributory benefit to be applied to the other contributory benefit. Those powers are needed to ensure that claimants cannot avoid a sanction in cases where they move from one benefit to the other.
895. We plan to take forward the current policy that applies in JSA and ESA so that, where a sanction is applied to a contributory benefit, it does not lead to a concomitant increase in the amount of universal credit, so that the claimant does not benefit because they are sanctioned and their universal credit automatically goes up because their JSA has gone down.
896. Paragraph 4 enables claimants who are sanctioned while on a contributory benefit to be able to apply for universal credit hardship payments. Contributory benefit claimants who are sanctioned and face hardship will first have to apply for and be awarded universal credit. The sanction that applied to their contributory benefit will then be applied to their universal credit award to ensure that they do not avoid the sanction. There will be no separate contributory benefit hardship payments. That is effectively the same position as under the current JSA regime where hardship payments are reduced payments of income-based JSA.
897. Finally, paragraphs 5 and 6 of the schedule amend the rules for calculating earnings in contributory JSA and ESA so that they are consistent with the tapering arrangements in universal credit.
898. Mr Brady: In the explanatory and financial memorandum, it states:
“ESA and JSA will continue to be available as contributory benefits.”
899. When JSA was introduced, it cut the period of entitlement for the contributory benefit from roughly 312 days down to six months. That is already in place. The ESA contributory benefit will only last for a year.
900. Ms M Campbell: Michael will talk about that later.
901. Mr Brady: That is one of the things that people are not aware of. People talk about all these people who are “scroungers”, but if someone who is working now and becomes sick in the morning, they will only get the benefit of 30 years’ contributions paid for one year.
902. Ms M Campbell: That is correct.
903. Mr Brady: People simply are not aware of that. You are confirming that that will be the case on the universal credit.
904. Ms M Campbell: Yes. Michael will talk about those provisions later.
905. Mr Copeland: On the previous occasion, we heard that the social fund had discretionary payments and that those discretionary payments could continue to be exercised until the money runs out. Is this hardship fund subject to any limitations to what would be available? Is it ring-fenced, or will it match need?
906. Ms M Campbell: It will match need.
907. Clause 37 introduces schedule 6, which enables the Department to bring forward regulations to cover some of the more detailed arrangements for migration to universal credit. The clause sets out the legislative framework for the move from the existing benefits and tax credits to universal credit. The schedule makes it clear that regulations can ensure that benefit and tax credit claimants are not worse off in cash terms simply through moving to the new system. It also deals generally with the arrangements for migration. As you will appreciate, it is a huge change, involving around 500,000 existing benefit and tax credit claims, which will translate into around 300,000 universal credit awards. The reason for the difference is that, obviously, there is double counting in there, because

- the man, to use that example of one half of the couple, could be claiming jobseeker's allowance and his partner could be claiming tax credits. There would be two claims in the one house, so this would bring it down to one claim.
908. Although we would like to move people to the new system as quickly as possible, it is a major undertaking, and it is appropriate for the transition to be conducted carefully. The schedule provides some very practical powers for handling claims in a sensible and logical fashion that will ensure that the transition is as smooth as possible for the claimant and that they are basically none the wiser. Paragraph 1 of the schedule sets out a general power to make regulations and define some key terms. It brings within the scope of the regulations prescribed benefits in addition to those that are abolished by the Bill. This is necessary so that we can deal with any interactions with other benefits that people may be receiving when they transfer over.
909. Paragraphs 2 and 3 of the schedule deal first with claims procedures either side of the date on which universal credit goes live, referred to as the "appointed day". We do not want a claim to fail just because someone has claimed the wrong benefit on the wrong day, so we need to be able to treat claims for existing benefits as claims for universal credits and vice versa. There also needs to be scope to make an advance award of universal credit ahead of the appointed day and a retrospective award for an existing benefit after the appointed day. Paragraph 3 also allows for migration to universal credit to be controlled by phasing. Margaret is in charge of the migration strategy, so she will talk about that in a minute.
910. As I said, clearly, we cannot convert all of the awards in one go. It will take a number of years, between October 2013, when we go live, and, we estimate, 2017, before everyone is migrated over. During that period, existing claimants will move on to universal credit in one of two ways. The first is that, if, at any time, their circumstances change and they would have moved to a different benefit or tax credit under the current system, they will move onto universal credit at that point. Secondly, if they do not move on to universal credit as a result of a change of circumstances, they will do so in what is called natural migration, so they will be part of a planned migration that will take place between April 2014 and 2017. A key principle is that people will not be able to volunteer to move on to the new system before they are due to move, hence the provisions enabling various exclusions from universal credit. Once they go on to universal credit, they will not be able to switch back to the old benefits.
911. Paragraph 4 of schedule 6 deals with the conversion of existing awards, the processes that are involved and the amount of the award. We have given an assurance that no one will lose out as a direct result of the change to universal credit, and we will ensure that this happens by providing cash protection to households where the universal credit entitlement is less than the entitlement under the old system. That transitional protection will last for as long as there is no change of circumstances.
912. Paragraph 5 deals with the transitional treatment of work-related requirements and sanctions. Requirements and sanctions made in respect of a legacy benefit may be transferred to universal credit. However, provision is also made for sanctions temporarily not to be applied for the purposes of the transition or, in the case of work-related requirements, to be removed. The transition from the current tax credit system will need to be handled very carefully, especially because of the current delay between provisional award notice and finalisation. We are considering how best to handle that transition. Paragraph 6 of the schedule may be used to align certain tax credit rules more closely in order to facilitate that change and make it easier for the claimant. It also allows for the overpayment of tax credits to be treated as overpayment of universal credit.

913. Paragraph 7 of the schedule provides for regulations that will allow those transitional protections to operate even if there is a gap in entitlement that would otherwise mean that they could not be used.
914. That is basically it. To sum up, we are intending to use the powers in the schedule in a practical, sensible way that will smooth the transition for claimants. Chair, if you like, Margaret will say a wee bit about migration.
915. Ms Margaret Stitt (Social Security Agency): Thanks, Martina. I will try to keep it at a fairly high level.
916. There are three ways that you can move on to universal credit. You can make a fresh claim, you can move across under a natural migration, which I will explain in a wee minute, or you can move across under a managed migration.
917. Basically, a fresh claim can be made by anyone who would have ordinarily claimed, for example, jobseeker's allowance but who will have to make a claim for universal credit because jobseeker's allowance will no longer be available after a particular date in the process. As Martina has explained, universal credit is a household payment. So, if one member of the household who ordinarily claimed JSA moves across to universal credit and their partner is in receipt of, for example, tax credits or employment and support allowance, the whole household will move across to universal credit. So, that deals with new claims.
918. Natural migration will happen in cases where there is a change of circumstances that involves the recalculation of a benefit. For example, if another child were born into a household, there would be a claim for universal credit and the whole household would move across to universal credit.
919. The third way you can move across is through a managed migration, which Martina explained. That will happen in cases where there has not been a new claim to universal credit or a change of circumstances that has involved a recalculation of benefit. The Department has to move customers across by the final date, which, at the minute, is around October 2017. The intention is that migration will start in October 2013 and will run for a four-year period. In NI, we are still working on our launch approach and our migration approach.
920. I will say something about the GB situation just to give you an idea of what is happening there. It has agreed on a phased approach. We are likely to go with a phased approach as well, because it is safer. GB will start off fairly slowly. It has certain percentages calculated. I think that it is going to do it on a geographical basis in October 2013. It will then roll that out over a period of months. It is going to start with jobseeker's allowance and then move on to tax credits, both child tax credits and working tax credits, followed by income support, employment support allowance and housing benefit.
921. That was the migration at a very high level. I am happy to take any questions.
922. The Chairperson: Thanks for that, Margaret.
923. Mr F McCann: You broke it down into a fresh claim, managed migration and natural migration, but how will the whole process work in reality? Will people be moved across in alphabetical order? How do you choose the first claims to go across?
924. Ms Stitt: We have not yet worked out the detail of that. At the minute, I can tell you that GB is using a geographical approach; it has picked certain regions within what would have been fresh claims to JSA. We are still working through the process of ours.
925. Mr F McCann: I think that you said that any break in benefits — you mentioned a child being born — would automatically move people over to universal credit. Maybe I have just picked this up wrong. You talked about a family unit coming in under universal credit. Say there are five people: a mother, a father and three children all

- aged over 18. I take it that the three over-18s do not count?
926. Ms Stitt: No, they do not.
927. Mr F McCann: They go for individual claims.
928. Ms Stitt: Obviously, there is a household, and there could be different benefit units within that household. There are some exceptions, but, generally speaking, it would be mother, father and children up to the age of 18.
929. Mr F McCann: I take it that there will be non-dependant allowances? That will have an effect on the overall benefit.
930. Ms Stitt: Yes, it will. Universal credit is one payment, but, as Martina said, there are various components and elements to that. They will all come into it.
931. Mr G Campbell: What you said about the regional basis was very clear. As I understand it, they will start with, say, JSA in the north-west of England or wherever. I understood a phased basis to mean that, gradually, people would be migrated across, but I got the impression from your assessment of the regional basis that that meant, for example, that the north-west of England would all be transferred across. It would not see a phased basis; it would be done immediately.
932. Ms Stitt: There are, I think, six regions in GB, and they are going to take a small amount in each of those geographical areas and run them at the same time. So, if they decide, for example, that they will go with 20% of the workload, they will take individual caseloads in those areas that will make up the 20%. That will probably roll out for six months. So, they will take particular areas in each of the six regions all at the one time, and then, the following month, it will be another area from each of the six regions.
933. Mr G Campbell: That is clear enough now. However, given Northern Ireland's size, are you contemplating —
934. Ms Stitt: We are looking at variations. We are still developing those models at the minute.
935. Mr G Campbell: Is it likely that you will break down Northern Ireland on a regional basis and do the same here on a micro level?
936. Ms Stitt: At this point, we have not yet made any decisions on that. We are working through various options. You could do it on a geographical basis; that is just one way to do it.
937. Mr G Campbell: I would have thought that the scale in GB would be significantly larger than ours; about 30 times larger. Each of its six regions is probably larger than Northern Ireland.
938. Ms Stitt: They are; yes, indeed.
939. Mr G Campbell: But they are not contemplating going to a subregional level, are they?
940. Ms Stitt: No. Well, sorry, they are going to a subregional level in that they will take a percentage within each of those regions and those will build up. We could do the same, but it would be on a smaller scale. You have to bear in mind that the staff that we would have to deal with those would be on the same scale as the staff they have to deal with their cases.
941. Mr Douglas: I think it says somewhere here — I cannot find it — that universal credit can be awarded without the claimant actually applying for it. Can you give us an example of that?
942. Ms M Campbell: No. [Laughter.]
943. Ms Stitt: The only thing that I can think of is where we manage a migration across. That is what I think it is, but we can certainly check that point for you.
944. Mr Pollock: That would be when there has been a claim for an existing benefit and that is migrated across.
945. Mr Douglas: Would the claimant know?
946. Ms Stitt: There will be a publicity campaign, and so on.

947. Ms M Campbell: They will be notified, but they will probably not have to do anything.
948. Mr Douglas: It sounds too easy, does it not?
949. Ms Stitt: It is not easy.
950. Ms M Campbell: It is not.
951. Mr G Campbell: Famous last words.
952. The Chairperson: It is on a need-to-know basis, Sammy.
953. Mr Brady: You mentioned that it will be jobseeker's allowance initially, then tax credits, then income support, etc, and that it will be run on a phased basis. We have been told that the IT system could not cope with different changes, but presumably there will be two IT systems running in parallel.
954. Ms Stitt: There will be; yes.
955. Mr Brady: So, obviously there is a facility in the IT system to accommodate that. You will have phased benefits, so some people will get jobseeker's allowance initially and then move to universal credit but other people will still get income support, ESA and so on. How will that work?
956. Ms Stitt: They will run down the old system as they build up the new system, so two systems will be running at the same time.
957. Mr Brady: There will still be a period of about four years when there are two systems.
958. Ms Stitt: Yes.
959. Mr Brady: The impression that the Department for Work and Pensions gave us is that this IT system will be super-duper, that there will be flaws, and that it could not accommodate changes. However, it is obvious that changes will be accommodated for at least four years.
960. Ms Stitt: I am not sure that they are changes. What we are doing is running two systems in tandem, which we do when we introduce any new benefit.
961. Mr Brady: But not on the same scale as this, it has to be said.
962. Ms Stitt: No; absolutely not.
963. Mr Copeland: Martina, I want to talk about clause 38. I think that we have got that far. There is a curious term: "capability for work-related activity".
964. Ms M Campbell: I am about to start talking about that.
965. Mr Copeland: Oh, we have not got that far yet.
966. Ms M Campbell: No.
967. I cannot remember whether I said in relation to the last clause that we will bring regulations on migration forward to the Committee. There will be another opportunity to discuss all that.
968. Clause 38 allows us to continue to use the work-capability assessment when determining whether a claimant has limited capability for work and, if so, whether they also have limited capability for work-related activity, which would be work prep or work-focused interviews. The determination of a claimant's capability for work following a work-capability assessment determines their work-related requirements and eligibility for an additional element within universal credit. Those who are unable to work because of the effects of a disability or health condition will be entitled to a higher amount of universal credit based on their capability for work. Similar to the current system, they will be allocated to either the work-related activity group or the support group. The work-capability assessment assesses individuals' functional ability to work rather than assuming that a health condition or disability is automatically a barrier to work. We know that work is generally good for people, including disabled people and those with health conditions. So, although we remain committed to supporting those who cannot work, we want to help as many people as possible to return to work.
969. In his first independent review of the work-capability assessment,

- Professor Harrington concluded that it is the right process to use but it is not currently working as effectively as it could. We have endorsed that review fully and implemented all of the recommendations from the first report. Improving the work-capability assessment is not a static process, so Professor Harrington has undertaken a second review. Of the 23 recommendations made in that review, 12 have been fully implemented, and work is ongoing to implement the remaining 11.
970. A call for evidence for his third review was carried out between 14 August and 14 September 2012. Work is ongoing on consultation on the descriptors for customers with mental health conditions, cancer or fluctuating pain conditions. Professor Harrington will report back before the end of the year. We look forward to the outcome of that review. That concludes my explanation.
971. Mr Copeland: Forgive me for this, Martina, but there appears to be a sort of a change in paragraph 190, where it describes:
- “limited capability for work-related activity owing to a physical or mental condition.”*
972. The current system actually allows for a physical and/or mental condition because, in many cases, the physical condition could be variable, as could the mental condition. The combination of the two conditions limits capability for work. If the language is correct, that appears to limit it to a physical or mental condition. Is that an actual projected outcome from this or is it just the way in which it has been worded? Do you follow what I mean?
973. Ms M Campbell: Yes, I see what you mean, but I do not think that is the intention. The intention would be as it is now, which is to include physical and/or mental conditions. It does not have to be both.
974. Mr Copeland: Could you try to get that put into the language?
975. Ms M Campbell: We can get that changed.
976. The Chairperson: You are reading from the explanatory notes. Is it in the Bill?
977. Ms M Campbell: It would be in regulations anyway.
978. Mr Copeland: We have not seen those yet. It could mean a significant change for a large number of people.
979. Ms M Campbell: Is it “or” in the Bill as well, Colm?
980. Mr Copeland: Is “and/or” in it?
981. Mr Pollock: No, just “or”. I do not think that we would see a problem with “and/or”.
982. Ms M Campbell: I will have a look at lunchtime to see whether I have the DWP work-capability regulations with me and check that for you.
983. Mr Copeland: OK. Thank you for that.
984. Ms M Campbell: Clause 39 puts beyond any doubt that information collected by the Department for all aspects of universal credit is social security information. So, it is really about data-sharing, in a way. In making legislation for work-related benefits, such as income support, employment and support allowance and jobseeker’s allowance, the Department recognised that it needed to obtain and use information that did not solely relate to the benefit itself. So, for example, people coming in for work-focused interviews may tell you that they have caring responsibilities that the adviser may not necessarily be aware of. So, it is about making sure that the adviser gets the whole picture.
985. The simplicity of the provision makes it clear that all information supplied when determining a person’s ability and capability for work or as part of the conditionality regime is to be treated as social security information. I do not think that any of us would doubt that financial, family and home information supplied for the purposes of universal credit is social security information. However, it is sometimes questioned whether all of the information supplied in a claimant's everyday dealings with the Department is social security information. As I said, information collected at a work-focused interview that relates predominantly to employment or health-related information supplied during a work-capability assessment might not immediately be considered as social security information. So, the Department's powers enable it to use information based around its core interest, particularly social security. It is crucial to ensure that all information supplied during the process is considered to be owned by the Department. Without this clause, there could be doubt about how this information could be shared. It might not be possible to share the information with partners who provide professional services for work-related matters, and it might not be possible to use the information to determine the effectiveness of departmental policy or to design new policy or processes. So, that is about collecting statistical information to use in identifying the consequences of policy changes.

986. This provision is nothing new. The Department already has legislation making exactly the same provisions for income support, employment and support allowance and jobseeker's allowance. However, that legislation is specific to those benefits, so we cannot use that information, and we need to make it an even playing field. That is my explanation of that clause.
987. The Chairperson: OK, Martina, thank you. No members have indicated, so I am happy for us to move on to clause 40.
988. Ms M Campbell: Clause 40 defines what is understood as a couple for the purposes of universal credit. As I said, the couple is one of the fundamental units of the universal credit system. We intend to carry over the existing definition used for current income-related benefits, so couples are defined as a husband and wife, civil partners who are members of the same household, or two people living together as if they were spouses or civil partners. That definition hinges on the couple being members of the same household. Universal credit will be assessed against the total income and capital of both members. It will be payable to them jointly. Couples who maintain separate households and who are not merely temporarily living apart are not considered as couples and will be able to claim as individuals.

989. There may be circumstances where it is appropriate to consider two people as not being a couple, or for them to be considered part — or not part — of the same household for the purposes of universal credit. Those instances are not common. A member of a couple will only be treated as a single person in the narrow circumstances where their partner would not meet some of the basic conditions. An example is where the claimant's partner is abroad and the absence is not treated as a temporary one, or, indeed, where the claimant's partner is in prison.
990. It is essential to define couples in order to be able to assess pay and apply conditionality within this system. That completes my explanation.
991. Mr Brady: Flexibility is often used in relation to this matter. The definition of a couple is really two people living in the same household, and you mentioned civil partnerships. In my experience, which goes back a long time, there are people living in the same household whom the Department assumes are a couple but, in fact, they are not. It is quite difficult for them to prove that they are not actually living together. They share the same household, but they want to claim benefits separately. It becomes even more complicated when there is a couple whose marriage or partnership has broken down and, human nature being what it is, one of them does not want to move out or whatever. It is quite difficult. Will there be any difference in the approach? That has been problematic. You mentioned that it does not happen that often, but, in my experience, it happens fairly often. I just wonder whether there will - be an approach as to how that definition of a couple may be addressed. For a lot of people, it is problematic. I have seen appeals in the past where two people are living in the same house and, because it is a man and a woman, usually, the Department assumes that they are a couple, but they are not. That can be quite difficult to prove. There is an opportunity in the definition to address that situation and have that flexibility built in. It can be difficult for people to prove that they are not a couple. There used to be legal separation, and that was accepted because people had gone through legal procedures. There is also divorce, obviously. However, people who are no longer a couple but are still in the same household may not want to claim as a single unit.

992. Ms M Campbell: I imagine the proposal is that the same methods of ascertaining a couple will apply, but we will take your point back and feed it through to the guidance writers.
993. Mr Brady: I am bringing it up at this point because there is always an assumption — wrongly, in some cases — that they are a couple. That can cause difficulty because the Department is starting from the premise that you have to prove otherwise. That can sometimes be quite difficult.
994. Mr Douglas: Martina, somebody raised a point with me at the weekend that I had not considered. What happens in the case of a foreign national or migrant worker who, for example, has two wives?
995. Ms M Campbell: I have the answer to that somewhere here. I will come back to you on that, Mr Douglas. I have the answer to that but I cannot find it at the moment. We do not recognise polygamy or multiple wives.
996. Mr G Campbell: Or husbands.
997. Ms M Campbell: Indeed. I do not think that it applies to husbands. Only the man gets the choice.
998. I have found the answer. Universal credit will not include special rules for polygamous marriages. It will treat the polygamous husband and one wife as a couple. Other spouses will have to make separate claims in their own right and will be required to satisfy the standard conditionality requirements, including residency.
999. Mr G Campbell: It is make your mind up time then? [Laughter.]
1000. Ms M Campbell: It certainly is.
1001. The Chairperson: We will move on.
1002. Ms M Campbell: Clause 41 is about interpretation and defines some of the key terms used in the universal credit clauses. It just brings together in one place terms used frequently throughout the Bill and, hopefully, makes the legislation easier to understand.
1003. Clause 42 allows the Department to set up and run pilot schemes for the purpose of testing the application of universal credit and the extent of the impact of its provisions. Mr Douglas asked earlier about monitoring and evaluation, and, as part of a monitoring and evaluation programme, the Department might choose to use a pilot scheme to test, for example, a different taper rate. There has been some talk in the past about regional benefit rates, and a pilot scheme could test those. However, the purpose of the pilot scheme has to satisfy one of three conditions. It has to make universal credit simpler to understand or administer; help people remain in work, obtain work or increase their pay or hours; or affect the behaviour of claimants or others. Under this clause, pilot schemes will, in the first instance, be limited to three years, although that could be extended, and they may apply only to a limited number of people, as suggested by the term “pilot”. Regulations under this clause will be subject to the affirmative resolution procedure, and members will get a chance to debate and discuss those fully.
1004. Mr Brady: Surely the whole notion of parity means that there should not be different regional benefit rates.

1005. Ms M Campbell: The coalition Government have mentioned the question of regional benefit rates frequently and, indeed, regional pay for the Civil Service. There are no plans at the moment to introduce regional benefit rates, but that clause will give the Department the power to operate a small pilot to test how that would work.
1006. Mr Brady: So, technically, there could be a change in parity if that were introduced. When I was in the Civil Service many years ago, there was an issue around the Imperial Civil Service, because people who worked for it and were based in Belfast got paid more.
1007. Ms M Campbell: They still do.
1008. Mr Brady: They also got time off for stress. That was a big issue because people here were, presumably, experiencing the same stress but were not getting that kind of leave or as much money. Therefore, there have been regional variations. However, you are suggesting that there may be changes both in the regional pay structure and, possibly, in the benefits, which would kind of blow the parity argument out of the water.
1009. Ms M Campbell: Yes, but it would be parity with the rest of the UK. People in London, for example, would have a higher rate of benefit than people in Merthyr Tydfil or wherever.
1010. The Chairperson: We do not need to argue the ins and outs of it. We just need to understand what the provision is supposed to do and what the clause covers. We can argue the rights and wrongs of it another time.
1011. Mr Brady: It was just to clarify that point.
1012. The Chairperson: I appreciate that, and it is important to do that.
1013. Ms M Campbell: It is not usual for Northern Ireland to carry out pilots because, generally, DWP does the pilots and we, generally, follow suit.
1014. Mr Brady: Logically, you could argue that, if parity is parity and, comparing like with like, we should have a pilot scheme.
1015. Ms M Campbell: Yes, but there is a great cost. Therefore, you have to take the cost of running a pilot into consideration, and the commensurate effort.
1016. Mr Copeland: If they are indeed considering regional rates of benefit, are they also considering regional rates of contribution?
1017. Ms M Campbell: No; I would not have thought so.
1018. Mr F McCann: I think that a pilot scheme was run in 2007 or 2008 when there were changes to housing benefit. A local housing allowance was going to be introduced here and there was some argument at that time that there were variances in other regions. If we were to run a pilot here, how would you decide where it would be held and how many people it would involve? Would you look at running a pilot scheme when the underoccupancy rules come in?
1019. Ms M Campbell: There are no plans to run any pilot schemes. As I said, it would be very unusual for Northern Ireland to run its own pilot, simply because of cost and commensurate effort. At the end of the day, it is a matter of the protection of the public purse.
1020. Mr Pollock: There is the timing as well. To run a worthwhile pilot, you have to decide what you are trying to find out and what the differences are. As Martina said, DWP has run a raft of different pilots across the UK. Unless we could point to a situation where we would learn something materially different, it would not be worth investing in a Northern Ireland-specific pilot. Indeed, we would not have the lead time to determine or discern what you would find out from it. You would have to set it up and monitor it over a period. By that time, the changes will have happened.
1021. Mr F McCann: We are talking about the possibility of regional variations. The impact of that would be different here than in other places. I go back - to the local housing allowance. They actually waited a year and then tested out the local housing allowance in a pilot scheme in some places here. That was about three or four years ago. I am just trying to work out how that would impact.

1022. Mr Pollock: I remember something around the introduction of local housing allowance, but it predates all of us here. Colm would be the only one who would remember that, and his memory has gone. [Laughter.] He did not actually work on the housing side. We can look at the introduction of the local housing allowance, but I am not sure whether there was a pilot as such.
1023. Mr F McCann: As Mickey said, why is it in there if you are never going to use it?
1024. Ms M Campbell: It just gives you the flexibility. Any pilot that would be run would be brought before the Committee by virtue of the fact that regulations would have to be made to allow us to run it. It is simply to give the Department the power. It is like a couple of other instances that I talked about earlier. It is included for efficiency purposes, because otherwise we would have to bring a piece of primary legislation forward and take up Assembly time. However, if we put it in now, it is there and, although it may never be used, it gives us that flexibility and allows for efficient use of Members' time.
1025. Mr Douglas: Martina, there is reference to affecting the behaviour of claimants or others. This is meant to simplify the system, but I assume that it is also about sanctions.
1026. Ms M Campbell: Yes, it is.
1027. Mr Douglas: Who are the "others"?
1028. Ms M Campbell: "Others" could refer to the partners.
1029. Mr Douglas: OK.
1030. Mr Copeland: Going back to pilot schemes, presumably DWP carries out pilot schemes in the rest of GB, whether it is in Scotland, Wales or England. Presumably, it must find some value in those schemes. Does a pilot scheme give an accurate indication of the likely outcomes in Northern Ireland, given that, as we have heard, there are regional variations? Are people in Northern Ireland affected positively or adversely by information and changes that take place based on pilot schemes in the rest of GB? We know we are different here. Surely, that is the responsibility of DWP, even though the actual thing has been devolved. DWP is not running pilot schemes for the sake of it: they must be of some use and they must be capable of yielding some information.
1031. Mr Pollock: Any of the pilot schemes that DWP is running would be closely monitored when it comes to the population cohort that they are looking at. Any of the findings from those schemes would be extended to the UK as a whole. So, if there were a scheme running in London on housing, you would expect people in the likes of Scotland, Northern Ireland, Wales and everybody else to say, "The findings from that do not stack up because London housing costs have a premium. You cannot extrapolate and apply the findings from such a scheme directly here". The findings of the pilot schemes are closely monitored from a statistical standpoint. What population of claimants does the cohort represent? Could the findings be extrapolated from a statistically valid perspective?
1032. Mr Copeland: An example is disability living allowance, for which there is a much higher uptake in Northern Ireland than elsewhere in UK. There are reasons for that, given our recent history. What does DWP use the information from the schemes for? It is not doing it for the sake of it, so there must be some purpose to the pilot schemes.
1033. Mr Pollock: Yes.
1034. Mr Copeland: What is it?
1035. Ms M Campbell: An integral part of monitoring any benefits system or any policy is learning, evaluating and checking down the line whether the

- originally intended policy outcomes are being met and whether a little tweak to the system — as Mr Douglas said, perhaps around sanctions — is needed. Before you go to the effort of bringing in regulations or perhaps primary legislation, you test that by means of a pilot. Good policymaking is always backed up and evidence based.
1036. Mr Copeland: How would we achieve that outcome in Northern Ireland?
1037. Ms M Campbell: You would take the learning from the DWP pilot, look at its impacts, match that to the population cohort here and consider the different circumstances that are operating here. You would do that in an equality impact assessment. In housing, for example, DWP is running six demonstration projects on direct payment, including one in Scotland. We are not running similar projects here because our circumstances are obviously different. However, the Minister has commissioned a number of pieces of research.
1038. Mr Copeland: Our Minister?
1039. Ms M Campbell: Yes. Our Minister has commissioned research on housing. I think he mentioned that yesterday when he launched the housing strategy. We are expecting the results of some of that research before the end of the year. That will help to inform some more of the policy development on housing.
1040. Mr Copeland: So, in fact, we will take the DWP statistics that have been gathered from a pile of projects, use those for analytical purposes, but apply regional factors to them.
1041. Ms M Campbell: Yes. Our statisticians have a DWP model that is based on the various information that has been gathered from, for example, the family resources survey and other survey tools. We will feed all that information into a software programme, and it will churn out the Northern Ireland impact.
1042. The Chairperson: This is a clause that enables the Department to do that by way of regulations. The efficacy or otherwise is a discussion for another day.
1043. Mr G Campbell: Is there any way of accessing the conclusions that have been drawn from what has been done in GB?
1044. Ms M Campbell: I think that there has been an interim learning report. I will check whether that it is public. If it is not, we will certainly be happy to bring that to the Committee once it becomes public.
1045. The Chairperson: We will move on to clause 43.
1046. Ms M Campbell: Clause 43 explains how the regulation-making powers in this Part of the Bill may be exercised. It allows for regulations to make different provisions for different cases. It explains that where regulations provide for an amount, that amount may be zero. It also allows for regulations to provide for different amounts depending on whether the claimant is single or in a couple, and according to age. That is in line with the current structure for existing benefits.
1047. With your permission, Chair, I will move on to clause 44, because the clauses are related.
1048. The Chairperson: OK.
1049. Ms M Campbell: Clause 44 provides for the procedure by which the Assembly will control the making of the regulations. The universal credit regulations will, in the main, follow the more common form of control, namely negative resolution. That follows the conventional approach to delegated legislation in this area. However, we have accepted that regulations that introduce new concepts into the benefit system should be subject to confirmatory procedure in the first instance. That will apply to the first set of regulations in each of the cases identified. Those are as follows: claimant commitment; capital limits; income to be deducted; the standard allowance; the children and young person's element; the housing costs element; other needs and circumstances, such as the childcare element; the work availability requirement; claimants subject to no work-related requirements; sanctions;

- hardship payments; calculation of capital and income; migration, which I mentioned earlier; and pilot schemes.
1050. All those regulations will be brought before the Committee and will be made by confirmatory procedure in the first instance. That is because the detail of the policy will be in the regulations, and because we recognise that Members are likely to have a number of concerns about those areas. That will ensure that there is a debate six months after the regulations have been introduced, allowing for a bedding-in period. We will then know how well the regulations are working. Obviously, it will also maintain flexibility for us to amend the legislation in the future in order to respond to changes, as I said, without disproportionate demands on the Assembly and Members' time.
1051. The Chairperson: Are members content with that explanation of clauses 43 and 44?
1052. Mr Brady: You can have a debate six months after the regulations are introduced, but is it likely that they will be changed?
1053. Ms M Campbell: That would depend on the outcome of the debate.
1054. Mr Brady: Realistically, it is paying lip service. You have to be cynical about these things. I cannot imagine them changing it. If universal credit does not work, full stop, are they going to change it? I do not think so.
1055. Mr Copeland: If I understood you correctly, six months after the introduction of universal credit —
1056. Ms M Campbell: Sorry; the debate can take place up to six months after the introduction.
1057. Mr Copeland: Having established that this is a sort of rolling process, how many of those likely to be affected ultimately will have been affected?
1058. Ms M Campbell: All new claims will be affected. Then, you are into the managed migration —
1059. Ms Stitt: Natural migration.
1060. Ms M Campbell: Natural migration people. They are people who have had a change of circumstances.
1061. Mr Copeland: I am just wondering —
1062. Ms M Campbell: I do not have the numbers at this stage.
1063. Mr Pollock: I do not think that we could quantify it.
1064. Mr Copeland: Could we get those?
1065. Ms M Campbell: It is not finalised yet.
1066. Ms Stitt: We have not finalised the launch or the migration approach yet.
1067. Ms M Campbell: We might get that closer to the end of the Committee Stage process, although I cannot promise that.
1068. Mr Copeland: Might it be better to extend the six months to a longer period to give us a better notion of what the ultimate effects will be?
1069. Ms M Campbell: I think that the rules under Assembly procedures is that it is up to six months.
1070. Mr Pollock: The legislative protocol is that it is within six months of the regulations. Some of the regulations will not necessarily be commenced on D-day in respect of universal credit.
1071. The Chairperson: It could be a year later. The operative thing for us is that, once it is introduced, it is then subject to debate for confirmatory resolution. That is what the clause does.
1072. Mr F McCann: Once the changes start to be made, you could have a considerable number of people being paid at one rate, and the rest being paid at another rate. There is an unfair balance there over the four-year period that takes you from the start to the finish.
1073. The Chairperson: I understand that comment. It relates to the phasing in, and all of that, which clearly requires a separate discussion. As the officials - have heard, members have concerns about how you will do that: whether it will be regionally, sub-regionally, broken up, thematically or whatever. We do not have those answers. Those are concerns, and members are right to put them on the table.

1074. Mr Pollock: It may help to clarify that it will be every housing benefit claimant or every JSA claimant within a region. It will not be a case of me and Colm, for example, both being on JSA or whatever but getting different rates at different times. All of those will be migrated across at the one time.
1075. Mr F McCann: All new claims and all claims in which there has been a change of circumstances will be paid at the universal credit rate. However, it might take the rest of the people four years to get to that stage, so there will be different rates of pay.
1076. Mr Pollock: My circumstances as a JSA claimant would be roughly comparable to Colm's as a JSA claimant and to someone else's as a JSA claimant. It is that population that you have to try to migrate across.
1077. Mr F McCann: But they would still be paid at different rates.
1078. Mr Brady: Can you clarify something? You mentioned the changeover starting with jobseeker's allowance and income support coming at the end. What happens to someone who is on jobseeker's allowance and income support when one is changed initially?
1079. Ms Stitt: When you move to universal credit, everything moves across.
1080. Mr Brady: That is all that I wanted clarified: you will not have to wait.
1081. Ms Stitt: No; it will be one universal credit payment.
1082. The Chairperson: Any new circumstances in the household will trigger the entirety.
1083. Ms Stitt: Any new circumstances that involve a recalculation of the benefit.
1084. Mr Douglas: Martina, you mentioned the pilot areas in the previous discussion. You mentioned sanctions and used the word "tweak". Would a tweak be subject to confirmatory resolution? Define a "tweak".
1085. Ms M Campbell: In the first instance, the regulations to ask for the pilot to be carried out would be subject to confirmatory resolution. Then, if the pilot worked and we decided, for example, that for the third strike in the sanction, instead of disallowing benefit for three years, or whatever, we would reduce that to one year, those regulations to amend the sanctions would be subject to negative resolution because we have already discussed the high-level policy detail. The regulations to carry out the pilot in the first instance would be subject to confirmatory resolution, but any tweak arising out of that would more than likely be made by the normal negative resolution, because it is only a small change.
1086. The Chairperson: It is conceivable to amend clause 44 or 43 if you so wish to make it subject to confirmatory resolution, for example. It can be amended.
1087. Mr Douglas: There is that option; OK. Thank you.
1088. Ms M Campbell: That completes my section.
1089. The Chairperson: Sorry, Mickey; did you want in again?
1090. Mr Brady: No; I am just starting to twitch. [Laughter.]
1091. The Chairperson: We have completed clause 44, which takes us to the end of Part 1.
1092. Ms M Campbell: That is all of the universal credit aspect.
1093. The Chairperson: At this very timely juncture, I propose that we suspend the meeting and come back at 1.00 pm. We will resume with Part 2, which deals with working-age benefits, starting at clause 45.

Committee suspended.

On resuming —

1094. The Chairperson: We are now into Part 2, which deals with working-age benefits. We will start on clause 45.
1095. Ms M Campbell: Chair, before you start, I will provide some clarification on the work capability assessment, which I promised I would check. In the DWP regulations that are published, the clarification is that it is bodily, mental, disease, illness or disablement or a combination of any.
1096. The Chairperson: Kevin, please give us a quick recap.
1097. The Committee Clerk: Just a quick overview of 31 to 44; the issues that have been raised, the questions asked and the answers given. Clearer wording is required in clause 31 in respect of good reason and clarity is required on grounds on which to appeal. A question was asked about whether guidance would be given in relation to good reason, and the point was made that guidance should be shared among decision-makers. The Committee asked to see the guidance when it is produced, and the Department agreed to follow this up with SSA.
1098. On clause 32, Mr Durkan raised the issue of underoccupancy. I will go back and have a look at the tape to get more detail on that. I think that the Department said that it would come back on that issue in respect of clause 32. On clause 33, Mr Campbell raised the making of statutory rules when the change was much greater than anticipated. The question was: where does that leave the Committee? The Department replied that, among other things, that should be picked up by the equality screening process.
1099. On clause 34, a key issue was raised about fraud and error. For example, would it be possible to compare fraud and error in the second year under universal credit with current rates? The Department said that that should be possible. The head of policy on fraud and error will be briefing the Committee in a few weeks on this. Monitoring evaluation will take place as a matter of course. Also on clause 34, Mr Copeland raised the issue of a person who finds themselves over a certain eligibility threshold for a claim; about the 75p and —
1100. Ms M Campbell: Yes, the underlying entitlement.
1101. The Committee Clerk: On clause 35, confirmation was given that housing credit is the same as housing benefit.
1102. Ms M Campbell: Yes.
1103. The Committee Clerk: It was asked whether the perhaps unusual questions on the current forms would stay the same.
1104. Ms M Campbell: We tried to clarify that at lunchtime. We are more or less certain that the questions will be the same. Those questions will continue. We will come back on that.
1105. The Committee Clerk: The point was made about clause 36 that, despite potentially many years of payment, ESA will be paid for only one year. There was concern about that. There was also confirmation that the hardship fund will match need. On clause 37, there was discussion around how migration will work. For example, could it work on a regional basis here? The answer is yes, but the process has yet to be decided on. There was an acknowledgement from the Department that the current and new IT systems will operate concurrently for a while after the introduction of universal credit. Some clarity was required on when universal credit can be awarded without a claimant applying. I think that that was the question that Mr Douglas raised. I am not entirely sure if there was a —
1106. Ms M Campbell: I think that is where they are migrated over. There would not be a need for — 1107. The Committee Clerk: You have just clarified the next point in relation to clause 38, which concerns physical and mental health conditions. Clarity was asked for on clause 40 in relation to the - definition of “couple”. That was in the case of people who maybe had been a couple —

1108. Ms M Campbell: It would be how it is practically ascertained.
1109. The Committee Clerk: It was about the approach that the Department would take to address it. You said that you would bring that back to the Department for consideration when drawing up the guidance. Clarification was provided on polygamous relationships as well.
1110. A range of issues were discussed in respect of clause 42, which concerns pilot schemes. It was mainly the relevance of GB schemes to Northern Ireland given that our circumstances are different. There was an indication that an interim learning report might be made available from DWP 1111. Ms M Campbell: Yes. I will check the position on that.
1112. The Committee Clerk: You said that you will investigate that and report back to the Committee on if and when that can be released.
1113. The Chairperson: OK. Are members happy to move on to clause 45?
- Members indicated assent.*
1114. Mr Pollock: Thanks, Chair. This, effectively, is me giving Martina a break. That said, she has done a lot of the heavy lifting in terms of introducing a lot of the things that are covered in Part 2 of the Bill, such as working-age benefits and things like claimant commitments, sanctions and hardship regimes. If you like, I will adopt the same sort of format; I will give you a brief description of the clause, and we will take questions afterwards.
1115. Clause 45 amends the Jobseekers (Northern Ireland) Order 1995 to introduce the claimant commitment for jobseeker’s allowance, which builds on the jobseeker’s agreement. Effectively, it aligns all the requirements on a claimant in one place, making it clear what claimants are required to do when they claim jobseeker’s allowances and the consequences of any failure. As for now, that includes the same sort of requirements to be available for work and to actively seek work, and specific actions that they need to take to meet those conditions.
1116. The claimant commitment will also include information that is not currently covered by the jobseeker’s agreement: information about general attendance requirements, any directions and other relevant information, and a duty to report changes of circumstances and the like. It is all about the underlying thread of personal responsibility that underpins a lot of the reforms. The commitment will be drawn up in agreement with the client adviser and the employment officer. However, the commitment contains mandatory issues, so it does not have to be agreed with the claimant. Instead, the claimant will be required to accept the commitment that is proposed by the employment officer and client adviser in order to be entitled to jobseeker’s allowance. The commitment can be altered in discussions between the client adviser and the claimant, depending on circumstances. Essentially, however, it is the same as the jobseeker’s agreement. It builds on that to smooth the transition to universal credit.
1117. Mr Brady: Mandatory issues are involved, so it is not a legally binding contract in that sense because, essentially, it is one-sided. I brought this up before: when people are actively seeking work, I presume that there will be guidelines for the client advisers about what that constitutes. People — this is likely to happen again — were going into work premises, saying that they needed to show that they were actively seeking work and asking for something to say that they have applied. They were then being charged. That should be factored into guidelines. It may sound vague in the sense that it might not happen, but it happened before and it is likely to happen again because employers, particularly small employers, will see the opportunity to get money for nothing. The excuse

- was that they had to spend time typing and that kind of thing; it was almost a cover charge. I know that we are not discussing that, Chair, but it is important sometimes to raise these issues while you think of them, because they are important. It happened in the past, and it is possible that it will happen again.
1118. Mr Pollock: That is well noted.
1119. Mr F McCann: Again, we raised this, and it is going back a couple of years: it is in relation to distance. If somebody in Belfast goes in and the client assessor says that there is a job in Newry, will the person be expected to travel to Newry? You know the way, in some places, they draw circles two miles out and four miles out or whatever. Will that be taken into consideration? I say that because I read somewhere in the past couple of days that there are six applicants for every job that is available, and it is getting worse. You end up with perhaps six or 10 people chasing the same job. It is a never-ending vicious circle.
1120. Mr Pollock: It will be whatever is considered reasonable in an individual's circumstances to show that they are available for work and actively seeking work. Regulations in the past have talked about something like 90 minutes' travel. It depends on what sort of car you are driving in that respect. That would not be unreasonable; people in our office travel from Newry and beyond every day to Belfast.
1121. Mr F McCann: The way I drive, it would be seen as totally unreasonable.
1122. Mr Brady: It would never be considered reasonable.
1123. Mr F McCann: Under those circumstances, if it is 90 minutes — say that it is Belfast to Derry — I take it that all expenses would be covered by the Department. Would it include the likes of food and other stuff to sustain them throughout the day? It is going to be a day-long exercise if you are travelling that distance.
1124. Mr Pollock: I do not know what the rules are for travel to work interviews. There could be some reimbursement in that respect.
1125. Mr McClarty: Surely food would not be an issue, because people have to eat anyway, immaterial of whether they travel five miles or 60 miles.
1126. Mr F McCann: People are paid at subsistence level here. It would be a substantial amount of money out of their already-meagre benefits to travel 90 miles to get to a job. It might be all right for someone like you, David, who could afford something like that, but we are not on benefits.
1127. Mr McClarty: I am not talking about the fuel. There is extra expense in fuel.
1128. Mr F McCann: We are talking about buses, trains —
1129. Mr McClarty: But food? You have to eat anyway, immaterial of where you are.
1130. Mr Pollock: There was some discussion, when we were going through the universal credit, about the claimant commitment. Ordinarily, it is a case of discussing with the client adviser what is deemed reasonable in their position. If you were a highly paid electrician or electronics engineer or something like that, for the first period in which you claim universal credit or benefit, or jobseeker's allowance as it is now, you would have an expectation that you would be looking for jobs in a particular area in a particular field at a particular salary rate. As you move further away from the labour market, your expectations tend to get lower in order to get work. However, the claimant commitment can be adjusted. It is a living document to take account of changes in circumstances and what is reasonable for an individual.
1131. Mr F McCann: I do not want to labour this, but say, for talk's sake, that I am on jobseeker's, I go in and the person says that there is a job in Derry they want me to go to. I say that I am skint; I do not have the money and I cannot afford the transport, and I do not have the money for food on the way up. They are able to - tap into a crisis loan, but they will have to pay that back again.

1132. Mr Pollock: For a job interview or for the job itself?
1133. Mr F McCann: A job interview. This is all about job interviews and actively seeking work. Do you understand what I am saying?
1134. Mr Pollock: I know what you are saying, yes, and there are certain schemes on travel to work and getting expenses to go to interviews. I do not know the detail but I can certainly get that for you.
1135. Mr F McCann: Thanks very much, Michael.
1136. The Chairperson: The key issue is what support is there for someone to go to an interview for a job.
1137. Mr F McCann: When they are saying that it is reasonable.
1138. The Chairperson: I understand that. That is the issue. Ultimately, that could result in sanctions for somebody, so you want a reasonable level of support. You are asking what that is, and we will get that information.
1139. Mr F McCann: You could get to Cork in 90 minutes the way Mickey drives.
1140. Mr Copeland: Fra has very kindly taken me into exactly the question that I was going to ask. In the border counties, there may be centres of population and places of work in the North or the South that might be closer in terms of travelling distance. Does this go across the border as well? In other words, if you are sitting in a job centre in Newry, Derry/Londonderry or Strabane, and a factory across in the South is advertising, is the availability of those jobs factored into the legislation — that there is a job in Bundoran or wherever?
1141. Mr Pollock: There is no directional compass on the 90 minutes. It is 90 minutes' travel in whatever direction.
1142. Mr Copeland: So it goes across national boundaries?
1143. Mr Pollock: No one will restrict you from looking across the border.
1144. Mr Copeland: I am not so much talking about looking; I am talking about being looked for. In other words, would the employment officer — I think that is what he is called — routinely tell you that there are jobs in Buncrana?
1145. Mr Pollock: He might be able to advise you, Michael, but he would not necessarily have the detail on jobs that are available in the other jurisdiction.
1146. Mr Copeland: He would not necessarily not, either?
1147. Mr Pollock: No.
1148. The Chairperson: So they do not know until you find out.
1149. Mr Brady: I want to clarify something, Michael. You raised the issue of tradespeople and people having qualifications — electricians and that. Going back again, for people who were signing on it was “suitable employment”. That was dispensed with so that you could, after a period of time, be offered anything. Will there be flexibility in the guidelines to deal with that? Essentially, one difficulty with people taking what they might have considered unsuitable employment was the wage rates, but some people were worse off, even with working tax credit.
1150. Mr Pollock: I imagine that there would be if there is a dearth in particular trades. It is reasonable to expect that, if you are in a dying profession, for want of a better term, you will try to seek employment and expand your own horizons.
1151. Mr Brady: I assume that there is no great rush for blacksmiths. However, is there a point at which, if you cannot find what you consider suitable employment for your particular skills, you are expected to take anything? It is already at that stage.
1152. Mr Pollock: I do not think that there is a set period of, for example, a month or two months.
1153. Mr Brady: It used to be, but —

1154. Mr C McLaughlin: I think that it is three months at the minute that you are allowed to apply for a job in your usual occupation, and, after that time, you have to actively seek and be available for any type of work.
1155. Mr Brady: It used to be six months.
1156. The Chairperson: OK, members, we got clarification there. Fair enough. We will move on to clause 46.
1157. Mr Pollock: Clause 46 allows jobs and benefits offices greater flexibility, where required, and allows claimants to participate in interviews other than the face-to-face interviews at the minute. That provision was probably touched on as we went through the universal credit in terms of future-proofing. So the provision relates to the wider government agenda of access to IT for making job applications, and so on. At present, there are no plans for jobs and benefits offices to deviate from face-to-face interviews and talking to clients at first hand. This provision would allow people to avail themselves of IT developments and technological advances. That is pretty much all that is involved in clause 46.
1158. The Chairperson: There are no questions, so you can move on to clause 47.
1159. Mr Pollock: We touched on clause 47 when going through universal credit. Effectively, it makes legislative change to reform jobseeker's allowance sanctions and hardship payments. The consequences for those who repeatedly fail to meet their responsibilities under the claimant commitment are a progression to tougher sanctions. That replaces the provision for sanctions under the Jobseeker's Order 1995. As Martina explained in reference to universal credit, there are three levels of sanctions: higher, medium and lower. As I said, it is important to point out that there is no conspiracy theory as far as sanctions are concerned. They are designed to act as a suitable deterrent. The underlying principle of individual responsibility, which is throughout welfare reform, is supported through this sanctions regime.
1160. It is also important to point out that, irrespective of the introduction of universal credit, it was always the intention to review the sanctions regime, because it was not being effective as a deterrent.
1161. The higher level sanctions would be imposed on claimants who failed to comply with the most important labour market requirements, such as applying for or taking a job. The sanction for a first failure would be three months; for a second failure, six months, and for a third failure, three years. However, there would be some exceptions, such as cases in which a failure occurs before a claimant's claim to jobseeker's allowance is made. That could occur in the case of someone leaving employment voluntarily and then claiming jobseeker's allowance. We do not expect very many claimants to be sanctioned for three years, but it is important to include that option to deter serial non-compliance.
1162. Currently, sanctions for those types of failures are generally set on a case-by-case basis and can be anything from one week to 26 weeks. The purpose of clause 47 is to clarify the whole sanction regime, including the claimant's commitment and the responsibility of individuals to comply. It provides greater visibility of the consequences of not complying with the requirements.
1163. Mr Copeland: Paragraph 224 in the explanatory and financial memorandum details the failures which may be sanctioned for up to this duration. One is losing a job through misconduct. Today, very many people who lose their job through misconduct appeal to the Labour Relations Agency (LRA). How are they treated during the period of the appeal?
1164. The second failure that may be sanctioned is refusing or failing to apply for or accept a job about which an employment officer has informed a claimant. A number of organisations, such as the army and the Fire and

- Rescue Service, run jobs fairs. Might there be an instance in which someone would be required to attend an army jobs fair despite being doctrinally against joining the army? Could someone be sanctioned for that?
1165. Ms M Campbell: No. I gave examples of when someone would be excepted from applying for jobs, and those include some religious beliefs.
1166. Mr Copeland: A vegetarian may not want to be employed in a butcher's shop.
1167. Ms M Campbell: There are conscientiously held objections, and those would have been specified in the claimant's commitment at the outset.
1168. Mr Copeland: What about the period between someone being dismissed through misconduct and lodging an appeal to the Labour Relations Agency? What happens while the appeal is ongoing?
1169. Ms M Campbell: I assume that the situation remains as it is now.
1170. Mr C McLaughlin: The decision-maker bases the decision on whatever evidence he or she gets from the employer about what happened. A decision would have to be made, but it could be overturned if the individual was successful at the employment tribunal.
1171. Mr Copeland: Could that not then be used by the employer as justification? The employer could say that x, y and z happened, and the Department might have accepted that x, y and z happened for its purposes. Could that not be used against the guy in the industrial tribunal?
1172. Mr C McLaughlin: The decision-maker would have to look at the two parties and at both sets of evidence, and then come to a decision on that basis, not just on the basis of the employer's evidence.
1173. Mr Copeland: You do not think that there is an element of prejudging the outcome of the Labour Relations Agency process?
1174. Mr Pollock: I do not think that it would be prejudicial to the LRA process. As Martina said, and as far as I know, the sanction remains in place until you have something to tell you otherwise. If a decision was overturned as part of an LRA decision, for instance, it could be looked at again.
1175. Mr Brady: My question follows on from Michael's point. One of the failures that may be sanctioned is losing a job through misconduct or leaving voluntarily. Legally, people are entitled to terms and conditions of employment, which would include [Inaudible.] I have another point about leaving voluntarily. Constructive dismissal is very difficult to prove, even at an industrial tribunal. Many people feel that they have been constructively dismissed but do not pursue it. Any adviser will tell you that you could have a go at making a case but that it is quite difficult. Are such situations factored in? It is important that they are looked at, particularly in relation to the terms and conditions of employment. As I said last week, an inquiry could determine that, in its opinion, there had been misconduct, but that "misconduct" might be something that the person concerned considered innocuous.
1176. My other point is that people cannot appeal the sanctions, but they could appeal the disallowance of benefit, presumably. There is a lot of discretion in that. When those guidelines are published, I would like the opportunity to see how flexible they are and what could be factored in — [Inaudible.]
1177. Ms M Campbell: Common sense.
1178. Mr Pollock: It is very difficult to legislate for every eventuality.
1179. Mr Brady: Absolutely, because each case is individual.
1180. Mr Pollock: The underlying rationale for the sanctions is that they are an effective deterrent and a support to the claimant commitment. They aim to encourage people to accept individual responsibility.

1181. The Chairperson: Paragraph 225 states that a person will be treated as not having left work voluntarily in prescribed circumstances. From where do you get the prescribed circumstances? Is that by way of regulations or guidance?
1182. Mr C McLaughlin: Regulations and guidance, Chair.
1183. Mr F McCann: I am stuck on what happens when a person who is paid off or sacked is told that he or she will be sanctioned. Let us say that this person has two or three kids. The person's spouse then says that he or she is experiencing hardship because of that sanction. From listening to what you have said, I take it that the spouse would have to make a separate claim for benefit. Given the way things are now, there could be a four-week wait for such a new claim to be assessed. So the person might want a hardship payment or a crisis loan, and it can take days for those to be processed. What happens to the family in between times? If they say that they are experiencing hardship and do not have food for their kids as the result of a sanction, is there a procedure that allows for an immediate payment, or are they told to go away while their situation is assessed and that they will be informed of the decision?
1184. Mr Pollock: I do not think that there are any plans to change the existing regime for hardship payments, other than proposals to make some hardship payments recoverable under jobseeker's allowance. Whatever procedures exist currently will remain.
1185. Mr F McCann: I have heard about a number of people who asked for a payment after being sanctioned. Say, for example, someone gets a week's sanction, by the time a decision is made on whether to give them something, the sanction period is up, so he or she has gone through a whole period without any payment. This Bill means that we could be dealing in future with people facing one, two or three years of sanctions. A person being sanctioned could have an adverse impact on the family unit.
1186. When we talked about misconduct in the past, we were told that this sort of sanction would be considered only in cases of gross misconduct. There is a big difference between misconduct and gross misconduct. The reference here is to "misconduct", not gross misconduct.
1187. Mr C McLaughlin: That was a reference to the work experience regulations, where the only sanction was for gross misconduct.
1188. Mr F McCann: It is "misconduct" in this case. A year or two ago, when we tabled a motion in the Assembly against sanctions, we were told by the Minister that they would not be used that much. Yet, the response to a question for written answer was that thousands of people had been sanctioned in the space of only a few days, or maybe a week or two. It is not that these sanctions will be applied only occasionally. The number of people already sanctioned is on record. We could be led to believe that a considerable number of people will fall foul of the sanction regime.
1189. Mr Pollock: As I said, it is not the objective of sanctions to punish people. The sanctions regime is part of the overall integrated process, and it is an integral process, of individuals taking responsibility for themselves in trying to move closer towards the labour market. The sanctions regime is designed to be a supportive part of that, in so far as individuals know what is expected of them through the claimant commitment. They know what they are required to do, and they are clear from discussions with their client adviser and everybody else about what the consequences are if they do not comply.
1190. Mr F McCann: We all know what the consequences are. Mickey has said often enough that what you term welfare reform, we class as welfare cuts. So we are playing with words. It is a punishment. People are being punished for not fulfilling the requirement of what is laid down.

1191. The Chairperson: OK, fair enough. That is a fair point. Did everybody get the clarification that they were looking for?
1192. Mr Brady: I have one final point. All the empirical evidence on sanction-led regimes indicates that they are not a deterrent.
1193. The Chairperson: OK. We will move on to clause 48.
1194. Mr Pollock: Clause 48 deals with the procedure for regulation-making powers and relates to the change from confirmatory to negative resolution procedure. We touched on this previously when going through universal credit. The natural protocol is that, under any new policy direction, regulations falling from primary legislation would be confirmatory subject to debate in the Assembly. This removes that requirement, because jobseeker's allowance was implemented in about 1995. So any changes will be fairly minor and technical in nature.
1195. Mr Copeland: This will probably sound very silly, but I make no apologies for it, because I am still pretty new here. What is the difference between confirmatory resolution and negative resolution?
1196. Mr Pollock: In a nutshell, regulations subject to negative resolution are just brought through as a matter of course. Once the Minister approves them, they can be made, laid and brought into force. If subject to confirmatory resolution, they are debated by the Committee and everybody else, but they are then subject to a debate in the Assembly within six months of coming into operation.
1197. Mr Copeland: So the former would remove any possibility for the Assembly or this Committee to influence the outcome?
1198. The Chairperson: Negative resolution means that you would have to get the Committee to intervene to put a motion to the Assembly to have the rule negated. It is like a prayer of annulment. As Michael says, regulations subject to confirmatory resolution are tabled and come into operation, and, after six months, have to be confirmed by the Assembly; otherwise they fall.
1199. Mr Copeland: OK. Thank you. Sorry for the question.
1200. Mr Pollock: Clause 49 is to be read in tandem with schedule 7 to the Bill. Clause 49 gives effect to schedule 7, which makes amendments to the existing jobseeker's allowance legislation as a consequence of the changes and measures in the Bill. This morning, Martina went through a list of consequential changes in respect of universal credit, and this is the same type of thing for jobseeker's allowance.
1201. Clause 49 provides for consequential amendments to the legislation. Amendments are essential to ensure that references are up to date. They include the sanctions and disentitlement-related provisions and the substitution of "just cause" for "good reason." Amendments are necessary to reflect the replacement of "jobseeker's agreement" by "claimant commitment" and changes to contracting out provisions. In addition to these consequential amendments, schedule 7 provides for the repeal of sections of the Jobseekers Order, which would allow for sanctions for violent conduct by claimants. We have no plans to introduce such sanctions but are confident that we have robust processes in place for taking appropriate action against claimants demonstrating violent behaviour. We feel that those processes effectively protect the staff in jobs and benefits offices.
1202. The Chairperson: OK. We will move on.
1203. Mr Pollock: Clause 50 is part of the transition from jobseeker's allowance to universal credit. Universal credit replaces income-based jobseeker's allowance. Jobseeker's allowance will still continue as a contributory-based benefit. We need to ensure that the rules and responsibilities that apply for contributory jobseeker's allowance claimants are aligned with the universal credit changes as far as possible. That is for three reasons: to ensure that all

- claimants, subject to the work search and work availability requirements, are treated in the same way as they would be under universal credit; to smooth the transition where a claimant's time-limited contributory benefit ends and they become entitled to universal credit; and to avoid unnecessary complexity in the handling of claims through the jobs and benefits offices. Clause 50, therefore, mirrors the work-related requirements and sanctions that apply comparably to claimants of universal credit.
1204. Clause 51 deals with dual entitlement. It amends a technical defect in section 1 of the Welfare Reform Act 2007 — we do not always get it right. This currently provides that a person is not entitled to employment and support allowance if they are a member of a couple entitled to a joint claim for jobseeker's allowance. The purpose of the joint claim provisions is to ensure that both members of a couple are subject to jobseeker's allowance conditionality. However, there are circumstances in which one member of a couple making a joint claim is entitled to jobseeker's allowance without meeting all of the conditions of entitlement: for example, if a member of a couple is not able to work because of ill health or disability. The policy intention is that such a person should be entitled to claim ESA while becoming or being part of a joint claim to jobseeker's allowance. However, the Department realised that the current provisions do not work as intended. Clause 51 rectifies this by ensuring that such people can make a claim for ESA while being a member of a couple entitled to a joint claim on jobseeker's allowance. This does not mean that such people will be overpaid and receive a full award for both benefits. Any employment and support allowance payable would be deducted from the income-based joint claim for JSA.
1205. The Chairperson: OK. Fair enough.
1206. Mr Brady: It is not really a change, is it? Any other income will be taken into account for income-based ESA or jobseeker's allowance anyway. It is really just tidying up.
1207. Mr Pollock: It is just tidying up a technical point in the 2007 Act.
1208. The Chairperson: We move to clause 52.
1209. Mr Pollock: This clause limits an award of contributory ESA for people in the work-related activity group to a maximum of 365 days. ESA for people in the work-related activity group was only ever intended to be a benefit for temporary, short-term interruptions in employment. It is considered that a limit of one year allows people time to adjust to the effects of their health condition, and the benefit provides support for them while they do so. Introducing a time limit on the entitlement of people in the work-related activity group is more consistent with the rules of contribution-based JSA, which has a limit of six months. It aligns the two, and it recognises the different nature of ESA for the purposes of the benefit.
1210. Under this provision, it would be possible for a person to requalify for a further 365 days of contributory ESA if they leave benefit for more than 12 weeks and meet the national insurance contributions in full without using the same tax year as the previous claim. This is the same as JSA currently, and it means that people who leave benefit for work can requalify if they satisfy the contribution conditions afresh. People who already receive contributory ESA in the work-related activity group when the time limit is introduced will have the period that they have already been on the benefit counted towards their 365 days of entitlement. This includes people in receipt of incapacity benefit who are reassessed and qualify for contributory ESA and are placed in the work-related activity group. They will have their ESA time limited to 365 days from the point of conversion.
1211. Clause 52 also contains provisions to apply a time limit where an existing award for severe disablement allowance is reassessed and converted into an award for ESA and the individual is in the work-related activity group. This is considered to be the fairest approach for all claimants. The most vulnerable people in the support group, whose medical conditions mean that they have limited capability for work-related activity, are unaffected by this measure. Equally, the poorest claimants in receipt of income-based ESA will be unaffected whatever group they are assigned to. This is deemed an important step in simplifying the whole benefits system and making work pay.

1212. Mr Brady: In fairness, whatever way you dress it up, it is designed to ensure that more people get less benefit. Previously, if you were sick and certified as being incapable of work, you went on to indefinite contributory incapacity benefit. The change was made when jobseeker's allowance was introduced, and the benefit period went from a year to six months. People were not paying any less in contributions.
1213. My point is this: if you get contributory ESA for a year, and your partner then works for 24 hours a week or more, you will not qualify for income-based ESA, or universal credit, whatever it is changed to. Essentially, you will get the contributory benefit for a year, and, if your partner is working at the end of that year, you will not then qualify for any income-based allowance. Your partner would then, presumably, have to claim universal credit or the equivalent working tax credit. That is the reality. You can dress it up in whatever way you want in the legislation, but the policy intention is to ensure that more people do not qualify for benefit. The same thing happened with jobseeker's allowance. I just want to clarify that, because it is undeniable. There is an attempt to try to dress this up as an incentive to get people into work, but the policy intention is to cut benefit. That clause reinforces the argument.
1214. The Chairperson: If that is the final point on clause 52, we will move on.
1215. Mr Pollock: Clause 53 deals with further entitlement after time-limiting. It provides, in certain circumstances, for a further award of contributory ESA after time-limiting of 365 days under clause 52. Where entitlement to contributory ESA has ceased as a result of time-limiting, a person may become entitled to a further award if, since that cessation, the person has not ceased to have, or to be treated as having, limited capability for work; the person satisfies the basic conditions; and the person has, or is treated as having, limited capability for work-related activity. This means that, where a person's contributory ESA has ceased as a result of time-limiting and their health condition deteriorates to such a degree that they are placed in the support group, they will be able to requalify for an award of contributory ESA if the above conditions are satisfied. The entitlement to the award exists only for as long as the person has, or is treated as having, limited capability for work-related activity and so falls into the support group. If the person goes through a subsequent work-capability assessment and is placed in the work-related activity group, entitlement to the award arising under this section would cease. The further entitlement is to be regarded as a contributory allowance. Effectively, the clause links periods of entitlement.

1216. Mr Brady: Can you confirm that this applies only to contributory ESA, which means that, even though you requalify, you will still get only a year?
1217. Mr Pollock: Yes.
1218. The Chairperson: We move on to clause 54.
1219. Mr Pollock: This is another contentious clause, in so far as it deals with the abolition of the ESA youth condition. Clause 54 abolishes the special concessions that currently allow certain young people to qualify for contributory ESA without meeting the usual paid national insurance conditions that apply to everybody else. This measure applies to new claims only, so existing claimants will remain on contributory ESA, but this will be time-limited. This means that contributory ESA youth claimants in the work-related activity group will be subject

- to a 365-day limit for assistance. Those in the support group will be unaffected, as will anybody receiving income from ESA, whatever group they are assigned to. To qualify for contributory allowance, the normal rules are such that a person must have paid and been credited with sufficient national insurance contributions in the tax years relevant to the claim.
1220. The existing rules for young people, as set out in the Welfare Reform Act 2007, exempt certain young people from the usual paid national insurance contributions: a person between 16 and 19 years of age, or between 20 and 25 in certain prescribed circumstances, who is not in full-time education and has had limited capability for work for 196 consecutive days is entitled to contributory ESA.
1221. Clause 54 repeals that provision in the Welfare Reform Act 2007 and, from the date on which it comes into operation, prevents new claims for contributory allowance being made on the grounds of youth. After that date, people who have formally benefited from that decision would be required to meet the national insurance contribution conditions that must be met when making an ordinary contributory ESA claim. No other age group can qualify for employment and support allowance without having paid national insurance contributions. No other contributory benefit has similar type arrangements.
1222. The vast majority — at least 90% — of claimants who currently receive ESA on the grounds of youth are expected to receive income-related employment and support allowance. Those who do not have qualify for income-related ESA are likely to have capital in excess of £16,000 or a partner in full-time work who may be entitled to working tax credits. That change is another step in simplifying the benefit system ahead of the introduction of universal credit.
1223. Mr Brady: This clause is a very contentious one. It is worth pointing out that the severe disablement allowance was introduced for young people who would never be able to work, in the normal sense, because of a learning disability or other problems. When that was abolished, youth incapacity benefit was introduced, which waived the contribution conditions. People who have, in many cases, quite severe disabilities are now going to be sucked into this. Therefore, it is wrong to say that this is simplifying it for them: it will actually make it a lot more difficult.
1224. The intention seems to be to disenfranchise people with quite severe learning disabilities, learning difficulties, and so on, because they will now have to qualify for income-based ESA, income-based universal credit, or whatever. This affects quite a large cohort of young people who were previously treated sympathetically and had their conditions recognised. That recognition of their condition and of their ability to cope is being taken away from them. It is quite difficult for some of them to cope on a daily basis, without having to deal with this whole mix-up that is universal credit and what they may or may not be capable of.
1225. The reason that I am giving a bit of an explanation is that a lot of people are not aware of the purpose of the severe disablement allowance and the youth incapacity benefit, and the whole issue of contributions. Again, if you qualified for youth incapacity benefit, the contributions were waived indefinitely, as long as your condition persisted. That has all changed. There has been a change to the definition of “disability”. I think that that needs to be pointed out, because people are not necessarily aware of it.
1226. As I say, this is a very important and contentious clause. You are right to say that it is contentious, and that will continue to be the case, particularly for large numbers of young people. They are already getting hammered by the provision of single room rent and all that. This is an attack on youth, regardless of the way in which you want to dress it up.

1227. Mr Pollock: As I say, it is not deemed or presented as a cost-saving measure as such. There are no other concessions to age in any of the other —
1228. Mr Brady: With respect, they are not going to publicise the fact that they are hammering young disabled people, which is what they are doing. That would not go down well.
1229. The Chairperson: We are now getting into — 1230. Mr Brady: I thought that it was necessary to say that.
1231. The Chairperson: I appreciate that. You have outlined your understanding of the outworking of that, and Michael is not challenging that.
1232. If we are happy enough, we will move on to clause 55.
1233. Mr Pollock: Clause 55 — again at the danger of repeating myself — deals with the claimant commitment for employment and support allowance. Martina explained that for universal credit, and I mentioned the same type of thing earlier for jobseeker's allowance.
1234. Clause 55 introduces the claimant commitment for employment and support allowance in the period leading up to the introduction of universal credit. A claimant commitment, which is a record of a claimant's responsibilities, sets out the information, the requirements placed on a claimant and the consequences if the claimant fails to meet those requirements. It can be reviewed and updated if a claimant's circumstances change. A claimant commitment will be a condition of entitlement to employment and support allowance. It will ensure that claimants have to consider and accept their responsibilities at the beginning of the claim and when the commitment is updated for particular changes.
1235. The requirements that can be placed on a claimant — for example, to attend a medical assessment, take part in work-focused interviews, or notify about a change of circumstances — would be imposed in the normal way. Any work-related activity that the claimant is required to do would be drawn up by advisers in exactly the same way. However, the action plan would be incorporated into the claimant commitment.
1236. Beyond requiring claimants to accept a claimant commitment, the clause makes no change to the requirements that can be placed on a claimant. They may still be required to comply with their requirements as appropriate for their particular group, whether a person is [Inaudible.] group, the content of the claimant commitment would be expected to be pretty minimal.
1237. The Chairperson: Thanks you. We will move on to clause 56.
1238. Mr Pollock: Clause 56 deals with work experience and the like. There will be increased conditionality for employment and support allowance claimants in the work-related activity group for the introduction of work-related activity regulations. For the first time, those who are able to prepare to return to work will be required to do so when it is reasonable. Claimants will receive support to get back to work that is tailored to their own particular circumstances. We expect to use the powers flexibly so that the adviser can devise tailored action plans for each claimant. The nature and amount of work-related activity that is required can vary for each individual. However, the requirement must always be reasonable in the individual's circumstances.
1239. Clause 56 makes provision for us to make it clear that work-related activity can include work experience and work placements for employment and support claimants in the work-related activity group. It is necessary to make it expressly clear that, although it remains unreasonable to require those claimants to undertake actual work, it may be deemed reasonable — depending on an individual's circumstances, obviously — to require them to undertake work experience or a placement to meet the - requirement to undertake work-related activity.

1240. The inclusion of clause 56 simply avoids the question of doubt over whether someone with limited capability for work can be required to undertake those activities to help them to prepare for work. We want to give advisers, both in jobs and benefits offices and jobcentres, as much flexibility as possible to require the work-related activity that they think would be most effective in moving a claimant back to work. Any activity that is required of the claimant, including work experience or placement, must be deemed as reasonable in the individual's circumstances.
1241. Advisers would work with each individual to understand his or her capabilities. Work experience and work placements help claimants to understand more about their career options and skills, increase their confidence, provide valuable work experience and make them more attractive to employers. They will not necessarily be more demanding than any other forms of work-related activity. They could take many forms and do not need to be full-time. The focus of placements would be on learning new skills and getting experience of the workplace — quite different from the more taxing demands of actual work, which would normally require a longer-term and less flexible commitment, with much higher expectations of the individual.
1242. Mr Copeland: Michael, does that cut across or have any bearing on the current work that is permitted under the employment and support allowance? If you have limited capability, you can work up to 16 hours a week for £99-70 a week for up to a year. If you are in the support group, you can do that almost indefinitely. Is there any inference to be drawn? If someone is, let us say, in the support group, and he or she undertakes permitted work within the terms of the current legislation, is there any likelihood that that person who is involved in that process might be called to enter into some other sort of training? Will permitted work as it is now continue under the new benefits?
1243. Mr Pollock: I think that it will. Colm, do you know anything about permitted work? My notion is that, because permitted work is permitted, effectively, by the client adviser and must have some added value for individuals, such as improving their skills or keeping them in touch, it could form part of —
1244. Mr Copeland: However, it allows people in a support group, who are not required to attend work-related interviews, to derive an income of up to £97 a week for 16 hours. They can do that forever, essentially.
1245. Mr Pollock: You asked some questions about permitted work last week when we were here. We are researching the answers to those questions. Therefore, we will wrap the whole thing up when we come back to you formally on those questions.
1246. Mr Copeland: Thank you.
1247. Mr F McCann: I want to raise an issue that has sort of been raised before: the ability of the client adviser to determine the level of work that a person can do. What training do advisers receive to deal with people with various illnesses? That goes back to the whole question that Mickey raised about assessing somebody who is bipolar, somebody who suffers from autism or somebody who has some other mental health difficulty.
1248. There is also a problem for people with physical health problems. Mickey has also said previously that this is not about helping people to live with their illness; rather, it is about the work that they can do with their illness. What training do the client advisers go through? Is there anything on paper that specifies the level of training required? Is there a two-week course, a six-week course or a longer course so that client advisors are able to determine how a person's illness is affected by work-related activity?
1249. Mr Pollock: We have already asked the question about the client advisers and

- their particular training programme, and I think that it was raised again last week. We have a response to that, which we will be formally coming back to you with in writing. It explains that client advisers undergo a fairly extensive training scheme. Presumably, that incorporates up-to-date training methodologies.
1250. I do not know whether the specifics of incapacities, particularly mental health disability, are covered by the training. Certainly, it is not in the response that we have received. We will build on that detail to see whether we can give you those sorts of assurances. The idea is that the client advisers need to possess the relevant information before they can take informed decisions on what is suitable for a claimant.
1251. Ms M Campbell: They also take into account the medical assessment — the work-capability assessment.
1252. Mr F McCann: Questions have been raised about serious flaws in the work-capability system and over how it has been handled. Therefore, I do not place a great deal of store in the system's ability to deal with the problems that I have outlined. Mickey talks of people being treated abominably when they have gone through the assessments.
1253. I would like to see something that we asked for in 2007. At that time, we were told, "Don't worry about it. There will be training so that the client advisers will be able to make those decisions." I have spoken to people who have difficulties in dealing with people who come in with illnesses, mental or otherwise, and assessing them for work. It baffles me that doctors can say that they think that someone is not capable of work, yet somebody who gets four-to-six weeks training can say, "I believe that the person is capable of work."
1254. Mr Pollock: Undoubtedly, as a public representative, you will get the cases where things do not work out according to plan. We need to look at particular issues around mental health to see whether there are those sorts of provisions in client adviser training.
1255. The Chairperson: This is a substantive point that has been raised on the record. What we will have to do eventually is say what we are going to do about these things. Are we clear that we know what this is supposed to do?
1256. Mr F McCann: I would like to see the type of training that is given to advisers, find out how long it is for and who provides it.
1257. The Chairperson: We are expecting a full response, because it is a substantive and a contentious issue.
1258. Mr Brady: We are not dealing with isolated cases. There are quite large numbers of cases, and this highlights the flaws in the clause.
1259. We talk about permitted work, but it was called "therapeutic allowance". The idea was that people, particularly those with mental health issues, such as depression, would be able to get some relief and get out of the house. The work would be therapeutic in the sense that it would offer rehabilitation and help towards getting them on to an even keel. I cannot imagine that those people would be allowed to continue on under this regime.
1260. Mr Pollock: I appreciate that. The only point that I am making is that you would hear about only those for whom it does not work out according to plan.
1261. Mr Brady: The point that I am making is that there are quite large numbers of them.
1262. The Chairperson: That is not specific. I am not going to parry you on that, but that is not necessarily the case. We are all aware of cases that do work out.
1263. Mr Douglas: I would like to know something. I was going to take on a young person from the Step Ahead programme, through DEL, but politicians and MLAs were not allowed to take on anybody. Will it be the same in this situation?
1264. Mr Pollock: Will what be the same?

1265. Mr Douglas: Someone with an interest in politics, for example, might want to work in my office. Could I let them work on reception to try to give the person some work experience? There may be jobs coming up in the political sector. Would we be eligible to take someone on? There was some legal question about us taking somebody on from the Step Ahead programme.
1266. Mr Pollock: We can perhaps talk about that outside. I cannot imagine that it would be good for anybody's health to go into politics for work experience.
1267. Mr Brady: It was probably thought that you would be a bad influence on them, Sammy.
1268. Mr Douglas: I had a young fella who had gone through a heart transplant recently. He actually died last Sunday. He was with me for a year. He was very limited, but he was able to sit at a desk, interview people and do reception. Getting him out of his house was the best thing for him, apart from anything else.
1269. Mr Pollock: The limitations would tend to relate to the individual's capabilities.
1270. Mr Douglas: Are you talking about learning difficulties?
1271. Mr Pollock: They would relate to their particular condition rather than to the occupation.
1272. The Chairperson: Sammy, you were wondering whether there would be an exclusion in place from working in politics. You are not sure, Michael; you are shaking your head. You are not aware of it.
1273. Mr C McLaughlin: We will check that with DEL. It might be able to give us some guidance on that.
1274. Mr Douglas: I suppose that the question is that if we were not allowed to take someone from the Step Ahead programme in the past but allowed to do it here, there must be anomalies.
1275. The Chairperson: Fair enough; it is a good question. Why would someone not be able to take up a post in your office, apart from the fact that you would work them too hard?
1276. Mr Pollock: Clause 57 is good news, of a type. It introduces a hardship payments regime for employment and support allowance, which did not previously exist. In context, the reform agenda announced the intention to raise the amount of sanctions that would be imposed on claimants in the work-related activity group. Sanctions apply where claimants fail to meet their responsibilities.
1277. Under the proposed new system, sanctions for that group, in most cases, would be open-ended until the claimant recomplies with requirements for a short fixed period thereafter. Although the consequences of non-compliance are made stronger, we want to improve the incentive to re-engage with the requirements. Alongside those reforms, we recognise the need to protect those who are sanctioned from falling into hardship. The clause also provides for hardship payments for employment and support allowance claimants. Many aspects of the system would be similar to the current arrangements under jobseeker's allowance. For example, in determining whether the person is, or would be, in hardship, we would continue to look at matters such as the level of resources available to the claimant's family and the risk that, without hardship payments, such essential items as food, heating and accommodation might not be available to the claimant or the family, or be available at considerably reduced levels.
1278. We now intend to set those matters out in regulations. We expect the rate of payments to be broadly similar to the current rates within jobseeker's allowance. However, unlike payments to jobseeker's allowance claimants, hardship payments under proposals in the new scheme would not be recoverable under the employment and support allowance.
1279. Mr Brady: Would it not be simpler not to sanction them in the first place and

- save all that money that is spent on staff having to check up —
1280. The Chairperson: Just ask a question or ask for clarification.
1281. Mr Brady: I would like clarification. Presumably, it will take a period to put the sanction into place, and the person will become aware of that. It may take a while for the hardship payment to kick in. It may take a week or two. I suppose that it goes back to Fra's point. If staff are going to investigate, how long will the person have to wait for the money that is meant to alleviate the hardship? Surely, that is the point of having it.
1282. You mentioned ESA. Are there any other recoverable benefits?
1283. Mr Pollock: Jobseeker's allowance.
1284. Mr Brady: It is only ESA that it will not be recoverable from. What is the rationale for that?
1285. Mr Pollock: It is possibly the fact that you are dealing with particularly vulnerable clients.
1286. Mr Brady: You could be dealing with vulnerable clients who are signing on.
1287. The Chairperson: There was a question in there around time lapse, which goes back to Fra's point.
1288. Mr Brady: It goes back to what Fra said the last time.
1289. The Chairperson: That been addressed for now. Fair enough.
1290. Mr Pollock: Clause 58 deals with the claimant's responsibilities for employment and support allowance. As Martina mentioned earlier, universal credit will replace income-related employment and support allowance. As with jobseeker's allowance, employment and support allowance will become a contributory benefit only.
1291. Clause 58 aligns the work-related requirements and sanctions that can be applied to claimants of contributory employment and support allowance with those for similar claimants under universal credit. That is equivalent to the changes to jobseeker's allowance made in clause 50. It replaces the current provisions for employment and support allowance. Although the clause generally mirrors universal credit provisions, the number of differences is worth noting. No employment and support allowance claimant will be required to search for or be available for work, so clause 58 does not include parallel work-search or availability requirements. As a result, the higher-level sanction cannot be applied to an employment and support allowance claimant who fails to meet his or her particular requirements.
1292. Some ESA claimants will not be subject to any work-related requirements. That will, of course, include those who are found to have limited capability for work-related activity and fall into the support group.
1293. Claimants with substantial and regular caring responsibilities, or lone parents or main carers of a child under the age of one, will not be subject to any requirements. Lone parents or main carers who have limited capability for work or are responsible for a child over the age of one and under the age of five will be subject to work-focused interview requirements openly. All other claimants who are found to have limited capability for work may be subject to work preparation for work-focused interview requirements.
1294. It is also worth making clear that, although there is no provision for hardship payments in the clause, other provisions in the Bill will ensure that employment and support allowance claimants who meet certain conditions will be able to access hardship payments through a claim for universal credit.
1295. Mr Brady: I want to clarify something. The Welfare Reform Act 2012 explanatory notes state:
"Claimants receiving ESA may be subject to a sanction for an open-ended period until a compliance condition is met, for a fixed period of up to 26 weeks or a combination of both."

1296. Does that mean that it will be open-ended indefinitely?
1297. Mr Pollock: It is indefinite in so far as the expectation will be that it will encourage the individual to re-engage with the service.
1298. Mr Brady: Presumably, if it is does not, it could last for forever and a day.
1299. Mr Pollock: Hopefully not.
1300. Mr Brady: According to how it is worded, it could, technically. You could be sanctioned for four years rather than three, if you did not comply. That is a possibility. I just wanted clarification on that.
1301. Mr Pollock: Clause 59 deals with entitlement of lone parents to income support. Legislation currently provides that income support must be made available to lone parents with a child under the age of seven. The clause lowers that age to five. There has been a gradual reduction in the age over a number of years. The intention now is that lone parents with children aged five or over will no longer be entitled to income support solely on the grounds of lone parenthood.
1302. Support for those lone parents will be available through jobseeker's allowance or employment and support allowance, if they meet the relevant conditions of entitlement, or through income support, if they qualify on grounds other than lone parenthood, notably if they are carers. Policies for lone parents are based on the key principle that work is the purist and most sustainable route out of poverty. The intention is to align the age at which lone parents can reasonably be expected to work with the time that their youngest child enters the education system — school.
1303. The Chairperson: OK, fair enough. We move on to clause 60.
1304. Mr Pollock: Clause 60 introduces the claimant commitment for income support. Again, that is to try to align the existing benefits with the start-up for universal credit. The claimant commitment will be a record of the claimant's responsibilities that sets out the requirements placed on them and the consequences of failing to meet them. It will be reviewed and updated as necessary, except when the claimant commitment will be a condition of entitlement for income support. That ensures that income support claimants will have to consider and understand their own responsibilities at the beginning of their claim and when the claim is upgraded. Beyond the need to accept the commitment, the clause does not change the conditions of entitlement for income support or the requirements that income support claimants must meet.
1305. Mr Copeland: I want to jig back to what we talked about last. Benefit payment, in some cases, can influence accessibility to preschool and playschool groups and put the ability to get a place above and beyond others. Will that change impact on people being able to access preschool and nursery groups? It is bound to.
1306. Mr Pollock: It depends on the conditions of the nursery. I do not know that there are hard-and-fast rules for nursery places. Do you know, Martina?
1307. Ms M Campbell: That is an education matter.
1308. Mr Pollock: It is a matter for the Department of Education.
1309. Mr Copeland: There is a perennial problem in east Belfast that, to the exclusion of local children, children are being placed in nursery schools on the basis that their parents are in receipt of income support.
1310. The Chairperson: I presume that that will fit into the category of passported benefits.
1311. Mr Pollock: And that is a much wider issue.
1312. The Chairperson: I presume that that is where that will have to be addressed.
1313. Mr Copeland: I am happy [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.].

1314. Ms M Campbell: It is the Department of Education that sets the criteria, or at least the guidelines, within which each school operates. It is not us.
1315. Mr Copeland: The benefit is changing. Will it be used as a matter of course?
1316. Ms M Campbell: Yes. Any Department that uses social security benefits as a criterion or an automatic lead-in —
1317. The Chairperson: With respect, it is the other way around. The destination of the Department is as a result of a passported benefit, so the issue starts with this Department and the welfare reform change. It is the benefit that will determine entitlement, or not, beyond that. Therefore, Michael's question is very relevant.
1318. It does not matter what the Department of Education might do next week as a result. It will have to do that. A number of Departments will have to take a political decision. The Department of Finance, the Department of Health and the Department of Education are all currently considering what they might have to do if the Welfare Reform Bill is enacted. Those Departments will have to decide what the consequence are for them. They are not causing the problem, but they will be in receipt of it. Therefore, the problem starts here.
1319. Ms M Campbell: It is a moot point whether or not they are causing it. They have chosen —
1320. The Chairperson: It is not. It is a very important point.
1321. Ms M Campbell: They have chosen to use receipt of social security benefits as a means of automatic entitlement. It is not this Department that does that. That is something that each individual Department decides.
1323. The Chairperson: However, it is beyond the issue that you raised. There is a range of passported benefits, and it starts with the benefits system and eligibility. A Department might use the criteria of another Department. Free school meals is an example of that. However, these clauses will determine whether someone is eligible or not. That is Michael's question. That is all that we need to establish here. Whoever else has to worry about the consequences has to worry about them. We have addressed what is a likely consequence. We are trying to establish whether that is what this clause will do. Whoever has to pick up the pieces is another issue, and I am not getting into that discussion.
1324. Mr Pollock: Martina touched on this earlier when she talked about universal credit, which is available to both out-of-work and in-work low-income families. The population in receipt of universal credit could be a lot more than those who receive out-of-work benefits now. Therefore, in theory, low-income families could qualify for some of the passported benefits, such as preschool places.
1325. Departments are having to put their thinking caps on and consider what would be the financial consequences of their opening the door rather than saying that it must be someone who is in receipt of ESA or JSA, which means that you have x number of people. Departments are not quite sure how many people will qualify for universal credit award, so they do not have a full idea of the financial consequences for their departmental spend.
1326. The Chairperson: OK. I go back to the point that a Department may use this for eligibility for something else. However, the difficulty for some people — and Michael put his finger on it — is that the clause removes that entitlement. At the end of the day, that is what it does. That is the point that Michael was making.
1327. Mr Copeland: Essentially, yes.
1328. Mr Brady: At the moment, the main qualifying benefit for passported

- benefits is income support. Income support is disappearing and being subsumed into universal credit. Therefore, Departments will have to come to some new arrangement about what benefit is the qualifying benefit. That is the important issue.
1329. Mr Pollock: Well, that is if they even use benefits at all. They may have some other more discerning arrangement. A process has evolved over a number of years — probably decades — whereby Departments have said that if you are in receipt of incapacity benefit, income support or a supplementary benefit, you are automatically entitled to a free school uniform, free school meals or whatever. Social security benefit was usually the easiest tag to hang those things on. The Department of Education, for example, could start with a clean sheet of paper now and say that, unless you have six kids or live in a certain area, you are not entitled to free school meals. A Department could redefine the qualifying criteria for a particular passported benefit.
1330. Mr Brady: Or they could abolish passported benefits altogether.
1331. Ms M Campbell: That will be a matter for the Executive. It has been discussed in the Executive subcommittee on welfare reform.
1332. The Chairperson: They will pick up the tab for it, too.
1333. Mr Pollock: Clause 61 deals with entitlement to work. Under current legislation, there is a possibility that people who are, or have been, working illegally could access contributory jobseeker's allowance. Under current legislation for contribution, an inference can be drawn that a claimant must have entitlement to work through the requirement to be available to work. This is for clarification, to put it beyond doubt and to introduce a specific condition of entitlement that states clearly that, to become entitled to this benefit, a person must have entitlement to work.
1334. It is around residency conditions. There was never any policy intention that a person with no entitlement to work in the UK should receive out-of-work benefits. This new condition of entitlement will ensure that that situation can no longer arise.
1335. The exact same issue is covered in the clauses for employment and support allowance, which is dealt with in clause 62, and for maternity allowance and statutory payments under clause 63.
1336. Mr Brady: Presumably, if you have no entitlement to work, you have not made contributions. Therefore, are they looking at people who worked and paid contributions but were working illegally? Some people have their passports stamped to show that they can work but do not have recourse to public money or benefits. Does it apply to habitual residents? It is not clear. People coming to England, the North or wherever could have stamped on their passport that they are not allowed to have recourse to public funds, but they may be entitled to work, because they have a partner or some such reason. Presumably, they could work and get contributions.
1337. Ms M Campbell: Yes.
1339. Mr C McLaughlin: It is supposed to. The problem with immigration authorities and us is that, as you say, Mickey, people are allowed to enter a country but there should not be recourse to public funds. If they go ahead and do a job illegally and the employers give them contributions, by our social security law, they are entitled to contributory benefits, despite the fact that the immigration authorities have said that they should not have recourse to public funds.
1340. Mr Brady: People from some of the non-accession countries such as Albania and Romania were entitled to come in and work but did not have recourse to benefits or public funds. That is borne out by cases that I have dealt with. In one case, a Romanian baby was getting

- inoculated and, when the practice found out that Romanian people were allowed to come in and work but did not have recourse to the National Health Service, for instance, it stopped giving the baby the vaccinations. That is the kind of situation that is evolving, and it will probably happen more. Presumably, that is aimed at those cases.
1341. Mr C McLaughlin: Yes. If people are not legally entitled to live here, they should not be getting anything.
1342. Mr Brady: Obviously, they did not after the practice found out. The baby got one injection and that was it. It is abhorrent that that should happen.
1343. The Chairperson: Michael, did you suggest that you were doing clauses 61, 62 and 63?
1344. Mr Pollock: Clauses 61, 62 and 63 are all of the same policy intent. Clause 61 deals with jobseeker's allowance, clause 62 deals with employment and support allowance and clause 63 deals with maternity allowance and statutory payments. As I said, that is to regularise the position to determine who is entitled.
1345. The Chairperson: We have completed up to and including clause 63. We will break for 10 minutes and start at Part 3, which deals with other benefit changes.
- Committee suspended.*
- On resuming —*
1346. The Chairperson: We are back in play. We will move to Part 3, which concerns other benefit changes. It starts with clause 64.
1347. Mr Pollock: Before we move on, I want to clarify something about clause 53, which relates to further entitlement after time-limiting under ESA. If someone is moved into a support group, that is when their period of requalification for the contributory support allowance would be reinstated. It would be in place only for the period in which they are in that support group, not for a further 365 days, which we possibly said.
1348. The Chairperson: OK. That is understood. Thank you, Michael.
1349. Mr Pollock: We are moving to Part 3, which concerns other benefit changes. Jane Corderoy, who will lead on parts of this, is with us. I will be dipping and out as well. I will hand over to Jane to deal with clauses 64 to 68, which concern industrial injuries benefit.
1350. Ms Jane Corderoy (Department for Social Development): Clause 64 repeals the legislation that maintains a separate scheme for providing no-fault compensation for work injuries that occurred before 1948. At present, there is separate provision for state compensation to be paid for accidents and diseases picked up at work that occurred before 5 July 1948 through the Workmen's Compensation (Supplementation) Scheme 1982. The scheme is known as the pre-1948 scheme. When this provision comes into operation, existing payments and claims for no-fault compensation for work injuries will be dealt with as claims under the main industrial injuries disablement benefit scheme, regardless of when the disease or accident occurred. That change is about removing unequal treatment and ensuring that everyone who is injured through their work is treated fairly. Essentially, it provides for the pre-1948 scheme to be abolished and responsibility to be transferred to the main industrial injuries benefit scheme. It will simplify and rationalise the scheme, reducing the complexities caused by separate schemes, with the aim of making it easier for claimants to understand. No one will lose out financially. New claims under the pre-1948 schemes are now extremely unlikely. Any current claims will receive the same rate of payment as they are currently on or a slightly higher rate. The clause enables the Department to make regulations, subject to negative resolution, with the aim of ensuring that new and outstanding claims are made, decided and appealed under the same rules.
1351. Mr Copeland: Does that impact on reduced earnings allowance that flows from the [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.]

1352. Ms Corderoy: I do not think so.

1353. Clause 65 removes the lower rate of industrial injuries disablement benefit that is payable to those who are under the age of 18. That means that all successful claimants, existing and new, will, in future, be paid at the normal industrial injuries disablement benefit scheme's rate, whatever their age. At present here, there are no claims to the lesser rate of payment for people who are injured and under the age of 18, but that may not always be the case. There is no reason why payments should vary on the grounds of age; everyone who is injured through their work should be treated equally and paid on the same basis. People suffering the same effects of any injury should receive the same rate of payment, whatever their age. Claimants under 18 will, in future, receive the same rates as people aged over 18. That will simplify the administration of the scheme and remove unjustified discrimination against those who are under 18.

1354. The Chairperson: Are members happy enough?

Members indicated assent.

1355. The Chairperson: OK. We will move swiftly to clause 66.

1356. Ms Corderoy: Clause 66 makes provision to enable trainees to be paid under the main industrial injuries disablement benefit scheme. Currently, because trainees are not employed earners, as is required by the existing legislation, they are not entitled to the main scheme but are required to apply to the analogous scheme, which is designed for those very few trainees who are disabled by an accident at work while participating in certain training schemes or courses. That is provided for by the Industrial Training (Northern Ireland) Order 1984. The scheme for trainees is being abolished, and responsibility will transfer to the main industrial injuries disablement benefit scheme. Trainees will, therefore, be treated as if they are employed earners and so will be eligible to claim under the main scheme. All claims will, in future, be made and decided using the same rules that apply to industrial injuries disablement benefit. No one here will lose out financially. Both schemes are identical, and the scheme for trainees has the same basic rules and payment rates as the main industrial injuries disablement benefit scheme. Payment levels will not need to be altered.

1357. Subsection (3) provides for regulations that are subject to negative resolution. The regulations will enable trainees to be treated equally as if they are employed earners under the same rules that apply to industrial injuries benefit. The aim of the clause and the regulations is to simplify and rationalise the scheme by reducing unnecessary complexities that are caused by running more than one scheme for the same purpose. It will make the scheme easier for claimants to understand and claim under and easier for staff to administer.

1358. The Chairperson: Thank you. If members are content, we will move to clause 67.

1359. Ms Corderoy: At present, industrial death benefit is paid to widows or widowers for industrial deaths that occurred before 10 April 1988. Claims in respect of deaths after that date are paid for under the bereavement benefit provisions. There have been no new claims for industrial death benefit in many years. Any new claims are now extremely unlikely as the death would have had to occur before April 1988, which is almost 25 years ago. Clause 67, therefore, removes the right to claim industrial death benefit. Payment will still continue on the existing caseload, so no one will have a reduction in payment. Essentially, the removal of that redundant right to claim industrial death benefit removes unnecessary legislation from the statute book.

1360. Mr Copeland: I wanted to check about civil partnerships. Saying widows or widowers suggests marriage, but that is being taken out of the equation. Is anything being put into the equation?

1361. Ms Corderoy: No, it will be replaced by bereavement benefit provision.
1362. Mr Copeland: Will civil partnerships be recognised for that aspect?
1363. Ms Corderoy: Yes.
1364. Mr Brady: Industrial death benefit was specific to somebody who died in the course of their work and, in some cases, could have been payable if their work involved travel to and from work. It was quite complex in that sense. With bereavement benefit, which is essentially for the surviving partner, I wonder, from a legal point of view, about a legal claim for compensation. Industrial death benefit was quite specific in that it was relatively easy to prove that the death had been directly as a result of an industrial action. Bereavement benefit is different because it really replaced the old widows' benefit, and survivors' benefit basically came into being because men, as a result of a European court case, were able to claim widowers' benefit. How might that impact? Has that been factored in or thought about?
1365. Ms Corderoy: I think that it has, yes. These are just technical things that are tidying it up.
1366. Mr Brady: It could make a difference in some ways. That particular benefit was specific for death caused by an industrial action, as opposed to bereavement benefit, which is a totally different concept. We need to clarify that.
1367. Mr Copeland: Will there be any changes to the perceived entitlement where, for example, a man or woman has disappeared and, after 30 or 40 years — this question is based on a real set of circumstances — the surviving partner has been informed by the Historical Enquiries Team (HET) or the police that the deceased partner is presumed to have been murdered but no death certificate has ever been issued because there is no body available? How do you establish whether there is an entitlement to that sort of benefit?
1368. Ms Corderoy: This Part relates solely to industrial injury.
1369. Mr Copeland: Is this not now going to partners? Sorry, you are right. I will ask you the same question outside because it is exercising me slightly at the minute.
1370. Ms Corderoy: If you ask me, I will find out.
1371. Mr Douglas: I have a question about deaths before the date. I knew some people who died of airway disease or an asthma-type disease before that date, and their families are still pursuing that even though it happened then. Does that mean that it just stops for them? One example involves the old Belfast Corporation. The family was trying to get records, and I know of someone who worked in Belfast Gasworks. I know that it is a lot of years ago, but some of those people are still widowers in their 80s or 90s.
1372. Mr Copeland: Pleural plaques and asbestosis are the same.
1373. Ms Corderoy: Has a death occurred because of that?
1374. Mr Douglas: Yes.
1375. Ms Corderoy: OK.
1376. Mr Douglas: They are trying to prove that it happened because, for example, the person worked in the gasworks.
1377. Ms M Campbell: They are getting normal bereavement benefits now. If that is proved, any difference in money will be paid. We can check that as well.
1378. The Chairperson: OK. We will move to clause 68.
1379. Ms Corderoy: Clause 68 abolishes the right to request an accident declaration. It has no effect on a person's right to claim industrial injuries disablement benefit in respect of that accident. To do that, it repeals article 29(2) of the Social Security (Northern Ireland) Order 1998. This provides for people to apply for an accident declaration confirming and recording that an accident has occurred without claiming industrial - injuries disablement benefit at the same time.

1380. If an accident causes disability at a later date, it will be investigated and decided upon in the usual manner by a decision-maker at the time of the claim. All available evidence is considered in all cases at the time a claim is made. The lack of a declaration will not in any way disadvantage or affect the claim. The decision is already made in the majority of claim cases when no accident declaration exists, irrespective of when the accident occurred. It is about simplifying processes, and the provision removes the need for separate decision and storage, meaning that the claimant only has to contact the Department once.
1381. Mr Brady: I have a question about unforeseen aggravation. Is that encapsulated in the legislation? For example, somebody could break their arm in an industrial accident, and, 10 years later, directly as a result, they could develop arthritis, thereby restricting the use of that arm. Provisions are in place at the moment to deal with that. People can go back and, because the Department has a record of the accident, which would have checked with the employer, it is easier to prove in a sense. If you do not have an accident declaration, effectively, it may abolish the right to claim for unforeseen aggravation.
1382. Ms Corderoy: We are assured that employers keep records of accidents at work under section 6 of the Social Security Administration (Northern Ireland) Act 1992. That would suffice as they keep a record of all —
1383. Mr Brady: It is my understanding that, in the initial stages of this, the right to claim for unforeseen aggravation was to be abolished. Is it possible to get clarification on that? Obviously, there are people who are making claims now for something that happened maybe 15 or 20 years ago because, as a direct result of the original industrial injury, other conditions have developed.
1384. Ms Corderoy: I think the decision-maker will investigate all the evidence at the time. You are saying that would be a problem because there is no declaration, but we feel that the information would already be recorded by the employer.
1385. Mr Brady: Again, that will require enforcement around the employer actually recording it. The legislation will abolish the right to request an accident declaration, so you are really relying on the efficiency of the employer. With respect, that is not a cast-iron guarantee, because the employer may not do it. Over the years, I have dealt with loads of cases where people go to the employer and report an accident but it was not recorded. It will rely on enforcement. I would like clarification on that point.
1386. The Chairperson: We will move to clause 69.
1387. Mr Pollock: I will deal with clause 69. It is another nice and contentious one about housing benefit. There has been lots of discussion in Committee and elsewhere around housing changes in particular. Clause 69 introduces two particular changes. One is the uprating according to the consumer price index instead of the retail price index. That is in line with other operating changes being applied across the board to other benefits.
1388. The second is the change that affects the working age claimants who are living in a social rented sector house. Housing benefit claims will be limited to reflect household size as now happens in the private sector, though there will be no equivalent of the shared accommodation rate, which, again, the Committee will be familiar with.
1389. The local housing allowance size criteria will be used to determine whether there is underoccupation. It is a more generous measure than the bedroom standard, as, for example, it allows an extra room for adults aged between 16 and 21, as it is under the bedroom standard.
1390. There will be two different percentage reductions made to the maximum

- housing benefit available. Generally, that is the amount of eligible rent that they could claim. It is based on whether the claimant is underoccupying the property by one bedroom or two. A 14% reduction will be made for people who underoccupy by a single bedroom, and a 25% reduction for underoccupancy of two or more bedrooms.
1391. It is a new approach to housing benefit in the social sector, and it is acknowledged that it will have a significant impact on various levels, as a large number of claimants could be affected. The average amounts of reductions in housing benefits are estimated at around £11.50 a week or £15 a week based on 2013-14 prices. The details of the policy will be set out in secondary legislation through regulations.
1392. Mr Copeland: Michael, I will put a few possible scenarios to try to establish the reality of this. In a situation where the Housing Executive has built a downstairs bedroom to be used by a disabled person, which renders an upstairs bedroom no longer occupied, would a reduction in housing benefit apply? Secondly, would it apply in a case where a single mother or father or, indeed, a new family has access or occasional access to children from previous relationships? [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.]
1393. Ms M Campbell: Foster carers, from memory of the last time.
1394. Mr Copeland: The other situation is that of a disabled person who, by reason of physical or mental disability requires someone to stay overnight to attend to their needs.
1395. Mr Pollock: There is provision in housing benefit legislation for a rate for an overnight carer, although it feels a bit incongruous if you are a carer and are charged with looking after someone. On separation or access to children, housing need is ordinarily based on whoever is regularly domiciled in the house.
1396. Mr Copeland: Does two nights every week constitute “regularly”?
1397. Mr Pollock: It would be the main residence. It would relate to whoever resides in the house for the majority of the time.
1398. Mr Copeland: Would the reduction apply to a situation where a downstairs bedroom or shower room was built for someone by the Housing Executive, thereby freeing a bedroom upstairs? Again, that would probably give rise to underoccupancy, but, in my view, there would be a justifiable cause in the circumstances.
1399. Mr Pollock: On the generality of the clause, we have not gone about setting out broad categories for exemptions. In due course, in GB and here, there will be the application of discretionary housing payments. For example, people with shared responsibility for children could possibly access discretionary housing payments for making up rental shortfall.
1400. Mr Copeland: Would the money available to satisfy the need for discretionary housing payments match the need before it ran out?
1401. Mr Pollock: That is still all up for grabs. The detail of how this would be applied in a particular situation in Northern Ireland in the social sector with the available housing stock is still to be thrashed out.
1402. Mr Copeland: Lastly, will that affect people who are of a pensionable age and in receipt of pension? A lot of pensioners find themselves in properties that their families grew up in. Possibly, their partner has died. Will they be included in this? In some cases, they could have one or two or three bedrooms empty.
1403. Ms M Campbell: Only where one partner is under pension age and in receipt of universal credit.
1404. Mr Copeland: That situation would cease when they achieve pension age?
1405. Mr F McCann: The clause mentions the determination of appropriate maximum. You gave a figure for what is being called the bedroom tax. Have you worked out

- how much people will lose in housing benefit by the new determination under clause 69?
1406. Mr Pollock: Under the operating —
1407. Mr F McCann: Yes. It goes back to the debate we had earlier on. People are being told that the changes are reforms, but the vast majority of the stuff that we are dealing with points to reductions. In clause 69, there is talk about liabilities to pay rent, and built into that has to be a reduction, given the way it is laid out. Will you check for me?
1408. Mr Pollock: I will. This Committee and the Assembly would have approved the regulations that effectively set a baseline to allow it to operate using the consumer price index. So, those baseline figures would have been set out in April last year. We will be using the consumer price index from this September to operate from next April.
1409. Mr F McCann: Where the clause says “Executive determination”, is it talking about the Executive here or the Housing Executive?
1410. Mr Pollock: The Housing Executive.
1411. Mr F McCann: If this has been worked on, you must be able to get a figure for the reduction in benefit.
1412. I will move onto the bedroom tax. I asked in the Assembly last week about the rooms that people call “box rooms”, which are found in most of the older Housing Executive and housing association properties and usually measure 8 feet by 10 feet. Are those rooms going to be reclassified? For many people, those rooms are large storerooms rather than bedrooms.
1413. Mr Pollock: That has been mentioned. I do not think that DWP has issued any particular guidelines on what constitutes a bedroom. We are looking at the issue of box rooms and what is the appropriate size for a room to count as bedroom.
1414. Mr F McCann: What were the two figures you mentioned for the cost of underoccupancy? You said there would be a 25% reduction in benefit for two rooms.
1415. Mr Pollock: A reduction of 14% for one bedroom, which is around £11.50 a week. The majority of individual claimants are likely to experience losses of less than £15.
1416. Mr F McCann: For two bedrooms, it is £11 a week.
1417. The Chairperson: It is £15 a week.
1418. Mr F McCann: That is £60 a month.
1419. Mr Pollock: Possibly, yes.
1420. Mr F McCann: That all boils down to the debate about the number of people who could lose their houses because they were in arrears. That is taking £60 a month from a benefit that is already stretched. In addition, people cannot necessarily move from area to area due to the legacy of the Troubles, which places a major difficulty on them. People will be getting £60 a month deducted from their benefits. What level of arrears could you build up before action is taken? The £60 a month will have a knock-on effect for people. Will you check that out for me too?
1421. Mr Pollock: The level of arrears you can build up?
1422. Mr F McCann: Yes.
1423. Mr Pollock: I will certainly have a wee look at that. As you know, nothing about housing is simple in Northern Ireland.
1424. Mr F McCann: I appreciate that.
1425. Mr Pollock: The Minister has his own views on direct payments, the Housing Executive and the housing stock. Those are all interlinked with this, but the general premise of the reforms, and particularly the housing benefit reforms, is to make things fairer for the taxpayer. A family on a certain level of income should not be disadvantaged. A family on benefits should not be able to afford a house better than someone’s who is getting a certain level of income.
1426. Mr F McCann: That goes back to the issue of it being a punishment.

1427. The Chairperson: That has been well flagged up and identified as an issue. However, the clause is designed to do certain things. Regardless of whether we agree with the reforms, the points have been made, so we are not going to have debate on whether they are a punishment. I accept what you said entirely.
1428. Mr F McCann: I have heard that upwards of 40,000 tenants will be directly affected by that. It goes back to the discretionary payments that Michael mentioned, and they are paid at the full rate for the first 13 weeks, 80% for the second 13 weeks, if you apply, and then nothing after that. So, there is no safety valve in there for the continuity of payments. For many people, all you are really doing is putting off the inevitable.
1429. The Chairperson: OK. The point is well made.
1430. Mr Pollock: We are getting considerably lower figures than the 40,000 that you are suggesting, but rest assured that we will come back and forward to Committee with further clarification.
1431. Mr F McCann: What figures are you getting, Michael?
1432. Mr Pollock: I do not have them in front of me, Fra. I cannot quote them.
1433. The Chairperson: That will form part of people's arguments. People will argue for or against this, but what we are trying to establish here is cut and dried, and that is the purpose of the clause as stated. People can clarify what they are not sure about. People can argue for or against the provisions, but that is another day's discussion and a separate day's work entirely. I want to steer clear of all that.
1434. Mr Douglas: We are still on clause 69, is that right?
1435. The Chairperson: Yes.
1436. Mr Douglas: Michael, this other paper says:
- "the Department may make regulations that limit the amount of housing benefit other than by reference to an Executive determination."*
1437. It says "may"; it does not "will". Is the flexibility there? Secondly, what does that actually mean?
1438. Mr Pollock: What are you reading from?
1439. Mr Douglas: It is 244. This big one.
1440. The Chairperson: Did you say 244?
1441. Ms M Campbell: Is it 344?
1442. The Chairperson: Is it 334?
1443. Mr Douglas: No, it is in this other paper.
1444. The Chairperson: Are you on the explanatory memorandum? It is on page 50, is that right, Sammy?
1445. Ms M Campbell: Is it 334?
1446. Mr Douglas: It says 244 on mine. It is Part 3, clause 69, housing benefit determination. Do you want a wee duke at this?
1447. The Chairperson: Share it over there, Sammy. The one we have is page 50 of the explanatory memorandum. It is 344 on page 50. It looks like you are reading a different paper.
1448. Mr Douglas: It is under clause 69, Chairman, on housing benefit. Do you want to leave it until later on?
1449. Mr Pollock: I will take a wee look at it and check with you later. It is 335 in ours. I am not sure about the detail of it. That is the standard reference grid point at the minute. I am not sure of the exact detail, but I will come back to you on it.
1450. The Chairperson: Are you happy to get a response later, Sammy?
1451. Mr Douglas: Yes.
1452. Mr Brady: I want to come back to a point that Michael raised. The alternative accommodation issue is for another day, but a disabled facilities grant is a legal entitlement from the Housing Executive. Will that be factored in to alternative accommodation if money has been spent? You may not - want to move, or the Housing Executive will not want you to move.

1453. Ms M Campbell: I will pick up on Mr Copeland's point. Where the house has been adapted and public money has been spent on it, that will all be taken into consideration. It is all about good use of public money at the end of the day and that old friend common sense.
1454. Mr Copeland: I refer to 337 on page 51. It is a bit complex for now, but, in the future, we could maybe get further explanation about it. The Housing Executive set the local housing allowance at the moment based on the information that is available to it. That will be transferred to the Department. What methodology will the Department use? Will it use the same figures? What will the impact be of assessing housing benefit not on what the Housing Executive says but, as it states:
- "by reference to the lower of either the CPI or the bottom 30th percentile of private sector rents."?*
1455. I want to see what that means; there are a lot of words in there.
1456. Mr Pollock: It would be the same process. GB has rent officers; here, that work is done by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive.
1457. Mr Copeland: Will they do it for the Department now instead?
1458. Mr Pollock: That is still in the melting pot.
1459. Ms Corderoy: Clause 70 allows for the abolition of the discretionary part of the social fund. The social fund was introduced more than two decades ago as part of the Fowler reforms of the social security system. Since then, welfare delivery has changed significantly. Clause 70 provides for the abolition of the discretionary social fund by repealing section 134(1)(b) of the Social Security Contributions and Benefits (Northern Ireland) Act 1992, which provides for community care grants, crisis loans and budgeting loans to be paid from the social fund. It also abolishes the Office of the Social Fund Commissioner and allows the Department, by order, to make provision for the transfer of property rights and liabilities from the commissioner. It also makes provision for the transfer of money from the social fund into the consolidated fund.
1460. As the Committee is aware, there was a public consultation on the Department's new policy for discretionary support, and details of the proposed new scheme to replace the discretionary social fund will be brought forward in due course.
1461. Clause 70 also provides for schedule 8 to the Bill, if you want the schedules in order. The schedule amends the Social Security Administration Act 1992 as a consequence of the abolition of the discretionary social fund. Those are minor amendments to clarify or ensure continuing application of remaining powers in sections 74 and 75 of the Social Security Administration Act 1992.
1462. In summary, schedule 8 does three things. First, it clarifies that the reference to payment to meet funeral expenses are those made out of the social fund under the revised section 134 of the Contributions and Benefits (Northern Ireland) Act 1992. Secondly, it clarifies that outstanding existing social fund loans made under the GB legislation can continue to be recovered by deductions from certain benefits payable in Northern Ireland. Thirdly, the amendment to schedule 4 ensures that the Social Fund Commissioner and any staff who have been involved in the social fund will still be subject to penalties for unauthorised disclosure of personal information and data, even when they have finished working in the social fund field and the Office of the Social Fund Commissioner has been abolished.
1463. Mr Brady: Will the Office of the Social Fund Commissioner last for the transition into the consolidated fund, or whatever alternative to the social fund is brought in? Will it go at that stage? Is it only a transitory measure?

1464. Ms Corderoy: Yes. The contract has been extended until the new discretionary fund comes in. I think that they are considering how that will be independently —
1465. Mr Brady: I would like clarity. At last week's long and protracted debate, we were told that the social fund would lose £200 million if the Bill was not ratified by a certain date. Surely, what is in the transition period will carry through until the new consolidated fund, or whatever they will call it, comes into being.
1466. Ms Corderoy: When I mentioned the commissioner, I meant that the commissioner in GB has gone.
1467. Mr Brady: In GB or Britain, or whatever you want to call it, they have gone to the local authorities because they have the infrastructure. We do not. Presumably, the social fund will carry on until an alternative is put in place.
1468. Ms Corderoy: As I understand it, that cannot happen because the money and the IT operational equipment will not be there.
1469. Mr Brady: Surely, it is incumbent upon the Department to get the alternative into place as soon as possible. They told us that it would be our fault, when, in fact, if they do not do the business, it will be down to them.
1470. Mr Pollock: As part of the legislative process, the replacement scheme would be facilitated by a Government amendment at Consideration Stage that will set out the detail of how that is to be handled. That is for the Executive to agree. Once it has been agreed, it can be allocated to the block proper.
1471. Ms M Campbell: Regulations will be brought forward as well, but you need the primary power before we can bring the regulations forward.
1472. Ms Corderoy: Clause 71 extends the scope of budgeting loans from the existing social fund to include maternity and funeral expenses. At present, there are two types of social fund payment: regulated payments in the form of Sure Start maternity grants and funeral payments to meet maternity and funeral expenses, and discretionary payments in the form of budgeting loans, crisis loans or community care grants to meet other needs. The regulated payments are non-repayable and designed to help with extra costs at certain times in a person's life, such as a funeral or a new baby. Budgeting loans as part of the discretionary payments are repayable interest-free loans that are designed to help claimants to meet expenses that are difficult to budget for out of their regular benefit. Currently, payment is not available from the discretionary social fund to help people to pay for any funeral or maternity expenses. This clause will amend that.
1473. Since March 2011, the Sure Start maternity grant has been restricted to the first child in the family. That restriction recognises that families face the highest levels of expenses when a new baby is the only child in a household. Continued support for low-income families at that expensive time is provided for by the £500 grant.
1474. Extending the scope of the budgeting loan scheme to include maternity expenses will provide an alternative source of support for families having their second or subsequent child. Similarly, making budgeting loans available for funeral expenses will be helpful where the full cost of a funeral cannot be met by the funeral payment or the estate of the deceased. That may also reduce the need for some benefit recipients to turn to high-cost lenders when faced with such additional expense in times of need. It will not replace funeral payments or Sure Start maternity grants, which will be unaffected by the change.
1475. Making the change now, in advance of the introduction of universal credit, will not only help people in the interim but will ensure that wider access to assistance is carried forward to universal credit, where budgeting loans will be replaced with an advanced payment of universal credit.

1476. Mr F McCann: I am trying to work this out. What that actually means is that you can still get a community care grant or a non-repayable grant for a funeral payment, but, if it falls short of the required amount, you can apply for a budget loan to make up the difference.
1477. Ms Corderoy: Once this comes in, you will not be able to get a community care grant or crisis loan; however, you can still get the regulated help for funeral expenses or your first baby. That means that you will still be able to apply for a budgeting loan for those things that you would not have been able to apply for before.
1478. Mr F McCann: There will still be part of the funeral expenses that you do not have to pay back.
1479. Ms Corderoy: Yes.
1480. Mr F McCann: In most cases with people on benefit, there is a large shortfall in the amount of money that is required, so you can apply for a budget loan.
1481. Ms Corderoy: Yes. It exists now so that it will be in place for when it goes into universal credit. Clause 72 is a technical amendment that puts beyond doubt that the Department has control over the maximum amounts that budgeting loan applicants can borrow and how those amounts can be arrived at. To do that, the new provisions are inserted into section 136 of the Social Security Contributions and Benefits Act 1992. That section sets out the principles of the determination of the discretionary social fund.
1482. Clause 72(2) makes it clear that directions that are issued by the Department may prevent an award of a budgeting loan being made for an amount above that specified or calculated in a specified way. The provisions inserted by clause 72(3) relate to the way in which that amount may be arrived at. The maximum amount is variable. Clause 72 includes specific provision that affirms the Department's power to set a limit to be applied in all budgeting loan decisions. That will cover budgeting loans for the interim period before universal credit is fully operational.
1483. Mr F McCann: In respect of funeral payments and applying for a budget loan for the shortfall, does that include the purchase of a grave?
1484. Mr C McLaughlin: Yes. As you know, the funeral payments regulations contain a list of what you can claim for. If there is a shortfall, they can look for a budget loan.
1485. Mr F McCann: That is fine.
1486. Mr Copeland: When you have a family unit with joint claimants, is the entitlement to a budgeting loan on the basis of the two people as a joint claim, or do they have an individual entitlement?
1487. Ms Corderoy: It is on a sliding scale. They can get more if they are a couple or a family.
1488. Mr Copeland: What I mean is when one component part of a couple is axed out, does there become an availability in the other, or is it judged on the basis of them as a legal entity as a couple?
1489. Ms Corderoy: I will have to come back to you on that; I do not have that detail.
1490. The Chairperson: Does anybody have any questions on clause 72? If not, we will move on to clause 73.
1491. Ms Corderoy: Clause 73 repeals sections 15 to 17 of the Welfare Reform Act (Northern Ireland) 2010, which made provision for community care grants to be awarded as items rather than as cash payments. Those provisions were never commenced, and, given the intention to abolish the existing social fund scheme, the Department does not intend to use them. The repealing of community care grants provided for in the Bill makes the provisions in the 2010 Act unnecessary. The replacement discretionary support scheme is still under consideration, and proposals for that will be brought forward in due course.
1492. Mr Pollock: Clause 74 amends the State Pension Credit Act (Northern - Ireland) 2002 to change the entitlement conditions for the additional amount of guarantee credit in respect of caring responsibilities and to remove the explicit link to carer's allowance in that Act. Clause 74 amends section 2 of the State Pension Credit Act 2002 to provide for an additional amount to be added to the guarantee credit where the claimant has regular and substantial caring responsibilities. It also amends section 17 of that Act to provide that the term "regular and substantial caring responsibilities" is defined in regulations. The clause changes the entitlement conditions for the additional amount for carers and enables the criteria for its award to be set out in regulations. That will enable the initial amount to be awarded where, as now, the customer or the partner is entitled to carer's allowance. It gives the flexibility to set an alternative test to award the additional amount to those who have regular and substantial caring responsibilities but who do not claim carer's allowance.

1493. The policy intention is that any new qualifying criteria specified will ensure that the same group of people as now will be entitled to the additional amount for carers. That is, those who would be entitled to carer's allowance under the current rules if they were to make a claim. Additionally, that flexibility will allow us to remove an element of irrationality in the existing rules, whereby customers must claim and establish entitlement to carer's allowance to become entitled to the additional amount for carers even when they know that they will not be paid because they are already in receipt of state pension credit.
1494. Mr Brady: The criteria at the moment for substantive caring responsibilities are normally defined by — [Inaudible.] — carer's allowance. Many people carry out the responsibilities and the 35 hours a week minimum but do not claim it, for whatever reason. Will there be some discretion in deciding on the definition of substantive caring responsibilities?
1495. Mr Pollock: It is to be defined in regulations.
1496. Mr Brady: There will be guidelines, presumably. We will look to see what those may be, because it will only apply, presumably, to people under state pension age. At the moment, a pensioner is not entitled to carer's allowance but has an underlying entitlement. That needs to be clarified.
1497. Mr Pollock: We will certainly look at that.
1498. Mr Brady: Particularly if the disabled person is under state pension age and the carer is state pension age and the premium would be included if the younger person was the claimant. [Inaudible.] contributions, I suppose. We need to clarify that, if possible.
1499. Mr Pollock: OK. I will get something for you. Clause 75 is again about state pension credit and deals with the capital limit. The clause amends the State Pension Credit Act to provide for a capital limit to be applied to state pension credit. Universal credit will replace housing benefit for working-age claimants. We are now introducing a housing credit into pension credit, which will provide support for rental costs for people over women's state pension age. There is currently no capital limit for entitlement to state pension credit. However, a claimant can only be entitled to housing benefit if they have capital below the prescribed limit, which is set at £16,000. An exception to that capital rule applies where a claimant is also in receipt of the guaranteed credit element of pension credit.
1500. In those cases, receipt of the guaranteed credit provides a passport to full support for eligible housing costs, irrespective of the level of the capital held. The aim of the change is that the existing housing benefit rules should be broadly carried across housing credit and pension credit. However, as set out, that is a complicated picture. We recognise that it is important that pension credit continues to operate in a way that is clear to customers and staff once housing credit has been incorporated.

- Making the power to introduce the capital limit that can be exercised in respect of one or all elements of pension credit allows for the possibility of simplification through alignment of the rules across pension credit.
1501. Again, this is complicated. It goes without saying that one of the main issues in the reform agenda is the need to simplify things, and this change is a fair example of that.
1502. Mr Copeland: I want to try to get something right in my head. I know about a specific case where a caravan that was purchased 10 years ago for £3,600 has been classified as a holiday home and a ridiculous value has been apportioned to it for the purposes of pension credit. An overpayment of pension credit has now arisen in this case, even though the caravan itself has deteriorated to such an extent that it cannot be used, but, because of the contractual agreements, the customer cannot get rid of it. I was wondering whether there is an appeal mechanism to challenge the classification of something as capital outside the value that is locked in a person's house. How is it that a caravan that is worth nothing suddenly acquires a value, which is then applied against the owner for pension credit?
1503. Mr Pollock: I can certainly look into that for you, Michael. As with all assets, there should be some sort of recognition of its depreciation to say that it is worth nothing now. Is there is some benefit or value ascribed to it?
1504. Mr Copeland: Because of the contractual arrangements, they are committed to maintaining the pitch, which is, I think, £1,300 a year, but it would cost them more than that to take the caravan away. I am just curious because it is classified as a holiday home.
1505. Mr C McLaughlin: Has a valuation been put on it?
1506. Mr Copeland: The valuation put on it by the Department was far in excess of what the thing is actually worth. I am just wondering whether there is an appeal mechanism.
1507. Mr C McLaughlin: There is.
1508. Mr Copeland: I will talk to you outside about that.
1509. The Chairperson: Fair enough, Michael?
1510. Mr Copeland: Will that be ameliorated into the new proposals. In other words, will cases such as that cease to exist?
1511. Mr Pollock: There is no intention to dilute any of the appeal mechanisms.
1512. Mr Brady: To clarify, for pension credit at the moment, there is no outer limit for capital. You lose a £1 for every — 1513. Mr C McLaughlin: Two pounds fifty.
1514. Mr Brady: Therefore a person could end up with a small amount of pension credit and still be entitled to passport benefits. What the regulation does is limit the amount of capital that you can have when claiming a state pension and brings it into line with the amount that you can have when claiming housing benefit, which is, as I say, £16,000. It is actually a cut for people on pension credit, because the outer limit will be capped.
1515. Mr Pollock: The idea is to simplify it, not cut it.
1516. Mr Brady: Again, another euphemism for “cut”.
1517. The Chairperson: OK. We will move on to clause 76.
1518. Mr Pollock: That is Part 3 finished, Chairman.
1519. The Chairperson: OK. Thank you. The officials who were due to deal with Part 4 are on their way. They did not get the times mixed up; they just did not think that we would have progressed so far. Given that it is 3.50 pm, I propose that, rather than have those officials come up to deal with what is a hefty section, we move on to the next section and complete it this afternoon. Part 5 on benefit cap is on page 69 of your explanatory memorandum. As I said, there is no point in bringing officials up at this late hour when you are here. We can deal with the next part of the Bill,

- which is substantial enough itself. If members are content, we will skip Part 4 and do it in the morning, and we will move now to Part 5.
1520. Mr Pollock: Clause 95 deals with the benefit cap and provides the power that allows us to apply a cap on the amount of welfare or benefit that a household can receive, taking account of the average earnings of working households in Great Britain. The average in Great Britain is slightly higher than that in Northern Ireland and will ensure parity across the United Kingdom.
1521. Although the measure will provide some valuable savings, it is not primarily a financial savings measure. The primary objective is to tackle the culture of welfare dependency by setting a clear limit on what people can expect to get from the benefits system.
1522. It is important that the benefits system is fair and is seen to be fair to both the individuals who are claiming from it and the taxpayers who pay for it. It is not reasonable or fair that households getting out-of-work benefits should receive greater incomes than the average weekly net wage for working households.
1523. The clause will allow us to prescribe in regulations how the cap will operate. The regulations will set out how we will calculate a household's overall entitlement to welfare benefits, the amount of any deduction to be made and the benefits that the deduction can be made from.
1524. The clause makes it clear that we will not include state pension credit or the state retirement pension in the operation of the cap.
1525. The reforms to the welfare system will ensure that the most vulnerable households will continue to be supported. Therefore, the clause will allow us to set those circumstances that we believe to be appropriate to exempt households from the impacts of the cap. That is, broadly speaking, the intention of clause 95.
1526. Mr Durkan: I asked whether child benefit is included in the benefit cap, and it is. How many families or households in Northern Ireland do you think the proposed cap of £500 will affect? Given that child benefit is included, is it discriminatory against large families?
1527. Ms M Campbell: The number of households affected is 620 by the time you take out all the exclusions, which is less than 1% of the total. The total number of households estimated to have payments in excess of the cap is 13,300. The vast majority of those households are excluded because of their receipt of the exemption benefits, such as DLA. When you strip that all out, you are left with approximately 620 households. That figure does not take account of any future socio-demographic or economic developments that may impact, so the numbers are all heavily caveated by statisticians. Of the households affected by the cap, 61% will lose up to £50 per week and a further quarter will lose between £50 and £100 per week.
1528. Mr Durkan: OK.
1529. Mr Pollock: Clause 96 is also related to the benefit cap and makes supplementary provisions. Clause 96 makes supplementary provisions to introduce the cap in clause 95. The provisions explain how we intend to use the powers in clause 95, making different provisions for different purposes. For example, the cap will affect couples and single people differently.
1530. The clause amends the Social Security Administration Act 1992 to state that we will review the level of the benefit cap each year to see whether it has retained its relationship with the level of average earnings. It also allows us to increase or decrease the level of cap following the review as considered appropriate. Finally, the clause clarifies the position for appeals against the application of the benefit cap.
1531. Mr Copeland: I would like clarification on the level of average earnings. Is - that the increase or decrease in the level of average earnings or the actual level? There is already an assumption that, in some cases, people are better off on benefits than they would be in employment. Will there be a period of equalisation? In other words, if average earnings go up by 3% according to the CPI, or whatever it is, will that be reflected in an increase in the benefit?

1532. Ms M Campbell: Yes. It is actually advantageous to claimants in Northern Ireland because the cap is based on the GB median wage, which is higher than the Northern Ireland median wage.
1533. Mr Copeland: Therefore, in some respects, trying to close the differential by making people who are in work more advantaged could build in a degree of continuing variance.
1534. Ms M Campbell: Possibly. However, I do not think that we would want to shout about that as it is to our advantage.
1535. Mr Copeland: I understand that. I am just curious.
1536. Ms M Campbell: The benefit cap will be reviewed annually, I imagine, in line with the annual minimum wage up-rate. I think that that is done by regulations.
1537. Mr Copeland: This may be stupid, but I want to understand precisely what is meant by benefits: these are benefits above and beyond entitlements that people might have to other payments such as income from CMED; that is not a benefit as such.
1538. Ms M Campbell: There is a list of benefits that take people out of the benefit cap. We will send that to you through the Chair.
1539. Mr Copeland: Thank you.
1540. Mr F McCann: I was trying to work this out. If a family has £400 a month taken out of their budget, that will have severe consequences on their ability to survive. Is a safety valve built in to allow such families to tap into any additional resources that are available?
1541. Mr Pollock: The safety cap would be the things that we have talked about, such as hardship provisions —
1542. Mr F McCann: They will have to pay that money back.
1543. Mr Pollock: In some cases, yes.
1544. Ms M Campbell: What the agency plans to do now is identify the families that are likely to be affected and start working with them in advance of the cap coming in to help them to effect a change in their circumstances. That could be a change of house, an increase in their hours, a move to higher-paid work or whatever. However, there will be losers. There is no doubt about that, and you cannot hide it.
1545. Mr F McCann: Are many of those 620 working and also classed as low-earners?
1546. Mr Pollock: I do not think that we have any breakdown of them as yet, Fra.
1547. Ms M Campbell: I am not sure whether we have that.
1548. Mr F McCann: I heard somewhere that 37% of those affected by the shared room allowance will be low-paid people. Rather than penalising people who are not working, it seems that this too will have a mixture of people. People could be penalised just because they come from a large family.
1549. Ms M Campbell: The 620 households were ranked in order of their household income and split equally into five groups called quintiles. Their income was then compared to the benefit cap threshold. Those in the bottom quintile — those who have the lowest welfare income — were estimated to receive £5·91 per week in excess of the cap. Removing that excess would mean that they will lose approximately 1%.
1550. Mr Pollock: These are benefit recipients as opposed to people in work. The idea is that those on low income would have access to universal credit as well. In that sense, I cannot see how they would be affected.

1551. Mr F McCann: It has not worked for them as far as the shared room allowance is concerned. People who are entitled to housing benefit at the moment will lose out because their benefit will be cut. They will have to move out of one-bedroom apartments because they need housing benefit to supplement their rent. I am probably going off at a tangent, but I am trying to work out how many people on low pay will be affected by the cap.
1552. Mr Pollock: I cannot see how anybody on low income would be affected by the benefit cap.
1553. Mr Durkan: Is child benefit included?
1554. The Chairperson: OK, so, we are not 100% sure.
1555. Mr Douglas: This question is not related to your number 4, or whatever it is. It says that the benefit cap can be applied to a couple. Different benefits apply to couples in different ways; for example, for some benefits one member of the couple could be the claimant, while for other benefits both members must claim jointly.
1556. Mr Pollock: Must claim jointly?
1557. Mr Douglas: Yes. Will you give us an example?
1558. Mr Pollock: Universal credit would be a joint couple claim, as such.
1559. Mr Douglas: In other words, there would be one person.
1560. Mr Pollock: There would be one claim for the household.
1561. Mr C McLaughlin: JSA is the same, with joint couples.
1562. The Chairperson: OK, let us move to clause 97.
1563. Mr Pollock: Clause 97 deals with claims and awards. It amends the existing rules governing how claims for benefits may be made. Most benefit claims are governed by the rules set out in the Social Security Administration (Northern Ireland) Act 1992. Those rules determine how benefits are claimed and the ways in which they may be paid.
1564. The rules govern, for instance, the way in which a claim should be made and the information that must be supplied when making a claim. The payment rules govern issues such as the frequency and power to pay some of a claimant's benefit to a third party.
1565. In general, the existing rules will apply to universal credit and personal independence payment, which is the replacement for DLA, ensuring that the administration of the scheme will fit consistently with the administration of other benefits. This clause makes minor amendments to the provisions to deal with situations in which benefit claims may be made jointly.
1566. The clause also provides for regulations to specify the conditions that must be met before a person can receive an award of benefit in advance. This brings the Social Security Administration (Northern Ireland) Act 1992 provisions into line with the advance awards for ESA under the powers of the Welfare Reform Act (Northern Ireland) 2007.
1567. Finally, the clause expands the changes in circumstances that a claimant is required to notify; for example, where those might affect the work-related requirements that a claimant is expected to meet but do not have an immediate effect on work.
1568. The Chairperson: OK, thank you. We shall move to clause 98.
1569. Mr Pollock: Clause 98 deals with the information, and the powers to require information, relating to claims and awards. This provision replaces existing powers relating to regulations to require information or evidence relevant to claims or awards of social security benefits.
1570. Current legislation only allows that such regulations relate to existing individual claims and awards. The proposed amendment will extend the power so that information can be required in relation to potential claims and awards.

- Information on potential claims will help the Department in the development of future policy initiatives for payments.
1571. The Chairperson: OK, let us move to clause 99.
1572. Mr Pollock: Clause 99 deals with payments for and to joint claimants. It clarifies the existing power in the Social Security Administration (Northern Ireland) Act 1992 to decide who should be paid benefit and includes power for the Department to determine which person should be paid in a joint-award situation. Currently, payments of benefits are normally made to the claimant. For couples, ordinarily one partner will make the claim, with their partner's income and capital being taken into account and rates paid accordingly. The exception is joint claimants of JSA, where partners can decide between them who receives the payment. As we discussed when Martina was going through the clauses on universal credit, it will routinely be a single payment to a household, with couples who live together claiming jointly.
1573. Determining the recipient of the payment in cases with a single claimant is straightforward; the claimant receives the payment. However, where a claim is made by a couple, a decision must be made as to who will receive the payment. In most cases, it is believed that the couple should decide between themselves who should be paid the money and how the funds are then apportioned within the household. This clause provides for couples to nominate in this way. It is envisaged that this will happen in the majority of cases. However, there may be a limited number of cases in which it is not appropriate for the couple to make the decision. It may be as simple as cases in which a couple cannot or does not decide. Alternatively, it may be necessary when it is clearly in the best interests of the family for one partner rather than the other to be paid; for example, if someone has substance or alcohol abuse problems or whatever.
1574. Again, this issue was raised a few times previously and in the debate. The general intention is that a single payment under universal credit will be paid to the household.
1575. Ms M Campbell: It allows the flexibility for split payments.
1576. The Chairperson: Under what circumstances? This is one of the more contentious aspects of the Bill. If two partners decide to split the payment between them, that is their choice. Given that such flexibility is provided for, how will the Department respond if two people, by choice, want to split the payment but do not state that one of them is an alcohol abuser, or whatever?
1577. Ms M Campbell: Again, the decision-makers' guidance will specify the circumstances in which departmental intervention is required or where the payment can be split or paid to someone other than the person making the claim. That is why it will be important that the guidance is explicit. We can expand the explanatory note further to provide clarification on that as well.
1578. Mr Copeland: As you, quite rightly, said, the key to this will be the guidance. Personally, I think that this is a recipe for disaster. It is an instance in which legislation meets the real world, and I am not keen to endorse this in any way until we have seen the guidance. I do not know whether it has been developed yet, or even scoped. In my view, this provision will give rise to major difficulties.
1579. Mr Brady: To clarify: it gives flexibility to the Department to use discretion to pay one partner. The definition does not encompass split payment. That is a different issue.
1580. Ms M Campbell: It does allow for the personal allowance to be paid to one party and the balance paid to the other.
1581. Mr Pollock: So, that would be a split, if you like.
1582. Mr Brady: We will need some guidance or clarification on that. The old split

- payments provisions allowed for the single person's allowance and the rest to be paid separately.
1583. Ms M Campbell: I think that the legislation is fine as drafted, but we could put something more in the explanatory memorandum, which holds a lot of sway because it explains the policy intention behind the clause.
1584. The Chairperson: Thank you. Fair enough; we will return to that at some point. We will move on to clause 100.
1585. Mr Pollock: Clause 100 deals with payments on account that are currently awarded on a discretionary basis when a claim for benefit cannot be paid or determined immediately. They are provided for by regulations made under the Social Security Administration (Northern Ireland) Act 1992. Clause 100 amends that Act to extend the range of circumstances in which payments on account can be made. These changes are needed primarily as a further consequence of the ending of the discretionary social fund, which Jane touched on earlier. This clause will allow for a single system of recoverable payments known as short-term advances to replace interim payments of benefit and social fund crisis loans. Short-term advances will be available when it is not practical for a benefit claim to be made or determined immediately, for an award to be determined or paid in full immediately, or in cases of extreme need.
1586. There will be additional flexibility in the new system to take account of the fact that claimants will continue to receive universal credit while in work. For example, short-term advances will be made to prevent severe financial difficulty when a person in work who also receives universal credit does not receive their wages as a result of their employer going into administration or receivership.
1587. The clause will also allow the Department to pay in advance of benefit where it considers, in accordance with the criteria to be set out in regulations, that such payment can reasonably be expected to be recovered. These types of payments on account, to be known as budgeting advances, will replace social fund budgeting loans. The system for applying for budgeting advances will allow for online applications and automated decision-making. This will make the system simpler for claimants and significantly cheaper to administer.
1588. There will be greater transparency over the maximum amount of advances that can be made and the terms under which they will be recovered. That will support claimants to make sensible budgeting decisions and take control of their personal financial situations. Claimants will be able to borrow only what they can reasonably be expected to pay back through regular deductions from benefit. It is imperative that there is provision to enable benefit claimants to cope with short-term expenses, and when the need arises, to offer support for budgeting to those on the lowest incomes.
1589. Mr Brady: It seems like a switch in emphasis because it talks about living expenses that are difficult to budget for out of normal benefit income, such as fridges or cookers. In particular, replacement of a cooker breaking down would generally have been considered essential under a community care grant. The emphasis has changed. Presumably, too, the recovery aspect would encompass hardship payments, apart from the ESA that you mentioned earlier, which would be from the likes of JSA.
1590. When the social fund came in, budget loans were seen as a good idea and self-financing. The difficulty that I found, however, was that after a relatively short period, they were probably taking back huge amounts of money. I had people 15 years ago who were getting £28 deducted from their weekly benefit, putting them £28 below subsistence level. When we talk about caps, will there be a cap on the amount recoverable on a weekly basis from someone in receipt of benefit? At the moment there is not, as far as I am aware.

1591. I want to make a point about parity: historically, the recovery of payments, overpayments and other payments here has been higher than in Britain. I think even the Department would acknowledge that. Parity tends to be selective when it comes to that.
1592. The Chairperson: OK, so you are looking for more information at a later point?
1593. Mr Brady: Yes. Will there be a cap on repayments, because that is what causes hardship for people. The Department is saying, “We will give you money for an item because you are stuck” — and they talk about kids being on holiday during the summer. There is realisation or acknowledgement that school meals are so essential that families cannot afford to feed their kids during the summer. That is reality. However, if you recover too much from benefit, it goes below subsistence level. That was at the discretion of the social fund people.
1594. The Chairperson: OK, you can come back on that.
1595. Mr Pollock: Clause 101 deals with the power to require consideration of revision before appeal. It should be read in tandem with schedule 7. Clause 101 and schedule 11 relate to decision-making and appeals. They provide enabling powers to make regulations to introduce a formal reconsideration stage before a person is able to apply to an appeal tribunal.
1596. Currently, if a claimant is dissatisfied with their social security decision, they can apply for a revision of it on any grounds, normally within one month. That triggers an internal reconsideration process, at the end of which a decision notice is issued that revises or refuses to revise the original decision. If the revision is refused, the claimant has a further month in which to appeal the original decision. Alternatively, the claimant can simply appeal the decision. In those cases, the decision is routinely considered, but the reconsideration process takes place after the claimant has already decided to appeal to a tribunal.
1597. The proposed change will enable more disputes to be resolved through the internal reconsideration process. The process will allow a claimant’s decision to appeal to be informed by whether a reconsideration has provided them with a clearer justification for the original decision and a clearer explanation of it. The reconsideration process also enables new information or evidence to be taken into account that may not have been available when the original decision was made.
1598. Claimants will, therefore, be able to make a positive choice to appeal after their case has been reconsidered. That contrasts with the present position in which they have to make a positive decision to withdraw their appeal if they are content with the reconsideration process. The change does not alter a person’s right of appeal. It just requires them to go through an internal reconsideration process first. Schedule 11 makes the corresponding provision in relation to child support, recovery of benefits, housing benefit and lump sum payments in respect of diffuse Mesothelioma. That is clause 101.
1599. Mr Brady: Just to clarify; the explanatory and financial memorandum states:
“In particular, regulations may provide that there is to be a right of appeal only where the Department has considered whether to revise the decision”.
1600. What happens at the moment in a lot of cases, given that there is already a reconsideration process in place, is that people tend to appeal immediately because they believe that the reconsideration process will not go further and because of the length of time it will take to get a decision. You say that claimants will now have a further month in which to appeal but, for a lot of people, that will just add another month to the length of time that they are left waiting. The process is already in place, so I am not sure how this is going to improve the existing situation, which is not that effective.
1601. The other issue is that if someone is turned down for benefits, they may not

- get paid during the reconsideration period. If they then appeal, they may not get paid for another month.
1602. Mr Pollock: I think that the aim is to resolve more disputes and to do so internally through the reconsideration process.
1603. Mr Brady: I accept that that is the aim, but the reality is that there is already a reconsideration process in place, which does not really work. There is nothing in this legislation that will enhance what is already there. I take your point about what it is saying — that the policy objective is to make sure that more decisions are made more quickly by the Department.
1604. Mr Pollock: It will be quicker, and if there is additional information that was not available at the time, that could be —
1605. Mr Brady: I suppose the crux of the question is this: how will this differ from what is already in existence?
1606. Mr C McLaughlin: It is mandatory. They actually have to seek a reconsideration.
1607. Mr Brady: Exactly. That is my point. All it is going to do is prolong the agony.
1608. Ms Corderoy: As part of this, the agency is looking at the wider appeals process, in which this is included, in order to improve and define it and make it faster. Mandatory consideration is really about providing more information to a person earlier so that they can decide whether it is worth appealing.
1609. Mr Brady: I admire your tenacity in explaining that, but I do not necessarily understand it.
1610. Mr Copeland: I may have got my wires crossed entirely here. Under the current system for social fund loans, when you apply for an oven or a cooker from the social fund or a community care grant, you get a decision. You can then ask, by telephone, to have that decision looked at again. After that, you can ask for a face-to-face meeting in a social security office, and if all that fails, you can then go to the appeal stage. Are we are talking about the same thing here?
- Will the face-to-face entitlement still pertain? Will claimants be entitled to a face-to-face meeting to have a decision reviewed? Or is this nothing to do with that at all?
1611. Mr C McLaughlin: This is nothing to do with that.
1612. Mr Copeland: I got confused by the reference to a cooker, which appears to be a perennial issue.
1613. Mr Pollock: That was the previous clause.
1614. Mr Copeland: In other words, clause 100 and clause 101 relate to two totally different things, and one does not refer to the other.
1615. Mr Pollock: This is clause 101.
1616. Mr Copeland: I understand that, but clause 101 is not a progression from clause 100 apart from numerically?
1617. Mr Pollock: No.
1618. The Chairperson: OK. We will move on to clause 102.
1619. Mr Pollock: Clause 102 clarifies the Department's approach to legislation that enables the use of electronic communications. Currently, if the Department wishes to authorise electronic communications for business, it has to make an order under the Electronic Communications Act (Northern Ireland) 2001. That Act enables Departments to modify existing legislation, including Acts, to facilitate electronic communication and electronic storage.
1620. This clause makes it clear that regulations made under social security legislation can include the type of provision that could be made under the Electronic Communications Act (Northern Ireland) 2001. This could include, for example, provisions about the form that the electronic communication must take and the conditions under which electronic communication is allowed.
1621. Amending the existing provision in the Social Security Administration (Northern - Ireland) Act 1992 and the Social Security (Northern Ireland) Order 1998 will enable the Department to include provision for electronic communications in regulations, rather than to have to make a separate order. In essence, this is not anything new. The clause simply allows provision to be made under social security legislation rather than electronic communications legislation. It enables a simpler, more transparent and more effective approach to introducing electronic communications into the benefits system. That is the general thrust of clause 102.

1622. Mr Copeland: About three months ago, there was a bit of a furore about the Government collecting cookies when people were using their computers to interface with government computers. Some regulations and changes were introduced in England. Will that will be factored in here. In other words, when someone logged on to a government website, the website was collecting information from the person's computer. About three months ago, it was a real big story on the mainland.
1623. Mr Pollock: It sailed right over my head.
1624. Mr Copeland: I will try to get the detail on that. I asked some questions about it at the time.
1625. The Chairperson: If you do not know anything about it, let us move on.
1626. Mr Copeland: I am content that we do not know anything about it. Maybe we are better not knowing.
1627. The Chairperson: You can come back and pop up later on with it.
1628. Mr Brady: I presume that electronic communications relate solely to computers and IT rather than to mobile phones. Obviously, people can access information through mobile phones. To widen this slightly, the majority of people on benefits who I deal with have pay-as-you-go phones and have great difficulty in accessing information from local offices because it costs them so much money and no provision is made. Provision is made for landlines with free phone numbers but not necessarily for mobiles. It depends, of course, on your provider. Has any of that been factored into these provisions for electronic communication?
1629. Mr Pollock: I do not think so, Mickey.
1630. Mr Brady: It really is a big issue for people. I had one case recently, for example, in which a woman tried to contact the local office and it cost her £17 of mobile phone credit of the £20 that she had left. That is unacceptable.
1631. Mr Pollock: Clause 103 deals with the recovery of benefit payments. It sets out when and how overpayments of benefits, payments on account, and certain hardship payments can be recovered. The introduction of universal credit provides the opportunity to introduce a more straightforward recovery regime. All overpayments of universal credit, JSA, ESA and the housing credit element of state pension credit will be recoverable, either from the person to whom it was paid or another person, who may be specified, for example, a landlord. This includes overpayments arising due to official error.
1632. Where the Department makes a mistake, claimants should not expect to have the right to keep taxpayers' money to which they are not entitled. Regulations made under this clause will specify how the amounts to be recovered will be estimated or calculated. Although most overpayments of universal credit, JSA and ESA will be deemed recoverable, in certain circumstances, the Department will decide that the overpayment, or part of it, does not have to be repaid. The circumstances in which action will be taken to recover overpayments will be governed by a code of practice to ensure consistent, considered decision-making. Where a payment is deemed recoverable — whether overpayment, payment on account or recoverable hardship payment — it will be recoverable, in the first place, from the person who actually received the money.

1633. Regulations will also allow for recovery to take place from any person who was not the intended recipient of the payment but who benefited from it. It could be, for example, an appointee who appropriates excess benefit for their own use or where a payment has been made directly to a landlord in respect of a claimant who has committed housing benefit fraud. The clause also deals with four specific methods of recovery: deduction from ongoing benefit, through court action, adjustment of benefit and deduction from earnings. That will allow a deduction from earnings to take place by the Department's authority without the necessity of obtaining a court order. The clause also enables the Department to recover court costs where there is a court judgement in the Department's favour.

1634. Mr Brady: Section 69 of the Social Security Administration (Northern Ireland) Act 1992 eliminated departmental error. It did not matter who was responsible, the Department could recover. Will departmental error still be part of the equation? The explanatory and financial memorandum states:

"Subsection (6) allows for an amount paid to one member of an award which is made to persons jointly to be recovered from the other by any method (as listed in subsection (7))."

1635. Say one partner in a couple gets a budget loan or the equivalent of a budget loan and does not tell the other person, who has absolutely no input, which does happen. That person may go off somewhere while the other person is still claiming benefit. Will both people still be treated as a couple, or will the second person be liable for the recovery from their benefit as a lone claimant? I am not sure whether this has been factored into the equation.

1636. The memorandum says "by any other method". To me, this rings alarm bells. The person who is going to carry the can might not even know that the other person made a claim. I have had cases over the years in which wives have gone out to work and husbands did not know about it. It does not happen often, but it is reality. It does not happen often, in fairness, but it has happened. There are people who borrow money or get budgeting loans and do not tell their partners, but the partners may be liable under this legislation eventually. The phrase "by any other method" sounds fairly draconian.

1637. Ms M Campbell: There were some discussions about that, but I cannot remember the outcome or whether they have been concluded yet. Those things will be specified in regulations.

1638. Mr Brady: Could you participate in the discussion so that it comes to an equitable solution and decision?

1639. Mr Pollock: We are involved in the decision-making process. With respect to departmental error, I thought I had mentioned that, where the Department makes mistakes, the claimant is not expected to be able to say, "OK, I can keep that money." The amount will be recoverable.

1640. Mr Brady: So, it does not matter whether the person has no responsibility whatsoever for the error?

1641. Mr Pollock: It is a departmental error.

1642. Mr Brady: Years ago, they used to raise overpayments against the person.

1643. Mr Pollock: They used to.

1644. Mr Brady: It was a long time ago, obviously.

1645. The Chairperson: OK. We understand what the clause is supposed to be about. We move to clause 104.

1646. Mr Pollock: Clause 104 concerns deductions from earnings for other cases. It is a follow-on from clause 103. Clause 104 provides for the recovery of certain overpayments of benefit, including overpayments of housing benefit and recoverable social fund payments by deduction from earnings. That will be known as direct earnings attachment (DEA).

1647. Overpayments of universal credit, JSA and ESA will be recoverable by DEA by - virtue of the provisions in clause 103. Regulations will set out the rates of deduction and will include safeguards to ensure that the deductions do not take the debtor beneath a given level of earnings. They place a duty on claimants to disclose details of their employers and require employers to make deductions and pay them to the Department. It is intended to use DEA to enforce recovery when debtors are in PAYE employment and will not come to a voluntary arrangement to pay back their debts. It is important, therefore, that, when someone refuses to meet their obligations to repay benefit debt, the Department should be able to use those powers to make recovery. Clause 105 relates to application of the Limitation (Northern Ireland) Order 1989. It clarifies the application of the statute of limitations to the recovery of benefit overpayments and social fund loans by means of deductions from a person's ongoing benefit entitlement. The statute of limitations, whilst preventing action being taken through the courts after a given period, has no application to the recovery of social security debts by deduction from benefits through social security legislation. Social security legislation rightly restricts the level of deductions that can be made from income-related benefits, and the Department operates a hardship policy whereby deductions are often reduced below the legal maximum. This means that the recovery of even moderate-sized debts can take in excess of six years.

1648. The Department's duty to protect public funds and recover overpayments and social fund loans means that it is right that it should be able to do so over an extended period. Without this, there would be higher repayment rates, which could put undue financial pressure on those repaying a debt. This measure is also retrospective, which ensures that all recoveries already made since the introduction of the limitation Order can clearly be deemed to have been made correctly. This maintains the longstanding principles in relation to recovery by deduction from benefits.
1649. Mr Brady: To clarify, does this mean that, following the discovery of an overpayment, the Department can take six years to recover it?
1650. Mr Pollock: All we are saying here is that it means that even a moderate-sized debt could take in excess of six years to be recovered.
1651. Mr Brady: Does it have to be paid back within six years?
1652. Mr Pollock: No. There is no statute of limitations on that. They could recover it over a longer period.
1653. Mr Brady: Why the six years? Is that an arbitrary period?
1654. Mr Pollock: That is just an example.
1655. Mr Brady: There are people who owe a lot of money that has built up for whatever reasons over the years, and it could take a lifetime to repay that.
1656. Mr Pollock: I could have said seven years or five years. I am just saying that it can take a fairly long time.
1657. Mr Brady: All I wanted to find out was whether six years was an arbitrary figure or a mandatory figure.
1658. Mr Pollock: The basis of the clause is that there is no statute of limitations on the Department recovering overpayments.
1659. Mr Brady: It can take as long as it wants.
1660. Mr Pollock: Yes. What they are saying is that, because of hardship provisions, they would invariably recover less than they would do normally.
1661. Mr Brady: What I was trying to find out was whether, if a large overpayment had to be paid within six years, larger amounts would have to be taken weekly or monthly. However, that is not the case.
1662. Mr Pollock: That is not the case.
1663. Mr Brady: OK. That is really what I wanted to check.

1664. Ms M Campbell: The last sentence in paragraph 543 of the explanatory and financial memorandum states:
- “it secures that the time limits do not apply”.*
1665. Mr Brady: I had not reached that part.
1666. Mr Douglas: Paragraph 543 also states:
- “puts beyond doubt that the Department may recover social security overpayments ... by means other than court action.”*
- Have you covered that bit?
1667. Ms M Campbell: That would be where the Department makes recoveries by means other than court action.
1668. Mr Pollock: Recovery and deduction from benefit.
1669. Mr Douglas: So, that is what that means.
1670. The Chairperson: Is that OK, Sammy?
1671. Mr Douglas: So, you are not thinking about taking the furniture and selling it.
1672. The Chairperson: Let us move to clause 106. I am trying to get to clause 120 before 5.00 pm.
1673. Mr Pollock: Clause 106 deals with section 103(B) of the Social Security Administration (Northern Ireland) Act 1992, which covers the powers to require information relating to investigations. The section specifies from whom the Department can require information when investigating whether benefit is properly payable.
1674. Clause 106 inserts a new subsection to add a regulation-making power to prescribe persons from whom an authorised officer under existing section 103B can require information. An example of how this might be used would be to require information from those who are presently asked to provide information for tax credits, which will come in under the universal credit regime.
1675. Clause 106(b) amends the existing section 103B(2)(j) to include a new subsection stating that the persons from whom the Department may require information includes their servants and agents. This amendment allows it to extend to a new subsection.
1676. Mr Brady: Does it really widen the scope as regards people from whom the Department can get information? It is a bit old-fashioned to talk about servants. I am sure that not many people on benefits have servants, and maybe not agents. It widens the scope. Is that what you are saying?
1677. Mr Pollock: It widens the scope, particularly with tax credits coming in under universal credit.
1678. Mr Brady: Presumably that would apply, because it specifically mentions the person responsible for childcare. Would that be taken if there was a registered childminder? Is it in order to access the childcare element? That is one example, I suppose.
1679. Mr Pollock: I do not think it is meant to be prescriptive.
1680. Mr Brady: None of it is meant to be prescriptive.
1681. The Chairperson: It will all be dealt with by way of the clauses. Do not worry about it.
1682. Mr Pollock: Clause 107 deals with the time limits for legal proceedings and permits the Department to issue a certificate allowing proceedings for a summary only offence to be commenced later than 12 months from the date an offence was committed if it is within the period of three months from the date on which the evidence comes to the Department’s knowledge, and that evidence is, in the Department’s opinion, adequate to justify a prosecution for the offence.
1683. The Department will now be able to issue a certificate to extend the period when proceedings may be commenced where a claimant is to be prosecuted for a housing benefit offence; where that benefit is administered by the Housing Executive through DFP; and where, although the 12-month period after the offence was committed has - expired, the date is within three months of the date on which evidence came to the Department's knowledge that is sufficient to justify a prosecution.

1684. Mr Brady: It talks about legal procedures. Would they have to look at the legal implications? I ask that because, presumably, there are different rules of evidence for court cases. The Department says that, if it has only just found out about the situation, it can extend the period. It might take a couple of years for it to become aware of that situation. I am just wondering about the statute of limitations in relation to the legal aspect rather than the social security aspect. Is there any contradiction there? There are criminal proceedings for alleged fraud, for instance. I am wondering if there is a statute of limitations from the courts in prosecuting that kind of offence, given that the Department is extending the period for which it can do that. Maybe you could find that out.
1685. Ms M Campbell: I think that that is one for our colleagues in fraud.
1686. Mr Brady: I think those questions have to be raised, because it is something that may or may not come up in the future. Unless it is clarified, there is no point in bringing it up.
1687. Ms M Campbell: It is better to get clarification now than to hold things up later.
1688. Mr Brady: Absolutely.
1689. The Chairperson: Yes. We are being asked to look at a clause that may or may not be impacted on by the judicial system. The process is there, as are the standards of evidence and time frame for evidence. It is important. We will have to return to that in due course.
1690. Mr Pollock: Clause 108 inserts a new section relating to Housing Executive powers to prosecute housing benefit fraud. It will restrict Housing Executive powers to bring proceedings relating to housing benefit offences. It provides that the Housing Executive may not bring a prosecution for suspected benefit offences unless certain circumstances apply.
1691. Under the new section, where the Housing Executive has already started an investigation in relation to a suspected fraud of housing benefit, the Housing Executive may prosecute that offence.
1692. There is a lot of detail in that, Chair. I would feel better if you went through that clause with our fraud colleagues. Is that something that you could do?
1693. The Chairperson: It is also relevant to the previous clause. I think that we need to see if it is compatible with current legislation. You could argue that it is, but that is what we are trying to establish. Are members happy enough to deal with it that way?
1694. Mr Brady: The Department is, in a sense, the agent of the Housing Executive, because it pays the housing benefit, although it is paid through the Housing Executive. It is obviously a paper exercise. When talking about agents, there could be implications there.
1695. Mr Douglas: I have a general point, although this may be the wrong arena. Over the past year or so, I have noticed that hardly a week passes without one of our local newspapers mentioning housing benefit fraud or whatever. Is part of the policy to try to scare people? Has that information been leaked?
1696. Mr Brady: It never happens in Newry, Sammy.
1697. Mr Durkan: They are never caught. [Laughter.]
1698. The Chairperson: Remember Hansard.
1699. Mr Douglas: These people are being prosecuted. They go through all the hassle of that and then it is splashed all over the papers as well.
1700. Ms M Campbell: If it is a court offence, it is the court reporter who would record it.
1701. Mr Douglas: It is lazy journalism.

1702. Mr Durkan: The Department puts out press releases to name them. That is part of departmental policy.
1703. The Chairperson: OK. We move on to clause 109.
1704. Ms M Campbell: Clauses 109 to 115 all deal with fraud.
1705. The Chairperson: We will defer all those clauses up to and including clause 115. Are Members happy enough to do that?
- Members indicated assent.*
1706. Mr Pollock: Clause 116 is about information-sharing in relation to the provision of overnight care. It allows for information to be used and supplied for the purpose of ensuring that the correct amount of housing benefit is awarded in relation to people who are entitled to overnight care in their own homes, which we touched on earlier, and for the purpose of assessing awards of benefit when a person is admitted to or discharged from hospital or residential care.
1707. Claimants of certain social security benefits have their benefit awards reassessed when they go into or are discharged from hospital or residential care. Claimants are already required to report such changes. This provision will allow a relevant body to use the information itself or supply the information to the Department, the Housing Executive or the Department of Finance and Personnel for purposes relating to the payment of benefits.
1708. People who are disabled and require an overnight carer will also be able to qualify for a higher rate of housing benefit if they have an extra room that is used by a non-resident carer or team of carers. The provision will also allow Housing Executive housing benefit teams to use information from social services teams to confirm whether a person may require an overnight carer; if social services are providing the carer; and that the care has been provided.
1709. Subsection (8) defines the term “relevant body” for the purposes of clause 116 and clause 117, which deals with information-sharing in relation to welfare services, as a health and social care trust or the Regional Health and Social Care Board.

1710. Mr Brady: It says that this is to ensure that the correct amount of housing benefit is paid to people entitled to overnight care. It then goes on to talk about carers and the extra housing benefit for that. There was talk of the underoccupancy aspect. It mentions a team of carers and one room. Two carers who had to come in would obviously not want to share the same room. Some carers would lie down for an hour or two and may then have to get the person up during the night to take them to the bathroom and that kind of thing. Will all that be factored in? It might not be limited to one room, as it might involve two rooms and carers of different sexes.
1711. Mr Pollock: I do not know that it would involve multiple rooms, but there is provision for an additional room in existing housing benefit legislation.
1712. Mr Brady: I suppose the point I am making is that, in certain cases, it could and should. The reality is that some people are so disabled that they need at least two overnight carers. It is all to do with health and safety in lifting and all of that. That cannot be ignored.
1713. Mr Pollock: I would not say never, Mickey. I am sure that there is an exception to every rule.
1714. Mr Brady: Can I quote you on that, Michael?
1715. Mr Pollock: My general understanding is that, in specific circumstances, an additional room is effectively discounted. It is available because —
1716. Mr Brady: I understand that. I am just saying that it may be additional rooms. You could have a three-bedroom house with the disabled person in one and a team of carers coming in during the week; that happens. So, it is not just one room that is occupied. All the bedrooms may be occupied, and, therefore, the underoccupancy aspect

- would not apply. That needs to be checked.
1717. Ms M Campbell: We will clarify that for you.
1718. Mr Pollock: Clause 117 is about information-sharing in relation to welfare services. This replaces the information-sharing gateway in section 39 of the Welfare Reform Act (Northern Ireland) 2007. It broadens the scope of data-sharing that is provided for under the existing section 39. Relevant information can be shared between the Department, the relevant bodies, the Housing Executive, and Land and Property Services. Information can be shared in relation to the provision of a welfare service and for certain rates or housing benefit purposes. This is the standard information-sharing gateway, but it is slightly broader in the Welfare Reform Bill. It relates to the discussion that we had earlier about passport benefits and the number of Departments and bodies that access social security information to facilitate delivery of some other benefit or service. That is what clause 117 facilitates.
1719. Clause 118 is the corollary of data-sharing legally; it is about the unlawful disclosure of information. Section 40 of the 2007 Welfare Reform Act makes it an offence for a person to disclose without lawful authority information supplied by virtue of section 39 of that Act. Clause 118 creates a similar unlawful disclosure provision in relation to the information that we discussed in respect of clause 117. As with all data-protection or data-sharing legislation, it is incumbent on the people who are sharing the data to specify what data is being shared, what the purpose is and what it will be used for. In that context, it is reasonably wide in so far as it embraces new data-sharing gateways with the likes of HMRC. It also has to be sufficiently broad to facilitate delivery of passported benefits such as free school meals or free school uniforms.
1720. Mr Brady: Can you give us an example of that unlawful disclosure? It says that staff are specifically covered. Civil servants sign up to the Official Secrets Act. What examples would there be in relation to people outside the agency?
1721. Mr Pollock: I cannot think of any off the top of my head, Mickey. We are not conditioned to break the law.
1722. Mr Brady: I could not think of any either; that is why I asked you.
1723. Mr Pollock: I suppose it depends on who jumps up and down. You are sharing personal information, so that data has to be protected. If I am a social security claimant, and, for some reason, you share my information with God knows who, I may have a case for redress against you.
1724. The Chairperson: OK; fair enough.
1725. Mr Pollock: Clause 119 is entitled, “Sections 116 and 118: supplementary”. Clause 119 enables regulations under clauses 116 and 117, which are about information-sharing, to make incidental, supplementary, consequential, transitional or saving provision. It also provides that all regulations under clause 116 will be subject to the negative resolution procedure. Most of this is standard in so far as information-sharing gateways have been long established in respect of social security information. It should not be anything remarkably new.
1726. The Chairperson: If Members are content, we will move to clause 120.
1727. Mr Pollock: Clause 120 is about information-sharing for social security or employment purposes. It puts data-sharing in the context of the Department for Employment and Learning. When we were starting to draft the Bill, there was quite a bit of discussion about the continued existence of that Department. So, in drafting terms, it was simpler to carry all the references in one particular clause. Clause 120 amends article 69 of the Welfare Reform and Pensions (Northern Ireland) Order 1999 and enables the Department to make regulations that allow certain persons, including the Department for Social Development, to share social security and employment and training information with other Government Departments and their service providers, and with persons designated by an order. The regulations can also make provisions about the use of such information and its supply by such persons.

1728. Mr Brady: So, is it more or less in-house in that it is in the context of different Departments as opposed to outside agencies?

1729. Mr Pollock: Yes is the simple answer.

1730. Mr Brady: It will apply to the likes of the Social Security Agency, the Department for Social Development and the Department for Employment and Learning.

1731. Mr Pollock: And their agents or bodies.

1732. Ms M Campbell: And their training providers. It is to stop the Department having to continually do an order every time it changes the list of contracted providers.

1733. Mr Brady: It is all encompassing in that sense.

1734. Ms M Campbell: Yes.

1735. The Chairperson: That is the discussion on clause 120 finished. That is the conclusion of the discussion on Part 5, save for, I think, clauses 107 to 115 inclusive, on which we will receive a further briefing from other officials.

1736. At this stage, I propose to suspend the meeting and resume tomorrow morning at 10.00 am. I am tempted to ask people to work until 7.00 pm or 8.00 pm to finish this, but I do not think I will get too many takers.

1737. Ms M Campbell: We are happy to stay if you are. [Laughter.]

1738. The Chairperson: I am happy enough. I am going nowhere in a hurry, let me tell you. If members are content, we will resume tomorrow morning when we will have a short recap and work our way through to completion. Thank you very much.

1739. Ms M Campbell: Thank you very much.

1740. The Chairperson: We move to our continued scrutiny of the Welfare Reform Bill, with the departmental briefing. We will pick up from where we were yesterday. We will go back to clauses 76 to 94 inclusive, which is on the personal independence payment (PIP), as I recall. That will be our approach this morning. After that, we will return to clauses 107 to 115, which were deferred yesterday.
1741. Without any further ado, I hand over to Anne and her colleagues. The officials will address the Bill clause by clause, and members can ask for any clarification that they require. Then, we will move on, as quickly as we possibly can, to the next clause.
1742. Ms Anne McCleary (Department for Social Development): Thank you very much for the opportunity to brief the Committee on the Welfare Reform Bill. I will address specifically clauses 76 to 94 and schedules 9 and 10, which deal with the personal independence payment, which, as you know, is the proposed replacement for disability living allowance (DLA) for working-age claimants.
1743. Our witnesses today are Jane Corduroy and Mickey Kelly. Mickey is from the Social Security Agency, and he will be able to deal with operational queries that members may have. I will begin with a short summary of the policy background to the new personal independence payment, and the timescale for its implementation. Jane will then give some detail on each of the clauses. Obviously, we are happy to take any comments and questions as we proceed.
1744. I begin with the background and aims. As part of the wider reform of the welfare system, from June 2013 the personal independence payment will replace disability living allowance for people aged between 16 and 64. In replacing DLA, the aim is to create a fairer, more transparent and sustainable system that is fit for the 21st century, ensuring that the personal independence payment continues to support disabled people who face the greatest barriers to participation in society. The Department has consulted with disability organisations here on the detailed design and the assessment thresholds for personal independence payment.
1745. The rationale for replacing DLA is clear. DLA was introduced in 1992 and has never been fundamentally reviewed since then. It has now become difficult to understand and complex to administer. There is no systematic process for checking that awards remain correct. I know that there are some other occasions when cases are reviewed, but there is no systematic process.
1746. In May 2012, there were 189,590 recipients of DLA in Northern Ireland — a rise of almost 25,000 since May 2005. The focus is now on ensuring that disabled people are protected and support is provided to those with the greatest need. The introduction of PIP is intended to provide support to those

- with a disability who face the greatest barriers to leading full, active and independent lives. The importance of the role that benefits such as DLA play in achieving this is recognised, and it is important to be clear that the personal independence payment will maintain the key principles of DLA. Crucially, it will continue to be a non-means-tested, non-taxable cash benefit available to people both in and out of work.
1747. The personal independence payment will be payable to those who meet the conditions that are set out in regulations. Those include: being a resident and present in Northern Ireland; having a physical or mental condition that limits a person's ability to carry out daily living or mobility activities; having had a disability for the qualifying period of three months with the prospect of remaining disabled for the next nine months, although those with a terminal illness may be entitled to benefit without having to satisfy either the qualifying period or the prospective test; and claimants being assessed on their ability to perform a series of daily living and mobility activities.
1748. There will be a more objective assessment process, with most people receiving a face-to-face consultation with a healthcare professional, which will provide a more accurate and consistent assessment of individual need. The assessment for personal independence payment will look at disabled people as individuals, and will not label them according to health condition or impairment. We are looking at each person on a case-by-case basis. It has been designed to consider an individual's personal circumstances and the impact that their impairment has on their life. The proposed assessment criteria, the weightings and entitlement thresholds, are intended to reflect and differentiate between the barriers and extra costs faced by individuals who require extra support to undertake a range of everyday tasks, taking account of physical, sensory, mental, intellectual, and cognitive impairments. The assessment will also make greater use of evidence from those who provide support to the claimant, such as a GP, consultant or specialist nurse.
1749. There are 11 key activities, fundamental to everyday life, including: preparing and cooking food; washing, bathing and grooming; dressing and undressing; communicating; planning and following a journey; and moving around. Those will all be assessed.
1750. It is important to get the assessment right, and a number of improvements have already been made as this has developed. The formal consultation on the assessment criteria, which sought views from a broad range of local disability and advice groups, was carried out between 16 January and 30 April. Departmental officials are working with the Department for Work and Pensions (DWP) to analyse the replies, and a response to the consultation is due in the autumn.
1751. There will be two components to the personal independence payment: a daily living component, and a mobility component. Awards will be made up of one or both of those components. Each component will be payable either at a standard or an enhanced rate, and that will be set out in regulations. The amount for each rate has still to be decided.
1752. There is a duty to both claimants and the taxpayer to ensure that awards stay correct throughout. All personal independence payment awards, therefore, will be reviewed at appropriate intervals. The Social Security Agency will retain responsibility for decision-making, and decisions will carry a right of appeal. The Department will be working to support people fully on an individual basis as they encounter this new benefit.
1753. I will move on to implementation. The plan is to introduce the new benefit on a gradual phased basis from June 2013. In respect of all new claims from June 2013, personal independence payment will replace disability living allowance for working-age claimants. Existing DLA

- claimants will be asked at some time between October 2013 and March 2016 whether they wish to claim personal independence payment. From October 2013, if a claimant reports a change of condition, or has a fixed award that is due to expire after February 2014, that will trigger an invitation to claim personal independence payment. Contact with all other remaining DLA customers will be on a random basis from January 2014 to March 2016. At that point, if an existing DLA customer makes a claim for personal independence payment, DLA payments will normally continue until their personal independence payment claim is decided. If they choose not to claim personal independence payment, their DLA will end.
1754. There is clearly public concern around the introduction of this benefit, but we all want to assure the Committee that aim of the personal independence payment is to ensure a fairer, more transparent assessment. It has been designed in collaboration with independent specialists from the disability, social care and health sectors. It is about simplifying processes for people, and targeting the resources at those who are in greatest need. That is what this is about. I will ask Jane to take you through the provisions on a clause-by-clause basis.
1755. The Chairperson: Mickey Brady wants to ask a question at this point.
1756. Mr Brady: I do not want to go into a lot of detail. Obviously, one of the main issues is the healthcare professionals. We have been told that the contract will be announced shortly. There has been a lot of disquiet. Tanni Grey-Thompson, who is disabled herself, has presented a report and was on the radio this morning. There is a lot of unease. Parents are saying that children with disabilities may be put into residential care.
1757. The other issue is around Atos Healthcare, particularly in Britain, where they have made a mess of the work capability assessment. In Lanarkshire in Scotland, its work has been contracted back to the National Health Service,
- which is a peculiar way of doing things: a statutory body pays a lot of money to a private organisation, which then contracts the work back to the same statutory body, or a similar one.
1758. The detail of that will be extremely important. There is a lot of unease around the whole concept of how people are going to be assessed.
1759. Ms McCleary: I am quite sure that as soon as that contract is let, we will advise the Committee of it.
1760. Mr Mickey Kelly (Department for Social Development): We have indicated that there are just a few approvals and contract issues to work through. It is anticipated that the contract will be formally signed in four to six weeks. I understand, Mickey, where you are coming from with respect to the unease about those issues.
1761. Mr Brady: I think that it has become more than unease. It has turned into an unmitigated disaster.
1762. Another question I must ask is about is terminal illness. In my experience, there is an issue around the DS1500 forms. Obviously, the GP, or whoever signs the DS1500, is, in many cases, reluctant to do so because the person may not know. There needs to be a better way of looking at that and how it is dealt with. There is a whole issue about trauma to the person who may or may not know how bad their condition is. There should be a sensible way of doing that.
1763. Ms McCleary: That is an operational issue which we can look at.
1764. Mr M Kelly: We are working on the specific customer journey for people with terminal illnesses, which will build on DLA, and incorporate its good points. I am happy to work through that in due course.
1765. Mr Brady: Just on DLA, periodic reviews were introduced in the 1990s with some fanfare. Another thing that has changed in DLA after it was reviewed, is that, initially, awards were “lifelong”, and then they were changed to “indefinite”. So

- there have been changes, and it is not as though DLA has been there since 1992, sitting on the shelf, with nothing happening to it. A lot of things have been changed.
1766. Ms McCleary: There have been tweaks made to DLA, but not a systemic review.
1767. Mr Brady: There has been case law, for example, on the distance that a person can walk. All of that has evolved over time. It is not the case that it has just been left to its own devices. Medical evidence has been a very important part of it. An impression has been given by the Government that the Social Security Agency has turned into some sort of charitable organisation, and that you can apply for DLA and you will get it, no matter what is wrong with you. DLA is a very rigorous procedure requiring medical evidence. People need to be made aware of that. Sometimes, that is all forgotten amid the black propaganda, for want of a better term.
1768. The Chairperson: We have listened to an introduction, so I have allowed that comment. Michael, do you want to speak? I do not want long speeches; we are taking this clause by clause.
1769. Mr Copeland: No. I do not do long speeches, much.
1770. As I understand it, the examining medical practitioner (EMP) should be a medical doctor. The role of the EMP particularly involves visiting, in their own homes, people who were deemed to be, for whatever reason, incapable of attending an assessment centre. The EMP is, at present, always a qualified doctor. Will that role be undertaken by what they call a “healthcare professional”?
1771. Mr M Kelly: The examiner or medical practitioner at the minute will be part of the new system. The new system will involve healthcare professionals, and some of those people will, potentially, be doctors and some will be other healthcare professionals in the broader sense. There is an indication and, corporately, the Department for Work and Pensions has said, that people who have had visits in their own home and who need visits will still be visited in their home, where that is available.
1772. Mr Copeland: How will you ensure that the EMP or the healthcare profession is relevant to the specific customer’s needs? I have heard of occasions where people whose main hindrance is mental health difficulties have presented themselves, only to be told by the healthcare professionals that that is not really their field. I know of three such cases. How can you give an assessment of someone’s physical or mental capabilities if you are not qualified? I think that one guy is taking it to the ombudsman. He was not seen by someone who was qualified to sit in judgement of his condition.
1773. Mr M Kelly: The issue is: what is “qualified to sit in judgement”? Because of the complex nature of people’s illnesses and those with multiple disabilities, there is an issue of whether you would ever be able to specifically match healthcare professionals exactly with customers, depending on what you perceive to be their needs. The professionals that are recruited by the provider will be fully trained, vetted and qualified. Part of the process involves us, as a Department, to sign those people off as proficient to do the assessment.
1774. The Chairperson: At this stage, I do not think that we can get the answers that we are looking for. We are going through the clauses.
1775. Ms McCleary: Just before we move on, I want to say something about the work capability assessment, which Mickey Brady referred to. To repeat what I think we have said on numerous occasions, the purpose of the work capability assessment and the PIP medical assessment are totally different, and it is important to remember that. Hopefully, lessons will be learned from other fields, whether that refers to the work capability assessment, or whatever. However, I want to stress that they are very different things.

1776. The Chairperson: Some members are indicating that they want to ask questions. I do not want to have a discussion around the issues. People may not agree, and will not agree, with some of the explanations. I do not agree with some of the explanations that I am getting, and I do not accept some of the explanations that I am getting, but this is not the time to have that debate. We are examining the Bill clause by clause for information.
1777. Mr Douglas: I just want clarification on something. Anne, you mentioned people who have a terminal illness. You used the word “may”. However, in some of the stuff that I am reading, having a long-term illness would qualify you.
1778. Ms McCleary: Most of the people who you would regard as having a terminal illness will be covered by it. However, the difficulty arises where you have a congenital condition that goes on for a significant time, but is not terminal as such. That is where the difference lies.
1779. Mr F McCann: My question is on the back of what Mickey Kelly said. Given the legacy of the conflict here, far more people suffer from psychiatric and mental health problems. Will the new way of doing things ensure that people with a psychiatric background will be visiting those people to assess them, rather than what are called, in the broadest terms, healthcare professionals?
1780. Mr M Kelly: The provider will gather a mix of healthcare professionals to cover a broad spectrum. It is not going to be possible to say that we will have x number of each professional for each specific thing. I cannot go into the detail of that at the minute, but that will be part of our role as we work with the provider to ensure that they have adequate personnel and specialists who are trained to take into account the circumstances in Northern Ireland.
1781. Mr F McCann: I hate to prolong this, but surely that would be built into any tender or contract that you would put out?
1782. Mr M Kelly: Part of the procurement exercise was to indicate the circumstances in Northern Ireland.
1783. The Chairperson: We have not closed the gaps in the understanding of how that is going to work out. We will move on to the next clause, please.
1784. Ms Jane Corderoy (Department for Social Development): Clause 76 introduces the personal independence payment. As Anne said, the system has become quite complex. People are unclear about who can qualify and decisions about qualification can be inconsistent and subjective. The intention is to create a sustainable system that will support disabled people to overcome the extra barriers that prevent them from leading full and active lives. PIP is intended to be a more dynamic, objectively assessed and transparent benefit, and entitlement will be based on an assessment of the impact that a person’s disability or condition has on their daily living and mobility needs. Entitlement to disability living allowance depends on the extent to which someone needs help with personal care, needs supervision or has difficulty walking. The personal independence payment will take account of changes in individual circumstances and will reflect wider changes, such as advances in aids and adaptations. Support will be focused on those who face the greatest day-to-day challenges and who are, therefore, likely to experience higher costs. It will be non-contributory and non-means-tested, and its aim is to help people live more independent lives within their local community. The personal independence payment will focus on the ability of an individual to carry out a range of activities necessary for everyday life and the extra costs arising because of that. It will be payable to people who are in work as well as those who are out of work.
1785. Tests of residence and presence will be similar to DLA and will be set out in the regulations. It is intended to introduce a habitual residence test to bring PIP in line with other non-contributory benefits, instead of the ordinarily resident

- test that applies to DLA. Entitlement to personal independence payment will be determined by considering all of the evidence, including the new assessment, which will more accurately and consistently assess and determine who will benefit most from additional support.
1786. To make sure that this is right, the assessment is being developed in collaboration with a group of independent specialists in health, social care and disability, which includes disabled people. The Department has consulted on the assessment criteria. The personal independence payment will initially replace DLA for people of working age. The experience of reassessing the working age caseload will be used to inform future decisions on the reassessment of children and for those over 65. The policy aim of PIP is that support should be targeted at those disabled and vulnerable people who face the greatest challenges in leading independent lives.
1787. Mr Brady: I have just one question. Will the disability working allowance be going? We have DLA and disability working allowance.
1788. Ms McCleary: Sorry?
1789. Mr Brady: Disability working allowance: is it now gone, or will it be gone?
1790. Ms McCleary: I am not sure, but we will check on that.
1791. Mr Copeland: Will it be counted as income within the confines of the cap allowance?
1792. Ms McCleary: No; it will be disregarded. In fact, a household where someone is in receipt of DLA or PIP will automatically be excluded from the benefit cap.
1793. Mr Durkan: Is that any level of PIP or DLA, even if it is the lowest?
1794. Ms McCleary: Yes.
1795. The Chairperson: Thank you. Obviously, we will return to that. We move on to clause 77.
1796. Ms Corderoy: Clause 77 sets out the broad entitlement conditions for the daily living component of the personal independence payment. It provides that it can be paid at one of two rates depending on an individual's ability to carry out specified activities. The process of assessing whether someone is limited or severely limited in their ability to carry out the activities will be at the heart of personal independence payment. The clause also provides that someone has to have met the required period condition before entitlement to the daily living component can start. That condition is set out later, in clauses 79 and 80. Nine activities will be assessed, which, as Anne said, are preparing food and drink, taking nutrition, managing therapy or monitoring a health condition, bathing and grooming, managing toilet needs or incontinence, dressing and undressing, communicating, engaging socially, and making financial decisions.
1797. The policy intention is that the daily living component will prioritise those individuals who face the greatest barriers to living full and independent lives, will help protect those who are most in need and will focus support on individuals who face the greatest challenges to leading full and active independent lives. Entitlement to the daily living component and to the specified rate, whether it is the standard or enhanced, will be by reference to an objective assessment, which will consider whether someone is limited or severely limited in their ability to carry out certain daily living activities. The daily living activities will be set out in the regulations. A draft has already been consulted on, and the regulations encompass a range of those everyday activities. Each of the activities will be underpinned by a number of descriptors, which will allow an assessment to be made of the claimant's capability in undertaking the activities.
1798. In terms of subordinate legislation, the clause provides for the regulations that will set out the weekly standard and enhanced rates; the activities

- that are to be regarded as daily living activities; the details of the assessment to determine whether an individual has limited or severely limited ability to carry out those daily living activities; and further restrictions that relate to the pensionable age for entitlement and terminal illness. The first set of those will be by confirmatory procedure.
1799. The clause is also subject to provisions in clause 81, which deals with terminal illness, and clause 82, which deals with people reaching pensionable age or the age of 65 if pensionable age changes.
1800. Mr Copeland: If I remember right, there are two rates of mobility within DLA — high and low — and three rates of care — high, middle and low. Middle care seems to have disappeared in PIP.
1801. Ms McCleary: There are only two.
1802. Mr Copeland: What is the likely impact of that in terms of entitlement? Are more of the people who are currently on the middle care rate going to themselves chinned, for want of a better word?
1803. Ms McCleary: We do not know what the impact will be, because all those folk have to go through the assessments. Which category an individual falls into will depend entirely on their assessment. You cannot just assume that because we are moving from three to two, half of the group that would otherwise have been in the middle component will go up to the higher category and the other half will go down to the lower category. We just do not know. It will depend on the descriptors and the number of points scored. That will determine each case.
1804. Mr Copeland: At what stage will we as a Committee get sight of those? All these things are critical. It is the mechanics of it.
1805. Ms Corderoy: They have been consulted over. DWP is going to respond to the consultation that looked at those, we hope, soon enough. When it does, we will share that with the Committee.
1806. Mr Copeland: Is this a UK or a GB mainland consultation?
1807. Ms Corderoy: We were included in it. I think that we sent a paper to the Committee in which we made the case for the people who responded directly to us in the Department for Social Development (DSD).
1808. Mr Copeland: So there is no individual pilot scheme being run in Northern Ireland?
1809. The Chairperson: If I recall correctly, the Committee did respond to that, but we can clarify that later on.
1810. Mr Brady: The main thing for people on middle care is that, very simply, if they live alone, they qualify for a severe disability premium. That is quite a lot; at the moment, it is about £58. So you would have to assume that, unless that premium regime is kept in place, a lot of people will be moved from enhanced to standard.
1811. Ms McCleary: There may well be some.
1812. Mr Brady: Those people are going to lose out on quite a lot of money. The severe disability premium is a fair amount of money for a person living alone, particularly given the amount of benefits they are expected to live on. At some stage, clarification will probably be needed on the impact of the premiums on universal credit.
1813. Mr M Kelly: I think the report that was published this morning actually looks at some of the impacts of removing the severe disability premium on universal credit as opposed to — 1814. Mr Brady: This will make a huge difference to a lot of people.
1815. Ms McCleary: There is provision in universal credit for the building blocks of fundamental benefits, including disability factors.
1816. Mr Brady: I suppose, with respect, that sounds good in theory, but the difference is that if you are in middle care at the moment and you live alone, you qualify. Some people who have other - income may not get the whole severe disability premium. Then you get into passport benefits, which is a big issue.

1817. Ms McCleary: We will be looking at this report.
1818. Ms Corderoy: Mr Copeland, you talked about the different range. What this will do, in a practical sense, is reduce the combinations from 11 to eight. So people should be clearer on what sort of rate they will get from PIP compared with DLA.
1819. The other thing worth saying is that the criteria and the descriptors take more cognisance of mental health issues. You made the point that mental health is a bigger issue here. We imagine that some people will go up, as well as the fear that some will go down, because mental health will be taken more in the round in this new PIP compared with DLA.
1820. Ms McCleary: That was one of the changes that emerged from consultation on the descriptors.
1821. Mr M Kelly: To build on what Jane said, under the current rules on DLA, to get the highest rate of the care component, someone must require attention day and night. Under the new PIP rules, however, people can get the highest rate of PIP — the enhanced rate — even if they do not need attention at night. So the higher rate will be payable just for significant needs during the day. The people who will gain from that are those who have significant needs during the day but not at night and do not, therefore, qualify for the higher rate at the moment. Obviously, as you say, there may be some people at the other end. However, there is the potential for people to get higher rates of benefit.
1822. Mr F McCann: Anne, you mentioned that a lot of this depended on the number of points scored. How does that differ from the present assessment?
1823. Ms McCleary: Sorry, I am not quite with you.
1824. Mr F McCann: You talked about the level of benefit they would get.
1825. Ms McCleary: Yes, the descriptors and the points.
1826. Mr F McCann: It depends on the points scored. How does that differ from the present system?
1827. Ms McCleary: The descriptors themselves are different.
1828. Mr F McCann: You said earlier that the assessment that people go through, by comparison to employment and support allowance (ESA), is completely different; but the new system is points-based. Are you saying that the PIP system will be points-based also?
1829. Ms McCleary: Yes.
1830. Mr M Kelly: It will, but the descriptors in the work capability assessment are very different to what those that will be in the PIP assessment.
1831. Just to pick up on your point, Fra, in the current administration of DLA there are no points. It is a subjective judgement by a decision-maker based on a round of evidence. It will still be a decision made by a decision-maker, but the assessment will just form a part of that evidence-gathering process.
1832. Mr F McCann: I have to say that, if you are following some of the serious problems under ESA in England, tens and maybe hundreds of thousands of appeals have been made because of the descriptors in the system.
1833. Mr Copeland: I just want to check how you will ensure that the contractor — the company that is successful in tendering for this process — should it already be in possession of a contract for the other process; in other words, if Atos gets it for example — will it be able to use staff, according to availability, to deal with ESA and PIP? You said that they are quite different. If you have one person making judgements according to two different criteria, I would have thought that there could be a very serious pollution of one system by the other, if the same people are involved in both. I would have very serious issues about that. They have to be kept separate,

- and the people involved in them have to be quite separate and trained for each specific case.
1834. Mr M Kelly: I think that that is a point, Michael, that we will take up with the provider, when we announce the contract.
1835. Ms McCleary: If that is a relevant factor. It may not be.
1836. Mr M Kelly: We are in a position where we cannot go into any detail because of the commercial issues around the contract. It is a point that we have logged.
1837. The Chairperson: We cannot have long conversations about people's opinions.
1838. Mr Durkan: My question is about the contract as well. I know that you are limited as to what detail you can give. It is about lessons that have been learnt from the Atos/ESA debacle and the expense to the Department of so many appeals. Can there be something written into the contract around that, for whoever is successful? Rather than being target-driven, as many suspect it will be, to reduce the amount of money spent on PIP, the contractor should not be so quick to dismiss people's applications. Let the contractor incur the cost of the appeals, rather than have it fall back on the Department.
1839. Mr M Kelly: I must reassure members that there will not be any targeting. I know what people think. The Department and the agency will not be setting any targets in terms of getting people off disability living allowance. The contractor appointed across the water, and the work that has gone on, have been well cited. I know that members have views on some of the stuff that is coming out from Professor Harrington and his recommendations. Those will be built into part of the process as well.
1840. Once we have the announcement of the provider, the Department and the agency will have a detailed discussion with the provider about a range of issues with regard to the provision of the service. There will be, I assure you, a rigorous monitoring regime in place as well,
- through the provider, and also through what we do locally to ensure the quality of the work.
1841. Mr Douglas: I have a general point; maybe a bit of guidance from Anne or whoever. Whatever you decide about the eligibility criteria, they are going to be much more restrictive in future. To my knowledge, at this point, someone who has their legs amputated will naturally go on to DLA. Yet, in the new system, would it be right to say that they will be reassessed, even if they were born without legs? I suppose all of us — people stop us in the street and ask how this will affect them. [Inaudible.] What is your guidance to us? There is a list of every type of disability or illness.
1842. Ms McCleary: I do not think that there are very many disabilities which you can say, with any degree of confidence, you will definitely get or not get. It is not about the disability. This is about how it affects the individual person. That is the key. The exception would be those who have terminal illnesses, as we discussed. In relation to most other people, it is about how their particular condition affects them. It is therefore not possible to say any more than that.
1843. Mr Douglas: I understand.
1844. Mr Durkan: So, terminal illness is the only exception at the minute?
1845. Ms McCleary: Well, that is the exception in relation to special rules. However, I think that that is probably the only area where you can say that, just because somebody has X condition, they will automatically get automatically not get something. For everyone else, it just depends upon individual circumstances.
1846. Mr Durkan: Previously, it had been applied to some sensory conditions, such as blindness.
1847. Ms McCleary: Yes.
1848. Ms Corderoy: There had been some automatic entitlement for some conditions like that.
1849. Mr M Kelly: More work is still going on to finalise the assessment criteria

- following the closure of the last consultation, which might deal with some of the issues that we are faced with.
1850. Ms McCleary: Generally speaking, you just avoid saying “I can guarantee you X”. It is just a case of “We will have to see”.
1851. The Chairperson: We are going to move on to clause 78.
1852. Just before that, I will make a few general points. We have had a fair discussion so far, and I just raise this as a wee concern as to our process. There are a lot of questions around the fundamentals of PIP, and there are a lot of questions on the assessment process. It is fair to say that a number of members have raised those issues repeatedly, and rightly so, and they are on record; but I do not want to have a rehearsal of those arguments clause by clause.
1853. We will have to return to a broader political discussion on the fundamentals of these provisions, whether or not members or the Committee agree. Those are fundamental issues. As we go through the Bill clause by clause, I do not want to return to discussion on the fundamentals. Accept that there is a division of opinion; certainly, a range of concerns has been well flagged up. Let us move on. This is an explanatory process; we are getting the clauses explained. Members may ask questions to get clarification. It is not a debate or discussion of the rights or wrongs of it. Members, please do not give your opinions as to whether you like it or not.
1854. Mr Douglas: I apologise if I am raising stuff. There are so many things here. I forget some of the stuff, to be quite honest.
1855. The Chairperson: I have no intention, nor do I have the right, to try to restrict any member’s scrutiny of the Bill. We are here to give the Bill the absolute maximum scrutiny. I am just reminding members that we are getting clarification and explanation of the clauses. After that, and parallel to it, we will be taking presentations from stakeholders. Then we will return to whether we agree with any or all of those provisions and make our subjective opinions known at that point. Otherwise, we would never get through the explanation of the Bill at all.
1856. I am just recording, for members’ benefit, that we have rightly flagged up a range of very fundamental concerns about this Bill. Let us move on to clause-by-clause explanation of the Bill.
1857. Ms Corderoy: Clause 78 provides for the broad entitlement rules for the mobility component of the personal independence payment, with the exceptions for people who are terminally ill or of pensionable age, which we referred to before.
1858. As with entitlement to the daily living component, the intention is that support in the mobility component will be targeted at those disabled people whose health conditions or impairments impact most upon their daily lives.
1859. The mobility component of the personal independence payment can be paid at one of two rates: the standard or the enhanced. The rate paid depends upon the extent to which the ability to carry out mobility activities is limited, or severely limited, by a person’s physical or mental condition.
1860. The mobility component will only be paid to people over a prescribed age and to people with long-term health conditions or impairments. Someone has to have had their limitation to carry out mobility activities for a required period. That is set out in clause 80 of the Bill. That has to have been the case for the previous three months, and to be likely to continue to have that limitation for a further nine months.
1861. Subsection 4 provides that regulations will prescribe the activities that are to be regarded as “mobility activities”. Within the personal independence payment, mobility will be looked at in a much broader way. Entitlement to the mobility component will be assessed on both the ability to both move around and the ability to plan and follow a journey. The impact of sensory, mental, intellectual and cognitive impairments will be - considered in the same way as physical ones.

1862. Entitlement to the mobility component will be determined by an assessment of a person's ability to get around. It is considered that the existing criteria for assessing mobility focuses too much on the physical act of getting around, and not on those other issues. To enable support to be targeted on those who need it most, the assessment will take account of the successful use of aids and adaptations, such as wheelchairs and walking aids, which can help disabled people live more independent lives. It is recognised that not all barriers to participation in society will be removed by the use of support aids. Points will usually be awarded in the assessment where aids or appliances are needed, recognising that a need has not been removed simply because an aid is being used. It will be entirely possible for people using aids to qualify for the benefit, depending on their circumstances.
1863. In most cases, the assessment will involve a face-to-face consultation with an approved healthcare professional. However, people will still be able to provide evidence of their disability, including any relevant documentation from their GP or hospital consultant.
1864. Under provisions in clause 79, regulations will provide whether a person's ability to carry out prescribed mobility activities is limited or severely limited by physical and mental conditions. As with entitlement to the daily living component, the intention is that the support and mobility component will be targeted at those disabled people whose health conditions or impairments impact most on their daily lives. As I said before, the two rates are being retained so that benefit can be paid where ability to carry out mobility activities is both limited and severely limited.
1865. Regulations will also provide detail of the weekly standard rate and the weekly enhanced rate. Subsection 7 of the clause provides that regulations be made for a person not to be entitled to the mobility component if they are unable to benefit from enhanced mobility; for example, if they are in a coma.
1866. The first set of regulations will be subject to confirmatory procedure, so they will come back to the Committee. This clause is vital in safeguarding the principle of mobility in personal independence payment, which will help to enable people with a long-term disability to lead full, active and independent lives.
1867. Mr Brady: I think that you have answered one of my questions, but I just want you to clarify the detail. Where it says that a person is excluded from entitlement to mobility component in circumstances in which the individual involved is unlikely to benefit from improved mobility. I would have thought that most people, if they are compos mentis or awake, will probably benefit from that. You mentioned coma, so I can understand that.
1868. The other thing is that subsections 1(a) and 2(a) provide the power to prescribe a minimum qualifying age. There is a minimum qualifying age at the moment. It is five years for children, and then I think it changed slightly. Is there going to be a minimum qualifying age?
1869. Ms Corderoy: At the moment, this is just dealing with the working age of 16 to 64.
1870. Mr Brady: So, it is not going to affect children? That is not going to be changed.
1871. Ms Corderoy: No.
1872. Mr Brady: The legislation at the moment states that a person must be able to benefit from enhanced facilities for locomotion. That is the terminology they use. This may be in the regulations, and you can let us know at a later stage, but I had a case years ago where a woman with Alzheimer's could physically put one foot in front of the other, but she would have sat down in the middle of the road because she had no concept of danger. The legislation says that there has to be arrested development of the brain. These are points that need to be

- clarified. A retired consultant psychiatrist was a member of that panel, and, when I asked him to explain whether arrested development meant physical development or mental development, he could not answer. There were bits in the legislation that were so nebulous that they could not give you any sort of answer. It may be in the regulations, but it is something that needs to be checked.
1873. Ms McCleary: I think it will be in the regulations, but the descriptors have been developed with considerable involvement from psychiatrists and so on, so that kind of thing should be covered.
1874. Mr Brady: The point that I am making is that there was language in the regulations that was so nebulous that people could not give you an answer. If someone like the person that I was representing came before them, they could not make a decision based on the regulations. That is the point that I am making. There needs to be clarification on those kinds of issues.
1875. Ms Corderoy: We will aim to do that. One of the things to do with the mobility component is that it should reflect that, because it is about moving around but also being able to plan and follow a journey. Therefore, it is supposed to be much broader.
1876. The Chairperson: OK, thank you.
1877. Ms Corderoy: Clause 79 outlines provisions related to the proposed assessment. Regulations will provide detail on the assessment, including entitlement to the two rates of the new benefit, which will depend on individuals being determined as having limited or severely limited ability to carry out key activities. Those will relate to either the daily living or the mobility components or both. The greatest support will go to those who are least able to carry those out.
1878. The intention behind the assessment is that it is more evidence-based and consistent. It will take into account the full impact of a person's disability. Draft assessment activities and descriptors have been consulted on, and, in the first draft, the criteria were tested on a sample of existing DLA claimants in order to understand the criteria's reliability, validity and impact. As a result of the testing, which included cases from here, the criteria were refined and improved.
1879. Nine of the 11 activities to be reassessed relate to the daily living component entitlement. The addition of communication as an activity within the daily living component allows impairments' impact on sight, hearing, speech and comprehension to be more appropriately taken into account.
1880. Two activities relate to entitlement to the mobility component. Assessing those activities together provides a broader perspective of mobility. The assessment will consider a person's ability to plan, as well as their ability to undertake a journey, giving equal weight to the mental and physical requirements for this activity.
1881. Using the best and most appropriate evidence, including that from professionals involved in the care of the individual throughout the assessment process, will be vital. It is intended that, in most cases, individuals should have face-to-face consultation with a trained, independent healthcare professional. That will allow an in-depth look at the individual's circumstances and enable a two-way discussion to take place.
1882. There will be instances where face-to-face consultation will not be appropriate; for example, individuals with the most severe impairments, or where sufficient evidence is already available. In such cases, an assessment on the basis of paper evidence only might be more appropriate. That will be considered further as the process development progresses. However, the final decision regarding an individual's entitlement to personal independence payment will remain with the Department. It is important that individuals engage with the personal independence payment assessment process to ensure that their - voices are heard. The clause makes provision that regulations will also provide that individuals will be required to provide information or attend face-to-face consultation. Where individuals do not do so, without good reason, the Department has the power to disallow their claim to benefit. That power will be used sensitively and proportionately, taking into account individual circumstances, in particular the impact of impairments.

1883. Mr Brady: It says that it is likely that the first set of regulations will only address the assessment process for adults, and subsequent regulations will deal with assessment for children. Presumably, that is children who may qualify for PIP. At the moment, the legislation says that if a child is to qualify, they will require substantially more care for the care component and substantially more care and attention than a child of that age who does not have their particular problem. Do we know whether that will be part of the criteria, or will that be contained in the regulations? There has been case law on the issue of substantially more care and attention.
1884. Ms Corderoy: It would be in the regulations.
1885. Mr Brady: It is an important issue in terms of the detail of the legislation. We do not have the regulations, but it is worth bearing that in mind.
1886. Mr Douglas: Anybody applying for the mobility component will also have to meet the required condition in respect of the six-month timeline.
1887. Ms Corderoy: It has been changed. It is now three months and nine months, so it is more in keeping with DLA, but it has to be that they would imagine having it for the next nine months.
1888. Mr Douglas: OK.
1889. The Chairperson: This is a key clause, because it is an enabling one for a lot of these regulations on the issues that we talked about earlier. If everyone is happy enough, we will move on.
1890. Ms Corderoy: Clause 80 is linked with clauses 77 to 79 and makes provision related to what constitutes the required period condition for entitlement to either component of personal independence payment. These essential conditions are intended to distinguish between a long-term impairment or health condition, for which financial support through PIP may be appropriate, and shorter-term conditions, for which other support mechanisms exist.
1891. The required period condition is that an individual will have met the conditions of entitlement to a specific rate of the daily living or mobility component during the three months preceding the date that they become entitled. There is an expectation that they will continue to meet those conditions for a further nine months following that date. These are referred to as the qualifying period and the prospective test.
1892. The qualifying period and the prospective test are also reapplied where an award is reviewed and a higher rate of benefit is merited. This will ensure that any changes in circumstances resulting in an increase from the standard to enhanced rate are also long term. Crucially, people with a terminal illness who are expected to die within six months are excluded from the required period condition by virtue of clause 81. That enables financial support to those in the most difficult circumstances to start as soon as possible. People affected can receive enhanced rates for the daily living component immediately.
1893. Subsection (4) allows for the required period condition to be modified in certain cases; for example, those provisions could allow the qualifying period effectively to be waived where there has been a short break in entitlement. That may be because someone has been in remission from a disease or illness such as MS or leukaemia and their condition deteriorates again. The combined effect of the required period condition is that the individual will have to be or would be expected to be substantially disabled

- for a period of not less than 12 months. That definition is in keeping with the definition of long-term disability for the purposes of equality and disability legislation.
1894. Not everyone will have to wait three months after they make a claim before starting to receive personal independence payment if they have already met all or some of the qualifying period before they submit their claim. People with variable or fluctuating conditions will not be prohibited by virtue of the clause from entitlement to personal independence payment. The assessment criteria will be attuned to the needs of people with variable or fluctuating conditions and will not be a snapshot of the ability on the day that the assessment is carried out; rather, the criteria will consider a person's ability to perform activities over a broader time frame. The fact that an individual may, for example, not satisfy them on the day but would be likely to satisfy them on most others could therefore be enough to satisfy the assessment.
1895. Mr Brady: You talk about a period of 12 months. Again, case law would aggregate over time. From personal experience, I am dealing with cases of, for instance, sarcoidosis, which is a lung condition that flares up over a period. Therefore, in one month, somebody could have three bad weeks and one good week. Will such conditions be looked at in the regulations and the general legislation?
1896. Ms Corderoy: It should cover those conditions.
1897. Mr Brady: It is like an aggregate. If you had nine bad months out of 12, would that be considered a long-term chronic condition? It should be, because it is.
1898. Ms Corderoy: It should be, yes.
1899. Mr Copeland: Is there an automatic right to ask for a review of a decision and/or appeal a decision?
1900. Mr M Kelly: The same rules that the Committee discussed yesterday for mandatory reconsideration and all those things will apply to personal independence payment, and it is the same with appeal rules.
1901. Ms Corderoy: Clause 81 provides for special provisions to apply to claims to PIP made by or on behalf of people who are terminally ill. Those are people who find themselves in the most difficult of circumstances, and it is right that financial support be provided as quickly as possible. The special rules for terminally ill people were introduced in response to the very reasonable demand that people made. People with a terminal illness should receive financial assistance with their end-of-life needs. They are tried and tested through DLA, and will, therefore, be carried forward into personal independence payment. Clause 81 will enable terminally ill people — that is, people who have a progressive disease and are not expected to live beyond six months — to be entitled immediately to the enhanced rate of the daily living component, providing unconditional financial support without them having to demonstrate that they have any limitation on their ability to carry out daily living activities.
1902. Terminally ill people will also be able to be paid the mobility component immediately, subject to having their mobility needs assessed. The assessment of someone's mobility needs will be handled sensitively, discreetly and appropriately, and should avoid the need for a face-to-face consultation where possible. The special rules will also allow claims for personal independence payment to be made by a third party without the terminally ill person's knowledge. That is in recognition of the exceptional circumstances in which information might be kept from patients about their prognosis, either because they have clearly stated that they do not wish to be informed or because to do so may cause them serious harm. Robust procedures will be retained to ensure that terminally ill claimants are not informed of the prognosis through the actions of the - Department. The clause is designed to support people in very difficult circumstances and to try to make the process of receiving the benefit at that time less stressful.

1903. Clause 82 sets upper age limits for claims to personal independence payment. The upper age limit is 65 years old or state pension age, whichever is higher. Therefore, a person who has reached the upper age limit will not be entitled to personal independence payment. The clause enables regulations to be made to specify exceptions to the provision. Exceptions include people who are already in receipt of personal independence payment when they reach the upper age limit, and, provided that their mobility and daily living needs continue in line with the eligibility criteria, those people will continue to receive PIP.
1904. Clause 83 introduces a new provision that affects people who come from Northern Ireland from another European Economic Area (EEA) state or Switzerland, or who claim benefit from one of those states. The purpose of the clause is to clarify which state is responsible for the payment of benefit within the EEA. People who wish to claim personal independence payment but who are insured for a similar benefit with another country will be unable to receive personal independence payment. In Northern Ireland, being insured means paying national insurance contributions under the UK scheme.
1905. Benefits in cash are normally paid according to the legislation of the EEA state where the person is insured, regardless of which state the person resides in. Currently, people who come to Northern Ireland can receive DLA at the same time as receiving payments from another state, as DLA does not have the restriction that is being proposed here.
1906. The provision will safeguard public funds, and it will be a fairer system that people will be able to understand. People arriving in this country will not, therefore, be in a more advantageous position than long-term residents. A similar provision has already been made for the disability allowance care component for attendance allowance and carer's allowance.
1907. The Chairperson: OK; fair enough.
1908. Ms Corderoy: Clause 84 confers power on the Department to make regulations to provide that the daily living component of personal independence payment is not payable where the person is a resident in a care home in circumstances in which any of the costs of any qualifying service provided for the person is already being met out of public funds. The mobility component will continue as normal.
1909. A "care home" is defined as an establishment that provides accommodation, together with nursing or personal care. Qualifying services are defined as inpatient treatment, accommodation, board, personal care and such other services as may be set out in the regulations. People with a disability who do not get any of the costs of those qualifying services paid for by the state will continue to be paid the daily living and mobility components of personal independence payment.
1910. The proposed rules mirror those for the care component of disability living allowance, which is not payable to those in care homes or similar institutions after 28 days for adults and 84 days for children. That will also help to ensure that a claimant's award is not disrupted during a period of respite care in a care home. It will ensure that the taxpayer does not pay twice for the same need.
1911. Mr Brady: Someone in a care home will be given care and attention, so I can see the principle. You said that the mobility component will not be affected. Relatives of those who are in residential care use that mobility component to take them out during the week and at weekends, and there was a lot of speculation that that was going to be affected. What you are saying is that the mobility component will remain the same and not be affected.

1912. Ms McCleary: There was considerable concern about that during the deliberations on the GB Bill and [Inaudible.]
1913. Mr Brady: I just wanted to confirm that that had not changed. Thanks.
1914. Mr Copeland: I think that somewhere in the region of 700-odd folk were going to be affected by the proposed changes to the special needs maintenance allowance. The nature of their domicile was slightly different: they were viewed as tenants rather than residents. You know, like the Camphill community that we visited.
1915. The Chairperson: Yes. Supported housing.
1916. Mr Copeland: Yes. For qualification for the daily living allowance, will any allowance be made for the difference between supported housing and the categories that you have discussed?
1917. Ms Corderoy: The clause deals only with care home residents, and I am not sure about those who live in supported housing. We will need to look at whether those in supported housing will be provided for in the regulations.
1918. Mr Copeland: Will you do that for us? They are getting a rough enough time as it is.
1919. Mr Brady: Following on from that, I know that, in the light of practice, people in supported housing but who lived in individual flats had the severe disability premium taken off them and then reinstated. That would apply in the same way. The people whom we visited have their own address and flat and are residents within a larger supported housing establishment. They do not receive the severe disability premium, because, technically, they live alone. We should perhaps flag that.
1920. Ms Corderoy: Clause 85 confers a power on the Department to make regulations, provided the daily living and mobility components of the personal independence payment or both are not payable in certain circumstances to inpatients of hospitals or similar institutions, where any of the costs of any qualifying services provided for the person is paid from public funds. The clause also provides that regulations will set out further detail on whether any of the costs of medical or other treatment, accommodation and related services provided for a person is considered to be qualifying services borne out of public funds. Disabled people who do not get any of the costs of those qualifying services paid for by the state will continue to be paid the daily living and mobility components of the personal independence payment.
1921. As with clause 84, which relates to care home residents, there will be an underlying entitlement to cover where an individual leaves hospital, and a 28-day run-on or continuation of entitlement to avoid interference with a claimant's award during short periods of hospitalisation. The proposed rules will mirror the existing rules for disability living allowance and will ensure that the taxpayer does not pay twice for the same need.
1922. Ms P Bradley: I suppose that my question also relates to care homes. You referred to the 28-day run-on period. Currently, when a person is admitted to hospital, all the agencies are notified. When the person comes out of hospital, he or she must be out of hospital 28 days. Is this the same as for DLA?
1923. Ms Corderoy: As far as I understand it, it will be the same.
1924. Ms P Bradley: Therefore, people will have to have that break from hospital for their award to continue.
1925. Ms Corderoy: No. I think that they will retain that underlying entitlement to it.
1926. Ms P Bradley: In hospital settings, you get frequent admissions, and people may be out of hospital for one or two days and then have to go back in again. When I worked in the hospital, part of my job was to point out to those patients that, because they were not out of hospital for long enough, they should notify the authorities. In my experience, very few people ever did that and

- continued to claim their award while they were in hospital, whether they were in for one week or six months. I just wanted to clarify whether patients still have to have that break of 28 days.
1927. Ms Corderoy: I will double-check that just to be sure.
1928. Ms P Bradley: It would be the same for care homes. You would need to have that.
1929. Mr Kelly: I think that the general overriding principle is that this will carry forward the same rules as for DLA. We just need to check that.
1930. Ms Corderoy: It is supposed to be for those who are in and out of hospital. Obviously, a lot of those who qualify will be in and out of hospital. It is supposed to be —
1931. Ms P Bradley: If they are in and out of hospital and are out for two days or two weeks, they think that they are still in the qualifying period, but they are not. They are not aware of that.
1932. Ms McCleary: We will have a look at that.
1933. Ms Corderoy: If they are in hospital for longer than 28 days, it becomes —
1934. Ms P Bradley: If they are in hospital for two weeks, out for one or two weeks and back in for two weeks, they have not had a break. That is a run-on period. You must be out of hospital a certain amount of time. If they are in for 28 days and then come out of hospital, that would not apply, but if they are only out of hospital for two weeks, that is not seen as a run-on period. The regulations on that are complicated for most people, and especially for those who are in receipt of that benefit.
1935. Ms McCleary: We will have a look at that.
1936. Mr Brady: It is great to hear social services taking such an interest in benefits.
1937. Ms P Bradley: I filled the forms in many items, Mickey.
1938. Mr Brady: To follow on from that, people have less of a period now. Previously, you could be in hospital for up to eight weeks and still get your DLA or attendance allowance. That was reduced, and it seems that it has been reduced again to 28 days. Can you check that?
1939. Ms Corderoy: Yes.
1940. The Chairperson: Were you thinking out loud there? I thought that you were going to come back in.
1941. Ms Corderoy: No. If it is OK, I would rather check it and get the answer right.
1942. The Chairperson: That is fine.
1943. Ms Corderoy: Clause 86 provides that, generally, personal independence payment is not payable when someone is in prison or legal custody. It also confers a regulation-making power to provide exceptions to that general rule.
1944. Under current legislation, recipients of disability living allowance who are imprisoned because of a criminal offence are disqualified from receiving benefit, and payment stops. If, however, they are detained in custody on remand, payment is suspended pending the outcome of the trial or sentence. Where people are detained in custody on remand, they can have arrears of their DLA paid where, at the conclusion of proceedings against them, they are found unfit to plead, not guilty or are found guilty but do not receive a custodial sentence.
1945. The rules relating to periods of detention on remand are currently common to many benefits, including incapacity benefit, carer's allowance and bereavement benefit. However, unlike those benefits, which are intended to provide income maintenance, DLA is intended to contribute towards the extra costs associated with disability. It is therefore important to ensure that the funding of those extra costs is not duplicated.
1946. With the introduction of personal independence payment, the position of those in prison has been re-evaluated, whether they are on remand or under sentence. Disabled prisoners have their disability-related needs met by the prison or through healthcare provided by the local health and social care trust. Accordingly, it is considered that, to avoid duplication of provision, the payment of benefits should cease when someone is placed in legal custody under any circumstances. Clause 86 provides for that. However, the Department does not propose simply to turn people's benefit off the moment that they are put on remand or sent to prison. People may need to settle some outstanding financial commitments when they are in prison, such as a higher than normal fuel bill that arises as a result of their disability. It is proposed that personal independence payment will be payable for a short period — perhaps 28 days after someone goes into prison. Providing such a period of continued benefit also has the advantage of providing some administrative simplification and helps to ensure that a person does not leave prison in overpayment, which then has to be repaid. The measure prevents duplication of provision.

1947. Mr Douglas: You mentioned legal custody. Does that include police stations or holding centres where people have been arrested?
1948. Ms Corderoy: It is anywhere where they get their needs met.
1949. Clause 87 sets out conditions for claims, awards and information for personal independence payment. It provides that payment of personal independence payment cannot be backdated beyond the date on which a claim is made or treated as being made. Awards of personal independence payment would normally be for a specified fixed period, after which a new claim must be made. Information gathered in the process of determining a claim for personal independence payment is to be treated as information relating to social security. Not backing a PIP payment beyond the date on which a claim is made or treated as being made is a practical provision that has been a feature of both disability living allowance and attendance allowance since their inception. Clearly, this provision needs to be supplemented by measures that will ensure that people who may be entitled to personal independence payment make their claim at the right time.

1950. Subsections (2) and (3) relate to the duration of awards when an entitlement to personal independence payment has been established. The aim is to introduce more regular reassessments into personal independence payments to ensure that ongoing benefit decisions reflect any changes and remain accurate. The majority of awards for personal independence payment will be limited to an appropriate fixed term. Under the current system, the majority of fixed-term awards are given for up to two years. However, there will be a greater range of award durations for personal independence payment; for example, from less than one year to three, five or 10 years, taking account of issues such as the nature of the impairment, the known progression of any condition or the effects of treatment or rehabilitation given or expected to be given. Clearly, exceptions have to be made to that default position for those with the most serious long-term and stable impairments that are unlikely to see any change. Subsection (3) provides that guidance will be issued as to when a fixed-term award would be inappropriate.
1951. Finally, subsection (4) provides that any information gathered during the processing of a claim to personal independence payment will be treated as information relating to social security. That will enable the Department to share relevant information and reduce the requirement for people to provide the same information over and over again.
1952. Mr Brady: Can you clarify a point? At the moment, if someone has an award and there is no end date, it is an indefinite award. Are you saying that it will be less than one year to three, five or 10 years?
1953. Ms Corderoy: Yes.
1954. Mr Brady: It will be fixed-term award, and there are no more indefinite awards?

1955. Ms McCleary: There may well be some indefinite awards.
1956. Mr M Kelly: It is expected that there may be some instances in which there could still be a longer-term award.
1957. Mr Brady: Longer than 10 years, depending on the condition, obviously?
1958. Ms McCleary: Yes.
1959. Mr Douglas: I want to go back to the situation for people with a terminal illness. They go through a lot of trauma, and it may take them a couple of weeks to make a claim. Would that claim be retrospective, or is it from the actual day on which they make the claim?
1960. Ms McCleary: It is from the day on which they make the claim. It cannot be retrospective.
1961. Mr Douglas: There is no flexibility at all? None whatsoever? You can understand the situation. That person is in a dire situation, and finding out about DLA, personal independence payment or whatever is the last thing on his or her mind.
1962. Mr Brady: Just to clarify that point, if you apply for DLA at the moment, and you contact the office, it will note the date. Therefore, it is the date on which you make the claim, and that can be by phone. The office will put that date on the form that it sends out. It might take three months to process, but it will be effective from that date.
1963. Mr Douglas: People with a terminal illness would have a letter from the doctor to say that they were told on that day, although it may take two weeks for them to make a claim.
1964. Ms McCleary: They are likely to have a social worker involved who would presumably advise them.
1965. Mr M Kelly: Macmillan and some of the cancer wards in the hospitals ensure that those who are diagnosed are picked up.
1966. Mr Brady: There are some very diligent social workers.
1967. The Chairperson: We will move on with our diligent officials.
1968. Ms Corderoy: Clause 88 requires the Department to produce two independent reports on the personal independence payment assessment and lay those before the Assembly within two and four years of the legislation coming into operation. The ability of personal independence payment to support disabled people properly will, in a large part, depend on the successful development, implementation and operation of the assessment. The purpose of the review will be to measure that. No decision has been taken on who will undertake the reviews or how it will be conducted. What is important is that it be reviewed and that the review be carried out properly. Providing a report within two and four years of the clause coming into effect will allow time for the process and operation of the assessment to settle down, evidence to be collected and evaluation data analysed.
1969. Clause 89 allows for disability living allowance to be closed legislatively at a future point, when the entire DLA working-age caseload has moved over to personal independence payment. The reassessment of the existing working-age disability living allowance caseload and the movement of people on to personal independence payment is planned over a three-year period beginning in October 2013. Work is ongoing on the design of that process.
1970. Mr Brady: There was speculation that there will be under 1,000 cases processed a week. I think that you gave the figure earlier, but if there are 180,000-odd, logically, if you were doing 1,000 a week, it will take longer than three years. Reasonably, probably nowhere near that number would be processed if they were being processed properly. Therefore, you are talking about a long time. We could all be retired by then.
1971. That figure was put out by the Department, which speculated that 1,000 cases a week would be processed.

1972. Mr M Kelly: No, the 1,000-a-week figure is, I think, predicated on the reassessment of the working-age caseload, which was estimated to be at the point of reassessment in June of in and around only 117,000. The figure of 1,000 is based on the 117,000 as opposed to the full 190,000.
1973. In line with the commitment, the Department will obviously have to ensure that the resources are in place for the provider and the staffing to allow those assessments to take place. Part of our challenge as a Department is to make sure that adequate resources are in place to match that timescale.
1974. Mr Brady: One thousand cases a week is a huge number.
1975. Mr M Kelly: Absolutely.
1976. Mr Brady: Of course, it depends on “healthcare”.
1977. Mr M Kelly: And availability.
1978. The Chairperson: But there is no specified time limit?
1979. Mr M Kelly: No.
1980. Mr Brady: It was just to clarify, Chair. The issue was in the public domain.
1981. The Chairperson: I appreciate that. We will move on to clause 90.
1982. Ms Corderoy: Clause 90 gives effect to schedule 9, which makes provision for amending existing legislation. Its purpose is twofold. First, it makes provision to ensure that personal independence payment binds with common rules for things such as claims, decisions and appeals. Secondly, it updates references to disability benefits in existing legislation to include references to personal independence payment. That will include providing that personal independence payment will be classed as a non-taxable benefit.
1983. Clause 90 works in tandem with clause 91, which provides a broad power to mop up through regulations any remaining references to disability living allowance that may have inadvertently been missed in existing legislation. That is standard practice when an entirely new benefit is legislated for.
1984. As I said, schedule 9 is given effect by clause 90. The amendments in the schedule are in consequence of the introduction of personal independence payment and can be divided into broadly two groups: first, amendments required to the Social Security Administration (Northern Ireland) Act 1992 and the Social Security (Northern Ireland) Order 1998. Those provisions relate to matters such as claims and payments, decisions and appeals and uprating relating to PIP; and, secondly, consequential amendments to a wide variety of legislation, including social security legislation that currently refers to disability living allowance to include, where appropriate, similar references to personal independence payment.
1985. The Chairperson: OK, happy enough? We will move on.
1986. Ms Corderoy: Clause 91 supplements the provisions in clause 90 and schedule 9 to apply consequential arrangements on the introduction of personal independence payment. The task of identifying all the changes that need to be made is substantial. It is clear that, notwithstanding the wide range of consequential and supplementary amendments made by clause 90 and schedule 9, not every change may have been identified. Clause 91 allows the Department to pick up through subordinate legislation any changes identified in future.
1987. Mr Brady: Can the appointed day for the changeover from DLA to PIP vary or is it the day on which PIP kicks in? Obviously, people will be assessed at different times.
1988. Ms McCleary: It will be triggered by a change in their circumstances —
1989. Mr Brady: Yes, and they will then go on to PIP. I am just wondering whether the day on which they go on to PIP will be the appointed day or will there be an appointed day on which PIP will kick in?
1990. Ms McCleary: I think that it will vary.

1991. Mr Brady: That is really what I am asking you. It will therefore vary from person to person almost?
1992. Ms McCleary: Yes. It will vary from person to person, because there will be those for whom it would be triggered by a change in circumstances that they report to the Department. For the rest, it will be done on a random basis.
1993. Mr Brady: Thank you very much.
1994. Ms Corderoy: Clause 92 gives effect to schedule 10, which makes transitional provisions related to the introduction of personal independence payment and the reassessment of individuals currently in receipt of disability living allowance. The clause and the schedule allow the Department to make regulations concerning the replacement of disability living allowance with personal independence payment.
1995. As I said, schedule 10 is given effect by clause 92 and makes provision for the introduction of personal independence payment and reassessment of individuals who are currently in receipt of disability living allowance. It allows the Department to make regulations concerning the replacement of DLA with PIP. The powers provide the flexibility that is required to manage the introduction of personal independence payment and the reassessment of existing DLA in a manner that is both administratively efficient and fair to the individuals concerned. Individuals' conditions can change gradually over time, sometimes so gradually that individuals themselves will not notice. DLA does not have a systematic process for checking regularly the accuracy of awards. There have been 155,577 recipients of indefinite disability living allowance awards. As a result, there may be people who are currently on DLA who are receiving an incorrect amount of benefit. Reassessing the DLA caseload under the new eligibility criteria for personal independence payment is necessary to ensure that all receive an accurate and up-to-date assessment of their support needs.
1996. The powers that are contained in schedule 10 allow the Department to phase in the introduction of personal independence payment and manage the flow of new claims. Regulations will also enable the Department to terminate an existing award of disability living allowance and make an award of personal independence payment in its place. Each case will be looked at individually and assessed against the new criteria for personal independence payment. Claimants may be required to provide information or have face-to-face consultation before a new award of personal independence payment can be made. As a result, each individual will have his or her particular circumstances and support needs considered individually, ensuring that everyone receives the correct amount of benefit.
1997. There are concerns about the reassessment process and what it will entail. The powers that are contained in the schedule are intended to enable the smooth transition between DLA and PIP for the individuals concerned.
1998. The Chairperson: OK. We are happy enough.
1999. Ms Corderoy: Clause 93 makes additional provision that relates to the regulation-making powers that are required for personal independence payment. Those powers are intended to give additional flexibility to the Department as personal independence payment is introduced and the extent to which it is meeting its objectives is assessed.
2000. The powers will principally enable different provision to be made for different cases or purposes that relate to entitlement to personal independence payment. For example, that will be of use for a possible requirement to vary the assessment criteria for those who are moving from childhood to early adulthood or for those who are approaching pensionable age, at which differing activities and measures of ability may be required. They will also provide for making exceptions from - specific provisions, such as those dealing with pensioners.

2001. Subsection (1) makes clear that powers extend to the transitional arrangements and provides for discretion to be applied in certain circumstances. Finally, there is provision that the first set of regulations made to the assessment criteria, whether for working-age adults or children, or for determining the required period condition, will be done by the confirmatory procedure.
2002. The Chairperson: Members are happy enough. Thank you.
2003. Ms Corderoy: Clause 94, which is the interpretation of Part 4, is purely technical. It defines various terms that are used in that Part of the Bill. The definitions are intended to help with the interpretation of the legislation.
2004. The Chairperson: Thank you for that. That concludes Part 4 of the Bill. Therefore, discussion of Part 4 is complete. As I said earlier, some fundamental issues are still foremost in members' minds. They have been well flagged. I thank everybody for their diligence and discipline in trying to get our way through this.
2005. Yesterday, we reached clause 107. Members will recall that we deferred clauses 107 to 115 because of their legalistic nature. We will now resume discussion on those clauses. I propose to suspend the meeting at noon for 30 minutes for lunch. If we are happy to continue until then, we will move on to clause 107.
2006. Ms McCleary: Chairperson, I introduce Conrad McConnell from the Social Security Agency. He will take the Committee through clauses 107 onwards, which are on fraud and error.
2007. The Chairperson: As an overall observation, members had concerns and officials were not in a position to answer them. In general, people's concerns were about the legalistic nature of the clauses and how they interface with the legal system. That is why we deferred these matters for proper consideration.
2008. Mr Conrad McConnell (Social Security Agency): I will deal with clause 107 first. At the minute, if someone commits benefit fraud, there are various ways in which we can take that person through the courts. There are cases that can be tried either way, and cases that can be taken to the Magistrates' Court only, such as those for summary offences. The issue with summary offences is that we have to take the case within 12 months of the offence having occurred. At the minute, under the social security system, we can also take forward cases that have gone over the 12 months, if the evidence has only come to light recently. We can extend that 12-month period by a further three months. The issue is that the certificate process, as we call it at the minute, to allow that to happen does not apply to housing benefit. This clause simply allows housing benefit to come into that regime with other benefits.
2009. The Chairperson: OK. We will move to clause 108.
2010. Mr McConnell: At the minute, housing benefit fraud proceedings are taken forward by the Social Security Agency and its benefit investigation service. The Housing Executive does not take forward its own investigations. Clause 108 simply allows the Housing Executive at some point to carry out its own investigations if it desires to do so. However, there are no plans to move in that direction. The intention is that we will continue to deal with all housing benefit offences along with other benefit offences. It is simply a provision to allow it to happen at some point, but there is no intention to actually commence that clause.
2011. The Chairperson: Is there any understanding of what that might mean for a Housing Executive officer? Does that person become a quasi-judicial official? What does it actually mean in practice?

2012. Mr McConnell: It simply allows the Housing Executive to act in the way that the Social Security Agency acts in that it has powers to investigate fraud offences. It allows the Housing Executive, as an organisation, to take that power as well. It would carry out similar work to us. It simply allows that to happen in theory. In practice, we do not have any plans to not investigate housing benefit fraud. In fact, as we move to universal credit, there will be simply one benefit fraud offence anyway, which our investigation service will investigate.
2013. Mr Copeland: Does that have any impact on housing associations or private landlords, as they are now some of the main providers of social housing? Does it apply solely to the Housing Executive?
2014. Mr McConnell: It is the Housing Executive.
2015. Mr Copeland: Is the Housing Executive restricted to only investigating suspected fraud in the case of its own tenants, or does it have a remit for all people in receipt of housing benefit?
2016. Mr McConnell: I honestly cannot say. I suspect that it is all tenants. However, I would need to check with our people, who currently investigate the offence for the Housing Executive anyway. I cannot give you an answer now, but I will certainly find out.
2017. Mr Copeland: Given the shift in ownership of social housing from the Housing Executive to associations and private landlords, I would have thought it a bit unfair, in some respects, if Housing Executive tenants were the only ones who were caught in that net.
2018. Mr McConnell: I think that the primary motivation behind this is to do with housing benefit coming under universal credit, of course, and we will investigate that — as we do anyway — as part of other benefit offences. There are parts of the benefit at present, such as the rates relief element, that do not form part of social security benefits. This clause would, perhaps, give the Housing Executive power to look at that, if some sort of offence was committed. It is more about that kind of eventuality in the future rather than a change to what currently happens.
2019. Mr Brady: My question is about the Housing Executive's prosecution powers. Housing benefit is part of the benefits system, and it is a paper exercise when it is paid over to the Housing Executive, so it administers housing benefit; it does not actually pay it. If there was alleged or suspected fraud, it would be dealt with by special investigation officers from the Social Security Agency as opposed to the Housing Executive.
2020. Mr McConnell: Yes; that is right. That is what we are doing currently, and there are no plans to change that.
2021. Mr Brady: That should remain the same.
2022. The Chairperson: We will move to clause 109.
2023. Mr McConnell: Clause 109 relates to the offence of attempted benefit fraud. At the minute, the agency can provide what is known as an administrative penalty as an alternative to prosecution for benefit fraud. That can only be applied to offences where there has been an overpayment of money. This clause allows the agency to offer an administrative penalty as an alternative to prosecution for an offence of attempted fraud, where it did not get to the receipt of money. It is to recognise the fact that attempted fraud is a serious offence as well as actual fraud. We want the power to be able to offer the administrative penalty in those cases too. At the minute, in practice, if we have an offence of attempted fraud, we only really have one avenue for it, which is through the courts, whereas an administrative penalty might be more appropriate. Therefore, it allows us to extend our powers to do that.
2024. Mr Copeland: I am sorry if I sound a bit under-briefed on this issue, but are these offences that take place under civil law or under criminal law.
2025. Mr McConnell: They are all under criminal law.

2026. Mr Copeland: So, in other words, you prepare a file, and it is sent to the Public Prosecution Service (PPS).
2027. Mr McConnell: Absolutely, yes.
2028. Mr Copeland: And they apply the three tests.
2029. Mr McConnell: Yes, including the public interest test.
2030. Mr F McCann: At present, there is a period between what happens in the Social Security Agency and the time that it gets to you. I think that it is called compliance. Is that what you are talking about?
2031. Mr McConnell: No, it is not. To explain what compliance is —
2032. Mr F McCann: They offer people the opportunity to say if they have been working rather than going to court. That is what you are talking about, is it not?
2033. Mr McConnell: No. Compliance is very different. As you described, compliance is where officers of the agency, who are not fraud officers, go out, talk to people and uncover changes in circumstances. They allow the person the opportunity to tell us what they should have told us up to now, and we accept the fact that we need to get this sorted out and get their benefit corrected, and there is no further action beyond that point. That is purely in relation to fraud. What I am talking about is the opportunity to give people the alternative to prosecution, but there is still a sanction for benefit fraud. It is like an internal fine, if you like, but it does not involve going to court. At the minute, we cannot offer that internal administrative penalty to people where we have not actually incurred a loss of money, and it allows us to change that. Otherwise, we would end up taking to court everyone who has attempted fraud, even though it is a very small offence, because we have no other option.
2034. Mr F McCann: How do you determine what the sanction is going to be and the length of the financial penalty?
2035. Mr McConnell: There are further clauses that talk about the administrative penalty and its size. At the minute, it is 30% of the overpayment, so, if you had an overpayment of £1,000, we would apply a £300 administrative penalty to that. That would be your penalty for having committed that offence. You would not go to court because the whole point of the penalty is that you do not go to court.
2036. Mr F McCann: That increases the amount of money.
2037. Mr McConnell: Yes, it does.
2038. Mr Brady: I am intrigued by the alleged fraud without an overpayment. Can you give us an example of that?
2039. Mr McConnell: It is attempted fraud where, for example, someone could change a bank statement or adjust their earnings to try to get benefit. It may be that we then catch that on, and I hope that we do catch that on. If we do, we can then take the person for the offence of trying to commit benefit fraud. It is a bit like shoplifting where someone is caught at the door on the way out. It is a similar issue. Someone has tried to commit an offence, but they did not quite get away with the actual benefit of what it was they wanted. However, it is still a serious attempt.
2040. Mr Brady: With respect, if somebody is caught shoplifting, they usually have the goods on them.
2041. Mr McConnell: But they have not made use of the goods.
2042. Mr Brady: I am not sure if that analogy would stand up in court. It is an interesting one. Essentially, there is speculation, to some degree, that the person is attempting to commit fraud without the actual proof of fraud, which usually comes by way of them having been paid benefit that they are not entitled to.
2043. Mr McConnell: Yes, although the fraud takes place where the facts that are reported are the wrong facts. That may lead to money being received or not, and this is about tackling the situation where it is intercepted and the money is not - actually given out, but the attempt was made to try to get it.

2044. Ms McCleary: We come back to dishonest intent — the intent to defraud.
2045. The Chairperson: In practical terms, if someone gets an overpayment through fraud, you fine them 30% of that. Is that right?
2046. Mr McConnell: Yes.
2047. The Chairperson: What percentage of nothing do you fine someone for attempting fraud? It is a serious question. Where is the sanction level drawn from? Where is the reference point?
2048. Mr McConnell: We will have to work through the detail of that in the regulations. It is a valid question. At the minute, the penalty is based on the fact that you have a figure and it is a percentage of that figure. Further on, we are looking at extending the administrative penalty powers to include a minimum of £350. We have to work through the thinking of that for the regulations. At this early stage, there will be something like that £350 minimum, because there is no figure to apply a percentage to in that case.
2049. The Chairperson: In essence, we are being asked to agree — not now — to clause 109, which would enable the Department, by subsequent regulation, I presume, to determine that, if someone is deemed to be involved in attempted fraud, there would be some level of fine. Therefore, this is enabling that, but we do not know what that will be.
2050. Mr McConnell: Yes.
2051. The Chairperson: OK. Fair enough. We move to clause 110.
2052. Mr McConnell: I have just touched on this. The administrative penalty as it is at the minute is 30% of the overpayment. Through clause 110, it is intended to create the power to increase that to 50% of the overpayment or a minimum of £350. For example, if someone has an overpayment today of £100, we would apply a penalty of £30.
- This clause will give us the power to apply a minimum of £350. The purpose of this is to try to deter people from committing benefit fraud. It increases the current administrative penalty amount.
2053. Mr Brady: Is this the same as you were talking about before? This is the compliance matter and you pay something instead of going to court.
2054. Mr McConnell: Yes, exactly.
2055. Mr Brady: It is going up to 50%.
2056. Mr McConnell: Yes, it is not compliance. It is a penalty for a benefit fraud offence, but it is an alternative to court. It takes the current 30% and brings it up to 50%, and it also brings in the minimum of £350.
2057. Mr Brady: We are back again to subsistence levels.
2058. Mr McConnell: Yes.
2059. Mr McClarty: How do you get blood out of a stone?
2060. The Chairperson: The clause is designed to set the minimum at £350. We do not need to have a discussion on that. We just need to understand what it is going to do. Is everybody happy enough with that? We know what it is designed to do and what the implications will be.
2061. Mr McConnell: I will move to clause 111. At the minute, if someone is offered the administrative penalty as an alternative to prosecution, there is a 28-day period within which they can withdraw their agreement. If the agreement is withdrawn within the 28-day period, we would take the person to court instead. This clause reduces that period from 28 days to 14 days. It is a balance aimed at giving the person a reasonable time to consider their position. At the minute, these things drag on. Someone may not be sure and it may go on for the full month. If the person then withdraws the agreement later on, that holds up the case if it is going to court. It is trying to get a balance between moving cases through the system — good administration — and giving the person sufficient time

- to consider their position and what they want to do. It brings it back by two weeks.
2062. The Chairperson: OK. Do members understand that? Fair enough.
2063. Mr McConnell: Clause 112 is the civil penalties clause. The intention is to create the power to apply a civil penalty to people who have been negligent in their claims. It is accepting the fact that their behaviour is not worthy of a full fraud investigation, a case going to a court or an administrative penalty being imposed, but at the same time, there may be clear negligence in how the person looked after their case and did not report circumstances or failed to report something that was material to the case. It is trying to tackle that problem where people get the wrong amount of money. It is about trying to encourage people to be really careful about their circumstances and report changes on time. The amount will be set in the regulations, but, at the minute, the intention is to have a civil penalty of £50.
2064. Mr Brady: It goes back to the argument of misrepresentation versus failure to disclose. If you misrepresent something, you are misrepresenting something that you know. With failure to disclose, the person may not actually know what they are supposed to disclose. You cannot disclose something that you know nothing about. It is about the terminology.
2065. Mr McConnell: It is important to stress that this would not be applied in every case — certainly not in every case where there is an overpayment. This is about trying to disaggregate people who very deliberately commit fraud against the system. There are people, as Mr Brady has described, who genuinely make a mistake, and there are people in the middle whose circumstances may not be sufficient to show clear intent but, at the same time, it was obviously not a genuine error that they made; there was some sort of negligence involved.
2066. Mr Brady: I think you will find that, and it was answered yesterday, the point is that, irrespective of who makes the mistake, be it the Department or the person, the Department — under clause 69, I think — has the power to recover it. It is very one-sided.
2067. Mr McConnell: The intention behind it is to encourage responsibility.
2068. The Chairperson: Fair enough. We will move to clause 113.
2069. Mr McConnell: We already have what are known as the loss-of-benefit regulations in place. They are also known as the one-strike regulations, whereby we withdraw benefit from someone who is convicted of a first benefit fraud offence. That applies for a four-week period. The intention, through clause 113, is to increase that four weeks to 13 weeks for someone who receives a conviction for a first offence for fraud. So, it is strengthening the current provisions by, essentially, increasing the four weeks to 13 weeks.
2070. The clause also creates a first-offence loss of benefit for three years for someone who is convicted of a serious benefit fraud offence. That would be described as an offence that attracts a term of imprisonment of two years or there was overpayment in excess of £50,000. The intention is to tackle serious, organised benefit fraud, whereby there are large overpayments, and fairly hefty imprisonment terms can be imposed by the court on the back of that behaviour.
2071. Mr Brady: I suppose this is where the double whammy comes in. You are caught, get a jail sentence and, when you come out, you are sanctioned. What you are saying is that you could have a three-year sanction but you are in jail for two years and you have another year of sanction.
2073. Mr Brady: The seriousness of the offence is, obviously, reflected in the prison sentence. Is two years the sort of arbitrary sentence that they are looking at?

2074. Mr McConnell: Yes. If you receive a two-year —
2075. Mr Brady: But, when you come out, there could still be another year's sanction on you. Is that right?
2076. Mr McConnell: Yes, in terms of your loss of benefit. However, I would stress that, in all loss of benefits, hardship provisions also apply. There are also protections for the family and all of that.
2077. Mr Brady: Just on that, the family — the wife or partner and children, let us say — claims while the person is in jail. When the person comes out, they become part of the household again. Will there be a split payment? This is something that we have been discussing. Will the partner and children be paid separately and the person who committed the offence and was sentenced to jail not get anything? How is that going to work?
2078. Mr McConnell: I am not sure of the logistics or whether they would have to make fresh claims. I can say though, that the benefits that apply to the family, not the individual, are protected from loss of benefits and always have been.
2079. Mr Brady: I understand that, but when that person comes back, there would be a change of circumstances, which the partner would have to report because someone is coming back into the household. The issue is about the logistics of how that will be addressed. Will that be in the regulations?
2080. Mr McConnell: I am guessing it would be. I cannot say for sure at this point how exactly that would work, but I can certainly come back to you on that.
2081. Mr Brady: You can see one problem it throws up.
2082. Mr McConnell: Yes.
2083. Mr F McCann: It may be simple, but how do you determine what a serious offence is?
2084. Mr McConnell: The regulations will set out the definition of seriousness. At the minute, in GB, what is being put forward about how you would define that is what I described, which is the two-year imprisonment for a benefit fraud offence, which sets a seal in terms of seriousness, and/or a £50,000 overpayment.
2085. Mr F McCann: So, it is jail or a £50,000 overpayment?
2086. Mr McConnell: Yes.
2087. Mr F McCann: So, if you go into court and are given a suspended sentence for, say, a £50,000 overpayment, you come out and face a three-year loss of benefit.
2088. Mr McConnell: Yes, and the intention behind it all, as with all loss of benefits, is to deter people from committing benefit fraud.
2089. Mr F McCann: I spoke about this in the Assembly. The thing that throws me is that, if I go in and rob a bank of £500,000 and get two years, I can make a fresh claim. However, if I commit fraud against the system, I go in then get sentenced again.
2090. Mr McConnell: Yes, it is the same as the one-strike rule and the regulations at the minute.
2091. Mr F McCann: I was going to say do you not think that is unfair, but I would not put you in that position.
2092. The Chairperson: That was very helpful, Fra. Thank you for that. We will move to clause 114.
2093. Mr McConnell: Clause 114 is around the two-strike rule. It increases the loss of benefits for a second offence from 13 weeks to 26 weeks. The intention is the same as for the other loss of benefit regulations, which is to deter people from committing benefit fraud.
2094. The Chairperson: OK, if everyone is happy enough, we will move to clause 115.
2095. Mr McConnell: I think that this is the final clause in this section, and it relates to cautions. At the minute, the agency has the ability to bring someone to court through the Public Prosecution Service, to apply the administrative internal penalty, which I mentioned, or to offer someone a caution for benefit fraud. The intention of this clause is to withdraw the caution as a means of dealing with benefit fraud, so you will have only two routes: go through the courts and prosecution or the penalty. All that is in line with DWP in GB. The intention is to reflect the seriousness of benefit fraud by removing caution as a means of dealing with it and having the internal fine or a court case.

2096. The Chairperson: OK. I think members are happy enough with the information so far. We have finished going through clauses 107 to 115, which concludes our deliberations on Part 5. You will be pleased to know that we have finished Parts 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5. We will restart at 12.30 pm sharp to go through Parts 6 and 7. If we do well, I will let you away a wee bit earlier. [Laughter.]

Committee suspended.

On resuming —

2097. The Chairperson: We move to Part 6 and clause 121.

2099. The current child maintenance system needs to change; it is not fit for purpose. Only half of all children benefit from effective child maintenance arrangements. The current system places too much emphasis on the state determining financial support and not enough on supporting separated and separating families to reach their own arrangements. Family-based arrangements will always be the best option for children. Research shows that children who receive support from both parents throughout their childhood tend to enjoy better outcomes in later life.

2100. The Committee will be aware of the wider reform programme that has been driven by the 2008 Act, about which officials have already spoken to the Committee. The reforms aim at rebalancing child maintenance policy to support parents and to encourage them to work collaboratively. The clauses in the Welfare Reform Bill make only minor amendments to the 2008 Act.

2101. Ms Corderoy: Clause 121 supports the vision of increased parental responsibility. As Anne said, it is in the interests of the children if separating families work together to make arrangements. Such arrangements also produce better and more enduring outcomes.

2102. It is considered that, given access to the appropriate support, many child maintenance clients might be able to reach their own arrangements. Many parents are already making their own arrangements using the existing child maintenance choices service. Clause 121 makes provision that will require an applicant for statutory maintenance to enter through a gateway conversation, which will require them to take reasonable steps to come to a private arrangement. It is not about denying access to the statutory scheme; however, it will ensure that the applicant is fully aware of all the options and that he or she is directed to support that may assist them.

2103. Good relationships between ex-partners and between the non-resident parent and child are a key factor in enabling parents to make their own arrangements. The gateway process will include a discussion of the options available. If, for example, a parent considers that it might be possible to make a family-based arrangement but they need information or guidance to assist with that, they will be directed to that support.

2104. Where it is clear that a family-based arrangement will not be possible, applicants will still be able to access the statutory scheme immediately. That would include situations where a person has been unable to contact the other parent or where they were in fear of a violent ex-partner. They will be advised of the implications of such an application. In that way the clause is personalised,

- and no person would be asked to take steps, which, in their circumstances, would not be regarded as reasonable. The provision will apply to all parents who are considering applying to statutory schemes for the first time, as well as to those who are using the present scheme and who wish to remain in the statutory system.
2105. The Chairperson: OK, Jane; thank you. Members are happy enough with that.
2106. Ms Corderoy: The intention behind the amendments made by clause 122 is to ensure that there is more choice about how child maintenance is paid. The clause will enable non-resident parents to choose to pay maintenance directly to the parent with care, following an application to the statutory child maintenance service and a subsequent calculation of the maintenance liability. That amends the current position in which the parent with care can insist on the statutory child maintenance service collecting the money from the non-resident parent. That will avoid further involvement through the use of the full collection service.
2107. Most non-resident parents will be permitted to elect to make a direct payment and prove to the parent with care that such payments can be made voluntarily. It is also sensible to change the legislation as per that clause to allow the non-resident parent a choice of paying maintenance directly to the parent with care, which we know as direct pay, in the event that the provision in the Child Maintenance and Other Payments Act 2008 to charge a fee for maintenance collection is brought into operation in the future. It will allow them to avoid getting into the situation in which they may have to pay fees. As long as the non-resident parent pays the maintenance due in full and on time through direct pay, the clause will allow both parents to avoid any collection charges should they be introduced here. The clause will not allow non-resident parents to avoid their responsibilities. Should the non-resident parent choose to fail to pay the parent with care in full and on time, the Department will swiftly move the case into the full collection service, and enforcement action will be taken as appropriate to ensure that payments are made. Additionally, the clause will permit the withholding of the choice completely from non-resident parents, where it has been shown that it is unlikely that they will pay through direct pay.
2108. Mr Brady: Obviously the thrust is for people to make their own arrangements.
2109. Ms Corderoy: Yes.
2110. Mr Brady: That seems a sensible way of doing things. Will the Department take active steps to facilitate that? I am not sure whether that is clear in the Bill. If, say, a woman told the Department that she should get maintenance and that it was possible to come to an arrangement, will the Department consider facilitating that rather than someone coming along six months later to say that they have been trying to get maintenance payments from their ex-partner who will not pay it?
2111. Ms Corderoy: The whole thrust is the gateway conversation. The Department is supposed to make sure that people get the right support.
2112. Mr Brady: I am trying to tease out your involvement. Will the onus be left completely to the couple, or will the Department take a proactive role in facilitating the gateway conversation?
2113. Ms McCleary: It will facilitate it, but whether it will do more than facilitate will be up to the couple. It is not up to the Department to decide what they should do.
2114. Mr Brady: The Department should point out the pitfalls if they do not. That may be part of it. It is all right someone saying that they will come to the arrangement, but the Department may be in a position to say that if they do not they will be penalised in some way.
2115. Ms McCleary: I am fairly sure that part of the gateway conversation will be to tell a couple that they can avoid having

- to pay x amount of money if they do y. It is factual.
2116. Ms Corderoy: The child maintenance enforcement division is working with the voluntary and community groups that provide those services. It is also working to provide an enhanced service through the gateway conversation.
2117. The Chairperson: Following on from what you said, Jane, we were lobbied recently by people who are not sure whether the new arrangements will introduce another conversation and create duplication and a barrier for people to engage with the Department.
2118. Ms Corderoy: This comes from DWP. There is an active and sophisticated voluntary and community sector, and there are support services available. It is about getting them to work together so that there is no duplication of services, that there is much better co-ordination and that people are pointed to the right service at the right time.
2119. The Chairperson: Thank you.
2120. Mr Copeland: Jane, if I heard you right, you slipped something in there very quietly about the cost of the collection service if we decide to charge it here. Is it being charged somewhere else? What exactly does that mean?
2121. Ms Corderoy: That was in the command paper that we spoke about last week, in which they propose collection fee charges in GB. The proposals in that paper are that non-resident parents will be charged 20% for collection and parents with care will be charged 7%. That is out for consultation, and no decision has been taken on what will happen here.
2122. Mr Copeland: Is that a 27% deduction from the amount of money that will go from the parent without care to the parent with care?
2123. Ms Corderoy: No; it is 20% on top of the money that the non-resident parents pays. The 7% would come out of the money that the non-resident parent pays to the parent with care.
2124. Mr Copeland: Will we be given the chance to address some of the iniquities, for want of a better word, that apply to parents with care and parents without care in the current CMED legislation, or is it just these adjustments?
2125. Ms Corderoy: That would be brought in through regulations that would be brought to the Committee. At the moment, we do not have anything on that. The Minister and the Department are still considering it.
2126. Mr Copeland: Will we get more information in future?
2127. Ms Corderoy: Yes.
2128. The Chairperson: The clause does not relate to that.
2129. Ms Corderoy: No.
2130. Mr F McCann: Returning to the question that Alex asked, with the best will in the world, the legacy of these payments is that there has been complication after complication. If different conversations do arise, can you tweak it rather than have to seek changes to legislation?
2131. Ms Corderoy: The legislation is relatively high level, but conversations and work are going on to develop that. The meetings that I have been at, at which CMED has taken a lead, have been very positive and there has been very good, collaborative working. CMED understands that things may apply in England that we do not need here. It is about taking a bespoke approach to local issues. It would not require a change to the legislation to tweak that.
2132. Mr Brady: Last week, I raised the point that people in my constituency live within a mile of a different jurisdiction. Many non-resident partners have exploited that. England, Scotland or Wales do not have that problem in the same way that we do. Someone could make an arrangement to pay the caring parent but not, necessarily, pay anything.
2133. Ms Corderoy: You are right; they do not have that problem to the same extent that we do. They have cases of people

- who, for example, live in France, but we definitely have more such cases. Maurice, do you want to say something about reciprocal enforcement of maintenance orders (REMOs)?
2134. Mr Maurice Byrne (Department for Social Development): As I said last week, there is European legislation in place to allow parents with care to pursue maintenance from a non-resident partner [Inaudible.]
2135. Mr Brady: It is expensive.
2136. Mr Byrne: I cannot comment on that; I do not know. It may be a matter of their going to the court and getting an order for maintenance. That could then be pursued through the Department of Justice, which will address it on their behalf through the other member state.
2137. The Chairperson: That is not pertinent to this clause.
2138. Ms Corderoy: No; sorry. It is not.
2139. Clause 123 will allow parents to apply to the Department for an indicative calculation of what the child maintenance calculation would be under the statutory rules. That would not create a statutory legal enforceable liability and would only provide information for separating families. The calculation would be a key tool to help parents who want to work together to make their own arrangements. It will provide a calculation based on the same rules as for statutory maintenance. It will, therefore, take account of other children that a non-resident parent may be supporting and whether that parent shares the care of a qualifying child. It will also take account of the non-resident parent's gross weekly income, with that amount normally based on the most recent information held by HMRC.
2140. That supports the objective of empowering parents who are separating to make informed choices on collaborative family-based arrangements. Parents are best placed to make the arrangements that deliver the best outcomes for the children. We understand that many parents would welcome someone to help to work out how much should be paid or received to facilitate family-based arrangements.
2141. The indicative calculation differs from the statutory calculation, in that it is only intended to give the position at the time it is applied for. It will, therefore, not be adjusted for subsequent changes in income or circumstances, as it would be if it was through the statutory scheme.
2142. That service will provide information that is specific to the parent's circumstances and which might not otherwise have been available to both parents. It will enable fairer negotiations between them. Without that provision, a parent would need to apply formally for statutory maintenance in order to obtain that information, even if they did not want to involve the Department in collecting maintenance payments.
2143. Mr Brady: Payment in kind has been accepted in the past. It could have been a pair of shoes for a child rather than money. Will that be included in the legislation? It could be a school uniform or clothes and not necessarily money. Much of this seems to be predicated on the payment of money as opposed to payment in kind, which has been accepted in the past.
2144. Ms Corderoy: I am not sure. We will have to check on that and get back to you. If it is direct pay, it is whatever both parents agree to.
2145. Mr Brady: I just wanted to flag that up. It is worth checking it out now rather than it becoming an issue later when we may not know how to deal with it.
2146. Ms Corderoy: Clause 124 would enable fees, if they were introduced, to be recovered directly from the benefits payable to a non-resident parent. That is essential to ensure a consistent and fair approach to charging in the new scheme. The Department already has the power to make deductions of child maintenance directly from benefits payable to a non-resident parent. This clause also would allow such deductions to be made in respect of charges and arrears payable by non-resident parents.

- Additionally, the clause would remove the restriction in the current scheme to make such deductions from benefit only where the non-resident parent is liable for the flat rate of maintenance.
2148. Mr F McCann: Is there a sliding scale in the deduction of benefits depending on how much you owe? Most people are paid at subsistence level. What is the maximum amount that you can remove without it having an effect on a new family, for example?
2149. Ms Corderoy: I do not know what the maximum amount is. I will find out for you. As regards the sliding scale, I know that this clause is changing the arrangement. It only affected people on the flat-rate maintenance. This clause means that now, if you are on benefit but you know that you have more of an income, this will still apply to you. I will find out about the sliding scale.
2150. Clause 126 will clarify in law that arrears of child maintenance cannot be included in individual voluntary arrangements. That supports the belief that parents' obligations to support their children should be a priority and that they should not be allowed to avoid that duty by exploiting insolvency law. This clause will ensure that a non-resident parent entering into an individual voluntary arrangement continues to be liable for the full amount of outstanding child maintenance throughout and following any agreement. It is not a change in policy. There is a general principle in personal insolvency law relating to bankruptcies and debt relief orders that arrears of child maintenance are excluded from those processes. However, that is not expressly set out in legislation for individual voluntary arrangements, which has led to some legal uncertainty. The amendment confirms current policy and legislation and puts the legal position beyond doubt.
2151. Mr Brady: The intention may be to ensure that people do not use bankruptcy as a ploy to avoid payment. However, will individual circumstances be taken into account if someone is genuinely bankrupt, does not have recourse to any other funds and is unable to pay?
2152. Ms Corderoy: As I understand it — and I am in no way an expert on insolvency law — the individual voluntary arrangement is so that the person can avoid being declared bankrupt and come to an arrangement with their debtors. This is so that they cannot avoid paying their child maintenance. I imagine that individual circumstances will be taken into account.
2153. Mr Brady: Presumably the voluntary arrangement will not include an arrangement with the caring parent.
2154. Ms Corderoy: Yes, I think so.
2156. Ms McCleary: We are investigating that. Clause 127 removes the obligation — and I stress that — for the Department via jobs and benefits offices and jobcentres to advertise certain types of jobs in the sex industry. This removal of obligation applies to jobs where the activity is intended to sexually stimulate others. It includes jobs such as lap dancers, topless barmaids and

- strippers. We believe that provisions in the clause are needed because it is absolutely wrong that the Department should advertise jobs that could support the exploitation of people. We should not encourage vulnerable people to apply for those types of jobs. It will enshrine the commitment that we made to stop jobs and benefits offices and jobcentres advertising those types of jobs. The change followed a public consultation that revealed significant public concern about jobs and benefits offices and jobcentres advertising jobs in the sex industry.
2157. The consultation also indicated that the people who worked in that industry could be vulnerable to harassment and discrimination. The ban also serves to protect people who use jobs and benefits offices and jobcentre services from taking jobs where they could experience that.
2158. Mr Brady: I presume that those jobs will not be regarded as alternative employment if you fail the work capability assessment.
2159. Ms McCleary: I could not possibly comment on that.
2160. The Chairperson: We do not need to go any further into that.
2161. Mr Durkan: Would taking the advertising out of jobcentres give protection to vulnerable people?
2162. Ms McCleary: You seem to be suggesting that there would be more protection for them if such jobs were advertised in jobcentres.
2163. Mr Durkan: I am not suggesting that. I am saying that there is a possibility.
2164. Ms McCleary: It is not an ideal situation whatever way you look at it. I suppose you could argue that it is better that they are advertised in jobcentres rather than in — 2165. Mr Durkan: Phone boxes?
2166. Ms McCleary: — shop windows. I do not know, but there was a commitment given to do this, and that is why we are doing it.
2167. Mr Douglas: I know that I will get questions about this somewhere along the line. It talks here about retail being excluded. Is that right? In England, sex objects are manufactured. I do not know of anywhere in Northern Ireland that does that, but we have sex shops here.
2168. Ms McCleary: It is not quite as personal when you are dealing with a sex shop.
2169. Ms Corderoy: The key is that it is any activity intended to stimulate others sexually. If that is what the job entails, that is the thing that is banned.
2170. Ms McCleary: Clause 128 is to do with reduced fees for dog licences. This clause amends the Dogs (Northern Ireland) Order 1983 to introduce reduced fees for persons in receipt of income-based benefits. Provision in the Bill updates the Dogs (Northern Ireland) Order 1983 to include certain income-related benefits for the purposes of a passported benefit and reduced dog licence fees. The benefits to which that applies are: universal credit; state pension credit; income support; housing benefit; income-based JSA; income-related ESA; and working tax credit.
2172. This amendment is in relation to reciprocal agreements. The need for it has arisen from a previous consequential amendment to section 165 made by paragraph 10 of schedule 4 to the Tax Credits Act 2002, which, unintentionally, narrowed the scope of the power and prevented its exercise by the Secretary of State. Section 165, therefore, does not enable the Secretary of State to make regulations or orders by statutory rule. That was - an unintentional oversight, so this is a correction measure, effectively.

2173. Reciprocal agreements between the UK and a number of non-EU countries assist in the satisfaction of conditions for entitlement to various benefits. International relations are an excepted matter under schedule 2(3) to the Northern Ireland Act 1998, and the power to make the necessary order rests with the Secretary of State under section 155(1) of the Social Security Administration (Northern Ireland) Act 1992.
2175. Mr Brady: I am asking this to satisfy my own curiosity. If, for instance, parts of the Bill are approved, does the Secretary of State, under the Social Security Administration Act, have the power to overrule a decision by the Assembly relating to the provisions of the Bill and go ahead and impose something?
2176. Ms McCleary: That is something that I would need to come back to you on.
2177. Mr Brady: It is giving them powers, which, presumably, they may not have had previously. If they had, that bit would not be in the Bill. If we decided on one thing in respect of a devolved issue, he — or she; they change quite frequently, apparently — could come along and overrule it.
2178. Ms McCleary: We will investigate that and come back to you.
2179. Mr Copeland: That would come to us as a statutory rule in the normal way, in which case we could accept it or take it to a prayer of annulment.
2180. The Chairperson: You do not know, because we have to get an explanation. This enables the Secretary of State to make a reciprocal agreement with some other state. How does that impact here? How does it come into effect here, if he or she decided that that was what they had agreed between London and France, or wherever? How does it become enacted here? Is it by way of a statutory rule? Or, does the Secretary of State sign off on it?
2181. Mr Douglas: You mentioned France. What sort of examples are we talking about here?
2182. Ms McCleary: There are a number of reciprocal agreements with various states.
2183. Mr Douglas: I am talking about those that affect Northern Ireland.
2184. Ms McCleary: I know that our division handles a number of reciprocal arrangements in relation to the benefits system with certain countries. In another briefing, we mentioned Switzerland. I think that that was because of a reciprocal agreement. I will get you examples.
2185. Mr Douglas: It would be good if you could get us a few examples, because this is an important aspect.
2186. The Chairperson: Yes, of course it is, but the key question with clause 129 is this: what actual power does it give the Secretary of State over and above the head of a Minister and Department in the Assembly? That is what we want to determine.
2187. Ms Corderoy: I think that it is only to do with subordinate legislation. It would not have an impact on primary legislation.
2188. The Chairperson: It would be helpful to get that clarified for people.
2189. That is clause 129 and Part 6 completed.
2190. Ms McCleary: Clause 130 relates to the rate relief scheme. It amends article 30A of the Rates (Northern Ireland) Order 1977, which is an existing enabling power that allows DFP to make whatever regulations are necessary to maintain support schemes for domestic ratepayers. This amendment will allow that power to be extended to cover the - replacement of the rates element of housing benefit, which will, as you know, cease to exist from 1 April 2013.

2191. The Executive have agreed to preserve the existing entitlements for up to two years and to fund any shortfall out of public expenditure for that interim period. The provision will provide the legislative cover for that holding operation, but will also provide for any new rate support scheme that may emerge beyond then. The details of any rate support scheme will be included in subordinate legislation, which will be subject to normal Assembly scrutiny.
2192. The Chairperson: Members are happy with that.
2193. Ms McCleary: Clause 131 relates to repeals. It gives effect to schedule 12, which makes provision for repeals that result from the introduction of the welfare reform measures. They are listed there. I do not know whether you want me to go through them.
2194. The Chairperson: I think that people can go through them themselves, unless anyone needs to have any of that explained. It is probably self-explanatory. Are members content with clause 131? OK. Thank you. We will move on to clause 132.
2195. Ms McCleary: Clause 132 is a general interpretation clause. I do not think that there is anything that I particularly want to say about it.
2196. Clause 133 is a commencement provision, which will provide for the coming into force of the provisions of the Bill. The provisions specified in subsection 1 will come into force on Royal Assent. The remaining provisions of the Act will be brought into force by commencement orders. Subsection 3 sets out how commencement orders can be used; for example, to appoint different days for different purposes and, in certain cases, different areas.
2197. The Chairperson: OK. Members are happy with that.
2198. Ms McCleary: Finally, clause 134 is the title of the Bill.
2199. The Chairperson: It is not in the explanatory notes. I do not see it in the paper. Is it in the Bill itself?
2200. Ms McCleary: It is on page 98.
2201. The Chairperson: It is blank.
2202. Ms McCleary: It is on page 96 of the Bill.
2204. Ms McCleary: Well, you will not be surprised that I cannot answer that. I will not pretend otherwise. [Laughter.]
2205. Mr Copeland: No. I would like to see the methodology and formula that were applied and the instructions that were given to reach those figures. In other words, what instructions did the people who came up with those figures actually follow?
2206. The Chairperson: OK. Fair enough.
2207. Mr Durkan: On that point, is the Department on target to realise the figure for the financial year 2012-13, by the end of which the Bill may or may not have passed through the Assembly?
2208. On one other point, paragraph 636 of the explanatory and financial memorandum, which deals with the effects of the Bill on public sector manpower, states that, basically, there is expected to be an increase in demand initially, but that there will be reduced demand on public sector manpower in the long run. Is there a business case anywhere or anything to show how much that demand and manpower will be reduced by?

2209. Mr Brady: So, you are creating employment by reducing employment in one sector?
2210. Mr Durkan: That is particularly important given that, last week, the Minister referred to the 1,500 jobs that will be lost by not passing the Bill.
2211. The Chairperson: Fair enough.
2212. Anne, clause 130 is in Part 6 of the Bill. In the explanatory notes, it is in Part 7.
2213. Ms McCleary: You just want to clarify that. Certainly, in my notes, Part 7 starts at clause 131. In the Bill, it starts at clause 131.
2214. The Chairperson: Obviously, the Bill is the important document. I just want to draw members' attention to the fact that clause 130 is actually in Part 6 of the Bill as opposed to Part 7. I am not sure about the relevance of that. I just wanted to make it clear for people where it sits.
2215. Mr Copeland: I just want to check the difference between a Bill and an Act. Most Acts are accompanied by an interpretation Act, which tells you what some of the stuff that is in the Bill means. Is there an interpretation clause, or are there interpretation clauses, available with this legislation?
2216. Ms McCleary: There is an interpretation Act, which is a totally separate piece of legislation. I do not even remember the year of it. There usually would be a definition section, as there is in this Bill. There is an interpretation clause at 132, which explains the various phrases used. So, there is that.
2217. The Chairperson: I presume, generally speaking, a Welfare Reform Bill, for example, is a Bill tabled for debate and passage, perhaps. The Welfare Reform Act is the outcome of that.
2218. Ms McCleary: Once it has passed Royal Assent —
2219. The Chairperson: It becomes an Act. We will have the Welfare Reform Act 2013, I presume.
2220. Ms Corderoy: The Committee asked for a paper on the Bill. That is being prepared and is in addition to the explanatory and financial memorandum and has [Inaudible.] mean.
2221. The Chairperson: We have a fair wee bit of clarification to get. We have completed all the parts clause by clause and need further explanation on some of them. We need to process that as quickly as possible because I was a wee bit unsure as to what we were going to receive by way of written correspondence from the Minister.
2222. Going back to last Wednesday, by the afternoon some clarification was provided and some was not. We were then told that we would have to wait until those were signed off by the Minister. I am confused about this and I was not sure whether that was the case. I just presume that we are working our way through this. If you come back and give us information from last week or this morning, we are happy to take that. Can we just get those issues clarified expeditiously if we can?
2223. Ms McCleary: We will sort out the outstanding issues as soon as possible. A couple of letters are coming officially. They were being progressed over the past couple of days and I expect them to be with you very shortly.
2224. The Chairperson: Are we in danger of causing a problem if we are in writing? All we are doing is trying to get clarification and that may not need to go through Ministers. Maybe some questions do, of course, but where they do not have to go through a Minister —
2225. Ms McCleary: Whenever we get a letter from you and we have to give a written response, it does have to go through the Minister.
2226. The Chairperson: Can we find a way to short-circuit that?
2227. Ms McCleary: We will liaise with the Committee Clerk.
2228. The Chairperson: OK. I just want to ask so that we can keep moving. Anne, Maurice and Jane, thank you very much for your attendance.

2229. The Chairperson: I welcome the representatives from Advice NI to the table. We have Kevin Higgins, Sinead McKinley and Jenny McCurry. I remind everybody in the room that this session will be recorded by Hansard. I thank you for being here, Kevin, Sinead and Jenny. Yesterday, we had the announcement from the Minister, and I presume that you have read that and taken it on board. You have provided us with a submission. You have addressed the Committee before and elaborated quite well on your position. I will leave the floor to you.
2230. Mr Kevin Higgins (Advice NI): Thank you, Chair, and thank you to the Committee for the invitation. I will introduce my colleagues. Sinead McKinley is North Belfast Advice Partnership advice co-ordinator, and Jenny McCurry is a social policy student at Queen's University who is volunteering with Advice NI and doing a piece of work related to welfare reform.
2231. If it is OK with the Committee, we propose to take the following approach: I will give a very brief summary of the key aspects of the Bill from the perspective of Advice NI — when I say brief, I mean brief — and I will pass over to Sinead, who will talk about the issues faced on the front line by advice services, what advisers are seeing and the needs of clients. I will then pass to Jenny, who will talk a little bit about the research that she is going to do for us, and then it will come back to me. We would like to focus on four things: three additional clauses that we would like to propose, and one amendment to an existing clause. We feel certain that those will not threaten parity but will demonstrate that we are trying to do our very best to mitigate what the Minister called unpalatable consequences. People have called them stronger things than that.

2232. The Assembly debated the Bill in great depth last week. I know that the Committee is, of course, familiar with the content of the Bill and, in particular, many of its shortcomings. As the Chair rightly said, the briefing paper by Advice NI sets out the parameters of where we are coming from today. I want to briefly draw the Committee's attention to a number of quite recent reports and assessments, primarily from GB, on emerging thinking on the impact of the Bill. For example, a new report by the Children's Society and others has highlighted that up to half a million families stand to lose out under universal credit. The report gives a number of examples of how that will happen, but I will take just one: 230,000 severely disabled people who do not have another adult to assist them could receive between £28 and £58 a week less due to the abolition of the severe disability premium. It does not say that they do not have health problems or anything like that; it simply says that it is an arbitrary cut and that is the amount they will lose out on.
2233. According to the Resolution Foundation, almost 1.2 million people will be affected by the in-work conditionality aspect of universal credit. In a briefing note published earlier this month, the foundation highlighted that, under universal credit, conditionality will be extended to working people for the first time, and claimants who do not reach the earnings threshold, equivalent to a 35-hour week at national minimum wage, will be expected to increase their income through a combination of additional employment, higher wages or increased hours. The foundation estimated that that will impact on 1.2 million people. If there is to be increased conditionality, obviously the next step will be an increased risk of sanctions for not adhering to that increased conditionality. It will put a lot more people at least under the threat of increased sanctions.

2234. As for the performance of Atos Healthcare, the current provider of medical assessments for disability living allowance (DLA) and employment support allowance (ESA), the Committee will know that the National Audit Office (NAO) report that came out last week contained a number of findings, including that just 10% of the penalties triggered by poor performance had been applied. That is relevant because it all feeds into our proposed new clauses and amendment, which we think will add value to the Bill. The Chair of the Public Accounts Committee (PAC) at Westminster, Margaret Hodge, has stated that:

“People with disabilities must be able to access the benefits to which they are entitled. The department relies on medical assessments to make sure it awards the right benefits to the right people. Getting this wrong can have devastating impacts on individuals and their families.”

2235. As we know, the people who are most likely to be negatively impacted by the Bill are those with disabilities. That is mainly where the axe is going to fall.

2236. Also with regard to those with disabilities, I want to highlight the report ‘General Practitioners at the Deep End’, which many of you will have seen. It involved 100 GP surgeries serving the most socio-economically deprived populations in Scotland. That work and that report underpinned a number of British Medical Association (BMA) statements. The BMA would not, I suppose, make statements on welfare reform lightly or flippantly. These are some of the statements:

“The idea of saving £2bn ... from the group of people in question seems to be inhumane and unreasonable”.

2237. The group of people in question are those with disabilities.

“Evidence seems to suggest that people with serious health conditions are sometimes being declared fit for work.”

And, finally:

“the full impact on disabled people and the associated costs to the government are being ignored”.

2238. Again, that ties in with the four suggestions we have made.

2239. That sets the context. When we look at what is happening in GB, we begin to see more clearly the emerging implications of this legislation. I suppose that that is what will happen here in the future. I invite Sinead, our co-ordinator of advice services in north Belfast, to present to you on the pressures currently faced by advice services in north Belfast.

2240. Ms Sinead McKinley (Advice NI):

Thank you for inviting us along. I work in north Belfast. Our six main advice providers come from a range of different backgrounds, such as community, church, ex-prisoners and citizens advice. We all work together to provide advice right across the north of the city. We have 13 full-time advice workers, and last year we dealt with 35,000 inquires. That is a lot of work and pressure. We are now doing longer hours and holding weekend surgeries, and we are stretched to full capacity. People are so worried about what is already happening in the welfare system and what is about to happen. There is an increased demand for the service. I have been doing this job for 15 years, and I really do not know how we will cope with that.

2241. One of the key issues for us is funding. We really need long-term funding. We cannot plan and review our services if we are continually worried about how we are going to pay our advice worker until the end of March next year. That is a continued strain on the sector. We are firefighting, rather than looking to the long term at how we can work in partnership with the likes of the Social Security Agency (SSA) to help people get the right information and advice.
2242. When we look at what we have at the moment, we see people continually coming back to our service, at least six times a year, whereas, before, when we had benefits like incapacity benefit, they were maybe coming in once a year. Now, they are continually coming in with questions about the new regulations attached to employment support allowance. They are more worried about their benefits. We are also seeing people with more complicated cases, with the knock-on effect that one benefit has on another. We are continually chasing progress on benefits, and there is increased demand for tribunal representation. Last year, we attended 960 appeals for 520 clients. We have an 80% success rate, so we know that tribunal representation definitely works for clients, but we cannot continue to meet the demand that is being placed on our services. It is putting a real strain on not just clients but advisors. They are taking on a lot of work, and it is putting them in a very vulnerable position. We are asking people to open up about their medical history. Last week, I had to send advisers on applied suicide intervention skills training (ASIST). That is not their role, but it is going to be their role as things progress in the next year or two.
2243. I hope that the Committee will really look at some of the pressures on our sector and that it will work in partnership with all of us to try to help people to get the right information and advice.
2244. The Chairperson: OK, Sinead, thank you for that.
2245. Ms Jenny McCurry (Advice NI): My role at Advice NI will be in supporting the policy work. I plan to write a short series of policy reports that will look at some aspects of the changes and at how best their impact might be mitigated in Northern Ireland. One particular concern is the impact the changes will have on women. We heard yesterday that the payments will be split in some circumstances, but we do not yet know when that will be. There is a serious concern that that will impact on the financial independence of women. There is also concern about the requirement to move lone parents to jobseeker's allowance (JSA) after their youngest child turns five, and about how that is going to be practical in Northern Ireland with the childcare provision we have. There is also concern about how that will impact on lone parents' ability to pursue higher education and find work of a better quality.
2246. My role will be to conduct some interviews and focus groups and to go out and talk to people. Some research has been done in GB and we have some findings from England, but it would be useful to know exactly how the changes will impact on people here. I also hope to do some focus groups with people from black and ethnic minority communities. Another big problem is that the online assessment service will only be available in English. That will also have an impact on people in Northern Ireland because this is the region of the UK where people are least likely to have access to the internet or to have ever used it. Hopefully, through going out and talking to people and looking at existing research, I will be able to find out a bit more about what is going on and how we can support people in the best way.
2248. Mr Higgins: I will now get to the meat of the presentation: the four changes that we would like to see made. Number one — if you remember nothing else about the presentation after we leave this morning, we would like you to remember this — is to include a clause in the Welfare Reform Bill that would highlight a statutory right to independent advice for those who are negatively affected by the Bill. We do not say that flippantly or lightly. The Committee will know that the Housing (Amendment) Act (Northern Ireland) 2010 came through the Committee in November 2009, and a couple of members were part of that. It places a duty on the executive — I take it that that means the Housing Executive:

“The Executive shall secure that advice about homelessness, and the prevention of homelessness, is available free of charge to any person in Northern Ireland.”

2249. I would argue that that is relatively minor in comparison with the Welfare Reform Bill. People in the housing field will say that it is very important, and I do not dispute that. However, what I am saying is that we should include a clause in the Bill to the effect that the Department for Social Development shall secure that independent advice about welfare reform, in particular to those negatively affected by welfare reform, is available free of charge to any person in Northern Ireland.

2250. The counterargument, if I could even go so far as to call it that, is that people may say that there are advice services at the moment, but we are clearly saying that those services are reaching capacity, and that is why Sinead is here today. We all know about the social security cuts that have come in since 2010, and we all know about the recession and people losing their jobs. We all know that tribunal representation is at capacity at the moment, and we have a raft of changes. Given all that, we think — and we can stand over this — that it makes sense to include a statutory right to independent advice. If that could be agreed, we could move on, and the questions could be about how we do it, whether it is too difficult and what the processes are. We can overcome all of that. We are here to overcome questions like that, but the starting point has to be whether we can include a statutory right to independent advice. That is the first change, which is at the top of our list.

2251. Members will already know from constituents coming through their offices about the problems with medical assessment and the knock-on effects on ESA, DLA, and so on. People with disabilities are going to be profoundly impacted by this Bill because it replaces DLA with a personal independence payment (PIP) for those of working age and because it limits to 12 months the period for which people in the work-related activity group (WRAG) can receive contribution-based ESA. Those two things will be based on the medical assessment. The medical provider’s report plays a big part in determining whether you are placed in the WRAG or whether you will continue to get DLA and the additional premiums that flow from that. What we believe would add a sharper edge is statutory scrutiny by this Committee of the medical provider’s performance. At the moment, there is a contract in place between the Social Security Agency and the medical provider, and responsibility lies with the Social Security Agency to scrutinise the performance of the medical provider. We want to see something more than that. We believe that the Committee could add a sharper edge to the performance of the medical provider by providing scrutiny there.

2252. The Committee will have seen the two TV programmes at the start of August: ‘Dispatches’ and ‘Panorama’. They must have made for very uncomfortable viewing for anybody watching them, particularly MPs and MLAs. You must have been thinking how you could change the attitude of, “We can almost do what we want. We can produce reports and pass them to the decision-maker, and, at that point, our accountability ends. We do not have to stand over those reports. We do not have to go to tribunals to stand over them or anything like that.” We think that we have an opportunity here to address that issue. At the moment, from the Committee’s point of view, the scrutiny of the performance is slightly at arm’s length. Let us try and see if we can bring more accountability to the performance of the medical provider. That is the second point. Again, neither of the two points threatens parity. They do not do anything that will change the level of benefits paid.

2253. The third point is around monitoring. We would like to see the Committee monitoring the impact of the implementation of welfare reform, both directly on people and indirectly on displaced expenditure. The direct impact on people is fairly straightforward. It involves, say, the numbers of people reassessed from DLA to PIP who do not make it across or who make it across at a reduced level. That is one example, and that is a direct consequence of welfare reform legislation. However, advisers are highlighting to us that the issue of displaced expenditure is equally important. There is a knock-on impact. You can make a saving on the social security spend by spending less on DLA or ESA, and that is fine, but what are the knock-on impacts? For example, in the report, 'General Practitioners at the Deep End', GPs highlighted that when people's benefits were negatively affected, it drove them to their GP. If they suffered from mental health problems, it very often caused their condition to deteriorate, so there was an impact on the health budget. There is also an impact on justice. We have already talked about how the number of tribunals has gone through the roof, and you know about the success rate of ESA appeals and all of that. That is fact at the moment. However, what will the impact be if people do not get their DLA or the amount is reduced when they move from DLA to PIP? What will happen when they argue that they are not in the right group for ESA and that they should be in the support group and should not, therefore, be affected by the 12-month limit? All that will have to be absorbed by the Justice Department. It will have to pay for the additional tribunals and extra sittings that we know will happen. Again, there would be displaced expenditure there. There might be savings in social security, but look at all the extra spend that is displaced. Also, shortfalls will occur in the social housing sector and the private rented sector, but what is the displaced expenditure when it comes to homelessness and the Housing Executive or whatever body having to find people emergency housing? So, there should be monitoring of the impact of the implementation of welfare reform directly on individuals and indirectly on other Departments.

2254. Finally, we think that there should be an amendment to the child maintenance clause. We think that it is unfair that the parent with care is effectively penalised for having no other option but to pursue child maintenance through the statutory scheme. We say, yes, maintain the penalty, maintain that fee, but place it where it should be. If we can get a family-based agreement, that is the best way to go. If it means that we are not upsetting children and all of that, we should try and get an agreed settlement. If an agreed settlement cannot be obtained, you penalise whichever party or parent is responsible for not allowing that family-based arrangement to be put in place. So, if it is the parent with care who is blocking maintenance, you apply the penalty or the charge to them. I do not think that that will often be the case, but, if it is, so be it. If, as is more often the case, it is the non-resident parent who is obfuscating and blocking the family-based arrangement — of course, when there is relationship breakdown, communication will be at an all-time low — then discharge the penalty on the non-resident parent. Again, you are not breaking parity. You are still charging the fees, penalties, and so on, but it will be more effective, and you will be charging the person who is responsible for the penalty being imposed in the first place.
2255. Those are the four issues. We know the way the Bill is at the moment, and we think that those four things could change it. Come March or April, when Royal Assent is given, this Committee could say that it changed the Bill and that it put in place things that will mitigate its effects and help the most vulnerable in Northern Ireland but that

- do not threaten parity. We want to focus and major on those four things, and that is why we have come here today to present to the Committee.
2256. The Chairperson: Kevin, you are suggesting the inclusion of a new clause that would, in effect, ensure that there is statutory advice available to those who engage with the Department on this issue. It is basically about the provision of statutory advice. Is that right?
2257. Mr Higgins: Independent advice.
2258. The Chairperson: The second issue is about statutory scrutiny or enhanced scrutiny of the medical provider. Can you explain what precisely that means? Is that the process of assessment? You mentioned the medical provider, but there is an assessment process.
2259. Mr Higgins: It would be specifically Atos, which does the medicals at the moment for DLA and ESA; we do not yet know who the medical provider for DLA to PIP is going to be. At the moment, the Social Security Agency has the contract with Atos, the medical provider. Advisers have raised this with Advice NI, and we have raised it with the Social Security Agency. The agency will tell you that it is its responsibility to monitor that contract and to ensure and verify the performance of the medical provider. We are saying that that needs to be built upon and made more robust. We feel that the Committee should be involved in that in some way; I am not sure how, but we can work up the detail. Given the problems, which we all see, of people feeling that they did not get a fair go at the medical assessment, and given the two TV programmes I mentioned, I think that there is merit in seeing whether we can strengthen and bolster the medical provider's performance and give the Committee a role in that. If you look at the Public Accounts Committee's comments on the National Audit Office report on the shortcomings of the medical provider's work, you see that this may provide an opportunity for the Committee to have a more direct involvement in the provider's performance.
2260. The Chairperson: You are looking for greatly enhanced monitoring of the impacts, first, on people and, secondly, on displaced expenditure. Your last point refers to child maintenance provisions and the issue of the penalty for the parent who is not the one preventing an agreement. I just want to be clear, because I see all of those things as involving enhanced scrutiny or monitoring, with the exception of the provision of independent advice and the issue of penalising a parent.
2261. Mr Copeland: Kevin, you said that your existing structures are already creaking, and I know from my constituency office the scale of the hit on the ground. Can you give any indication of what you foresee being the likely increase in need from where we are now to when the legislation kicks in?
2262. Mr Higgins: There is information there on which calculations can be based. The Treasury document that we all know came out in 2010 referred to a 20% cut. We also know that 50 per 1,000 head of population in GB claim DLA, while in Northern Ireland it is 100 per 1,000 head of population. So, that is twice as many people. There is no doubt that there will be a differential impact here. If we use the 20% cut referred to in the Treasury document, we can estimate the number of people on DLA who will be negatively affected. They will, undoubtedly, come in for advice because the additional premiums that they get could be affected — the money itself, Motability schemes, blue badge and all of that additional support. Again, that is not to say that the person does not have a disability or a health problem; it is just that they simply do not reach whatever threshold this is set at. So, 20% is one way that we can try to estimate demand.
2263. We also know the numbers on contribution-based ESA who are placed in the work-related activity group. So, everybody who is claiming contribution-based ESA in the WRAG group will, as a result of this, see their benefits stopped after 12 months, and that is all additional demand. Undoubtedly, such people will come to advice services. We will go through the merits of the case, and it may be that not everybody will fit the criteria. In that event, we will be open and honest and say that they do not, but many will, and that will feed through to appeal workloads. As for contribution-based ESA and the WRAG, of course people in the support group are not affected by the 12-month rule. So, that is where people will be coming from there. For those on DLA, it will be about getting onto PIP. For those on ESA, it will be about getting into the proper group, which for some people will be the support group. We know the numbers there, so we could then work up demand and estimate what the demand would be on the advice sector.

2264. Mr Copeland: If you have extra demand and you are creaking now, you will need extra resources. I am curious about the increase in and availability of those resources. Given the fact that we have twice the number of people on DLA, a substantial proportion of whom are receiving that benefit as a result of mental illness, do you know whether the contract between the Department for Social Development and Atos, or whoever the provider will be, will give weight to expertise and knowledge of mental illness? In my view, when it came to the ESA stuff, people who were not qualified to pass judgement on mental illness or recognise a mental illness were sitting in judgement of people who quite clearly were mentally ill. Do you know whether that was inculcated into the way in which the contract was constructed? It strikes me that, if it was not, it should have been.
2265. Mr Higgins: I will pass that comment on to Sinead. My one comment on that is that, undoubtedly, it will be discharged by healthcare professionals. That means that some will involve GPs and doctors but some will involve other healthcare professionals, such as nurses and so on. I suppose that our query is whether that examination will give an accurate picture. I sat in on one of the examinations a couple of weeks ago to see how it works. It lasts for 30 minutes to 45 minutes and may not be conducted by a doctor; it may be conducted by some other healthcare professional. The information is typed into a computer because it is a computer-based system. Can that snapshot really give an accurate picture, particularly for people with mental health problems, as you rightly pointed out? I am not so sure that it can. Sinead will comment on that.

2266. Mr Copeland: I am sorry; just before you do that, Sinead, I have a question. There are people who suffer the consequences of physical illness or mental illness or both. They may be examined by someone who is not a doctor. The number of GPs involved in this process is a lot smaller than I had originally thought, and some of the figures on the mainland are frightening. Is it possible that someone who suffers from both physical illness and mental illness could be examined by a healthcare professional who specialises in one or the other?
2267. Ms McKinley: When Atos was introduced, we were told that it would bring people in so that, if you had a mental health problem, you would see a counsellor, or, if you had a back problem, you could see a surgeon. You would be examined by the relevant person, depending on your condition. That has not happened. GPs and nurses are actually doing the majority of the examinations. One of the main problems is that when people go in with a mental health problem and it is clear that they are on very high levels of medication for their mental health, that is being sidestepped. The medical professional involved is not even taking that on board and is not going back to the GP for additional information or looking at whether the patient is seeing anyone else. The whole area of mental health is being skimmed over. The majority of people who come to us in north Belfast have mental health problems, so they become more vulnerable. We are hounding GPs, which is a big problem for us, because we have GPs who are very good at giving us additional evidence, but we also have GPs who want to charge for additional evidence, and maybe the GP is not the right person to be giving the additional evidence. The flip side of that is that you can get a very good supporting letter from your GP but the Department will not look at it. It is about how you marry all those things together so that GPs are aware of what is being asked and so that Atos, in a sense, is aware of the criteria for the benefit. When people apply for ESA, the descriptor that they have to meet is very clearly stated on their form. When they go to the medical, it is a completely different assessment. The specific questions around the descriptors are not asked. We have to tease that out of people and give them examples of what the benefit form is asking of them. If that is not put in front of them at the medical, they are disadvantaged from the moment they go in.

2268. We have found that people who very clearly meet the criteria for benefit are not receiving it. It is an ongoing thing, and they are being put through the stress of an appeal, where they have to go in front of a panel and put their case forward. That is happening daily; at the moment, we are dealing with 20 appeals a week. A lot of people are putting their evidence in front of a panel and are being told that they are being awarded the benefit, but it is six months of worry and stress that there is no call for.

2270. Ms McKinley: And cost, yes, indeed.

2271. Mr Douglas: Thanks very much for your presentation. I want to follow on from Michael's point about the expansion of your work in the future. I am not quite sure whether you could do this or whether you have done it, but could you quantify how much monetary benefit that this would bring to Northern Ireland? Think of the benefit take-up campaigns; a lot of people do not claim benefit. I imagine that that will be the case with some of these measures as well. It would be helpful if you were able to quantify what this would bring for the people in Northern Ireland who are on benefits. That money goes back to Treasury if you do not claim that benefit. It is a good selling point on top of everything else.

2272. Mr Higgins: Good question. We do an annual membership profile report, and we get statistics. We do not do it ourselves; our members keep a tally of all the work that they do and the income that they generate. We get the information from the appeals service. It is able to tell us the numbers of people who are being represented by our members, their representatives and advisers and the success rate of all of that. The bulk of that work is related to DLA and ESA. We are able to tell very clearly. That is verifiable information. You are quite right: we delivered the benefit uptake exercise last year. I understand that the Minister will make an announcement imminently about that work. When you see the report and what the Minister says about that, you will see — again, it is verifiable information — the impact that independent advice services are having on generating additional money for people. I understand that that will be out this week.

2273. Mr Brady: Thanks very much, Kevin, Sinead and Jenny, for your presentation. It was very comprehensive. I suppose that I should declare an interest as an ex-independent adviser. You talked about the increase in work. Obviously, that will happen anyway because, allegedly, they are replacing a complex system with one that is supposed to be more simple. One of the points that you made, Sinead, was about online accessibility. I imagine that that will increase your workload greatly anyhow because, in my experience, people will go to advice centres before they go to the statutory organisations. Otherwise, many advice centres would not exist. You are going to have a huge increase in work.

2274. There have been all sorts of discussions over the years about mainstream funding. That simply has not happened. Maybe that is something that the Department should look at, particularly in relation to independent advice centres. That is much required. You

- raised four points. It is very important that people should have a statutory right to independent advice. That is extremely important because of the depth of knowledge that advisers have around all aspects of social security and benefits in general.
2275. Fra and I were on the Committee in the previous mandate. When the initial stages of welfare reform were being introduced in June 2007, the then Minister wanted it rushed through under accelerated passage. We were told at the time that, if we did not agree to that, people's benefit would be affected. One of the amendments that we put forward was exactly what we have been talking about. In relation to mental health, the person who examined or was dealing with the person should be an expert, such as a community psychiatric nurse, a clinical psychologist or a psychiatrist. We were told that staff would be trained and that that would not happen. As for what is happening in Britain and undoubtedly is starting to happen here, people are going to the assessments, and it is a tick-box exercise. My experience in my constituency is that people are being assessed by nurses, and sometimes doctors, but mostly nurses who, in some cases, are not clued in. I had one person who went in with a particular type of boot that he had been given by Musgrave as a compression thing because he had broken his foot very badly. The nurse did not have a clue what it was; they did not know why he had it. That is the kind of example I am talking about. It seems that the primacy of medical evidence would go a long way to alleviating that problem. If you had somebody with a mental health problem and they were dealing with a psychiatric community nurse, a psychiatrist or a psychologist, medical evidence from them should be paramount. That should take primacy. The medical provider should take note of that. People are winning appeals because that type of medical evidence is then being assessed by the decision-maker, whereas, as you rightly said, it is being ignored at the initial stages. That
- is very important. What are your views on that?
2276. The monitoring is important and will have a tremendous impact. You outlined that.
2277. What you said about the fees on child maintenance is fair. Ideally, people want an in-house solution, and, if that does not happen, the charges should be imposed on the person who is not prepared to do that. The point has been made that the constituency that I represent is on the border. The caring parent is often left chasing somebody who is in a different jurisdiction. That has not been factored in to any great degree, and that is important.
2278. In Lanarkshire in Scotland, Atos got a contract for work capability assessments and contracted it back to a statutory agency. By doing that, it made around £18 million. That statutory agency really should have had the contract in the first place, it might be argued.
2279. I would like to hear your views on the primacy of medical evidence and on the issue around funding.
2280. Mr Higgins: We are trying to get a balance in that the work is being outsourced to a private sector firm under a commercial agreement. That introduces tensions around all of this, because you have a provider trying to maximise its revenue from the contract. On the other side of that balance, real people who are having to go through this with health problems are coming into advice centres. There is a tension between service provision and the commercial drive to maximise profits. That drives the firm to consider how it can provide the service at reduced costs, and that takes you down the road of using nurses rather than always using a doctor, as would have been the case under the old medical support services way of doing things. If the Committee were sitting on the other side of the equation, it would allow the weight, strength and robustness to counteract the incentives to maximise profits that commercialism can bring into this. If you could get the Committee involved in - some way in the service delivery end, it would be useful. It makes sense to me.

2281. The demand on the advice sector was mentioned. To get that included in the Bill is top of our shopping list. It would be a fantastic thing for the Committee to be able to stand over that and say that it got that added, because look what the advice sector can do. I include in the advice sector the Law Centre, Citizens Advice and Advice NI. It does not matter. Look what the advice sector can do in the areas of benefit uptake, tribunal representation, taking people to commissioners, and so on. Deploy that resource to try to mitigate the worst impacts of welfare reform. We have tried to highlight the fact that we are at capacity as it is, and there will have a bit of thought on how we can deploy it best. We are open to discuss that. Resources are a part of that, of course, but maybe it is about us doing things differently as well. Get it in there, and we can work on it.
2282. Mr Brady: I have a couple of points. The success of statutory independent advice is predicated on the fact that the independent advice sector will have proper resources and funding. Obviously, you can change to some degree what you do, but most people will agree that, right across the sector, you are doing very well in the advice that you provide. Therefore, it is really about resourcing.
2283. An issue for many years has been that there are a number of people who get a medical certificate from their GP saying that they should refrain from work and then those people go to someone who tells them that they are not actually looking at their ability to work. They are looking to see not what is wrong with them but what is what right with them. There is that anomaly, and GPs are falling back on that and saying that they are not there to decide whether a person is fit for work. Ultimately, they are, because it still says that on the certificate. All of those anomalies need to be sorted out, and that would make things easier. If you got the nuts and bolts of it right, it would be easier to follow it through. That is part of the difficulty.
2284. On the monitoring, you are right about striking that balance. However, ultimately, if someone has a particular mental health or physical problem and has a consultant, it should be the consultant who deals with them regularly, backed up by GP medical evidence. Ultimately, these decisions are made by civil servants who are not medically qualified or by so-called health professionals who are in the middle. They abdicate responsibility by telling people that they do not make the decision and that it is made by a civil servant. The point I am making about the primacy of medical evidence is that the decision-maker should have the medical evidence to strike the balance with what the health professional is saying. That is important.
2285. Mr Higgins: It is. We have reiterated to the Social Security Agency that decision-makers are exactly that — decision-makers. They should take their role seriously. Very often they do, but you are right. Their role is to make decisions. If there are competing elements of evidence and medical evidence, they should be weighting that accordingly, and then making what is hoped to be the right decision and getting the decision right first time.
2286. Mr Brady: I will finish with this point. The problem is that they do not have that balance, because the medical evidence that has been put aside at the initial stages does not filter through to them. It is only at the appeal stage. That has been going on for many years, as I have certainly seen in my experience of representing people. People were able to produce medical evidence. In some cases in the old medical support service system, people brought in X-rays, and the doctor, nurse or whoever was carrying out the examination told them not to show them to the X-rays, because they were not experts in that. It is very important that the medical evidence goes through to the decision-maker and is not ignored, which it is at the initial stage of most cases.
2287. The Chairperson: Mark, were you going to make a point on that?

2288. Mr Durkan: I was going to make a point on the medical assessment and the lack of accountability of the medical assessment providers. Obviously, the major impact is the impact that it is having on people who are being wrongly assessed, but there is a major impact on the Department, which is facing the cost of the appeals. I raised this point last week or the week before. It is about building something into the contract which states that, if a decision is overturned after appeal, the medical assessment provider foots the bill for that appeal. It would make them be a lot more scrupulous or stringent in their assessment process.
2289. Ms P Bradley: Thank you for your presentation. I do not want to regurgitate things that have been said. I do not disagree with most or any of what I have heard. I also worked in the advice sector; I worked for the Citizens Advice for five years. I know the problems, due to what came through the door there, and that was some years ago. I also know what is coming through the doors of my constituency office now. There are lots of issues and problems out there. I do not disagree with any of the four points that you highlighted to us today. When the Bill comes into force, I would like to think that there will be some sort of monitoring put in place around the impact that it is having. Some of us sit on the Health Committee as well. We would like to be able to see how it is going to impact on health inequalities and everything else. So I would like to think that something will be put in place for that.
2290. I am looking at the part about child maintenance. I have been down this road myself, never mind anything else. An amicable agreement between two parties immediately after a separation very rarely happens. It is some years down the line before that happens. It would be ridiculous and awful if a parent with care were penalised. Quite often, the parent with care will be left without anything. I know that; I have been there. I will certainly be arguing against someone being penalised for that.
2291. There are, and have been, many faults with medical assessments. We all recognise that. I do not think that anyone in this room does not recognise that.
2292. The statutory right to independent advice is another very good idea. I assume that the money for that would have to come from the Department. Have you put any figure on what the projected cost of that might be?
2293. Mr Higgins: At the moment, we are working on that and trying to estimate demand. That can be a difficult thing to do. Even estimates of the total negative monetary impact of welfare reform vary, but we have a fair idea of the numbers, specifically with DLA and ESA. We can work that up in more detail over the coming weeks and get it to the Committee. We understand that there is a bit of work to do. At the moment, at a high level, we are flagging up that it is a huge need that will be coming our way.
2294. Ms P Bradley: If that is something that the Department would need to take on board, it would be another factor, because I assume that it would have to be funded from this level. It is something that we would need to keep an eye on to see how much it would cost. Thank you very much.
2295. Mr Higgins: I totally agree. Getting the line added into the Bill would concentrate minds, and it would ensure that we put the necessary thought into it and that it was taken seriously.
2296. Mr F McCann: The problem with coming last is that most of your questions have been asked. I will try to think of a couple of new questions.
2297. Ms P Bradley: That is why I tried to get in before Fra.
2298. Mr F McCann: I have a couple of points, and I raised this one before with regard to previous cuts. Has the Department sat down with the advice sector to work out what resources will be required to deal with what can only be a serious increase in the amount of people going through your doors?

2299. Mr Higgins: I know that chief executives have met senior officials from the Social Security Agency, so I am quite certain that welfare reform has been on the agenda of those meetings. I am not sure if it has got to the point at which they are saying that they are going to make x amount of resources available. I do not think it has made as much progress as that. Our incentive for trying to get the line in is that it will hasten the journey towards knowing what we can put in place.
2300. Mr F McCann: I would appreciate it if you could keep us in touch with that, because it has been a matter of interest for the Committee over a period.
2301. You mentioned GPs in Scotland. A number of reports have come through from the BMA and its subcommittees coming out against Atos and the way it handles things. I think that we need to take that one stage further, because we have all dealt with complaints from constituents who have faced difficulties, not only with Atos, but with those within it who carry out the medical assessments. Have you any idea of what level of training is provided for them? Or, have you had any feedback on it? Mickey touched on it earlier. In 2007, it was one of the questions that we were pressing home. We said that there needed to be a high level of training to ensure that people were given fair representation with regard to their medical assessments.
2302. Mr Higgins: To be fair: a lot of the information we glean from advisers or from clients coming through the door is that, irrespective of what training there has been, the performance in the medical examination is perceived to be insufficient. I suppose that is the first thing. Beyond training, it might be the experience of some of the people who are conducting the medicals. You have to try to be fair. Can somebody with not a great deal of experience and who is quite new to the profession be expected to hit the ground running, when they might see someone for 30 minutes and have to make an accurate assessment? That client might have a combination of physical and mental health problems, or all mental health problems. Training is one thing, but we wonder whether commercialism is taking over. It is being delivered as cheaply as possible, and, perhaps, nurses are receiving bare-bone training. On the other hand, they are not providing the service that we think people need and deserve.
2303. Mr F McCann: What about the Department and those who have to assess the decisions by Atos.
2304. Ms McKinley: We have asked a few times. All that we have ever been told is that the medical support team in Atos gets two days of training. I do not know how that is presented to them relevant to the benefit. I have been to a medical as well. Take a person with mental health problems, for instance. Someone who sits behind a computer asks the individual whether they have ever self-harmed. If the individual answers no, they are asked whether they have ever thought of suicide. They are left in limbo. It does make you wonder whether those people were actually trained to cope if someone were to open up about a condition. Their training is more in line with what people do on a typical day than the criteria for benefit. It has never been married together in that way.
2305. Mr F McCann: I have a final question. The majority of the Bill is sanction-led. Further and serious increases of time sanctions have been proposed. Have you done anything on sanctions as they have worked up until now and how they will impact on people?
2306. Mr Higgins: I am not sure how effective sanctions are with regard to what they are supposed do. Are people even clear about what sanctions are supposed to do? Are they simply a penalty? What support is put in place to modify behaviour to ensure that it does not happen again? A sanction means less money coming into that household and less money going to the children, if there are children in that household. In some senses, it can be just punitive, and it can just penalise. I am not sure how effective those sanctions are, and

- I am not sure that there is very much research out there that highlights how effective they are in improving behaviour, if you like.
2307. There are many clauses in the Bill, and it covers lots of things. We covered sanctions, employability and childcare, and the fact that there are no jobs out there. We ended up coming back to the four things that will not threaten parity, the fact that changes can be made, and that it will improve things for people once it becomes law. Seemingly, this is our chance to change it, and you will know more about that than me. Officials will tell you that there is not too much detail and that all the detail will be in the regulations. However, when the regulations come before the Committee, it has to either accept or reject them. There are no confirmatory regulations; there is no scope to change.
2308. Now is the time to put a Northern Ireland fingerprint on the legislation and, hopefully, what it is now will not be the same as what it will be when it receives Royal Assent. That is our goal anyway.
2309. Mr F McCann: I have one final thing. It was interesting that the Minister said yesterday that part of the discussions that he had with Lord Freud involved the financial institutions and banking. Obviously, everybody would need to have a bank account. I have two questions. First, I take it that bank charges would apply if people open a bank account. Secondly, does it not seem unusual that you would have to go to a financial adviser to work out how you can spend your £200 a month?
2310. Mr Higgins: Operationally, we are still very unclear as to how all this will work, and the online aspect has to be added in as well. Let us say that something happens to me, and I want to make my claim for universal credit today. Under the current system, I would ring up. It might take a while to get the paper claim in or whatever, but the date of my claim would be today. There is a school of thought that you will have to master the online system and you may have to open a bank account — it is not even a bank account; it has to be an online accessible account that provides the security to allow you to proceed with the universal credit claim. That is the biggest thing. Our concern is that I would become entitled to benefit from today as I satisfy the conditions, let us say, from today, but I cannot press the green button on the universal credit online claim until, for example, four weeks down the line, and we understand that my claim to universal credit does not start until I press that button. What about the number of weeks, through no fault of my own, when I have to open the account, get online and maybe go the library because I do not have access in the house? We think that there is a big issue with the data claim and people actually lodging their universal credit claim.
2311. Ms McKinley: The other thing about online access to benefit is that, when people have their online account, they are going to have tasks set with their online account. We will be inundated because people will come in continually to find out the task for their benefit. If they do not complete the task, they do not get paid. It will be a big problem for us, and for the bigger community sector as well, to make sure that people have access to online services.
2312. Mr F McCann: I was also making another point about bank accounts. If someone opens a bank account, I take it that banking charges would apply for anything that they do in relation to whatever amount of money they get. It will dilute the amount of monthly money that people would have.
2313. Mr Higgins: I completely agree with that. There could also be charges, and we all know what has happened with charges. We do not know where bank accounts are going in the future. Will you have to pay for the privilege of having a bank account in the future? We do not know where that is all going.
2314. Mr F McCann: I thought that people already do pay.
2315. Mr Brady: I have a couple of points. Following on from what Fra said, there - is the whole thing that goes back to medical evidence. You may have somebody with bipolar, or one example that I mentioned during the clause-by-clause consideration was a condition called sarcoidosis where you could be disabled for three weeks out of the month. My question was about whether that would be aggregated. What about the training given to the person who would have to assess you? If you have bipolar, you could go in on a Monday and be great, but be in bed for three weeks after that. It is that kind of level.

2316. The other thing that you mentioned, Kevin, was the severe disability premium. That, surely, will have a bigger impact here in the North because of the larger numbers of people on DLA, particularly people living alone. The severe disability premium lifts them above that subsistence level, and people will really suffer if that is lost. We already pay higher costs for electricity, gas, all the utilities and food, because everything has to be transported. To some degree, the severe disability premium lifts people out of that, although not completely, obviously. I think that that will have a huge impact here as well.
2317. Kevin, you made the point that, if you do not have online access, you would go to the library. I imagine that an awful lot of people on benefit, whether they have online access or not, would not have the ability to use it, and that is a difficulty. That is why I go back to what I said earlier: you will be even more inundated than you are now.
2318. Mr Durkan: There is also the fact that the libraries have had their opening hours reduced.
2319. Mr Higgins: The severe disability premium is a huge issue. That is why, to take it back to the beginning, people with disabilities will feel the hurt with regard to the perceived savings that were to come out of the legislation. There is the 12-month time limit for ESA, and, if you have a partner working, that is, pound for pound, a drop and there is nothing that you can do about it. You - are right. I understand that the support group will get you the severe disability premium in future.
2320. Mr Brady: That is part of the issue. At the moment, you can be found to be capable and still be on DLA and get a severe disability premium. That will change, and that is one of the issues that has not been addressed.
2321. Mr Higgins: People will still have those health problems or whatever, and they will have not improved in any way. That should not be underestimated. The simple fact is that the goalposts have been moved. People will be confused and ask themselves what is going on because their condition has not changed and nobody is saying that it has changed, but they are left high and dry with nothing. That feeds us back into what is going to be done and who is going to help them.
2322. The Chairperson: OK members, thank you for your questions. Kevin, Sinead and Jenny, thank you for your presentation this morning, your submission earlier and your ongoing engagement with the Committee. It has been very helpful and informative. You have made your presentation, and you have underscored at least four key points and proposals. Obviously, we will consider them as we move further into the scrutiny of the Bill during Committee Stage. If you happy enough with the work so far, it leaves me to say thank you for being here.
2323. Mr Higgins: Thank you.

Mr Les Allamby Law Centre NI

2324. The Chairperson: We resume our scrutiny of the Welfare Reform Bill. We have a briefing by the Law Centre, and a number of representatives have come to advise the Committee. I welcome Les Allamby.
2325. Mr Les Allamby (Law Centre NI): Chair and Committee, thank you very much.
2326. The Chairperson: Are you on your own today?
2327. Mr Allamby: Yes I am.
2328. The Chairperson: You are well able, I might add. You are very welcome, Les. Members have before them an earlier submission from the Law Centre. I remind Members that the session is recorded by Hansard. In your submission, Les, I would like you to take on board, or reflect upon, some of the comments made by the Minister yesterday, if you are in a position to do so.
2329. Mr Allamby: Yes, Chair. I am happy to do that. Someone described me as “not a man of few words”. Clearly, that extends to writing, as well. My apologies for presenting this paper to you at a late stage. It is a very extensive submission, which really reflects the size of the Bill.
2330. To take up your invitation, the Law Centre welcomes the flexibilities that have been negotiated by the Minister. We support them. It is a recognition of what can be achieved when political parties, this Committee, Ministers, officials and stakeholders like the voluntary sector, all speak with the same voice, by and large, on issues.

2331. Now we need to look at some of the details. I think that the payments to landlords looks slightly more straightforward and clear to me on the initial reading of the Minister’s statement than how we are going to manage the payment fortnightly rather than monthly. I am not completely clear yet as to how big and significant a concession that is.
2332. What I mean by that is that I am still not quite clear as to which groups will be paid fortnightly, and which will be paid monthly. In Britain, the intention is to pay monthly, but there is a default mechanism to pay fortnightly. So it will be interesting to see what the difference is between Northern Ireland and Britain when the detail comes through. However, I do not want to put a wet blanket over the announcement yesterday; I think it was quite important. I think it is an achievement that should be banked by all the political parties because these are issues that pretty much everyone was at one on.
2333. On the payment of housing benefit to landlords, we have always taken the pragmatic view and I will give an example. My wife gets exasperated by me occasionally, when she finds me looking in estate agents’ windows, not to find a lovely new house for us, but to see how many properties are rented that say, “No DHSS”. I did that the other day, in Stranmillis on Sunday, when we went for a walk through the Botanic Gardens and up to Stranmillis. There, it said “19 properties in the private rented sector; no DHSS”. One had, “DHSS considered”, six had, “DHSS yes”.
2334. Putting aside the private rented sector’s landlords being rather out of touch with

- who administers social security, that gives an indication of, for example, the state of play in the private rented sector market and the housing benefit changes. I would not put that down as a scientific survey but it is the second or third time I have looked at that in the past three or four months and seen pretty much similar figures.
2335. Paying housing benefit to landlords is important because it probably at least encourages some to be open to renting to people on and off benefit. It is significant because the assumption is always made that there is one homogenous group who are on housing benefit, and, presumably, on housing credit, and another who is not. In fact, lots of people move between the two. You move in and out of work; you move in and out of housing benefit. So, “No DHSS” has all sorts of ramifications for people who were in work and are no longer in work.
2336. I welcome the concessions that have been made to the Bill and, in fairness to Lord Freud, he has genuinely engaged with politicians of all political hues and others, and that is to be welcomed.
2337. I will turn to our submission, which is a long one, reflecting the size and importance of the Bill. We had a difficulty in drafting a response because the Bill is an enabling Bill. It sets the framework but leaves very significant issues to the regulations: the rates of benefit; how the old work requirements will work; what will be the earnings disregards; the detailed rules on personal independence payment about what is a daily mobility activity and what is a daily living activity; and lots more besides. In addition, an awful lot of information will be produced in guidance and circulars that will not be in regulations. Looking at the approach in GB, there has been an attempt to move stuff that had been traditionally in regulations across to guidance. Therefore, we do not have a complete picture at the moment.
2338. The other reason we do not have a complete picture is that there are still significant issues to be decided in Britain, despite the Bill having been passed there for over six months. How will transitional protection work? How will self-employed people be treated? What are we going to do about passport benefits? What will be the arrangements for housing credit? For example, how long will the waiting period be? And a great deal more besides. So, a lot of key issues have still to be decided in Britain and some go right to the heart of the purpose of the Bill in terms of making work pay etc. You are, to some extent, working in a vacuum without all the detail to have the whole picture.
2339. I will give you a date that you may want to keep in your diaries in terms of looking out for things, because this is in the public domain. In partnership, the Department for Work and Pensions (DWP) and the Secretary of State in the summer asked the Social Security Advisory Committee to consult on the draft universal credit regulations, albeit that there were gaps in the regulations. The Committee did that and submitted its report in August. The Department has announced publicly that it will respond to the report on 5 December 2012, so we may get some information right in the middle of your deliberations about the Bill.
2340. I suspect that some of the things that they will announce that day may be quite important, so there is a sort of “watch this space”, as our Bill travels through its procedures, to see what is going on in tandem with Britain. I saw some of the information that you asked for. I know the answers to some of the things you asked for. In some cases, I do not know the answers and neither does the Department here, because DWP has not got the answers as yet.
2341. That is a fairly long preamble. I will take you through our submission and outline what we think are the key issues in the Bill. I will not go through everything. We have not drafted amendments yet, but the Law Centre is very open to doing so. If you say to us, here are some areas where you would welcome, entirely without prejudice, as the lawyers say,

- amendments to be drafted, we will do that. We felt that that was better than giving you a blizzard of amendments and leaving you to wade through vast amounts of paper in case there were some areas that were perhaps not what you wanted to look at in particular. If you give us an indication of what would be helpful — we understand that they may or may not become amendments that you can live with — we will do that. I hope that that is a helpful offer.
2342. I will try to do this with a page-by-page approach so that you can follow what we are saying. I am more than happy to take questions as we go along or at the end, on anything and everything.
2343. The Chairperson: Are members content to wait until we have had the whole presentation?
2344. Mr F McCann: My only question is about the advisory group. I remember that it may have looked at the issue of the single room allowance.
2345. Mr Allamby: I am sorry, Fra, what was that?
2346. Mr F McCann: The single room allowance. I am going back a while. Some of the material that I read indicated that the Government did not accept the advisory group's recommendations. I take it that you were asked to look at the Bill in its earliest stages. The group's recommendations had not been accepted, and I take it, from what you just said, that there are aspects of those recommendations, which had been unacceptable, that you will recommend again. It just seems strange that you keep getting asked. It is a very important group that includes quite a lot of good opinion-makers, but the Government asked for this information and continuously rejects it.
2347. Mr Allamby: In fairness, I would be taken aback if the Government accepted everything that the social security advisory committee had to say to them, because it is an advisory committee. At the same time, there are areas where they have been prepared to listen and have made changes in the past.
- However, it has always been selective and I guess that the committee itself would not expect anything other than that.
2348. Interestingly, this time, the draft regulations that were published in Britain — and they were draft, but they gave a sense of the direction of travel — on some areas there was a very considerable response from organisations, much of which is in the public domain. In some of the areas, it is clear that pretty compelling issues were raised, and in some cases the issues are coming from, if you like, not just the traditional stakeholders of the voluntary sector, but small employer organisations etc, who are raising some very important detail.
2349. My sense is that officials and Ministers may pick up on some of those areas. I would be absolutely flabbergasted if everything that the committee said, they followed. I have not yet met any organisation with which I have been involved that, just because you say something, they immediately agree with it.
2350. So, I think that in December, we will, perhaps, get some sense of some changes. This is a fast-evolving situation. Even in Britain, where they have the Bill, they are still working on issues at what is a very late stage, given the timetable there. One of the reasons why I welcome pushing back the universal credit timetable is that it gives us a chance to see how the pathfinders, which come into operation in Britain in April 2013, and the first wave of universal credit, will go. I suspect that we may learn some very important lessons and may even be able to avoid some pitfalls if we move from 2014.
2351. I will start with clauses 3 and 4, which are dealt with on page 3 of our submission. These deal with the rules on entitlement. It is quite clear in the Bill, and it is the position in Britain, that where one person in a couple is over pension age and the other person is under pension age, the couple is placed on universal credit and not on pension credit. That, it seems to me, has some ramifications for the all-work - requirements and the seeking-work commitment arrangements.

2352. As you know, women's pension age is going up and will be equalised. So, once universal credit is in, there are likely to be situations where an older member of a couple has a younger partner. You could quite conceivably have a woman aged 61 with a male partner aged 70, for example, who will be claiming universal credit and, as a couple, not pension credit. I am not clear whether a 70-year-old, for example, who may well have retired several years ago, is suddenly going to be plunged into the world of work requirements and seeking work. It does not seem to me to be the most sensible use of jobs and benefits office time, per se, but I am not clear on what is going to happen there. That is one of the things that you might want to seek some information on from the Department.
2353. You can have claimants who are wealthy 86-year-olds, with 27-year-old partners. I do not think we have many of those, but are you going to ask someone who happens to be 80, and who has a partner in their late 50s, to be looking for work?
2354. The Chairperson: I am not sure whether I should congratulate them or commiserate with them.
2355. Mr Allamby: All I can say is that you should choose a partner who is about the same age as yourself.
2356. Mr Brady: It is too late for some of us.
2357. The Chairperson: There is no romance there, Les.
2358. Mr Brady: I do not mean that prescriptively. I am talking about the age aspect.
2359. Mr Allamby: There is another issue that you might want to tease out. Clauses 3 and 4 set out regulations about when you can be absent from Northern Ireland and about when you can study and retain benefit. We are not clear yet on what those arrangements are going to be. It is probably important to see whether they are going to change from the current arrangements, because, within jobseeker's allowance (JSA), income support and employment and support allowance (ESA), we already have different arrangements for studying and retaining benefit. If you are on ESA, the rules are much more restrictive than they are if you are on JSA, but, presumably, we will have a single set of rules for universal credit. Are they going to be more restrictive, or are they going to be slightly more liberal? I think that it is probably worth asking that question of the Department now, if you have not already done so.
2360. I move now to absence from home in specific circumstances. The Department in Britain has signalled that it is going to have a two-tier system: you could be absent from home for up to one month in certain circumstances, and up to 26 weeks in other circumstances, and they will set those out in regulations. That includes payment for housing credit for up to 26 weeks when a person is in residential care or hospital. Those contrast with the current housing benefit rules, for example, which allow you an absence of 13 weeks in certain circumstances and up to 52 weeks in other circumstances. In other words, the new rules may be more generous in some cases, but less generous in others. They are going to be less generous in the situation of a person being in hospital or residential care on a temporary basis. I am not sure. I think that the 52-week rule was a fairly good rule in terms of giving people a chance to recover and find themselves in residential care. We might find ourselves with some hard cases. It is worth clarifying whether we are going to have the same rules here. I assume that we probably will.
2361. The one other thing in this clause relates to 16- and 17-year-olds. From the draft regulations in Britain, we know what the intention is, and I have set them out on page 4. In the current system, we have what I call a catch-all safety net. Sixteen and 17-year-olds, for example, coming out of care are no longer dealt with in the social security system; they are dealt with in a separate system through health and social trust payments. However, there is a catch-all net that allows for severe hardship money to be paid to 16- and 17-year-olds. It does not look to me as if that sort of overall safety net is going to be kept, where you have a discretion, so it would be worth asking the Department about that.

2362. Clause 5 introduces the new capital rules. I understand that they will be the same as the current rules for income support, JSA and ESA. That is what the Department has signalled. In other words, the overall savings are £16,000, with a tariff income. It is a bit like a taxi meter. Savings of between £6,000 and £16,000 are assumed to generate an income. That will be quite a significant change for some claimants. Tax credits and pension credit have no upper capital limit. It is more likely to affect older workers. Let us say you are 55 and low-paid and you have done what the Government have said you should do, which is save money assiduously, and you have saved £20,000 for your old age. If you make a claim for universal credit, you will not get it, because you will be above the limit, whereas, when you were on tax credits, you would have got it. I am not clear if transitional protection will protect those who are already on tax credits. That is a question we need to ask.

2363. Let us say you are on pension credit, for example, at the moment. Again, you could have a fairly low income but you could have saved money and reached pension credit age of what is now pensionable age. Under the new arrangements, where universal credit will be paid later and later if one partner is under pensionable age, you have got a capital rule. Let me tell you why I think that is significant. If you remember, the Joseph Rowntree Foundation issued its annual monitoring poverty and social exclusion document in May. One of the differences between Northern Ireland and Britain was that pensioner poverty was going down in Britain and rising in Northern Ireland. One of the explanations for that is that it appears that we have not got the same level of occupational pension provision that many people in Britain have, and that will be with us for some time. Therefore, when we get to pensionable age, we do not have the cushion that proportionately more people seem to have in Britain. If you take away an issue of capital rule for people above 60 or pensionable age that is not there now, it may have a further chilling impact on pensioner poverty. That is another area that needs some scrutiny.

2364. I will spare you the detail of clause 6, which probably means that members of religious orders will not get universal credit. They do not get benefits at the moment.

2365. Clauses 8 to 10 set out the rates of universal credit. We do not know what they are yet. The only intention that has been signalled is that they do not expect them to be less than what is currently paid, in general terms, but there are a couple of significant differences. One is that the new standard allowance rate of universal credit is going to be simplified for people under 25. I will spare you the details at the moment, but it looks pretty clear to me that the benefit of some people who are currently under 25 will be lower under universal credit. You probably need to ask the Department for the details and the numbers of people who will be adversely affected. If what they have said they are going to do in Britain is replicated here, a number of young people will be worse off. It will simplify the system, and there may well be transitional protection, which I will come to in due course, but it looks as if groups of people will be worse off. I think that you need to ask about that.

2366. The next area that I have included is how the self-employed will be treated. One of the new features of universal credit is what is called a deemed minimum income. At present, if you are self-employed and making no net profit, you are deemed to have no income if you are, perhaps, part-time and self-employed. When you start to make an income, it affects your benefit. Under the new arrangements for universal credit, there will be an assumption that you are making a minimum income. Regardless of whether you do or whether your self-employment is ebbing or flowing, the assumption is that you are making a minimum income. The Government have not said what it will be. At one stage, they were talking about the possibility of it being the national minimum wage, but they seem to have resiled from that, and I think they are probably looking at something smaller than that.

2367. They have indicated that you will be given a period before the minimum income is brought into effect. So there is a recognition that, if you start a self-employed business, you do not make money from week one. My best guess, from what I understand is going on, is that it is probably going to be a period of about a year, but I do not think that that has been officially confirmed. They have said that you will be allowed one start-up every five years. Woe betide you if you start a self-employed business and it does not work and you come back with another idea in 18 months' time. It feels a bit like 'Dragon's Den', with DWP sitting round the table and no doubt Lord Freud, Iain Duncan Smith et al saying, "No. If you tried once, you are not going to get another chance to be self-employed, unless the minimum income kicks in straight away." That seems pretty harsh, because the whole purpose of this is to encourage people into work, and one way of getting people back to work is through self-employment.
2368. The other problem with a minimum income scenario is that, if you run a small business or are a single person, or if you are part of a family and you are self-employed, what happens when you fall ill and, suddenly, your income drops? You have still got the same minimum income. What happens if you go on maternity leave? Do you still have the same minimum income? We do not yet know what the arrangements are going to be. The Department has signalled, for example, that it is going to manage the reporting on a monthly basis. Well, heaven help people who are self-employed if, every month, they have to report their income. Most people do not keep their accounts on a monthly basis; lots of people keep them quarterly, some six-monthly, and so on. That will require a level of discipline that does not reflect how self-employed organisations work in reality. It will also involve ebbs and flows on a month-to-month basis. It strikes me that it is going to create all sorts of issues around managing people's universal credit. There is a lot of work to be done around self-employment. If you look at the number of people who are in self-employment in Northern Ireland and the number who lose jobs and move into self-employment — the world of taxi-driving et al — it seems as if universal credit will, paradoxically, achieve the opposite of what was intended.

2369. Finally, you probably saw Tanni Grey-Thompson's report, which was backed by Disability Rights UK, Citizens Advice and the Children's Society. It outlined three areas where it sees people with disabilities being significantly worse off as a result of the change to universal credit. I do not need to go into the detail; it is in the paper. I know that the Department, to some extent, attempted to traduce the paper by saying that it was an exaggeration. There will be transitional protection for some of the groups that are mentioned here. The problem with transitional protection is that it will be eroded inexorably over time. So unlike, for example, public sector workers, who are having to face the austerity measures of pay freezes and so on, there is an assumption that eventually you will be paid more than you are currently being paid. Transitional protection does not work in that way. Slowly but surely, your income will drop until you are down to the level that new claimants of universal credit are at. What the Department did not say when it criticised the report was what will happen to new claimants of universal credit. What about young people with disabilities who cannot find work and who move into universal credit for the first time? They are not going to find any transitional protection; they are going to be worse off straight away. There is a need to look at that and at the numbers of people who will be affected.

2370. Clause 11 is about housing costs, or housing credit, as it will be called. There is one important thing that I do not think people have picked up on. If you read the DWP explanatory memorandum for universal credit regulations, you can see that it makes clear that there is going to be a new “zero earnings rule” in universal credit for owner-occupiers. That means that, if you move into any form of work, you will lose help with mortgage interest. Let us say, hypothetically, that you are a lone parent who is getting help with the mortgage interest and you decide to do what the Government say you should do under universal credit, which is take a mini-job to see whether you can get into the world of work while still being able to pick up the children from school, etc. If you do, say, seven hours a week — under the zero earnings rule, you could do two hours a week — you will immediately lose all your help with mortgage interest. It seems to me that that is likely to have a chilling impact on the work incentive. You will have more generous earnings disregards, etc, but it strikes me as being a very tough rule indeed that says that, if you start any form of work, you will lose your help with your mortgage interest. Again, I think that you may want to press the Department on the rationale behind that rule.
2371. The other thing we do not know is the waiting period for housing costs. Currently, it is 13 weeks if you go onto income support, JSA or ESA, and that has been the case since January 2009. Before January 2009, you used to have to wait 26 weeks or, in most cases, 39 weeks before you got any help with your mortgage. They have not yet announced which of those they will do for universal credit. Clearly, that is quite an important issue.
2372. There is another thing to be aware of, and the Committee has probably picked up on this. At the moment, as you know, more and more lone parents are moving to JSA as their youngest child turns seven; eventually, it will be when they turn five. If you are on income-related JSA for two years, you lose help with your mortgage interest. So, you have to find work in two years. If you do not, you lose help as an owner-occupier. If you happen to have only two years left to pay your mortgage and you are 61, it appears to be a case of, “Tough.” However, in the new arrangements, we understand that that will be transferred to universal credit, but it will now encompass a lot more people. It will no longer just be people who were on income-related JSA; it will also be people who are on income-related ESA, probably in the work-related activity group, and people who are on income support. It might pick up people who are on tax credits, etc. You may well find that a larger number of people will lose help with their mortgage interest. We need to know from the Department what other help will be available to people who lose their accommodation. That is the end of chapter 1. I will pause for breath for a second and then move onto chapter 2.

2373. Clause 14 deals with the claimant commitment. You have asked for a lot of information on that, and you might ask the Department about one other issue. I understand from DWP that both partners must sign the claimant commitment. If both partners do not sign it, you do not get benefit. There are ramifications of that. One of the advantages of doing advice work for a number of years is that I have regularly found people who, occasionally justifiably and occasionally unjustifiably, are at loggerheads with the Department and will say, “I am not signing a claimant commitment or the jobseeker’s agreement.” In the current situation, if one partner decides that, to somehow get at the other partner, they will not sign the commitment, neither partner gets any benefit and neither do the kids. If one partner has mental health problems and refuses to sign, the rest of the household does not get benefit. In our view, there ought to be prescribed conditions that say that, if one partner signs the claimant commitment and is clearly committed to finding work and another does not for whatever reason, pay the single person rate, pay it to the person who has signed the claimant commitment and pay the amount for children. I think we could live with that. By all means, do not pay the couple rate if one member will not sign. However, the idea of saying that, unless you get your husband or wife or male or female partner to sign, you will not get any benefit at all seems to me to punish people and almost says to households, "Split up from your partner if you want to get any benefit". I am not sure that that is the most productive way forward. You might want to ask again about the claimant commitment. Let us have some sensible regulations that do not punish people who are not the cause of their own demise.

2374. Clauses 15 to 24 are the work-related requirements, and, again, you have asked for quite a lot of information about that. As you know, there are four categories you can be in. There are actually five, I suppose. The first one is that you have no requirements at all as you have just given birth and do not have to look for work — not for very long — or you are about to give birth. Then you have work-focused interviews, which are a relatively light-touch approach, and then the slightly more onerous work preparation, work search and work availability. The Department in Britain has signalled that, if you are in what is called the "all work requirements", at the moment, it is likely to be suggested that you have to show that you are spending 35 hours a week looking for work. If you are a carer or need childcare, it may be reduced. However, if you do not fall under any exemptions, you are expected to spend 35 hours a week looking for work. I will be candid with you: if I became unemployed tomorrow, I could probably spend 35 hours in the first couple of weeks looking for work. I could, no doubt, work on my CV, go to the jobs and benefits office and the library and do any number of things to prepare myself for work. I could write out to employers, etc. If, after six weeks, I have done all that and got all that out there, could I put my hand on my heart and say that I could spend 35 hours a week looking for work? Not unless I was knocking on doors and saying, "Have you got a job?", or "Gissa job", as in the 1980s Alan Bleasdale plays. I do not know how you could spend 35 hours a week, 52 weeks a year physically looking for work. It almost sets up an impossible task. How the Department is going to enforce that and how it is going to say that there are things that you should be doing 35 hours a week, every week of every year, is a bit beyond me. However, that is what the intention is in Britain. I do not have a difficulty in saying that there is a very good training project and that you can spend 35 hours a week on training if it helps you to get work, etc, but, if you are not in that category, I do not quite know how you tell people that they have to spend 35 hours a week looking for work. It is clearly very onerous if you are in the all work requirements category. We need to know a bit more about what the operational arrangements are and how they will work.

2375. The other thing that I strongly urge you to look at is at the top of page 11 of my presentation. It is one of the nastier bits of the Bill, in that, to be quite candid, this Bill does not seem to like foreigners. I think that the Bill is bordering on the xenophobic. Look at paragraph 7 of schedule 1; it allows for regulations to provide that claimants from the EU with a right to reside who fall under the no work-related requirements, work-focused interview requirement only, etc, will be placed instead in the all work requirements category. Hypothetically, say that you are a Polish woman who has been here now for seven or eight years. You have worked for five or six years and you have had children here. Let us say that your young child has a disability. You will be expected to spend 35 hours a week looking for work. You will not be placed in any of the other requirement categories. If you have just given birth, it looks as if you will be expected to look for work 35 hours a week when you are barely out of hospital. If, on the other hand, your next-door neighbour is in exactly the same circumstances and happens to be Irish or British, they will not be treated in the same way. Can someone tell me how that can possibly be lawful? Under the European Convention on Human Rights, a case called Stec states that both contributory and non-contributory benefits fall under the right to property. Article 14 of the convention states that you have a right to be free from discrimination. Treating EU migrant workers differently from indigenous local workers when it comes to looking for work is clearly discriminatory. There may be an objective justification for saying that a Polish woman who has just given birth has to look for work 35 hours a week but that somebody next door who is British or Irish does not. I cannot see an objective justification, and I urge you to talk to the lawyers and, perhaps, even the Attorney General's office to see whether they think that is lawful, because I do not think it will survive a legal challenge. In our view, it should not be enacted in this Bill. I do not think that it is being driven by officials. I think that it is being driven by politicians who have an antipathy to the EU. That is one area where I think there is scope for us to recognise that there needs to be a different approach.

2376. The other thing that is new is in clause 22, and that is that all work requirements can be imposed on claimants in work who earn below a specific threshold. If you are on tax credits at the moment and you work 16 hours a week, there is no requirement to say that, as you are only working part-time, it is about time you found full-time work. Under universal credit, if you are working 16 or 17 hours a week and your earnings are below a certain threshold, the notion is that you will be expected to still look for work on top of the part-time work you are doing, even if you have a sensible rationale for working part-time. In fairness, the Department in Britain has said that it wants to trial that before implementing it to see how it might work. So, it is not coming down the track immediately. However, there are clear ramifications that DEL and the jobs and benefits offices are going to be biting off probably more than they can chew in getting people into work at all, and we appear to be saying that we are going to try to get them into full-time work rather than part-time work. We should probably start by trying to encourage people to get into work. My experience of most people who work part-time is that, if full-time work were out there, they would probably happily take it. They usually work part-time because that is the reality of the market that they are in, or that is the reality of the circumstances that they are in. So how much is to be gained from that? The sanctions regime will apply to people who are part-time working but who do not apply for full-time work. That does not strike me as a sensible use of resources. The reality for DEL and the jobs and benefits offices is that they are going to have to concentrate their resources where they can make most impact. If you keep bringing in things like this, all you will do is spread the resources more thinly. You will not concentrate them where you can get the most effective outcomes, and I think it is counterproductive. It is one of the areas that you might want to explore with colleagues behind me. I do not even want to look at Michael Pollock's face as he hears this list getting ever longer.

2377. The other thing is sanctions. You will not be surprised to learn that the Law Centre is not a big fan of sanctions. The level of sanctions and what the new arrangements will be are set out in a table on page 13 of our presentation. As you can see, it is a bit like a Bruce Forsyth game show: higher and lower. In this case, it is high, medium, low and lowest level. The high level is almost "Three strikes and you are out": it is three years off benefit if you offend for a third time within a certain period.
2378. There are a number of issues around sanctions. The first is whether they are proportionate, given the impact on the rest of the household including children. If, for whatever reason, I happen to fail to do something, should the rest of the household be punished for up to three years? We think that that is too long. If we are going to live with sanctions, we do not see why we have to increase them to quite that significant level.

2379. Secondly, the regulations in Britain only allow five working days for a claimant to establish "good reason" before a sanction is applied. If we are going to increase the level of sanctions, it seems to me that it would be fair and proportionate to increase the time you have to explain why you have failed to do something. I will give you an example. Say that you did not sign on on Thursday because you had a family emergency; you were rushed to hospital or something happened to your partner or child. Let us say that that crisis lasted for the next 10 days or whatever. Then, you finally go and say, "I am really sorry that I did not sign on last Thursday. It was because my partner was involved in a car accident and ended up in hospital." Under those arrangements, you did not get back within five working days. To me, five working days seems to be a very tough time period within which to do something. You will not find five working days being imposed on the Department to do things anywhere in the social security system, yet we seem to be quite comfortable with imposing it upon claimants. I think that it should be increased to 15 working days. That allows people a bit of time to explain whatever it is that they have done and avoid the sanction. That is a recognition that, if we are going to increase the level of sanctions, we should increase the time period for people to do that. That will be in regulations, and we are keen to see that introduced.

2380. The second issue is in two clauses that I will come on to. DWP has already increased the sanction arrangements for people on JSA and ESA in advance to broadly align with universal credit. The line seems to be that we want to get into the swing of sanctions so that we align all this together. However, we are not aligning the apparent advantages of universal credit, so it feels like we are introducing the sticks in advance, but not the carrots. With the best will in the world, if we are going to have sticks and carrots, we should introduce them at the same time. We do not have the work programme here; we will not have an equivalent until October 2013. We do not think that you should introduce sanctions or up the sanctions regime in ESA and JSA in advance. I do not think that is fair or appropriate. If we have not got the work programme and all the other advantages of better earnings disregards, etc, that should not be introduced.

2381. Clause 28 also introduces hardship payments in advance. Hardship payments are already a feature of the scheme. The difference between hardship payments under universal credit that may come in advance and the current ones is that you are going to give loans under the new system, not grants. Currently, if you reduce somebody's benefit in certain circumstances and they are in hardship and there is a sanction, it is not repayable. Under the new regime, it will be repayable. Again, that affects all members of the household, not just the person who is sanctioned. We have never been very keen on kicking somebody when they are down. This appears to me to be a bit like kicking someone when they are down. Again, we do not think that hardship payments under the new regime should be introduced in advance. We do not see why they should be loans. If you are going to reduce benefit by 40%, that is a pretty significant drop in income. You then force the person, when they come out of the sanction period, which will be a much longer period, to pay the money back. You will have families going into serious crises, and somewhere else in the system will have to pick that up, whether it is the social fund or social services. All you will do is spend money elsewhere to shore up somebody who is in crisis, so it will not save very much money and it does not make sense.

2382. We are now on chapter 3. I am not sure that the Welfare Reform Bill would make it into 'Book at Bedtime'. Clause 31

- relates to regulation-making powers. I mentioned paragraph 7 of schedule 1, which refers to how people from EU countries will be treated. I suspect that one of your questions will be whether that includes people coming from the South to the North. I think the answer is probably no, because I suspect the arrangements will protect those in the common travel area. So, it will probably be people outside these islands. I have not seen that for definite but, looking at other arrangements, that is my best guess. However, it will not protect Portuguese, German, Polish, Latvian, etc.
2383. Clause 42 relates to pilot schemes. You may wish to ask what, if any, pilot schemes we are thinking of introducing here. I am not aware of any, and that clause may be there just in case, but you might want to ask.
2384. Clause 47 relates to sanctions arrangements. That is the clause that introduces sanctions in advance for JSA. We do not see the need for an in advance introduction.
2385. Clause 52 deals with the ESA restriction of entitlement. That is one of the big-ticket items. If you are on contributory ESA for 12 months and you are in the work-related activity group, you will lose benefit. The particularly significant issue for us here is that you will lose benefit straight away if you have already been on ESA for 12 months. So, the day this is introduced, a large number of people will drop out of the system.
2386. I have not seen figures for Northern Ireland, and we probably should ask for them. However, I remember that, in the equality impact assessment in Britain, 48% of the people who will fall out of the benefit system altogether as a result of this are aged 50 or over. That is because older workers are more likely to have partners who are also in work and therefore they will not be able to go onto means-tested benefits, or older workers are more likely to have savings ready for retirement of above £16,000 and therefore will not be on means-tested benefits until they erode the savings that were supposed to be for old age.
2387. It strikes me that this one comes at a cost, and it is in the explanatory memorandum: £12 million in year 1, £52 million in year 2 and £56 million in year 3. I understand that doing something different has a pretty significant price tag attached to it. I am not sure about those figures and whether they take into account how much it would cost if you took into account the proportion of people who go onto income-related ESA or income-related JSA, which may reduce the figures. You may want to interrogate that a bit further. It is possible, I guess, that you could look at amendments that say that this should not apply to claimants over a certain age. Alternatively, you could look at having a clause that says that the clock should start ticking from the date that this comes in, so at least you would give people 12 months' notice rather than saying that claimants who have been on ESA for two years would come off it the next day. That might be more equitable.
2389. I have already spoken about clauses 57 and 58, which allow the new sanctions regime for ESA to come into effect in advance.
2390. Clauses 61, 62 and 63 create the new requirements for claimants to have an entitlement to work for contributory benefits, including maternity allowance and statutory maternity, paternity and adoption pay. This is really aimed at people who are subject to immigration control. Again, the current rules say that means-tested benefits are public funds. Therefore, if you are subject to immigration control, you cannot get means-tested benefits. However, if you are here, for example, under a work visa or other arrangement and have paid your national insurance contributions, having worked legally, and are then in a dispute with the UK Border Agency (UKBA) about whether you are entitled to remain, you will not be able to access contributory benefits. If you have worked here lawfully and paid your national insurance contributions, why on earth should you not be entitled to claim those contributory benefits? This will not affect very many people, but it seems to be another of these issues in the Bill that demonstrates an obsession with people from abroad getting benefit. If someone has a partner who has worked and paid national insurance contributions, they will not be entitled to maternity benefits on the basis of his or her contributions. I cannot, for the life of me, see what this is about other than an antipathy towards people from abroad. That should not be the basis on which you legislate. Sorry, that is my rant over with on that one.

2391. One of the key clauses, clause 69, concerns housing benefit and has two elements. The first is the issue of how the levels of local housing allowance will be calculated. They will go up on the basis of the lower rate of the consumer price index (CPI) or what has happened to the 30th percentile in the private rented sector, whichever is the lower. Currently, it is based only on the 30th percentile. In April, a regulation came in to pave the way for this. In the past 15 years, average inflation on the basis of the CPI has been around 2%, and the average rent increase in the bottom 30% has been around 4%. At present, claimants are expected to look for accommodation in the bottom 30% of the market. Almost certainly, that will be inexorably eroded to become the bottom 28%, 26%, 25%, and, eventually people will be trying to find accommodation in a very small part of the private rented sector if they want to have any chance of their full rent being met. That is before all the housing benefit cuts that have already been introduced come into play. It seems to me that it is being made more and more difficult for claimants on benefit to get into the private rented sector. We will make it very difficult for people who are already in the private rented sector, have paid rent while in work, et cetera, and then fallen out of work to stay in their accommodation. It is tough enough when you lose your job. How losing your job and accommodation at the same time would help you to get back into work is beyond me. It seems to me, therefore, potentially counterproductive.

2392. The second part of clause 69 is our dear friend, the size-related element of housing credit for people of working age who live in public sector housing, or the “bedroom tax” as everybody else likes to call it. As you know, that will lead to reductions. Someone who “over-occupies” one bedroom will lose 14% of their maximum eligible housing benefit; for two bedrooms, the loss will be 25%. The draft regulations in Britain suggest very few exceptions to the rule. If someone is in what is called “supported accommodation” — the kind of accommodation that is registered, et cetera — that will not apply. Beyond that, there are very few exemptions. A foster carer, for example, who has a spare bedroom between placements, will be expected to have their housing benefit cut. Although there is no doubt that people could ask for discretionary housing payments, et cetera, why we should make life more difficult for foster carers who do the state a very considerable favour is beyond me.
2393. If, on the other hand, the rules are equivalent to those for the private sector, again, I think that there are issues of lawfulness. The bedroom tax, if you like, has existed in the private rented sector for some time. Recently, the rules were challenged on the basis that exceptions did not include people who needed a spare bedroom for full-time carers or people who had two children under 10 years of age, both with disabilities, where it was impractical for them to share a bedroom. One child with a disability was keeping the other child up every night, so separate bedrooms were needed because of the care required by each child. The courts found that both cases were unlawful under the European Convention on Human Rights and the Human Rights Act 1998. The DWP then accepted that needing a full-time carer and an extra bedroom would become an exemption. The second challenge was because two children under 10 years of age — the particular case involved a 10-year-old and an eight-year-old — were being told to share the same bedroom even though both had disabilities. That, however, was not an exemption — do not ask me why — which gives you an example of how narrowly the exemptions are being crafted.

2394. Presumably, families in that situation are expected to ask the Housing Executive for discretionary housing payments. The Housing Executive and local authorities are being told by DWP in Britain that those exemptions and discretionary housing payments should not be paid in perpetuity, but for a period to allow claimants to do something different. Well, unless a claimant's child recovers from the disability, I am not quite sure when and on what basis that claimant will suddenly be able to get out of that situation. You are aware of many of the other concerns that the Law Centre has about this, such as how exactly the Housing Executive will be able to implement it in practice. It is another provision that comes with a rather bloodcurdling price tag with regard to the expected savings: £15 million in year one and much more thereafter. However, I am not sure whether £15 million would be saved after the discretionary housing payments have been paid or before, so I want to ask about that.
2395. I do not think that this provision should be implemented until the Housing Executive and housing associations have a credible plan for how to deal with it. It is one thing to tell people, "We will give you an alternative, and here are proposals that allow you to avoid a cut in housing benefit." However, if an alternative cannot be offered, it seems unreasonable to start reducing people's housing benefit. If there is no offer of an alternative in the public rented sector, that is, effectively, telling people to move into the private rented sector. First, if you move into the private rented sector, it will probably not be cheaper; secondly, given all the new rules in the private rented sector, you will not get all of your housing benefit anyway; and, thirdly, you will find it very difficult to find accommodation in the private rented sector because, of course, you are looking in the bottom 30%, or 25%, or whatever it happens to be when the CPI new rules kick in.

2396. So we need to find creative ways to deal with the issue. Having been involved in discussions with Lord Freud, I know that he understands that we also have issues with single identity estates. Our housing stock is such that we do not have the deftness to say to people from the New Lodge that there is accommodation in Tiger's Bay that is more suitable to their needs, or vice versa, and so they can just move across the road. The current reality, for perfectly understandable reasons, is that, in certain estates, it would be very difficult to make that a credible option. That is not going over the top about where we are; it is the reality of life in Northern Ireland, and you all know that as well as I do.
2397. There are a number of things that we could do to make this better: we could decide to apply it only to people over a certain age; or we could make sure that the regulations include far more exemptions than in Britain. There are discussions to be had about what the clauses or amendments might look like. I recognise that simply saying that we should not implement it carries with it a very considerable price tag. I realise that this is a very challenging issue for political parties in the Assembly.
2398. We are galloping on. There is an issue about discretionary payments, and I know that you are looking closely at what the new son or daughter of the social fund will look like. It is pretty clear to me that, unless I am missing a trick, the existing social fund will remain after April 2013. For the life of me, I cannot see how a new scheme can be put in place, with all the consultation complete and the implementation and IT issues resolved, by April 2013. It is important that we get a timetable and a sense of when that will be in place.

2399. The personal independence payment (PIP) is another difficult one. In our submission, we flagged up some of the changes from disability living allowance (DLA) to PIP that are not clear. To qualify for DLA, a person must have had a particular form of ill health or disability for three months previous to an application for benefit and be likely to have it for six months afterwards. To qualify for PIP, the periods will be three months before and nine months afterwards, which is a slightly adverse increase.
2400. Under DLA, when a claimant's condition has deteriorated and the claimant makes a new claim within 12 months of a previous one, he or she does not have to serve the three-month waiting period. People who have fluctuating conditions that worsen again within 12 months do not have to undergo another three-month wait. Under DLA, that was allowed if a condition worsened within two years. So the period in which the fluctuating condition can come back has been halved. Rheumatoid arthritis is a very good example: some people can go into remission but it then comes back very severely. Under PIP, if the condition happens to come back 18 months after the claimant was in remission, he or she must serve another three-month waiting period. I cannot see any rationale for that other than saving money.
2401. A new residence and presence test is being introduced. The old one was held to be unlawful by the European Court of Justice. The detail is not in the Bill, but we understand from the Department that, under the new test, claimants will have to have been in the UK for two of the past three years. Again, that is clearly aimed at telling migrant workers that it will be harder for them to pass that test. A migrant worker might have been here for 18 months when they suffered an accident at work, and they would have been likely to qualify for DLA. Why should they have to have been here for at least two of the past three years? The test is primarily aimed at people from abroad, and, interestingly, another example of a particular obsession on the part of Ministers.

2402. The provision on PIP and prisoners is an improvement. I will give you the rationale for that. PIP will be paid for 28 days to prisoners or people held on remand who are already on PIP. Currently, DLA stops on the day of imprisonment or being placed on remand. The reason for giving PIP for up to 28 days is that there are loads of overpayments of DLA to people who move into prison for short periods. Given the time taken to recover that money, it is more sensible to pay PIP for 28 days before recovering any overpayment, because many of the overpayments to people who go in to prison are small. Currently, under DLA, if someone is held on remand but then not sentenced to imprisonment because the charges are dropped, the conviction quashed, or it is clear that they should not have been held on remand at all and that the authorities had the wrong person, benefit is paid back when the individual comes off remand, which can be a very long period. However, under PIP, the person's benefit will not be paid back. So if there is a miscarriage of justice and the individual happens to be disabled, that is just tough. I guess the rationale is that they will get all the support that they need for their disability when in prison. Well, unless prison conditions have changed since the last time I visited any HMPS establishment, I have my doubts. However, on principle, if you wrongly lock up somebody who has a disability and is entitled to benefit, and you then release them and recognise your error, frankly, it seems to me that you ought to restore the benefit. The rules, however, say otherwise.
2403. Finally, the rules on temporary absence from the UK will be made tougher. They will allow entitlement to PIP for only four weeks, or up to 26 weeks if a claimant goes abroad for treatment. Under DLA, temporary absences of up to 26 weeks do not normally affect entitlement. I have heard that the Government might ameliorate that by making it eight rather than four weeks. Again, to my mind, that is one of those areas where, when you compare the amount of money saved with the difficulties created, it is probably not worth it.

2404. In Part 5, clause 95 deals with the benefit cap. You know our views on the benefit cap — they are on the record. We now know how much it is intended to save in years 1 and 2. I would be fascinated to know what those figures are based on and how many people DWP think will be affected. Last week, DWP issued figures on whom it thinks will be affected by the benefit cap in England, Scotland and Wales. It would be very helpful if the Department here issued something similar so that we could get a feel for who will be affected. In other words, we want to know how many children the Department thinks that people will have, what proportion of parents will be lone parents and what the proportion will be in England, Scotland and Wales. We need more figures.
2405. My view is that we should consider amending the clause on the benefit cap. It should state that, if you are receiving carer's allowance and looking after somebody full time; are on a widow's or bereavement benefit; or have worked long enough to pay contributory-based ESA, those benefits should exempt you from the cap. That would at least ameliorate the impact, although I would prefer no benefit cap. I think that we should extend the current exemptions from just DLA, attendance allowance, war widow's and widower's pensions, the support component of ESA and industrial injuries benefits to those other benefits. The Law Centre urges such an amendment.
2406. There are issues with the recovery of overpayments. Under the current rules, the Department can recover an overpayment if someone misrepresents their circumstances, accidentally or otherwise, or fails to disclose something. If a person does something wrong that causes an overpayment, the Department can recover it. Under the new rules, it does not matter how the overpayment arises; the Department will recover it. So even if the overpayment is the Department's fault, and the person affected has not contributed to that, it will still be able to recover the money. In fairness, that is what HMRC can do with tax credits at present, although it has a code of practice on when it will and will not recover. The Department is talking about having some guidance on this. However, I think that, before the legislation is enacted, we need to see under exactly which circumstances the Department will and will not recover overpayments. As the Bill stands, the Department will have carte blanche to recover overpayments, even when the overpayment is clearly its fault and the claimant has not contributed to that in any way. It is worth noting that the clauses also give very considerable additional powers to recover the money by going to employers without, as happens at present, going through the court. In addition, if an employer does not co-operate and comply with the court order, they will face a criminal sanction. I do not know whether small employers realise that this is coming down the track, but I do not suppose that they will be overly keen when they hear about it. Interestingly, there will also be an administrative charge. So if you get an overpayment that has to be recovered, you will also pay for your employer to take it out your wages. The sum being proposed in the regulations is not that significant, but it is there. All of these provisions are quite new, and this is probably not one that people have majored in.

2407. Penalties for benefit fraud will increase considerably. The Law Centre does not condone fraud. We recognise that there are criminal sanctions for fraud and that that is appropriate. This provision, however, disproportionately ramps up the penalties. If, for example, something is not disclosed and it turns out that

- there is no overpayment — nothing has been gained from the non-disclosure — the proposal is to introduce a new penalty. It will state that a minimum amount of £350 can be paid to avoid prosecution. The period for which the person will also be off benefit, which is up to four weeks, means that they could find themselves, despite not having taken any money off the state in benefit, facing a £350 penalty plus four weeks off benefit. The cooling-off period is being reduced from 28 days to 14 days. As set out in my submission, there will be increased rules for sanctions if more than one offence is committed within a certain period, etc. A new civil penalty for incorrect statements and failure to disclose information will be introduced — that £50 penalty was introduced in Britain on 1 October. Interestingly, although HMRC has these powers, it very rarely uses them. When we look at DWP's anticipated income from civil penalties, it appears that it intends use them to a far greater extent than HMRC. You might want to ask the Department for Social Development (DSD) about how often it intends to use civil penalties and how much it thinks that it will raise from them. If you believe DWP, civil penalties will be handed out with about the same alacrity as parking tickets on market day in any town near you.
2408. We have a concern about clause 130, but not about the clause itself. I am still unclear on something, and perhaps the Committee is as well, so I would welcome clarification. In Britain, as part of the localism agenda, council tax benefit has been moved from central government. Local authorities have been told that they can implement their own council tax benefit scheme. However, to do that, they have 10% less to spend than central government had. In other words, local authorities have to do it more cheaply. The argument is that, somehow, money can be saved through local implementation. I am not clear whether our rate rebate scheme will have to be 10% less generous. I have heard various answers to my questions. I am not sure whether we will reduce our rate rebate scheme or how we will deal with the apparent issue of where that 10% saving will be made. As I understand it, if such a saving were to be made here, it could be as much as £10 million, so we need to know what is happening with the rate rebate scheme.
2409. I am sorry that that was such a lengthy narration — I am a man of not few words. I am more than happy to answer any questions.
2410. The Chairperson: Les, thank you. That was very helpful and explanatory on a whole range of issues. It added to your previous presentations to us. All have been very helpful in shaping the minds of members.
2411. Mr Brady: Thanks, Les. That was extremely comprehensive, and you covered most of the issues that I wanted to ask about. There is just the matter of financial conditions. As you said, currently, the pension credit cap is open-ended. Obviously, there is then a sliding scale when £1 is lost for every £250 or £500. Those who qualify for only a very small amount can get a passported benefit, but that will be affected by the introduction of universal credit, which will rule out fairly large numbers of older people.
2412. The waiting period for universal credit needs to be clarified. They may opt for 39 weeks' help with a mortgage, but my experience of that was that it affected a lot of people very adversely. In many cases, it led to people having to give up their houses or to repossession.
2413. In the claimant commitment, is one partner signing the equivalent of a split payment?
2414. Mr Allamby: Yes.
2415. Mr Brady: If accepted, that could be factored in. Someone may have mental health problems. Years ago, I had a case of a man who was a paranoid schizophrenic. He spent all day in bed and all night up in the attic tramping about and keeping everybody else awake, refusing to have anything to do with anybody, so his wife had to find out what benefits they might be entitled to.

- In a sense, she was totally isolated from him. Those cases do happen, and they are probably more commonplace than most people think.
2416. The other issue, which you also covered, is the requirement to look for work for 35 hours a week, which is completely ridiculous. People will be fired up about that, particularly at the moment. Statistics from the Department show that there are 5·8 applicants for every available job. There was an item on the radio last week about Kilkeel, where 446 people are signing on, but only nine jobs are available. I am sure that the remaining 437 will not necessarily want to spend 35 hours looking for jobs that are simply not available.
2417. The xenophobia that you highlighted is just the Bill carrying on Tory policy from Peter Lilley in 1995, when the concept of habitual residence was introduced. That also affects people who are not necessarily foreign nationals; it could affect somebody who was born here, lived here for 20 years, went to work in America or Australia and then came back and had to show that they were habitually resident. The case law on that is arbitrary: some offices accept that someone is here for two weeks; others say that people have to be here for three months and show all sorts of proof. Those issues need to be clarified.
2418. Last week, we asked the officials about sanctions. What happens when a person who is convicted of fraud and spends two years in jail, but has had sanctions of three years imposed, leaves jail facing another complete year without benefit? If hardship payments are to be recovered, that leaves the individual in an almost impossible position. What happens to the partner and children? Who then becomes the claimant? If the person is back in the household and the two are living together as a couple, they would normally have to claim as a couple. If the partner was looking for work, surely both would have to sign the claimant commitment. All sorts of issues need to be resolved.
2419. Another concern is the erosion of benefits for young people. Severe disablement allowance has already been abolished. In my experience, the young people who were getting severe disablement allowance had quite severe learning difficulties. When that allowance was abolished, there was young person's incapacity benefit, for which the contribution conditions were waived. Now, those young people will have to be absorbed into the pool and, presumably, have to make themselves available, or show whether they are capable. It is worse than we thought, to be honest with you. I mean, Jesus, I was depressed enough —
2420. Ms P Bradley: You are now really depressed, Mickey.
2421. Mr Brady: — and I mean that in the nicest possible way. I think that we are all really depressed after that. You covered some issues that had been raised before, but provided more detail. It is certainly not a pleasant picture that you paint. There are a lot of answers that may or may not come back. Irrespective of the statement yesterday, the Department seems to be wedded to the whole concept of “welfare reform”.
2422. Mr Allamby: One of my ambitions in life is, one day, to come to the Social Development Committee and leave it more cheery than when I start. However, I have yet to realise that ambition.
[Laughter.]
2423. The Chairperson: You might need to consider bringing a box of mulled wine or something. [Laughter.]
2424. Mr Allamby: It may take that.
2425. The Chairperson: Members are open to offers.
2426. Mr Allamby: You are quite right about the waiting period for mortgage interest. One of the arguments that I have heard advanced by DWP is that, because they have mortgage interest to pay, owner-occupiers have a real incentive to get back to work. If they have to wait even 13 weeks, never mind 39 weeks, they will really be wanting to get back into work.

2427. That is fine, well and good. The problem is that, given the number of jobs out there and the number of people looking for them, even the most assiduous person, who has lost his or her job but who wants to find work tomorrow, will find it hard to get a job straight away. That is the case even if people are flexible and willing to work unsociable hours, and so on. Some people who are homeowners will, if the period changes to 39 weeks, which equates to nine months without having the mortgage paid, find that really difficult to deal with. If you have worked for 20 years and have built up savings, you might well be able to manage it. You might if you have insurance. However, for people who are unemployed, the insurance market has suffered because of various other things that have happened with insurance products, and I think that that will affect some people very adversely.
2428. You mentioned the idea about the EU stuff. We have had lots of examples of UK and Irish nationals returning to Northern Ireland who have fallen foul, for at least a period, of the habitual residence test. We have had everything: people who have come back, either temporarily or permanently, to look after parents who are seriously ill; people who had gone abroad but whose marriage has broken down and who have decided to come back to Northern Ireland; and people who have decided to come back to Northern Ireland for whatever reason. Unless there is something in the regulations that makes exceptions for those people, some will find it tough to get into the universal credit system when they first come back — even if they are coming back for reasons that will probably save the government money. If you come back to look after your mother or father who is now terminally ill, for a year or whatever, it is pretty harsh to say that there will be a period before we will give you any benefit, even though you are probably saving us a very considerable sum of money by doing that. Yes, we need to look at what the regulations will contain.

2429. As to fraud, yesterday I understood that we were going to have an “intelligent approach” to the issues. We would have retribution on the one hand and rehabilitation on the other. However, the Bill seems to be a bit stronger on retribution, and I do not see much on rehabilitation. If you remove benefit for up to three years in some circumstances, it strikes me that you are probably removing it from people who have been punished once, and probably quite rightly. If you make it almost impossible for them to go back to their family without them losing all their income and having to work through all that, you are saying to the family that it must split from the person, which is presumably not going to be very good for rehabilitation. I suspect that most prisoners will find it easier to make their way back into society if they have family support. Or you push families into the fiction of pretending that separation has occurred when it has not. That is not a very attractive proposition, either for the state or the family. It does not seem to me to be, to use the Prime Minister’s words, an “intelligent approach” to the issues.
2430. Mr Brady: I will raise just one other thing that I meant to mention, Les. When people fall below a specific threshold — let us say that they are in part-time work — they will have to go into the work capability stuff. I am sorry, but I mean that they will have to be actively seeking work — whatever the terminology is. When officials told us about universal credit and the tapers, they said that it was designed to encourage people to move in and out of part-time work. Essentially, however, they are saying in this that people will be penalised if they go below a certain amount. As you say, if you have a part-time job and are doing the required minimum hours, you will still get some tax credit.
2431. Mr Allamby: As I understand it, the threshold will not be hours as such but earnings. In other words, if you are in very lucrative part-time work that gets you out of universal credit, that is fine — you can do that part-time work. I do not think that it has really been formulated how that will work for a part-time worker on universal credit. That is why the Government want to do pilots, and they have said that they are not going to introduce it straight away. They are going to run some pilots, and I am not sure where those are at. The powers are in this Bill, and were in the Bill in Britain, to say that, just because you are doing 17 and a half hours a week, it does not mean that you will not be expected to look for work. You are not going to be expected to look for work for 35 hours a week, but, in theory, I guess that you should be looking for work in the other 17 and a half hours.

2432. Mr Brady: The difficulty with pilot schemes is that one might be run in the south-east of England, where more full-time or part-time employment may be available. The results of that scheme could be favourable or more encouraging, and its results could be imposed here. That happened in the previous mandate where pilots were run on certain issues. That is not parity, because parity compares like to like. In our area, we have the highest unemployment figures since 1997. If there is to be a pilot scheme, it has to be equitable, in that it has to be run here to reflect local circumstances. Unfortunately, that did not happen previously. I assume that the British Government have no intention of doing it here at the moment.

2433. Mr Allamby: If I were DEL, I would be looking at this aghast. DEL will have its work cut out. It has large numbers of people migrating from incapacity benefit to employment and support allowance who, for the first time, will come into the work-related activity group. That is already happening. Therefore, there is already a new cohort of people whom you will be working with who are, to use the terminology used, a long way from the labour market. There is intensive work to do with that group. There are increasing numbers of unemployed people. Increasingly, DEL will have to engage with both the husband and wife or the male and female partner in looking for work. On top of that, DEL is taking on the challenge of people who are in work part-time and working with them to find full-time work. It looks as though the average person in a jobs and benefits office through DEL will be spending more than 35 hours a week dealing with this, because it is an enormous undertaking.

2434. Our view has always been that you should use what limited resources you have — DEL will tell you that its resources are limited in a jobs and benefits office — where you can the most effective outcomes. It seems to me that that means, without writing anyone off, working with people who have 40 years of their working life left rather than with people who have five years of their working life left. At the moment, I do not get any sense that any of that is being considered.

2435. We should have a lighter-touch arrangement on sanctions and on what you have to do to look for work for someone who is 60, for example, than for someone who is 20. Should the same level of resources be spent to encourage or help back into work a person who is 60 and in poor health when the time that that person will spend in work will be relatively limited compared with that of someone who is 20? It is a tough call, but, if you have limited resources, you have to make those tough calls.

2436. Mr Brady: It is not that long ago that, when they reached the age of 50, people did not have to sign on. Now, people with a younger partner will have to be absorbed into that market, if you like. They could be in their late sixties. The example that you gave was of someone who is 71. That adds another tier to the people who may be considered.

2437. Mr Allamby: Absolutely.

2438. Mr Copeland: Thank you, Les, for an interesting afternoon.

2439. Mr Brady: Depressing.

2440. Mr Copeland: It is very depressing, because I can picture someone whom I know in every category that you raised. What is waiting for them is not particularly pleasant.
2441. Les, you may be aware of concerns in some quarters, if not all, regarding the compliance with human rights legislation and, particularly, equality. You may also be aware of the findings in the report of the joint Lords and Commons Committee, which highlighted concerns. Are you sighted on the level of discussions that have taken place between the relevant commissions here and the Department to ensure that we are not in the process of enshrining or recommending something in law that will subsequently be open to successful challenge?
2442. Mr Allamby: I am not. I know that the Human Rights Commission has commissioned a piece of work. It may have been published, but I am not sure. It commissioned that piece of work to look at the human rights implications of the Welfare Reform Bill. I am not sure whether it is in the public domain; I just know that the work has been done.
2443. I know that the Human Rights Commission was looking at producing a submission for you, so, if one is not with you, I am pretty sure that you will be getting it. I am not sure what is happening on the Equality Commission side.
2444. There are a number of things in the Bill, and I will put them into two categories. There are potential human rights challenges, the strongest of which relates to the idea that EU migrants have to be in the all-work requirement, regardless of their circumstances. I would much rather be arguing our case than arguing the Department's case.
2445. There are other potential legal challenges out there, and I have mentioned them. There is the potential to challenge the ESA reduction straight away if you have been on 52 weeks, for example. I will put my hand on my heart and say that that would be a much tougher case to win. There are potential challenges to some of the housing issues, such as the size-related element, particularly if the Housing Executive and housing associations have not got credible alternatives to offer people. There are legal challenges there. Again, I will put my hand on my heart and say that there are arguments that the Department can make.
2446. Therefore, there are some areas in which it would be very difficult to call. There are other areas in which, I think, the Department will find it a struggle to win a legal argument. That is why it might be worth getting some of your in-house advice and possibly exploring with the Human Rights Commission, for example, whether it thinks that there are issues, particularly with migrant workers.
2447. I am a lawyer. I know what lawyers will attempt to do, in most areas. If you ask lawyers whether they can argue against something, they will sometimes say that there is absolutely no argument, but, on most things, they will say that there is a credible argument. In some cases, they will have a credible argument, but, in others, there will be a struggle to provide one. I do not know how you would quantify the costs that would be saved. If migrant workers fall into the all-work requirement, as local workers, they should be subject to the same conditions. However, if they do not, because they are a full-time carer, have just given birth or are doing any of the other things that arise, they should be treated the same as anybody else.
2448. Mr Copeland: There should be parity.
2449. Mr Allamby: Yes. Parity appears to apply only —
2450. Mr Copeland: There is selective parity.
2451. Mr Allamby: Yes. There does not seem to be parity across the European Union, but that is probably going a bit far, even by my standards.
2452. The Chairperson: There are no more questions, but I have a couple of points to make. This is timely, given your last point. Next Tuesday, we will hear from the Equality Commission and the Human Rights Commission, among a number of other stakeholders. We will be taking advice and evidence from both of those organisations. We intend to look at some of the, if you like, legalese points that you raised. We will likely take advice from Assembly Legal Services. That will be available to us.

2453. Les, we have taken note of your contribution today, your submission and your responses to Committee members' questions. I thank you for your comprehensive presentation. As always, it was very informative and provided an expert point of view. I thank you, and I thank members for diligently pursuing your presentation. No doubt, we will take your views on board. Obviously, you know the process that we are involved in. This is the Bill's Committee Stage, and it will be followed by Consideration Stage. This is part of the evidence-gathering, which will continue. Our schedule dictates that we are due to finalise our report by 27 November.
2454. Mr Allamby: Thank you. If you are feeling overly euphoric and need to be brought back down to earth, I will come back to talk to you at any stage.
2455. Mr Brady: That is not going to happen before 27 November anyway.

2456. The Chairperson: Good morning. I formally welcome Lynn Carvill, who is representing the Women's Resource and Development Agency (WRDA); Bronagh Hinds; Marie Cavanagh; and Sharon Burnett. We are familiar with most of you as we have engaged with you before. Thank you for coming this morning. I invite you to present to the Committee. You know we are at Committee Stage. Last week, we had an explanation from the Department about the content of the Bill. Members have tried to satisfy themselves with the content of the Bill and its intentions, clause by clause. We are now involved in engaging with a range of stakeholders, some of whom we have heard from before. That has been very helpful for the Committee's understanding in the past year or so. Without any further ado, please brief the Committee as you see fit, bearing in mind the fact that we had some announcements in the Assembly yesterday from the Minister. I presume that you are aware of that and may have considered it.

2457. Ms Lynn Carvill (Women's Resource and Development Agency): Thank you very much for having us here to speak to you today. We have gone through the hours and hours of debate that took place on welfare reform. We have also gone through the DSD evidence from the session that you had with the civil servants, and the Minister's statements and answers to questions yesterday. We were quite off the hoof yesterday afternoon trying to bring those into our session today. We have prepared a paper and are going to go through some of the issues outlined in the paper, and then maybe you can ask some questions around those issues.

2458. The evidence that we are giving today should be read alongside the paper that we presented to the Committee on 20 June, in which we outlined how welfare reform sacrifices women. I have noticed that the paper is not included as part of the evidence. It is not in the Hansard report, so it is perhaps important that we put that in again.

2459. This welfare reform reduces women's capacity to work, economic autonomy, equality and personal security. We observe that most MLAs share concerns about the impact of welfare reform on constituents and that parties have different views on how to proceed. We will make a number of critical comments about the process so far, and want to make it absolutely clear that we do not support any party position. Our role is solely to use our expertise to represent the interests and concerns of women.

2460. Yesterday, the Minister for Social Development announced a little progress in three areas of negotiation on welfare reform; payment of housing costs; the person to whom the payment is paid; and frequency of payment. Those developments are already provided for in the current Bill. Disappointingly, the Minister's announcement fell short of realising the full flexibility contained in the Bill, and signalled an intention to limit flexibility.

2461. We are disappointed at how little account has been taken of women's needs and circumstances, and we urge the Committee for Social Development to press for further progress on that and to make sure that the flexibility permitted in the legislation is not narrowed in regulations and guidelines or by an unresponsive IT system. You will see in our paper that we have listed some of the key issues, which I am not going to read out, because we are going to be talking about them further down the line.
2462. The processes for adopting legislation and regulations lack coherence and transparency, which may lead to failure to make fair and good arrangements. It is our view that it is essential to obtain acceptable cast-iron commitments and statements of intent on the application of the law and regulations in certain areas before agreeing to pass the Bill. I am now going to pass over to Bronagh.
2463. Ms Bronagh Hinds (DemocraShe): I want to speak to you about our central issue, on which we have seen little movement. I even refer to the question about split payments, but, nevertheless, we do not see the movement that we need to see. This refers to clauses 2 to 5 and clauses 97 to 99, which, I note, you did not get through with the DSD officials. In fact, you were only focusing up to clause 40, but there are some critical elements in other clauses of the Bill that relate to welfare reform.
2464. Clauses 2 to 5 provide that couples must make a joint claim for universal credit and that both claimants must meet the basic conditions and jointly meet the financial conditions. Regulations may provide for exceptions to the basic conditions in clause 4, but there is no exception provided for financial conditions in clause 5. The question therefore arises as to what happens on relationship breakdown before that breakdown is formalised or recognised, when, at that time, presumably, single or split claims might be made. What evidence is required to split payments, especially when it may not be possible in the current economic climate or housing market for one person to leave the marital home? Does the legislation provide for that?
2465. Clause 97 amends section 5 of the Administration Act to allow for joint claims by enabling one person to make a joint claim on behalf of another. The main applicant, as it has been called, is most likely to be male, and he is likely not just to make the claim but to receive the single universal credit payment unless there is intervention to regulate otherwise. If that is allowed to become normal practice, it would be a backward step to the old male head-of-household model, which will have consequences, as we know from past experience. We had that model for many years. Women in couples will lose all direct financial support and economic independence. There are also additional worrying duplications for children and abused women.
2466. Under clause 99, payments can be regulated differently, if we have read the Bill correctly. In amending section 5 of the Social Security Administration Act 1992, clause 99 provides the Department for Social Development:
- "in the case of a benefit awarded to persons jointly, power to ... determine to which of them all or any part of a payment should be made, and in particular for the Department — .*
- (a) to determine that payment should be made to whichever of those persons they themselves nominate, or*
- (b) to determine that payment should be made to one of them irrespective of any nomination by them."*
2467. Despite those powers, the Minister announced that there will be a single household payment for the majority of claimants, with flexibility for split payment only when necessary in a limited set of circumstances laid down in the guidelines. I refer to the Minister's statement and the DSD advice to this Committee two weeks ago, which were the same. He declared:
- "If we can avoid split payments, so much the better."*

2468. That denies the extent of the Department's powers under clause 99 and narrows the possibilities in the legislation. An approach that leaves it to:
- “partners to look at split payments and come forward to present a case if there is a need to do so”*
2469. does not appreciate women's reduced access to income, including vulnerable women suffering financial and other domestic abuse.
2470. There should be a cast-iron commitment or statement of intent before passage of the Bill that the default position will be to pay universal credit (i) to the second earner or carer in the household where the main earner is working because it is likely that the main earner will be male but, on occasion, it may be the other partner, and (ii) as a split payment where neither person in the couple is working. Our interpretation of clause 99 is that it would allow that.
2471. We have reasoned arguments for proposing this. When praising the new taper for benefit levels at the Committee earlier this month, DSD officials neglected to inform members of the gendered differences in universal credit. Universal credit is designed to reward the primary earner in couples, who is normally the man. The UK Government — not us; we are not saying this — acknowledged that they have reduced rewards for the second earner and weakened women's incentive to work. It actually takes more money from them because of the way the taper works for the second earner. That was not brought to your attention.
2472. The fact is that women are more likely to have no earned income of their own. When they work, their income will normally be less than their partners and they will not receive the single universal credit payment unless there is intervention to redirect that income to them. This is extremely serious. We urge the Committee to press the Minister to implement our proposal on who to pay universal credit to.
2473. Our approach will resolve several problems: it will provide the right economic arrangements in which the interests of the child are safeguarded best; it will not transfer all financial resources from the purse to the wallet, leaving women unequal and vulnerable without any independent means of support; if sanctions are applied to the main applicant, likely to be male, there will be less likelihood of a gap in payment affecting all of the family; it will assist in overcoming the financial abuse of women that is part of domestic violence and abuse; and in cases of relationship breakdown and domestic violence, it will avoid women and children becoming homeless and unable to secure alternative accommodation due to the housing debt accumulated by the male main applicant to whom the payment will be made.
2474. Women's organisations have been asked for advice on how to identify those who are vulnerable to domestic abuse, and I note that the Minister made the same statement in the Assembly yesterday about consultation with stakeholders. We welcome that, but something has to be understood. Although it has not been made explicit, we have, presumably, been asked to do that to form an exception group for single payment. I want to be extremely clear: that is to fundamentally misunderstand domestic violence. You cannot identify a victim of domestic violence in that way. Domestic violence is rooted in inequality and power. Financial control and financial abuse is one component of domestic violence. Secrecy, including among those who are affected keeping it to themselves because of shame, is another factor. The only safe and effective way to provide for abused women, many of whom you will not know about to identify, is to provide access to income for all women.
2475. Ms Sharon Burnett (Causeway Women's Aid): The next issue that we want to raise is about the frequency of payments, which is very important to us. Clause 7 gives the Department discretionary powers over assessment and payment periods. The Minister confirmed yesterday that, where necessary, bimonthly payments will be made in place of a single monthly payment. Officials told the Committee for Social Development two weeks ago that while flexibility is built in, departure from the normal practice of monthly payment will happen only in exceptional circumstances. That is, again, where exceptional circumstances come up time and time again.

2476. We welcome the proposed consultation on payment periods. However, the consultation should not focus on defining exceptional circumstances but develop an effective approach to meeting claimants' concerns and needs in relation to payment frequency. We ask you to look at that. We are aware that the Committee was advised by DSD officials on the number of people in work who are paid weekly, fortnightly and monthly as a basis for assessing capacity to manage on monthly payments. In our view, that is not a sufficient assessment. Women have reported the importance of weekly child tax credits, which saved them in the lean weeks between fortnightly payments of benefits. Flexibility should not be restricted to a few, and we ask the Committee to obtain the Minister's commitment to inclusivity in flexible payment regulations and guidance.
2477. Clause 11 deals with housing. We note the Minister's commitment to automatic payment of the universal credit housing element to landlords unless the claimant opts out. Refuges rely on direct payments of housing benefit to support victims of domestic violence, and we appreciate that the arrangement announced by the Minister will assist refuges to sustain their service. The decision on automatic housing benefit demonstrates that policy variations and operational flexibility can be accommodated within a shared welfare system.
2478. The best interests of the child should be taken into account when implementing the shared room rate up to the age of 35. That is necessary to allow the non-custodial parent, normally the father, to have his children in a safe and comfortable environment for day visits and overnight stays. The interests of abused women must also be considered when implementing the shared room conditions. When they are not housed in refuges, abused women must have conditions of privacy, safety and security, and we request that the Committee secures a commitment and statement of intent on those shared room rates from the Minister. Women and children are often forced to leave their house due to domestic abuse, and we ask the Committee to seek regulations capable of declaring the house to be under-occupied and moving the abuser out so that the woman and child, or children, can be returned.

2479. Everything that we are discussing today has to be seen in the round and in the context of all the changes to the social fund, the move to a discretionary support scheme and the significant likelihood that there will be reduced access to funds to enable women to leave abusive relationships as a result.
2480. Ms Marie Cavanagh (Gingerbread NI): I will speak on clauses 13 to 25, which are on work-related requirements. The issue that I want to raise is about the best interests of the child. A claimant who is a responsible carer for a child faces work-related conditions set according to the age of the child, starting with no work conditions for lone parents or nominated carers with a child under the age of one year. Those with a child aged up to three years, or five years according to DSD officials, are required to attend work-focused interviews, yet our childcare infrastructure is very poor and is recognised as being very poor for younger and older children. Cuts have already reduced financial support for childcare for those on lower incomes.
2481. Conditionality and sanctions are extended under universal credit. The conditionality threshold is set at the national minimum wage, except for those who are not expected to work full time. A high proportion of those on - benefits are already working. In effect, the benefits are subsidising low wages. The Minister and DSD officials are keen on making work pay and might therefore be expected to enforce the national minimum wage and actively champion equal pay, which would be welcomed by low-paid women. However, where claimants are working full time but earning below the minimum wage, officials made it clear to this Committee that responsibility will lie with claimants to find better paid work or to increase their hours. Essentially, that will mean approaching employers to ask for higher wages or increased hours. That approach will increase pressure on women to juggle work, childcare and domestic responsibilities. Juggling those issues is already commonplace for many working women.

2482. The Welfare Reform Act (Northern Ireland) 2010 stipulates that the best interests of the child must be taken into account when drawing up job-seeker arrangements for lone parents. We urge the Committee to make sure that the best interests of the child principle is continued for lone parents into the universal credit arena and press the Minister to extend the same principle to child carers in couple households. The principle should be included in the claimant commitments. That is necessary given the low availability of childcare provision in this jurisdiction.
2483. In light of the 10% cut in child tax credits, which support working parents with childcare, we repeat our June 2012 request to the Social Development Committee to ask the Executive to cost the option for restoring the 10% cut in child tax credit in Northern Ireland and meet the costs of the 10% shortfall for lone parents and all low income families.
2484. With regard to the evidence from the DSD officials, much relies on personal advisers and the relationships between them and claimants. Personal advisers should be trained. Their training should include gender awareness, and they should be made aware of section 75 responsibilities as part of that. Very often, the service that the claimant is gets at the front office depends on the amount of information the personal adviser has and, more importantly, the experience of that personal adviser in the legislation and the regulations.
2485. I want to mention something at this stage that is not included in this paper, and it is directly related to lone parents. It is the issue of child maintenance, which the Bill incorporates. We raise the issue of the demand for payment related to the assessments for child maintenance and the impact that that is likely to have on families.
2486. Extrapolating some of the proposals in the Bill would indicate that a non-custodial parent earning a moderate income of around £20,000 may be expected to pay up to £150 a year for assessment and collection. Given the Executive's commitment to the relief of child poverty, that money would be better spent on children rather than being brought back into the coffers of the child maintenance and enforcement division. We also argue that the custodial parent should not be required to make any payment when it comes to assessments being made. In saying that, we then argue that those issues should be looked at and amended before the Bill's provisions are finalised.
2487. Ms Carvill: I am just going to talk quickly about sanctions under clauses 26 and 27.
2488. Given the harsher sanctions attached universal credit, we asked the Committee to obtain assurances from the Minister that vulnerable people will be protected in the legislation or by regulation. To avoid unfair sanctions, conditionality for those with responsibilities for children should take proper account of Northern Ireland's poor childcare infrastructure. The principle of the best interests of the child should be the primary consideration in the application of sanctions. We urge the Committee to ensure that the legislation permits that, and to obtain a commitment or statement of intent from the Minister - that he will include it in regulations for sanctions.

2489. Where sanctions are applied to the main applicant, which is likely to be the male, there should be no gap in payment to the woman or children in the family. Our earlier proposal for the Department to use powers under clause 99 to pay universal credit to the second earner or the carer, or to split the payments according to the financial circumstances explained previously, would avoid any of this.
2490. Ms Hinds: To conclude our presentation, as Lynn identified at the beginning, we have listed the key issues which is a summary of the issues that we have gone through with the Committee and provided the rationale.
2491. However, we want to return to the issue of process. We believe that regulations are an essential part of welfare reform, yet the legislation is scheduled to go through the Assembly without either the regulations having been prepared, or cast-iron agreement on exactly what would be permitted within their scope.
2492. We believe that this creates a dangerous framework for dealing with some of these issues. We urge the Committee to press for progress on women and children in the welfare reform legislation and regulations. We urge you to ensure that the flexibility in the legislation is not narrowed in regulations and guidelines, or by an unresponsive IT system, as we said earlier.
2493. We also want to come back to the point about fair treatment of women, and women's access to financial, support because this Bill is in danger of removing absolutely all finances from women and putting them a very dangerous position. We call for a cast-iron commitment and statement of intent before the passage of the Bill, in order to have a default position to pay universal credit, as we said, to the second earner or carer in the household, where the main earner is working, or as a split payment where neither person is working.
2494. It is clear that there are two kinds of regulation in the Bill. I do not know whether the Committee is very clear about that, because it appeared to us that the DSD officials kept saying that this would be done by confirmation resolution. In fact, the Bill contains both mandatory or "must" resolutions, and "may" resolutions, which are more permissive; and I am not sure whether DSD referred to one or both. It was not clear.
2495. It means that it may be difficult for MLAs to change regulations after this legislation is in place. I think that that has been the case before. Therefore, it is important that we understand what is going to be in the scope of the regulations, if the regulations are not drafted and there is not enough time to draft them. There must indeed be some outline of that and some cast-iron commitments and statement of intent on the application of law and regulation in the areas that we have brought to your attention before you vote the Bill through.
2496. What we are saying is that there are different ways that you can handle this. I know that there has been a debate on whether you should vote for the legislation; then there is the question of how far you can get on regulation or the content of regulation; and there is a third position, about getting further cast-iron guarantees to go further on some of the points that we have identified — if, indeed, it is not possible to regulate on them before the legislation has passed.
2497. We are extremely concerned about the impact of this legislation on women and children.
2498. The Chairperson: Thank you all for your presentation.
2499. I will make a couple of quick observations. The Committee went through all the clauses with the Department. We completed that process, although there are still some questions to be addressed fully. We completed that work; we deferred a number of clauses and we will come - back to them. We completed the process for all the clauses.

2500. The difficulty that the Committee will have to grapple with in due course is that this is, essentially, enabling legislation, which means that we do not have many of the regulations. We will be able to refer to Westminster regulations, but those are not the regulations for here. They may well be similar. It remains to be seen.
2501. Members are fully aware that, when they are voting for a Bill, a lot of the regulations will come a year or a year-and-a-half down the line. We are very aware of that. In a recent debate in the Assembly, I highlighted that we had firm commitments from previous Ministers on regulations that would follow, which, basically, amounted to nothing. I am not being judgmental on the Ministers, but, at the end of the day, if it is provided for in primary legislation, that will largely govern the regulations. We have to grapple with the fact that what we support in the Bill will work its way through by way of regulations at a later stage. There will be parameters around that.
2502. I presume that a lot of Members will try to do likewise, but we will seek commitments and assurances. Some of them may amount to nothing, although Members will be free to take that course and take your advice. They certainly will take your advice on board. I am just making that general point.
2503. My understanding of the Minister's statement yesterday is that direct payments will now be the default position, which you are arguing for. I think that we have all probably argued for that. That is a good thing. The split payment and the regularity of payments are, in principle, conceded, if you like, but those will be dealt with by way of a programme board and consultations, etc, as to how precisely the mechanics will work themselves out. You have tabled a number of formal suggestions as to how that may be done. Others have also put forward similar ideas, but they are not always the same. In principle, that has been agreed, but it is not the default position. Again, people will have to see how it works out in the time ahead, which is why people have given qualified welcomes. All that will take its course. I am just making those general observations.
2504. Mr Brady: Thanks very much for the presentation. I have a number of points to raise; you can correct me if am wrong in what I say about any of them. I am sorry that I missed the beginning of your submission. You are advocating single household payments to the main carer or second carer. The Minister made a statement yesterday. Split payments are quite a blunt instrument. Do you see that as one way of addressing the issue? He talked about exceptions. Will fortnightly payments by default be a better way of addressing this? Exceptions could be made for monthly or weekly payments, depending on the individual circumstances.
2505. You have stated that if the legislation went through it would increase women's dependency. Do you see that as possibly increasing domestic violence because of the utter dependency of women in that situation? There could be underlying domestic violence, but women, in the context of the current intention, would be disenfranchised to a large degree because they would not get the money that they are entitled to. Section 75 includes an obligation to protect the interest of particular groups such as women and children. You have addressed that to some degree.
2506. There is an issue around the main carer. It may have been used before in the tax credit system, so it might not be that difficult to transfer it across. I wonder what your thoughts are on that. Obviously, there are a number of other questions. There is no childcare provision in any sense; the legislation is simply not here. You could argue that the strategy is not here either. Those will be exceptions. You have talked about children under three, and it was mentioned that there seems to be some anomaly concerning children under five. That needs to be clarified, but, ultimately, the issue is about sanctions.

We were told during the previous mandate that lone parents would not be sanctioned if they could show that there was no available childcare. In my experience in my constituency office, it started out like that, but then sanctions started to creep in. Welfare reform — so-called — is about punishing people if they do not adhere to particular criteria. Undoubtedly, lone parents in particular are vulnerable to sanctions. We have been told that, if someone is jailed for two years for social security fraud, and there is a three-year sanction on their benefit, they will still have to do another year without benefit when they come out. How does that impact on their partner and family? If that is the main carer, what you are saying is that there will be a fairly seamless transition. That does not seem to have been addressed. It is the nuts and bolts and the logistics of it. The regulations have been referred to, but we do not yet have the ones that will apply here. Those things need to be sorted out before all that is put in place. I wonder what your thoughts are on that. There was a lot there to take in, but they are points that need to be addressed.

2507. Ms Burnett: I was trying to take notes, so I will start us off. You talked about how we suggested that payments being made would potentially be a blunt instrument. Although I am here representing Women's Aid, I am also here trying my best to be part of a larger women's sector. It is about trying to make sure that whatever we do has a positive impact on all women who will be affected by welfare reform. The other issue, very clearly for women who are victims of domestic violence, is that, when we look at things that say "in particular circumstances" or "in exceptional circumstances", the real worry for us is how that will be judged. How will women be able to present their victimhood to access universal credit or any benefits? Are we going to sit in rooms and say, "Well, you will not have your non-molestation order until next Tuesday. Actually, it is only an interim non-molestation order; we will wait for another month for a full non-molestation order. Have you got a police report?

Have you got a report from a hospital?" It is completely inappropriate to ask any woman to do those things. Doing that type of thing puts them in a far riskier position. It puts those who are administering all of the benefits in an extremely difficult position. It does not recognise absolutely where there is psychological and financial abuse — where there is not a bruise or a broken arm but the abuse is as real and can be as damaging. I get what you are saying about a blunt instrument, but we look at women as a whole and try to make sure that we do not go down the path of saying, "Here are your list of injuries. Here is the piece of paper that proves you are a victim of domestic violence." That is why we are very clear on that.

2508. I think that you then asked questions about the main carer.

2509. Ms Carvill: I picked up on a couple of things. It is really about who universal credit is paid to. I see that, in some ways, there is controversy around that. What has really blown my mind in some ways, especially after the statement yesterday, is that we have been consistently calling for universal credit to be paid to the second earner in the household to ensure that money goes to two people or to the main carer. Already, however, our Minister has jumped to the position of saying, "Well, we are not going to look at that, but we will split the payments." He is happy to retain the position in which one payment will be paid to the male earner in the household as a default. My mind is completely blown by that. There is a lot that is wrong with welfare reform, but simplicity in the benefits system is very good. It seems that this is a perfect opportunity to rebalance some things. One way of doing that is to make sure that people in a household have access to income. Bronagh gave the list of five reasons why; I have not heard any reasons why not. That is still not being talked about, so I would like to put that out there. We probably have a lot more work to do in that regard.

2510. I will pick up on the issue of the frequency of payments. Since the launch of our report ‘Women on the Edge?’, we know, from speaking to women, lone parents and low-income families, that they really struggle. What is the issue with giving them the choice? When I signed up for tax credits, I could have received them weekly, fortnightly or monthly. It was up to me to decide what was best. All I had to do was tick a box. That goes into the computer, and it is paid that way. What is the issue? Why does there have to be a default system that says that you will be paid in this way? It does not make any sense.

2511. Part of the Welfare Reform Bill is about choice, as you choose who gets the universal credit in the household. However, it contradicts itself in respect of frequency of payment, because that is not about choice. That would be very simple. Universal credit is a little bit more difficult to grasp, but the reasons and rationale behind who it is paid to are really important and simple.
2512. Mr Brady: There are two points. Iain Duncan Smith’s rationale is that it will get people used to being salaried in non-existent jobs. You make a very valid point about universal credit being difficult to grasp. Surely the whole point of universal credit is to make it simpler so that we can all understand it. All of the other 30 benefits will go into the ether, and we will have one that we can all understand. You and I both know that that is simply not going to happen.
2513. They are making what was a complex system in many ways even more complex because of the tapers and all of that. I would like someone to sit down and explain to me how you go in one end badly off and come out the other end necessarily better off. You then have to change your whole attitude to work in the sense that you may work part-time, you may work three days a week, you may work two the next and all that kind of thing. I have not grasped this yet either, so we are all in the same boat at the moment.
2514. Ms Cavanagh: I will comment on childcare provision. Mickey, you were very clear about that issue. The 2010 Act very clearly identifies best interests of the child. In legislation, there is relief for lone parents in respect of work-focused interviews and so forth. One of the points that we raise in the paper that we presented is that that should be carried through seamlessly into universal credit. At the moment, it is not in it. The difficulty is that, if we do not get it in, it will be a matter of interpretation. That goes back to the point that you made a minute or two ago about sanctions. Even though the 2010 Act has that provision, we can see that sanctions, while not prolific, are certainly increasing. If it is left to discretion, sanctions will inevitably become the default mode. More work needs to be done in that area.
2515. There is another issue that is also particularly relevant to your point, Mickey. The fact that sanctions were not looked at initially and have started to grow has a impact on training for personal advisers, which is another point that we raised. It often depends on who you get at front of house, how experienced they are, the length of time that they have been working in that area and the amount of training that they have had in the legislation and regulations. That will have a big impact on how things are dealt with.
2516. Another issue is that, as everybody knows, we have a problem with childcare provision. There is not sufficient provision to meet need. Even if, as we hope, we will have the jobs that will make work pay, there are still not sufficient childcare places to enable all the families who will need that provision to take up those jobs.
2517. Those are all things that we need to think about. They are extraneous to the actual Welfare Reform Bill, but they are imperative if we want to be able to implement any of it correctly and to the advantage of the claimant.
2518. Mr Brady: I will just make one final point, which is about affordable childcare. Historically and traditionally, children here were looked after by members of their extended family. When

I was in Welfare Rights in Newry about 12 years ago, we did a survey that found that Newry and Mourne had the worst childcare provision in western Europe. I think that we had five registered childminders for a population of about 90,000 people.

2519. In England, there is legislation that states that the local authority has to provide childcare. They already have the infrastructure, because they provide housing, social services and all of that. There is no comparison with here. To become a registered childminder, you have to look after another child who is not related to you. That needs to be addressed. If a granny is looking after her grandchild, she will not want to take responsibility for someone else's. There are all of those issues. It is as if one size fits all, but it does not.
2520. Ms Hinds: We cannot start sanctioning lone parents or other carers whom people require to fulfil certain conditions after their child is one and, then, after their child is three or five, when the childcare is not actually there for them to do that.
2521. Mr Brady: Bronagh, that comes back to Marie's point that it depends who you deal with. You may be dealing with someone who is sympathetic or you may —
2522. Ms Hinds: Yes. However, our concern is that although there was protection under the 2010 legislation, there is no protection yet in this legislation. Given the increase in sanctions, we need to roll that protection for lone parents forward into this legislation. We need to extend it to other carers until we get ourselves sorted out.
2523. Mr Brady: It should not come down to the subjective opinion of somebody who is sitting across the table from you. How people are treated, in that sense, should be very clearly defined.
2524. Ms Cavanagh: To my mind as well, it is imperative to get protection into the legislation. That goes back to the point that Bronagh made about process. If it is not there and regulations come out without, at least, some modicum of protection in them, we will not have an option to change it. That will be the simple fact of the matter. Therefore, we need to make that move now with the Bill and in the formulation of the Act, ultimately.

2525. Ms Hinds: That is a different position from the issue — if we have read the legislation correctly — of to whom that payment is paid. We would ask you not to mix up or generally ally the issues of monthly payments and to whom payments are paid. Our understanding — we asked you to check it out — is that clause 99 would give us permission to regulate what we have asked for. It is within the gift. We understand that the legislation permits it.
2526. Why we proposed two different methods is exactly because women, as well as men, should have their income, not only in cases of domestic violence where they need to have a financial way of getting out, but because it is only fair, proper and equal that they should have it. Therefore, whether the main earner is a man or a woman, the second earner should be given the universal-credit benefit in order to have balanced income in the household. Where neither is an earner, the payment should be split properly. Perhaps, somebody who cares for children would get a bit more. However, it should be split fairly equally. That is why we made that proposal. It is important to be fair to women and men.
2527. Mr Brady: I will finish on this point. As regards an equal split, the fact is that, in most cases, the woman is the person who most looks after the children and the household and who makes the financial decisions in a "normal" relationship. There are cases where, if there are gambling or drink problems, the person with the problem could possibly get a payment as a single-person's allowance and the rest would go to the main carer who is, in most cases, the woman. All of the logistics of that have to be worked out. However, you are quite right. The first decision has to be made that there is a facility for people to make an informed choice in the context of their - own households, because there will be so much diversity. When you start that and sort it out, the decision on who will get the actual money and how often it is paid comes after that, in a sense. If the wrong person gets it, it does not matter whether it is paid monthly, weekly or fortnightly, somebody in the household will suffer — usually the woman and children.

2528. Ms Hinds: The Department can decide who the payment is made to. It could make the default the other way round.
2529. Mr Brady: The facility is there.
2530. The Chairperson: That is understood. We understand that point, which has been usefully made again.
2531. Ms P Bradley: Thank you. I always look forward to hearing from you. For me, as a female, it brings me back down to earth to remember where I come from and the things that I have been through in my life to get to where I am today. I am very grateful to you for coming here today. All that you have mentioned has highlighted to me again that gender inequalities still exist. They need to be addressed.
2532. The most important thing, which Mickey brought up at the very end of that discussion, is choice. Through welfare reform, we are trying to help people to make choices to go back to work and do all of those things. However, what is missing in a lot of this is empowerment. We are not empowering people by denying them choices on how they receive their benefits. I believe that we need a much more precise commitment from the Minister as to how the split payment and the monthly payment will work.
2533. Lynn mentioned tax credits, and I remember that you had to tick a box to indicate whether you wanted that paid weekly, fortnightly or monthly. Why are we not empowering people to make decisions? If we want to empower people to go back into the workforce and build better lives for themselves, which, we are told, is the ethos behind this, why are we not empowering people and telling them that they have the right to make decisions as to how they want to receive this?
2534. The domestic violence issue is a big one, whether the victim is a man or woman. We know from experience that for anyone who is suffering domestic violence, whether male or female, financial abuse is a major factor, so that is a big reason. I have clause 99 here in front of me, and there is something in that that could be looked at.
2535. I really appreciate your coming here. You are hard-hitters, and that is what we need to hear. We need to hear the plain and simple truth, and you need to bring us back to the reality that these are the communities we live in and these are the people we work with. These are the people coming in and out of our offices, and we need to do what is best for them. We need to protect the vulnerable. We need to remember that and keep that at the forefront. Thank you again, this has been a very worthwhile session for me.
2536. Mr F McCann: Again, Mickey has touched on most of what I wanted to say. The whole concept of universal credit is built on a false premise — an availability of work. There is no availability of work, and there is not going to be an availability of work for many years.
2537. The issue that I believe will have a major impact is underoccupancy. Have you done anything on that? We live in a world where there is an increasing number of one-parent households living in a two-bedroom or three-bedroom house. They are going to be penalised. Have you done any research into the impact that that will have, especially on women?
2538. Ms Cavanagh: The housing sector has been looking at that particular issue fairly closely. From our point of view, underoccupancy is not so much an issue for the parent with care because, generally speaking and notwithstanding that our housing stock is generally three-bedroom stock, there is not underoccupancy for the parent with custody of children. Our difficulty arises for the non-custodial parent, where we want to encourage good contact between both parents. The paper mentioned the rule around single-room occupancy for the under-35s. That directly impacts on lone fathers or non-custodial fathers, or non-custodial mothers in some cases, where they are going to be forced into houses of multiple occupation. Where do the best interests of the child fall in that instance? On the one hand, we have demands for parents to take responsibility for children, and research would indicate that good contact is productive for children. On the other hand, we are going to have people who will not be able to get contact simply because they do not have the accommodation to allow either day visits or overnight visits in safety, or in what can be guaranteed safety. That is the single-room issue.

2539. The underoccupancy issue will come into play where you have smaller households in larger houses; that will create a problem in housing mobility. I think it is a fairly foregone conclusion that our housing stock is not fit for purpose in that regard, and the demand for people to move into smaller accommodation, if that is what is required, is not necessarily going to be an option. Those are the issues that we need to look at in the Bill, and the housing sector certainly will be making presentations on that issue.
2540. Mr F McCann: You are right in everything that you say. The single-room allowance is only starting to have an impact across the board. There is an argument about transitional payments or discretionary payments, as they are called, as they are only meant to tide you over for so long before it is stopped. I deal with housing quite a lot, certainly in the west of the city, and one of the big arguments is about young people being offered three-bedroom houses because they are in areas where people may not want houses. They could be penalised for that in a short time. We are also living with the legacy of the conflict in - that it is not easy for people to move into different areas. We have raised some of that.
2541. Last week, it was said that 520 families will be directly impacted by the cap on benefits. I think that, if one family is impacted, it is one family too many. It was also said that over 13,000 families who are on DLA may also be impacted when they switch over from DLA to PIP. Have you done anything on that?
2542. Ms Cavanagh: The welfare reform group has been looking at all of those issues, and, obviously, there are specialist organisations in each field. Principally, the people who will suffer the worst impact of the benefit cap are people who have adult disability in the family or, importantly, child disability in the family. Obviously, if there are two or three members of the family who are entitled to disability premiums, it will not take too long to rack up the amount to the benefit cap. My understanding of the legislation is that some provision will be made for that, but you will have to speak to some of the disability sector organisations to get a clear idea of the likely impact of that. We have been led to believe that the legislation will contain exemptions where there is significant disability in families. Again, that needs to be checked out more clearly with the organisations that work in that field.
2543. Ms Burnett: On your first question about underoccupancy, I know that the Council for the Homeless raised issues about the disjoint between the common selection scheme and payment of housing benefit. I am sure that, at some point, you will have written submissions from that organisation or have its representatives in this room. It said that, under the common selection scheme, you will be able to access houses that are far larger than housing benefit will pay for. It will be able to give you significantly more detail than I am able to go into.
2544. One of the significant issues for Women's Aid is underoccupancy and the subsequent reduction of money going into the household. When women leave relationships, that is the point at which they are at most risk of serious harm or homicide, so it is an extremely risky time for women to go through. As I am sure you are aware, we have introduced Multi-Agency Risk Assessment Conference (MARAC) processes throughout Northern Ireland to try to ameliorate that. However, the issue for us is that, when a woman leaves, she is already at significant risk. Now the house that she and her children have left will be an underoccupied house and the partner who remains there will have a financial hit on his pocket as well. That will give added reason for the perpetrator of domestic violence to cajole, threaten and abuse the person who has left the house. That will definitely have a direct impact on the levels of domestic violence in the future.

2545. Mr F McCann: One of the other points that is being raised is that most of the old Housing Executive and housing association stock have what is called a box room of 6 feet by 10 feet. We have asked that that be excluded as a room for the purposes of housing benefit, because it has a direct impact on people moving in.
2546. Ms Hinds: Chairman, can I ask you about the whole issue of the framework of the process? We are trying to find a way of squaring the circle where people want to move ahead with the legislation. First, we are concerned about whether the legislation contains everything that will be required, and we have identified things that are not in the legislation such as rolling forward the protection for lone parents and extending it to carers.
2547. Secondly, there is interpretation of parts of the legislation. In some areas, we think that it does permit things that we want, but, so far, we have not heard the political will to interpret that to deliver what we think is essential. This is a matter of equality for women, but it is also a matter of severe vulnerability. There is getting that requirement.
2548. Thirdly, you said that statements of intent are not strong enough. Essentially, we are not wedded to any of those three. We want something that is effective and gets us the result on those issues that we need.
2549. The Chairperson: Speaking as the Chair of the Committee as opposed to a partisan politician, we are now formally in Committee Stage. Therefore, as I said at the start of the meeting, we held an explanatory session with the Department, just so that everybody around the table is clear on what the Bill is supposed to do; whether they agree with it is irrelevant. What we first had to do was work out whether we knew what we were talking about and make sure that we knew what the Bill is designed to do. Members have asked, “How will that work out?”, “Will this be the implication of that?”, and so on. So, there has been a very robust examination of the Bill’s intent. As I say, members have sought to clarify the outworking of that, and I think that that has been well covered.
2550. There are still some issues that we need a bit of clarification on. That will obviously help members to work out their position. When we were going through some of the clauses, the Department outlined the intent of those clauses, and we had a discussion around the table. We were then verbally advised, “That actually means this”, “Those are the criteria and the guidelines”, “That is how it will work”, and “That will be dealt with by way of regulation or by way of confirmative resolution”. Something written by the Department at this point will be done by way of negative resolution or confirmatory resolution. That is a political decision that will be taken by the Department and the Minister. That is the stated position of the Department at this time. I suppose that there will be another argument on that.
2551. The Committee will obviously have to satisfy itself that it fully understands the Bill and its implications and that, through engagement with stakeholders and in conjunction with parties and members around the table, it knows what the views and mandates are, and so on and so forth. The evidence-gathering sessions, which will be - extensive, the discussions with the Department and the commitments from the Minister will be factored in to the Committee's final report, which will be published on 27 November. So, by 27 November, the Committee will have gone through all the evidence-gathering sessions. We are still tweaking the forward work programme for the next number of weeks. So, the Committee will take evidence, and, by 27 November, it will sign off on a report that will go to the Assembly. That report may involve some amendments to the Bill or a narrative from the Committee. The Committee might say, "We are not happy about this but —". For example, as you know, the Minister yesterday outlined a process for looking at universal credit and the mechanics of split payments, regular payments and so on. That may work out and resolve the issues that you raised this morning and which a lot of members have raised. That may end in a good result, and I hope that that is the case.

2552. We have been told that David Freud is coming over here to engage directly with the Minister, the Department and the rest of us in the Executive on the whole issue of housing benefit and so on, and on how all that might work out. That is good, because there is a focus of attention on that. It does not guarantee a particular outcome, but it represents at least a formal, more direct engagement. I think that we will all welcome that.
2553. I am not going to be judgemental. I am simply saying that we, as a Committee, may want to get commitments, and we will welcome people making political commitments to do something. All I am saying is that when you sign off on legislation, the Minister responsible for that legislation could be away by the next week. That Minister may have had the best intentions in the world, but that may not carry through. We know that from having recently dealt with landlord registration, for example. During the last mandate — I was not on the Committee then, but the record will show this to be the case — members had some concerns and wanted landlord registration to go further, and they were told that they could deal with that in the regulations. However, the Bill was passed, and when we got the regulations here in the past two or three months, we were told, "Sorry, the primary legislation does not allow you to go that far".
2554. Ms Hinds: Can you influence regulations when it comes to the regulation stage?
2555. The Chairperson: You can vote for or against the regulations. However, you are then told that the regulations must be in line with the primary legislation or that they must maintain parity. So you get into all those arguments. All I am saying is that members need to know that primary legislation sets the scene for upcoming regulations. So when members eventually vote, they need to fully understand that, however they vote, the regulations flowing from primary legislation are governed by the primary legislation.
2556. Ms Hinds: I understand.
2557. The Chairperson: There may be flexibilities in all that. You asked about the process. We are at Committee Stage and are taking all the evidence. For example, we will have the Housing Executive in on Thursday, and, next Wednesday, the Chartered Institute of Housing, the Federation of Housing Associations, the Housing Rights Service and the Council for the Homeless will be here to discuss the wider issues of housing. We have series of other evidence sessions, some of which are, in a way, generic and some of which are more specific. All of that will be very helpful to us as members. As Paula said earlier, it is very important to hear from people, particularly people who are working on specific issues, because you can then roll your sleeves up and get into the detail because they are, in a way, experts in the field. By 27 November, it will be up to this Committee to report to the Assembly. That report may contain amendments to the Bill, and amendments may be accepted by the Department. During discussions with the Department, we will ask whether it is prepared to adopt that as an amendment. It may well do so.

2558. Ms Hinds: I want to make clear that our preferred position is that the Bill creates the permission to allow this. If the primary legislation were to say to whom the payment is to be made, that would be even better. We assume that that is not likely to happen, but we think that the Bill permits it, and, therefore, it needs to be regulated. Our preferred approach is that there are amendments to the Bill. Our next approach is for the regulations to make full use of what the Bill allows to be done and not to narrow it to special or exceptional circumstances. Our third position is the statement of intent. We want to make that clear because we totally appreciate and understand, from having done other legislative stuff, that that is the way to best protect what we need to deliver here.

2559. The Chairperson: That is not a problem. I do not want, in my role as Chair, to be in any way negative about anybody's statement of intent. If we can get statements of intent from Ministers and so on, not only Ministers here, we will want to build on that and try to make them reality. I am not trying to gainsay the motivation behind any of that but am simply saying that, ultimately, when you sign off on the Bill, you need to understand what you are signing off on. From my point of view, the default mechanism of paying money directly to landlords is a good thing. I would prefer other things to be the default mechanism and you then work out the special circumstances after that and can opt out. We will all have that discussion. I certainly want the default mechanism to apply to a range of other issues, and you have identified some of them.

2560. Given the principle of the essence of the statement from the Minister yesterday on universal credit and the work to be done on that, theoretically, before the Bill is passed, you could have that written in to the legislation. That is doable, in my view, because the work that will go ahead will hopefully determine that. The statement yesterday talked about the programme board looking at the mechanics of that and going out to consultation. The Department may come back and say, "We are amending the Bill accordingly", and we might all be happy. Hopefully that will be the case.

2561. The detailed scrutiny that we are going through now is very important. We have benefited, as Paula said, from engaging with a range of people, including yourselves, in the past. It has been very helpful — especially for me, in chairing this Committee in the past year or more — to acclimatise and inform ourselves about the ins and outs of how all this is worked out. Probably everybody around the table deals with those issues in their constituency offices more or less daily anyhow.

2562. Thank you, Sharon, Bronagh, Lynn and Marie for your presentation this morning and for indulging us with your expertise. I am sure that we will engage again.

2563. The Chairperson: I welcome Iris Elliott from the Northern Ireland Association for Mental Health (NIAMH). The association has provided a briefing paper to the Committee.
2564. Ms Iris Elliott (Northern Ireland Association for Mental Health): I thank the Committee for giving me the opportunity to present the views of NIAMH on welfare reform. We have submitted written evidence to the Committee, and we circulated a briefing on mental health and welfare reform to MLAs on the day of the Bill's Second Stage. Rather than repeating the points that were made in the submission and briefing, I will highlight five key themes in our representations to date.
2565. The first is the importance of ensuring that evidence on which decisions are made is timely and based on independent expert mental health opinion that is provided by professionals and services that have an established relationship with the individual. Second is the importance of ensuring access to independent advice and representation. Third is the importance of ensuring that the first stage of the sanctions regime is to provide access to independent advice and representation for the individual to assist him or her to compile their evidence. Fourth is the importance of supporting the individual's pace of mental health recovery by removing arbitrary time limits from the contributory employment and support allowance (ESA) work-related activity group (WRAG) and introducing provision for the individual to requalify for ESA, either the support group or the WRAG, if his or mental health deteriorates. Finally is the importance of supporting the individual's recovery of their mental health by introducing discretionary provision on the frequency of the personal independence payment (PIP) review and the requirement of being consistently unwell three months prior to and nine months following the prospective test for assessment. Underpinning these specific recommendations for amendments is our overarching concern that the Bill requires a human rights review for its compliance with the European Convention on Human Rights to maximise the potential protections for individuals who experience mental ill health.

2566. NIAMH is the longest established and largest mental health charity in Northern Ireland. We provide community-based mental health services through Beacon in every constituency across Northern Ireland. Through Carecall, we provide access to counselling and psychological therapies and mental health and well-being programmes, mainly focused on workplace and educational settings. This presentation is infused with this organisational expertise and examples of the experiences of individual service users who we call members. However, we note that there are many individuals who are not engaged with services. We consider this to be a particularly vulnerable group who must be informed about welfare reform through an effective public information campaign and supported with independent advice and representation.

2567. At the outset, I want to underline that we at NIAMH are committed to a recovery ethos in the services that we provide. We know that individuals do recover their mental health and, with support, can reduce the frequency and severity of relapses. Engagement in meaningful activity, including volunteering, caring, education and training, and employment can be important milestones in the recovery journey. However, this journey is, at its heart, an individual experience and does not always sit easily with a rigid social security system of time-limited benefits, assessments and review procedures and sanctions. We welcome the fact that there is widespread recognition that welfare reform will have specific and significant impacts on persons who experience mental ill health and that there is cross-party support for action to address this. Furthermore, we welcome Minister McCausland's assertion at Second Stage that the first principle of the welfare reform agenda is to "protect the vulnerable".

2568. On behalf of NIAMH, I acknowledge and welcome the valuable changes to the operation of welfare reform that Minister McCausland announced earlier this week. As a member of the Northern Ireland Welfare Reform Group, we at NIAMH welcome progress on those issues that are of common concern.

2569. There is recognition that welfare reform will have a much greater impact on mental health issues in Northern Ireland because of first, the prevalence of mental ill health due to the conflict, and secondly, the severity of mental ill health related to the high levels of post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD). The relationship between mental health and the conflict is illustrated by research into our day support services that reported this year. That research demonstrated that 91% of our members were raised in Northern Ireland, and of that, 36.5% reported some or a lot of political violence in their neighbourhood, and 39.5% reported having personally suffered some or a lot as a result of the conflict. The reported impacts of the conflict included having to move due to intimidation, which affected 16.7%; 10.9% personally experienced damage to their home as the result of a bomb; 7.7% experienced personal injury as a result of cross-community violence; and 19.3% had family or friends injured in cross-community violence.

2570. We consider the relationship between mental health and the conflict to be particularly relevant when looking to the protections that are afforded by the human rights provisions under the Northern Ireland Act 1998. This prevalence of mental ill health is reflected in the significantly higher levels of claims in Northern Ireland for benefits such as DLA. Northern Ireland has double the proportion of its population in receipt of DLA than is the case in Britain, and 23% of DLA recipients in Northern Ireland have mental health issues, compared with 17% in Britain. That profile is reflected in our members' reliance on social security. In our Beacon housing support service, research in 2012 found that 75% of residents were in receipt of DLA. In our Beacon day services, research in 2012 found that 95.8% of members are in receipt of state benefits, including 79% on DLA.

2571. The high rates of mental ill health and the consequent high number of benefit claims are characteristics of contemporary Northern Ireland society. Significant investment in community mental health services, as well as actions to address the broader determinants of mental ill health, may impact those prevalence rates. Nevertheless, welfare reform will not alter the levels of mental ill health or the need for social security for that vulnerable group. However, if not sensitively implemented, there is a risk of removing necessary social protections and consequently destabilising an individual's mental health and stalling or reversing their mental health recovery.

2572. We are seeing such negative impacts already, even in early contact with the changes. For example, a 58-year-old woman who lives in one of our 24-hour supported housing schemes in Belfast received a letter calling her for a work-focused interview, outlining that she would have to attend a series of interviews with a personal adviser. She has a diagnosis of bipolar disorder and complex physical difficulties, including a double mastectomy and chronic obstructive pulmonary disease. She has the propensity to self-harm by scratching at various locations on her body, usually at a low level. After receiving the letter, the frequency and intensity of that self-harm has increased to the point where the wounds are open and sores have developed. Assistance and reassurance from her GP and our service have done little to reduce the impact of simply receiving that letter.

2573. Anticipatory fear of welfare reform has led to acute distress. When I visited one of our day support services in mid-Ulster, as soon as I started to speak about welfare reform, one woman became so distressed and fearful at the thought that I was there to take away her benefits there and then that she had to leave the room and be supported by staff. In contrast, during the same session, another woman asserted: “It is OK, Iris; welfare reform is nothing to do with me. I have asked my social security office over and over if I am OK on DLA, and they said that it is OK — I am on it for life.” That underlines our recommendation that an effective public information campaign needs to be put in place.
2574. Anxiety about welfare reform is causing people to withdraw from activities that support their recovery. The fear of being judged fit for work, despite being mentally unwell, is being felt across our services. Some members have reduced or stopped volunteering and are reluctant to be involved in public activities, such as welcoming the Olympic torch into Enniskillen and participating in a graduation ceremony, ironically for a live-and-learn programme on welfare benefits that the Big Lottery funded and that was run in partnership between NIAMH, CIB and the Open College Network. As well as being concerned about the costs of welfare reform to the individual, our experience to date has highlighted what could be called the hidden costs of welfare reform, which will result in a displacement of expenditure to the mental health sector and the advice sector. Those hidden costs include supporting individuals whose mental health deteriorates, building the capability of mental health staff on welfare benefits and providing evidence for assessments, reviews and appeals, as well as engaging in social security advocacy.

2575. I will illustrate those costs with the example of a 46-year-old man who lives in one of our 24-hour supported housing schemes in Belfast. He has been diagnosed with psychosis and has an acquired brain injury and epilepsy, which are conditions that have significantly impaired his functioning and mental capacity. His mother is his legal guardian and deals with his finances. From October 2011 to September 2012, both our service and the statutory mental health service made representations that he was not fit to attend a work-focused interview. However, no amount of evidence or advocacy over the calendar year could persuade the social security system that he could not participate in an assessment of his capability of work-related activity. At the end of the process, the Beacon housing service’s manager attended the ESA appeal, and the case was settled in our member’s favour.
2576. I want to move on to the specific recommendations in NIAMH’s submission. In the first section, we look at the human rights review of the Bill. We are conscious that there has been debate this week, both in the Assembly and the Committee, on whether to progress a human rights review of the Bill. As the section on human rights includes detailed legal analysis of the issues in the Bill, the relevant provisions under the Northern Ireland Act and the contextual international framework, I will limit myself to the following remarks.

2577. We concur with Minister McCausland that the first principle of welfare reform must be to protect the vulnerable. We have asked ourselves how we can make that principle a reality. What resources are available to us to safeguard individuals who experience mental ill health? We have referred to the high levels of mental ill health in Northern Ireland and said that they are the legacy of the conflict. The Northern Ireland Act and its human rights provisions represent a consensus by political leaders to address the legacy of the conflict. Traditionally, human rights have focused on civil and political rights in Northern Ireland. However, welfare reform reorientates us to look at the protections that are afforded under socio-economic rights and the obligations of the state, particularly under article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights regarding the right to respect for private and family life.
2578. To clarify the meaning of article 8 protections for persons who experience mental ill health, we note the judgement of the European Court of Human Rights in the case of Bensaid v. UK in 2001, which stated:
- “Mental health must also be regarded as a crucial part of private life associated with the aspect of moral integrity. Article 8 protects a right to identity and personal development, and the right to establish and develop relationships with other human beings and the outside world. The preservation of mental stability is in that context an indispensable precondition to effective enjoyment of the right to respect for private life.”*
2579. Mental ill health is experienced by all sections of our society, and we at NIAMH believe that mental ill health creates a shared space in which we can meet to discuss the conflict and its impacts.
2580. In realising the Executive’s commitments to the Delivering Social Change agenda, we think that there is a need for all Government Departments to issue legislation that progressively realises the human rights of persons with disabilities, including persons who experience mental ill health. Clearly, that includes the Department for Social Development (DSD) and the Welfare Reform Bill.
2581. We note that the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister (OFMDFM) has consulted on, and is expected to produce, a disability strategy and action plan this year that will progress the implementation of the UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities in line with UK obligations. Our note of caution is that we consider it challenging, if not impossible, to understand the full outworking of the legislation and its potential impacts on human rights without the timely publication of the secondary legislation and draft regulations.
2582. The second section of our submission deal with amendments to the Welfare Reform Bill. I will speak together to those subsections that cover evidence, sanctions and advice and representation. I aim to simply highlight that those sections in our submission have common themes.
2583. The first theme is the statutory requirement to ensure that the cases of persons who experience mental health are considered on the best available independent mental health evidence and that the statutory right to access independent advice and representation is available at all stages, including the sanctions stage. Those recommendations are informed by our experience of the introduction of the employment and support allowance, particularly the lack of mental health expertise among assessors, decision-makers and appeals personnel; the failure to proactively seek independent mental health evidence in a timely manner; the focus on mental health evidence that is provided by generic medical professionals rather than mental health professionals or service providers with an established relationship with the individual; the success at appeal stage of overturning decisions based on assessment when there is appropriate evidence and representation; and the human and financial costs of the above inefficiencies in the welfare reform

- system and the distress and delay that they cause.
2584. We have identified where we think those issues could be addressed in specific sections of the legislation, and they cross-cut a number of different sections. We have tried not to be too repetitive but to highlight where they are.
2585. We are seeking the removal of the time limit of 365 days for the contributory ESA work-related activity group. In agreement with the debate in the House of Lords, which we cite in our submission, we consider that time limit to be arbitrary, unfair, stressful and without an evidence base. It is contrary to the ethos of supporting an individual to recover their mental health. For fluctuating conditions, it is unfair to require an individual to recover within a one-year period and to not make provision for them to requalify through the WRAG or, indeed, the support group, should their mental health deteriorate. We are very concerned that the time limit will prematurely move individuals out of a necessary benefit that they have contributed to.
2586. Our view is that the arbitrary rotating assessment period for PIP and the requirement of the so-called perspective test, whereby an individual is consistently unwell three months prior to and nine months after the assessment, do not reflect the fluctuating character of mental ill health and work against an individual's attempt to stabilise and recover their mental health. Our knowledge of the potentially distressing experience of assessment, decision-making and appeals under the employment and support allowance causes us to be concerned about the impact of having to be in a perpetual cycle with those procedures. That is why we are strongly recommending a discretionary provision on the level of the disability in the test and the frequency of review.
2587. In conclusion, we are asking the Committee to consider our overarching concern about the Bill and to progress a human rights review of it and the draft regulations. We ask the Committee to consider our five section-specific amendments on evidence, sanctions, independent advice and representation, the contributory ESA WRAG group, and the PIP assessment and review.
2588. Beyond those specific legislative changes, we note that we raised a number of process issues about the implementation of the legislation, which we asked the Committee to consider. Those were: publishing the draft regulations, as well as their passage by affirmative resolution; resourcing an effective public information campaign for vulnerable groups; acting to address concerns about the digital-by-default approach; showing leadership as political representatives by the use of non-stigmatising language; and considering how procurement can be monitored and reviewed on an ongoing basis.
2589. We appreciate that all parties are concerned that we are short of the time that will allow us to progress welfare reform legislation and that there are well-rehearsed consequences if we do not do so. However, time needs to be made to ensure that all opportunities are maximised to protect vulnerable groups in keeping with the first principle of welfare reform, as articulated by Minister McCausland.
2590. Finally, we think that it would be valuable to consider the establishment of an expert group to provide advice on mental health and welfare reform.
2591. Thank you again for this opportunity to contribute to the Committee's scrutiny of the legislation. We hope that our evidence is useful and that we can continue to be a resource to you and your work.
2592. The Chairperson: OK, Iris. Thank you very much for that comprehensive contribution that you made in addition to your written submission.
2593. Mr Brady: Thanks very much for a very comprehensive submission, Iris. I have a couple of points to make. You made a lot of very good points, but there is one in particular that I can empathise with. It is about the misunderstanding in the social security system that an individual's GP and mental health team are the best qualified to give evidence. As you say, if a person's condition has stabilised but fluctuates from day to day, people in the voluntary sector, such as you, may be in a better position to help them. The other thing is that independent advice from the voluntary sector should be a mandatory inclusion. That is very important.

2594. Back in 2007, when the initial stages of welfare reform were coming through, particularly work capability assessments and job-focused interviews, we argued that an interview with someone who has mental health issues should be done by a specialist in that area, whether that is a psychiatrist, a clinical psychologist or a community psychiatric nurse. We were told at that time that staff would get training, but that has never materialised.
2595. If a client claims universal credit, both parties involved have to sign the claimant commitment. If there is a mental health issue and one person refuses to sign the commitment, the couple and their family might be prevented from getting benefit, certainly in the initial stages, until that is clarified. Another issue is with people attending interviews. You said that there should be a specialist advocate for mental health. I know that an autism champion is supposed to be attached to each office, which seems sensible. Although you may have an advocate with a specialism, I think that it is incumbent on the Department to ensure that the person on the other side of the counter has some specialist knowledge, particularly concerning conditions like bipolar disorder or chronic clinical depression. Somebody with bipolar disorder might be fine today but not for the next month. So, it is about trying to pick that out and aggregating the person's condition over time.
2596. The other point is the one-year time limit for ESA and people's being reassessed if their condition worsens and they go back on to that benefit. If I may discuss good practice in the South, many years ago, if someone had mental health problems and went off benefit, they were given three years to find out whether they had stabilised or whether they could carry on with work. If they came back within three years, they went back on the same level of benefit. Here, that applied for only one year or slightly less. So, that example from the South is a demonstration of good practice that could maybe be looked at.

2597. A lot of universal credit is predicated on the notion that people will be going online and so forth. In the section of your submission entitled 'Digital by Default', you said that you have done assessments that indicate that the vast majority of people who use your centres do not have access to computers or the internet. That highlights the reason to have staff in local offices in particular, and, of course, for the specialist advocate being included even more in that kind of legislation. I wonder what your thoughts are on that.
2598. The other point to consider is permitted work, which used to be the therapeutic alliance. We are not sure how that is going to work. That provision was particularly for people with mental health problems whose doctor felt that it would be beneficial. They were not working in the normal sense, but it would be beneficial to get them out of the house and to be involved. It really concerned their gradual rehabilitation from their condition. Has any information been forthcoming to you about that kind of situation? I am sorry to bombard you.
2599. Ms I Elliott: I would expect nothing else from somebody who used to be an advice worker. Thank you very much for your really informed comments and questions. I will try to work through a few of them. Our submission is based on the reality that some form of welfare reform legislation is going to pass. That is why we have tried to identify very specific actions that the Committee could recommend, across the entire the legislation, protective mechanisms for people who have mental health difficulties. That is also the reason that we are particularly focusing on the whole area of independent advice and representation. Part of that is predicated on the fact that we have very good relationships with independent advice organisations. We feel that they have been crucial for the staff and users of our services in understanding how to negotiate the welfare reform system. Evidence indicates that, when people have representation, they have much higher levels of success in receiving benefits or winning appeals. One of the strongest characteristics of mental ill health is that you feel very alone and isolated. I always think that it is very important for people with mental health difficulties to have somebody on that welfare reform journey with them. That is why we emphasise that people not only in our services but outside services completely need somebody to be with them on the journey through welfare reform.

2600. A number of the points that you identified are issues for regulations. I am sure that we are not the only organisation to say that we are very concerned that we do not have draft regulations. The intention to pass the regulations by negative resolution, rather than having the scope through affirmative resolution for some scrutiny, is a huge source of concern for us, because we feel that a lot of the detail is in the regulations.
2601. You mentioned a written basis for assessment. We would like good clarity in the regulations about how we can move people who have significant mental health difficulties, long-established relationships with services and a very good evidence base for their condition, needs and vulnerability into a paper scrutiny of their application and review. We have certainly had evidence of a distressing, lengthy detrimental process of face-to-face encounters. We have instances, for example, in some of our east Belfast services, of people who have made the transition from incapacity benefit to ESA with absolutely no difficulty whatsoever. The written evidence has been taken and respected, and there has actually been almost no difficulty with that. I can compare that with one of the services that I described in south Belfast, where we had a year of social security advocacy on such a transition. Looking at how the written evidence can be used could be really valuable for people with a mental health difficulty. Again, however, this is about the regulations.

2602. We have also raised with colleagues in the Civil Service the detailed design of PIP and ESA and why it is not possible for people who have expertise in mental health to undertake the assessments and the decision-making by looking at what is presented to them. It should also be possible for the people who are making decisions to know, through their expertise, that we need to go after further evidence from services, including the voluntary sector. We are repeatedly being told that that is too difficult. I spoke about this earlier, but, given the statistics about the prevalence of mental health issues in Northern Ireland, we simply do not understand why it is not possible to identify claimants who, for example, are moving from DLA to PIP and who have mental health difficulties, to book them in for assessment and to have mental health experts available. There are examples of members of our services who have got into a great state of distress anticipating having to attend for assessment, and they have then turned up at the ESA assessment centre to be told that it does not have the expertise to see them and that they will have to be given another appointment. I see members nodding their heads at that, and I know that that is the sort of issue that is also coming through in constituency work.
2603. I do not really have information about permitted work. I think that that is something that really needs to be part of the public information campaign. One of the reasons why we have difficulty with people withdrawing from voluntary activity, any kind of public activity or some forms of part-time work is because they are so terrified at this stage that, if they are seen to be functioning in any way, their benefits will - be taken off them. So, it would be really helpful to have that clarified.

2604. Mr Brady: I have two points to finish on. We argue that medical evidence should have primacy, but it has to be relevant to the person's condition and demonstrate the most up-to-date position on both their mental and physical health. Quite rightly, the medical evidence is often available only at tribunals. It would save all that hassle and trauma, particularly for people with mental health issues, if that relevant information were readily available. They should not have to go through all that, because decisions could be made. As you rightly say, they should be made by someone who has specialist knowledge.
2605. The other point that I will make is that you rightly ask MLAs not to use language that stigmatises people or that might be inflammatory towards people, particularly those with mental health issues. However, quite large sections of the media are already doing that on the whole issue of welfare reform. I think that, in fairness, we are aware that we should not, but, unfortunately, quite large sections of the media have been instrumental in stigmatising people already. That applies not just to people with mental health problems but to those on benefit in general.
2606. Mr Copeland: Iris, I should probably declare an interest. I think that my wife, Sonia, has attended a number of training courses in the WAVE trauma centre over the past couple of years. I think that I picked her up at one.
2607. In my experience, mental health conditions are conditions that are generally diagnosed by the apparent behaviour of the constituent. In many cases, more than one thing is present. The most complex case that I have is a cocktail of conditions, some of which is diagnosed and some of which is suspected, including schizophrenia, bipolar disorder, attention deficit disorder (ADD), attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD), personality disorder, mild-spectrum autism and low-end learning difficulties. In your professional view, is it possible that one doctor, one individual or one healthcare professional could be so competent that they could pass a judgement on the basis of the planned test on that person's ability to function in the real world?
2608. Ms I Elliott: That is a very good question. There is a very real challenge for individuals who present with a complex range of issues.
2609. Mr Copeland: Is that the norm? It is the norm that I see, in that there seems to be more than two or three issues. However, it is perhaps just an interpretation of symptoms; I do not know.
2610. Ms I Elliott: There is a huge variety of presentations or issues in the field of mental health. I am sure that our colleagues in Mencap would say that some people have what is called a dual diagnosis of both an intellectual disability and a mental health condition. I think that it is very challenging for someone to have the ability to assess somebody with that degree of complexity of need. I think that that goes to the need for people to have somebody with them who can advocate and support them, to ensure that the information is as complete as possible and to bring any written evidence to that initial assessment.
2611. One thing that I will stress is that we are trying to move away from the assessment of an individual as a series of medical diagnoses or conditions to looking at how the person presenting is able to participate in the world. Although somebody may have a number of complex conditions, it is more about how their skills in everyday living are affected and what support they require from the social security system to enable them to participate in society. If you take the case that you used from your constituency work, you will see that that might concern a series of issues about a person's ability to communicate. Now, that might be sourced in a number of medical diagnoses, but there might be more to look at, such as the person's ability to communicate, their ability to look after themselves and their ability to eat or to attend to personal hygiene,

- for example, as well as their ability to participate in social relationships and to engage in employment and education. That would be very much in keeping with the human rights approach that is advocated in the UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, through which we are trying to move away from a medical approach to understanding people's disability to looking at a social model of disability that concerns people's ability to participate in society. It is challenging, but that is all the more reason to have people who have some degree of competence in that field, rather than to have somebody who is a general nurse or doctor.
2612. Mr Douglas: Thank you for your presentation, Iris. There was a hugely successful event in the Long Gallery earlier this week, where we all had our photos up on the wall. That was a good opportunity to raise the profile of the problems and the stigma that we talked about.
2613. Your briefing mentions Beacon day services research. My family has been involved with Beacon and had an excellent response. It was very helpful. You said that, in 2012, nearly 96% of the members of those day services were in receipt of benefits. So, we are talking about a huge number of people who are in receipt of benefit and have mental health problems who use your centres. Over the past few hours, we have been talking about sanctions from the Housing Executive, which will have to evict people who do not pay. We also talked about sanctions that will have an impact on the likes of young people, which the members who spoke previously discussed, and children in a household where there will be sanctions. What will the impact on your members be? I am thinking of people who have acute depression who some mornings just cannot get out of bed, or other people who have agoraphobia and cannot go out. What will be the impact of the new welfare reforms on your members?
2614. Ms I Elliott: To return to my comments about this almost anticipatory fear that people are experiencing, we are already seeing that happening through their becoming quite distressed and unwell.
2615. It is useful to use the analogy of the Beacon centre, because the assessments seem to be coming in waves. So, if one or two people experience, for example, the changeover from incapacity benefit to ESA, it then goes like a wave around our services. When I visited some services, people were relatively calm because they had not experienced the assessment. However, among staff where it had happened, there were high levels of upset and concern.
2616. We are trying to approach this issue by really thinking through the kind of information that we need to give to people, so that they will understand the changes that are happening, what the process will look like, and how we can support them in it. It is going to be important that people are as informed and assured as possible. Likewise, staff must be supportive, but there must also be support from the peer group.
2617. We gave detailed figures about our services because welfare reform will affect our members. They comprise the group that this issue will massively impact, and you can see that from their 90%-plus reliance on state benefits. There will be a range of different impacts that will cause fear and distress. We have a lot of experience of people who have gone through the assessment process. A man in our south Belfast service described it as losing a year and a half of his life. He went through a distressing assessment process embodying all the things that people talk about — somebody rushing through the assessment on a computer, not making eye contact, not giving him time to talk and not explaining what they meant. Subsequently, he got zero points and then had a long and very anxious wait for his appeal. Although people were supportive, he found the appeal hearing very distressing again. He was then brought back to full points. He said to me that that year and a half finished a couple of weeks before Christmas, and he just took a deep breath. Then, a - couple of weeks later, he got called for his DLA review, and he is now back into the same process again.

2618. So, we are seeing people's mental health deteriorating. We are finding that they are destabilising and are not engaging in the activities necessary for their recovery.
2619. My role is to lobby for changes. Locally, mental health services are trying to create supports and information for people to try to assist them. That takes me back to why we think that it is really important that people have independent advice and representation, which, at some level, will balance things. We say that particularly in respect of sanctions, because you can see that the language in the legislation is very much about people not engaging with the various procedures under the benefits system, "without reasonable cause", or "voluntarily" deciding that they are not going to "engage". Somebody with a serious mental health problem will not be doing that "without reasonable cause" or choosing to do that "voluntarily". They may not even understand what they have been called to engage with. They are very unwell. Depression is a good example. Somebody with depression may not even open their post for months at a time, and, because of the sanctions, they can quite rapidly go through losing benefits for three months or six months and then longer.
2620. I know that the provision of independent advice and representation will need investment, but I think that it is how we will have early intervention, so that things do not get a lot worse.
2621. Mr F McCann: I have a couple of questions, the first of which I have posed to a number of witnesses. Your presentation was comprehensive and the information in it was great. It is one of the first submissions that we have received that lays down some amendments that could be proposed, which is helpful.
2622. I asked the Children's Commissioner whether, given the obvious impact that this will have on tens of thousands of people, and certainly on those suffering from mental health problems, whether consideration has been given to taking legal action against the DWP or the DSD to try and force changes in some aspects of the Bill?
2623. I think that we discussed three amendments with the Human Rights Commission; and the Equality Commission is due here next week. We tried to set up an ad hoc Committee to look at the human rights implications and the same with equality, but it was defeated on both occasions. Have you considered taking legal action or bringing in the Human Rights Commission to advise you on the best way to proceed? Obviously, it is not happy that all this has been fulfilled.
2624. I said this morning that I am also a member of the Committee for Employment and Learning. I asked senior people a question at that Committee's meeting yesterday. When this process starts to take shape, thousands of people will be migrated into one of their work focus groups. Will those groups be able to cope with that? Does DEL have staff with the experience to deal with people who have mental health issues? They were shocked at first, but they then came out with the obvious departmental answer and said: "We believe that we will be able to cope with it." I do not know whether a discussion has taken place between the two Departments, but I do not think that they realise what is coming. The other question is about the role of the decision-makers and client advisers who are dealing with people with mental health issues. What level of training will they get to allow them to make a decision that affects people with mental health problems?
2625. Ms I Elliott: Thanks for your question. Your first question was about whether we had considered taking legal action. Now that the welfare reform legislation is in operation in Britain, there have been decisions to take judicial review based on different cases. We are looking at those cases with interest.

2626. Our decision to include a whole section in our submission on legal analysis was very much to look at where we can provide advice, through evidence, to suggest where we think the Government are vulnerable if the legislation passes without specific changes due to the obligations under the 1998 Act and the requirements for legislation to comply with the ECHR. That is why we flagged those issues.
2627. We will look at the legislation we get on the other side of all the debates and, in particular, the regulations. At the moment, we are taking that position to try to provide the best available information, including a legal analysis, to colleagues in the Assembly and in Departments, but noting that judicial reviews have been taken in other parts of the UK because of the welfare reform legislation. Our submission highlights the types of cases that we are already seeing in our services. We will look at different strategies, but we prefer to have some earlier intervention to stop those difficulties at an early stage.
2628. You asked about cross-departmental discussion and work. Part of our earlier briefing concerned the need for other Committees, not only the Social Development Committee, and the Assembly to be aware of welfare reform. We talked about the displaced expenditure issue and the impact on people's mental health. We think that it should be a concern for the Health Committee as to whether it is anticipating the impact that welfare reform will have on health services.
2629. DEL is another good example, and some of the consultation documents on the new employment programme, Steps 2 Success, name welfare reform as an issue whose impact needs to be anticipated. In our submission to DEL on Steps 2 Success and in meetings with colleagues in the Department, we have been raising that issue. People will be coming through, particularly, ESA and into a work-related activity group and moving on to jobseeker's allowance quite quickly — prematurely, in our view — and they may not be able to engage in the existing programmes.
2630. Our beacon members need something akin to a pre-work programme, because they do not even have the social skills, work skills, communication skills or interpersonal skills to manage being in employment. That is an important area for consideration.
2631. In our presentation, we mentioned the Government's Delivering Social Change agenda. We see welfare reform as one of the cross-cutting issues, about which all Departments need to consider how they are going to prepare.
2632. Going back to Mickey's point about training for the decision-makers who will sit with the papers on the other side of the counter and make the decisions, there is a real need for training in mental health across the social security system. With welfare reform, in particular, we are going to push people into certain parts of the social security system where they have never been before. Colleagues who work in the Social Security Agency are now engaging with people with significant mental health problems. They will never have done that before and they really need some training and support around that.
2633. Mr F McCann: One of the things that we were told when we raised this question is that the Department is taking advice from groups in the mental health sector and others. Have you been approached to provide advice or training to any of the decision-makers?
2634. Ms I Elliott: We have offered. We are meeting with the DSD in the next few weeks to try to have a detailed conversation about welfare reform, the issues of training, the step-by-step customer journey and where we feel there needs to be mitigating activities, training and capacity-building for staff who will administer the system.
2635. One of the difficulties for us is that some of the work will be done by people employed in the public sector and some will be done by private contractors. We raised this issue with colleagues

- in the Social Security Agency when we discussed the need for training for staff. The sense that we have been given about the public procurement contracts is that those workers cannot be required to engage in mental health training. That is a real issue. We have raised the issue about procurement, but what is actually in those procurement contracts about the competence of people who will operate welfare reform?
2636. Mr F McCann: I have one last comment on sanctions. I listened to a programme this morning in which residents from a village in north Wales told of their experiences in dealing with the system. One of the things they discussed were the sanctions. You are right. What happened was that people, who did not know they were under a sanction, took the short sanction on the chin and walked away. Most of it was because, as far as the Department there was concerned, they had not fulfilled the requirements of seeking work.
2637. Mr Brady: I have two points. I sit on the Health Committee, and you are right: there are so many overarching issues and they have to be raised with the Minister.
2638. The other thing that we sometimes forget — it does not apply to these cosmopolitan Belfast and Derry MLAs — but in my constituency —
2639. Mr F McCann: Mickey's constituency is semi-rural.
2640. Mr Brady: According to Fra, 30% of West Belfast is rural —
2641. Mr F McCann: It is 27%.
2642. Mr Brady: In my constituency, we have a big rural hinterland. My experience in the advice sector is that mental health issues are an even bigger stigma for a lot of people who live in rural areas. I have represented people in tribunals who, had they sought specialist mental health treatment, would probably not have had to go through what they did. They felt that if their neighbours knew they were getting that kind of treatment they would think that they were completely mad and all of that. Sometimes that is forgotten.
2643. You confirmed that we have a higher rate of mental health issues compared to Britain. However, we also have quite large numbers of people with those issues in rural areas. They are not always picked up on and they do not always go for the required treatment. Sometimes they will acquiesce to the system and get help. I think that this is sometimes forgotten.
2644. In my experience in the advice sector, from 1997 to 2007, the number of young people who presented with mental health problems, in particular, just got larger and larger. Some of them were as young as 16, and they had really severe clinical or reactive depression and all sorts of other things. In rural areas, they do not necessarily always look for the help, and their parents do not always seek that kind of health because of the nature of the illness.
2645. Ms I Elliott: Your comments really highlight the need for the Health Committee or the health sector to look at the impact of welfare reform. Some of the issues you raise are about rural mental health and people feeling stigmatised and being isolated.
2646. Looking at the Transforming Your Care agenda, I think that the other issue is that mental health services are not often appropriate for rural areas. One of the things that NIAMH wants to do is to develop what we call services without walls, so that rather than requiring people to come into a centre in a town or city, we will provide what we call floating support and support people in their local areas or in their homes.
2647. There is a real concern for us about those who are not in mental health services. That probably includes a lot of people in rural areas, or, as you say, younger people, who do not feel that the services that are provided are appropriate for their age group.
2648. Mr Brady: You are right about the services without walls. I have gone to meetings with the trust in the mental health department of Daisy Hill Hospital, because there is an administration department upstairs. As you walk through the waiting area, people who know you try to avoid eye contact. They are there with family members or for treatment. They do not want people who know them to see them. That needs to be addressed.

2649. Ms I Elliott: Absolutely.

2650. Mr Brady: There are areas that deal specifically with mental health. People know about those and, sometimes, the stigma is reinforced.

2651. The Chairperson: OK. Members, thank you. Iris, you are obviously happy with the session this afternoon. You have provided us with written material and spoke, as members said, quite comprehensively. Thank you for that, and for your help and support to the Committee in its deliberations.

2652. Just to make you aware, the Bill is in Committee Stage, and the Committee is due to report on 27 November. Thank you once again for providing us with a lot of food for thought and very specific and direct information that will help us.

2653. The Chairperson: We will now have a briefing from the Commissioner for Children and Young People. With us are Patricia Lewsley-Mooney, Colette McIlvanna and Dr Goretti Horgan. You are very welcome. We appreciate the fact that you have, once again, taken the time out to come and brief the Committee. You have presented a paper, which is in members' packs. The Floor is yours.

2654. Mrs Patricia Lewsley-Mooney (Northern Ireland Commissioner for Children and Young People): I thank the Committee for the opportunity to come before you and present our evidence on the Welfare Reform Bill. I want to introduce Dr Goretti Horgan from the University of Ulster and Colette McIlvanna, who is part of my legal and casework team. I will give a brief presentation and then take any question members might like to ask.

2655. As you will be aware, under the legislation set out by the Assembly that created my office, I have a duty to keep under review the adequacy and effectiveness of law practice and services relating to the rights and best interests of children and young people. In determining how to carry out the functions of my office, my paramount consideration is the rights of the child. It is my duty to remind the Assembly of its commitment to the United Nation Convention on the Rights of the Child, or the UNCRC as we commonly know it.

2656. Any reform to the welfare system is recognised as having a particular impact on the lives of children and young people. The Welfare Reform Bill is accepted as having the furthest reaching consequences for children and young people. Children's rights should be considered at an early stage to ensure that they are embedded in policy and legislation. The UNCRC should be the starting point when considering any law, policy or decision in determining the impact on children's rights. It is with that in mind that I have called for the Bill and the subsequent regulations that will hold the detail of the practical application of the Bill, to be scrutinised against the standards set out in the UNCRC. I will renew that call to the Committee later in my presentation.

2657. You will have seen my written briefing to the Committee along with the evidence in my two reports on welfare reform, which assess its impact on children and the question of parity. I listened with great interest to the Minister's statement to the House on Monday, and I want to begin by welcoming four significant aspects of his statement.

2658. First, the issue of the regularity and timing of payments to families has been of concern to me and others who work with and support families. I welcome the confirmation from the Minister that he has negotiated a concession to allow for operational flexibility on that issue, which will allow the IT systems

- to be developed to split a payment for a family into two smaller payments, rather than the single full monthly payment. That will, no doubt, assist vulnerable claimants who find budgeting difficult, and it will, in turn, benefit the children in their families.
2659. Although I welcome that, I am concerned that the Minister has asked his officials to develop a set of guidelines for determining the circumstances when a universal credit payment should be made on a twice-monthly basis and consult with public and voluntary sector representatives. I believe that the choice of payment options should lie with the claimant, who should be able to choose whether to accept the default position of a monthly payment or opt into the option of having fortnightly payments, without having to meet any additional set criteria. I believe that that will protect the most vulnerable claimants and their children. To require them to meet a set of criteria when there is no risk to parity on the issue simply complicates the matter unnecessarily and could serve to stigmatise claimants further.
2660. Secondly, I welcome the Minister's confirmation that he has negotiated flexibility regarding who in the family can receive the benefit. The original proposal was that the universal credit would be paid to the main claimant, which, in most households, is likely to be the male and which could have resulted in a breach of children's rights under the UNCRC. Research has shown that when money goes directly to the mother, it is more likely to be spent on children than when it goes to the father. Therefore, I ask that, when the Minister is looking at the implementation of that operational flexibility, he makes sure that the child element of the benefit is paid directly to the primary carer of the children. I believe that that will better serve the rights and lives of children.
2661. Thirdly, I welcome the flexibility on direct payments to landlords. The issue of changes in the housing elements of benefits has the potential to have a vast impact on the lives of children. The issues of segregated housing in Northern Ireland, the definition and application of the rules on underoccupancy and the impact of the new rules on children with disabilities cannot be underestimated.
2662. Along with the Children's Commissioners in the other UK jurisdictions, I met with Lord Freud in September and he told us of the research he was conducting into the Northern Ireland housing situation. I note that Lord Freud will visit Northern Ireland in November. We have written to ask whether we can meet him when he is here to raise that issue and the other matters I raised with him in September.
2663. Finally, the Minister confirmed that the implementation date for universal credit will be April 2014, which is six months after the implementation in the rest of GB. Hopefully, that will mean that Northern Ireland can benefit from lessons learned in other jurisdictions as they roll out welfare reform in October 2013. That is, again, to be welcomed.
2664. However, notwithstanding those concessions, a lot of work remains to be done to ensure that the Bill meets the standards outlined in the UN Convention. The issue of the benefit cap and the impact that will have on larger families remains. It has been remarked that I have raised a warning that the benefit cap will be like social engineering and will force families to have fewer children. I was, in fact, warning that the benefit cap will punish larger families. In addition, as Members know all too well, a lack of childcare infrastructure in Northern Ireland also hampers our families in seeking work or increasing their hours of work. Childcare provision here is among the lowest in Europe.
2665. The proposed conditions and sanctions have the capacity to cause breaches of children's rights. Even with the Westminster commitment to continue to pay the child element of benefits to sanctioned parents, that does not go far enough to protect the rights and best interests of children in sanctioned families, as the removal of any income - from a household budget will have an severe impact on the children living in it.

2666. The social fund and the availability of crisis funding for families has long been a mechanism that has assisted families in urgent hardship. If the social fund is not replaced by a ring-fenced alternative that is protected in the Northern Ireland Budget as an emergency fund for families, I feel that it will result in a failure to provide the best interests of a child in accordance with article 3 of the UNCRC. It is also likely to result in a breach of other articles, including the right to enjoy the highest attainable standard of health under article 24.
2667. I am deeply concerned that, in the proposals, claimants who seek emergency funding and who have a certain level of debt or rental arrears will be refused assistance. It is the families that are already at breaking point who will be most in need of emergency crisis funding. Therefore, I call on the Assembly and the Committee to make sure that enough money is allocated to meet the basic material needs of children, and that the money that is available for crisis funding is ring-fenced and not made conditional on the solvency of the claimant.
2668. I also want to advise the Committee of the many potential problems that I and others foresee for children with disabilities as a result of the change from disability living allowance (DLA) to personal independence payments (PIPs). Due to the high rates of disability and ill-health in Northern Ireland, many children may suffer from a decrease in their family's income due to the changes.
2669. As you may be aware, my remit extends to young people up to the age of 21 who are disabled. Around 5,000 of those young people aged between 16 and 20 currently receive DLA. The mobility element of DLA, in particular, is vital for the additional transport costs of many of these disabled young people. So, this could result in the reduction of a young person's independence, if changes as currently envisaged are implemented.
2670. The rights of disabled children or the children of disabled parents are under threat. The Assembly and the Committee, through scrutiny of the Bill and the regulations, has the power to protect the rights of those children and young people under a varying number of articles, which are set out in the submission that you have already received. I call on you to make sure that those rights are respected.
2671. I previously called for the setting up of an expert group to examine the work capability assessments (WCA) being carried out in regard to the new assessments for PIPs. We suggest that that expert group should include psychiatrists who work with people with post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) due to the legacy of the conflict, as well as paediatricians and other experts in childhood disability.
2672. Through my engagement with other agencies and families, I have heard concerns about the transition from DLA to PIP, and I am aware that there is concern that recipients of DLA are not aware that they will, in fact, have to apply for PIP, as it is a new benefit and will not automatically be an opportunity for transition to the new system.
2673. Further concerns have been expressed about the procedure that will ensure claimants are invited to apply for PIP and the associated time frames for applications. Clearly, the advice sector in Northern Ireland, along with MLAs' constituency clinics, will feel the effects of that, with an increase in claimants needing assistance. We understand that some MLAs have already reported that their constituency offices have been inundated for advice. I call for funding to be made available to the advice sector to meet this need. Perhaps many members around this table may wish to seek training for their constituency staff as the effects of welfare reform bite.
2674. The regulations that will follow the Bill will shed further light on how it will impact on children and young people. I urge the Assembly and the Committee to make sure that the Bill complies with

- children's rights and that the regulations are scrutinised against the standards set out in the UNCRC. It is not enough for the Bill and the regulations to be human rights-compliant, they must be UNCRC-proofed too in order to uphold the rights of some of the most vulnerable members of our society.
2675. I acknowledge that in all reform there are, to put it bluntly, winners and losers. I fear that the real losers will be the most vulnerable in our society. So, when you sit in your constituency offices tomorrow, I hope that you will pause for a moment and reflect on how the Welfare Reform Bill, in its current state, will hit the most vulnerable of your constituents and, most importantly, their children.
2676. The Chairperson: Thank you very much for that. As you said, members already have your written submission.
2677. Mr Brady: Thanks very much for the presentation. I have to say that I have been pausing and reflecting since 2007, when the initial stages of welfare reform were introduced and, it has to be said, given accelerated passage, because of threats that people's benefits would be stopped. That is a point worth making.
2678. In relation to children, nothing in this so-called welfare reform legislation will really be of any benefit to families. I have a couple of issues. First, for tax credits, the disability premium for a child will be halved from £58 to approximately £27. The rationale for that is that it will be spread wider. Surely that means that they are taking away from the most needy and vulnerable.
2679. There are a couple of other things. ESA for young people is important, given that severe disablement allowance has been abolished. It was targeted at young people who would never be able to work in the normal sense. In my experience, most of those people have learning disabilities or other disabilities. They are now going to be sucked into this "employment pool" — I say that because there are no jobs. Young people are already being exploited in my constituency, where some stores get them in on schemes — one particular place has eight — and people who work there are going part-time or are being let go. That has to be considered as well, but I am sure that you do not need me to tell you about it.
2680. I want to talk about lone parents and childcare issues. You are quite right; about 12 years ago, when I was involved in welfare rights in my constituency, a survey indicated that Newry and Mourne had the worst childcare provision in western Europe as regards registered childminders. I know that this is a complex issue, but have you thought about addressing the issue of the childcare element and registered childminders? Historically, children would have been looked after by members of the extended family, but if members register as childminders they have to take other children on board. Have you thought about that aspect of it?
2681. I know that there are social services and child protection issues involved, but there is no reason why a granny or a sister cannot go through the protection of children and vulnerable adults (POCVA) check or whatever. I have not heard that being addressed, I have to say.
2682. The other issue is to do with the availability of childcare for a lone parent with a one-year-old. We were told before that — it happened initially and then did not happen afterwards — that lone parents would not be sanctioned because of the lack of childcare. That was my experience in the constituency office. However, what happens if such sanctions are put in place.
2683. There is another issue around universal credit and looking for work — the job search. Apparently, you have to be looking for a job for 35 hours a week. That is the equivalent of working full-time. You would nearly want to get paid for looking for a job, considering the time involved. I am not being facetious when I say this. It is crazy.
2684. In your report, you mentioned the issue of raising the hours of childcare

- provision from 16 to 24. The other thing that will impact on children is the ESA contributory for one year, at the end of which, if your partner is working and there is no income-based ESA, children in that family will be affected, because, apparently, it is all going to be subsumed into universal credit. You go in at one end really badly off and, apparently, you come out the other end in great shape. No one has been able to explain the mechanics of that.
2685. I wonder what your thoughts are.
2686. Mrs Lewsley-Mooney: There are quite a few things there, and I would like the others to come in on them, too. Perhaps I will start with the childcare issues.
2687. We have been raising that issue for a long time. First, neither the Assembly nor the Executive have produced a childcare strategy, which is a great need. We do not have the childcare infrastructure here, and that is one of the issues that I raised with Lord Freud when I met him in September. I have had conversations with the Minister and his advisers have told me that he is going to provide 70% of childcare costs. That has dropped from 80% for a start. That is OK; he can give 100% of the costs, but if there is no provision in the area how do they deal with that?
2688. For me, the issue of the ability of an extended family to facilitate that centres particularly on women who are in part-time employment and who rely specifically on family members to mind their children for that 16 hours. What will happen here is that they are now going to have to find an extra eight hours' work. That is eight hours' of childcare that they are going to have to find. Very often, the person who is minding the children is on benefit. If that person now is going to be in a position where they are going to have to find employment, the person who is working part-time is going to be hit twice. There needs to be a huge recognition of that.
2689. I know that there are some Department for Employment and Learning (DEL) training programmes that will allow family members to provide the childcare for that short space of time without it affecting benefit or otherwise. That needs to be looked at, and we need to know whether it can be extended.
2690. There are issues concerning disabled young people in particular. Some families will lose up to £1,400 a year or more. I ask the Committee to look at the cost benefit analysis of that. If such families lose £1,400 a year out of their budget, with a child who is disabled, what is the impact of that on the child's need for further help and support through health and social services, doctor's appointments, medication and all that, never mind the stress that it is going to put on the parents.
2691. Mr Brady: Displaced cost is one issue that we mentioned. It is not just a loss to the family; it is a loss to our local economy. People spend benefit where they live. We need to address that.
2692. Mrs Lewsley-Mooney: Goretto will talk about ESA or universal credit.
2693. Ms Goretto Horgan (University of Ulster): It is important for the Committee to emphasise to the rest of the Assembly the extent to which all those things are linked. You made a point about the contribution-based ESA and the fact that it will be limited to a year. That means that some families will lose £100 a week almost overnight, and that will be people who very often have paid national insurance contributions for decades. Some will be grandparents, because an overwhelming number tend to be in the older age group. Those same grandparents may be helping with childcare for their daughters or sons who live somewhere nearby in an underoccupied house, and they are getting moved out. We talk about lone parents but an awful lot of married young parents depend on their parents for childcare given how little childcare there is across the region.
2694. So, all of those things interact, and the question of displaced costs, which you mentioned, needs to be flagged up to the Department for Social Development

- (DSD) officials and the Minister so that you can say to them that they really need to think about how much it will cost if they do implement them. That cost will be to the block grant. More children may come into the care system, for example. Patricia talked about the £1,400 that a lot of families with disabled children are likely to lose. Families with disabled children are very likely to be in fuel poverty, and have to keep the heating on an awful lot more if they have a child who is not mobile. If they do not have that level of heat, the child will be in hospital with pneumonia, which leads to costs for the health service.
2695. The huge levels of displaced costs involved need to be considered. I realise that this is very far away from contribution-based ESA, but it seems as if there is a drive at Westminster to get rid of anything to do with national insurance. That is a shame because that made the difference between the workhouse and the system that we have today.
2696. Mr Copeland: Once again — I have said it twice today already unfortunately — I am sorry that I missed the early part of your presentation, but I have read it with interest. Patricia, in your capacity as the Northern Ireland Commissioner for Children and Young People, have you been approached directly by the Department as part of its process to assess the impact that the reforms will have on children and young people?
2697. Mrs Lewsley-Mooney: Yes, we had ongoing discussions with departmental officials after one of our meetings with the Minister. Again, it was very much a case of, “This is what is happening”, and we are arguing about what we can do to get that changed to secure operational flexibilities and other flexibilities to alleviate some of the hardship. We have the argument around the cost-benefit analysis, but officials will say, “I am being told to do this and I have to implement it.”
2698. Mr Copeland: I do not want to put words in your mouth, but would you say that you were presented more or less with a fait accompli?
2699. Mrs Lewsley-Mooney: Something like that.
2700. Mr Copeland: Secondly, we hear a lot about a number of strategies, but we do not tend to hear much about them after much time. You can call it child poverty or family poverty, but it is basically poverty. Have you any notion or gut feeling about the effect that the reforms will have on child poverty?
2701. Mrs Lewsley-Mooney: My feeling is that it will raise the levels of child poverty. It will certainly not reduce them.
2702. Mr Copeland: Marginally or greatly?
2703. Mrs Lewsley-Mooney: Greatly. Look at some of the statistics in the report that Goretta did: somewhere in the region of 6,500 children could be affected by one of the benefits, and that is only the one that we talk about. We could also talk about children with disabilities and children who are affected because of the childcare issue. So, the number could be greater. The Minister says that 10,000 children will be taken out of poverty through universal credit, but that is dependent on whether a parent can get a job. We heard about the number of jobs that have gone here: over 750 from FG Wilson and the others that have gone over the last number of months. There is also the whole issue of placing sanctions on parents if they cannot find work, which could be because they cannot find childcare. There will be a knock-on effect from that.
2704. I do not think that we will see a huge decrease in our child poverty figures at all in the next few years after this reform is implemented. In fact, I think we will see an increase. The Assembly has signed up to a poverty Act — it is supposed to produce an action plan that we still have not seen. It will be interesting to see what that action plan says when the welfare reform goes ahead.
2705. Mr Copeland: Lastly, among the most vulnerable groups of young people are those who are in short-term or long-term care or short-term or long-term fostering. Have you given any thought to the way the Housing Executive, for example, would treat a couple with a child who are - applying and have a history of fostering in the short term?

2706. Mrs Lewsley-Mooney: We asked that question, even of Lord Freud. We asked him to consider foster care and even kinship care with regard to the tax on housing benefit. We said that such people should be exempt.
2707. There is also an issue for parents who have two children, one of whom has a disability; they are now supposed to share the same room, so if they have a three-bedroom house, they should now only need a two-bedroom one, even though the child with a disability may disrupt everybody's sleep. It will be worse for the child who is in the same room, and that could pull that child's health down as well, which has cost implications for the National Health Service.
2708. Mr Copeland: I also note your request that the expert group that you were talking about setting up involves psychiatrists. Are you content with the current contract as it is on offer? The only thing we can look at is the Atos cutback with regard to ESA, where the level of medical expertise is, in my view, seriously unreflective of the type of cases that they come across. Child psychiatry is a different field from psychiatry. Do you believe that, in order for this system to be discharged justly and fairly, child psychiatrists should also be available, and that people with such disabilities should be seen by people who are medically qualified to judge their conditions as opposed to ticking boxes on a computer screen?
2709. Mrs Lewsley-Mooney: I agree with that, and I would go further by saying that, before any assessment is made, any medical practitioner who is in the life of a child or an adult should be taken into consideration rather than somebody who will meet somebody for one day and decide, based on that initial conversation or assessment, to make a lifelong decision for that young person or even for an adult.
2710. Mr Copeland: It strikes me that young people are slightly different. In many cases, these are young people who have difficulties communicating, and I cannot for the life of me see how the system will be enacted in any way that remotely approaches the need.
2711. Ms Horgan: DLA is continuing for children at the moment, so we are talking about only —
2712. Mr Copeland: For a small group.
2713. Ms Horgan: We are really talking only about people of working age, but, as Patricia said, the impact that the change from DLA to personal independence payment will have for their parents is what is worrying us at the minute. As a region, we are emerging from conflict. I heard the Minister talking about the welcome attempt to bring mental health issues into the assessment for PIP in England, but they do not have PTSD, except perhaps for soldiers coming back from Afghanistan and Iraq. Overwhelmingly, our population has very high levels of PTSD, and that —
2714. Mr Copeland: I just wanted to come back at you on that last point that DLA may be paid to a parent in respect of a child. Is that on the basis of the impact of the condition on the child or the impact on the parent?
2715. Mrs Lewsley-Mooney: No, it is solely on the child. That remains the same.
2716. Mr Douglas: Thank you, Patricia, Goretta and Colette, for coming. Patricia, your briefing says:
- “the Westminster commitment to continue to pay the ‘child element’ of benefits to ‘sanctioned’ parents will not go far enough”.*
2717. We had the Housing Executive in here earlier and their representatives talked about sanctions as well. Everyone is talking about sanctions, evictions and the trauma that that involves. Can you elaborate a bit more on that? You say that it does not go far enough. What should it be? Or how can we help in this situation?

2718. Mrs Lewsley-Mooney: The issue here is that, if a parent is sanctioned, they say that the child benefit element of that will be protected. However, that element can be a minimal amount of the overall amount that goes into the household. So, while the child element is given to the parent, that money will still to go to pay the rent, heating or electricity. It will not go directly to feed the child. Therefore, we are saying that the sanction will have a ripple effect on the children and the family as a whole. How the sanction is brought into play, and how it is played out needs to be looked at. If there are children in the household, we think that sanctions really should not happen, rather than it should happen but as a last resort.
2719. Mr Douglas: I have a final question. Your submission also states:
- "The numbers who receive 'Youth ESA' are small enough to cost relatively little".*
2720. Have you costed it? If the Assembly decided to do something along those lines, how much would it cost? Have you done any work done on that, Goretta?
2721. Ms Horgan: We have not. We just looked at the numbers involved, and they are quite small.
2722. Mr Brady: The figure given for that was about 390,000.
2723. I have two more points. The first relates to passported benefits. Many children rely on school meals as their only proper meal of the day. It is very unclear how those are going to be worked out through universal credit.
2724. The other thing is about the change from DLA to PIP. You have a remit for disabled children up to 21 years of age. Presumably, when such children hit 16, under the current legislation, they become claimants in their own right. We are unclear —
2725. Mrs Lewsley-Mooney: That is only in some circumstances. It is for mild learning disability, but for severe learning disability, it is 18 or 19. That transition from education into adult —
2726. Mr Brady: Yes, but I am thinking of 21 years of age, because it is unclear at what stage such children will be reassessed as adults. I have dealt with cases where Down's syndrome children got two-year awards, as though they would wake up some Monday morning and not have Down's syndrome. It is crazy. However, other Down's syndrome children got lifetime or indefinite awards, which are not going to happen anymore. So I just wonder what will happen as such children reach adulthood. It is very unclear. This is enabling legislation and, presumably, the regulations will come sometime, God knows when. That is when you will have the nuts and bolts of this. There are inherent difficulties ahead, apart from just the Bill that we are scrutinising.
2728. We have just done a huge report on transitions. Very often, on entering adult services, children lose quite a number of the services and support that they were getting while they were in the education system, so there is going to be more pressure on families and those young people in order to live in the future.
2729. Mr Brady: I will just finish off by saying that, in his statement on Monday, the Minister talked about Freud coming over in November to assess the impact. I am not sure how he can assess the impact if it has not yet happened. We were told that all this has to be in place, otherwise we lose the timescale. However, now we are told that, instead of October next year, we can put it back to April 2014.
2730. Mrs Lewsley-Mooney: There are lots of ways around this if you want to find them. That is probably one way that was found. For me, the particular issue around housing is the cap or tax on housing benefit and how it will affect families. What will the impact be on children if families have to be evicted? We met the Minister recently and he said that he was using the fact of how few houses were now being repossessed as an indication of the slowdown of everything. I am saying that I really would not use that as an indication because the families who I meet are making the roof over their heads the priority. They are not eating or heating. That is why there has been a huge increase in the number of food banks. It is the families who have been in employment, lost their jobs and know how traumatic it would be if they had to move their children out of their homes into hostels, bed and breakfasts or wherever else. They are trying to keep the roof over their head — particularly people who are in low-income households. Of course, when some of those benefits kick in and they lose money from their household, it will become more difficult. Obviously, banks have become wiser; it is better to get some money off them than none. So I would not take the lower number of house repossessions as an indication that things are getting better. If you speak to families who are going through that hardship, they will tell you that it is getting worse, not better.

2731. Mr Brady: On that point, Advice NI has a debt advice centre in Newry. They have just moved into Ballybot House, where I used to work. If you talk to a worker there, you will be told that they are inundated. They are able to give advice along the lines of what you are saying: to avoid repossession. However, people are losing out on something else. The passported benefits need to be clarified in the meantime.
2732. Mrs Lewsley-Mooney: Very much so.
2733. Mr Brady: There is the particular issue of school meals. Although it is through education, someone has to have a qualifying benefit in order to get them. Therein lies a major problem.

2734. Ms Colette McIlvanna (Office of the Northern Ireland Commissioner for Children and Young People): That will also impact on access to justice because a lot of legal aid, especially for children's cases, would be contingent on passport benefits. Therefore, not only this Committee, but the Committee for Justice may need to have input into that.
2735. Mr Durkan: Thanks for the presentation, ladies. A lot of stuff has been covered. I will focus on one area, which is the benefit cap. I have, probably, raised that issue here ad nauseam. Given that child benefit is included in the benefit cap and that that will have a direct detrimental impact on children here, we should look at some sort of amendment that will exclude child benefit from it, particularly if we consider the noises that are coming from Iain Duncan Smith today that child-related benefit may now be restricted to and capped at two children. I would like to hear more of your thoughts on that.
2736. Mrs Lewsley-Mooney: We have an issue with its being frozen for three years and, of course, with George Osborne's announcement a few weeks ago that the Government will look at families who are on benefit and have a far larger number of children, as well as the fact that, if you have any more than two children, you will not get any more money for them. Therefore, there are many knock-on implications, not only for child benefit, but for the childcare allowance and all of that. So, a lot of those issues will have a ripple effect on that one thing.
2737. Ms Horgan: It is clearly a particular issue for Northern Ireland because we have larger families. That is generally not the case for people who are on benefits; our working families are larger. What happens if somebody loses their job? There is an assumption that certain families just have children and live on benefits their entire lives. They actually forget that people move in and out of work. How many former FG Wilson workers, for example, have more than five children in their family? Will we tell them that, after years of paying their national insurance, they will not get any

- benefit at all for some of their children? So, I think that you are right: it would be good for you to put up a fight to get child benefit, at any rate, excluded, although it has to be said, of course, that the House of Lords did that and it got sent back. There is the issue of how much it would cost. I know that you have to take all of that into account. However, something has to be done, otherwise, we are sending out a very bad message to families.
2738. Mr Durkan: I am just looking at the numbers, Goretti. The submission states:
- “6,500 children in Northern Ireland will see their families lose money as a result of the benefit cap”.*
2739. How did you reach that figure? I asked departmental officials how many families would be affected. I think that they said that it would be 260.
2740. Mrs Lewsley-Mooney: Those figures actually came from the Department. When we asked officials — Goretti can verify this — they were talking about 1,500 families with five children or more. We worked out that 1,500 by five gives you 6,500. The figure is probably more than that because some families have more than five children.
2741. Mr McClarty: It is 7,500.
2742. Ms Horgan: It is actually about 1,150 children or something like that, but they were DSD’s own figures.
2743. Mr Durkan: I think the most recent figure they gave here excluded child benefit, even though the cap will include child benefit.
2744. Mr F McCann: Thanks for the presentation. It was interesting. A number of the presentations that we have had since we started the scrutiny have had the same strong message about the impact that the welfare reform is going to have on families and people. It was interesting to listen to Iain Duncan Smith on the radio this morning. I think you are right, Patricia. When he speaks of people having children when they cannot afford them, it is about social engineering. I think it is disgusting that you can only have children if you are rich enough to be able to afford them. That needs to be tackled.
2745. One of the things that concerns and baffles me is that there has not been the same type of protest as some of the huge protests that have taken place in England. I can only put it down to the British Government’s attempt to criminalise those who are anything. On a certain TV programme that he was on last week, Alex touched on the fact that very few people out there actually realise that, if they are in work and happen to fall into sickness, they will only get benefit at a higher rate for a year. I think that is lost on people out there. More and more people who lose their jobs will fall foul of that. It is all right for people saying now that they understand why it is being introduced, but if they have a change of circumstances, they will be impacted upon.
2746. The presentation that we got from the Housing Executive was interesting. It has estimated that 26,168 people will be impacted upon by underoccupancy. That obviously begs the question: is it geared up to be able to deal with that? The answer is no. That needs to be taken into consideration.
2747. Over the past few weeks, we have had two amendments discussed in the Assembly and then defeated, and one at this Committee. Two of them were in and around human rights and equality. I know that you referred to the UN charter. Have you considered taking legal action — there are probably other groups that have — on the grounds that the implementation of the Bill will seriously impact on the rights of families and children?
2748. Mrs Lewsley-Mooney: At present, we are working with the Equality Commission. I will let Colette answer that one.
2749. Ms McIlvanna: As Patricia said, we are working with the Equality Commission in relation to that. I will go back to one of your earlier points about the lack of information. It is accepted that the Bill is an enabling Bill and, as Patricia said in - her presentation, the devil is going to be in the detail of the regulations. Unless and until we see the regulations and the outworkings, people on the street are not necessarily going to know the impact. That is a concern, especially in regard to families who may think that, as you say, they are in work, things seem to be OK and it might affect someone else. You do not know what is coming down the track for you. That is one of the big things that we are calling for in relation to the regulations. They must be scrutinised to be sure that they comply with human rights and the UNCRC, especially with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration in respect of those.

2750. Mrs Lewsley-Mooney: One of the issues for us — some of you may look at it when the review of our legislation comes before you — is that I do not have victim status, so I cannot take a case on behalf of all of the children who will be affected by it. I have to go out and find an individual child. That is something that we are working on at the moment.
2751. It is also important, when you are talking about the benefits and the whole issue of having to move from incapacity benefit or DLA to PIP, that people understand that they have to reapply and that they do not automatically move from one to the other. It is going to be very difficult, particularly for people who have mental health issues, to fill in those forms and be constrained to a certain amount of time to do so. The stress of that, again, will have a knock-on effect on their mental health. If they do not get them filled in on time, they will not get any money. What impact will that have on children? How many of the 26,000-plus families who you talked about have more than two children? So, you are talking about a much larger number of people being affected by this.
2752. Mr F McCann: This morning, two other things that were raised were the legacy of the conflict and housing — people not being able to move. When the Department went through the clauses with us last week, it was interesting that its officials quoted that they had identified 520 families who would be affected by the cap on benefit. However, the big “but” was that there are over 13,000 families with members in receipt of DLA who they think could automatically fall into this. It will have a huge impact. When we take the benefit cap, the cuts in housing benefit and all the other stuff that is coming down the road, the impact will be huge.
2753. Mrs Lewsley-Mooney: That was our worry around the passport to benefits; around taking the money that children got for free school meals and giving it back into the household. If you are going to lose money for housing and for something else, that money would be used for stuff other meals. All of us around this table know that a free school meal was often the main meal of the day for children, particularly when it came to the end of the week or the fortnight when benefits were being paid the next morning and there was no food in the house on a Wednesday night. Taking away the opportunity for such children to get at least one decent meal a day will have a long-term effect on those children’s health and educational attainment.
2754. Mr Brady: I have a couple of points to make. Both parties have to sign the claimant commitment. If one does not sign, they do not get their benefit. That may happen because of the claimant’s mental health, because they had a run-in with somebody in the buroo or it could be a personal thing.
2755. Fra mentioned that the media campaign. In Britain and here, if you listen to some of the stuff, you hear people on benefits being castigated. It amazes me that the state is abdicating its duty of care to children. There is no other way of describing it. We are being told on the radio, in print news and the rest of it that the Social Security Agency is some kind of philanthropic organisation that gives money out of charity. What about the duty of care that the state has? What happened to the Beveridge report? What happened to the welfare state? All of that seems to be going down the Swanee. As Fra said, when the poll tax came in, there was huge opposition because it affected everyone, particularly the middle classes because people were going to get penalised for the size of their house. There has not been that reaction with welfare reform because the media in particular have, for want of a better word, vilified people on benefit. In my long experience of working in benefits, that is not be the case; I have never met anybody who loves being on benefit. It was not their ambition to spend the rest of their life on income support. It does not work like that.

2756. Mrs Lewsley-Mooney: I agree, and the media portrayal is that there are all these people on benefit. We know that the majority of people in Northern Ireland who will be affected by this are couples and families who are on low-income wages. They are out working and trying to make a living.

2757. Mr Brady: The statistics that we have for the single room rent for under-35s show that 37% of those people are working, so they are on low pay purely and simply because we live in a low-pay economy.

2758. Mrs Lewsley-Mooney: For us, the other housing issue is multiple occupancy, and particularly its child protection implications.

2759. The Chairperson: A last point from me for you and your colleagues, Patricia, concerns the discussions that you said you had Minister Freud and with the Minister and his Department here. You said that there has been a lot of talk about parity, and there has been, but, in my view, there has been a lot less understanding of it. Your submission questions:

“Whether statutory provisions require parity”.

2760. I presume that that is meant to raise the issue of whether they actually mean “parity”, are parity or are relevant to parity. Even after my meeting with David Freud yesterday, I am no clearer on what “parity” is supposed to be. It is something that has to be fully tested. In any of your discussions thus far, and in looking at the Bill, have you been able to determine whether any of its provisions meet the test of parity, are relevant to the issue of parity, or do you detect any possible change?

2761. Mrs Lewsley-Mooney: The only change is the —

2762. The Chairperson: I do not mean by way of concessions.

2763. Mrs Lewsley-Mooney: No, but flexible operations is the only one that we have been able to see.

2764. The Chairperson: I am just saying that I do not like the word “concession”, because I do not accept that it is a concession. Some of the provisions, in my opinion, do not cost money and are more policy issues or administrative issues. In any of your discussions, have you detected any of the suggested changes that you would make that the Minister or the Department would consider not to be a breach of parity?

2765. Mrs Lewsley-Mooney: No.

2766. The Chairperson: Fair enough. No other members wish to comment. Colette, Patricia, and Goretti, I thank you once again for your diligence in bringing these matters to our attention. Thank you for helping us to consider the Bill. For the record: this is the Committee Stage of the Bill, and we are due to complete our report by and on 27 November. For that reason, we are having evidence-gathering sessions three days a week. Thank for very much for your contribution.

2767. Mrs Lewsley-Mooney: Thank you very much.

2768. The Chairperson: I welcome Gerry Flynn, Dolores Ferran, Fiona Neilan and Pat Durkin of the Housing Executive. Thank you very much for coming here this morning. We are very pleased to have you.
2769. Mr F McCann: Is there a written presentation?
2770. The Chairperson: The presentation is on its way round.
2771. Mr Gerry Flynn (Northern Ireland Housing Executive): Chair, I apologise for our lateness. We have with us copies of our briefing. Because of our lateness in finishing it, we have not had an opportunity to have it formally cleared through the Department. We have made comments, clause by clause, against the Bill's provisions, and I have brought a summary of our views on the big issues, and what we are trying to do to mitigate the impact of this on our tenants.
2772. I have copies of our presentation for members.
2773. I will quickly take members through the summary. My colleagues, who are steeped in our work on welfare reform, can contribute. We are happy to take questions from members and deal with any issues of detail that may arise.
2774. We welcome the opportunity to make a submission to the Committee. This Bill is an important piece of legislation for Northern Ireland. It will significantly change the welfare system and have a significant impact on social housing across Northern Ireland.
2775. We are well aware, as are Members, that the Bill deals with: the creation of universal credit; replacement of the disability living allowance (DLA) with personal independence payments (PIPs); reform of the social fund and housing benefit; benefit caps — which we are all well aware of — and conditionality of sanction powers.
2776. This submission deals in the main with the impact of the changes to housing benefit in the social sector, but it also refers to impacts and other changes contained in the Bill. As to recent developments, we welcome the concessions which Minister McCausland has recently obtained on behalf of Northern Ireland, particularly in the arena of direct payment and the method by which that payment will be made to individuals. Members are aware of our concerns about individuals getting access to monthly payments in arrears, which will result in their having to make arrangements, potentially, for paying rent right across the social sector. So we welcome those interventions
2777. In terms of the relationship between the Department and ourselves, the Minister has asked the Housing Executive to act on two fronts: one is that, as a regional housing authority, we should comment on the impact of welfare reform; and another is to comment as a landlord managing 90,000 tenancies. To that effect, we have worked very closely with the Department in putting together working groups to examine the various strands of the welfare

- reform review. On the basis of that, we have carried out a detailed analysis of the potential impacts on applicants looking for housing, our tenants and the business activities that we manage as an organisation. To that extent, we have worked closely with our colleagues in the housing association movement, who have to deal with similar issues in managing social tenancies.
2778. I will deal with the key issues for our organisation. The Bill is known as a piece of enabling legislation. Much of the detail that will come out of it will be in regulations. We would require and request that when regulations are drafted, we get an opportunity to comment on them in detail because they will impact on how we deliver this.
2779. A big issue with regard to the Bill is underoccupation. I have provided data for members. As you can see, in the main, we have around 26,000 tenancies with the potential to underoccupy either one or two bedrooms. The impact on those individuals, as you will see – bearing in mind that they are people who, in the main, are on benefits – is that they will have to find between £7 and £15 a week out of their universal credit allowances to cover the shortfall in their rental payments.
2780. So, we are doing a lot of analysis. We have piloted that and my colleagues might want to talk about that in more detail later. We have done a lot of analysis to see what the impact will be locally on the people who live in our housing stock, what impact that might have and the mitigations that we would have in place to try to deal with those issues. When you look at the make-up of Housing Executive stock, you see that although we have 90,000 properties, somewhere between 10,000 and 12,000 of those are targeted at one-bed accommodation. So, we have around 26,000 underoccupying tenancies. If everybody presented at our door tomorrow morning looking for accommodation that is appropriate to their needs, we would have a major issue to try to deal with that. We would not have the supply to match their needs.
2781. With regard to vulnerabilities, significant changes will arise as a result of personal independence payments in the Bill. I have quoted the chapter there. They will impact directly on how people manage their family income. Although other disability related benefits are not intended to be used for housing costs, you can understand that any reduction in housing allowances to cover rental costs will have to be met from the payments that they get for other issues. The additional costs of living with disability have been well documented. The administration and targeting of a range of services, including disability facility grants, for which eligibility would be determined by passporting individuals through access to the system, could prove challenging to us in ensuring that individuals match up to the rules.
2782. Although older people are exempt from the changes, it is difficult to see at this stage — I know that the data that we have collected provides only indicators — how people in the disability sector may not be impacted adversely by that. I know that it is early days. The proof of that will come as we gather hard-nosed data. Therefore, if you are of working age, you are directly impacted. However, if you are of working age and you have a disability, there is potential that your group may be impacted adversely. The proof of that will come out through the detailed research that we carry out.
2783. We are still waiting for details on households that are affected by the benefit cap, which will be implemented through deduction from awarded housing benefit. When that is available, we will be in a better position to come back with more information.
2784. I will make a point about sanctions. There is a penalty in the Bill that relates to people's providing false information. We need to be very careful about how we manage that as regards whether people have provided false information deliberately, negligently or simply because they were confused about the information that they were asked to provide. As we move forward, that part of the Bill needs closer examination.

2785. I would like to make a final general point before I close. In our initial responses to managing the impacts of welfare reform, we set up our own working groups. We produced internally a document called a “social welfare action plan”, which looks at the sorts of things that we would have to do as a major social landlord in Northern Ireland to mitigate the impact of that. Part of that includes a lot of significant research on tenant profiling, the level of underoccupation and the level and type of individual who applies for accommodation in Northern Ireland. So, we are doing a lot of research on those issues.
2786. We are trying to gather information about the extent to which young singles are on our waiting list. Up until last week, we have also done a lot of work on the potential impact of direct payments and how that would be managed. The Minister’s intervention could certainly mitigate that.
2787. We also need to look at the make-up of the newbuild programme and whether we have sufficient one-bed accommodation built into that to cater for potential demands that are coming down the track. We also have to review the nature of the building form itself. I mentioned the mismatch between the nature of the housing stock and the requirements of people who are looking for accommodation. We certainly need to look at issues with regard to houses of multiple occupancy (HMOs).
2788. One big aspect of our work will be looking at the review of the housing selection scheme, on which we have worked very closely with the Department, and, in particular, the rules on how people access bed spaces and the mismatch between that and the current housing benefit rules. So, we are also doing a lot of work on that.
2789. We are also trying to promote, through technology — my colleagues may want to talk about that — the impact of direct exchanges and how people can potentially swap for accommodation that is more suitable to their needs. We have looked extensively at the impact of universal credit as it comes down the track, bearing in mind that we have statutory responsibility for processing housing benefit payments and a significant workforce currently employed in doing that.
2790. We also need to develop some significant work on the potential for a review of a new rates scheme in Northern Ireland, which is currently impacted through the management of housing benefit. As a result of the changes coming up in how we manage bed spaces, it might be incumbent on us as we move forward to look at how the current rent scheme of the Housing Executive is structured.
2791. Finally, underpinning all of that, it is incumbent on us, as a manager of major stock in Northern Ireland, to get simple, precise information and advice out to the wider public on how we move forward and manage changes that are coming down the track. Underpinning that, we hope to develop a fairly comprehensive communication strategy to deal with those issues.
2792. Those are the sorts of things that we are dealing with at a very high level. I am quite happy to take questions from members.
2793. The Chairperson: Before I bring in other members, I want to be clear on this point: you produced a table in your summary identifying 26,168 tenants who will be impacted by the underoccupancy rules, 7,000 of whom are underoccupying by more than one — [Inaudible.] You said that, if all of those people who will be impacted by that were to present themselves for alternative accommodation, you would have a serious challenge to address that. Does that mean that you would not be able to address it, or it would be a serious challenge to address it?
2794. Mr Flynn: If they all presented tomorrow morning, the evidence shows that we would not have the accommodation for them. If all of those people who are underoccupying presented at the front door of the Housing Executive in the - morning, could we, within a week or so, move them to suitable accommodation? The answer to that is no, we could not.

2795. The Chairperson: OK. I appreciate that.
2796. Mr Brady: Thanks for the presentation. I have just a couple of questions. On underoccupancy, you mentioned a figure of 26,000. We are constantly told that the whole premise of universal credit is to get people back to work. Do you have any stats on how many of those 26,000 are actually in work? With the single-room rent — [Inaudible.] — I think 37% of those people affected were actually working, so it is not just about people who are not working. It is also about people who are on low income, and we live in a low-income economy. Will you check that out and get back to us?
2797. Mr Flynn: I will get back to you, but I do not have that data at this stage. It is an important question.
2798. Mr Brady: That is fine. It is an important question, because it skews the rationale to a certain degree.
2799. The other thing relates to the disabled facilities grant. They are saying that, under the universal credit, it is going to be more difficult to identify the criteria. If someone is in receipt of DLA or attendance allowance then it makes it much easier. A lot of people are going to be affected by that move by being taken off DLA and not necessarily going on to receive a personal independence payment. That is a challenge for you.
2800. The other thing about underoccupancy is that you mentioned the house not being available. Apart from the way housing works in different areas, where people are reluctant to move, one of the criteria in certain areas if you have a disability is that you move near family and friends for support. That may well be badly affected if, for instance, the only single-room accommodation is 10 miles away. I do not think all of that has been factored in. I am sure you probably have thought about it. Those are a couple of issues that I just wanted to raise.
2801. Mr Copeland: Hi Gerry, and welcome to your team. There are a couple of issues that I want to clarify at the start.
2802. Of the 26,000-odd citizens or families who will be affected, each one is currently in possession of a tenancy offered to them on the basis of reasonable accommodation by the Housing Executive, and each one of them could well ask why you are now putting them into a property that they cannot afford to live in.
2803. Secondly, I have seen some Housing Executive properties classed as having three bedrooms when the third bedroom is not really a bedroom and was never intended to be a bedroom. Is there any opportunity to reclassify what constitutes a bedroom and perhaps ameliorate that in some way?
2804. Lastly, what about a case in which underoccupancy is created by the provision of a downstairs disabled bedroom to facilitate a disabled person, thus freeing a bedroom upstairs? Will that person, who has already gone through the trauma of all that, be affected? What about overnight stays, particularly with reference to parents without care, and the requirement of some people to have on a regular basis someone to stay with them due to some sort of stress or trauma? Will any of that be allowed for in the context of the legislation?
2805. Mr Flynn: You touch on a range of very — 2806. Mr Copeland: They are all quite similar.
2807. Mr Flynn: They are all very challenging. We are not on our own; every local authority across the United Kingdom is faced with the same issues about how to deal with working practice that applied in the past, such as where we provided an extra room for someone who had access to children at a weekend. Under the benefit rules, they would be hit and would have their benefits reduced. We have promoted in areas in which it has been difficult to let accommodation that was much bigger than the needs of the families on the basis that we do not want to

- blight the area; we want to have the properties occupied. All of those are real issues for us. We do not have the solutions. We are working through options and evaluating whether it is possible to change the building form to accommodate the people who live there and ensure that you are not creating any inequalities in the system, so that somebody who happens to be on housing benefit does not have their rent reduced because of something that we do to amend the property while somebody who works and pays their way has to pay a different level of rent. There are issues with the equality dimensions of this. We are working through them; we are trying to gather as much data as we can. That is why I said earlier that we may have to look at the rules of the housing selection scheme. We may have to look at the construct of the rent scheme, which has been known to us and has worked for quite a long time, to deal with this. All those policy changes would have to be widely consulted on and formally approved by the Department and back in here through the Assembly.
2808. Mr Copeland: The issue, in some ways, is that, for us to take an informed decision, we need to know that before we can judge the effect of this. Is it likely that we will be in possession of that information in time to do that?
2809. Mr Flynn: Yes. Our research is pretty well advanced —
2810. Ms Dolores Ferran (Northern Ireland Housing Executive): Yes.
2811. Mr Flynn: — in respect of the information that we are gathering.
2812. Mr Copeland: Could I also ask, tongue in cheek and knowing the constituency that I come from, if the Department or the Government place a financial penalty on those who are underoccupied, will they consider placing a financial premium on those who are over-occupied?
2813. Mr Flynn: That is the other side of the coin. We have data on the level at which our accommodation is over-occupied. That is why, in many respects, we are trying to use all the tools that are available to us to try to get a better match with the accommodation that we have through the tenant exchange scheme.
2814. If people know that they are underoccupying and somebody else down the street is over-occupied, we are trying to create a situation in which people will willingly swap accommodation. That has not happened in the past because people get used to where they are living. However, the financial penalties that are potentially coming down the track open the door to seeing a greater level of exchanges.
2815. A big issue that we will have to face coming down the track is that, if you fine people who are underoccupying, and they get their benefits reduced and have an inability to pay their way, we, like all the other social landlords, are going to be faced with hard decisions about the action that we will take with those individuals. It is different for someone who just refuses to pay and has the wherewithal; we have evicted those people in the past. There are big social issues. Are we going to take hard-nosed action against individuals who just cannot pay as opposed to those who refuse to pay?
2816. Mr Copeland: On the basis of that, do you feel that this Westminster legislation is not particularly compassionate, if that is the right word? Legislation is seldom compassionate, but this did not pay particular attention to Northern Ireland. There are pressures here, given the polarisation, in many cases, of your properties, which, quite simply, are not taken into account by the legislation. Although it is not your view to prejudice a Minister, should we make the case that that aspect requires some degree of re-examination?
2817. Mr Flynn: Certainly. I do not want to speak for the Minister, but he is looking forward to meeting Lord Freud. He will try to make the case that Northern Ireland is different. I fully understand the issue about parity with the rest of the United Kingdom and the cost to the Northern Ireland block if we do - something different, but if we could do something that allows us to work within the rules with different sets of procedures, that is something that we would like to see.

2818. Mr Copeland: It depends, in some ways, on whether you view parity as a simple financial computation or whether it is parity of outcome. Although the financial parity may exist, the parity of outcome will be dramatically different in Northern Ireland.
2819. Mr Flynn: We need to be mindful that any change that we look to put in place in Northern Ireland does not cost the Northern Ireland block. If we take it out of one pot, it has to be found somewhere else. That is the issue.
2820. Ms Ferran: It might be useful if Fiona adds a little bit. We are doing what we call a pathfinder in Lurgan and Portadown. That involves going out and talking to households and tenants who are underoccupying currently to see how they are going to cope with the potential changes.
2821. Mr Copeland: Would that be what you call a pilot scheme?
2822. Mr Flynn: Yes.
2823. Ms Fiona Neilan (Northern Ireland Housing Executive): It is indeed. We have about 1,100 underoccupied tenants, according to the size-restriction rules, in that district. We are doing that pilot scheme to talk to as many of those as possible. That involves face-to-face interviews and discussion about how they will be affected, a calculation of the likely financial impact and their shortfall in rent.
2824. There will also be discussions about what they are likely to do and whether they would prefer to stay and try to pay the shortfall or whether they are likely to be willing to move. Less than 10% are saying that they would prefer to move at this stage. For anyone who indicated that, we are discussing options for transferring and, as Gerry mentioned, the direct exchange. There are — [Inaudible.] — on board with the new — [Inaudible.] — exchange scheme now that is going to be up and running.
2825. We are also talking about offering some budgeting advice and referrals to other agencies to get some help with budgeting and talking about ways to pay rent. That will be important, as will be discussing our rent card, direct debits and other housing options, such as transferring to another area, etc. That is a very useful exercise. It has given us a lot of information. It shows that an overwhelming number of tenants would like to stay where they are.
2826. Mr Copeland: I wish that some of the other areas of the Department involved were as keen to carry out pilot schemes. We had a discussion a couple of days ago about it. I think they are sleepwalking on a minefield.
2827. Mr Flynn: We are also tracking the pathfinder pilots in the UK. Some of the new changes are up and running, and we will track closely what they are dealing with because we all face the same challenges.
2828. Mr Copeland: Although Northern Ireland has an added layer of challenges.
2829. Mr Flynn: I accept that.
2830. Mr F McCann: I have a quick question. In terms of the 26,168 people on housing benefit who it will affect, is that people on full housing benefit or people at all ranges? Does it take in, as Mickey said, low pay?
2831. Mr Pat Durkin (Northern Ireland Housing Executive): That takes in everybody who is on housing benefit. Some of those would be on part benefit. They have not gone down to that level at this stage.
2832. Mr F McCann: Could that be broken down? It is crucial. Mickey is right: what is lost in here also is the fact that a sizeable amount of people are also on low pay. Sometimes, we are given the impression that all the people who are on housing benefit are scroungers, but many people are also working. Many people suffer from severe disabilities.

- A breakdown of that would be useful, because it is crucial.
2833. The Minister and some from the Department said that the increases in discretionary payments will take care of what has happened. Sometimes, however, exactly what a discretion payment is and how long it lasts for is lost on people. It is a short-term fix for a long-term solution. After a short time, people will feel the full impact of what is happening. You can stop me if I am wrong. I take it that people will be paid for the first 13 weeks at the full rate and 80% for the second 13 weeks. There was some confusion about whether people would be paid at all after the second 13 weeks.
2834. Mr P Durkin: It will depend on the numbers who apply and the extent of our budget. That is the overriding factor that we have to apply. If we do not have the money available to pay them, we will not be able to pay them. At present, when we put on a discretionary claim, it is for 26 weeks. At the end of that period the tenant is entitled to ask again for a further payment period, but there is no guarantee of how much they will get or for how long they will get it after that because it is seen as a short-term solution, as you said.
2835. We cannot guarantee it indefinitely, otherwise there would not be enough funding left for new people to come into the scheme. We have to make case-by-case determinations as to how long we can pay a claim for and how much we pay out.
2836. There is no guarantee that, when we make an award, it will cover all the shortfall even at the first time of applying. We have to judge the budget and the demand and try to make sure that we live within our budget.
2837. Mr F McCann: I thought that the 26-week period was broken down into two different 13-week cycles.
2838. Mr P Durkin: No, not at the moment.
2839. Mr F McCann: When did that come in? I was talking to people about six weeks ago and the information that I got from housing benefit was that it was 13 weeks at the full rate and 80% for the next 13 weeks.
2840. Mr P Durkin: No. Our policy at the moment is a 26-week award. It is purely to provide some degree of stability for tenants and give them a chance to find alternative accommodation. If you were limited to 13 weeks, it is a very short period for someone to have to up sticks, find somewhere new and move. We decided that — 2841. Mr Flynn: If you want, I will forward a note to cover that, if it helps.
2842. Mr F McCann: The point is that it is a short-term fix.
2843. Mr P Durkin: It is.
2844. Mr F McCann: People will feel the full weight of the cut in housing benefit after a short period. You are right; it depends on the amount of money that is available and whether there is the ability to pay. The discretion lies with whoever to determine whether a claim can be given.
2845. I wonder whether you have taken into consideration the legacy of the conflict that we live with, especially in some of the big urban areas where it may be dangerous. Just recently, we heard on the news about cases of intimidation where people have been put out of houses and are afraid to go into certain areas. Was that taken into consideration when you drew up your report or submission?
2846. Mr Flynn: We have rules for dealing with intimidation and how people get pointed.
2847. Mr F McCann: Let me give you an example. There are parts of north Belfast where quite a number of houses are lying empty. Some areas are overcrowded, so if people from those areas went to you tomorrow to say that they wanted to move into those houses, would you be in a position to move them?
2848. Mr Flynn: Well, those are things that would have to be discussed in the round. We would deal with the circumstances as they presented themselves.

2849. Mr F McCann: Yes, but if you do not do it they can still be penalised for underoccupancy.
2850. Mr Flynn: The nub of the issue is that if someone presents looking for accommodation of a certain kind and we do not have it, and we are making them an offer, it is about the action that we are going to take as a reasonable landlord in making reasonable offers to those individuals. That is one of the issues that we have to try to deal with.
2851. As I said earlier, if everyone who is underoccupying presented, could we offer them accommodation directly appropriate to their needs in the morning? The answer is no; we could not deal with them all. Some of the work that we are currently doing —
2852. Ms Ferran: We are currently looking at issues in low-demand areas. We have different solutions where there is high demand, for example, where if you have a three-bedroom house you could let it. However, if we cannot let in a low-demand area, it is better to have a house let than have it empty. If someone is underoccupying, how are we going to compensate for the loss that that person might experience under the new regulations.
2853. Mr F McCann: On top of that, the point is that there are areas, certainly in Belfast and perhaps Derry, where houses may be empty, which people cannot move into. Is that being worked into your considerations?
2854. Mr Flynn: Setting aside the issue of the impact of welfare reform, we have been doing a lot of work, considering that there are over 20,000 people in housing stress on our waiting list, to ensure that our accommodation is used to its maximum. Our level of voids has reduced significantly over the past period of time and we will continue to look at that.
2855. Mr F McCann: Have you started any process that identifies future newbuild to meet the needs?
2856. Ms Ferran: Yes. We have been actively talking to housing associations this year about acquiring smaller properties such as one-bed apartments. That has not been terribly successful, but we now have a target of having 200 units in the programme for next year in that target market. It will take a while for those to come through into the supply. We are also looking at converting some of our houses. There is potential to convert some into an apartment upstairs and a bedsit below. Whether it is economical to do so is another question, but we are looking at the feasibility of all that.
2857. Mr F McCann: How would that work in areas of high demand? How would you match that?
2858. Ms Ferran: High demand is probably not a factor, because we can let the house anyway. The difference in rent between a three-bed house and a converted bedsit with a one-bedroom apartment does not make it a good investment to spend £30,000 on conversion.
2859. Mr F McCann: Although it might be different elsewhere, in areas such as west and north Belfast, most of those on the waiting list and staying in hostels are young families and one-parent families. How will you deal with that when building 200 houses or flats to meet the need?
2860. Mr Flynn: I do not have all the facts with me, but it is fair to say that the waiting list contains a significant number of young families. An increasing chunk of our waiting list is made up of singles looking for appropriate accommodation. Schemes from some of our local offices have brought back into use void one-bed properties that were not popular. The impending change means that they are now popular, and we are starting on work to bring some of those properties back into stock.
2861. Ms Ferran: In Belfast, 48% of those in housing stress are single.
2862. Mr F McCann: May we have a copy of that information?

2863. Mr Flynn: Yes. I will provide one note to cover a couple of issues.
2864. The Chairperson: Fra was getting at what is one of the elephants in the room. Gerry, you said earlier that there is a particular problem that exists not just in urban areas, although it is probably more stark in some urban areas, particularly Belfast. I agree entirely that you do not want to allow houses to lie empty and blight an area. By the same token, people might need additional accommodation in a neighbouring district, maybe one street away, but would not be allowed to live there. That issue has to be grappled with, because that is us trying to manage sectarianism in basic, simple terms. That is an elephant in the room that we have to address.
2865. Mr Campbell: It was a very useful presentation. I was very interested in the Lurgan survey, which found that only 10% would prefer to move. I do not know what type of questions were asked but, presuming that the survey was within the past couple of months, most people being surveyed about changes as a result of welfare reform were probably thinking that it would not affect them immediately but might do so some way down the line. Although the survey is useful, and I glad that you conducted it, it would be even more helpful if another one were to be carried out when the changes are imminent, because somebody's view about a change next year, the year after or some time in the future will be different to their answer closer to the time. If you were to carry out another survey and ask for people's views when they know that the change is about to happen in the next month or two, you may well get a radically different figure than the 10% from this survey. It might become 25%. I do not know what the figure would be, but a survey at that stage would be even more useful. Do you plan to do that closer to the time?
2866. Ms Ferran: Yes, we have planned further communications, and, from January, we plan to roll out communication with everybody who is underoccupying and offer them a face-to-face visit if there are vulnerabilities or if they need more information.
2867. Mr Campbell: A number of members have asked about the table in your submission, and I am not 100% clear on that either. It shows that a total of 26,000 people are underoccupying. Below the table, you state:
- "This represents around 60% of all NIHE tenants of Working Age claiming Housing Benefit."*
2868. I am not clear on what that means. Does it mean that 60% of all 90,000 Housing Executive tenants who are of working age claim housing benefit? Are 60% of the 26,000 eligible to claim housing benefit?
2869. Mr Flynn: No. The general breakdown is that over 70% of our tenants are on housing benefit.
2870. Mr Campbell: Of all your tenants?
2871. Mr Flynn: Yes. Say we have 90,000 tenants, about 64,000 or 65,000 of those are currently on housing benefit.
2872. Mr Campbell: Yes, but what percentage of the 26,000 are getting housing benefit?
2873. Mr P Durkin: All 26,000 are on benefit.
2874. Mr Campbell: They are all underoccupiers, but are they all on housing benefit?
2875. Mr P Durkin: They are all housing benefit claimants.
2876. Mr Campbell: Of any kind?
2877. Mr Flynn: Yes.
2878. Mr Campbell: Right. That means that approximately 60,000-odd other tenants are protected.
2879. Mr Flynn: They are protected because they are not of working age or because they are able to pay their way. They are exclusive of the rules. We are trying to grapple with underoccupation. So we ask ourselves who will be affected and can we get their addresses. Anecdotally, our information shows that about 26,000 will be affected. We really have to try to deal with them. Part of that was picking a sample

- area, Lurgan, and asking what the real issues are for those households. We believe that 26,000 people would be directly impacted if the change came in tomorrow morning. Their benefits would be reduced by the amount applied to one or two bedrooms.
2880. Mr Campbell: That is helpful. Do you plan pilots other than in Lurgan to see whether that was reflective?
2881. Ms Ferran: As you can imagine, it is quite a time-consuming task. If the legislation goes as planned, it will come into force in April next year, so we do not really have time to go out and visit every single person. There will be a lot of telephone contact and visits to people who have greater needs than can be dealt with over the telephone.
2882. Mr Campbell: My last question is about sanctions. Again, I have full sympathy with you here. Presumably, a number of people, and I do not know whether that number will be large or small, will give false information. Your problem, as you outlined, is how to distinguish between those deliberately giving false information and those doing so inadvertently. If most of the people who give false information are assessed or designated as having done so inadvertently, how difficult will that be to manage?
2883. Mr P Durkin: It will be a subjective decision. There is no suggestion of fraud necessarily. It may well be that some people did not tell us on time that their circumstances had changed. We will have to decide whether that was due to their negligence or because something else happening in their lives meant they just did not get round to telling us. We would have to get to the bottom of that level of information in every case if we were to decide to apply a penalty in one case but not in another. It would be a very complex addition to an already complex decision-making process. Determining whether an overpayment should attract a penalty could add 50% to the time taken to decide whether there had been an overpayment in the first place. That would be a major addition to our work and have a major impact on the person who, for whatever reason, had not told us in time that their circumstances had changed or, possibly, had not provided us with the full range of information required.
2884. Mr Campbell: I appreciate fully all the time constraints involved, but the point that I am trying to get at is this: if a significant number of people are assessed as having either inadvertently given wrong information, or if, as is reasonable to assume, some mitigation is taken into account, the end result will be that you have spent a great deal of time for little result. Taking all mitigating factors into account would mean few or no sanctions.
2885. Mr P Durkin: That is right. There would be no end result of all the work up to that point.
2886. Mr Campbell: I am on your side on that. What is the solution, other than not going down that route?
2887. Mr P Durkin: The regulation is discretionary and states that the Department “may” act.
2888. Mr Campbell: Do you pursue it or not?
2889. Mr P Durkin: The choice can be made not to pursue it. It is in the legislation, but the Department may decide that the regulation is not one that it wants necessarily to pursue in every case.
2890. Mr Flynn: Under the current housing benefit regime, people do not provide us with the necessary information because they do not understand what is required. The view is that, if they did not understand the rules and failed to provide the information, they were paid benefit that they were not entitled to. That is a pretty harsh approach. Housing benefit is fairly complicated.
2891. As we move to the introduction of universal credit, the expectation is that individuals will eventually make applications online of their own volition. You can understand the difficulties that will be faced by staff processing applications for universal credit, which - is a composite of all the benefits in one payment. The problems that we struggle with every day of the week in processing applications will be added to.

2892. There are two issues: training for staff who process cases and the information that we get out to people in a simple format. It is easy to talk about that, but it is not so easy to do. As some of our studies have shown, despite all the press coverage, discussion and media awareness, an amazing number of people do not know what universal credit is about. They do not understand. That may be a failing of ours: we are a public service, and we need to be better at getting the message out in a simpler and more readily understood fashion. It is alarming that, as close as we are to the introduction of the legislation, people do not really understand that, for example, if they underoccupy a property, their benefits will be cut by £5, £6 or £7 a week. So it is incumbent on us all, as officers in the public service and as officials, to try to get that message out in as many forms as possible.
2893. The Chairperson: For us as legislators, it is all very well for somebody to tell us that they might not act anyway, but we have to agree legislation that sets out what can be done. You rightly pointed out that this is enabling legislation. If I am asked to support legislation that sets out what the rule will be, it is no good telling me, “Well, we are not really going to do that anyway”. If I pass the legislation, I have already enabled it. That is a matter for us to decide on in due course.
2894. The legislation already provides for penalties to be levied, and so on, if people give information that is wrong, inadvertently or otherwise. The legislation will specify how much giving the wrong information will cost, even if it is done innocently.
2895. Ms Ferran: That is in clause 112.
2896. The Chairperson: When you take that into the benefit arena, people will be paying through the nose, whether they have made a genuine mistake or not.
- Of course, that does not reverse the sanctions from the Department.
2897. Mr Douglas: I thank Gerry and the rest of the team for their presentation. I want to go back to my colleague Gregory's point about people being evicted. At a recent conference in east Belfast, that was the one issue that people became agitated about. They said that the number of people being evicted due to underoccupancy, a reduction in benefits or whatever, would increase. What is the situation with evictions? Do you have any predictions for the potential increase in evictions?
2898. Mr Flynn: We currently take a very hard line. If people who have the wherewithal do not pay, we evict them. We will take a hard line when advertising that. So it is incumbent on you, if you get a tenancy from us, a housing association or someone in the private rented sector, to pay your rent. If you do not pay your rent, you lose your home. If you lose your home in those circumstances, you do not qualify for help as someone who is homeless because you are intentionally homeless, and we do not have any responsibility to help you.
2899. This is slightly different, as we may find individuals who do not have access to the wherewithal and have had their benefits cut. If the proportion of their universal credit left to cover their housing costs does not meet the need, we will be faced with a real choice. We have not made any decisions about this yet, and I do not want to pre-empt what might go to our board and through the Department. The first case of eviction because of underoccupancy might involve someone who simply does not have the money and has a young family. Think of the press coverage and the political flak that we would get, but we have a set of rules and public money to manage, so it is about striking that balance.
2900. There are figures being bandied about for the rent arrears of all those affected in the first year. If everybody refused to pay, our rent arrears could go up by between £12 million and £15 million in the first year. The issue for us is whether to continue to try to manage those tenancies and collect what we can. Do we keep a record of the debt until such times as they are able to pay, or do we take a hard-nosed approach and evict. However, if we evict because of an inability to pay, they are not intentionally homeless. That decision has to be taken separately. If they are not intentionally homeless, they can call at a different Housing Executive door and apply to be treated as homeless. We would then be responsible for finding them temporary accommodation and would have to put them up in a temporary placement, the cost of which would be far greater than the average rent that we charge. It is a vicious circle. We have not reached a conclusion, but I do not want anyone to be under any misapprehension: if people do not pay their way deliberately, we will evict them. I imagine that you would expect us to say that, because 20,000 people are queuing to get a property from us and our social tenancy colleagues. If people who have a property do not value it, it is important for us to take action.

2901. Mr Douglas: The other side of the coin is people who will not pay. Let me give you an example: I am sure that here are seasonal spikes, where you have —
2902. Ms Ferran: Christmas?
2903. Mr Douglas: Yes, Christmas, Easter, Halloween or whatever. Also, at back-to-school time, people will pay for their families' needs but deliberately not pay rent. If I were in that situation, I would do the same. I would look after my family rather than paying my rent. Will such people be in the category that you just described?
2904. Mr Flynn: We have been at this a long time, and we know the patterns of payment behaviour. We know that there are spikes in individual tenancies, and we know that they always come back and enter into agreements. The issue for us is to demonstrate that we are managing the debt, taking appropriate action and getting people back into agreements as quickly as possible.

2905. Our information shows us that, particularly in new tenancies, if people do not get into the way of paying and get beyond the four-to-six week period, they develop a mindset of, "We will never to be able to pay this; the debt is too great." The average rent is £50 per week. People think that, if they go beyond £300 in debt, they will never be able to pay it, and so they just stop paying. However, if we get in early and get people on to a payment plan, it is OK.
2906. It is the same as any debt. You must give people hope that they can get to the end of it. That is why we are doing a lot of work on tenancy counselling and trying to work with the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (DETI) to address the problem of the loan sharks who are rife in estates and giving "advice" and "support" to people. They say that they will help people out, but the rates that people have to pay for that "help" are very high. Someone owing £100 one week can suddenly owe thousands of pounds. I am sure that you are all well aware of that. It is incumbent on us to try to get advice, assistance and support to those people. There is potential for that type of debt to increase. It is incumbent on us to manage that and to have a social conscience as we do so.
2907. Mr Douglas: I have a final question. Obviously, this is a daunting task for you. You said this morning that you face huge challenges. One thinks of the whole future of the Housing Executive and of all the structures aligned with it. This morning, I reflected on the task for your staff in retraining and getting up to date with all the legislation.
2908. This morning's previous set of witnesses was from WAVE. They asked whether we could do something for them. Our question to you is this: what can the Committee do to help you? I think that you will come back to us with suggestions for the regulations. As you said in your report, the Minister has been very helpful in his work with Lord Freud, and so on. It would be good if you came back and said to us, "These are the specific areas in which we need help."

2909. Mr Flynn: The Minister is right that one of the biggest concerns that we face is direct payment. I do not have the exact figures, but we collect something like £225 million or £230 million a year in housing benefit. We were suddenly faced with having to knock doors and collect that money, which would have been a massive task. It would have been a return to the rent collectors that we employed in the late 1970s.
2910. Equally, many people, including public and community representatives, tell us that they do not want the responsibility of having to think about paying us their rent. If a way can be found to collect rent out of their universal credit payment, that would be fine with them. Suddenly faced with hard decisions about Christmas, back-to-school time, and so on, many will decide not to pay their rent. If they do not pay their rent, however, they will not have a home. I think that the intervention on the direct payment has significantly taken the fear away from us. It has been the same for housing associations, which would have been faced with the same challenge of collecting rent and putting arrangements in place. Some of the pilot schemes in England have got people to sign up to direct debits, so people get their universal credit payment paid into their bank account, and they are virtually walking with them to ask them to sign up to a mandate that will take £50 or £60 out of that. That is the way it is being done in those schemes in England, and that is among the things that we would have had to consider. The evidence will be when we start to roll that out. It is one intervention that will have helped all social landlords.
2911. Mr Brady: Gregory made a point about civil penalties and sanctions. The same problem has existed over the years with social security, whether because of misrepresentation or failure to disclose. Those are the sorts of criteria. You cannot disclose something that you do not know, but you can misrepresent something, so there is a difference.
2912. I have a question for Fiona on the pathfinder pilot schemes. I heard or read somewhere that people might be encouraged to take in lodgers to solve the underoccupancy problem. The difficulty is that, if you do that and they pay rent and you are on a means-tested benefit, you will lose that amount from your benefit, so I am not sure of the rationale or logic. Has that been suggested?
2913. Ms Neilan: It is an option for people to consider, and some may think that it is a viable option for them. Obviously, it will be up to the individual to decide how it will impact on their benefits.
2914. Mr Brady: That needs to be explained to people. That is extremely important.
2915. Ms Neilan: There are some plans — maybe Pat would know better — about the change to benefits.
2916. Mr P Durkin: Some discussions are going on about disregarding the income from a lodger from the calculation of the tenant's benefit. It has not come through yet, but the scenario that you are painting has been accepted as one that is not the desired outcome here, and steps are being taken to deal with that.
2917. Mr Brady: That is creating a new cohort, if you like, of people who, rather than going into bedsits or somewhere, will become part of a household, in a sense. It is a kind of social engineering, apart from anything else. You are parachuting people in on families.
2918. Ms Neilan: Yes, absolutely. It may not be the option for many people, but it is certainly one option. In looking at good practice and at how other local authorities are putting out a range of options that are open to people, this is one of the options that has been identified, but I recognise that it will not be an option that will be useful for everyone to consider. Some people may be able to think about it.
2919. We are also doing other things to look at, for example, the selection scheme, about relaxing the rules around the creation of joint tenancy, whereby, if someone is currently in their home, they may wish to create a joint tenancy with another individual to share the burden of underoccupancy. That is one of a number of things that we are looking at in the proposals to change our housing selection scheme to realign with housing benefit rules regarding underoccupancy. We are looking at ways to ensure that the new housing that we are allocating does not result in underoccupancy and also at ways to ensure that tenants who are currently in underoccupied properties are supported and maybe given more priority and assistance under the housing selection scheme if they wish to downsize. Creation of joint tenancies is one of those things that we are building in.

2920. Mr Brady: Pat mentioned the disregard. That would be fine if the income were all disregarded, but if there is a shortfall, there is no underoccupancy. I presume that, in normal circumstances, the lodger, becoming part of the household, would have to be fed and would, possibly, use extra facilities. Presumably, a reasonable amount would be charged. I am not sure whether that would be encompassed in the disregard. To me, it complicates an already complex and complicated system, even with the administration of something such as that. There will be displaced costs. These things do not seem to have been thought out to any great degree.
2921. Mr Flynn: It is like all of the aspects. We have put everything on the table to try to work through it and come up with a solution. It is like anything that you start from new: lots of things go on the table but do not stay on the table. We would not rule anything out at this stage, because, if we are trying to create a situation where we are helping people, it is incumbent on us to look at all of the options.
2922. Mr M Durkan: Thank you for the presentation, and I am sorry that I had to nip out there. We will all share your relief at the flexibilities that have been afforded, particularly around direct payments. You mentioned your team processing housing benefits. What impact will this have on them? What role will they have to play in the administration of the direct payments? In general, what implications will the Bill have for your work?
2923. Mr Flynn: The decisions on the management and administration of universal credit have not been finalised. Until those decisions are made, we will not really be in a position to comment. Suffice to say, we have about 400 staff working on housing benefit and benefit-related work. Some of those people might still be working on it. The challenge of moving back to providing people with advice, assistance and tenancy-counselling will be huge. Our view is that work will be created in and around that.
2924. It is like everything else; it is about having finite resources to manage this. As with any other public body, there is a cap on our resources. You have to live within your means. Those are real challenges coming down the track. As soon as the decisions are made on how the future of universal credit will be managed, we will know exactly what we are dealing with and will respond accordingly.
2925. Mr M Durkan: You spoke about a lack of knowledge on the streets about the impact of the Welfare Reform Bill. I agree wholeheartedly with you on that. There are people who will suffer as a consequence of this new underoccupancy legislation but who are oblivious to it. However, I meet more and more people who will be exempt, such as pensioners, who are panicking about it. Are you doing anything to ease those people's fears?
2926. Mr Flynn: That is part of our communication strategy. We have had evidence of that as well. People contact us and ask, "Will I have to move?" On the one hand, it is because people are suddenly getting an understanding of all of this. On the other hand, we need to be self-critical sometimes. If elderly people are coming to us with those questions, we need to ask: what have we not done to help them? We need to step back and look at the information that is given to people and how we get that information out to people. Through the housing community network, we have a fairly comprehensive network. We have contacts in every single estate. We need to find better ways of getting a simpler message out. If that is not in written format, it may be done through running clinics or going to community halls in the evenings to tell people clearly who is affected and who is not. That is something that we need to address.

2927. Mr Copeland: I have been doing some work on homelessness. On Saturday evening/Sunday morning, I will be going out with the Welcome Organisation to look at what it does to try to ameliorate homelessness. It seems to me that, somewhere down the line, there will be, or could be, a potential growth in the number of people who are homeless. On the evening that I spoke to Sandra Moore, which was about the middle of last week, there were three beds available in the city of Belfast for people who are homeless. Have you factored in the likely peak that this will lead to and considered whether or not the current provision needs to be increased to accommodate that peak?
2928. Mr Flynn: What a question. We have a statutory responsibility to deal with homelessness. We have a fairly extensive portfolio of accommodation to deal with families and single people who present. We have the approvals to acquire private rented accommodation to deal with pressure spikes that arise. We have fairly searching standards to make sure that people meet the standards.
2929. Mr Copeland: That could be viewed as being more expensive than the situation that pertains at the minute.
2930. Mr Flynn: It could be. There is always a danger, Michael. It is about striking a balance. If you think that you will have x number of people homeless, you can build more hostels or enter into more arrangements with voluntary groups to build more hostels. However, the demand might not materialise. You can also have a flexible regime in which you can respond quickly to a short-term spike in demand. That is about access to and working with the private rented sector. We have moved away from building hard-and-fast hostels. We have stopped doing that with our voluntary partners. We have tried to use the private rented sector. To date, we have been able to work with the private rented sector to provide sufficient accommodation; we will keep that under review.
2931. Mr Copeland: It is fair to say that the profile of those presenting as homeless may change dramatically. It is traumatic — I do not mean that in a way that is detrimental to you — for people who suddenly find themselves without a home.
2932. Mr Flynn: A by-product is that, in working with our voluntary sector partners who provide homeless services for us, we need to step back and look at the thresholds that they use for taking people into their accommodation. We need to step back and say, “These people are homeless. There should not be categories of homelessness. If you are homeless, you have a need for accommodation.” We should all step back and work to that mantra. It is also about getting the best use of the accommodation that we have available to us.
2933. Mr Copeland: I come back to the profile. A lot of the people who find themselves homeless now are people with difficulties. Drink, drugs or a whole raft of other things may be involved. However, in the future, you could be looking at low-paid working families, which is a totally different demographic to that which the sector has been used to dealing with. If you put someone from that demographic into that world as it exists now, the outcomes would be very expensive in both financial and emotional terms.
2934. Ms Ferran: Pat can correct me if I am wrong, but I think that, if you stay in a hostel for more than three months, you are exempt from the underoccupation rules. So, it can be a perverse incentive.
2935. Mr Copeland: Sorry; explain that.

2936. Mr P Durkin: If a person aged under 35 who is affected by the shared-room accommodation rule has been in hostel accommodation for more than three months, they are exempt from it. Therefore, they could move from a hostel into a one-bedroom flat.
2937. Mr Copeland: For what period of time will that that exemption pertain?
2938. Mr P Durkin: There is no end to it at the moment.
2939. Mr Flynn: That is when you reflect back on the decision that you make in respect of families who just cannot afford to pay their way and suddenly find themselves homeless. Are we actually going to put those people into a position where they become homeless? We would then have to find them suitable accommodation. Those are the factors that you need to weigh up when you are making decisions about who to take hard-nosed action against. Will it be those who cannot pay or those who refuse to pay?
2940. Mr Copeland: I suppose there is no chance of keeping the house for them for the three months so that they get the tenancy changeover — 2941. Mr Flynn: We are mindful of the issues.
2942. Mr F McCann: Gerry, my understanding is that over half the people who declare themselves homeless are young singles and that they are usually deemed not to be acceptable as homeless. There is little chance of those people spending three months in a hostel before they go into the shared-room arrangement. So, you are talking about a very small number of people in the broad scheme of things.
2943. As regards being able to handle what could be a serious increase, my understanding is that one fifth of the Housing Executive's workforce will be lost over the next wee while. How will that impact on your ability to deal with any rise in homelessness?
2944. I know that there are some exemptions in respect of supported housing. However, I think that people in supported housing are unsure exactly what those exemptions are. How will they be impacted by an underoccupancy rule?
2945. What about people who have had disability adaptations made to their home? In some of the cases of housing adaptations that I am dealing with, the children have grown up, and the house is underoccupied. How do you deal with stuff like that?
2946. Ms Neilan: The figures for singles in statutory homelessness that I have to hand are that, at the end of September, we had just over 12,000 statutory homeless applicants on our waiting list. Of those, about 4,500 were singles.
2947. Mr F McCann: They were not directed. We were told that, under the provision, you cannot house them. They are left to their own devices, so they are not in hostels for three months. They do not fall under the rule that you just spoke about.
2948. Mr P Durkin: That rule will apply to people who have self-referred to a number of the homeless accommodations.
2949. Mr F McCann: It is a very, very small number of people.
2950. Mr Flynn: You made a point about the resources. We have to live within — 2951. Mr F McCann: That was a comment more than a question.
2952. Mr Flynn: We all have to live within our means. In many respects, it is about finding smarter ways of doing things.
2953. Mr F McCann: And supported housing?
2954. Mr P Durkin: Supported accommodation will not be impacted by the underoccupation rules. In fact, housing costs for supported accommodation are being held outside universal credit altogether, as we understand it. We do not see that the welfare reform changes, as they stand, will have any impact on that sector.
2955. Mr F McCann: And disability adaptations?
2956. Mr P Durkin: Part of the increase in discretionary budget that we are getting is specifically to cater for that

- type of case, so that is one that we will be looking at. If they are now underoccupying then yes, they would be affected by the change in legislation, but we would be looking to use our discretionary budget to ease the financial burden placed upon them.
2957. Mr F McCann: It must be a never-ending pot of money.
2958. Mr P Durkin: It is being increased.
2959. Mr F McCann: The question is there. It is discretionary, so it is only a short-term solution. I get a bit annoyed — not at you — at the fact that, when people are talking about the solution to this, they often refer back to discretionary payments. People need to make it clear what those payments are. They are short-term; they will not deal with the long-term effect of what is happening.
2960. Mr Copeland: I just want to clarify with Fiona whether the 12,000-odd figure referred to the number of applicants or applications.
2961. Ms Neilan: That is the number of those awarded statutory homeless status. Having presented, they have been —
2962. Mr Copeland: Yes, but is every one of those applications for one applicant, or could there be two, three or more people?
2963. Ms Ferran: No, there are families.
2964. Mr Flynn: Some of those might be families of four or five people.
2965. Ms Neilan: The 12,000 figure refers to households, of which over 4,500 are single persons.
2966. Mr Copeland: So that leaves 8,000, or it could be 20,000. That is what I am driving at.
2967. Mr Flynn: It could be.
2968. Mr F McCann: Are those last year's figures?
2969. Ms Neilan: No, they are the figures at the end of September.
2970. Mr F McCann: So I take it that it will probably hit 20,000 by the start of the next housing year.
2971. Mr Copeland: Which could be 30,000 or 40,000 people.
2972. The Chairperson: We are getting into speculation. No other members have indicated that they want to speak, and I think we have had a fair bit of discussion. Gerry, are you and your colleagues happy enough that you have presented your argument and made your points?
2973. Mr Flynn: Yes, we were quite happy to come back on the detailed comments by the clauses through the Department, which will provide a formal briefing, so I said that today I would come for a general discussion.
2974. The Chairperson: I am sure that you are aware that we are in Committee Stage and are due to complete our report by 27 November. We take on board the points that you have put to us, both in writing in your submission and in the contribution you have made today. Thanks very much for your presence today and your help to us in our deliberations.

2975. The Chairperson: I welcome Annette Creelman, Amanda Deans, Stuart Magee and Philomena McCaughey from WAVE. Thank you for being here this morning and for taking the time to make a submission. There are a number of specific issues that you want to draw our attention to, so the floor is yours.
2976. Ms Annette Creelman (WAVE Trauma Centre): Thank you, Chair. I am the welfare advice worker with WAVE Trauma Centre. I am accompanied by my colleagues Amanda, Stuart and Philomena, who are also welfare rights workers. WAVE Trauma Centre welcomes the opportunity to contribute to the Committee's consideration of the Welfare Reform Bill. WAVE Trauma Centre is a cross-community charity that supports and helps those who have been injured, bereaved or traumatised as a result of the Northern Ireland Troubles. We have five centres operating in Belfast, Armagh, Ballymoney, Omagh and Derry/Londonderry.
2977. Among the services we offer to our clients is welfare advice. We deal with a vulnerable client group, most of whom have been physically or psychologically injured, long term, as a result of the Troubles. Many rely on sickness and disability benefits and live in low-income households. That is why welfare reform is so important to our members.
2978. I am aware that the Committee is scrutinising the Bill, clause by clause, and that you are hearing evidence from other stakeholders on various parts of the Bill. My previous submission to the Committee focused on the effects of time-limiting contribution-based employment and support allowance (ESA) for those placed in the work-related activity group (WRAG), particularly for the over 50s, and our concerns about the eligibility criteria for the personal independence payment (PIP), which is set to replace disability living allowance (DLA).
2979. We would like to focus on some key points that we hope will mitigate some of the effects of the Bill. First, we want to look at clause 52, which deals with a time limit for contributory ESA. That is the biggest issue among our membership. Many of our clients have been on long-term incapacity benefit and have undergone migration to ESA. This has been an extremely stressful time for them.
2980. The cessation of contributory ESA for those placed in the work-related activity group has implications for those who have other forms of income or savings, as they may not qualify for income-based ESA. Those who do qualify for income-based ESA may find that they are worse off if they receive other income such as industrial injuries benefit, which would be deducted from income-based ESA. Others may live with a partner who works or may have a small occupational pension that may exclude them from means-tested benefit. We fear that the sudden loss of that income will cause many low-income households to plunge

- into financial hardship, particularly with rising food, fuel and utility bills.
2981. Despite waiting for an ESA appeal for up to six months and winning their case, an individual will find that their payment comes to an abrupt end, not because their condition has improved but because of this legislation. In my experience at WAVE, the majority of the clients that I have dealt with who claim long-term incapacity benefit have been over 50. Due to injury and disability, many have spent many years out of the labour market and lack up-to-date skills. They typically suffer from both physical and mental ill health.
2982. The proportion of people over 50 without any educational qualifications is nearly double that for those in their 20s. The idea that ESA should be a temporary benefit, pending a claimant's return to work as soon as possible, will prove very difficult for that group, who will be competing for work with healthy and skilled young people, graduates, lone parents and those recently made redundant. They are unlikely to be an employer's first choice. Many of our clients will face a withdrawal of state assistance overnight when the legislation is enacted, regardless of how long they have worked or paid national insurance contributions. Many may experience financial hardship, and even risk losing their homes, before they reach retirement age.
2983. Long-term claimants of incapacity benefit who are migrating to ESA will require longer periods of rehabilitation than those who have more recently left the labour market due to ill health and claimed ESA in the past year. We propose that those people are permitted a longer period on benefits and that more resources are put into training and condition management for that specific group. The one-year cut-off period is arbitrary and contradicts the Government's own research on the difficulties facing those who have been out of the labour market for long periods due to ill health.
2984. We ask the Committee to consider introducing an exemption for those who have reached a certain age, in recognition of the difficulties they will face in finding employment, particularly victims and survivors of the Troubles. To that end, it may be helpful for the Committee to obtain statistical data from the Department on how many long-term incapacity benefit claimants over 50, over 55 and over 60 have migrated over to the work-related activity group and succeeded in obtaining employment through Pathways to Work and the assistance provided by the jobs and benefits office. That may be helpful to define a cut-off age. I will now hand you over to my colleague Stuart.
2985. Mr Stuart Magee (WAVE Trauma Centre): Following on from what Annette was saying about the time-limiting of contribution-based ESA, one of the practical steps the Committee could scrutinise is the way in which the decision-making process to place claimants in the support group is implemented. Members will be aware that it has been increasingly difficult since March 2011 for claimants of employment and support allowance to meet the criteria of the support group. Therefore, there is a lack of expectation on them to conduct work-related activity. That will become more important with the introduction of the time-limiting. As members will be aware, those placed in the support group rather than the work-related activity group will be exempt from the time-limiting and will continue to receive their benefits.
2986. The process for making that decision is a technical one, and it is added on to the end of the assessment for limiting capability for work. It is also a decision that many claimants do not really understand, and it is not very well explained to them. If claimants have already gone through an appeal process, many will not challenge the decision, because they are relieved to have got the benefit in the first place. The other reason they generally will not challenge the decision is that there is a small monetary difference of around £5

- a week. However, that will become more important, because, after a year, that difference increases from £5 a week to £100 a week. Therefore, we envisage increasing numbers of appeals on those decisions, as well as on the previous decisions about whether someone meets the criteria of the benefit rather than just that of the support group.
2987. We suggest that the Committee recommends to the Department that there is mandatory explanation that someone has been placed in the work-related activity group and the implications at the outset for the time-limiting of their claim to 365 days. If they do not challenge it at that stage, which can be three months into the claim, they cannot go back at the end of the 12 months and challenge it. We feel that there are many people in the work-related activity group who should not be. They are not capable of conducting work-related activity, and, therefore, should properly be placed in a support group. They may not be aware of the changes coming down the road towards them, but we feel that they should be made aware of them.
2988. The Department could take a practical step in relation to the support group. At the end of the 365-day time limit, they should make it apparent to claimants that, if their condition deteriorates to such an extent that they should be placed in a support group, they can then go back and have a reassessment. If they were placed in that support group, their benefit would be reinstated, and they would receive the full amount again.
2989. In our opinion, that step probably would not be that difficult to implement. It would be beneficial to very many chronically ill and severely disabled people, and it would make a major difference under household budgets.
2990. The second point that I would like to deal with concerns clauses 55 to 58, and particularly the sanctions and strengthening of the existing sanction regime afforded to the Department. Clauses 55 to 58 give the Department considerably more power to set claimant commitments, which are a major part of the Welfare Reform Bill, as well as sanctions for failure to meet those claimant commitments.
2991. In reality, we have found from our members that, because of the pressures put on jobs and benefits offices with dealing with the unemployed rather than with claimants of ESA, people are not really being asked to do all that much in terms of work-related activity anyway. The Government in GB have indicated that it is their aspiration to increase this type of activity, in particular through the work programme. They are targeting people who have been claimants of ESA and looking to try to get them back into work. There are practical difficulties with that, in so far as Northern Ireland is experiencing some of the most hostile labour market conditions for very many years. If implemented, we would be worried that many chronically and seriously ill people in the work-related activity group are going to be asked to conduct activity of which they are not capable.
2992. The other issue that we see with those clauses is that they confer on the Department very wide-ranging powers — in fact, they confer on the Department all the power to decide what work-related activity the person is capable of. That is often going to be in the hands of a civil servant, who may have access to only limited medical information about the person, and may not fully understand their condition. If the sanctions regime is attached to that, there is a real concern for us that people who are ill and are incapable of such activities will be sanctioned. That reform will impact severely on the most vulnerable people, through no fault of their own. That concludes my part of the presentation. I will hand you over to Amanda, who is going to take you through some of our concerns around personal independence payment.
2993. Ms Amanda Deans (WAVE Trauma Centre): Thank you. The third point that we would like to make today concerns part 4 of the Bill, which is the abolition of disability living allowance

- and the introduction of the personal independence payment. That is a major worry for our clients, because many qualify for this benefit due to physical or psychological injury.
2994. There are two main issues here: the criteria, and the actual assessment. We have deep concerns about the criteria for this benefit, particularly the draft descriptors, but we are aware that this is a matter for a separate consultation.
2995. In regard to the assessments, we are very concerned that there may be a repeat of the mistakes that have been seen with the assessment for ESA. There are good economic reasons for that. The Government are paying private contractors millions of pounds to carry out a service that is not satisfactory. That would not be permitted in the private sector.
2996. We understand that the contract for the assessment for personal independence payment in Northern Ireland has not yet been awarded, so there is still an opportunity to build in some clauses to ensure that there is no repeat of what we have seen with ESA. The process of assessment must be person-centred because it concerns some of the most vulnerable people in our society. To that end, we feel that it should be mandatory for the medical assessors to obtain up-to-date reports from GPs, particularly where the application for personal independence payment reveals that the claimant is undergoing hospital treatment or is under the care of a consultant in the past 12 months. That would help to inform the medical assessor and would provide the decision-maker from the Department with a separate piece of evidence. Unfortunately, under the current system for ESA, it is extremely rare for that to occur. We hope that the Committee will make that recommendation.
2997. The Committee will also be aware that the Chair of the Public Accounts Committee has heavily criticised the Department for Work and Pensions contract with Atos Healthcare. We also ask the Committee to include something
- in legislation around compulsory monitoring of the performance of the medical assessors. Atos uses a variety of health practitioners to carry out work capability assessments. There have been numerous criticisms of those reports produced by nurses.
2998. I would like to contribute something from my personal experience of representing people at tribunals in the Causeway area. The frustration is felt not just by the claimant, who is caused additional stress and anxiety; it is felt by the legally qualified member on the tribunal and the GP whom the claimant turns to when they are disallowed. For many clients who proceed to appeal, it seems to be an exercise that could be avoided — and an expensive one at that.
2999. It would be of interest to see how many of these types of assessments end up at appeal and are overturned — cases where a properly qualified doctor or clinician relevant to the particular disability carries out an assessment. A monitoring exercise will be helpful to evaluate that. It is of particular concern that, recently, the charity Benefits and Work reported that bids by Atos for the personal independence payment assessments reveal that most of the health professionals will be physiotherapists or nurses, not necessarily doctors.
3000. It is believed that Atos will have to assess well over one million claimants for personal independence payment — some on paper only — of whom at least a quarter are likely to have mental health conditions or learning difficulties. Yet the majority of health professionals involved will be private sector physiotherapists or nurses with limited knowledge or experience of dealing with these conditions.
3001. In Scotland and Northern Ireland, Atos plans to use 500 physiotherapists, 200 nurses, 40 occupational therapists and 10 doctors. The NHS will provide 36% of the service. Atos says that that mix of health professionals was based on a number of considerations, including the cost differentials between the types of - health professionals and the desire for the work among different types of health professionals. There is no mention of how many, if any, of the nurses will be specialist mental health nurses.

3002. Ms Creelman: Finally, we would like to draw the Committee's attention to clause 87, which concerns the duration of awards for PIP. We hope that this clause will be utilised when someone's medical condition cannot change so that they will not be reassessed needlessly. Many of those with serious and long-term injuries find it frustrating and degrading to have to justify why they are in receipt of disability benefits and have to repeat again and again what happened to them. We ask the Committee to use its powers to ensure that that will not be the case for those with long-term injuries as a result of the Troubles, where it is clear that there will be no improvement in their condition.
3003. The Chairperson: Thank you very much. I have a question about medical evidence. You have dealt with some of this. We have heard arguments over who pays for medical evidence on behalf of the claimant. Does your organisation have a view on that? Should that cost fall to the taxpayer, to Atos or to the claimant? Do you have a view on who should pick up the cost for the provision of that evidence?
3004. Ms Creelman: The fact that many of the assessments are wrong and are overturned at appeal is an indication that Atos is not carrying out proper, detailed assessments of people's health conditions for ESA. The Government are paying Atos millions of pounds for these contracts. The cases subsequently have to go through the Department for review and appeal, which takes up civil servants' time, and through the Appeals Service, which is very costly. We feel that it is unfair that that cost should also be borne by the taxpayer. The taxpayer has already paid once in giving the contract to Atos to do the job. Our point is that, in the private sector, it would not be tolerated if a company were not carrying out its contract properly.
3005. The Chairperson: Thanks for that; that is helpful.
3006. Mr Brady: Thanks very much for your presentation. You raised a number of issues that I would not disagree with in any shape or form. The idea of limiting ESA to a year is not aimed at encouraging people to get back to work; it is about cutting benefits. That happened in 1996 when unemployment benefit changed to jobseeker's allowance, and it was reduced from a year to six months. That has been going on for a long time.
3007. In relation to exemptions and migration, people have two hurdles. First, you have to get through the work capability assessment. You have given some examples, and I have come across a number of examples where people were just not clued into what was wrong with the person. That is a big issue.
3008. On the age issue, the Department for Social Development (DSD) obviously has the statistics for over-50s, over-55s, and over-60s, and the decision-making process of the work-related activity group. The difficulty with the claimant commitment is that both partners have to sign it. If one of them refuses — and that person may have mental health or trauma problems — that nullifies the benefit for both people.
3009. You mentioned that, at the moment, people in particular categories are not being forced to look for work. However, legislation will state that people have to look for work 35 hours a week. There is the whole issue of the cost that employers may charge people for letters that state they have been looking for work and all that that will involve. There are a number of issues that you may want to comment on.
3010. Sanctions will be really draconian. Any research that has been done on sanctions shows very clearly that they are no deterrent. That is a fact. People can argue about that all they want, but the statistics are there.
3011. We do not know who will get the contract for the personal independence payment.

- In Scotland, Atos has the contract. In Lanarkshire, they have re-contracted it back to the health service. So you have a private provider contracting back to a statutory provider that probably should have been doing it in the first place.
3012. My colleagues on the Committee and I would argue that medical evidence should have primacy. There are so many cases in which the proper medical evidence is not seen until the appeal. I did a lot of appeals when I worked in the voluntary sector. People brought in X-rays but were told, "We cannot read that, because we are not qualified." Yet, as you say, there will be only 10 doctors. They are also talking about processing 1,000 cases a week in the transfer from DLA to PIP
3013. Back in 2007, when these changes started to come through, we argued about the qualifications that these so-called health professionals have. You might have a nurse with absolutely no experience in mental health, or a physiotherapist who has even less. How are they going to be able to assess someone with bipolar disorder or chronic, clinical or reactive depression? There are so many different things. Consider people who are in certain categories of conditions. In England, Atos has already found 32 people who were terminally ill to be fit for work, and they consequently died within a relatively short period. That is the kind of thing that we are up against. Obviously, the primacy of medical evidence is very important.
3014. We are talking about displaced costs as well. The majority of people who fail the test will appeal. I am sure that you will be inundated with even more appeals, and, therefore, it will cost more in the long run. So it has a knock-on effect for the Department of Justice, because appeals are now done through the Court Service.
3015. All of that is happening. Everything that you have said makes sense. The idea is to limit ESA. However, your partner might be working the prescribed hours on the minimum wage. We do not yet know how it is all going to work in respect of childcare, universal credit and the tapers. That is undoubtedly going to impact on people. Will you comment on some of those points?
3016. Ms Creelman: We are concerned because not only will people be hit with losing their ESA and possibly their DLA, they will be hit by cuts in housing benefit. This is all happening very quickly and within a very short period. We are concerned about the impact of all of this. It is not just one or two things that are happening. A lot of things are happening within a very tight period.
3017. People in our group are not going to be an employer's first choice. A 60-year-old is now expected to go out and look for a job because the retirement age has gone up to 66. They will be left with a drop in their household income of £400 a week. That is a lot of money, particularly for people who are coming towards the end of their mortgage, who have shortfall in an endowment, or who have children at university. It will not only be people on the income-based ESA who will be affected. It will also be low-income households that are just above the level of income-based benefit. That is a big concern for us.
3018. Mr Brady: There is another point on that issue. If, for example, the male partner in a couple is five, six or 10 years older, the younger person will have to claim universal credit. That brings the older person into a completely different context and into the alleged work market. That will be another big issue.
3019. Ms Creelman: It will have an impact on savings that may have been set aside.
3020. Mr Brady: Yes, because pension credit is open-ended. Even if you got only a small amount of pension credit, it brought in the passported benefits. There is the whole issue of disability premiums and how they will work. The disabled child premium for those on tax credits will be halved from £58 to £28.
3021. Ms Creelman: The transitional protection that is supposed to be offered to claimants who are moving to universal - credit is very fragile. It will easily be lost if there is any sort of change whatsoever. You are talking about a very substantial loss of money if someone loses the severe disability premium, for example. That is a big concern.

3022. ESA is the big issue that our clients are bringing before us. It is a about a shortfall in rent for those in the private-rented sector. Our concern is that, whereas there have been people who have had difficulties purchasing heating oil and whatever, the introduction of the Welfare Reform Bill will mean that people will have a problem just keeping a roof over their head.
3023. Mr Brady: I want to ask you one final question about underoccupancy. You mentioned older people. There is no doubt that underoccupancy rules will affect older people whose family have grown up and left and may come back to visit at weekends. If there is one bedroom being used but two that are not occupied, the housing benefit will be cut by up to 25%. That is another big issue that I am sure will impact on a number of your clients.
3024. Ms Creelman: Yes, it will impact, in particular, on older victims and survivors who are still in their house. Their children may have left home, and they have the security of having settled in their community. When you have come through something horrific in your life, stability is key. The last thing that you want is to be forced to move home. That is particularly the case if, for example, you have a support network or you have a mental health problem but have family members living nearby. It will cause an awful lot of difficulties. The Bill is huge, and the more you look at it, the more concerned you become at every aspect of it. It is a bit like a set of dominoes: if one benefit stops, there will be a knock-on effect. The knock-on effect of all the different regulations coming into force at the same time is a huge cause of concern for our members.
3025. Mr Campbell: Thanks for the presentation. I want to concentrate on two aspects of the ESA issue that you raised, and I have considerable sympathy with both. One is the age issue and the fact that most survivors of the Troubles are in a particular age bracket. You seem to be concentrating on around the 50-year-old mark. I appreciate that everything has to have some sort of arbitrary nature, but, if the Committee were looking at that, how would you defend that position if a 48-year-old person equally claimed to be a survivor who was affected as much as the 51-year-old, who is entitled when they are not?
3026. Ms Creelman: We know that the Committee and the Assembly are constrained by parity. There will probably have to be some cut-off point. We would welcome it if the Committee could put a case for victims and survivors to get some sort of treatment and have a longer period to allow them to rehabilitate. More effort should be put into that because those injured in the Troubles have been very much forgotten about, and people are continually contacting our centre for counselling and support even at this late stage. For a lot of people, things are triggered in later life, and they seek help. We want it for everyone, but we are also aware, when looking at the Bill, of the constraints. However, we welcome anything that the Committee could do for the vulnerable group that we represent.
3027. Mr Campbell: My other point is about the bigger political issue, and you touched on it there for a second. You will be aware of the political minefield in defining a victim/survivor of the Troubles in a wider context. If that were introduced in the ESA context, can you see the difficulty that might emerge if, for example, people who describe themselves as a victim or survivor but, in fact, may been a perpetrator would qualify for what might be regarded as more favourable treatment than somebody else who perhaps is not regarded as a survivor or victim but who just falls into the category of trying to apply for assistance and help?
3028. Ms Creelman: We are a cross-community charity, and we deal with all victims and survivors. We are focusing - on the needs of someone who has a disability and the hardship that will possibly be caused because of the introduction of the reforms. We have not specifically looked at the issue that you raise.

3029. Mr Magee: There is some precedent for criteria for financial assistance for victims and survivors through the Northern Ireland Memorial Fund. If the Committee wanted to look at some sort of criteria along those lines, we might argue that the criteria included there as a definition for financial assistance could be transplanted over fairly easily. However, I know that individual members have their own opinions on that.
3030. Mr Copeland: Apologies for not being in for the start of your presentation. I want to talk about post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD). Conditions such as that are usually directly attributable to the Troubles. I know from sad personal experience that there can be an awful time delay between the incident and the emergence of a condition. In our case, it was 27 years, and nightmares then became fairly regular. Do you think that these proposals favour or are against those who suffer from Troubles-related conditions, particularly post-traumatic stress disorder? Secondly, and this is probably more for the Committee to consider than the witnesses, the number of general practitioners employed by Atos came to my attention a few days ago, and it is scandalous, to be frank. Most people going to a capability-for-work assessment will have one fairly vital piece of evidence, and that is a sick line from their doctor stating that they are not fit for work. Then, an individual, who may or may not be qualified to the same level as their GP, suddenly draws a line through that and says that it does not matter. In a number of cases, particularly of those affected by PTSD and mental health issues, some such decisions have led to appeals that I attended, and I attend a fair number of them. I have seen a doctor at the appeal abandon it on the grounds that to proceed would prejudice the health of the person being examined.
3031. At the contract tendering stage, was there any requirement on Atos to not just type the answers into a computer, which is apparently what they do, but to ensure that what they have done — by having such a small proportion of GPs, who are more expensive — is not a way of maximising the contract value? Is Atos applying a commercial decision to something that should be above commerciality? Have you any indication of the number of companies that have tendered for the Northern Ireland contract or how tightly tied down that contract is?
3032. Ms Creelman: I am sorry; we do not have that information but we can certainly find it out.
3033. The Chairperson: Those are questions that the Department might answer.
3034. Mr Copeland: Can we establish that, because I think that it is fundamental. I thought that it was 50 GPs, but the figure that you quoted was 10. Is that in the whole of GB?
3035. Mr Magee: I think that the 10 related to Lanarkshire, where the contract that was awarded went back to the NHS.
3036. Mr Copeland: If someone has a piece of medical evidence from their GP, and someone who is not a GP places themselves above that, I personally cannot see how that is not open to some sort of review. Are you content that, on the far side of this — and this is sort of related to ESA — that the provision that we have here for the identification and treatment of PTSD, particularly in ex-military personnel, is adequate and fitting?
3037. Ms Creelman: No. We find that the descriptors for ESA and the second draft descriptors for PIP do not seem to take on board the symptoms of post-traumatic stress disorder. We raised that with the victims' commissioners last year, and it is a cause for concern. The Minister at Westminster recently made a statement in which he suggested that there is a responsibility on claimants to supply evidence at the outset of their assessment. Our experience is that - people do not really understand ESA. They are confused by the descriptors and they need assistance in even filling in the forms. They think that getting medical evidence may just amount to getting a quick note from their GP. They are not aware that the specific questions and evidence needed have to tackle the actual descriptors that will be considered by an appeal tribunal. Some people have literacy problems and do not understand these complex regulations. So I think that it is unfair to expect people who are already sick and disabled to have to run to doctors when they feel that they are a burden. Many of the claimants have to pay for obtaining the medical letters out of their already low benefit. I think that the responsibility at the outset to obtain such evidence really should be back with Atos or whoever the contractor is.

3038. Mr Copeland: Chair, can we try to see those contracts to make sure that Atos is discharging the contract, wherever it is doing so, properly?
3039. The Chairperson: That issue is one that is more between the Committee and the Department.
3040. Mr Brady: I just want to make a quick point about the GPs. In Scotland and at its conference in Liverpool, their governing body, the British Medical Association, condemned the work capability assessment. That may be a factor in this.
3041. Ms Creelman: That is in my first submission to the Committee.
3042. Mr Douglas: Thank you for your presentation and for your briefing paper, which is very helpful. The paper mentions that many of the people who you work with were injured during the 1970s and 1980s. What is the age breakdown? How many people will this impact on? I am talking about people who are in their 50s and 60s.
3043. Ms Creelman: The difficulty is that, although statistics have been kept on the people who were killed in the Troubles, statistics have not been kept on people who were injured. At WAVE, we have an injured group, and we have recently commissioned research. Again, even the researcher found that it is difficult to find accurate numbers on the number of people who were injured. The Northern Ireland Memorial Fund's database might be helpful. For instance, we know that around 400 injured people qualify for the high-rate care component of DLA. There is a difficulty there. Given that 53% of the deaths in the Troubles were civilians, it is probably fair to say that a large proportion of the people who were injured were also civilians.
3044. Mr Douglas: My colleague Gregory raised a point about a cut-off point. You asked about people who are in their 50s and 60s. Have you looked at this from a legal point of view on discrimination or ageism? Would that cause major problems with equality legislation, for example?
3045. Ms Creelman: I am not really sure. The difficulty is that, although there is age discrimination legislation and the Disability Discrimination Act, you have to take a realistic viewpoint about someone who is 60 with a disability competing for a job with someone who is younger and highly skilled. It may be helpful to have that legislation in place, particularly if there is a very buoyant market in which employers are looking for a lot of workers. At the minute, the job market is oversubscribed with well qualified people. We cannot forget that it will be harder for people who are older with a disability to obtain a job.
3046. Mr F McCann: I will try to be brief. I am also a member of the Committee for Employment and Learning, and, yesterday, we posed a number of questions during our discussion on the new work programme. We said that the migration of a huge number of people from incapacity ESA straight into one of the working groups had not been taken into consideration. I asked whether the Department for Employment and Learning will be able to cope with the migration. The indication initially seemed to be that it will not, and the officials then said that they believe that they will be able to cope. It is a short time away from this being implemented, and the people who are supposed to provide the backup for it are unsure about whether they will be able to cope with it. I do not think that many of them have sat down to look at how you deal with quite a number of people — it could be a number of a thousand or more or less than that. The fact remains that the vast majority of people on DLA and ESA benefits are on them for mental health reasons. If they go across, they will be assessed, first, by people who may have been brought in to take up the overflow and, secondly, by decision-makers who have very limited experience. You do excellent work, and, in that work, have you come across anything on paper that tells you the level of training that decision-makers in the Department get on assessing people with various types of illnesses, especially people with mental health problems?

3047. Mr Magee: To be fair to some of the decision-makers in the Department, I think that they are not being given the opportunity to make the right decisions in a lot of cases, because they simply do not have access to the right information about someone's condition. A lot of our members suffer physical and mental health problems, and a range of people could be treating them. If a decision-maker does not have access to that information and is given a scant report from Atos, they are not really given the opportunity to make the right decision. That flaw in decision-making is carried right through to appeal, and you only get the chance to put that right there. Someone will normally come for advice only once they have been turned down, and the decision has already been made at that point.

3048. In reference to some of your points about the work programme and things like that, the frank answer is that we do not know how DEL and DSD are going to cope with the work programme. What we do have is a recent example from 2008 of the introduction of a benefit, ESA, and the attached work programme. Anyone who has worked in the advice sector since that time knows the endemic problems that were caused by that in respect of initial claimants in 2008 and the people who were migrated over.

3049. Part of the work capability assessment was the work-focused health-related assessment (WFHRA), which was supposed to entail an assessment by a healthcare professional about how you can improve your chances of going back into work and the types of work you can do once you are found not fit for work. That was dropped for two years, and the deemed wisdom in the advice sector was that we would probably never see it come back. However, it is coming back through these proposals. The answer, in our opinion, is that we do not think that DEL has the resources to implement all the proposals in the Bill.

3050. Ms Deans: I will just add to that, Stuart. This may answer some of what you have put to us. In respect of ESA and the assessment, I think there is evidence that the Department is under pressure, especially the decision-making service. On numerous occasions, I have seen cases where the GP has actually been contacted by the Department. The Department has good systems in place when it uses them. They can contact a GP by sending an ESA113, which replaced the AB113. That is a questionnaire that is sent to the GP. You do not often see it in a set of appeal papers, but I have seen one that a GP has completed indicating severe mental health problems, low mood and difficulties with maybe six or seven activities. That, obviously, indicates that the client is severely disabled. However, after that has arrived at the Department, that person has still been required to attend an assessment where they have been assessed by a nurse and awarded zero points, and has then had to go to a tribunal. To my mind, that indicates not that the decision-makers are not doing their jobs but that they are under so much pressure they have overlooked that vital piece of medical evidence, and have gone straight to the Atos report and disallowed the benefit.

3051. Mr F McCann: I think that that again raises the question that Mickey raised about the primacy of medical evidence in all cases.

3052. Ms Deans: Absolutely.
3053. Mr F McCann: Over the past couple of weeks, there has been a debate in the Committee about reports by the Human Rights Commission and by the Equality Commission, both of which are in front of us next week. They have voiced concerns about the direction that the Bill is going in. Sammy raised a question about legal action. I do not know whether you have been in touch with either group to raise the questions that you have raised here about the impact of the Bill, especially on ESA, and about how the switch from DLA to PIP will impact on the people you represent. Have you been in touch with the Equality Commission about section 75 considerations? Have you been in touch with the Human Rights Commission to see whether the Bill breaches human rights in respect of how it deals with people?
3054. Ms Creelman: To date, no, but that is certainly something that we will look into. I definitely think that it is a good idea.
3055. The Chairperson: Thank you. No other Members wish to speak. If the witnesses are happy that they have made their presentation — and they have helpfully and kindly provided us with a written submission — I thank them. I take it that they are content with the evidence session so far.
3056. Just to make you aware, this is the Committee Stage of the Bill. Our schedule allows three days a week for dealing with this and we are due to complete our report on 27 November. Obviously, as we move through the evidence gathering sessions, we will take note of all that we have heard and deliberate on it, according to members' views. Then the Bill will go into the Assembly for further debate and discussion.
3057. Thank you very much your contribution to this work.

Rt Rev Dr Roy Patton
Fr Tim Bartlett	The Catholic Church

3058. The Chairperson: I formally welcome the four Church representatives, the Reverend Roy Patton, the Reverend Donald Ker, Father Tim Bartlett and the Reverend Adrian Dorrian. Mervyn McCullough and Lindsay Conway are also in the room, and you are all very welcome. We have received your written submission. Thank you for providing us with that in advance and for your attendance. You will be aware that the Welfare Reform Bill is at Committee Stage, and we have until 27 November to complete our report, which will then go to the Assembly. It is up to the Committee to consider all of the evidence that it can between now and then. We have already spent several days taking evidence from the Department and a range of stakeholders. Thank you for assisting us in our consideration of the Bill. I know that you have made a number of contributions to this debate in recent years. I will let you address the Committee in whichever way you decide.

Normally, we take presentations first and then members ask questions if they wish to clarify anything.

3059. Rt Rev Dr Roy Patton (Presbyterian Church in Ireland): Good morning everyone. We appreciate this opportunity to meet you, and we appreciate your warm words of welcome. I am the Moderator of the Presbyterian Church. Father Tim Bartlett is here to represent the Catholic Church, Reverend Adrian Dorrian represents the Church of Ireland and Donald Ker represents the Methodist Church in Ireland. Lindsay Conway works with the Presbyterian Church, and Mervyn McCullough represents the Irish Council of Churches and has a broad sweep of understanding of the Church situation in Ireland. I am sure that I do not really need to take up time by going through the paper that you have already received from us, but let me make a number of introductory comments.

3060. It will not come as news to you that welfare and caring is at the heart of the Church's DNA. From the very beginning, the Christian Church has always been concerned for the welfare of the community and the care of individuals. This, for us, is not a peripheral issue, and it is not an issue that does not have significance. We are passionately concerned about it, and, in that sense, we feel very engaged with it and are stakeholders in this process. We do not want to simply respond or react to the issue of welfare reform. We really want to engage with it, because it has an impact on our work at ground level with individuals and in the communities that we serve. Whatever government does, at whatever level, the Churches have always been there. They are there now and will be there irrespective of what takes place in the days to come. We are very interested, are passionately involved and are stakeholders in this process.

3061. We do not come late to the table on this process. We have been very involved and engaged with this from the very beginning. You will see from our paper that we have had significant and important meetings with Lord Freud. The four Church leaders also sponsored a meeting that took place in the Presbyterian Church's Assembly Buildings in Belfast. That was a positive forum and a positive engagement. At that level, we have been involved with the discussion. We are encouraged to note that some of the issues that were raised were taken account of. We are happy to recognise, for example, that payments made to landlords and that kind of issue has been talked through and, as I understand it, amendments have been made. That is really good.
3062. We welcome welfare reform, but we are concerned about how it will roll out and how it will impact upon people in the community, especially the weakest and most vulnerable. We see how it works; we are not in some kind of ivory tower. This is not an academic issue for us, and we are not removed from it. In pastoral ministry, our clergy and people who are engaged in our churches will engage with people day after day and see how this works out in practice.
3063. Without repeating what is in front of you in our paper, that is all that I want to say by way of introduction. I will invite the others to make a contribution.
3064. Fr Tim Bartlett (The Catholic Church): Thank you all very much for having us here this morning. Eighteen months or two years ago, the four Church leaders made a visit to Lord Freud as soon as it was brought to their attention that welfare reform was about to take place and the various factors that it was going to embrace. That was a sign of the depth of the concern among the faith constituency that is represented by the Irish Council of Churches and all of the Churches, particularly, as the Moderator said, because of the impact on the vulnerable. We are very grateful that you have invited us into this conversation now that the legislation is at this stage.
3065. By way of introduction, I want to convey to you a couple of things in particular. I want to convey the amount of confusion and the level of absolute fear that exists among the most vulnerable people in our society. I know that many, if not all, of you are very aware of it. However, I can tell you that we, as clergy, are extremely aware of it. There is literal fear. Part of that fear comes from not knowing clearly what is intended. Even though a lot of it will be very hard and very difficult news for people, I appeal to you, as politicians, to please start telling people as quickly as possible what they need to plan for, what they need to expect and what, with respect, the Westminster Government are imposing on them. I appreciate that that is largely outside of your control.
3066. A key concern is a fact to which insufficient attention is drawn: approximately £0.5 billion is about to be withdrawn from the most vulnerable people in this part of the island. That is not just any £0.5 billion that people could save, hold back or whatever. That is £0.5 billion that is spent by people every year because they are vulnerable. They do not save it or hold onto it they need every penny of it. So, there is, therefore, the economic impact. It is a point that we made very firmly to Lord Freud. It is a situation of economic decline and trauma as well as other cutbacks. The Institute for Fiscal Studies in London has said that Northern Ireland will be the region of the United Kingdom most affected by the cuts. That is a huge problem that I think we need to be more honest about.
3067. As others will point out, there is an equation between addressing that through work and an economy that is in decline, with no evidence that work is evolving or that the private sector is developing. There is a complete and horrifying mismatch here. I know that you all share that view.
3068. In agreeing with my colleagues, I want to focus on my mantra about this. Nobody wants the lifeboat of welfare to become a lifestyle. However, in Northern Ireland, that lifeboat has over 120,000

- children in it, and the water is already lapping over the sides. You have — unfortunately, but for understandable economic reasons — had to be bound into the concept of parity. You are, therefore, limited in what you can do. However, the appeal that I make to you, which is shared by the Churches, is to accelerate and prioritise as urgently as possible whatever you are doing to address child poverty. I know that you are trying to do something. It would be a terrible indictment of this society if we do not do something to address that particular aspect.
3069. That is all I want to say by way of introduction. There is confusion, so please address that confusion. There is fear, and that fear will manifest itself, and has done so already, in increasing mental health problems, suicides, despair, etc. We, as Churches, will pick up some of that with voluntary and other organisations. However, if there is something that you can do outside of parity through the child poverty strategy that is effective and that really helps to catch some of those children who will start sinking in that boat, please do it. That is my appeal to you this morning.
3070. Rev Donald Ker (Methodist Church in Ireland): I recognise that there are some things that are beyond the control of the Executive and the Assembly. However, there may be some things that still sit within your control. One of those may be the method by which people are assessed for personal independence payments (PIPs), as they are now known. I suspect that you are as concerned as we are about the way in which that seems to be working out at the moment.
3071. The old disability living allowance (DLA) forms, which are 40-pages long and so on, are known to be complex. If I may speak personally, my wife is a retired social worker and is being trained today, within a church organisation, in how to help other people address that form. So, on the one hand, that approach is over complex. However, on the other hand, human beings are complex sometimes. Therefore, the very simple assessment that has taken place up to now does not seem to match, for instance, some of the mental difficulties that people have in moving from total dependence on benefit back into the workplace. We want to encourage people into the workplace. Of course, it would be good if there was more work in the workplace for people to do. That is also perhaps a strong focus for the Committee, the Assembly and the Executive.
3072. It is quite clear that the method of assessment for PIPs is not fit for the purpose for which it was designed. We encourage you to seek, if you can, to address that issue in Northern Ireland in a way that is somewhat different to the way in which it seems to have been addressed across the water, simply because of the complexity of people themselves. If there are ways in which people can be taken gently out of benefit dependency and into the disciplines and demands of work, we want that to happen. However, it does not happen as easily as is assumed at the moment. That is all that I want to put in at this point.
3073. Rev Adrian Dorrian (Church of Ireland): I would also like to say how grateful we are to you for your engagement with us as representatives of the Churches and how encouraged we are by it. While we all agree that we want more people to get into work where they are able, the reality is that the system has to work for those who require benefits. As Father Tim said, we in Northern Ireland are potentially more vulnerable than the rest of the UK in a number of areas. There is a much higher prevalence of fuel poverty and extreme fuel poverty in Northern Ireland. In respect of social housing, the housing stock is simply not fit for purpose for those who need space for temporary carers, those who live on their own and, in particular, those who are under 25. Something that I hear an awful lot as I work with young people and students is a fear, which is tied in with bigger issues of tuition fees and what jobs are out there in the first place, about the cutting of housing benefit for those who are under 25.

3074. I will not go into great detail now. I will simply say that, in those areas where Northern Ireland might find itself more vulnerable, we encourage you, as a Committee and as politicians who represent us, to continue to do good things to close the gap between Northern Ireland and the rest of the UK. The two areas that I will mention in particular are social housing and fuel poverty.
3075. Rt Rev Dr Roy Patton: The issue is spread right across our society. It is interesting, for example, that two food banks have recently been developed in the north Down and Bangor area, in which I minister. It is perceived to be a more affluent area, so that shows that the economic situation cuts right across communities.
3076. The Chairperson: Thank you, gentlemen. As I said earlier, you have provided us with a written submission. I want to assure you that members have already raised probably everything that is in your submission. We have had quite a bit of discussion. Your submission is an important reminder, and you have further added to that through your personal contributions this morning.
3077. Have you any specifics in mind as regards the conditionality requirements on lone parents? You addressed that issue in your submission. We will eventually have to grapple with what we can seek to do. You rightly mention parity, but we are not entirely sure what parity confines us to. That is something that we are going to have to test as the Committee continues. Through the whole process of this legislation, there will probably be a lot of discussion about parity. It is also about how the system is administered. Most people assume that parity is about pounds, shillings and pence or levels of benefit. However, I was with David Freud at a meeting last week in London, and I still argue that there is a lot of scope around the issue of parity. It needs to be properly explored by the Committee. To my mind, it is not at all clear where the limits might be in all cases. It is not just about money; it is about the conditionality of people. For example, in your submission you talk about lone parents.
3078. Without further ado, I open up the discussion to members.
3079. Mr Brady: Thank you very much for your presentation. I read through your paper with interest. We have met the Churches, and I certainly commend them for the work that they have been doing, not just recently but for a long time.
3080. Most people consider that the Bill is not an attack on poverty: it is an attack on the poor. If we start from that premise, the ideology behind it becomes clear.
3081. It is interesting that you mentioned Beveridge, because he was of a different time. I think his influence started in 1942, and the welfare state came into being in 1948. After the war, there was virtually full employment in Britain, and that was the case through to Macmillan, who announced that you:
- “have never had it so good.”*
3082. Unfortunately, things have changed. At the moment, there are 115,000 people unemployed in the North but only 5,000 vacancies.
3083. As I drove down this morning, I heard a report on the radio about a recent survey and an in-depth study about the amount of money that people who work need to maintain a reasonable lifestyle. They need about £7·20 an hour. About three weeks ago, the minimum wage went up by 11p to £6·19. So, according to this report, people are being paid £1 an hour below that. Interestingly again, it said that, here in the North, people will be affected much more severely. That is an indication of the problems that we face.
3084. Also, Father Bartlett talked about the fear and confusion. I have attended a lot of meetings on welfare reform across the North, and I would say that such a fear is not just in nationalist/republican communities, it is also in some unionist/loyalist communities. Certainly, there is a consensus that this is going - to affect everyone. That is obviously very important to bear in mind.

3085. The other thing you mentioned specifically is the assessment for PIP. That contract has not yet been awarded, apparently. At least, that is what we have been told. ATOS has the contract in Britain. ATOS made a complete mess of it and continues to do so. It has been described by the British Medical Association as “not fit for purpose”. So that is one thing that we will have to look at, obviously.
3086. As to the food banks, there was a debate in the Assembly a couple of weeks ago about the upsurge in the number of food banks. In your paper, you said that it is an indication that the system is under strain. However, going back to Beveridge, the whole issue around supplementary benefit was that it was to be a safety net. You talked about the lifeboat not becoming a lifestyle. Unfortunately, policies over the years have turned that lifeboat into a lifestyle. We have generational unemployment through no fault of the people. I have been working with people on benefits for over 30 years, and I have never met anyone who willingly wants to be in that situation.
3087. We commend the premise of universal credit and welfare reform in getting people back to work. However, there is no work there. We have the highest unemployment figures since 1997. That is the reality.
3088. As to the influence that we can have, you have picked out one of people’s main fears: the numbers of people on DLA who are going to be reassessed. Since so many people are going to be reassessed, less time will be given to claims. At present, there is an indefinite award; that will now be restricted to about five years, or possibly to two, three and five years. All of those things are happening.
3089. It is incumbent upon all of us to get that message out. I know, from talking to the Churches previously and from your paper, that you have been doing that. It is important to carry on. Parity seems to be a moveable feast. On many occasions, we have come across selective parity, usually where it impinges more on people here. For instance, if the Assembly decided to give everyone £10 less from their benefit a week the money would go straight back to the British Treasury. If we decided to give them £10 a week more, then we would have to find the extra money. So, parity is not comparing like with like. What happens and what has happened is that universal credit and, welfare reform in particular, are predicated on what is happening in the south-east of England.
3090. Adrian, you mentioned working with young people. Thirty-seven percent of under-35s who are being moved to single-room rent have been working. There is the notion that the reforms will affect only people who are on benefit, but they will affect everyone. The number of people who are on working-tax credit, which, again, will be affected by universal credit, is very large. It encompasses a whole range of people, not just the unemployed. In your paper, you termed them the working poor. It will encompass all of those people. It does not paint a very pretty picture in that sense, and, as I said, it is incumbent on all of us to see what we can do.
3091. I know that you have met Lord Freud. I attended the meeting that you had with Owen Paterson, and there was not much forthcoming from that. What it did was to highlight the concern and give people an idea of what was in front of them. We need to keep getting that message out. Thank you.
3092. Mr Copeland: Thank you, gentlemen, for your presentation. I suppose that, in some ways, I should declare an interest as a member of the Church of Ireland who is married to a Methodist with a Roman Catholic step-grandmother from the Liberties in Dublin.
3093. Rev Donald Ker: We will pray for you, if that is helpful.

3094. Mr Copeland: I rather suspect that the time for praying is long gone.
3095. The Chairperson: We heard the start of this story last week, and it lasted for 45 minutes.
3096. Rt Rev Dr Roy Patton: My colleague says that you are not a Presbyterian.
3097. Mr Copeland: I know, but my grandmother would very much resent that comment.
3098. There is not a single word that you have said that everyone around this table is not patently aware of. If I seem a little troubled today, it is because I am. I spent the early part of Saturday evening and the early hours of Sunday morning in the company of the Welcome Organisation for homeless people in the city of Belfast. Throughout that expedition, which included the Salvation Army hostel, the police and the SOS bus, I saw an underside to my city, in which I have lived all my life, that I simply did not know existed. We came across Methodists, Presbyterians, Roman Catholics and members of the Church of Ireland in their capacity as part of those Churches trying to do what they can. What troubles me is that we can barely cope with the situation as it is, where single people need single or shared accommodation, which is not there. Many of those people are under 35 and will come under the shared accommodation category.
3099. My awful fear — and in many ways, it is unspoken — is that we will, by necessity, be forced to take actions that will run contrary to the consciences of practically everyone around this table. In effect, it will bring misery to a substantial number of people. I have to ask: are you co-ordinated, and are you aware, as you must be, of the likely impact of this, and what steps can we take as a Committee to support or enhance the support that we already give those organisations that work in your own groups to at least try to ameliorate some of this sorrow that is heading towards us? The work of people, particularly at the Welcome Organisation centre at Divis, but, more importantly, the volunteers who came from everywhere and were driving around, left me inspired, but it left me feeling very troubled that they have to do what they do. They do derive support from government. Have you any counter measures, corporately or individually, that you can foresee that will need additional assistance that can offset some of the likely outcomes of the legislation, should it be accepted?

3100. Rev Donald Ker: Frankly, that is a difficult one. We do not want to be simply in the role of rescuing the vulnerable people who have fallen through the net. However, in many cases, that is the role that we have, and that is precisely what you saw on Saturday night. How do you provide housing and support for under-25s? For people who have been in the care systems, there are systems of supported housing after that. For instance, at the Belfast Central Mission, where I had some responsibility, we were quite involved with that, and that is only part of it. Obviously, hostels such as the Salvation Army hostel and so on tie in in the same way.
3101. Preventing these kinds of casualties takes finances that we currently do not have. One of the other things that the Churches are always doing is trying to work to provide healthy homes and family structures, but that does not happen in every case, so we are troubled by the people who are falling out of that. Others might have further things to say, but the only other thing that I want to say at this point is that we want to assure you that we continue to walk alongside. It is clear that the members of the Committee know what some of the circumstances are like for the people who are most vulnerable in society. That gives us hope, because we are aware of that too. The truth is that we are struggling to come up with a solution that will counteract all of this.
3102. Rev Adrian Dorrian: I think that that is fair. I imagine that, from your experience on Saturday night, Michael, you will have observed that where we, as Churches, find ourselves at the coalface alongside others, things work best when there is a functional relationship with government agencies. So, food banks work because the GP or social services are telling the organisers where the people who have need are. It is not that we do not know where the need is, but it gives it that air of co-operation and cover. That is one small way that things could be developed: simply making sure that those partnerships, if that is the right word, are viewed as being viable from both sides of the conversation.

3103. Fr Bartlett: I endorse this. As we move into collectively addressing this dramatic situation, it has never been more critical that those partnerships and engagements between you and civic society, including the Churches, is accelerated and enhanced and that we all together assess this as it is being implemented and work together. There is no shortage of genius in Northern Ireland, and there must be many ways to skin a cat. If we are united in our concern about addressing the needs of the most vulnerable people in our society in light of all of this — thank God, it looks like everyone is — then we need our collective genius. There must be creative ways of trying to do something to address some of these issues that we may not have even worked out yet.
3104. For example, I do not know where this goes, but there is something in my mind about the confluence of the economic situation that we are in, particularly in relation to property, landlords and banks. I have spoken to a number of landlords who invested in cheap property during the Troubles and have a lot of small and, in many respects, inhumane apartments. They are worrying that they will have to oust people from them because the benefits will be cut and all of the rest of it. They are not interested in being patient. You need to get those kinds of people in here and ask them what they are going to do and about what their social and moral responsibility is. You need to get the banks and others in. I do not know what the solution is, but this is a time to be
- incredibly creative, pool our genius and build up the partnerships that this new Assembly — thanks be to God — has the capacity to do at this moment in our history.
3105. Mr Copeland: What struck me was the way in which my preconceptions were wrong. I thought that money would be an urgent need, but most people said that money was not a problem because they could beg or busk or because others would give them money. I thought that food would be a problem, but it is not, because the bins are full and people give them sandwiches. Hot food is a problem on occasions. Their real problem seemed to be shelter and some way to tackle what is, essentially, loneliness. Most of them had worked previously and were not the victims of drink or drug difficulties. That was not what had led them there. They may well become —
3106. Fr Bartlett: By the way, those people also deserve our care and attention [Inaudible.].
3107. Mr Copeland: I fully understand. I am trying to put to you my own personal preconception of people who find themselves in that position, and the reasons why they find themselves so. For example, given my background, kicking a policeman is not something one does. If you kick a policeman, you get arrested, taken to court and sent to jail. To some of these folk, kicking a policeman is a route to a warm bed, warm breakfast, and a shower. Now, the total cost of that process would exceed the cost of putting them up in a five-star hotel overnight.
3108. So, are we being stupid in the way in which we approach the whole problem? We see it as siloed, which is a favourite word of mine, and we find very expensive ways of achieving absolutely nothing. I wonder whether you have any thoughts about that.
3109. Rev Donald Ker: Could I throw in another thought? I mentioned supported housing for care-leavers, in which I have been involved. Is there a way in which that - programme may be extended beyond those who have simply been in the formal structures of care, so that where you have people who have in some way managed to survive under whatever the family roof means until they are 18 years and, therefore, are out of the system, but now, for whatever reason, are on the streets? If their problem is finding a bed, company, or a certain amount of mentoring as to how to cope, is there a way in which the concepts of supported housing for care-leavers can be extended? You talked about silos; we may have done a bit of siloing in that respect.

3110. I am interested that you say that the problem is not money. I accept that.
3111. Mr Copeland: That is what they said.
3112. Rev Donald Ker: I quite accept that. At the same time, there is also an issue when, for some people, the problem is money, and when there has been some failure to claim all the benefit available. That is another area in which we are very keen and content to work with the Committee to make sure that the benefit provided is taken up. We are concerned that, in some cases, there is low take-up. Those are my two thoughts.
3113. Mr Copeland: The salutary lesson that I took away, and I fear that it is something that we will see a lot more of, is that there was an individual in one of those places who, until about six months ago, had a home, a car, a family, and a job worth £50,000 or £60,000 a year. In the space of that period, he descended into alcoholism and was sleeping in a shelter. His life experience has not equipped him to deal with that. Some people are so equipped, but he is not. I fear that there will be people who will find themselves in changed circumstances for which they are not prepared to cope
3114. Rt Rev Dr Roy Patton: I will follow on from Donald's comments. This is one of the questions that we will raise: what steps will the Department take to reduce the high level of under-claiming by those most in need? This is an area in which partnership is vital and the Churches could play a real role in it by alerting communities to that particular issue, and by encouraging people to claim, thus ensuring that the system works, as best it can, for all who are in need.
3115. Fr Bartlett: An example of that is that Age NI is contacting the Churches to get us to promote the winter warming campaign for older people, and ensure that they know what they can get. Clergy can visit homes and give out the packs, and say; "You need to do something about this" or "We will help you to get this."
3116. Mr Copeland: I am sorry for the length of that digression, Chair.
3117. The Chairperson: It is not a problem, Michael. It is very helpful. Clearly, it is an issue that we have to address, because we get periodical initiatives from the Department. Those are all very important and, on each and every occasion, they realise a number of additional benefits for people who need them and are entitled to them, but have not been claiming. However, there needs to be something much more organic than the process of just happening upon unclaimed benefits on an ongoing basis.
3118. Mr Durkan: Thank you for coming along today, gentlemen. First, I commend you on your proactive and collective approach on this issue. A lot of the issues that you have raised are ones that we have raised previously. A lot of the issues that I may have raised today have already been raised by members who have already spoken.
3119. Protection of the vulnerable is central to all your respective faiths, and I would like to think to ours as well. As Mickey rightly said, this legislation is an attack on the vulnerable. You mentioned the Institute of Fiscal Studies' analysis that £0.5 billion would be taken from the vulnerable. Not only is that money being taken from the vulnerable, which is reprehensible, it is being taken out of the wider economy. Do you share the view that they will, therefore, actually - create more vulnerable people, as that will inevitably lead to more shop closures, job losses benefit dependency?

3120. Housing stock was mentioned a couple of times, particularly its unsuitability given the proposed under-occupancy legislation. There is also an issue given the segregated nature of our housing stock. Unfortunately, there are people with different religious backgrounds who do not co-exist as harmoniously as you all seem to. Have you thought of the impact of that on your own congregations? For example, people will be asked to move to different areas of a city merely because there is a smaller unit available there or whatever.
3121. I like the lifeboat analogy. Whereas it was traditionally women and children first for lifeboats, they do not seem to have been afforded that privilege for this one. In fact, they seem to have been the first to be attacked. There are issues around childcare in particular. Do the Churches see themselves as having a role to play in that respect?
3122. Fr Bartlett: As you know, churches are very often the centre for childcare initiatives, clubs, nurseries and all of that. There is certainly more scope, given the infrastructure that they have at their disposal, often in very challenged areas. Again, this is where the partnership and conversation between the relevant Departments needs to be more detailed. They need to be more proactive in thinking of the Churches. To be frank with you, I remember meeting a senior official who was in charge of developing the work on child poverty. He set up a committee of about 25 people, and not a single Church had been invited to be part of it. When I pointed that out, he said, “Why would we invite the Churches?”
3123. Anyway, I am just saying that we need to be much more alert to how the social capital can be brought to bear on all these issues. However, we are living in very fragmented times. There is nothing easy in what you have asked about.
3124. Mr F McCann: Thank you for the presentation. I do not think that anybody who comes through these doors to make a presentation says that universal credit or any aspect of it is a good thing. We all take into consideration the fact that it will have a massive impact.
3125. I want to go back to what Michael said. I understand the work done by the Welcome Centre. I live a couple of hundred yards from it. It was actually kick-started by St Peter’s after a fire in the Morning Star hostel. It has its origins there, and it does some excellent work. However, the issue is much wider than that. It does not affect only people who are sleeping rough. I always operate under the old adage, “There but for the grace of God go I.” You are just one disaster away from something like that happening to you. I have been in and out of the Welcome Centre many times, and I know that the Chair has been too.
3126. Like Mickey, I have addressed quite a number of public gatherings. The more you explain this to people the more it depresses them. Rather than depress people, we are trying to find ways of starting to tackle some of it. All the parties around the table have opposition in their own ways, but not all the parties agree on the best way to approach this and take it forward. You spoke about lobbying. At this stage of the game, there needs to be intense lobbying from all the parties to all the key figures in the British Government as they look to implement this. Hundreds of thousands of people came out on the streets to protest about the poll tax, but there has not been anything like that this time because the British Government have started to criminalise those who claim benefits. There is a lot of work to be done.
3127. We can break it all down individually. Some people say that universal credit is good in itself because it brings all the benefits together. However, by the time you get to that stage, everything will have been cut so much that the impact will already have been felt.
3128. The Churches can play a unique role in bringing people together and giving - them advice and information. People will seek information not only on the impact that this will have on them but on how they can work with us to get around it, whether in respect of benefits, DLA and PIPs, ESA, the single-room allowance or under-occupancy.

3129. As Michael said at the start, it is not down to just what the four Churches can do and what you represent. We have a collective moral responsibility to try to take people through this. We, too, have a moral responsibility to ensure that we protect those in most need in society. There are a lot of things that all of us can do, and it is about how we approach it collectively.
3130. Given the parishes that you all represent, you are well-equipped to bring people together, discuss this with them, and look at the ways in which you can have an impact. Two things that have been mentioned are food banks and housing, but there is much more that gels the whole thing together. Hopefully we will have made some difference by the end.
3131. Rev Donald Ker: The family structure is something that we have not addressed yet but which is in our submission. We talked about families that break down and the effect of that on young people, but, thankfully, most families do not break down. This means that a large number of people are involved — not formally or paid for — in caring for those with special needs, the elderly and so on. This is an almost hidden task of caring, because it does not register in the economics. They could also be vulnerable to welfare reform and change. We plead with you to not forget carers when you are thinking through the possibilities of making sure that the most vulnerable are not left out. We are concerned that they could very easily slip through the net. Due to their task of caring within a family, they do not have the possibility of going out and finding paid employment elsewhere. They do, of course, save the state substantial money, although that is a very crude way of looking at it. Society has to be very careful that unpaid carers do not suffer as a result of this. We want to put that on the table.
3132. The Chairperson: Thank you for that. I tried to refer to it in my opening remarks, because you addressed it in your submission. We have to look at the implications for people who are caring, child-minding and so on. That leads into the whole area of conditionality, and we have to grapple with that. I appreciate your reminder.
3133. Mr Douglas: Thank you very much for your presentation. Over the past number of weeks, I have met a number of groups here and in other places. I ask them, “What can the Assembly do for you?” The biggest issue that comes up every time is welfare reform. So, you are right; you have hit the nail on the head. People have fear, and, as Roy said, it is not just in disadvantaged areas. A lot of people are struggling with their mortgages, job losses and those sorts of things.
3135. Mr Douglas: It is interesting, because on Friday I was at a seminar in east Belfast about welfare reform, and later afternoon I met with the East Belfast Independent Advice Centre. They told me that, because of poor benefit uptake, they have been able to help people to claim £1.8 million and that is just one organisation. I thought to myself: there is a huge saving to be made. It is money that would have gone back outside Northern Ireland.
3136. One thing I would say is this: a number of people have said that they have a heavier workload and that they are under pressure. I can see that churches are under pressure as well. Do you anticipate that your workload will increase as a result of welfare reform? Some organisations are telling us that their workload will probably increase by about 30%. They are at breaking point at the moment and are struggling. I thought I would just asked that question: do you anticipate that the workload of local churches will increase?
3137. Rt Rev Dr Roy Patton: There is no doubt about it. The Churches are engaged - in various processes at the moment. For example, there is an organisation called Christians Against Poverty. It is mobilising more people and training them. However, we can deliver only so much. I think that the issues identified here, regarding our ability to respond, are very time-consuming to start with. It is not as though you can sort out issues for individuals in five minutes. It is not as though that is all the time it takes to fill in the forms or things like that. It takes a lot more time. There is no doubt about that. Anything that can be done to encourage and support churches that are engaged at grassroots and on the ground level in supporting the wider community would be very helpful.

3138. Rev Donald Ker: You are right that the work will increase. I am aware of a church in my own denomination that is addressing this issue by setting up a small charitable community company in which it is involved. It knows that its work will increase; but one of the difficulties is accessing bits of the necessary funding that will allow it to get premises and administrative staff. It is staffed by volunteers, some of whom work morning, noon and night in one case, to try to get some funding that will help it meet the need.
3139. It falls back to churches. If there is a way in which such groups could access support funding to help them do the job. There is a sea of goodwill among our people, as well as a sea of concern. We know that we need to put the structures in place, and we seek to do that. However, accessing the funding to put a small community group in place, which will be involved with a lot of this, is a problem. I think that I have to name that.
3140. Mr Douglas: The other thing is that all that work and all those ideas need arms, legs and co-ordination. That was another thing that came out of the meeting with the independent advice centre. It also uses a huge number of volunteers. However, volunteers have to be managed, co-ordinated and trained. There are all those issues.
3141. In your paper, you ask, at point five,
- “What steps will the Department of Social Development take to reduce the high levels of under-claiming by those in most need?”*
3142. Advice Northern Ireland suggested to us that there should be some sort of statutory obligation to provide the resources for independent advice. Is that something with which you would concur?
3143. Rt Rev Dr Roy Patton: That would be very helpful. In the communities that we represent and are part of, this is an issue that needs to be addressed. It is not something that might happen; there must clearly be an obligation for it to happen, and every effort should be made to make it happen.
3144. It comes back to what we were saying about working together and partnership. All of us feel that this is something that we can advance together and make a real difference. People do not claim benefit for various reasons. Maybe they do not know, and they need information and advice. There are also others, who, because of their ethos and understanding, take the attitude that, “We have never taken money from the Government” or “We stand on our own two feet.” We need to encourage people to think differently about that. They have probably paid their national insurance and they deserve, and are worthy of receiving, the support that they need at this particular stage in their lives.
3145. Rev Adrian Dorrian: More important than the statutory obligation is that the mechanisms that are in place to make those things happen are fit for purpose. I echo the moderator’s comments that there is a strategic opportunity here, because the Church is probably best placed to do that. We have two members of the clergy in my parish in east Belfast, and, between us, we were in one of the local schools at length hearing about the problems that it is facing because of the cuts, not just welfare reform. Another of my colleagues was at a gathering that was organised by the Belmont and District Council of Churches on suicide in east Belfast. Over 100 people were at that, and it was called together at around a week's notice. I was not there, but my colleague was. At the same time, we were putting work into preparing for this, and a new food bank is about to open just down the road from us. Those are all things that are happening at the same time, and it may be that the Church is one of the few bodies in civic society that has, if you like, the overarching perspective. That is not to suggest that you and your colleagues in the Assembly do not, but there is a strategic opportunity to work together to ensure that those mechanisms that are being wheeled out into society, for example, for means-testing, and so on, are fit for purpose.

3146. Fr Tim Bartlett: I will respond to that with a wider comment. I do not underestimate the importance of and challenge to Churches to call on the generosity of those who might have a little more finance to spare. The Society of St Vincent de Paul is funded primarily from the voluntary contributions of parishioners in the Catholic Church, so we will have to ask those who have more to give more. So that we are not completely bleak about this, two great positives that we have in Northern Ireland are that we are an incredibly generous people, which will help, and we probably have a better community infrastructure and sense of community cohesion at local level. Sadly, it has fractured over the years, but this is an opportunity to work together and across traditional boundaries. I am as concerned about poverty and social cohesion in any part of Belfast as I am in Catholic areas. It is a time to look again at how we build good, strong communities that care for and support each other. It is a good thing in its own right that, as human beings, we should try to achieve that in societies. This crisis might help us rediscover how we do that a little. We are already good at that and are ahead of the rest of the UK.
3147. In fairness to Lord Freud, when the four Church leaders met him, he surprised me by acknowledging that Northern Ireland is a different place. As you probably all know, he has a particular interest academically and otherwise in Northern Ireland and its social welfare structures. I do not know how that has expressed itself in the journey to where we are now and whether any allowance has really been made apart from allowing you freedom to recalibrate minor bits of the legislation. We appealed to him and to the British Government to fund Northern Ireland more directly in addressing some of the other issues outside of the welfare system that can compensate. That is where I take Fra's point that we need to continue to lobby very strongly and together. Sorry if I have gone slightly off your question, Sammy.

3148. The Chairperson: A number of Committee members want to interject, and I will take them in order.
3149. Mr Douglas: I have one quick point to make. Adrian, you mentioned vulnerable people, particularly young people. I know that you have been involved in youth work over the years. Can you expand a bit on that? We hear about disability and elderly people and about benefits for a whole range of people. Can you give us a snapshot of your own feelings on how this will impact on young people?
3150. Rev Adrian Dorrian: Tying in with what Tim said at the start, I think that the two biggest things that sit with young people are the fear of what the future holds and the confusion around what the future holds. That includes people who want to go into further education and people who want to finish school and go out and get a job. They do not know what is out there. They know that there is not much out there, or at least that is the perception. Then they hear things such as there may not be the opportunity for housing benefit, so the idea of moving somewhere to find work, even part-time work, is not available to them.
3151. As Mickey said, 37% of young people who are on housing benefit are in employment. It just means that there is a sense of hopelessness, I suppose. That is the word that I get back most often. I hear, "What does the future hold for us?" and "What is the point - of working hard and trying to get qualifications or some sort of vocational training, because, at the end of it, there will not be anything?"

3152. My wife is a teacher who teaches part-time in two schools, and both of those jobs will probably be gone at the end of the year. There are limited prospects for the future, and, among people who are trying to go straight into work or further education or to take professional qualifications, there is a sense of hopelessness, if I have to summarise it in one word.
3153. Rt Rev Dr Roy Patton: That is a very significant issue, and, in some way, as a society together, we have to find ways of giving our young people hope. That is the most disastrous thing in our society at the moment. Some time ago, I talked to a secondary school principal who said that schools used to be able to say to their young people that if they wanted to get out of the poverty trap, they should get educated. The principal said that they can no longer say that because people can have PhDs and still be walking around. Somehow, we need to get that message out there and create some ways of creating opportunities to give people some hope.
3154. Mrs Cochrane: I need to learn to signal to speak sooner, because most members have come in on almost all my points.
3155. Mark raised the issue of childcare, and the Churches have a role to play there. I encourage them to feed into OFMDFM's childcare strategy. I am a mum who is paying £80 for my two children to be in childcare today, and that is not realistic for people. Mickey said that the minimum wage is £6.19 an hour, and someone who earns that cannot afford to pay £40 for one child for a day. When trying to help to find places for constituents, a lot of the groups that are being run really well in churches run from 9.00 am to 1.00 pm. That does not work, and that needs to be looked at. There have to be mechanisms for getting funding in to allow those things to continue longer, because some of the changes in welfare reform are to ask people to work more hours, so childcare needs to go on beyond that time. If you have to be back to pick your child up at 1.00 pm, you have to have finished work by 12.15 pm. Those are things that the Churches can do.
3156. Perhaps the Committee needs to go back to the Department to ask it to outline its communication plans. We have all raised it individually with it, but are we using the churches and their halls to have information sessions? I am sure that the churches would be quite happy to allow that to happen. Our church is linked into Acts 2:45, through which people make a specific request for things that they need, such as a kettle or a washing machine. You can really target help through that, and we find that to be useful.
3157. Given that the youth are the working generation of tomorrow, I will pick up on some of the information about that. I am a leader in the senior section of the Girl Guides, and, last week, we had a careers night with the Boys' Brigade (BB) in Bloomfield Presbyterian Church. That was brilliant, even just to give some of the kids the opportunity to speak with adults one to one and hear some ideas of what might not work for them. On the night of the Welfare Reform Bill's Second Stage, I had to nip home to take the Rangers, and, while I was taking them, I had the debate on my iPad, so they had to listen in to it. It raised a lot of questions for them, and they have now asked to do a session on money matters and lifestyle. They have not got a clue how much it costs to live or what decisions they have to take. That is not getting through to them in the schools. This is a group of teenagers asking for that. Perhaps that is another type of activity that could be going on. They should be encouraged to bring extra friends along, so that they too will get the opportunity to go through it.
3158. Rt Rev Dr Roy Patton: I think that that is a very helpful contribution. This is a way in which Churches can engage. It also needs the support of the wider community and government to make it possible and be really constructive, so - that it is not happening just in an ad hoc way. Teaching people basic issues around money, budgeting and all that could be significantly helpful.

3159. Mr Brady: I have just a couple of points to make. You mentioned carers, who are extremely important. Carers save the state approximately £4 billion a year in the North. Carers over 65 years of age save in the region of £500 million. It is a big, big issue. Carers are treated abysmally. To get carer's allowance, you have to be looking after someone for a minimum of 35 hours a week, and for that you get £58, which is £1.24 or £1.25 an hour. Carers are limited in what they can earn. There are all sorts of issues around that.
3160. Another point concerns benefit take-up. We talk about parity, and we have done. It is interesting that, in the early stages of welfare reform, Fra and I were both on the previous mandate's Committee. More recently, there have been pilot schemes in Britain on pension credit. Here in the North, approximately £2 million is unclaimed in pension credit each year. That equates to around £104 million each year. It is a considerable sum of money. The idea was that people would get automatic entitlement to pension credit, whether or not they were entitled to it. Then, after three months, it would be sorted out who was entitled.
3161. Scandinavia has a similar system. People do not have to claim their benefits but get automatic entitlement as it comes along. There is no reason that that cannot be done here. We were told that it could not be done here because we did not have postcodes. Of course we have postcodes. It is just another excuse.
3162. The other thing that is often forgotten in all this is one of the main planks of the Beveridge report: that those people who could afford to pay national insurance contributions, and so on, would support the most vulnerable.
3163. The Churches do a great job. As Tim says, we have a very good and well-developed voluntary sector infrastructure. I spent many years working in it. All of that is happening as it should do. However, the state has a duty of care to the most vulnerable. It is an old cliché, and often used, that the recognition of how good a state is is how well it looks after its most vulnerable people. It seems to me that the state now abdicates that responsibility.
3164. Let us go back to the lifeboat analogy and think about the Titanic. The majority of people who were drowned were in steerage, and it seems to me that the majority of people who will drown this time around will be in steerage. Nothing has changed. The state continues to abdicate its responsibility. You and all the voluntary organisations are doing wonderful work. We are supposed to live in a democracy that looks after people. Unfortunately, welfare reform is another indication that such responsibility is diminishing. That needs to be borne in mind.
3165. Rt Rev Dr Roy Patton: I support your views on that. Churches and the voluntary sector are willing to step up, as far as possible, to address this. I am still convinced that it is the responsibility of the state. Under Christian influence and teaching, we want a society that actually cares for people. That care is exercised through the discharge of government responsibilities as well as in the community, voluntary and Church sector.
3166. Mr F McCann: We as politicians have all said what we think the difficulties are. The most practical way to try to deal with complaints is to co-ordinate actions. Something that has not been raised is the direction that this is taking towards the financial institutions. People are being allocated financial advisers, who will advise them on how to spend £220 a month, which is really depressing. That is an area in which Churches can come in. They have an influence on credit unions and other financial institutions that have a far better outlook on how they deal with people who are banking their own money and provide some care. People's time

- will be wasted when they are brought in by these advisers to be told how they can spend their money. The Churches might be able to assist in that.
3167. Fr Tim Bartlett: That requires ongoing dialogue and partnership, but it is a very important point.
3168. There is one issue that has not been touched on at all but, for obvious reasons, is of deep concern to me. The whole idea that people will be encouraged to take people into their homes to use up spare rooms frightens the absolute life out of me for a whole lot of reasons, but the question that I urge you to pay particular attention to is this: how does that link in with the whole issue of child protection? People may be bringing into their home people either whose full background story they do not know, even though they might think that they know them from the local community, or whom they just do not know particularly, but needs must, and they bring them in.
3169. How does that connect with the sex offender register and that type of thing? On the one hand, government seems to be saying, quite properly, that we need to do more and more to protect children, and all the rest of it, yet they are creating this huge vulnerability. I appeal to you to look at how that issue might be addressed and safeguards put in place.
3170. Mr Brady: Father, the Housing Executive was in with us last week. It is doing a pilot scheme in Lurgan and Portadown around the Pathways programme. It is talking to people about underoccupancy and how that might be addressed. One of the issues is encouraging people to take in lodgers, and we raised the point that you make. The other thing is that, if people do take someone in, that will inevitably affect their benefit. Therefore, on the one hand, it may solve the underoccupancy problem, but, on the other hand, it will not solve their financial problems.
3171. The whole issue around child protection also applies to childcare. To access the childcare element of tax credits, your child has to be looked after by a registered childminder. As far as I know, it will be the same under universal credit. Historically, our children are looked after by mothers, aunts, sisters or whomever. However, they now have to be registered in order for parents to access that money. If relations register as a childminder, they have to take on at least one other child who is not related to them. It would seem that one way around that is for the mother, the sister or whomever to be vetted under the child protection legislation, the protection of children and vulnerable adults (POCVA) checks. That would possibly go some way to solving that problem, and it would be an example of joined-up government.
3172. I also sit on the Health Committee, and there are a lot of over-arching issues. There is nothing to stop social services looking at that. Children are being looked after, but people cannot access that element of tax credits. The majority of children are not looked after by registered childminders. We did a survey in my constituency around 12 years ago that found that we had the worst provision of registered childminders in western Europe. It just does not happen, but the children are looked after anyhow. That is another way of looking at it that may provide a solution.
3173. The Chairperson: Thank you for that, Mickey.
3174. I thank you, the representatives of the four Churches, for being here and for your written and oral presentations. We have covered a lot of ground. I want to assure you again that, in the past year or more, the Committee has had seven or eight pre-legislative briefings from the Department and engaged with a range of stakeholders. Some parties have engaged bilaterally with others. My own party engaged with you some months ago.
3175. There is a range of issues that are interrelated. We tend to categorise those. We are looking for whatever flexibilities there are in the system within the confines of parity. As I said earlier, some of us are not entirely wedded to parity or exactly sure as to what the limits are. We are also looking at what can be done by way of mitigation and at what else can be done to address the consequences of the legislation. That is a wider responsibility for the Executive, other Departments and important organisations in our society, not least yours.

3176. We as a Committee have a specific remit to look at the Bill's provisions to see what we want to do. On the basis of the evidence that we garner, we may seek to amend, change, oppose or whatever. That will be a matter for all Committee members in due course. It is also open for the Committee to make recommendations and observations by way of a narrative. We will deal specifically with the 130-odd clauses and dozen or so schedules, but we will also have the opportunity to comment. I have no doubt that some of your commentary will find its way into that narrative. I look forward to engaging with you again in due course.
3177. Rt Rev Dr Roy Patton: Thank you very much. We very much value the opportunity, and we wish you well in the challenging task that lies ahead.
3178. Fr Tim Bartlett: For the record, the Minister has written to the Church leaders to invite them to meet him before the end of this month.
3179. The Chairperson: Thanks a million.

3180. The Chairperson: I welcome everyone here this morning. Thank you for taking the time to make a written presentation as well as for coming to the Committee to speak to us and have a good discussion.
3181. Committee members have the papers before them. If members want a copy of the Bill folder, we have copies here.
3182. I do not want to get off on the wrong foot, but I must make a wee point. I see that one of the paragraphs in the written presentation from NIPSA seems to suggest that it is inappropriate for the Committee to give a three-week period for stakeholders to respond in. It states:
- “This response is therefore prepared within the unacceptable constraints imposed by the Social Development Committee as our initial response.”*
3183. I need to put on record that the Committee does not accept that. The Committee is very clear that we have a statutory time frame for legislation. Not only did we advertise before the time frame was scheduled but we telephoned people directly through the Committee Clerk. We have a list of the series of phone calls that we made, asking people to prepare evidence formally.

3184. Most administrative people, such as you, not only provided a written submission but attended, after the 19 October, and it is entirely up to you what you want to say in addition to what you have written. The floor will be yours in a couple of minutes.
3185. I am just making the point that the Committee is satisfied that, not only are we giving adequate time for this — it has devoted three days a week to the task of evidence-gathering, and rightly so, given the importance of the Bill — we had seven or eight pre-legislative briefings from the Department, we had a range of engagements from organisations, including a number of your own, over the past year or more and we have participated on panels organised by trade union representatives and others. Therefore, the Committee does not accept that it has restrained anyone from making an appropriate submission. We have a statutory framework to abide by.
3186. I say all that without prejudice to any member’s views on the Bill, whether or not members eventually support it. That is a matter for them to decide in due course. However, the Committee has, as I said, to work within the statutory time frame and the legislative process.
3187. The Committee believes that it is well within its remit. No matter what people’s views are, we are very anxious to engage with all the key stakeholders. We recognise that your sector is a very important one in society. We look forward to continuing to engage with you.
3188. Without further ado, I once again welcome you to the Committee, and we look forward to hearing what you have to say.

3189. Ms Alison Millar (Northern Ireland Public Service Alliance): I will lead off.

3190. I hear what you are saying, and I note the position of the Committee on the consultation and time frame.

3191. The Northern Ireland Committee, Irish Congress of Trade Unions (NICICTU), the Northern Ireland Public Service Alliance (NIPSA) and the Public and Commercial Services Union (PCS) have engaged with political representatives for quite some time now. However, the point that we made in the NIPSA submission is that we did not see the Bill in its totality until 1 October. With due respect, it has taken up a significant part of my time, Maria's time and that of a number of other people to try to get our submission in within the allotted time frame. We are still picking up issues of detail in the Bill because it is complex legislation and has far-reaching ramifications.

3192. We had hoped that the Committee would offer a 90-day consultation on it. To be perfectly frank, it is our view that this is all to fit in with the GB legislative time frame. They want to have most elements of this legislation in place for April. We will talk about the detail of that. We believe that things like the sanctions regime and the new benefits, such as PIP, etc, are designed to meet that time frame. Universal credit has now moved out for six months. Given the impact that this legislation will potentially have on Northern Ireland society and for workers in the system, it should not have to meet a legislative deadline of 1 April. That is the issue that we are raising primarily.

3193. Just to clarify the situation, I will kick off, and Maria, Derek and Pauline will cover various elements. That might help the Committee.

3194. We are aware of the Minister's announcement of 22 October, last Monday, about split payments, direct payments to landlords and fortnightly payments; that is all in our submissions. We fully support them.

3195. As with much of this legislation, the devil will be in the detail and the regulations.

We want to reserve the right, once the regulations come out, to engage with them. We have a question, at the outset, about the regulations. Will the regulations be fully scrutinised by this Committee in the same manner as the Bill? We hope so. As I have said, it is our position that the regulations should be subject to affirmative, rather than negative, resolution procedure. If it is appropriate, we would like to hear the Committee's view on that. The devil is in the details with a lot of this, and the regulations will be of great significance to us and to society at large.

3196. The Chairperson: Thank you for that, Alison. The Committee has not formally decided on a number of those key points and, as I suggested earlier, those matters depend upon what the parties and the members round the table eventually decide. Obviously, in due course, the Committee will consider all that.

3197. As I am chairing the Committee, I have to take a neutral stance. The Committee has not formally agreed on any of that. The Committee is well aware of that. I can safely say that I am satisfied that all the parties and the members around the table, no matter what way they ultimately vote, are fully aware of the consequences of the Bill, its implications and the big issues that are there to be dealt with.

3198. Our difficulty — to a member — with the Bill is that it is enabling legislation. Therefore, many of the regulations will come afterwards. You can be assured that all the regulations will be fully scrutinised by this Committee. We will engage with whoever we need to engage with and, equally importantly, whoever wants to engage with us at the given time. Our problem in grappling with the Bill is, precisely as you have already said, that a lot of the detail will come after it.

3199. Already, for the most part, we know what will happen through the Westminster Bill. Certainly, from my discussions with David Freud last week, I think that there are still huge question marks as to how all this will roll out. As far as

I am concerned, and I have said this publicly, I welcome the announcement on the area now to be dealt with: split payments, monthly payments and all the rest of it. However, none of that is settled yet. So there is still a day's work to be done on that.

3200. We welcome that direct payments will be made to landlords for people in receipt of rent. Beyond that, nothing else is formally agreed or tied down. So there is still work to be done by those who are concerned with that. As I said earlier, I and all the members around the table are satisfied with that.
3201. In making its decision, the Committee has to grapple with the fact that this is enabling legislation which will then be followed up by regulations. Regulations come after the primary legislation, which means that, to some extent, they are governed by the primary legislation. That is the big dilemma that Members will have to face when they eventually vote on the Bill. The Committee Stage is one part of this, and the Committee will make its decisions. It may seek to amend the Bill or change particular provisions in it. Obviously, there will be other Stages in the Assembly with opportunities. It is up to the Committee in its deliberations to decide whether to support amendments or propose amendments. We can also add a narrative to that by way of recommendations or observations, and I have no doubt that it will do so. There will be some things that may not be changeable in the Bill. It would not be right for me to count heads around the table, but the options for the Committee will be to make amendments, to oppose elements of the Bill perhaps, to support elements of the Bill perhaps and to make additional recommendations and observations. I have no doubt that a number of the submissions that we have heard so far and the members' own experiences will lead to a particular narrative. I could nearly write some of that script in advance, but that is up to all of the members. Alison, thanks for asking that question, which gave me the opportunity to set that out. The big issue for us is that the detail will come later on. We know already most of what is coming through Westminster, but, as I said to David Freud last week, I will, ultimately, have to vote on what is front of me, not what someone thinks might be all right on the night, so to speak.

3202. Ms Millar: Thank you, Chair. I understand that the Minister made headline announcements last week, and we will have to see how split payments and so on map out over the next short period. We are fully supportive of those three issues about direct payments to landlords, split payments and the view that fortnightly payments are more appropriate than monthly payments. They need to be fleshed out. Although we welcome those concessions, our view is that they do still do not improve the economics of the Bill, and it will still lead to £500 million being removed from the Northern Ireland economy. Further job losses will result. The Committee will be aware that, unlike other parts of the UK, our unemployment figures are rising and the number of available jobs is decreasing. Our submission includes the DETI figures from July of this year, which show that only 3,000 jobs are available, with 63,000 people, or thereabouts, unemployed. The figures do not stack up. We ask that, for those reasons, the Committee considers in the round the impact that the introduction of the legislation will have and that any mitigation should be taken in that broad context.
3203. As the Committee will be aware, NIPSA represents members in the Social Security Agency and the Housing Executive. Colleagues in the PCS represent members in Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs (HMRC). As we understand it, between now and the introduction of the legislation in 2017, although jobs may be ramped up in the initial phase to get the new benefit and changes in place, there is potential for up to 1,600 job losses in the public sector in those areas. We are currently working through the issues around the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 2006 (TUPE) and so on and how people in the public sector transfer to a new organisation. We do have serious concerns about the potential for job losses in the administration of benefits.

3204. We cannot accept that 1,600 job losses is appropriate. I refer the Committee to areas of the private sector and the recent announcement of 860 job losses at FG Wilson. Quite rightly, there was a special debate in the Assembly on that issue. Yet, it appears that the Committee and Assembly almost accept job losses in the public sector, whether the losses relate to the introduction of the Welfare Reform Bill or to change in other areas such as health or education services, etc. We ask the Committee to take that into account in its totality, because, with those types of job losses, the reality is that staff who currently administer benefits will end up being recipients of those benefits. That is a major issue, and members will be aware that thousands of jobs across the public sector have gone, and this will just bring further losses.

3205. Leaving aside the issues that I have already raised, we have concerns around elements of the Bill, such as universal credit. We are concerned about the benefit being primarily delivered online. In paragraph 3.2 of our submission, we refer to a previous PricewaterhouseCoopers (PWC) report that made it clear that claimants prefer face-to-face contact. We have major concerns about the impact of online payments on the vulnerable and those with low IT skills or poor accessibility to IT, such as the disabled. We do not believe that the Department for Social Development has thought this through. We believe that the people best placed to advise are our members who work in delivering these benefits. Individuals need to be able to access face-to-face contact. That is not something that only we believe; there is hard evidence in the PWC report into changes to the benefit system that face-to-face contact is vital. Otherwise, people do not claim. I know that each year the Department seeks to ensure that those entitled to benefits do claim, but we believe that there will be an increase in the number of non-claimants. Because it will be computer-driven and people cannot have questions answered, etc, there is the potential for more errors. There is also the potential of sanctions and conditionality penalties being imposed on people because they have made a mistake. So, we do not believe in, and have major concerns around, the whole IT provision and online accessibility.

3206. We have major concerns around the clause 5 provision for the introduction of a taper. We do not have a figure for that that we can state today, but we believe that it should be set at the highest possible level. We believe that doing that does not break parity, because there is flexibility to introduce a different taper in the Northern Ireland context. We have been listening in to other people who have been in front of the Committee, and you have heard concern expressed about the impact of the tax credit issue, particularly but not exclusively because tax credit changes earlier this year have already hit middle- and low-income families and driven down their standard of life. I have heard stories of people already losing between £30 and £130 of their tax credit. From our reading of the Bill, one of the tax credit issues is that it is likely to impact on older claimants who may have spent time saving for their retirement. This is all about making work pay; so, will the changes mean that people who have worked and continued to put aside money for their retirement or to send their children to university no longer receive tax credits? Our reading is that older people are more likely to have spent time saving for their retirement, and the Bill's savings rule for those with £6,000 to £16,000 will have a negative impact on older people, which may raise an equality issue for the Committee to examine. So, we ask the Committee to consider putting the case for protection or transitional arrangements to be put in place for tax credit claimants who will transfer to universal credit and that the capital entitlement for one or both of a couple who have reached the age of 60 should also be exempt and have

- protection. We ask the Committee to consider that in its deliberations.
3207. I will touch on the issue of the benefit cap. It will be £500 or £350 depending on whether it applies to a couple or a single adult. We have major concerns about the benefit cap, particularly the impact on families with children. The August 2011 figures show that just short of 82,000 claimants are on income support, and, of those, just over 33,500 have children. With the larger-family issue, 8,000 have three children or more; 2,000 have four children or more; and 870 have five or more children. Therefore, as child benefit is included in the cap, that will potentially impact very negatively on families, particularly those families with a larger number of children.
3208. As I understand it, while PIP is excluded from the benefit cap, the disability premiums of the child tax credits will be included in the cap. The Northern Ireland Commissioner for Children and Young People's research and figures show that 6,500 families will lose under the new arrangement. So, there will be an impact on health and well-being, and educational outcomes will be diminished for children, particularly those from larger families. So, as an action point, we ask the Committee to consider whether it should ensure that the benefit cap is removed or set at a high level to protect families and children, irrespective of family size, because, as you know, there are larger families here in Northern Ireland than, perhaps, in other areas. We are asking that the Committee consider overall whether, because of the negative impact, the benefit cap should be removed and set at a higher level for families with children.
3209. I will move on to the housing element and finish there. I will then pass over to my colleagues. We very much welcome the housing element of universal credit being paid to the landlord, and I think that that will address a serious number of the concerns that we had. However, there remain quite a number of issues with housing that we want the Committee to consider. For example,
- the intention of clause 11 is to provide an amount to be included for universal credit for housing costs, and that is not related to actual rent in the local housing market. That should be included, because our understanding is that that has the potential to cause a disconnect between the housing costs and the actual rent and, therefore, over a period of time, cause further hardship or perhaps even homelessness. That also impacts on and has a resonance with the Department setting the rents at either consumer price index (CPI) or the bottom 30th percentile. It is currently at 50%. Again, that has the potential to cause homelessness.
3210. The issue that has most exercised the minds of many is that of bedroom tax and underoccupancy. I will not tell the Committee what it already knows, but 14% of properties in Northern Ireland have one underoccupied bedroom, and 25% have two or more underoccupied bedrooms; so there is potential for tenants to receive approximately £8·25 or £14·70 a week less respectively. Again, that will result in hardship or homelessness. We believe that the Committee needs to address the issue of what is commonly called the bedroom tax, and we have looked at some of the issues with the availability of social housing and houses with one and two bedrooms. The 2009 Housing Executive housing condition survey showed that the availability of properties with one and two bedrooms is very limited. That is in our submission.
3211. We think that non-resident parents should be exempt from the current shared-room requirement in housing benefit. For a variety of reasons, including child protection reasons, we do not think that it is acceptable that a child should have to share a bed with a parent. When I talked to my colleagues in social services, they said that there were issues under the Children's Order in relation to the potential there. That is not to discredit any parent or family member or to say that they would abuse a child, but, under the Children's Order and from my contacts with social services, it raises issues around child protection.

3212. To sum up, as you will know, 90% of social housing in Northern Ireland is segregated. While the Housing Executive has been working to improve that over the years, it will take a generational change and a focus to change that situation. We have to recognise that we are coming out of 30-plus years of conflict. We ask the Committee, in its deliberations, to consider not introducing the underoccupancy bedroom tax until sufficient social housing of one and two bedrooms has been built to meet the needs and/or, where there are children involved, the underoccupancy rule should be set aside until we are able to get houses built that are of sufficient standard. What we are actually saying is that we do not have the resources and have not been able to do the in-depth study. Perhaps that is something that the Committee would want to get its researchers here to look at. If people are made homeless, they turn up at the Housing Executive. What is the cost impact if they have to be put up in more expensive accommodation? What is the impact, not just from a cost point of view but from a point of view of the children and the family living in hostel type accommodation, etc? Therefore, it is not just about the cost; it is about the social impact of a lot of these changes. As I said, the Assembly should exempt non-resident persons from the shared-room requirement in relation to the housing costs. I will finish there and pass over to my colleague Maria, who will go through the conditions and sanctions.

3213. The Chairperson: On your last point, I just want to make the point that David Freud has already said, and the Minister mentioned it last week, that he is going to come over here by the end of this month to look at the whole question of housing benefit. I am just repeating to you the announcement that was made last week. We had a presentation from the Housing Executive last week, which said that, on the evidence that it had so far from its own database, it could not meet the challenge if people affected by this presented themselves tomorrow morning. That will add to the issue around displaced costs. I am not going to bring in other members until we hear the presentation.

3214. Ms Maria Morgan (Irish Congress of Trade Unions): Thank you, Chair. Alison made the point that the aim of the trade unions in coming here today is to try to express in detail some of the ramifications of the proposals. That said, the devil is in the detail, which will be in the regulations, so we got our trade union side in the areas that currently deal with disability living allowance DLA and jobseeker's allowance JSA to try to give us some of their concerns in order to highlight the ramifications.

3215. We are opposed to this Bill on the basis that it is, as it says, predicated on cuts very significant cuts of £18 billion, which will mean £500 million for Northern Ireland. We have tried to extract the ramifications as best we can without the detail. I am going to deal specifically for now with sanctions, conditionality and hardship, which relate to clauses 13 to 30. Those clauses introduce severely increased sanctions for people who fail to meet conditionality requirements. We ask the Committee to consider whether those clauses are proportionate and reasonable. We ask that because, if you look at the period of sanctions – 13 weeks, 26 weeks and up to three years – it is quite incredible to try to imagine that you would sanction anybody for three years. However, leaving that aside, that is the worry that we have in dealing with this issue. If you were to sanction someone for that length of time, we would have absolutely no doubt that hardship and destitution would result. That would have to be considered with respect to the equality and human rights aspect of the Bill, including the consequences of the withdrawal of benefit and what that might mean to families, particularly those with children.

3216. There has been an increase in instances of aggression against public sector workers. In our own environment, in Jobcentre Plus, PCS and across NIPSA,

- the potential increase in violence or aggression occurs where people are in despair and coming into our offices. That is not to say that these are not reasonable people. They are people who come in, first-time unemployed, and our fear is that our members are not being given the time to deal with job search and to create all of the de-stressers that are needed when someone is in that situation. We are very proud that our members provide that service. However, we worry about where our society will end up, if that service is removed.
3217. In clause 22 of this particular area, it is required that 35 hours a week are taken to find work. We do not oppose in any way the principle that those who are unemployed should take reasonable steps to find work. In our view, if you are to scrutinise what 35 hours of seeking work might mean to someone, it should not mean that someone should trawling the streets or offices. There are mechanisms in place for that now. We do not know what 35 hours of seeking work would mean. I have worked in a benefits office, and I really do not know what that would mean. I think that that needs to be looked at. Is it excessive?
3218. The other thing is that we are very concerned about is that, although the Bill is about getting people from benefit into work, what has not been publicised is the number of in-work people that it will affect — the working poor. All work requirements contained in these clauses can be imposed upon claimants who already work but who earn below a certain threshold. That will affect, for instance, lone parents who cannot work full-time hours any longer because of various barriers. One of those barriers is absolutely clear in Northern Ireland, and that is the lack of affordable childcare. There is no Northern Ireland strategy to address those issues at the moment. Lone parents are predominantly female, and we are concerned that no analysis has been done. The equality impact assessment has been done on the Bill, but it is our view that it lacked detail. No real impact has been assessed.
3219. The family resources survey (FRS) figures have been used to assess what the Department calls “winners” and “losers”. Those are not our terms. The FRS data is from 2009-2010. They are old, pre-recession figures and, in our view, they would not identify the current economic climate and the high levels of unemployment.
3220. Alison made the point that Northern Ireland is different, and we have to consider that we are coming out of conflict. There are high levels of mental ill health. We have people who would take jobs if jobs were available, but they are not available. You need to consider that when you look at sanctions. Who would be affected if sanctions were imposed, as provided for in the Bill?
3221. There is also the issue that Northern Ireland has the highest unemployment of all 12 regions. It was on the news last week that Britain is officially out of recession. I do not know how that makes any difference to anyone’s pocket. We are talking about society and people. NIPSA and PCS members would all say the same thing. In a school, our members have been asked to reduce their hours rather than lose a classroom assistant. They have reduced their hours in order to keep people in work. If the sanctions say, “You are not meeting enough hours or an earnings threshold. Go back to your employer and ask him whether you can increase your hours.” That will not happen. I represent NIPSA in the Civil Service, and we have a lot of part-time workers. There are simply not enough hours available. These are part-time workers in receipt of tax credits who will be universal credit claimants, and the hours are not there.
3222. We ask the Committee to consider that we are imposing a potential sanction on someone because they are not working enough hours, because they are not earning enough money. That is the way our society is made up. Neither we nor anyone else in the room will be able to address that. In particular, employers will not be able to address it. I know that there has been some discussion with the Committee for Enterprise, Trade

- and Investment to see how employers can put someone from benefit into work when there are people who are already in work and cannot get the hours. That is a huge worry for us. Alison also pointed out that there are between 3,000 and 4,000 vacancies and, as we speak, nearly 120,000 people seeking work in Northern Ireland.
3223. In July, there were 11 jobs going in a DFS furniture store in Derry, and 2,300 people applied for them. There are examples such as this at Asda stores across Northern Ireland. We are aware, and have been told, that the cuts will be made by cutting down on the number of workers, and it is planned that another 40,000 jobs will be cut. So, given that we know that the Tory Government are proposing to make more people unemployed, and that sanctions will be imposed on those who cannot find work, there will be a big cycle in which people will not be able to claim benefits and will not have the safety net of the welfare state that they need.
3224. We have an issue with universal credit. The current six working-age benefits will become one benefit. That will, in our view, be a platform for privatisation. On that point, colleagues will cover some issues around Atos.
3225. Before I leave the sanctions issue, I want to say that according to research carried out by the Institute of Fiscal Studies, Northern Ireland will be hardest hit after London. To date, we have not seen any analysis from the Department on who will be impacted. Until we know that, the only thing we can go on is our currently high levels of unemployment. If sanctions of 13 or 26 weeks, or three years are imposed on people, that will create poverty in Northern Ireland. If there are not enough jobs, and there is not childcare, we do not see how these proposals can be met. On that basis, we ask that these clauses be removed and that some analysis is done. Nobody can tell us any more than we know already about what, who, or how many people will be impacted. On that point, we would say that more analysis needs to be done on who may be impacted.
3226. Clause 28 deals with hardship payments. At the minute, such payments exist to see people through periods when their benefit is not paid. The proposal is for hardship payments to become loans. We just do not think that this is acceptable. We take issue with the fact that if someone's benefit is stopped their hardship payment will be a de facto loan. This is a huge deviation from the current set up and is unacceptable to us.
3227. I want to touch briefly on the proposal to reduce receipt of the contribution-based ESA to a year. Chair, you will know that we raised this point when we were here in December. What will happen to people who pay into the national insurance scheme all their working lives? We still cannot understand what will happen if, after 30 years of paying in all that money, someone becomes ill but gets only a year's benefit. Where is the money going to? Who is telling those individuals that they are investing in a welfare state and in a future that they will not be able to take up? That is a massive issue for us. Where is the money going? Whose idea was it to dismantle the national insurance scheme? Why does nobody know about it?
3228. We have trade union members who are postmen and women, refuse collectors, and others who do heavy duty work that means, in the future, they may be ill with back problems, or whatever, but who will receive only one year of all the money they invested in the national insurance scheme. We are asking you, "Where is that money going?", because we cannot get answers anywhere else. After contribution-based ESA has been paid for a year, if the partner in the household is working, the sick person will receive no money. Roughly £6,000 a year will be lost. When we talk about money coming out of the economy, that is what we are talking about. The economics is the clear bit. It is about what will happen to children and sick people in such households if this happens. That is the reality of what is contained in the Bill.
3229. I will finish very briefly with the clauses on child maintenance, starting with clause 121. The child maintenance and

- enforcement division in the Civil Service protects children and ensures that child poverty does not increase. You will know that the Northern Ireland Assembly discussed child poverty in October. In Northern Ireland, 122,000 children have been identified as living in poverty. The figures are staggering. Save the Children has made comments such as, “If this Executive does not do something about this, we will be in a crisis with child poverty.”
3230. Due to the changes to child maintenance, we are concerned that private agreements will have to be reached between parents. These are parents who quite often, because of the breakdown in a relationship, do not have any discussion with each other. How can they possibly come to a private agreement? Regardless of whether they do, who will be impacted? It will be nobody other than the children. The poverty strategy that the Assembly is working on has been tasked to reduce child poverty by half by 2020. That will simply not happen.
3231. People will also now be charged for using the Child Support Agency. Given all the other implications of the Bill, we wonder how, if fees are introduced, anybody will find the money to go forward and ask for help for child maintenance collection. The private arrangements and the privatisation aspect are also big worries. Our members in the Civil Service, across the Social Security Agency and the child maintenance and enforcement division, are best tasked to deal with people in distress and poverty. Part of the objective is to get children out of poverty.
3232. Mr Derek Thompson (Public and Commercial Services Union): First, I would like to make some general comments about the Welfare Reform Bill on behalf of the Public and Commercial Services Union (PCS). PCS is utterly opposed to every aspect of the welfare reform agenda. We agree that the welfare system needs to be reformed but not in the manner outlined in the Bill. We believe that the Bill is almost draconian. It is nothing more than a systematic attack on a class and on generations.
3233. If this attack goes unchallenged, it will marginalise and impoverish millions of people in society and thousands here in Northern Ireland. This is one of the reasons why I have come here on behalf of the PCS. I represent the PCS nationally. I have been having meetings about welfare in Westminster and in the Scottish Parliament. We are asking people to look at the direct impact on communities and on the people you are elected to serve. I will touch on some of the stuff that is specific to Northern Ireland as I go along.
3234. I am here, primarily, to discuss PIPs, which will replace DLA. Their introduction will see a 20% cut in DLA. That has a monetary value, which I will touch on later. There are questions that we should always ask ourselves. Why was DLA introduced? Who benefits from DLA? Why is it needed? If you think that disabled people have the same advantages as those who work, you are mistaken, and I will cover some of that later.
3235. The mobility component is designed to support people. One of the things that we looked at was the success of the Paralympic Games. A lot of the athletes who took part in that said that DLA was a major component in allowing them to go through their life and take part in their sport. The mobility component allows people to leave the house on a regular basis, to socialise, and to have some form of life in the community. That will be taken away in some way, shape or form.
3236. Maria touched on the issue of mental illness. Northern Ireland has particularly high figures in that regard. As we know, it probably has the highest figures for post-traumatic stress in the UK. These people will be disadvantaged by this process and the 20% cut. One of the things that has been missed in respect of the introduction of PIPs is how it will be managed through the benefits system. My understanding is that we are quite close to being able to deliver new claims across the benefit system but that we will not be able to deliver in respect of change of circumstances. How many people with mental illnesses and some physical illnesses will be able to use the online systems that are available to them? Where are they going to go when the different aspects start to come through? We need to look at that.

3237. One of the key aspects that the Committee should be looking at is this: who has the authority to make decisions on behalf of disabled people claiming PIPs? I urge people to look at the disaster that is ESA just now, the referrals that go through Atos, and the horrific nature of what Atos puts people through. I am not blaming those who work in Atos or those who work in the benefits system. I am blaming the stipulations put on them by this Government to get more and more people off disability benefits and on to jobseeker's allowance or ESA. There are false figures. They are massaging the figures to try to get rid of some of those targets that are out there.
3238. It is crystal clear that we need to work on the assessment process for PIPs. I would like accountability for that to lie with the Department. A strong case has to be made for every decision on somebody's benefit entitlement to be taken by a decision-maker who is sanctioned by the regulations that are in place rather than for those decisions to be taken at the behest of an Atos adviser who is looking primarily at a profit in some way, shape or form for the number of people they get on and off benefit. The number of people they disallow is profit-driven. There has to be some kind of control over that. As a Committee, you need to make sure that that is built into every single stage so that authority to decide someone's entitlement to PIPs lies with a decision-maker who is employed by the Civil Service and who is sanctioned by the regulations to make that decision.
3239. Having a history in the benefit department, I say that there needs to be some form of accountability to the Assembly as well. One of the key things that you have to look at is reviewing the process on an ongoing and regular basis. You have to see how many people are coming off benefits and how many have failed to have a PIP claim accepted. Then, the key issue that you have to look at is how many people appeal those decisions and how many win their appeals. This is my real fear about the introduction of PIPs. Appeals under ESA have jumped through the roof. The majority of people go on to a lower rate of benefit or lose their benefit completely, but win an appeal six months later because the decision is found to have been fundamentally flawed. We are opposed to that, as I said, but the issue is not about that: It is about getting this right from the very start and ensuring that people are protected as much as possible.

3240. I will be open about the evidence that we have received about the Atos assessors. Sometimes it is almost a case of, "Welcome. What is your illness? That is fine. Away you go." There is no real assessment being made. People are not being trained properly. Sometimes they do not even see a proper doctor but rather a nurse or an assessor. Who trains those people? Who employs them? What accountability do Atos employees have? We need to get a guarantee about that before the Welfare Reform Bill is set in stone. We need a guarantee that those who are making assessments on people's lives are properly trained to carry out that function. I hope that you will try to get that guarantee.
3241. Control must rest with the Department: that is the key principle for us. The failure of private provision of welfare is legendary. We are dealing with people's lives and prospects, but privatisation is creeping in. Surely, the object of a civilised society must be to put people before profit and support them. The PIPs will lead to further barriers for those who are looking to get into long-term employment. Let us be honest: there is not an even playing field when it comes to disabled people looking for employment or disabled people getting support. There is a number of reasons for that. One of the reasons that DLA was created was that it brought - down some of those barriers and gave support.

3242. We now have a process in which people who are disabled go out of work, and who, under whatever assessment is needed, lose their benefit. How will they fare in the job market if they are up against an able-bodied person? Which person is an employer more likely to employ? The disabled person will need the support that has been withdrawn from them. They might need reasonable adjustments in their workplace that have been withdrawn under the coalition Government's rules on employment law. Those are all barriers to people who have disabilities getting into work and ensuring that they continue to be supported.
3243. The savings outlined are around £23 million in the first year and £64 million in the second year. Those figures are a drop in the ocean in benefit terms. They are nowhere near the current figures for unclaimed benefits. So, where is the programme that will get people who are entitled to benefits to claim them? We should also be looking to minimise the disruption for the disabled person that PIP threatens to bring about.
3244. I will sum up by saying that you need to try to ensure that there is fairness and transparency in the process; keep as much control as possible over the outside providers and GPs who are making the decisions to ensure fairness, and ensure that the Department has overall control over those decisions. This is about bold choices. I said that at the hearings I attended in different places. There are choices to be made by everyone in this matter. The general Westminster drive on welfare reform is there, but I believe that every Assembly has its own way to go.
3245. We have seen the demonisation of people on benefits, of those on disability benefits, which I think is a shameful approach. Almost a shock-and-awe tactic has been used, and, from that, we have seen a rise in hate crime against the disabled as well. How do people feel when they are coming off disability benefits or are losing benefits every week? They cannot go out into society anymore. They cannot get jobs that they feel they can go through with.
3246. I urge you to oppose welfare reform in any way, shape or form that you can. I know that you may feel that you are not in a position to do that. Along with other trade unions, we will soon be campaigning massively against the welfare reform agenda; not just against what is coming in now but opposing further cuts that we know people will face in the future. We need to make stark choices as a society on a number of issues, but, on one of them, the Committee and Assembly have the opportunity to draw back from some of the Bill's more draconian measures and make sure that disabled people get their proper entitlements and benefits and that a proper support system is in place for them.
3247. The Chairperson: Thank you, Derek.
3248. Ms Pauline Buchanan (Irish Congress of Trade Unions): Congress is worried that there has been no human rights analysis of the Bill and its potential implications. Northern Ireland's culture and structure is left over from the Troubles, and I do not think that we can move away from that fact or pretend that it has had not had a major influence on the welfare system. The benefits system cannot possibly sit on its own, away from that structure and away from past influences.
3249. Congress also believes that the Welfare Reform Bill cannot work in these recessionary times. Let us have a look at it if we have the jobs to go round, but we do not have them. What we have at the minute is temporary employment, job insecurity, and zero-hour contracts. Put simply, we have no work. We believe that there are not the structures to support the Bill, and we ask you to look strongly at that aspect.
3250. We also believe that the 20% cuts in DLA and PIP, as outlined by my colleagues, are driven by figures rather than by people or the society in which we all want to live. We are deeply concerned that major cuts will be made in DLA, contribution-based ESA and lone-parent conditionality. Those are three areas that particularly concern us. I reiterate that there are high levels of socio-economic deprivation and a higher reliance on the welfare benefits system because of the Troubles. For people with disabilities, the proposals are based on a medical model of their having need and requiring treatment, rather than on the social model that we should have, and very much work towards, of inclusion and participation.

3251. Women will be affected greatly. We all know, and have heard it again from my colleagues, that women are more likely to be carers and have the bulk of childcare responsibilities. We ask that you consider whether the lone-parent conditionality and other cuts that will affect women, because they are more likely to be on means-tested benefits, amount to indirect discrimination under the Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW). Again, for women in particular, but also for those with disabilities and in marginalised groups, there are no childcare structures to enable access to training and to gain employment. The fact that they are simply not there must be considered as well.
3252. Under sanctions, which Maria covered, we ask whether there has been full equality. Has there been investment in the areas that there should have been? Is there full equality for those with English as a second language? Through research that has been done here, we all know that there are high inequalities and high rates of illiteracy, and we need to put a lot of resources into essential skills. Are those people starting on a level playing field? There has been major underinvestment in people with learning disabilities and there is no childcare structure. There have been inequalities in investment in the past that will very much affect those who are under sanctions and conditionality.
3253. Through research, we know that the key inequalities, coupled with welfare reform, will have a major impact on those who are most vulnerable. If we look at our education system and link it to welfare reform, a lot of people here leave school without qualifications, and that can lead to a lifetime of poverty — it starts off with child poverty and it can lead to a lifetime of poverty. Future poverty is linked to educational attainment, and I think that we need to look at that.

3254. At this point, it is also unclear what the impact of passported benefits will have on welfare reform and what the impact will be on those who lose their benefits. Will they also lose free school meals and uniforms? We also do not know what the impact will be on those who have always found it difficult to obtain work, for example, those in the Travelling community and looked-after children.
3255. Maria covered a bit about employment in her discussion of clauses 13 to 30, and we are very concerned about the move to three-year sanctions. We need to consider all the aspects that make up employment here, or non-employment as there is at the moment. There is no job security, and we need to look at where workplace locations are and whether they are accessible to everyone and at harassment. Those can be major issues for people who leave employment, and those who voluntarily leave employment or who are dismissed face being placed under sanction for three years.
3256. Harassment is a major issue in the workplace, which may mean people having to leave their jobs or being dismissed, perhaps unfairly. We deal with lots of grievance and disciplinary cases, which then go into the system. They can be because of race or whether someone is lesbian, gay, bisexual or transgender. They can also be because of sectarianism in the workplace, which is an issue that we all know that we need to keep looking at and putting resources into. We also have zero-hour contracts and all sorts of insecurities. Workers need the safety net of a social security system, and that is not going to be there for them. If it is taken away, we expect to see a rise in exploitation. People will not challenge their - employers: if they are being harassed in the workplace they will be afraid to leave the workplace and will not challenge in case they lose their jobs. They will then face three years of absolutely nothing. We are very worried that there will be a rise in exploitation, sectarianism, racial harassment and many other issues in the workplace.

3257. It has been well documented that there is poorer access to training and employment for women. One of the major barriers to women's participation in the workplace is caring. We all know that we are becoming a more ageing society and there is also the issue of childcare, which is also crucial.
3258. For those with disabilities, trying to access the workplace is a major issue. The key barriers for people with disabilities are education, attitudes and transport. One of the major issues in the Bill is the removal of DLA and mobility allowance. That will mean that people with disabilities will not be able to access the workplace.
3259. Alison covered all the issues about housing, such as the availability of housing and shared housing. We also want to raise the lack of suitable housing for those with disabilities to live in supportive environments. There will also be major issues for looked-after children, such as whether the parents of children in care will be able to have their children come back to them or to come home at weekends. All the issues around looked-after children are very unclear. We want to live in a social model for participation, and I think that the Welfare Reform Bill is going to roll back on that.
3260. We also feel that the contravenes section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998. We are worried about its impact on CEDAW, which was ratified by the UK Government in 1986 and its impact on the UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, which was ratified by the UK in 2009. There are other pieces of law, such as the European Convention on Human Rights, on which I am not an expert, but we have major concerns that the Bill will contravene them.
3261. I want to tell you a personal story. I was raised on benefits. I was born in the 1960s, when there was no work. I was in receipt of free schools meals and my mum and dad were in receipt of benefits. I had a brother who was not as robust as the rest of us, and one of the things that I remember as a child was my mum sending my other brother for a bottle of over-the-counter medicine, and, as he came through the door, he fell and he broke it. To this day, I can see her kneeling down over it crying, because there was no more money. We have built a society to move away from those days and to move back towards that is just unacceptable. I would never want another family to have to go through such a thing.
3262. We believe that there is mitigation for difference. There can be a stretching of parity, and that must be sought because of the special circumstances in Northern Ireland.
3263. Some of the examples that I have given you of where people are most vulnerable were taken from the reports of OFMDFM's promoting social inclusion disability working group, the Joseph Rowntree Foundation, DENI databases and 'Care Matters'. Thank you.
3264. Ms Millar: Chair, I just want to give a very brief run-through. It has been said by a number of people that a Bill that considers only the cost — we looked very much at that issue — is not acceptable, particularly if it does not look at the social impact. If it does not do that it must be a flawed Bill.
3265. Many people in Northern Ireland will live with the consequences of the Bill. You, as a, Committee and the Assembly owe it to those people to take the time to get it right, and to ensure that we can live with its consequences from a social point of view. I do not think that the public quite realise what is coming down the road, and I think that a division has grown up between in-work and out-of-work families. In particular, families who - are in receipt of tax credits do not see themselves inside the benefit system, and I think that it will come as a huge surprise to them.

3266. To sum up some of the issues that we have touched on today; as a society, Northern Ireland as a whole prides itself on having strong family values, but we are different in a number of respects. There is no childcare strategy; we are coming out of a post-conflict situation with segregated housing; we have more DLA claimants as a result of the conflict and we have a greater proportion of larger families — I spoke earlier about the 870 families we have with five or more children, and that is just families who are in receipt of income support. We also have higher levels of unemployment and those levels continue to rise month on month. We are certainly not out of recession.
3267. In summary, this is about choices for the Committee and the Assembly. We welcome devolution, but with it comes responsibility. We implore the Assembly to make the right choices for the society of Northern Ireland and for the workers in that society. This will create a generational change, and we will have to live with it, potentially for a generation or generations to come.
3268. Ms Morgan: I do not need to tell you that the Tory millionaires will never need to use the welfare system. They will never need to use the education system, which is why they are privatising that and the health service. I do not need to tell you what the pain that they are inflicting on communities will be like.
3269. The Chairperson: I thought that we were all in it together.
3270. Ms Morgan: Yes. You will all know from your constituency offices the type of people who come through your door. I was speaking to a community worker last week, and 800 people who are in absolute despair are coming through her advice centre. So we would like the Committee and the Northern Ireland Assembly not to allow themselves to be bullied by the Tory Government into introducing cuts that will result in destitution. Suicide rates in Northern Ireland have increased; it is all there in front of us. If the cuts are implemented, there will be no turning back. We believe that the Assembly can make a difference, and that is why we are here today to say that there is harm in the Bill. There are issues with parity, and there will have to be difficult discussions. Some things will cost money, and we understand that that it is difficult, but we ask you to tell the Westminster Government that there are some things that you just cannot implement. If you do not do that, they will not be Tory cuts but Northern Ireland Assembly cuts. We ask you to consider alternatives where you can, and the trade union movement will work with you as best we can on that.
3271. The Chairperson: Thank you all for your very comprehensive contributions so far. It has been a good engagement. I need to step out for a moment; I will back in a minute.
3272. Mr Copeland: Very wise, Chair.
3273. Thanks for your presentation. I have a couple of points, largely related to what Alison said at the start, and I will take them in the order that I noted them down, which is not chronological. You commented, Alison, that you had spoken to people in social services about the bedroom tax, single room rate, or whatever you want to call it. Is it your view that the lack of a separate bedroom for a child visiting the non-resident parent would, in a court, militate against access rights being granted for overnight stays?
3274. You referred to the 40,080 and the 22,156 people in housing stress. It is my understanding that those are the numbers of applications as opposed to applicants and that, if that number was extrapolated on the basis that there could be two, three or four people per application, the number of people involved could approach 100,000, as opposed to the lower figure of 40,000 applications.

3275. Lastly, may I ask a general question? Years ago, I found that, if you wanted to know what was really happening, you did not ask a general, major or even a sergeant, you asked a private — people on the front line. A lot of the changes will fall on your members, Maria. Are you picking up any sense at all that the Department knows what it is doing?
3276. Ms Morgan: Are you looking to get me into trouble?
3277. Mr Copeland: It is a straight question. I have day-to-day communications with a large number of your members who work on the front line with people who are, as you said, sometimes aggressive. I wonder how we discharge our duty of care towards the people who, day after day, have to listen to absolutely heart-wrenching stories, yet the legislation is similar to the advert: “Computer says no”. How do you protect psychologically the people who have to relay those decisions? I have a deep suspicion that this will all come wrapped like a Christmas present: you will open it and probably not like it, but you will have to deal with what comes out of the box. I am curious about how the preparation for and recognition of the significant changes are affecting your members.
3278. Ms Millar: I want to be very clear that we are not suggesting for one minute that there are issues of child abuse with all non-resident parents. However, you asked a question about a separate room for a visiting child. As I understand it, the courts, when deciding whether to grant access, consider all arrangements for the child, including where he or she will sleep.
3279. The housing stress figures are the number of applications. They represent not 40,000 or 23,000 people but the number of applications. Each could represent a single-member family, or a six- or seven-member family.
3280. Maybe I will duck the question of whether the Department knows what it is doing. On a day-to-day basis, I have responsibility for looking after our members in the Housing Executive.
- I regularly hear stories of homeless people coming in and saying, “Here are my children.” On occasion, parents have left their children in a Housing Executive office, saying, “You look after them because we have no money left, and we are now homeless.” Does the Department know what it is doing? I hope that it does.
3281. However, the fact is that front line staff, both in the Social Security Agency and the Housing Executive, face the reality of people at their wits end coming through the door. They have no money left or have been declared homeless, and they do not know what they are going to do. I am sure that these people come to your constituency offices regularly. You do not need me to tell you the horror stories; you have heard them yourselves.
3282. Ms Morgan: May I answer that question in another way? When NIPSA meets the Department once a month to discuss universal credit, we deal with the policy issues, but we are also supposed to deal with the HR aspects. However, there is currently no detail at all of what our members will be expected to deliver in the future. I will put that in context: I do not think that the people whom we meet have that information. It is very worrying for our members. This is all happening in the background. The very HR people who are expected to make this work have no detail at all.
3283. It helps that the introduction of universal credit has been put back to 14 April. Maybe a whole lot more of the reform should be put back. In the Department, the management side that we deal with has been given an unrealistic time frame. This is an Act in Britain, but we are only looking at the Bill now, and yet the timetable is the same. That is wrong, and our submission refers to the time constraints being imposed on Northern Ireland. They do not allow us to do what we need to do. The legislation is being rushed through by Britain in an unrealistic time frame.
3284. Mr Durkan: Thank you for your presentations. You have raised many issues with which we are, unfortunately,

- all too familiar. Many more are raised in your written submissions, and I look forward to studying those in my own time and in more detail. However, it is important that you know that the Committee has resolved to address these issues as best we can.
3285. Maria raised the issue of equality, and that was reinforced by Pauline. The Bill is, in my opinion, disproportionate in its impact on women, older people and people with disabilities. Last week, the Chair tried to invoke Standing Order 35, which would have meant an equality proofing of the Bill. It is my understanding that the Equality Commission will give evidence to the Committee tomorrow. I wondered whether you, as unions, had sought its advice. What actions lie within the commission's statutory power and obligation?
3286. I will ask Alison a question about the outline business case, which is important to me. Alison, you received that from the Department, I presume?
3287. Ms Millar: Yes.
3288. Mr Durkan: I attempted to acquire the same document from the Department but was refused it. That is completely unacceptable. During the debate on Second Stage a couple of weeks ago, there was quite a lot of talk about job losses, but they were job losses that would occur if the Bill was not passed. I have, as yet, been unable to find one scintilla of evidence of any mention by, or communication from, Westminster saying that that would be the case. However, when I asked the Minister in that debate how many jobs might be lost as a result of the imposition of universal credit, he said that my question was incomprehensible. I do not know how we are expected to fulfil our scrutiny role properly if we do not have sight of that same business case.
3289. Ms Millar: On the matter of the equality elements being disproportionate and the question of whether we had sought advice from the Equality Commission, it is our intention to meet the commission,
- but, as I explained earlier, there have been time constraints. We have been burning the midnight oil to ensure that we were prepared for coming here and that we got our submission in. It is our intention, under the umbrella of congress, to have meetings with the Equality Commission and the Human Rights Commission to tease out further some of the equality issues.
3290. We refer to the outline business case in our submission. We received it a number of months ago on a restricted basis. We have not released the detail, but the high-level figures that it contains highlight the fact that, between now and 2017, the loss of 1,600 full-time equivalent jobs are projected. That makes sense if you look at all of the elements: six benefits will merge into one; and, taking the Bill at face value, much of the administration will be online, so fewer staff will be needed to deliver benefits. I think that there is, perhaps, some disquiet in the Department about our referring to that in our submission. I press the Committee to ensure that you have all of the information in front of you to allow you to make decisions.
3291. Ms Morgan: Although we welcome the fact that we have that information, because the Department has an obligation to consult with the trade union side, I find it very odd that we have information that the Committee does not have. You need to make decisions on the basis of the information that might be held in that business case.
3292. Mark, you made a point about using Standing Order 35. We would have very much welcomed an equality and human rights approach to the Bill. That is on the basis that it contains issues that we believe contravene equality legislation, particularly the reference in section 75 to the nine categories. We also believe that it contravenes human rights on the protection of children, the Children Order and CEDAW, which is the UN convention that Pauline mentioned. We will let the experts on the Human Rights Commission deal with that. However, even if the Committee does not invoke the Standing Order, it needs, in our view, to have an eye to international and domestic law and consider whether the Bill flouts or contravenes any of that.

3293. Mr Durkan: It is my understanding that the Equality Commission has the power to scrutinise the Bill. Should it identify issues under section 75 — I would be surprised if it did not — the Department will have to respond.
3294. The Chairperson: We look forward to listening to the Equality Commission and the Human Rights Commission tomorrow. As I said in my opening remarks, parties have engaged in bilateral meetings, and I know that colleagues were with the Equality Commission and the Human Rights Commission some time ago and engaged with them directly on that. I have referred to that publicly in some of the debates, so, clearly, there is a range of concerns.
3295. Mr Brady: Thank you for the presentation. The spectre of privatisation hangs over all of this. In the previous mandate, Fra and I were also on this Committee. As far back as 4 June 2007, the initial stages of welfare reform were being rushed through by accelerated passage. At that time, we were told by the then Minister that up to 40% of the Social Security Agency staff could be lost. That was five years ago. We then had the strategic business review, the name of which was changed to Customer First, presumably because it sounded better, although it was basically the same thing. Fra and I proposed an amendment to delete clause 16, which provided for the privatisation of services. At the time, we were told that that would never happen so the clause did not need to be deleted, and the proposed amendment was voted down in the Assembly. Interestingly, a couple of weeks later, the medical support service was privatised, and there has since been a continuous roll-out of that. That is one of the issues.
3296. I said this morning and will do so again that the Bill is not an attack on poverty; it is an attack on the poor. Keeping that in mind will focus people's minds.

We could go on about the Bill all day, and I have gone on about many issues. However, I want to address two issues. The first is the one that Derek raised about Atos and the PIPs and ESA assessments, which have turned out to be an unmitigated disaster. You said that such assessments should rest with decision-makers and not some nurse or so-called health professional. I mean no slight on nurses and the wonderful work that they do, but there are certainly questions to be answered about the box-ticking exercise involved in some assessments. It may sound simplistic, but surely medical evidence should have primacy if someone's situation is predicated on their medical condition, which is the case for DLA claimants. You mentioned, and Fra has said on many occasions, that people on benefits are being criminalised. We have the "Nolanisation" of people on benefits here, whereby we hear all kinds of nonsense about people driving around in motability cars to deliver pizzas. Yet, the Government's own figures estimate benefit fraud to be less than 0.01% and show that fraud in general is going down. Those are departmental figures. It is almost as if, as I have said before and will continue to say, the Social Security Agency is some kind of charitable institution that altruistically gives people money they are in fact, legally entitled to that money. It seems to me that the decision-maker should have the medical evidence that is available to the assessors, but has been ignored by them in all the cases that I have dealt with recently and in many years past. What are your thoughts on the decision-maker having that evidence?

3297. My second point concerns conditionality and sanctions. As we have been going through the clauses, the Department's officials have told us that much of the Bill is predicated on guidelines that will be given to staff. If staff have discretion to accept what is now to be changed from "good cause" to "good reason" — as mentioned, I think, in the Irish Congress of Trade Unions paper and NIPSA's — people do not have to be sanctioned. That flexibility is there. Obviously, people foresee a difficulty concerning something that you could perhaps clarify: has there been any discussion about the nature of the guidelines? If you are to have a sanctions-led regime, which is what universal credit under welfare reform is all about, what is the position in relation to targets? The Department is breaking targets, including those on appeals. How will staff cope if their using discretion means that targets are not met? You made the valid point that people will become irritated and that there will be more "violence" against staff, which I think will eventually become a big issue for them. How do you think that conditionality, sanctions, the guidelines and the primacy of medical evidence might be addressed? Getting those right may solve the problems of ESA and the change from DLA to PIP.

3298. Mr Thompson: Chair, I did not join in the last debate because it was primarily about Northern Ireland, and I wanted to allow my colleagues to have their say. On a national basis, does the Department for Work and Pensions (DWP), the Social Security Agency or HMRC know what they are doing? No, the fact is that they do not. Over the water, they do not know what they are doing, and my fear is that the mistakes in Britain will feed into here if we do not get it right.

3299. We have heard welfare called a multibillion pound business. There is money to be made by going down a sanctioning route and introducing more draconian measures to get people off benefits. People get rewarded for doing that. A while back, a pilot involved handing over unemployed people to a private company, and if the company got an individual into work after one week, it kept the rest of his or her benefit for that year. Where is the incentive for getting people into good employment? Those ideas are, I hope, going away. Privatisation and targets under welfare reform need to be dealt with, as does the impact on our members, civil servants and the public sector.

3300. Wages are going down dramatically in public civil services. Pensions have been attacked; terms and conditions will be attacked. For a start, that means a demotivated workforce. The only reason for the changes is to facilitate privatisation. A private company will not want to come in and take on employees on good pay, good terms and conditions and good pensions. It will want to take on what is cheapest.

3301. I was an ESA decision-maker a while back, and, at first, I based my decisions primarily on medical evidence. However, when the system started to change and more work capability assessments came in, I got into trouble with my manager, who said that I was making too many favourable decisions. There is a real pressure on staff not necessarily to make adverse decisions but to look at the evidence more strictly in view of the targets. What happens in different places is that, if a member of staff is not making enough adverse decisions, he or she is placed into performance improvement. So there is a real fear factor among staff that, if they do not carry out that instruction, they will face disciplinary action. Primarily, the targets are not departmental but ministerial. There has, in general, been a politicisation of the Civil Service, and I am representing the entire Civil Service here. Departmental heads no longer have the authority to bring in change in the way that they want, which might be in a different way or more slowly. It has been ministerially driven that the changes must happen in a certain form and that the cuts must be made by a certain time. Targets are a major factor in that, and, particularly for Atos, there is a financial impact.

3302. Mr Brady: My next question relates specifically to Scotland. A couple of weeks ago, in Lanarkshire, Atos had a contract, which it then re-contracted back to the local health authority. So a statutory agency gave money to a private agency, which then gave it back to the statutory agency and, presumably, made a lot of profit. Do you see that being a feature of privatisation?

3303. Mr Thompson: Absolutely. With the introduction of Workfare, people were being forced into working for private companies for six, eight or 12 weeks. Let us be frank: that is state-funded free labour. Private companies get benefit claimants for a six-week period of training, and they stack shelves in ASDA or B&Q. The companies do not pay wages; the Government just pay benefit, which is less than the minimum wage. We pay private companies to do that, so where is their incentive to create jobs? How will unemployed or disabled people have an opportunity to get jobs when there is an unemployed workforce who can do it? Companies are not investing and not creating jobs. That is creating more unemployment, which is creating bigger hazards. As a result, taxation is not being upped and the welfare benefit bill is rising. That is why they want to push through these radical reforms, which are only about cost, not about society.
3304. Mr Brady: Before we move on to the guidelines, there was an item on the radio this morning about a report that has been published on people having a reasonable income for their lifestyle. It worked out the amount required at £7.20 an hour, whereas the minimum wage is £6.19 an hour. The other point that was made, which is absolutely relevant to what we are talking about here, is that the situation is much worse here in the North. More people depend on the minimum wage, and there are more working poor, or whatever the terminology. Interestingly, the report states that to have a reasonable or decent standard of living, people should get at least £7.20 an hour, which is £1.01 above the minimum wage, which went up by 11p only three weeks ago. That is the kind of thing that will affect getting people back to work. Ours is a minimum wage economy.
3305. Mr Thompson: All unions have signed up to and are trying to push the Living Wage campaign. For general interest, the Scottish Government, along with PCS and others, have signed up to become Living Wage employers. That has been very successful in retaining staff.
3306. Mr Brady: When you get independence, you can sort all that out.
3307. The Chairperson: You dealt at length with the question of targets. The Department has been adamant in its assurance to the Committee that there are no targets. If I heard you correctly, you said that they are not departmental targets; they are ministerial targets. Will you, as a former decision-maker, tell me how that might work? If that is the case, I will be absolutely infuriated, and I will deal with the Department, because this is an ongoing discussion between us at Committee Stage. As a former decision-maker, you are telling me that there were targets.
3308. Mr Thompson: Yes.
3309. The Chairperson: How did that work? I am trying to deal with a Department that comes here and says that there are no targets, and you are telling me, as a former decision-maker, that there are. Will you tell me how that works? Somebody's head will roll on this one.
3310. Mr Thompson: Decision-makers will be told that every case is to be assessed on its merit and the basis of medical evidence, but the expectation is that 20% of cases will not fall into the right category.
3311. The Chairperson: Who tells you that?
3312. Mr Thompson: That is in the guidance, and that is the expectation. How that is managed in Departments, offices and systems is very straightforward. An individual member of staff has a live load of x people, and, as 20% of them should fall into that other category, the pressure is on. So much is now micromanaged in the benefit system. If you have 10 cases a day, you would expect two of them to fall outwith the category. Therefore, two of them will, perhaps, be disallowed.
3313. The Chairperson: So the Department officially and publicly states that there are no targets, but you are telling me, as a member of the trade union and former benefit worker, that staff will be told to do something that the Department denies.

3314. Mr Thompson: When you do not do it, you face disciplinary action. Although they say that there is no specific target as such, putting a certain percentage into your work objectives or into the strategy means that you are measured against that as part of your overall performance. What used to happen is that you would put a distribution cover on your decisions. You would say that one person was really unwell and another was not quite as unwell, and that is how they fell into the carve-up of decisions. That is the reality.
3315. The Chairperson: That is fair enough. The reason that I am pressing you is that we will take this up with the Department again. I am being told publicly and legally by a Department and a Minister that there are no targets, and someone is telling me that there are targets. Somebody needs to show me the guidelines that specify the 20%, meaning that staff have to knock back two of 10 people every day. If that is what you are telling me, I need to see that guidance, because that is a serious allegation.
3316. Mr Thompson: I would ask them to show you the guidance.
3317. The Chairperson: Tell me where it is, and we will ask them to show us the guidance. We will not be denied sight of any guidance. The point that I am trying to make is that the Committee is being asked to deal with something new, yet the process that you outlined is under way. It is not about what might come in as part of the change from DLA to PIPs. You are telling me that this happens today, so I need to establish whether that is correct. Do you get my point?
3318. Mr Thompson: Yes, absolutely.
3319. The Chairperson: Clearly, that cannot be acceptable. You say that there is a fear factor. If there is that fear factor, I suggest that the trade union needs formally to identify that. We will have to get to grips with this. I want to see the facts and the evidence. We will take serious issue on this matter, because it has concerned the Committee from day one. Being told this by a person who has done the job gives us serious cause for concern.
3320. Mr Brady: I want to make a point about targets. When I worked in the voluntary sector, I did a lot of appeals. From the appeals, the Department worked out that people had good targets. If people had a heavy caseload, they picked out a case that could be heard within, perhaps, three weeks, which was OK. However, any cases that had to be heard within the next week were put to the back of the box. So they did the cases that they could cope with within a fortnight. I was told by several people that there were good targets and bad targets. The bad targets were put to the back of the box, but they would come up eventually. It is ongoing, and it has always been the same. That happened when I worked in the Civil Service 35 years ago.
3321. The Chairperson: We have to grapple with the fact whether people are saying that, in their mind, a person is legitimate but, because of some target over their head, they had to knock that person back. I have to say that that is a very serious suggestion.
3322. Ms Millar: We will provide that to you, Chair.
3323. The Chairperson: That would be very helpful. I would appreciate that, Alison.
3324. Mr F McCann: Thanks for the presentation. The more you read into all these presentations, the worse it gets. I understand perfectly what you are saying; it would be useful to set out some of the detail, but I think that that will be in the regulations coming down the road.
3325. I have a couple of points, the first of which Mickey raised. Two recent TV programmes covered the targets set for Atos. Both programmes laid out quite clearly that Atos was expected to go in a certain direction. We have certainly been looking at that issue.
3326. Mickey is right: from 2007, our party tabled a number of amendments to motions and tabled three or four of our own motions in the Assembly, which were defeated. We have had debate after debate in this Committee. Although the general opinion is that this welfare reform will have a detrimental impact, not all parties have the same stance on the direction in which it is going. Two weeks ago, we tabled a reasoned amendment, which clearly laid out some of the key issues that you have brought up this morning, but that was defeated. Last week, we had a motion under Standing Order 34. That resulted in a tie with one abstention from the Committee. Although there is a general belief that this welfare reform will be detrimental, there are different opinions on how it should be handled.

3327. I wanted to pick up on a couple of things that have already been raised. The Department for Employment and Learning (DEL) will also be impacted. Last week, in the Committee for Employment and Learning, I raised questions about the people who will be moved over to work-related support groups and activity groups. The question that I posed to some of the officials — this is my difficulty — was the fact that it is possible that thousands of people will, over time, be lifted from ESA or incapacity benefit and put onto those work-related groups. That will be another pressure on top of the pressures under which people are already trying to deliver. The Committee for Employment and Learning has been told that staff will be able to cope. Some of the people who are being moved across suffer from severe mental illness or severe disability. There is a fear that the system or the people who run the system in offices will buckle under the pressure of trying to deliver that. I do not whether that is an issue that you have raised, but will you comment on it?

3328. I want to pick up on something that Mark said. Maria, you and I spoke a number of years ago about the intention to cut a quarter of the Housing Executive's workforce and the issue of additional jobs. I know that that has been raised. The Human Rights Commission and a number of other groups that we have heard from are considering taking legal action on a number of aspects. I know that there is probably a broad group of people who regularly sits down to discuss this. Is there any design to say that this works against people's human rights and against equality? In the trade union movement, is there any intention to take some type of legal action? Another thing that concerns me — I have raised it a number of times and during the presentation this morning — is that, when the poll tax was introduced in England, Scotland and Wales, hundreds of thousands of people came out onto the streets, yet I have not seen anything like that number of people now. Somebody said to me that it was probably because the middle classes were impacted by the poll tax, but I am a wee bit concerned that you did not have mass movement in what is the biggest change to the welfare state. That is a problem.

3329. What is your opinion on parity? There is a difference of opinion in the Committee on how far parity should be taken. I am interested in that.

3330. Maria, I was concerned by an article in the 'Andersonstown News' on Friday about a group going into offices and advising workers. It will mostly be your members delivering that. What is your opinion on that? Some people have raised concerns about the impact of that.

3331. That will do for a start.

3332. Ms Millar: Do you want me to take a couple of points?

3333. The Chairperson: Sorry, Sammy is looking in.

3334. Mr Douglas: Thanks very much for the presentation. I have a couple of points that link with what Fra said. The first point is about Standing Order 34. As I said at our last Committee meeting, we were assured in the Assembly by the Minister that he had taken legal opinion and was happy enough with that. So, like Fra, I want to ask: will you be looking for a judicial review, as some people had suggested?

3335. Maria, you talked about choices and responsibilities. It goes back to Fra's point about parity. I was at a Unite conference a number of months ago, and people in the audience asked why we do not simply break parity, challenge the whole thing and not implement it. That is a big issue for all of us. In fact, Bumper Graham was here, and he said that, while he was not a great lover of parity, NIPSA says very clearly that parity cannot simply be breached. What is your response to that?
3336. Finally, the papers state that congress responded to the previous consultation and availed itself of opportunities to make direct representation to the Minister and our Committee but regretted that the views expressed by it have not been reflected in the Bill. That is another criticism, not only of the Minister but of us as a Committee. Could you reflect on that?
3337. The Chairperson: We did not produce the Bill. We are scrutinising it.
3338. Ms Millar: Do you want me to deal with some of the points?
3339. Mr Douglas: May I just say one more thing? You talked about the millionaire Ministers. I said that during the Second Stage debate on the Bill, and somebody said that some Labour people are millionaires. That might not change, which is understandable. You asked why do we not challenge this and plead for a special case. Do you honestly believe that the present Con/Dem Government — the Liberals and the Conservatives — will take any cognisance of us, even if the whole Assembly of 108 Members were behind that?
3340. The Chairperson: Respond in whatever way you want to. You do not have to respond to all the questions, but I am sure that you will respond to most.
3341. Ms Morgan: I will take a couple of the questions that are relevant to my area. Mickey asked about the decision-makers and discretion for sanctions. We have not had any discussion. The forum at which we meet the Department once a month has not looked at any HR issues, despite the trade union side seeking to get into that detail to try to understand the implications for our members as the workers. Mickey, I am very concerned that a big lot of discretion will not be able to be used. This is about getting people off benefit and into work, and when it is about that and about money and cuts, discretion goes out the window. Derek touched on the point that the Department should still be able to make discretionary decisions about people. That is notwithstanding the point that you make about the primacy of medical evidence, because our submission states that GPs may need to be paid if we need a report. We need to flesh that out. I know that there will be a cost to that, but it is about the medical assessors having proper and informed information, which might be medical evidence. The decision-makers in the Department are the people who should do it, because they are not working for profit. I would say that discretion will go out the window.
3342. Fra, you mentioned the impact on DEL. You are absolutely right. Current ESA claimants will become jobseekers. Our members in DEL and, indeed, in the SSA are already equipped because it is already happening. In our view, there are not enough staff to be able to spend adequate time with people who are coming off a benefit such as incapacity benefit or employment and support allowance to take time to talk to those people and find out their needs and then go to the labour market to see what suits them. It goes back to the old point that we are making that there are simply not enough jobs to facilitate the people who would work if there were a job for them. Your point is well made on some of the difficulties that will happen if our staff numbers are cut, as they will be. This is where some of the savings will be made. We have been discussing the matter of making a decision collectively to raise this as a human rights or equality issue. The welfare reform group at the Law Centre is a collective of the voluntary and community sector and the trade unions, and we are having our own discussion, as is the Irish Congress of - Trade Unions. Anything that we will do will be done collectively.

3343. Fra, you made the point that there was a mass movement against the poll tax, and I think that our difficulty here is the right-wing media. There is spin that this is only about scroungers. To be frank, when you talk about scroungers, you will get a whole lot of people who turn their back and say that, because it is not about them, they are not really that bothered. On 20 October, the three trade union centres of the Trades Union Congress (TUC) in London, the Scottish TUC in Glasgow and the Irish Congress of Trade Unions in Belfast held demonstrations. A big feature of that was, as you will have heard Peter Bunting and our president say, that further attacks are taking place on the working class. It is a class issue in our view. It goes back to Sammy's point about millionaires. I do not care whether they are Tory millionaires or Labour millionaires, but when they are telling us how we can and cannot spend our money, if you had the money, that is what it is about. It is about people who really are not involved in all the daily things that we do and what we see. That is the issue for us.
3344. On parity, the Secretary of State and the Minister talk about having to have a discussion about rates of benefit. We do not even know what the rates of benefit will be. That is the problem in the detail. Even if we thought that it was great, when we get the regulations, it will be too late because the Bill will be in. If we cannot safely say today what the rates will be for PIP, for universal credit, for the children's allowance and for housing allowance, we are all in trouble. It goes back to whether we are doing this too quickly before we know all those details.
3345. Sammy, you quoted a colleague of ours, Bumper Graham, who said that it must be parity "plus" and parity "warts and all". He also said that parity is a double-edged sword. No trade union and, I suspect, no MLA could say that they will take parity of misery. It is too important when it is about dismantling the welfare state. We know that you will have to have some difficult discussions in Britain. Taking your point, Sammy, you could go over and ask them to change it because of Northern Ireland's circumstances. I do not think that Northern Ireland is special. Northern Ireland is different. We are not special in the sense that we expect something that no one else has. On the day that the Assembly voted the Second Stage of the Bill through, the Minister said that Lord Freud had accepted that there are differences. So it cannot be selective. He cannot say that he agrees that there are differences but only allow us this bit and that bit. If that happens, all those people whom we have identified will fall through the net. They will walk into our offices or into your constituency offices, and what will we tell them? How do we deal with them? It is about getting it right. We believe and hope that the Northern Ireland Assembly and this Committee can look for an alternative to what is contained in the Bill. The Bill will not go anywhere near supporting those people whom we need to support.
3346. Let me finish on this point. The difficulty that we all have is that the right-wing media and the Government in Britain have done a very good job of convincing people that this is about only a very small portion of the population. The majority of people who will be affected by the Bill are people in work.
3347. The Chairperson: Maria, thank you.
3348. Ms Millar: Parity frightens off a lot of people. A number of months ago, the Minister talked about stretching parity. What does that mean? We want the same rates as GB unless there is a specific reason why we should not have them. As Maria said, this is about Northern Ireland being different.
3349. Sammy, you asked why there is not a mass movement against the Bill, as there was against the poll tax. Society has moved on, and we have very much moved away from collectivism to individualism. I will not give you a history lesson on that.

3350. In April this year, my union undertook a leafleting exercise and a campaign among our membership about the issue of tax credits. People did not realise why it was hidden from them or how it was hidden; the issue simply was not out there. People did not realise that those in receipt of tax credits in April this year were going to suffer a significant hit. Certainly, our phones started ringing only when letters arrived on doormats that explained that people used to get this but now were going to get only that.

3351. This leads us onto the issue of universal credit. It is said that no one will be worse off. People will not be worse off because they will have suffered all the cuts up until now. As a trade union movement, we would like to have people out on the streets, as was the case with the poll tax. The reason why people are not out on the streets is because, as Maria said, the media are putting a spin on the issue. Furthermore, there is a lack of information flowing from the Department and the Government on the Bill, which will have a detrimental impact on people. By the time the legislation gets through — we hope that you will have ameliorated the worst parts of it — it is almost too late because it will have already happened.

3352. There have been lots of debates and discussions on the issue of corporation tax. You could argue that that is also a parity issue. If we can break parity for corporation tax, we can break it, or stretch it to the absolute limits, on many other issues.

3353. I leave it at that.

3354. The Chairperson: Thank you very much, Alison.

3355. Mr F McCann: It is interesting. As Alex has said on a number of occasions, the elephant in the room is, in many ways, the question of parity. We have argued that parity should be stretched to its very limits, especially on issues such as these. However, you are the first witnesses who have said that parity needs to be stretched. What you say runs contrary to what all the others have said. I listened intently to what Bumper said, and he spoke about parity, “warts and all”. He said that he had to accept parity. This is a debate that needs to take place. We need to put parity exactly where it is and take out of it what we can. We have argued for that.

3356. I have two further questions. One of my questions, which I asked this morning, sometimes gets lost, and it is to do with the introduction of financial institutions to advise people on how to spend their money. This is very much a part of the discussion. It is an insult that financial advisers are being brought in to tell someone who gets £240 a month how to spend that money. Another concern that I raised is that, if people are forced to open bank accounts, there will be bank charges and different things. That will further reduce the amount of money that they get. Have you done anything on that specifically?

3357. Ms Morgan: I know the point that you are making about financial institutions and “jam jar” accounts. The issue was in the media last week, and we have raised it. In fact, we heard only at our last meeting with the Department that those need to be built in to facilitate the payment. I am still not really clear what a jam jar account is. It appears to be an account whereby somebody who is in receipt of benefit, which will include even somebody who is working and in receipt of universal credit, can have a piece of the account to pay this bill, a piece to pay that bill and a piece to live on. However, from what I can gather, the financial institutions are not open to facilitating that because it would be quite costly to deliver for the thousands and thousands who will be welfare dependent when universal credit is introduced.

3358. Mr F McCann: That probably runs contrary to what we heard last week about ongoing discussions with financial institutions. Financial advisers will come in and deliver their services, but obviously those people will not do it for nothing. If everything is paid into a bank account, surely there have to be bank charges that will reduce the level of benefit.

3359. Alison, I have continually asked about the discretionary payments to tide people over in the difficult times of the shared room allowance and underoccupancy. Discretionary payments, by their very nature, are short-termist. Six months down the line, because of the way in which the Bill is laid out, people will face what they were intended to face previously. The Housing Executive deals with discretionary payments. Have you been told anything about how those will be laid out? I know that the 13-week payment is discretionary with a further 80%. However, we are told that that might be extended to 52 weeks and then again beyond that.
3360. Ms Millar: On the issue of discretionary payments, in the past three to four months, we have set up an arrangement with the Housing Executive to look at the effect, primarily on staff. It comes back to this question: does the Department know what it is doing? The Department may know what is happening, but my senior level contacts in the Housing Executive say that, following the intervention of NIPSA, the Housing Executive raised major concerns about the transfer arrangement for staff. Those issues have not all been fleshed out yet. Of the 101 staff who are involved in the project for the delivery of universal credit, only two are on secondment from the Housing Executive. There is a dearth there. Despite several trawls in the Housing Executive, staff are not running and skipping to get into that project team. They are very concerned about the threat to their jobs if they were to transfer. We will, perhaps, deal with that in a separate submission to the Committee when more detail comes out.
3361. As regards the issue of bank accounts, we are firmly of the view that the current arrangement with the Post Office works well. It is available in many small towns, although a number of post offices have closed. It is the appropriate way to deal with this, and people do not face bank charges, and so on. People can get only what they have in their account; they cannot get any more. We support the retention of the Post Office account arrangement or the introduction of a similar arrangement that ensures that people are not hit with bank charges, and so on. However, we do not have any detail on that, so we cannot comment in any detail.
3362. Mr F McCann: I do not know whether you read an article in the 'Andersonstown News' last week in which a group called RNU said that it had leafleted workers advising them not to implement the welfare reforms.
3363. Ms Morgan: May I ask for clarification, Fra? I did not see the letter in the paper.
3364. Mr F McCann: It was an article.
3365. Ms Morgan: I know that the Republican Network for Unity has gone into the Falls Road, Andersonstown and Corporation Street offices and left leaflets on the desks of staff. It was essentially calling for a mass movement to defeat the Bill. I have to say that I agree with that. Our difficulty is that it said on the leaflet that, ultimately, it would be the staff implementing the changes and that, therefore, it is the staff who could stop them. We are concerned that that puts pressure on our staff. With Alison's involvement, I contacted our reps in those offices and asked whether the staff were concerned and what they wanted us to do. The staff were not concerned, so we did not address the leaflets publicly. However, we have asked the reps in those offices to keep a very close eye on the situation.
3366. The Irish Congress and the entire trade union movement do not have that level of detail about what we will do in the future. I know that Alison said that collectivism is not what it used to be. However, I feel, and I am sure that you feel, that there is a mood out there that we are all having to shoulder the burden for the bankers, the Government and all the people who are inflicting this on us. There was a lot of discussion at the march on 20 October. There were a lot of people from the voluntary and community sector there. We are also having our own discussions in the welfare reform group. I know that, at the

- TUC conference, there was a motion for a general strike. We have to have those discussions.
3367. I know that it is beyond your remit, but you asked about the mass movement. The trade unions need to be going out and informing people, and we have been doing that. I have been at public meetings, and once people are told what is happening, they are interested. That information is feeding through, and we are having more and more of those public meetings. We will also be doing other things. On Friday, Alison and I were at a meeting about congress facilitating a welfare reform group with community groups. We will be taking actions. Do you have any thoughts, even in respect of the worries that you hear from your constituents? I would be interested to hear those.
3368. Mr F McCann: I have been at most of the meetings that you have been at. Mickey has also been at quite a number of meetings. He was in Carnlough on Friday, and the two of us were at a trade union meeting in east Belfast a number of weeks ago. We have been available for anything like that. As regards constituency issues, we have been fairly active on the ground in trying to explain to people what is happening and what is going to happen. The difficulty is that a lot of the information has been drip-fed to people.
3369. I was at the march that you talked about in Belfast city centre. I should probably declare an interest in that I am a member of the Services, Industrial, Professional and Technical Union (SIPTU). You had quite a lot of people there. We need to work out where the focus is and how to deliver the message that this is severely detrimental to people's health. There are so many sectors involved, so it is also about how the strings of the different sectors are pulled together. Rather than isolated voices, a collective voice is needed. Collectivism might not be the in thing at present, but it sometimes works when you are trying to pull groups together.
3370. Ms Morgan: I agree. We have that through the welfare reform group, and we will need to build on it.
3371. Mr Brady: I want to refer to something that Alex said on 'The Nolan Show'.
3372. Mr F McCann: Mickey invented a new word earlier: Nolanisation.
3373. Mr Brady: There is a feeling out there that this applies only to people who are unemployed. Both Alison and Maria mentioned the right-wing media, which have criminalised people who are unemployed and made them feel bad about the fact that, through no fault of their own, they are unemployed. There is the issue that the contributory benefit of ESA for one year will not affect everybody. Anybody who has been working for 30 or 40 years and who, unfortunately, becomes sick will only get one year's benefit. You mentioned that if they have a partner who is working and on a low income, they will lose out. It is not a new thing. One of the questions you asked — it is an important one — is what happens to the rest of that money.
3374. In 1986, Thatcher put the national insurance fund into the red for the first time in its history to subsidise private pensions. That came out of the blue. It has to be said that she was a catalyst for mass movements, whether the miners' strike or the poll tax riots. I am not advocating that she should come back to stir people up even more than they are. Things have moved on to some degree. However, it is about getting the message out. I have participated in a lot of meetings across the North and, when you actually sit down and explain the impact of welfare reform to those who have suffered industrial injuries, those with unforeseen aggravations and those who used to receive youth incapacity and severe disability allowances, there is a realisation. That message needs to be put out. It is not just the long-term and the, according to the Government, "chronically unemployed" or generationally unemployed who will be affected. People who have been working for many years will also suffer, as will those on low incomes and those who - will lose their tax credits under universal credit.

3375. The idea about having as big a paper as possible needs to be looked at. There are many things that can be looked at and changed. Parity has been discussed, and there is a feeling that if we break parity we will lose the block grant and will all be paupers. The way things are going, we are all going to end up like that anyway. I think that there needs to be a wider discussion. Sammy talked about the Labour millionaires, and I think that there is a misapprehension that the British Labour Party is a socialist party. Some people may think otherwise.
3376. There is a lot of issues that need to be addressed, and I think that the unions are, maybe, starting to look at those in more depth than before. That is just a personal observation.
3377. Ms Millar: It has been said that the poll tax maybe got more resonance because it affected a wider group of people, including those on middle incomes. As I understand it from the media, HMRC will, today, start to send out letters about the removal of child benefit from middle-earning families. That will impact on those families.
3378. You can talk about different groups of people, and welfare reform, universal credit, etc are supposedly about making work pay. We have touched on a number of issues today, and I will not rehearse them all. However, I think that we have tried to come up with action points for the Committee to consider. One of those is that, although this cut in child benefit was announced this time last year, only when the letters begin to arrive on the doormat will people begin to think that it is actually happening. I think that, today and in the period ahead, you will hear in the media about the negative impact that will have. Those people who are just in the 40% tax bracket, and I would not classify them as high earners, will see a real impact on their child benefit, and we will see the impact that it will have on families.
3379. As things move on, there will be things that will impact right across, whether you are in the low- or middle-income bracket. It is an attack, and it goes to the heart of the welfare state.
3380. Ms Morgan: We have produced various leaflets and have given those out in town. However, there has been a gap in the information that has been provided by the Civil Service and the Department. Families, communities and even our members do not really know what will happen. That needs to be addressed. We have raised that at every meeting we have had with the Department, but, if you have the ear of officials when they are here with you, I think that you need to raise it as well.
3381. Alison made the point about child benefit notices being sent out today, and I think that that will help us. Also, Iain Duncan Smith made statements about the number of children that can be supported. Such incredible statements make you wonder, but, having said that, they also help to make people listen, ask what it is about and say that that is not the type of society that they want to live in.
3382. In that sense, it goes to the core of what Mickey said. However, the core of it all is what we can do about it and how we can make a difference. That will be the crux of it all.
3383. Mr Thompson: I have a couple of quick points. The Department's figures tell us that 40% of those who deliver universal credit will also receive it, as we well know. Those people do not think that they are part of the welfare system. The money they receive is seen as a tax credit and something different. Unfortunately, because of the shock-and-awe tactics I outlined earlier, welfare reform is popular at this time, and that is why it continues. It is popular because of the strategy of demonization of the very small minority of people who may be claiming benefits fraudulently. There are no success stories of people on benefits or a realisation that unemployment is so high, regardless of what the British figures might say. I think - that that spike was due to the Olympics, and it will probably fall again.

3384. I want to talk about what the trade union movement is doing. We are now starting to build up momentum. The PCS, Unite, and NIPSA will work closely in the future to try to launch something in communities. There is this idea of the workers against the unemployed, and that division needs to end, because everyone is being attacked.
3385. The point that I really want to make is about how we can change the debate on those issues in this country. NIPSA and the PCS have produced a pamphlet on pensions and tax justice that changed the debate, particularly when we pointed out the £120 billion in uncollected and avoided taxes and asked why job cuts were being made in HMRC. The PCS has also produced a welfare alternative, and the key to producing that was not to say what we are against, but what we are for. When they argue against those issues or deal with the Bill, the progressive elements in whatever Parliament or Assembly need to make the case for what they are for. That will draw in the things that every one of us has outlined today to try to protect the system and to make the statement that we are for something better. That is a real step forward, which will galvanise support.
3386. We talked about the Labour Front Bench, and 90% of the cuts were planned by them. The PCS was in open conflict with Labour when it was in power, because of the 30,000 job cuts in the Department for Work and Pensions (DWP) and things like that. It is about providing people with something different. Some sort of alternative will help to galvanise support.
3387. Ms Morgan: That is a big piece of work that all the unions and affiliates in the congress collectively started a long time ago. We will continue with it.
3388. Ms Buchanan: We will explore some sort of a legal challenge. It will not be easy. However, it is about where it stops just being awful and crosses the threshold into being discriminatory. We are working with various groups on that, and I will keep the Committee up to date.
3389. As to whether the Con-Dems will listen, history shows that they have certainly not listened to the trade union movement. However, we hope that they will listen to the Committee about the cost of implementing welfare reform, never mind the cost of not implementing it.
3390. I will keep the Committee up to date on where we are with, hopefully, a legal challenge.
3391. The Chairperson: OK, Pauline, thanks for that, and thank you all for your contributions today.
3392. I do not want to cover all the points, but, even in my constituency, we have put out about 8,000 or 9,000 bulletins door to door in recent weeks. Those have dealt with welfare reform and a whole range of other issues. As I am sure you know, my party puts out tens of thousands of bulletins in a load of areas. In their own way, many people are drawing attention to the issues, depending on where the parties come from.
3393. By way of assurance, you will know that the Bill is in Committee Stage and the Committee's job over the next couple of weeks will be to reflect on the Bill. That is why it is very important for us to take as much evidence as possible. By the end of this process, we will have received over 40 written submissions and over 20 oral submissions, many of which will be from coalitions. That is very important for us as part of our deliberations. Clearly, it is important for us to hear from people with direct sectoral interests as well as wider, more generic interests like yours. At this stage of the legislative process, it is up to the Committee to look at the Bill. People may oppose the Bill or want it amended; that will be up to the members and the parties around the table. I am satisfied that all Committee members have expressed serious concern about the Bill in a wide range of ways. Ultimately, it is up to members and their parties to vote accordingly, but widespread concern has been expressed by everybody, and that is, perversely, a good thing because there is a problem to be dealt with. However, it is up to the Committee to oppose or produce proposed amendments to the Bill.

3394. It is also up to the Committee to produce a narrative that may contain recommendations or observations. I find it difficult to see how the Committee will deal, for example, with the question of housing when that is to be dealt with weeks or even months up the road, including through working with David Freud. Having met him no later than last week in London, I know that he accepts entirely that circumstances here are different from those elsewhere and that, therefore, a different approach is required here. However, it remains to be seen how that approach will be manifested, and, without being disrespectful to David Freud or anybody else, I would not hold my breath. I am just making the point that we have a job to do, and, as I told David Freud: I have to vote on the Bill that is front of me and not on what someone tells me might happen. I have to look at the Bill and take my own decisions, and that applies to us all.
3395. We have had a useful discussion that touched on the question of parity, on which everybody and every party has different views. Nevertheless, ultimately, we have to deal with what — to use that nice word — “flexibilities” in parity mean. Does that mean stretching the Bill beyond parity? As publicly stated by all the parties, we will certainly be looking for flexibility, and I use the word in its widest context. Hard “and/or” choices may well have to be taken on flexibilities. We all know and accept that that could lie well up the road. So, I thank you for your comprehensive written and verbal submissions and for dealing with all of the questions from members. This is an ongoing process that is not, by any stretch of the imagination, over today. I thank you for your contributions and help so far.
3396. Ms Millar: We thank the Committee for having us here today.

for Northern Ireland*

3397. The Chairperson: I formally welcome Evelyn Collins, chief executive of the Equality Commission; Darren McKinstry, the director of policy and research; and Tony O'Reilly. You are very welcome, folks.
3398. I remind members that the briefing paper from the Equality Commission is before them. A copy of the commission's response to the equality impact assessment (EQIA) in 2011, and a briefing paper for the Committee from March 2012 may also be found in the folders.
3399. Without any further ado, I invite you, Evelyn, and your colleagues, to brief the Committee. The floor is yours.
3400. Ms Evelyn Collins (Equality Commission for Northern Ireland): Thank you very much, Chair. We are very pleased to be here again as you engage in your important work of scrutinising the Bill that has now been published. We appreciate that you are devoting a great deal of time and energy to it. We think that this is very important.
3401. I am accompanied today by Darren McKinstry, who was with me in March, and by Tony O'Reilly who has not been with us before.
3402. As you said, Chair, we have submitted a briefing paper outlining some of our concerns and queries about the equality implications of some provisions in the Bill. I appreciate that you will want to ask us about those in some detail. Darren will present them in summary terms after I have said a few words. Then, obviously, we will be happy to deal with any questions that you may have.
3403. Our briefing is based upon our statutory remit. You know that we have specific powers and duties under the various anti-discrimination statutes and in respect of the equality and good relations duties of public bodies arising out of the Northern Ireland Act 1998. As we have said to you before, we have also been designated, jointly with the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission (NIHRC), as an independent mechanism to promote awareness of and monitor the implementation of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, with regard to the Government's obligations in Northern Ireland.
3404. We said in our earlier briefing — and I am glad that members have copies of it before them — that, although the commission agreed with the broad policy aim to make the social security system fairer, more affordable and better equipped to deal with poverty and welfare dependency, we saw then that there was a real need to properly understand, consider and respond appropriately to the potential impacts of the proposed reforms. We said to you that we had concerns that some reforms aiming to encourage people into work might not reflect the fact that barriers to employment exist for particular groups of people — people with disabilities, older people, non-working women and so on — which are often social or institutional, not individual, and that, without appropriate support, it is not right to assume that everyone has the ability to improve their own situation. At that stage, we had particular concerns which we shared - with you about universal credit, lone-person conditionality, housing benefit cap and disability benefit reforms. Those are some of the issues about which we still have concerns.

3405. We also advised you in March that we advised policymakers in the Department for Social Development (DSD) not only about the requirement but the critical importance of assessing the potential equality implications of the policy proposals. Again, I heard you say that it is in members packs. We had concerns about the Department's draft EQIA, and you have copies of those. Some of those concerns remained when the final EQIA was published in May. Again, we raised those concerns with the Department.
3406. You will know that the Minister indicated on 4 May, when publishing the final EQIA, that he intended that the Department would continue to look at the possible equality impacts as the Bill moves forward, and also that work was ongoing in his Department to analyse the impact of policies across the various section 75 groups.
3407. We have engaged further with officials and have been assured that that will be the case; that the original EQIA was the first part of what they intend to be a lengthy assessment process to determine the impact of the various elements of the Welfare Reform Bill; and that there will be further equality screening and, possibly, further EQIAs carried out on the detail of some of the reforms and indeed, more particularly, as regulations are made. We understand that this is, in their own words, an "enabling" piece of legislation.
3408. We have also been assured that the intention is to update the EQIA, and that it is a living document. The Department intends to update the EQIA following a review of additional data received from HMRC recently, which, the Department says, will improve the information available and its ability to identify potential adverse impacts.
3409. So, we expect that the data that the Department now has will be significant in relation to the detailed proposals that will be contained in regulations. Officials have said that, as each set of regulations is prepared, the proposal will be screened for differential impact to assess the need, or otherwise, for an EQIA. This is an area in which the commission will maintain a close watching brief, continuing to monitor what the Department is doing and advise it of its equality duty obligations and responsibilities.
3410. We know that it will also be of interest and importance to the Committee to monitor this and scrutinise the results of any screening and, indeed, EQIAs and, importantly, to consider any mitigating measures put forward by the Department to address potential adverse impacts, as it is obliged to do under section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act.
3411. We are now seeing the outworking of the policy proposals on welfare reform in the draft Bill. We have looked to see what equality implications there may be across the various groups covered by the section 75 duties. We understood from your request for evidence today that you wished us to focus on the provisions of the draft Bill as it stands, and that is what we have done. We have gone through the Bill and have highlighted a number of those issues. There are probably others and, indeed, looking at some of the evidence that you have already received, there are certainly some others in which we will want to take an interest. However, you have seen in our briefing our first cut through since the publication of the Bill.
3412. I will ask Darren to take you through the summary of the document. We are here to answer any questions.
3413. Mr Darren McKinstry (Equality Commission for Northern Ireland): Good afternoon, all. As Evelyn mentioned, the Bill is an enabling framework, which gives us some difficulty in providing detailed comment on a lot of the detail, which will come in the regulations that will follow. However, we have tried, in the - paper that we have made available to you, to comment on a clause-by-clause basis. I will pull together some of the key themes and summarise them.

3414. We noted the flexibility indicated recently by the Minister, and our view is that it is important that ongoing consideration is given to the flexibilities proposed and to other flexibilities that may be available. One of those is the initial proposal that universal credit will be paid to the main earner, who is usually a male. We argued that we thought that that effectively reversed the social security provisions and reforms of the 1970s. In our paper, we propose that consideration is given to making that payment, not to the main earner but to the primary carer or second earner to facilitate more equal access to funds and use of funds in the household but with the option for splitting as necessary.
3415. We have identified a few points for clarification, where we feel it is not easy to tell the intended direction of travel. Existing passported benefits is one key area for us. It is not clear to us how that will go forward or, indeed, exactly how that will link in. In our recent consultation, in a response to the personal independence payment (PIP) regulations, we highlighted that we were concerned that those who are already being assessed for PIP would have to take a further work capability assessment for some income-related benefits that are already passported under disability living allowance (DLA). So, there are extra steps, which may affect efficiency and create onerous requirements. We are concerned that this may lead to a loss of income, which, in itself, could further drive disadvantage.
3416. In the paper, we note the intention to move to a more online system. Some other submissions that you have had over the past week or so have made similar points about lower internet usage in Northern Ireland and particular barriers for equality groups. In a recent UK survey, 47% of those who were Disability Discrimination Act (DDA) disabled said that they had ever used the internet, compared to 80% of non-DDA disabled. Those patterns are very different. Our view is that it is important that safeguards are in place to ensure that information collected or made available is accurate and accessible, that the benefit calculations are appropriate and that any sanctions on timelines for responding or actioning take account of people's access and ability to access.
3417. As far as the claimant commitment is concerned, we recommend that clarification is sought on how clause 14 is intended to operate for couples. We would be concerned if both members of a couple or their families were to be sanctioned when only one party in the couple failed to sign up or comply with that commitment. We want to see general sanctions across the board carefully applied so that their application takes account of the individual circumstances that may impact on people's ability to comply, such as disabilities or access to childcare, and that may affect timelines for actioning things. A range of things could be looked at.
3418. Clause 38 deals with pension credit. As was raised in some submissions last week, we also encourage the Committee to seek clarification on how that will work and its intended effect where one part of the couple has reached the age for pension credit but the other has not. We should also seek clarification on how universal credit sanctions and conditions will be applied in that situation.
3419. We note that clause 42 includes provisions for pilot schemes. We are not aware of any that are intended for Northern Ireland, and we encourage clarification to be sought on what, if anything, might be intended for Northern Ireland. Those pilot schemes could play an important role in considering the equality impacts in Northern Ireland to make sure that whatever is implemented is appropriately tailored to our needs. We note the clauses relating to the end of the existing social fund. It is not clear to us what is intended to replace that, and we certainly encourage that - sufficient resources are allocated to whatever is intended to replace it.

3420. I will highlight some of the concerns that we have raised previously and which we are raising again in this paper. We have highlighted concerns about the Atos assessments and the fact that a third of them are being appealed against successfully. It is important that lessons are learned from that and are taken on board as we go forward.
3421. We have previously highlighted our concerns about housing benefit and the caps therein. It is important to take account of the needs of different groups, such as: people with disabilities and fluctuating care requirements, who may have a fluctuating need for live-in care; and separated parents with various child access arrangements. Also — and I know you are aware of this point, given the available housing stock in Northern Ireland — our ability to move to a system when we do not necessarily have the stock in place to facilitate it. There are similar concerns about lone-person conditionality in the context of available childcare in Northern Ireland.
3422. I will wrap things up, or pull those points together as regards the importance of enabling provisions in Northern Ireland being available. In GB, welfare reform is operating in the context of a number of provisions that are not yet present in Northern Ireland. The Childcare Act 2006 in GB sets out a requirement on local authorities to meet childcare needs. We do not have that requirement here. We are developing a childcare strategy, but it is important that it focuses not just on child poverty but on maximising economic participation. That plays an important role. There are things such as the work programme that is underway in GB. As Mr McCausland said at the start of the year, the introduction of such a work programme is critical for Northern Ireland, so it is important to see that. And again, there is the housing issue, which I have just mentioned.
3423. It is vital that the Bill, as it comes forward, takes account of the specific situation in Northern Ireland, and I have given some examples of that.
3424. We are happy to take any questions.
3425. The Chairperson: Thank you very much. I open the session to members' questions.
3426. Mr Copeland: I have a general question. I am uncomfortable, in some ways, because it requires a degree of speculation.
3427. I am given to understand that the United Nations Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities lays an onus, or some very clear responsibilities, on Governments. In particular, articles 19, 23 and 28, deal with:
- “Living independently and being included in the community”;*
- “Respect for home and the family”;*
- and
- “Adequate standard of living and social protection”.*
3428. On the basis of what you have seen so far, do you believe that the Welfare Reform Bill should remain unchanged? Does it breach any of those articles? If you believe that it does, have you reported your concerns to the Office of the First Minister and the deputy First Minister (OFMDFM), as the lead Executive office concerned with protecting and ensuring compliance with anti-discrimination legislation? What are the potential consequences of a UN convention being breached? To the best of your knowledge, has Northern Ireland, or any other constituent member, ever breached such a ruling?
3429. Ms Collins: My word. Thank you for such an important question. I think that it would be fair to say that, in the time available, we have concentrated on looking at the potential equality implications of the clauses of the Bill. I know that the Human Rights Commission will follow us and will have been looking at this from the point of view of international human rights treaties. They may well have brought a somewhat different focus to it than us.

3430. On our reading of the Bill to date, we have not said that there is a very obvious standout breach of the UN convention. However, in our joint monitoring role, we have ongoing discussions with OFMDFM about the importance of ensuring that the obligations contained in the convention are implemented fully in Northern Ireland. That goes with the disability strategy that OFMDFM and others were consulted on. There are concerns around people with disabilities in particular and with the impact that some of the reforms may have. One of the issues we highlighted in our response to you today is that there are some areas in which the devil will be in the detail of further regulations, or where it is not clear on the face of the Bill what precisely the implications might be. We would want to push the Department for clarity on those.
3431. Mr Copeland: On your last point, pretty much everyone around the Table is concerned that we are dealing with enabling legislation, whereas the real bite will come in the regulations. In your view, is it possible for us to arrive at any sensible conclusions regarding the bit that we see now in the absence of the regulations?
3432. Ms Collins: It is difficult for everyone to see the full implications, but I think that there are certainly questions to be asked of the Department about what is in the Bill. We need further clarification about intention and so on, and it is possible for you to exercise your scrutiny role and for us to raise concerns or ask for clarification about the impacts. As I said in my opening remarks, I think that it is important that we hold the Department to account on its equality obligations when it does its screening and equality impact assessments, where necessary, on the regulations. It has assured us that it will do that. The devil will be in some of that detail, and we will have to be very careful to scrutinise it.
3433. Mr Brady: Thanks very much for your presentation. I just have a few questions.
3434. Some of the groups that have given us submissions have indicated that they would consider a statutory right to independent advice. In other words, they want to make sure that people who claim whatever benefit have the right to independent advice. What are your thoughts on that?
3435. My next question is on the sanctions. If someone has a good reason for losing their job, whether that is through misconduct or whatever, they may not be sanctioned. However, if, for instance, someone has an undiagnosed mental health problem that could be an issue.
3436. We hear so much about parity, and it is always assumed that it is, necessarily, about money, and, I suppose, to a large degree it is. However, while listening to the radio yesterday, I learned that a survey has been done in Britain. It found that if someone is to have a decent standard of living, they need an hourly wage of £7.20, yet the minimum wage here and in Britain is £6.19 it went up by 11p a couple of weeks ago. That survey indicated that people in the North will be much harder hit, as we live in a minimum wage economy.
3437. I have asked you this question before, and I do not want to put you on the spot too much. It is not just about the regulations; it is about the guidelines. The guidelines will play a very important part in the Department's attitude to sanctions, because there will, hopefully, be discretion involved, and objective rather than subjective decisions will be made on the basis of the guidelines. If the Bill does not comply with equality regulations, what takes primacy? Section 75 considerations are unique to the North and do not apply in Britain, and there all sorts of other issues that you mentioned, such as the lack of childcare and statutory provision for childcare in Britain was introduced in 2006. How does that all tie in? If the Bill is not compliant, how will that interact with section 75 considerations that might have primacy?
3438. Ms Collins: I will deal with the last point first and work backwards. When we were here in March, we discussed what the requirements of equality and

- good relations are on the Department. It is quite clear that the Department has to implement its equality scheme, and, as part of that, it has to consult on the potential impact of its proposals under its section 75 and schedule 9 obligations. That took place last year, and the reaction was that its treatment of the implications could have been much better. It was not just the Equality Commission that said that to the Department.
3439. In my introductory remarks, I said that we have focused very much with the Department on trying to ensure that it looks at and properly assesses the actual or potential implications of its proposals, and that it takes that into account when bringing forward its policy proposals. That requirement stands on the Department, regardless of what is in play in the rest of Britain, and it has to pay due regard to equality of opportunity in this as in other things within its framework. As we discussed before, you cannot really say that that trumps anything else. The Department has a set of obligations that it has to comply with, one of which is its section 75 duties.
3440. In the context of establishing a decent standard of living and having an appropriate minimum wage, I am not sure whether the Department is responsible for setting the minimum wage here. One of the key things that is important about that — perhaps it goes back to the previous question about whether any of us have a full picture of the potential implications — is that a number of other issues will impact on its outworking. For example, DSD published a housing strategy recently that may have overall implications for housing going forward and that will need to be taken into account. That is difficult. As to whether section 75 obligations trump or take primacy over everything else, section 75 obligations are one of a number of obligations on the Department and need to be effectively applied.
3441. Mr Brady: Obviously, I accept what you said, but, at some stage, a decision may have to be made when the regulations or the guidelines are published. The reason that I raised the minimum wage is that it highlights more inequalities that persist here than necessarily do in Britain. If parity compares like with like, we are at an obvious disadvantage. That was really the point that I was making.
3442. Ms Collins: Yes. We have been quite clear that the specific situation in Northern Ireland is the situation that the Department is working in. The number of adjustments that the Minister announced last week show that adjustments can be made to make the provisions as relevant as possible to the Northern Ireland situation. It is about paying due regard to the specifics of the Northern Ireland situation.
3443. The first question you asked was about the statutory right to independent advice. I am afraid that I am not familiar with the regulations that might impact on that statutory advice.
3444. On the questions of sanctions, I hope that we have been quite clear in our response and more generally that whatever sanctions are used have to take account of the different circumstances people are in. Of course, the fact that people in Northern Ireland may be suffering from mental ill-health may impact on their approach to benefits. That has to be taken into account. There cannot be blanket sanctions that do not take account of individual circumstances, whatever they may be. I think that that is a very important point that the Committee should scrutinise in the context of the Bill.
3445. Mr Brady: Finally, the point has been raised that claiming universal credit is predicated on making an application. That is the simplification. In my constituency, there is a huge rural hinterland. People simply do not have access to broadband or, in some cases, they do not have the ability to use computers or access to them. There is an almost universal acceptance that people have the internet at their fingertips, but that is simply not the case, and I am sure that it applies to many other constituencies.

3446. In Britain there are huge urban areas, in which it is incumbent on providers to ensure that there is instant internet access. There is also the issue of mobile access being provided through Everything Everywhere (EE). That will happen in 10 cities in Britain, but, of course, it will not happen until Christmas or afterwards. In a sense, that is another inequality.
3447. Part of the difficulty here is that, in many cases, people need face-to-face contact. That is particularly the case for those with mental health problems, yet the Department may not have the resources available. Access might be seen as another equality issue.
3448. Ms Collins: There are two issues, are there not? The first is the access to an online facility and the second is the ability to use that effectively. Like many people, I have to get my children to help me with some of these things on occasions. It is also important that these are the sort of things on which there should be an impact assessment. What impact will having such a facility have on the range of people covered in the section 75 category?
3449. Mr Brady: A lot of the true impact will not be felt until the regulations and guidelines are outlined. Thanks very much.
3450. Mr Douglas: Thank you for your presentation. My point probably follows on from Michael Copeland's about human rights and equality. I got the impression during the Assembly debate on welfare reform that the Minister had got legal advice that assured him that the Bill was human rights and equality compatible. The suggestion here is that you and the Human Rights Commission had little or no contact with the Department, although I think that you refer to it. Are you happy enough with the discussions that you have had with the Department to date?
3451. Ms Collins: We are in contact with the Department. We made our submission on the equality impact assessment and I hope that we made our points clearly and that they were understood by the Department. We have had engagement at permanent secretary level about the importance of these matters. As I said in my introduction, we have had some assurances that more information has become available through HMRC that enables the Department to look more closely at the potential impacts and that they are continuing to do that. The Department understands that that is important and that there is a commitment to screening — taking a preliminary look at — the proposals and regulations and to conducting equality impact assessments as this is rolled out. We have had that assurance at senior level.
3452. Mr Douglas: Is that ongoing?
3453. Ms Collins: I talked to them on Friday about some of these issues, and, as I said, we recognise that we have an important role in advising Departments and ensuring that they are doing what they ought to be to comply with section 75 requirements. That is our ongoing function.
3454. Mr Douglas: I have another two quick questions. You recommend that the Committee considers supporting the payment of universal credit to the primary carer, who is usually the mother. Would doing that discriminate against men?
3455. Mr Tony O'Reilly (Equality Commission for Northern Ireland): The question relates to the primary carer and does not assume that person to be either a woman or a man. In some cases, the primary carer may be a male single parent or a female lone parent. The basic aim in this instance is to protect the child. Non-carers who are given the money have a tendency not to consider the wider implications of how it is spent, whereas the primary carer will always consider household matters and their caring responsibilities.
3456. Mr Douglas: A lot of organisations have told the Committee that it should specify that the mother should be sent the money. Would that cause any equality problems for you?

3457. Mr O'Reilly: We specify the carer and not so much the mother. Yes; the mother is generally assumed to be the primary carer —
3458. Mr Douglas: I think that we agree on that, anyway. I was just checking. What is your view on the possibility of split payments, as indicated by the Minister?
3459. Mr O'Reilly: The Minister indicated that split payments could go to both parties in a household. That goes some way towards addressing the matter, but not quite far enough in the sense that the primary care-giver would have more responsibilities and, therefore, more financial obligations in their role. That would not necessarily always be the case for the other recipient of the split payment.
3460. Mr McKinstry: Our default position would be for payment to go to the primary carer, with the option of allowing people some flexibility for split payments.
3461. Mr F McCann: I want to follow up what Sammy said. He started by asking about meetings with the Department. There is a big difference between having meetings and getting some common ground on equality impact assessments. There are quite a lot of different elements and parts of the Bill that people would say — [Inaudible.] Are you happy and content — maybe those words are too strong — that the Department will follow through with that and that that may result in some changes to the Bill?
3462. Ms Collins: I think I have to take that when the Department says squarely — and it has said it to you as well —
3463. Mr F McCann: I thought that you were going to plead the fifth amendment.
3464. Ms Collins: The Department officials have also said to you in evidence that they will continue to scrutinise and undertake screening and equality impact assessments. We have to take that and monitor that they do it and that they do it appropriately with the right levels of information and that, where they identify a potential adverse impact, they look seriously at potential mitigating measures. That is an important role that the Department has to play in terms of its obligations. We have an important role to work with it to ensure that that happens, and the Committee has an important role in scrutinising what it does.
3465. Mr F McCann: I will follow on by talking about pilot schemes. A number of pilot schemes have been rolled out in Britain. Mickey said earlier that there are clear differences between here and Britain. Would it be a breach of equality regulations to try to impose a pilot scheme here that reflects a different region?
3466. Mr McKinstry: The lessons that can be drawn from any pilot scheme will be dependent on who is involved in it. So, if the characteristics of those involved in GB are different from the characteristics here, the lessons may not necessarily map on. There may be generic lessons that map on but maybe not specific lessons. The key thing is that the Department in Northern Ireland is required to consider the equality impacts in Northern Ireland and should use whatever information is necessary, whether it is some lessons from those pilot studies or further specific data relating to what is likely to happen here.
3467. Mr F McCann: Would you advise the Department that it would be far better if a pilot scheme appropriate for the different considerations here is rolled out here to ensure that there is no breach of equality regulations?
3468. Mr McKinstry: We would be very clear that it needs to consider the impacts in Northern Ireland, and, if that includes the need to run a pilot scheme locally, that is what it includes. It is about the equality impacts in Northern Ireland.
3469. Mr F McCann: I say that because, back in maybe 2007 or 2008 when the local housing allowance was introduced here, one argument was that it was being done based on pilot schemes in the north-east of England. At that time, you were able to argue for and get a pilot scheme running here that dealt with the peculiarities here. The background of - that question is that there is already a precedent set for pilot schemes.

3470. The issue is cross-departmental. What happens in the Department for Social Development has a knock-on effect for the Department for Employment and Learning (DEL), and one of the major problems that will exist is the migration of people on employment and support allowance (ESA) across into the work-related groups. I asked a question in the Committee for Employment and Learning the other day: will the people who work for DEL be in a position to cope with the mass migration of thousands of people across into that? After a bit of study, the officials said yes, but I took that as a departmental holding response rather than one that any thought had been given to. Surely thousands of people, many of whom are suffering from mental stress and mental illness, who are put into those groups will need decision-makers and assessors who have the level of experience to accurately assess what people can and cannot do. Would that be seen as going against the equality of a person who might be suffering from that or even against that of the person who has been asked to do it, if they have not been provided with the special training required?
3471. Mr McKinstry: A different system will, by definition, have different requirements, different resource requirements. You asked about the skills of the people at the front line, and we have been clear in our responses that appropriate equality training needs to be provided to individuals to ensure that they are better placed and that appropriately skilled staff are there to ensure that proper assessments are made.
3472. Mr F McCann: There are two things that we are trying to establish. The first is the level of training for decision-makers who look at cases and the second, which I think is also a big issue, is what is “good cause”. We have never been provided with an explanation of what is regarded as “good cause”. I think that we were provided with a list of what may be deemed to be “good reason”, but that was changed to “cause” for some reason. In your dealings with the Department, will you also be asking it what “good cause” is and how it would be implemented, particularly when imposing sanctions?
3473. Ms Collins: A direct answer is that we have not yet, but that is not to say that we will not. Obviously, as the Committee scrutinises the Bill, we will be watching for other evidence and picking up on things that we need to be conscious of. Our briefing to you is our first run through the lengthy Bill. However, you made an important point about the interrelationship between the changes being brought forward by DSD and those that are the responsibility of other Departments with equality obligations. We will need to reflect further on how we ensure that other Departments connected with the reforms comply with their equality obligations. So, thank you.
3474. Mr McKinstry: We also made related points in our response to the work capability assessment. Part of that response concerns ensuring that the right people with the right skills make such assessments, but it is also about ensuring that there is access to an appropriate range of information. The information to be taken into account in the assessment should include that from the individual and from other professionals, for example the individual’s GP and other medical professionals. In any assessment, it is important that the right information is taken into account.
3475. Mr F McCann: The follow-on point that arises from that is the primacy of medical evidence, which is one of the things that Mickey and the Chair have argued. That has certainly concerned us, particularly in relation to assessments carried out by Atos. May I take it that in all these cases you would argue that the best medical evidence should be available for the protection of these people?
3476. Ms Collins: Tony may want to come in on this, but further to that, we also have some concerns, which we did not voice in our briefing but have articulated over many years, about how disabled people are governed by a very medical model of disability that does not take into account the fact that many of the barriers are social. I said at the beginning that although an overall drive to encourage more people into work may be a very good thing, the fact is that there are specific groups of people for whom there are barriers to employment, including the absence of childcare, institutional barriers or more social barriers. We would certainly like to see a more clearly expressed public policy of using the social model of disability. Tony is much better equipped and more articulate than me on that issue.

3477. Mr O'Reilly: In our response to the second review of the work capacity assessment that Professor Harrington undertook, we made it clear that it was not so much a question of who conducts the assessment but more how that evidence is broken down, presented and used.
3478. The Committee is well aware of the criticism that the independent assessor has simply been used, and the assessor has said, "Right, we are under pressure to get such and such, and we will go with that." What evidence have they used? Is the evidence from the Department's doctor? Is it from a person who knows the witness, their experience and their circumstance? And, to what extent is the evidence taken from the witness? In other words, to what extent is, in this case, the disabled person involved in the process?
3479. The difficulty with the Atos assessment is that it is not clear how that evidence has been gathered and put together, and to what extent each part of the evidence has been highlighted or leaned on in making a determination. That concern applies equally to the work capacity assessment for the move from incapacity benefit to employment support allowance and to the work capacity assessment that is associated with the income support supplements related to personal independence payment awards. The same criteria should apply. It is important for the Committee to consider that.
3480. Ms Collins: In the detail of our submission on pages 11 and 12, we mentioned that nobody has yet heard the Department's response to the consultation on personal independence payments that it issued earlier this year. So we will have to see what the Department does in that area. Again, going back to its obligations, the Department is obliged to consult on and consider the equality implications and to take account of the consultation. That is not to say that the Department has to satisfy every single person it consults, because that simply would not be possible. However, it has to demonstrate that it has taken into account the consultation responses it has received.
3481. Mr F McCann: I think that I asked a similar question the last time you were here. If, at the end of this process, you see that there are a number of issues that clearly impact on the equality of groups or individuals, then in the Assembly and the Department, will the section 75 implications that the Bill throws up supersede what comes from Westminster, or is it the other way round?
3482. Ms Collins: As I said before, the Department is under an obligation to conduct its duties in line with the Section 75 obligations. In the Assembly now, there is scrutiny of the Bill and political discussion about what clauses will end up surviving the legislative process. The Department has to give you information on the equality implications. The Bill is in your hands, and you as the legislature have to look at implications, seek clarification, make amendments, and so on. As I understand it, once the Bill is in the House, it is a matter for you what you do with it. Clearly there are arguments about parity and so on that we have heard, but you are scrutinising it, and it is in the hands of the legislature.
3483. Mr F McCann: If, at the end of this, you see that there are clearly equality implications, would you come back to us and say, "Look, we have identified a number of elements in the Bill that clearly have implications for people's

- equality”? Would you come back to us or would you go to the Department or the Executive? Under those circumstances, where does your power to ensure and protect people’s equality come into being?
3484. Ms Collins: Our role is to provide advice to authorities about the conduct of their duties. Where the commission believes that an equality scheme has been breached, it can undertake an investigation into that breach. It can also assist individuals who believe that an equality scheme may have been breached. The conclusion or outworking of such an investigation would not necessarily lead to the striking out of any particular provisions of legislation or a particular policy, but it may lead to our asking the Department to undertake, for example, another equality impact assessment and to look more closely at mitigating measures that it might bring to bear.
3485. The outworking of the duty does not necessarily dictate one particular conclusion. The Department has to satisfy us that it is engaged in the conduct of its duties properly and effectively. If it has gone through a process of an equality impact assessment, whereby it has identified potential adverse impacts and initiated mitigating measures, then even if we do not like the result and are not satisfied it has breached its equality scheme, it may not be possible to challenge that through the investigation process.
3486. Mr Durkan: Fra beat me to the punch there. I was going to ask you what teeth the commission has in this instance. In my opinion and, I am sure, in that of other Committee members, there are clearly equality issues right throughout the legislation. We take that very seriously. Indeed, just last week, there was an attempt, through the Chair, to invoke Standing Order 35 in order to establish an ad hoc Committee of the Assembly to look at equality issues in the Bill and the equality implications thereof. I was going to ask about the investigation procedure. I believe that it is covered in paragraphs 10 and 11 of schedule 9 to the Northern Ireland Act.
- As outlined there, Evelyn, that involves the commission looking into individual aspects and reporting back. Does that put the ball firmly back in our court?
3487. Ms Collins: No. If we thought that any public authority had potentially breached its equality scheme, we could initiate an investigation under paragraph 11. The paragraph 10 provisions that you mention relate to our role in assisting individuals who believe that a scheme may have been breached. However, under paragraph 11, we can initiate an investigation, seek information and bring forward a series of recommendations. If a public authority does not comply with those recommendations and findings, we have access to the Secretary of State to direct that the relevant public authority —
3488. Mr Durkan: Have you ever done so before?
3489. Ms Collins: We have for one council that we found had breached its scheme. We made a recommendation to it that it had not complied within a reasonable period of time. We asked the Secretary of State to direct that it should. He did, and the council did.
3490. Mr Durkan: Can you envisage the commission doing that again?
3491. Ms Collins: We have thought about it for a number of significant policies. Let me rehearse hypothetically. If we had decided to initiate a paragraph 11 investigation given our concerns about the equality impact assessment, which we are on record as saying that we felt was not good, the recommendation may have been that the Department does its equality impact assessment properly. We now have an assurance that the Department is looking at the adverse impacts of its proposals based on better information and intends to update its equality impact assessment and screen any regulations coming forward. We want the Department to undertake its obligations properly. Hypothetically speaking, that is probably where we would have got to if we had undertaken a paragraph 11 investigation.

3492. Mr Durkan: I want to raise one other wee issue around the pension credit entitlement for couples. You say that we, as a Committee, should seek assurances that clause 32 will not result in the loss of income for couples in which one partner has not yet reached the qualifying age for pension credit. Earlier, we had a witness from Age NI who outlined quite starkly that there will be quite a significant loss of income for couples in that situation. I think that it is potentially £104 or £114 a week. Are there equality issues there?
3493. Ms Collins: The section 75 obligations cover people of different ages, so the answer is yes, if there is an adverse impact. Our response recommends that you seek clarification from the Department about that. It is not clear to us exactly how that might work. There is obviously a concern that couples might be prevented from claiming their pension entitlements if one partner has not reached that age. That raises age issues.
3494. Mr O'Reilly: Another concern about that clause is the conditionality and entitlement framework associated with universal credit. Would that apply to somebody who had reached the qualifying age for pension credit and would not be subject to requirements and provisions such as the underoccupancy rule in relation to housing? Are they now subject to that? That also needs to be clarified.
3495. Mr Durkan: I had asked about this, but it became clear only in the previous session.
3496. Ms Collins: When pounds, shillings and pence are added to it, it is very stark.
3497. Mr Brady: You answered one of my questions, which was about equality proofing the enabling Bill and the regulations as they come out.
3498. One of the big issues with conditionality is the claimant commitment. If one member of a couple does not sign it, the couple will not get universal credit. If one person does not sign it, it may be that he or she has mental health problems or has taken umbrage with the Department for whatever reason. It has been suggested that the person who does sign it should get universal credit for themselves and for any dependent children. Surely that would impact on the person who does not sign it for whatever reason.
3499. It has not been made clear how much investigation goes into the reasons why that person has not signed it. Mark also asked the question about age. You articulated very well how someone may qualify for one aspect but be discounted from another. That will raise its head more and more, and it has to be addressed. The age aspect may be a human rights issue, but I am just thinking about the conditionality.
3500. Another issue is the work search. Under universal credit, a person who comes into the work activity aspect will have to look for work for 35 hours a week. You would not even have time to work, because you would be spending so much time looking for a job. I do not mean to be too facetious, but you get the point.
3501. All those issues are linked to conditionality. It seems that it will put a huge burden on people that is not there at this point. There are certain conditions, and nobody is disagreeing that there should be conditions. However, it seems that some of them will have an inordinately harsh impact on people, particularly at a time when we have about 60,000 people looking for 5,000 jobs.
3502. Mr McKinstry: Two things spring to mind in respect of your point about claimant commitment. First, a couple or family as a whole should not necessarily be impacted by the actions of an individual. Secondly, any consideration of a sanction on an individual should be appropriately considered to take into account his or her personal circumstances. A disability or anything that affects a person's decision-making ability at any given time must be taken into account appropriately. We are very clear that sanctions across the board should take into account —

3503. Mr Brady: I am sorry to interrupt. I go back to a point that I made earlier about misconduct. Say it is someone who has an undiagnosed mental health condition. What you are saying is that the individual circumstances must be looked at very closely.
3504. Mr O'Reilly: It must be done on a case-by-case basis. You may determine after an investigation that something, whether a disability or another external factor, has impacted on a person's behaviour and proceed on that basis. Our submission states that things must be considered on a case-by-case basis, particularly when the behaviour is unusual or different and against a claimant's interest. Surely that would encourage somebody to come forward and say, "It is not in the claimant's interest to do this, so why are they doing it?" Reason and logic should be used in the application.
3505. Mr Brady: Sometimes reason and logic do not exist.
3506. Mr Copeland: My point has been partially covered, but I want to talk about the obligations of legislation. We are in the process of reflecting on legislation that was drafted in the rest of the United Kingdom and has come here. We have other laws and requirements that go above and beyond that. Does responsibility lie with us to amend this legislation to conform to our laws? If cost implications arise from that, are those costs due from us or from the people who sent us the legislation in the first place?
3507. Ms Collins: In this instance, it is the Department that has an equality scheme and is responsible for bringing the legislative proposals to you. You have a decision-making and scrutiny role, but it is the Department that has an equality scheme that should not be breached.
3508. Mr Copeland: So we could endorse legislation — lovely — and someone could take legal action and derive compensation on the basis of that decision.
3509. Ms Collins: Although the provisions of the Northern Ireland Act relating to equality and good relations duties give individuals some right to complain that equality schemes have been breached, they are not the same as the anti-discrimination legislation, which gives individuals the right to claim race, age or sex discrimination and may go to a tribunal. If successful, that could trigger an award of compensation. It is two different types of legislation: one is the mainstream equality duty, the parameters of which are set out in section 75 and schedule 9 to the Northern Ireland Act; and the other is about the individual right of action in employment tribunals, which may lead to [Inaudible.] a finding of discrimination contrary to the anti-discrimination statutes.
3510. The Chairperson: You are right to remind us that we have a statutory obligation to deal with the Bill as we determine. This ongoing evidence-gathering process is important in our deliberations. Clearly, as we move on in our deliberations, we will discuss with the Department the raft of issues that has been raised with us, including by your organisation, and we will address those issues with the Department directly. The Department is also looking at the evidence, and I take it for granted that it will be prepared to have that discussion with us. You, like many organisations, have made the point that it is enabling legalisation, so it is difficult in some ways to go further in scrutinising it because, even though we basically know what is in most of the regulations, we do not have them in front of us.
3511. Nevertheless, we have to deal with what is in the Bill, and I am conscious of that. You have been engaged, to some extent, with the Department over a period of months, and you said that you have been given assurances from it. I do not want to put a pointed question unfairly to you, but, apart from assurances from the Department that it will give further consideration to equality issues, have you got one specific example of it saying, "We have looked at a, b or c, and here is our response"? That is important because when I am making my mind up on the Bill's provisions, I have to determine on the basis of what is in front of me, not on what somebody might do. I am not impugning the integrity of anybody in the Department or anybody else for that matter who tells me that they will do something, but what you might do after I have signed on for a Bill is no good to me, to be quite frank.

monitor developments closely. We wish you very well with your deliberations, which are detailed and complex. I know that, as a Committee, you are well able for it.

3512. Ms Collins: It is an absolutely fair question, Chair. Some additional information was considered in the final EQIA that was published on 4 May and dated April. In response to concerns raised, we sought some additional information but, as I said earlier, we were still not satisfied that that was sufficient. We have seen no further analysis since then, but I understand that departmental officials are working to analyse the data that they have received recently from Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs (HMRC). That will make it easier for them, but we will continue to raise the issue with them. There was some additional information in the final EQIA, and we have assurances, but we have not seen anything concrete. I understand that they are still working on it, and we welcome your asking the Department about the issue.
3513. The Chairperson: Thanks very much, Evelyn, Darren and Tony for your contributions this morning. For the record, we are due to make our report by 27 November. We have taken in the region of 40 written submissions and 20 oral presentations, some of which are by way of coalition. That is an important stakeholder engagement. I thank you for helping us in our consideration of the Welfare Reform Bill, and, no doubt, we will be in discussion with you again.
3514. Ms Collins: Thank you for that and for inviting us today. We remain at your disposal. If we can get clarification or any further information, it goes without saying that we will be very keen to engage with you. The commission has considerable interest in this area and has concerns about the potential equality impacts. We will continue to 3515. The Chairperson: You are all very welcome. Members, the Welfare Reform Group's submission is at tab 1 of your packs. Some further papers from the group arrived this morning, and those are in your tabled items. A full Bill folder is available for anybody who wants one. However, you should have a Bill folder for today's meeting in front of you.

3516. Without further ado, if you do not mind, we will kick off with your presentation. The floor is yours. Thank you for making your submission and for being here this morning to further that.
3517. Ms Georgina Ryan-White (Law Centre NI): First, I would like to thank you for having us here to present our views on the Welfare Reform Bill. The Welfare Reform Group is an umbrella group for organisations that have come together to campaign for positive and progressive changes to policy, service provision and legislation for those in receipt of social security. Joining me today are Anne Moore from Save the Children and Bernadette Magennis from Age NI.
3518. Rather than going through our submission, we would like to highlight key issues that we believe require further examination.
- Those issues are the operational flexibility within the conditionality and sanctions regime, and the other welfare reform changes impacting on children and older people. If you have any particular questions about our submission or briefing paper, we will be more than happy to answer those.
3519. We have chosen to talk about those areas today because we know that a number of our other members who have been or will be up over the next couple of days will be speaking on areas such as disability and housing. So we just felt that they were the most appropriate things to talk about today.
3520. To begin, the Welfare Reform Group welcomed the Minister's announcement about the flexibilities in the way that universal credit will be paid. We believe that that is the culmination of the efforts of various key stakeholders, which have largely spoken with one voice on those issues. However, we are cautious because, although those flexibilities have been achieved, we still need to examine what other steps can be taken to protect households affected by the changes and to tailor the welfare reform agenda to Northern Ireland's specific circumstances. It is vital that the changes work in practice for Northern Ireland. Moving people into employment can be achieved only if the jobs are available here and if people have access to good and affordable childcare. However, neither of those ingredients apply locally. We, therefore, recommend that the Committee carefully scrutinises, for example, the underoccupation penalty in the public rented housing sector and possible exemptions from that measure for foster families, carers and prisoners. It also needs to look at the level of conditionality and sanctions proposed under the Welfare Reform Bill, and the lack of childcare provision.

3521. The Northern Ireland Executive have set aside £20 million a year for a social protection fund. We believe that that could be utilised to widen the scope for exemptions to some of the more punitive measures under universal credit and the Welfare Reform Bill. We are not seeking an alternative social security system; rather, we are seeking one that is very much tailored to Northern Ireland and that will work in practice for the people here.

3522. It proved rather difficult for us to respond to your call for evidence. As the Bill is an enabling Bill, it outlines the framework, but a lot of the detail is left to the regulations, for example, the rate of benefits; how the work requirements will work; what the earnings disregards will be; and the detailed rules on personal independence payments. In addition, it is becoming increasingly evident in Great Britain that there has been a shift to move information and detail into guidance and circulars. Therefore, we do not have a complete picture of what is happening at the moment. The more significant issues still have to be decided in Great Britain despite the fact that the Westminster Bill received Royal Assent in March. Those issues include, for example, how will transitional protection work; how will the arrangements for self-employed people work; how will they be treated; what is happening with passported benefits; etc? In effect, a lot of key issues still have to be decided in Great Britain, some of which go to the core purpose of the Welfare Reform Bill in respect of making work pay for claimants. Essentially, we are very much in a vacuum, and we cannot see the complete picture.

3523. We are also concerned that many of the regulations governing critical parts of the Welfare Reform Bill will proceed through the confirmatory process, with scrutiny happening only after the regulations have been laid. Given that the Welfare Reform Bill is significantly enabling legislation, that is, in our view, very much a retrograde step. It is vital that there is a way to ensure that the guidance is also subject to scrutiny. The flexibility to do things differently in a Northern Ireland context lies in the detail of the regulations, so the scrutiny process must find a way of addressing where the scope for flexibilities lie. That is imperative. It is unlikely that, following the bedding-in period of the confirmatory procedure, there will be much scope to amend the legislation in the future. We, therefore, ask that the Committee ask the Department to provide a draft plan to include the timetable for publishing the regulations due to be made under the Bill.

3524. I will briefly move on to the issue of conditionality and sanctions. Part 2 of the Bill makes provision for changes to the responsibilities for claimants of jobseeker's allowance (JSA) and employment support allowance (ESA), and subsequently universal credit, contributory ESA and contributory jobseeker's allowance. The aim of universal credit is to make work pay. Claimants are expected to do everything that can be reasonably expected of them to find work or to prepare for work in the future as a condition of receiving their benefit payment. The conditionality will be backed up by much tougher sanctions to ensure that people meet their responsibility. We appreciate that the Committee has asked for a lot more information from the Department, and we are very much looking forward to the publication of that information.

3525. There are three main conditionality and sanction changes in the Bill. Four types of work requirements will be imposed on claimants: work-focused interviews; work preparation; work search; and work availability. There will be circumstances where there will be no work requirement, for example, if a woman has recently given birth. However, there will be a ramping up of the sanctions. Existing JSA sanctions, which can go up to 26 weeks and which apply to employment-related requirements, will be replaced with new provisions for sanctions on all work-related requirements of 13 weeks for a first failure, 26 weeks for a second failure and three years for a third failure.

- The new sanctions regime applies to failure to apply for a particular vacancy without good reason, failure to take up an offer of work without good reason or leaving work through misconduct. Those periods will be covered in the regulations.
3526. Medium-level sanctions can be imposed upon claimants subject to all work-related requirements. Those sanctions cover failures to undertake all reasonable work-search actions or failures, without good reason, to be available and willing to take up work. The sanctions anticipated are 28 days for the first failure, 13 weeks for a second and a subsequent failure within 52 weeks of the first failure.
3527. The lower level of sanctions will apply to claimants subject to all work-related requirements, work preparation and work-focused interview requirements. The lower level sanctions include failure to undertake specified work action without good reason, failure to comply with a work preparation requirement without good reason, failure to comply with a requirement to provide evidence or confirm compliance without good reason and failure to comply with a work-focused interview requirement without good reason.
3528. With all those sanctions and conditions, we would very much like to draw your attention to clause 22, which we fear is rather draconian. First, it provides that workers or jobseekers will be faced with all work-related requirements. This is provided for in schedule 1(7). This is clearly discriminatory, and is likely to be unlawful without any reasonable purpose. This is one area where we believe that there is scope to recognise that there needs to be a different approach taken in Northern Ireland.
3530. The Department for Work and Pensions (DWP) has also signalled that most claimants will be expected to spend 35 hours a week looking or preparing for work. In practice, we cannot see how that is going to be maintained on an ongoing basis. While CVs can be updated regularly, employers written to and jobs and benefit offices visited, there will be a time or point in the process where there is nothing more that a claimant can do, other than perhaps wait for a response from a prospective employer. So we do not believe that continuing to spend 35 hours a week searching for work for a period of months is practical.
3531. There will also be changes to the hardship regime. Claimants who are sanctioned can apply for and receive hardship payments if they can show that they or their dependants will suffer hardship in the absence of a benefit payment. The Welfare Reform Bill seeks to make hardship payments recoverable. At the Welfare Reform Group, we do not believe that hardship payments should be recoverable and we look for further investigation into that. We believe that the loss of a significant amount of benefit is a sufficient punishment without having to pay back additional money. There is evidence that sanctions do not necessarily work. Some 20% of claimants do not know that they have been sanctioned until after the event. So we believe that sanctions is an area for operational flexibilities could be put in place and the Department should be pressed hard on this issue to give specific undertakings.
3532. Therefore, there are a few issues for the Committee to consider. They include whether the increased level of sanctions is proportionate, given the impact on the rest of the household, including children. We suggest that the increase is disproportionate and that sanctions of 13 weeks, 26 weeks, and three years are way too long. Regulations in Britain allow for only five working days for a claimant to establish good reason before the sanction is applied. If the penalty for non-compliance is increased, so too should the time allowed to provide a good reason. We suggest that that period is increased to 15 days; however, we are happy to discuss that with you further.

3533. The Department for Work and Pensions has also increased some of the sanctions arrangements for JSA and employment and support allowance in advance to broadly align with universal credit. That seems rather unnecessary, because the apparent advantages of universal credit will not be available to those claimants in the interim period.
3534. I pass you on now to my colleague Anne.
3535. Ms Anne Moore (Save the Children):
I am honoured to speak here today on behalf my colleagues in the Welfare Reform Group. The paper that I present to you and my notes are the result of collaboration with Mary Anne Webb of Barnardo's, Marie Cavanagh of Gingerbread and my colleague at Save the Children Dr Chelsea Marshall. I will speak in a wee bit more detail about clauses 13 to 25, which concern work-related requirements and sanctions.
3536. Georgina talked about childcare, which I will not mention, except to say that we do not have the provision to make this work. It is also unclear, at this stage, how support for childcare costs would be included. You will all know that, at the moment, families spend about 45% of their income on childcare for one child, which is the highest amount in Europe. Until recently, low-income working families could claim support for up to 80% of childcare costs. That was cut to 70% in April 2011, so some families are already losing £1,500 a year, and some of our research shows that many low-income mothers are already leaving work because they cannot afford childcare.
3537. As you know, lone parents are currently exempt from certain earlier welfare reforms that applied in the rest of the UK. For example, compared to every fortnight in GB, lone parents in Northern Ireland sign on for work-focused interviews every 13 weeks. I am sure that you will all have heard of the Jobseeker's Allowance (Lone Parents) (Availability for Work) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2010, which provides a guarantee that lone parents who receive jobseeker's allowance and who have a youngest child of 12 or under have the right to restrict their availability for work to their children's school hours. The regulations augment other flexibilities, including the ability of lone parents to limit their availability for work to a minimum of 16 hours a week; to refuse a job or leave employment if childcare is not available; and there is also a requirement on personal advisers to take the well-being of any child into account when drawing up the jobseeker's agreement. The Welfare Reform Act (Northern Ireland) 2010 also requires the best interests of the child to be taken into account in Northern Ireland when the adviser is making a jobseeker's agreement.

3538. When we look at the present Bill's proposals, we see that conditionality and sanctions are to be increased. For example, as Georgina said, a whole new world is opening up. At the moment, claimants in part-time work on tax credits are not expected to seek additional work. However, with the changes, it would appear that benefits would be cut for those in work if they do not meet an earnings threshold equal to minimum-wage rates for a 35-hour week. They will be expected to earn more from working extra hours, getting better pay or taking on an additional job. This at a time when hundreds are chasing every job, and those jobs are likely to be part time or zero contract hours for many people.
3539. Moreover, this seems to run counter to last year's extension of childcare support to those working in short-hours jobs, when the coalition Government announced that universal credit would provide childcare funding for parents working fewer than 16 hours a week. Modelling done by Save the Children shows that universal credit would have negative impacts on work incentives for many low-income families, including lone parents working more than 16 hours a week and second earners. For example, a single parent who works full time for about the minimum wage and has two children will be as much as £2,500 a year worse off under the new system. So, for a start, we ask the Committee to seek clarification about these apparently contradictory provisions and proposals. Given this confusion, the lack of progress in childcare provision that we all know about and the lack of employment opportunities, those 2010 exemptions for lone parents should be retained and the new conditionality regime should not be applied here. The 2010 Welfare Reform Act's stipulation that the best interests of the child should be taken into account should be extended to the Bill and to carers in couple households. As Georgina mentioned, the Department for Social Development (DSD) could also cost the option of restoring that 10% cut in childcare budget by meeting the shortfall from the social protection fund.

3540. I turn to the issue of housing. Apart from repeating what I think is a universal request for direct payments, the provision for which we welcome, we would like your support in seeking several exemptions. Social housing that is deemed underoccupied but has children living in it should be exempt from a reduction in housing benefit. Households with children should be exempt from moving to cheaper housing until it is clear that suitable properties are available in the 30th percentile of rents. In GB, it was advised that £30 million a year would be added to the discretionary housing benefit for foster carers and families with a disabled child, who have adapted properties and need extra space. We suggest mitigation through amendments to the Bill in subsequent regulations, rather than discretionary payment. Exemptions should also be considered for families with a child in short-term care. Non-resident parents should be exempt from the shared-room requirement because they may have informal access to their children, and, as you heard from the women's sector, that raises child protection concerns about visits to houses in multiple occupation.

3541. We are all dreading the surge in requests from families for emergency help. As you know, the social fund has long provided a lifeline. I will not go into all of the details that are available about the amount from DSD research. It is shocking to learn that one of the eligibility criteria is the client's actual solvency. If you come for emergency help and are already in debt, you will be rejected at a time when we are expecting increased hardship and debt. We suggest that these criteria, as well as the payment amount and the need for a replacement appeals procedure, must be subject to your scrutiny.

3542. We can provide a lot more detail on child maintenance, but we want to highlight the need to exempt parents with care responsibilities who are on benefits from the collection charges and we need to research the impact of charging on levels of child poverty. Victims of domestic violence have the right to be believed even they have not reported that domestic violence, and that should be reflected in the regulations.

3543. You all know about the problems with medical assessments and the disability cuts. I draw your attention to findings that disabled children and children with disabled parents are more likely to be severely poor and at risk of persistent poverty. Those child poverty figures should be higher if the cost of disability were factored into counting households below average income. We reiterate the request from the Northern Ireland Commissioner for Children and Young People (NICCY) that an expert group should be set up to look into all of this.

3544. Finally, it could be argued that welfare reform represents a misdiagnosis of the problem and that most of the solution to poverty and disadvantage is job creation. Decently paid work will reduce inequality. You will know about the need for an adequate work programme, and we highlight the strong correlation between child poverty and women's employment and income. I also remind you that work is not always the best route out of poverty, because approximately half of all children who are in poverty live in families where one parent is working. We suggest that the Executive must do considerably more to create decent, well-paid work and reduce the barriers to taking up work and training, such as the lack of proper childcare.

3545. We have no need to remind you of section 75 and the duties under the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) and the Child Poverty Act 2010, except to say that Departments should actively demonstrate how the decisions contribute to improving outcomes for children and ending child poverty by 2020. These decisions will include funding, such as the social protection fund, the discretionary support policy and other forthcoming decisions on passported benefits such as free school meals and rates relief.
3546. The children's sector would like to leave you with a few key asks: to ensure provision of the impact assessment on child outcomes, as Georgina mentioned; to adopt the best principles of the child; to subject the changes to the social fund to serious scrutiny; to ensure exemptions from cuts in housing benefit and moving home for families with children; to retain the existing exemptions for mothers until childcare is properly sorted and clarify those contradictions; and, repeating what the other sectors have said, to designate the primary carer of children as the main applicant for universal credit; and to provide choice in the frequency of payment.
3547. I will hand over now to Bernadette Magennis.
3548. Ms Bernadette Magennis (Age NI): Good morning. I thank the Committee for giving Age NI the opportunity to present its views on how it feels that the implementation of the Welfare Reform Bill will impact on older people in Northern Ireland. Georgina, on behalf of the umbrella group, has gone over some concerns that we share. I want to look specifically at how the issues relate to older people and at the assessments on universal credit for mixed-age couples and the impact that that will have on reduced capital limits. I will look at sanctions and conditionality restrictions on occupancy and housing and at the impact of the personal independence payment (PIP) and the lack of clarity on disability living allowance (DLA). I will go through those in turn.

3549. To provide some context, everyone here will be aware of the fact that 23% of older people in Northern Ireland live in poverty. Unlike the rest of the UK, England, Scotland and Wales, where it has stagnated, that figure continues to rise, as does the incidence of older people living in fuel poverty. Many of you will be aware of my background in fuel poverty, so it will be no surprise that I will throw at you some statistics on that. Northern Ireland has a higher-than-average rate of fuel poverty of 44%, but over 61% of older people live in fuel poverty. That increases with the age of people. Those figures are, again, on the rise. We in Age NI are extremely concerned about any issues that we believe will worsen the already dire situation as regards the well-being and income levels of older people.
3550. As I mentioned, our biggest concern about older people and welfare reform is the way in which mixed-age couples will be assessed. As members will be aware, under the current legislation, if one partner in a couple has reached the qualifying age in keeping with a woman's state pension age, which is currently 61, they are both assessed for pension credit. However, welfare reform will mean that, where one partner falls below that age threshold, both will be assessed under universal credit. We are extremely concerned about the impact that will have on the financial well-being of couples in that situation. A very basic example is that, under the current structure, for a couple aged 61 and 56, the income on pension credit would be £217.90 a week. If that same couple were assessed under universal credit, their income would be reduced by £102.45 a week to bring their income to £115.45 a week. That is very basic and does not take into account all the variables that could be in play, but it basically shows that a single person on pension credit would be better off under universal credit than a mixed-age couple. We are extremely concerned about that.

3551. Another area of concern is the capital limit being imposed on universal credit of £16,000, with savings over £6,000 treated as £1 of income per £250 over the threshold. That will mean that, in future, those mixed-age couples with a low income who have over £16,000 and contain a younger partner will be excluded from pension credit because they will be assessed under universal credit. However, they will not be entitled to universal credit because of the savings that they have put together for their retirement. So, there will be a lot of pressure on couples of mixed age, particularly if the older person will no longer get the income that they now get while also having to support the younger partner. Basically, people will be penalised for having a younger partner. We do not feel that that is right.
3552. Following a question asked recently in Westminster, it was revealed that approximately 15% of pension credit claimants in GB were couples where one partner was, at that stage, under the age of 60. We call on the Department to carry out a detailed analysis of the impact of treating mixed-age couples as being of working age for benefit purposes, including providing information about the numbers over time that that will affect, the circumstances of those affected and the changes in the overall level of financial support afforded to them.
3553. Georgina mentioned claimant commitments and sanctions. First, in the absence of that detailed analysis, my comments are not based on any strict evidence. However, it is likely that the younger person in a mixed-age couple will be in their mid- to late-50s — certainly in their 50s. Research has shown that if people in that age group lose their job, they are the least likely to be able to re-enter the workforce before retirement. People in that age group may experience significant barriers to securing employment, such as long-term sickness or intermediate caring responsibilities for their older partner. For that reason, we believe that all necessary support should be given by advisers to assist that age group in re-entering the workforce and that a graded system of conditionality be applied to that group to reflect its circumstances.
3554. An even larger concern about conditionality and sanctions is the impact that they will have if applied to the older person in the couple. That older, retired and often vulnerable person will basically lose out on their benefits and perhaps their sole income through absolutely no control of their own. We are very concerned about the impact that that will have on the income, health, well-being and quality of life of some of our most vulnerable. The needs of the older person in that situation should be taken specifically into consideration.
3555. Housing is another issue of concern with mixed-age couples. Restrictions in the level of housing benefit will not apply to pensioners, but that is not the case if one partner falls below that threshold, and, if couples are assessed under universal credit, normal restrictions will apply. Older couples will often need occasional caring support and something in place if it is ongoing support, such as an extra room, not only for physical support but for social support and to reduce isolation from family. They may also need a separate bedroom if they have separate health needs. We feel that that needs to be taken into consideration in the circumstances. We would be keen to see the details of the proposals to be reassured that older people in mixed-age couples will not be adversely affected by the changes.
3556. One final point that I would like to draw attention to is the concern raised by

- older people currently in receipt of DLA. The Bill states that a decision has yet to be taken on whether to reassess people over 65 who are currently on DLA. We have been contacted by many older people through the services and advice lines that we run, and they are extremely concerned that there is a vagueness around that. We would call for the over-65s to remain exempt from this reassessment, and the introduction of PIPs should provide adequate support for disabled people over 50, again, falling into that category of older people.
3557. You will have received a more detailed briefing from me, which, hopefully, you will have time to read later. If there is any additional information that you require, I will be happy to provide that. Thank you again for the opportunity this morning.
3558. Ms Ryan-White: I will just finish off by drawing together everything that we have said in our presentation. We believe that it is vital that there is significant impact monitoring of the changes on vulnerable claimants from the outset. Unfortunately, that has not always happened in the past with changes. For example, with employment and support allowance, the number of sickness benefit claimants that have been found fit for employment was not monitored from the outset, despite that being one of the key aims of welfare reform and welfare change in the past.
3559. Based on the points in our presentation, we suggest the Committee examine the following: the impact of increased sanctions on jobseekers, including whether that has a positive effect on employability and whether sanctions lead to increased demand for charitable support and advice; the impact of universal credit on claimants with disabilities or illness who are fit for work; the impact of universal credit on child poverty levels, given the commitment in the Child Poverty Act to end child poverty by 2020; and the impact monitoring of the direct and indirect consequences of the implementation of welfare reform, in recognition of the significant impact on the working-age population and the knock-on impact in other sectors increasing displaced expenditure.
3560. I would like to thank you again for the opportunity to present to you today.
3561. The Chairperson: Thank you for your presentations. I appreciate that you are focusing on certain areas. I will open up the discussion to members. You will be aware that, at some point, all members have identified very clearly with a lot of the issues that you have raised. Obviously, they will try to debate with yourselves some of the components of your submissions this morning.
3562. Mr Brady: Thanks very much for your presentation. The thread running through the major submission that you put forward is the lack of knowledge about the regulations. I appreciate that it is very difficult to go into the detail because it is enabling legislation. You point that out very well in your submission. I have a few questions. You have all raised the issue of mixed-age couples. You talked about further explanation of those types of cases. Do you have anything specific in mind in relation to how those might be explored further? Bernie gave a very clear example of somebody losing £115 a week. That is a stark example of how people could be affected. Part of the difficulty about the regulations is the issue around passported benefits. Until they know if passported benefits are going to apply, particularly in relation to carers and disability, it is very difficult to come to any conclusions. Are you thinking specifically of looking at the types of cases that may be affected by lack of passported benefits as the regulations become clearer?
3563. Ms B Magennis: As a starting point, we wanted to make sure that we found out the extent of the impact that this was going to have and how many couples would be affected, that is, how many are going to be over the age of 61 with a younger partner. How that is going to be gathered together is something that we have not been able to find out, or whether Her Majesty's Revenue and

- Customs (HMRC) or the Department will be able to gather statistics on that, and we need to know the impact of that over a period of time. We understand that it will be a difficult statistic to reach because there are other variables at play in respect of couples not staying together or bereavement. There will always be an ongoing impact. As a rule of thumb, however, we would like to find out how many this will affect as people move into the benefits system. Again, the lack of clarity around some of the information that we have makes it difficult. Some of those basic examples show the stark reality of the impact that it will have. From our perspective, all that we can see is that its impact on poverty levels will be to continue to make them increase.
3564. Mr Brady: The work-related requirements have been mentioned, and most people find the work search based on a 35-hour week is unbelievable in some ways. There is also the claimant commitment, and if one person refuses to sign that, the suggestion is that the universal credit payment should be made to the person who does sign it and possibly to the children. Will you elaborate on that a wee bit? Would the prevailing economic conditions that you talked about also apply to the claimant commitment and work search requirements under universal credit? How do you envisage the prevailing economic conditions being monitored?
3565. Ms Ryan-White: When I was here last week, you pointed out that Kilkeel jobcentre had five job vacancies —
3566. Mr Brady: Yes; 446 applicants and nine jobs.
3567. Ms Ryan-White: That would also be one of our concerns as well; there very much needs to be the work out there.
3568. Getting back to the claimant commitment; we have suggested that the split payment of universal credit must be allowed. Along with that, it should be recognised that, in circumstances in which there is discord in a relationship or a breakdown or somebody does not wish to commit, there should be alternative means of allowing the partner who does commit to receive the payment and additional allowances for children, housing and suchlike. That would need to be worked out in the regulations, but we are looking for a commitment from the Department that it is happy to move forward on that and to work, perhaps with the voluntary and community sector organisations on relationship breakdowns, etc, towards finding a means of moving that forward.
3569. Mr Brady: I have just two more questions. Your written submission states that there should be a statutory right to independent advice. Now, that would not cost anything in benefits or affect welfare reform, although it would put a huge burden on the independent advice sector. Has there been any in-depth discussion among your group and with the Department about how extra funding for that would be worked out?
3570. Ms Ryan-White: There have been no official discussions by the Welfare Reform Group. I know that Advice NI is pushing that. The social fund policy specifically mentions increasing the role of the advice sector, and we would like to be key players in those discussions to ensure that there is not a negative impact on claimants. So, we are very willing to move into such discussions if the Department wishes.
3571. Mr Brady: Finally, Bernie, you said that you were asking for the status quo to be maintained for people over 65 making the transition from DLA to PIP.
3572. Ms B Magennis: Yes.
3573. Mr Brady: So really, people who qualified before becoming 65 should not have to be reassessed, but, again, I presume that that will depend on the regulations.
3574. Ms B Magennis: Absolutely.
3575. Mr Brady: The same applies to the cap, because none of that is known. Under regulations, it is possible that PIP may set out two-, three- and five-year

- reassessments but we do not know about the over-65s.
3576. Ms B Magennis: Our request is two-fold. We want people with mobility requirements to have those carried through after they turn 65, which the Bill does not specify. It states that, at the moment, people over 65 on DLA will not be reassessed, and we are looking for a commitment that that reassessment will not take place and that people who are currently in that situation will continue to access DLA.
3577. Mr Brady: Finally, I forgot to make a point about the sanctions and the guidelines. The guidelines are going to be so important, and we have asked the Department about them in relation to the imposition or otherwise of sanctions. Have you any idea or has there, from your perspective, been any discussion with the Department about having input into those guidelines or is that being done purely in-house?
3578. Ms Ryan-White: We have not had any discussions. As we mentioned, we would like a timetable for the regulations and guidance. We would like the Committee to have the opportunity to scrutinise that and to feed into that process.
3579. Ms Moore: Negative and confirmatory resolution have been mentioned. Is there any possibility of getting affirmative resolution so that you could have more say?
3580. Mr Brady: You covered that in your submission.
3581. Mr F McCann: Thank you for the presentation. It was fairly extensive, and a lot of other material is contained in the written submission. We have been dealing with quite a lot of different groups, and most have been singing from the same hymn sheet. There is quite a lot of concern out there. Clause 42 deals with pilot schemes. Do you think that a separate pilot scheme should be launched here? In the past, the Committee, when discussing the local housing allowance, raised the issue of relying on information that was coming from the south of England or the north of England to implement changes here. Do you think that there should be a separate pilot scheme on the Bill or elements of it?
3582. Ms Moore: Yes, we all think that. There are so many things that need to be ironed out, and there are so many contradictions. We have a bit more time to 2014, and we need to look at the IT problems. I heard on the radio this morning that employers are up in arms because many of them did not know about this switch to real time. Instead of giving information every year about employees, it will be every week, and they do not know anything about it. Obviously, they will need a communication strategy as well as the rest of us. Also, with all of those regulations and the appropriate type of resolutions, it will be very important to get a pilot here, given the unique circumstances in Northern Ireland with disability and so on. It would be vital.
3583. Ms Ryan-White: Our first preference is that a pilot scheme be introduced here. We mentioned in our submission that, if we cannot have a pilot scheme, the Department should take on board any learning experiences from across the water and publish a Northern Ireland-specific report and identify any problems encountered over there that might impact on Northern Ireland-specific issues so that there is a process of addressing those issues. That is our second choice, and we would like to see a pilot scheme run here.
3584. Mr F McCann: There are groups, which are trying to tackle the difficulties in the Bill, that are under your umbrella and, equally, there are other groups that also have concerns about the Bill. Has there been any attempt to pull everyone together to try to deal with it as one umbrella group right across the North? There are groups that deal with mental health and some that deal with homelessness. Is it not better to look at one approach for how the Bill could be dealt with?
3585. Ms Ryan-White: The Welfare Reform Group has an open-door policy. Our

- membership has quadrupled in the past six months. The unions have come on board with us, and we have had requests from Housing associations to join. There is a collective feeling and organisation. We know that the Churches and the unions were with you yesterday, and we are singing from the same hymn sheet and collectively working together.
3586. Mr F McCann: You have advocated that safeguards should be put in place so that people with mental health difficulties, learning difficulties and literacy problems and people whose first language is not English are not sanctioned. Have you given any consideration to how that would work in practice? Do you see that being dealt with in the Bill, or do you see it being placed in the regulations?
3587. Ms Ryan-White: We see it more in the regulations on the front line delivery of things. DWP is suggesting making home visits to people with mental health issues. We will very much look to GB to see what they do. We will take the good points from there and come up with some ideas on what can be delivered here in Northern Ireland and what is achievable within the funding restrictions.
3588. Mr Campbell: Your submission is very comprehensive. I want to follow up on the issue about potential home visits, and I noticed that you made it in your written submission. Given the diversity of groups under your umbrella, is it your view that, on a pro-rata basis, there is a greater preponderance of those with mental health and learning disability issues in Northern Ireland? I assume that that is the case, but can you confirm that, from your experience, you think that is the case?
3589. Ms Ryan-White: There is a higher incidence of mental health problems here, and there is evidence to prove that. The report from the Centre for Social Justice confirms that, and there are mental health issues overflowing from the Troubles. We have mental health organisations in our group, and we know that they will be with you tomorrow. We felt that they would be best placed to speak on mental health issues and disabilities. We have left it there, hoping that you will ask them further questions and speak in depth with them.
3590. Collectively, we agree that there should be home visits, transitional safeguards and allowances for people with mental health problems, especially given the increased conditionality and sanctions. That will ensure that they understand what is expected of them and what rights they have to ensure their safety.
3591. Mr Campbell: What I am really getting at is, if it the case — as it appears to be — that there is a greater preponderance of that type of issue in Northern Ireland for the reasons you suggested, that would indicate that there needs to be a greater resource in Northern Ireland to facilitate home visits, which will be more numerous, on a pro-rata basis, than in England and Wales. Is that correct?
3592. Ms Ryan-White: Yes. That is what we envisage.
3593. Mr Campbell: I presume that the resources would have to be increased to meet that demand.
3594. Ms Ryan-White: Yes.
3595. Mr Campbell: I was also interested in what Bernadette said about a couple possibly losing up to £100 a week.
3596. Ms B Magennis: That is based on the current information we have. Obviously, there will be changes to that.
3597. Mr Campbell: That is what I was coming to. That is, obviously, pretty stark.
3598. Ms B Magennis: Yes.
3599. Mr Campbell: Would it be possible to facilitate the Committee to go back to the Department? I know that it is difficult, because every individual's circumstance is different, but could you supply us with, say, four or five typical — I know it is very difficult to get a typical, possible universal credit claimant — or four or five different categories of potential claimants that we would hope would comprise the vast majority of potential claimants? We could put those cases to the Department and ask it what they are getting now and what they would get under the new regime. That will allow us to try and flesh out what you have said, so that, in each of those categories, we could see whether they will be better or worse off. If they are worse off, we could see by how much and how we can remedy that. Do you think that that is a good idea?

3600. Ms B Magennis: We do, and we are happy to provide information. Age NI has an advice line, and our workers work across the all the issues. I have a dedicated policy link with someone who deals specifically with poverty, and I know that there is no such thing as a typical claimant, because there are so many different variables. We hoped to bring together a case study for you today to illustrate all the different issues. However, the variables were so immense that it was impossible to say what was representative of a certain percentage. We can certainly draw out examples and provide them, but we could not say, with any certainty, what percentage those cases would reflect. There are so many different variables at play.

3601. Mr Campbell: The point I am making is that an individual or group could identify the type of person that might represent, say, 0-5% of potential claimants. Whereas, if it were possible to get the vast bulk of potential claimants in four or five categories, that would, at least, give us an idea of where this is leading us. I fully understand the complexities. You would probably need 150 different categories, and that is just not realisable. However, if it were possible to get four, five or six potential universal credit applicants and information on what they currently receive, and compare that with what they will potentially receive, that would at least give us an idea of the general drift. We could then see what the departmental response would be to that. Would you be able to give us that?

3602. Ms B Magennis: We are happy to draw that information. However, as I said, we could not say that it was totally representative.

3603. Mr Campbell: I understand that. Thanks.

3604. Ms Moore: Gregory, I can point you to research that Save the Children did in London. It commissioned research to ensure that universal credit would support working mothers, and the research found that, as we all know, second earners, who are mostly women, are going to lose out. It also found that part-time-working women who are lone parents and who work over 16 hours would lose £2,500 a year. The reason for that was because Iain Duncan Smith apparently did not get enough money for the reforms. We were asking you to lobby for the additional money to make it work. I am happy to pass those worked-up examples to you.

3605. Mr Douglas: Thanks very much for your presentation. Clause 52 deals with the contributory allowance. Almost every submission to date has raised concerns about the limit. You have suggested amending or not implementing that clause. Bernadette, you mentioned those who are under 50 or 55. How did you come to that figure? Is it arbitrary?

3606. Ms Ryan-White: No. We looked at the figures that were produced by DWP. The age group that will be affected most significantly by the changes to ESA will be those aged 50 and over — I think that 48% of the claimants who will be affected by the changes will be 50 and over. We very much want to mitigate that impact.

3607. Mr Douglas: Thanks, Georgina. Clause 69 deals with the size criteria and the notion of underoccupancy. Last week, the Housing Executive told us that it just does not have the housing stock to relocate all those tenants. You suggested possible alternatives, including opposing the clause in its entirety. Do you have a preferred option or approach?

3608. Ms Ryan-White: Our preferred approach would be to oppose it completely.

- We are aware that there are Treasury constraints, and so on. If that is not possible, we have given other, alternative suggestions that have the best interests of claimants at heart.
3609. Mr Douglas: It has also been suggested that we amend the clause so that it would not be applied until there is sufficient housing stock. How would you feel about that?
3610. Ms Ryan-White: Having spoken to the Housing Executive, we know that that might take a good number of years — perhaps 10 years. We would be happy if that happened.
3611. Mr Douglas: Plan B?
3612. Ms Ryan-White: Yes.
3613. Mr Copeland: Thank you for your illuminating presentation. Each of you represents organisations that have come together in a bigger organisation, but it is you, as Age NI, the Law Centre and Save the Children, to whom I wish to address my question. It is a very simple question, but the answer could be rather complex. Should the legislation be enacted in its current form? What is your single biggest fear for the group that you particularly specialise in? Is there a hierarchy of concern? Is there something at the pinnacle of it? If so, what is it?
3614. Ms B Magennis: As you can see from my presentation, apart from the personal independence payment, everything sits under our concern about treating a couple with one person who is of pension age as a mixed-age couple. That is our biggest concern. We can only see it impacting on poverty levels that are already the highest in the UK. That financial impact is our biggest concern.
3615. Ms Moore: We are the same. It is anticipated that, because of the accumulation of these cuts, the recession, unemployment and budget cuts, child poverty will increase to 34% by 2020, instead of being cut.
3616. Mr Copeland: As a direct consequence of this legislation.
3617. Ms Moore: Yes, it will contribute. It is not helping. I know that all the Departments are working together to produce a child poverty outcomes model as an outworking of the Child Poverty Act 2010. All legislation, proposals and funding decisions should be considered in this light: how will they contribute to ending child poverty? The proposals need to be looked at through the lens of the obligation to end child poverty and to realise children's rights in the best interests of the child.
3618. Mr Copeland: From our point of view, we are seeing one side of the scale.
3619. Ms Moore: Yes.
3620. Mr Copeland: I have deep reservations about the lack of availability of the regulations within a time frame that allows you to judge how they will affect the legislation. Following your logic, we also need to know what countermeasures may be put in place to redress the balance.
3621. Ms Ryan-White: The Law Centre covers a lot of areas of law. Our client groups will have issues with mental health, social security, community care, immigration, and so on. Our interest lies in almost every part of the Bill. We would like to see it tailored as much as possible to Northern Ireland's specific circumstances. We believe that the Committee should have the time to scrutinise the regulations. Appropriate time should be given for debate and to examine, as far as possible, what can be done by way of a Northern Ireland-specific approach. I could not put one issue ahead of another. They are all very important, are connected and will impact on every working-age member of the population.
3622. Mr F McCann: The Minister said a while ago that there is an objective to take 10,000 children out of poverty. That cannot be done with the introduction of welfare reform.
3623. Ms Moore: Universal credit, in its initial design, was meant to get more people into work and to make work pay. However, our research has found that - it is not working. Not enough money was put into universal credit in the first place. Then, of course, the work is not available, given the recession and the huge increase in unemployment. We suggest that, on the other side of the equation, there should be a real focus on job creation and decently paid work — pay above the living wage. The fact that around half the children in poverty are from families who already have a job, and that situation is getting worse, shows that there must be a focus on decently paid work. Then there is all the important support that needs to go into that, such as childcare, transport, qualifications, skills, early intervention, equality — you could start me on a rant.

3624. Mr F McCann: We will leave that to some other time.
3625. Ms Moore: Yes. [Laughter.]
3626. Mr F McCann: My other question – it has not been touched on and I cannot see it anywhere in the document – concerns the introduction of the financial sector and financial advisers being brought in to give advice. I have to say that I find it a bit insulting that an adviser will be brought in to advise somebody on how to spend £240 a month. People have to open bank accounts, so there is the possibility of incurring bank charges, which will reduce the amount of money available to them. Have you done anything on that? I do not know whether it is already in existence in England. I picked it up from the departmental briefing.
3627. Ms Ryan-White: No, but we can look into that and get back to you.
3628. The Chairperson: There is a suggestion that the Government — I use their language, not mine — would be minded to examine banking products that could assist people who are receiving benefit payments under universal credit and that some financial institutions could be encouraged or subsidised to come in to help people to manage their budget. That is the argument for it.
3629. Mr F McCann: The Minister said in the Assembly last week that he was talking to a number of financial institutions about those banking products.
3630. The Chairperson: I know that David Freud mentioned it at a meeting last week also.
3631. You are not aware of it at this time. We make it very clear that it is a discussion rather than a proposal.
3632. Mr Durkan: Thank you for the presentation. Bernadette, I was particularly interested in your focus on mixed-age couples. I have raised questions about that in Committee previously. You and Committee members have referred to the financial implications for mixed-age couples. However, with financial implications come other even more serious implications. You referred to the fact that people would be better off as singles than as couples. Do you believe that that could lead to more couples separating at that late stage of their lives?
3633. Ms B Magennis: Obviously, I cannot answer that categorically. However, I know that Age UK did research that found that it would put undue pressure on relationships. How that pressure will manifest itself will obviously be an individual issue. However, the concern is that older people would be better off living on their own than being assessed as a couple under universal credit. That is the bare reality of it.
3634. Mr Durkan: We will have the Equality Commission in later. Do you see a clear equality issue here?
3635. Ms B Magennis: We are certainly concerned. Pensioners are not of working age and therefore do not have any control over the issue. They will be subject to the sanctions and commitments, but they will not actually be the person signing up to those. They will be subject to the imposition of the commitments, but they will not actually have any control over it. They will not be in a position to increase their income, because they are beyond working age. That is a huge concern for us.

3636. Mr Durkan: The issue that I have always raised is that a couple will not be exempt from the underoccupancy element of the legislation if one is still of working age.
3637. Ms B Magennis: That is right.
3638. Mr Brady: Gregory raised the issue of the incidence of mental health problems, people being visited by DWP in Britain and the possibility of that happening here. Going back a number of years, social security offices had a pool of visiting officers who built up a kind of rapport with the clients whom they dealt with. They were, to a large extent, accepted in the community as being sympathetic, knowledgeable or whatever. If the intention is to have visiting officers go out from social security offices, surely there has to be an expertise involved. We have been talking for five or six years about the expertise needed to interview or deal with people who have specific types of mental health problems. It is about not just the resources that are available but the expertise and training that those people require.
3639. I have a question for Anne and Save the Children. Child protection is paramount, but the issue for a lot of lone parents with the working tax credit is that children need to be looked after by a registered childminder. That is a social services child protection issue. Has any thought been given to the fact there will be the same childcare element under universal credit, even though it is going down from 80% to 70%? That is a big factor for lone parents because of the lack of childcare. Has any thought been given to a family member who looks after a child having to go through the protection of children and vulnerable adults (POCVA) assessments. That is done through very formal and rigorous vetting. A change there might go some way to helping lone parents, given the lack of childcare. There are plenty of crèches, but they are extremely expensive. Registered childminders are also expensive.
3640. Your submission states that 390,000 young people will lose youth incapacity benefit. That does not seem a huge figure, but these are youngsters, a lot of whom have learning disabilities, who will be penalised and brought into the larger workforce pool. There is nothing there for them, and it is highly unlikely that there will be in the foreseeable future. Those may be youngsters who are also in receipt of DLA and possibly will be in receipt of PIP. How will they cope in general terms? That figure, which is quoted a couple of times, does not seem inordinately large even for the Assembly to deal with. What are your thoughts on that?
3641. Ms Ryan-White: I will pick up on the issue of ESA. The cost is very little in comparison with the impact that it will have on claimants' lives and what it can give to them by way of support. The social protection fund is where you could look for that money.
3642. If we did that in Northern Ireland, we would be putting our own stamp on welfare reform, by making sure that it provides for those most in need and meets the aim of supporting the most vulnerable in society. That is where we think that there is good flexibility.
3643. Mr Brady: It affects almost 3,000 young people at the moment. That is a fair number.
3644. Ms Ryan-White: I saw that you talked to the Department about that and asked it for figures. I have also been in contact with the Department looking for figures. It does not have the figures in the equality impact assessment (EQIA), and is looking to DWP for them. We are very keen to get the figures as soon as possible so that real costings can be done and this can be moved on as soon as possible.
3645. Ms Moore: On the issue of childcare, I know some of the Department for Employment and Learning (DEL) programmes made provision for exemptions for grandparents. I see no reason why that should not be provided. The childcare strategy has still not been - prepared and put out for consultation. That should consider those kinds of areas. Given the importance of the early years, from nought to six, and because of how the childcare and early years strategies will work together, not only for allowing women into work but for child development, we should be aiming for long-term universal childcare provision. All of that needs to be on the table. I think that that would be useful in the interim.

3646. Mr Brady: Obviously there would have to be liaison with the Health Department, because it is a social services issue.
3647. The reality is that there is a lack of registered childminders and affordable childcare. Mothers, aunts, sisters, and so on, are providing that, and that it is likely to continue because it is what has happened traditionally and historically in the North. It is likely to be a long-term thing. I have spoken to people who are looking after children for relatives, and they do not have any particular problem with registering. However, they have a difficulty with having to look after another child who is not related to them. They are just not going to be involved, because they will not take on the responsibility. That is part of the issue, and it needs addressed — you are right — probably in the short term but possibly in the longer term to some degree.
3648. Ms Moore: That is where the linkages need to be made. What would happen if grandparents or other relations became involved and then, because they have homes that are underoccupied, had to move out of the area? All of this has a knock-on effect. I think that all those displaced costs should be looked at as well.
3649. Mr Brady: To use that hackneyed phrase, it is all inextricably linked.
3650. Ms Moore: Yes.
3651. The Chairperson: No other members are looking to come in. I think that we have covered a fair amount of ground, so thank you. Unless you have anything else that you want to put to the Committee, I want formally to say again that we very much appreciate your written submission and your very illuminating contribution this morning. There were a lot of questions and answers. This session has been very helpful, as I am sure that all members will agree.
3652. For the record, as part of the legislative process, the Committee is due to complete its report on the Committee Stage on the 27th of this month, and the legislation will continue through the Assembly into early next year.
3653. Mr Campbell: Next month.
3654. The Chairperson: We are still in October, so it will be November. Sorry, we are well past the 27th of this month, so it will be 27 November. As I said, the legislation will continue through the Assembly into early next year.
3655. In tandem with that, over the past number of months, the Executive, with the help of a ministerial subcommittee, have been looking at issues around passported benefits, and so on and so forth. Therefore, the Executive have been looking at the matter, and they will consider whether to deal with the social protection fund amendments, which Georgina referred to earlier. There are ongoing parallel discussions on the preparations for the legislation. Obviously that is appropriate, because an awful lot of complex issues need to be addressed. The Committee is in the midst of its evidence-gathering sessions. By the end, we will have received something like 40 written submissions and more than 20 oral submissions. Many of the latter will be from coalition organisations. There is a lot of stakeholder engagement, and rightly so, given the complexities of the Bill and, naturally, the widespread interest in it.
3656. We are very appreciative of your assistance to the Committee. That has allowed us to further deliberate on and consider all the issues. Thank you for your support, which allows us to do our work on scrutinising the Bill. We will be scrutinising it clause by clause in due course. No doubt we will meet you again in a variety of formats.

3657. Ms Ryan-White: Thank you.

3658. The Chairperson: I welcome the representatives of the Human Rights Commission: John Corey, who is one of the commissioners; Dr David Russell, the deputy director; and Colin Caughey, who is a policy worker. Without further ado, I ask the representatives to kick off.

3659. Mr John Corey (Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission): Thank you very much, Chairperson. I thank the Committee for inviting the commission to speak to our advice on the Welfare Reform Bill.

3660. I must go through the formality of stating that the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission (NIHRC) provides advice pursuant to our role under section 69(4) of the Northern Ireland Act 1998. The commission grounds its advice on the full range of internationally accepted human rights standards, including the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR), which is incorporated in the Human Rights Act 1998, and the treaty obligations of the Council of Europe and United Nations systems.

3661. I will start with general points on the human rights analysis, which are addressed in the commission's advice to the Committee. The commission particularly welcomes the attention that this Committee has given to the human rights implications of the Bill. However, I must record that the commission is disappointed that there is a lack of evidence that the Department has undertaken the required human rights scrutiny of the Bill. We noted that, last Monday, the Minister for Social Development advised the Assembly that the Department had conducted a full analysis of the Bill against the European Convention on Human Rights. However, we are not aware that that analysis has been made available to the Committee or that it will be published. In addition, the commission points out that the Department is obliged to analyse the Bill against all relevant human rights standards in the treaty obligations of the Council of Europe and the United Nations systems, not just on the European convention.

3662. The commission also submits that the heavy reliance on secondary legislation complicates the task of providing a human rights analysis of the Bill. That is addressed in our submission, whereby we advocate that the regulations should be subject to affirmative resolution or confirmatory procedure to ensure scrutiny against human rights standards. I note that Mr Copeland is not here; however, we read the answer to a written Assembly question provided by the Minister in relation to the process and procedure of affirmative resolution. However, the commission still stands by its advice to you on that matter: the secondary legislation should be subject to affirmative procedure.

3663. Our submission highlights a number of specific issues that require the Committee's attention. The commission's focus is on testing the Bill against human rights standards, not the politics of welfare reform. The commission can support the stated aim of the Bill, which is to assist people into work. The right of people to work is recognised in the European Social Charter. The measures included in the Bill, intended to assist and encourage individuals to exercise the right to work, must, however, take into account the particular circumstances of an individual. That can be taken forward into the particular measures. We cover universal credit in our submission and have raised concerns regarding the payment of universal credit to a single member of a household. That may compound difficulties faced by vulnerable families, particularly, for example, when domestic violence is present. In that context, the commission welcomes the Minister's announcement that universal credit payments may be made to two persons, but the commission will want to analyse the detail of the proposed arrangements on that.

3664. The Commission will be familiar with the widespread concerns about the replacement of disability living allowance (DLA) with personal independence payments (PIPs). DLA or PIPs is an important benefit that assists disabled people to overcome societal barriers that they may face. The commission submits that the UK has ratified the UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, and, under that convention, the Northern Ireland Executive are required to protect the right of disabled people to live life as independently as possible. The commission's advice is that the convention requires the Executive to adopt the social model of disability and that that needs to be reflected in the assessment criteria for PIPs. The commission further advises that the Committee needs to investigate how the assessment process for PIPs takes account of the social, practical and environmental barriers experienced by claimants with disability.
3665. We deal with the sanctions regime in our submission and have raised concerns about the potential for the sanctions regime, relating to the various work-related requirements. Our concern is that those will be imposed unduly harshly, with the result that an individual may become destitute. The Bill contains numerous safeguards, so that the sanctions should not be imposed without good reason, and allows for those who have sanctions imposed on them to apply for a hardship payment. However, our concerns remain. The system places a significant amount of power in the hands of those who are responsible for its administration, which is how the benefits system has traditionally operated.

3666. Paragraph 7 of schedule 1 to the Bill provides for regulations that will define the circumstances in which a claimant could be determined as not having a good reason. The commission advises that it is important that those regulations take into account the particular circumstances of an individual. In that context, we have raised specific concerns regarding women with childcare responsibilities and have advised that the regulations should make specific provision for those with dependants. We also submit that that is an area in which the particular circumstances of Northern Ireland are relevant. We further advise the Committee to consider more generally how the absence of adequate and affordable childcare in Northern Ireland impacts and whether that should be reflected in the Bill.
3667. We cover the issue of hardship payments in our submission. As I said earlier, when a sanction is imposed, individuals may apply for a hardship payment, provided they can demonstrate that they are or will be in hardship. The commission's advice is that the imposition of a sanction that has the potential to result in an individual becoming destitute engages the Northern Ireland Executive's positive obligation under article 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights. That is an obligation to prevent hardship at a level that may amount to "inhuman or degrading treatment". The commission's concern is that a sanction creates a significant risk that it may result in individuals or their dependants becoming destitute. For example, the commission is - concerned that vulnerable members of society, particularly those with mental health problems or impairments, may encounter difficulties when applying for hardship payments. Again, the working arrangements for hardship payments are to be set down in regulations. The commission's advice is that those regulations should expressly provide that a sanction should not be imposed when there is a significant risk that it may result in individuals or their dependants becoming destitute. The Committee may wish to investigate whether the regulations may make provision for an alternative sanction in circumstances in which there is a risk of destitution.

3668. As a general point, the commission also advises that all staff who are responsible for the conditionality and the sanctions regime must be adequately trained and that every effort should be made to resolve a difficulty before a sanction is imposed. The sanctions regime must be proportionate and procedurally fair.
3669. Clause 70 of the Bill provides for the abolition of the discretionary part of the social fund, which includes community care grants, crisis loans and budgeting loans, all of which have provided important safeguards when an individual encounters financial difficulties. Community care grants in particular have provided support to disabled persons. We understand that a replacement scheme is to be developed, and we encourage the Committee to interrogate the sufficiency of the replacement scheme to ensure that it provides similar safeguards to the current system.
3670. Clause 69 empowers the Department to set an approximate maximum housing benefit. The precise details of how that will be calculated will, again, be set out in regulations. The commission advises that those regulations should provide for a specific assessment of the personal circumstances of an individual, particularly when an individual is disabled. Again, because of the particular circumstances of the Northern Irish housing stock, we think that specific provision needs to be made to monitor the implications of that proposal closely.
3671. Clause 30 allows for contracted providers in the private and voluntary sectors to exercise the functions of the Department that relate to work-related and connected requirements. That could impact on individuals' entitlement and benefits and, by extension, on their right not to be treated in an inhuman or degrading manner and on their right to an adequate standard of living. The commission submits that it is important that there is no ambiguity about privately contracted providers being subject to the provisions of the Human Rights Act 1998. Private contracted providers should also be required to provide adequate training to their staff, which should include training in relevant aspects of human rights law and, specifically, on the rights of disabled people. The commission advocates that those matters should be covered in statute.
3672. A final point that is not in our submission relates to migrant workers, which we understand the Law Centre has also raised with the Committee. Paragraph 7 of schedule 1 to the Bill allows for regulations to provide that claimants from the EU with a right to reside will be placed in the all-work requirements category. That appears to treat migrants in a discriminatory manner, and the commission advises that it may be in breach of article 14 of the European Convention on Human Rights. As pointed out in our submission, contributory and non-contributory benefits are proprietary rights protected by article 1 of protocol 1 of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR). The commission intends to analyse the issue further, and we advise the Committee to seek analysis undertaken by the Department on the matter.
3673. Those are the points in our written submission that I wished to highlight to the Committee. My colleagues and I will be pleased to answer points of detail that Committee members wish to raise.

3674. The Chairperson: Thanks very much for your presentation, which was quite comprehensive. Again, thank you for providing us with a written submission, which we were able to look at, and on which you further elaborated. A number of members wish to speak.
3675. Mr Douglas: Thank you, Chair.
3676. Thank you for your presentation. You mentioned what the Minister said in his statement on welfare reform. He said:
- “As part of the process for bringing a Bill to the Executive, my Department has already conducted a full analysis of the proposals contained in it for their compatibility with their obligations under the European Convention on Human Rights.”*
3677. He then went on to detail the various articles and finished off by saying:
- “The Department’s view and mine is that the Bill is compatible with the convention rights, as defined in section 1 of the Human Rights Act 1998. That view has been confirmed by the Departmental Solicitor’s Office.”*
3678. I note your concern about the absence of detailed human rights analysis of the Bill and of its potential implications. Either you are right or he is right, as you take totally different views. You also mentioned that there is no evidence of what the Minister detailed in his statement. Have you had any detailed discussions with the Minister or his Department on those details? Have you requested any of that information?
3679. Dr David Russell (Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission): We are not disputing that the Minister has undertaken a human rights analysis or an impact assessment. In fact, we noted that he made that remark to the Assembly. The only thing that we are drawing to the Committee’s attention is whether it has had sight of that impact analysis?
3680. Mr Douglas: Have you seen it?
3681. Dr Russell: No, we have not.
3682. Mr Douglas: Have you requested it?
3683. Dr Russell: No, we have not.
3684. In response to your final question, just to jump ahead, the commission met the Minister when the Welfare Reform Bill was passing through Westminster. At that stage, the commission made it clear to the Minister and his officials that it was willing to engage at whatever level they saw fit. However, in the interim period, the Department has made no approach to the commission seeking advice.
3685. Mr Douglas: Have you approached the Department?
3686. Dr Russell: No, we have not.
3687. Mr Douglas: Do you agree that it is a two-way process? We will certainly be asking the Minister for some of that evidence after what you have said; it is a good point.
3688. Mr Corey: To add to that, when the legislation was being considered at Westminster, the House of Commons Joint Committee on Human Rights criticised the absence of a detailed human rights memorandum at the time. Given that that criticism is on record, we take the view that it was not unreasonable to expect the Department to produce a memorandum when the Bill came in front of the Assembly. The warnings were already there.
3689. Mr Douglas: Are you saying that there is no memorandum at the moment?
3690. Mr Corey: That is one of the issues. The additional point I made in the submission is that the Minister spoke about testing the Bill against the ECHR. However, we submit that the Executive, the Assembly and, indeed, the Committee have obligations under United Nations and Council of Europe treaties as well as the convention.
3691. Dr Russell: Just to add to John’s point, perhaps it would be useful to draw the Committee’s attention to section 26 of the Northern Ireland Act, which states that Executive Bills have to be rendered compliant with international standards. The obligation falls, in the first instance, on the Executive and, ultimately, on the Secretary of State to ensure that

- Assembly legislation complies with binding UN law. We would like to see the Department bringing that forward and the Committee addressing it. The explanatory memorandum to the Bill contained a human rights compliance statement, but unless the Committee has seen otherwise; to date, that is certainly all that the commission has seen.
3692. Mr Douglas: I have a couple of quick questions. You do not seem all that happy with your experience in this process to date. Compared to previous processes, has this one been very different when it comes to your discussions with the Department and the information that you requested?
3693. Mr Corey: I cannot rely on a lot of personal experience on this. The first answer that comes to mind is that I think that everyone recognises that the Bill is almost unique in its scale and impact on people. What should properly happen in this case must be judged on its own as opposed to being compared to what happened previously with the Human Rights Commission's consideration of a relatively straightforward Bill that did not raise the same range of human rights issues.
3694. Dr Russell: We are happy to give you a few examples of recent such Bills. The Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (DHSSPS) engaged extensively with the commission and sought its advice privately on the mental capacity legislation, as did the Minister of Education on special educational needs reform.
3695. Mr Douglas: Finally, you talked about the absence of detailed human rights analysis. If there were agreement to do that, what would that analysis look like?
3696. Dr Russell: I suggest that we take as a starting point the international standards that the commission has identified, and look for convention compliance article by article relevant to each clause of the Bill; in much the same way as we assume that the Departmental Solicitor's Office would have done for the ECHR, which the Minister explained in his statement.
3697. Mr Douglas: May I assume that that process would be fairly lengthy?
3698. Dr Russell: It could well be. I caught the tail end of Mr Durkan's question raising the other alternative, which is for the Assembly to establish, under Standing Orders, an Ad Hoc Committee to undertake a detailed analysis. Westminster has the benefit of the parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights doing such analysis, but there is no Committee of that standing in the Assembly.
3699. The Chairperson: By way of information; the Committee has sought legal advice on the specific issue around the migrant workers to which Les Allanby referred earlier.
3700. Mr Douglas: Chair, may I ask another quick question.
3701. The Chairperson: Sorry, Sammy; I am just putting on record that we have sought a legal opinion on that matter.
3702. Mr Douglas: Some groups have told us that they may mount a legal challenge by seeking leave to apply for a judicial review. Would you be interested in doing that if we do not come to some sort of arrangement?
3703. Mr Corey: There are many complications for the Human Rights Commission embarking on judicial review processes. Our engagement in this matter is under our statutory function. I see our duty as being to advise, in this case, the Committee of the human rights standards and issues that have to be engaged in its scrutiny of the Bill, and to clarify those to members. That is our role.
3704. Dr Russell: The point is that court is the last resort. Within its competency, the commission's job is to make sure that the Bill is as compliant with human rights standards as we can possibly make it. That is our interest. We are certainly not interested in judicially reviewing anyone if we can at all help it.

3705. Mr Colin Caughey (Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission): To amplify John's point: the European Court of Human Rights has emphasised that the more parliamentary scrutiny that there is of human rights issues the less likely it is that there will be a court challenge. The Committee's interest in the human rights issues raised by the Bill is one area of significant difference from previous processes.
3706. Mr Douglas: OK. Thank you.
3707. Mr Brady: Thanks for the very interesting and informative presentation. You are right to say that this legislation is unique. The most recent major change was instigated by Fowler in 1985 and enacted in 1988. This is much wider and more encompassing. I may be misreading your demeanour, and correct me if I am wrong, but it seems that there are certainly parts of this that you are not particularly happy about. Other groups have highlighted the Convention on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women and article 27 of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. There is the whole issue about universal credit. Many have argued that payment should go to the main carer, which would then protect vulnerable members of the family, particularly children. I wonder what your views are on that.
3708. You also raised the issue of the transfer from disability living allowance (DLA) to PIPs. I know from talking to numbers of people with particular disabilities that DLA is there for a specific reason. It is to enable people to have a better and enhanced quality of life which they may not have otherwise because of their particular disability. According to the Social Security Commissioners' case law on DLA at this point in time, it is not necessarily what causes your problem that matters; it is how it affects you. This Bill takes that a step further: it is now about how you can cope. One of the issues that you raised is that it is also incumbent on the private sector — like Atos, for example — to ensure that human rights are properly dealt with.
3709. If you saw the 'Dispatches' and 'Panorama' programmes, it will be very clear to you that there are big human rights issues involved. The contract for the changeover from DLA to PIPs has not been decided here. However, I think that we can be reasonably assured that there will be a similar process put in place. That seems to be, in many cases, a denial of fundamental rights, particularly of disabled people. I wonder as to your views on that, though I do not expect you to comment on particular private companies.
3710. As to the work capability assessment, some people have been asked how far they can walk. I have had people in my constituency office who have said, "I have mobility problems and I told them that I can walk 20 yards". They were then asked, "How far can you go in a wheelchair?" They responded, "I do not have a wheelchair and I have no intention of getting one." That is the kind of situation that is developing.
3711. One of the things that you pointed out very clearly, and this is important, is that each case should be dealt with on an individual basis. It should be dealt with objectively by the assessor. We have argued, and I continue to argue, about the primacy of medical evidence. If you are dealing with a benefit such as PIPs, DLA or employment and support allowance (ESA) medical evidence is important. People get DLA because they are medically assessed initially, whether it be self-assessment or through medical evidence from their GP or consultant. It seems that the decision-maker who makes the final decision but is not medically qualified needs to have all that evidence to hand in order to make any sort of reasonable decision in relation to that person's particular circumstances.
3712. I think it is important that you mentioned that there are not just physical and mental disabilities; there are also the social barriers that people face. That is all interlinked with their human rights.
3713. Can you comment on those issues?

3714. Mr Corey: I will ask Colin to pick up on some of the detailed points that you have raised. You commented on my demeanour. I think it important that I restate that the commission's focus is to test the provisions of the Bill, as we would any piece of legislation, against human rights standards, and not the politics of welfare reform. There may well be differing views about welfare reform, the background and reasons for it.
3715. A second general point that I would make, without commenting on any private company, is that the media reports that have been quite widespread about individuals' experiences of the system so far in Britain, serve at least to put everyone on notice that this is a critical area for examination. That is one of the reasons why the commission included that, specifically, in its submission. We could see that human rights could be affected by this, and we have heard and seen that.
3716. My last general point is on your references to how individuals who are applying for PIPs are treated, as in the current DLA system. We have submitted the issues around the societal model of disability, as against the medical model of disability. However, we do not suggest that there should be some utopia in which assessments disregard a person's medical condition. That is not real, in the context of a person applying for that type of assistance. What we say, quite clearly, is that the assessment should take account of a wide range of factors and the societal factors that affect or may affect that individual. Not every two people will be the same, and we are essentially saying that each individual's full circumstances must be considered and that there must not be a regime of box-ticking. That is our approach. I will ask Colin to pick up the other points of detail that you raised.
3717. Mr Caughey: In our opening statement, we welcomed the Minister's indication that universal credit could be paid to two people. Certainly, it is written in the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) that children have the right to benefit from social security.
- So, our key concern will be to analyse whatever measures are proposed in that area so that they benefit the child. Similarly, with women; that the money there benefits female members of the family also.
3718. I will amplify the PIPs point. As John said, the United Nations Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (UNCRPD) very much supports the social model of disability and encourages and requires Governments to look at how societal barriers prevent a disabled person from engaging fully in life. We feel that it is important that that is reflected in the assessments for PIPs. There has been much discussion on how to do that in England, Wales and here. We encourage the Committee to keep that under review as the assessment criteria further develop to ensure that it is looking at what assistance an individual needs to ensure that they are able to fully participate in life.
3719. Mr Brady: I have one more point, Chair. Mark alluded to it earlier, and it was mentioned this morning by Age NI. Because of the change, one partner in a couple may be eligible for pension credit and one for universal credit, because they are younger. This is the norm for couples in our society in most, but not all, cases. That person will then be brought back into the work pool, and we heard this morning about the very stark example that the couple could lose £115 a week. You mentioned destitution, and when people are on a benefit that is, by government's own admission, at subsistence level, £115 a week is a huge amount of money and could lead to people being in destitution. If someone receiving that amount of benefit is trying to budget to a particular level and manage a particular lifestyle and loses approximately 50% of their benefit, how does that tie in with human rights? Presumably, it flies in the face of some conventions because of how the person's human rights might be affected. Ultimately, benefit is not their chosen lifestyle or chosen income but is how they have to manage.

3720. Mr Caughey: That indicates the importance of closely monitoring the implementations of the reforms once they are brought in and trying to anticipate the impact prior to that. As we mentioned in our opening statement, the Government are under a positive obligation to ensure that individuals do not find themselves in destitution.

3721. Mr Brady: The difficulty is that, by the time the monitoring is completed, people may already be in that situation. That issue has to be addressed.

3722. Dr Russell: I have not looked in great detail at the point about the universal credit and the pension provision. However, we have looked in more detail at the hardship payment, for example, and, with that, we are concerned that destitution constitutes a violation of article 3. So, there would be a breach in that instance. The difficulty with the provisions of the Bill — and I heard it mentioned in the previous evidence session — is what its outworkings may mean for potential human rights breaches is hard to quantify due to the lack of analysis combined with the reliance on secondary legislation. We do not really know in practice, and we could not say one way or the other, that a breach would occur. It seems to us that the hardship payment would kick in after the sanction, and that someone could find themselves in destitution. As a consequence, they would apply for the hardship payment and maybe receive support. At that stage, a violation would have already occurred. It is too late and is like trying to shut the door after the horse has bolted.

3723. On your other point about private sector contractors, the European and domestic case law is quite clear on that: private sector contractors carrying out a public function are public authorities for the purposes of the Human Rights Act. That should be made clear in private sector contracts.

3724. Mr Brady: Hardship payments will be recoverable. Although people may get a hardship payment to get them out of short-term destitution, they will be below subsistence level when their benefit kicks in again because they will have to pay back the hardship payment. The regulations may well deal with the amount. However, I think that it is true to say that, with respect to social security benefit and parity, it has always been the case that recovery from benefit here is more than its equivalent in Britain. People here have always had to pay back more. That was my experience when I worked for many years as an advice worker, and it puts people here in an even worse position.

3725. Dr Russell: If people find themselves in that circumstance, the multiplier effect is a possibility. Until the new regime kicks in, it is hard to justify it. One thing we considered regarding the migrant workers point, for example, is that, with the work-related requirement categorisation of EU migrancy and the right to reside, because of some other aspect, such as a disability, migrant workers would find themselves subject to a sanction regime. As a consequence, their hardship payment would kick in too late after the violation had occurred. They could find themselves in the repeated scenario that you paint.

3726. Mr Copeland: I would like to put to you one question that I asked previous witnesses. It is about the UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities with particular reference to articles 19, 22 and 28. What are the potential consequences of legislation being enacted here that breaches that convention? To the best of your knowledge, has Northern Ireland or any other constituent member ever breached such a rule?

3727. Dr Russell: Do you mean the UNCRPD?

3728. Mr Copeland: The UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, which sets out some clear responsibilities.

3729. Dr Russell: There are two aspects here. The question is this: what would be the impact if the Assembly brought forward legislation that had not been sufficiently scrutinised as regards compliance? It is a statutory requirement. However,

- the conventions are not justiciable. Therefore, if, as a consequence of the legislation, there was an unbeknown breach of the UNCRPD, the likelihood is that that would become part of the reporting process back to the United Nations.
3730. However, the more immediate worry is how the unbeknown breach of the CRPD would be linked to a potential breach of the European Convention. One possible scenario would be where, under the new regime, there was a withdrawal, or partial withdrawal, of payment of PIPs from someone who is disabled and who is subject to the new cap for housing. They could easily find themselves facing a choice between keeping a roof over their head and feeding themselves. That would constitute an immediate breach of article 3. It would also engage article 19 of CRPD.
3731. When people talk about the particular circumstances of Northern Ireland, we hear well-versed arguments about how we are different from the rest of the UK in respect of, for example, the housing stock. Something else that we think that the Committee should consider, which we mentioned in our submission, is the fact that there are a number of reforms taking place in a variety of Departments in Northern Ireland that coincide with the introduction of welfare reform and could also have a potential impact. As a consequence, in the scenario that I have just painted, someone could easily find that they would better-placed in a residential care home. However, we know that Transforming Your Care from DHSSPS will reduce the number of residential care homes in Northern Ireland. So, the situation could be compounded by the impact of another government policy.
3732. Mr Copeland: What are the consequences of that for the legislation, for those who enact the legislation, and for those who carry it out?
3733. Dr Russell: If, retrospectively, it were found that there was a breach, the legislation would have to be amended.
- You could easily find yourself with an individual claimant taking a judicial review.
3734. Mr Copeland: Would the legislation then have to be changed?
3735. Dr Russell: If there was found to be a breach, yes.
3736. Mr Copeland: If I picked you up correctly, you said a few moments ago that there is a duty to ensure that this legislation is as compliant as possible. Is there an interpretation of “compliance”? I suppose that there must be. What did you mean by the phrase “as compliant as possible”? I would have thought that something is either compliant or it is not, in the absence of a legislative process to decide that.
3737. Dr Russell: It is. However, ultimately, there is always the possibility that a legislature could unknowingly pass legislation that is then found to be in technical breach. It is the proper role of the courts to determine whether that is the case.
3738. Mr Copeland: So, are you the arbiter here, in so far as you are the font of all knowledge about whether something is a breach? Does an onus, therefore, reside not only with the Department, to ensure that what it is proposing does not breach human rights conventions, but with us in our scrutiny role?
3739. Dr Russell: Our role is to provide the best analysis, from a human rights perspective, as we can to the Committee and the Assembly in order to assist them to make good, compliant human rights legislation. A number of other actors have that responsibility as well, such as the Departmental Solicitor’s Office. As has been suggested, there is the possibility of the Assembly formulating an ad hoc scrutiny Committee to deal with this serious legislation. There are a number of avenues open to the Assembly under Standing Orders, and the commission will play its part.
3740. Mr Copeland: If I were to give two lawyers a piece of paper with x, y and z written it, they would argue about the - relevance of x, y and z for hours. I have always found that to be the case.

3741. Basically, at the end of this process, if we have done our job properly, we should be advised about whether what we are proposing to recommend, accept or declare as scrutinised is compliant. Even at that point, however, it could be subject to an interpretation from someone with a different view.
3742. Dr Russell: It could be. However, the Committee has at its disposal the possibility of making the recommendation about the secondary legislation under affirmative or confirmatory resolution. We certainly think that that would add in an extra layer of protection in respect of human rights compliance for those parts of the Bill that we have not yet seen and do not know the impact of. From a human rights perspective, that would be an extra safeguard.
3743. Mr Copeland: Sticking strictly to the human rights aspects of this, I presume that the rest of the United Kingdom is bound by the same conventions. Your view is that it would be unsafe for us to accept their findings because we have another layer of consideration to apply from the equality legislation and stuff. Some would say that we really are making a whip to beat ourselves. Given that this has gone through Westminster, there is an assumption that it has already been human rights-proofed and that everything is hunky dory. Are there implications for Westminster if we raise issues here about compliance with the human rights conventions?
3744. Dr Russell: This is a devolved matter. It is within the competency of the Assembly to pass this legislation. So the duty is on the Assembly to ensure compliance. Whether the welfare reforms that have been introduced in England and Wales, and Scotland are compliant is a matter for those Parliaments. In this instance, the commission is advising you. However, we engaged in the Westminster process as well, because we knew full well that the Act would be replicated here according to the parity principle. The Joint Committee on Human rights, a scrutiny Committee in Westminster, raised very similar issues to the ones we are presenting today. It may be worthwhile for the Committee to look at what the Joint Committee concluded and advised the Government.
3745. Mr Copeland: If, at the end of this process, we are faced with legislation from Westminster that satisfies its requirements but does not satisfy the requirements here, does responsibility for any financial implications arising from potential breaches and mitigating factors that have to be put in place lie with those who sent the legislation to us in that form or does it reside with us from our own meagre resources?
3746. Dr Russell: Responsibility for the implications of a breach would reside with the Department, because it is exercising the legislation. I am not sure what you mean by potential financial implications, but if you are talking about the possible impact on the block grant —
3747. Mr Copeland: Yes. In other words, that the legislation sent to us was not attuned to our needs, and that the cost of attuning it to our needs in order to comply with as much as we could was rested in the fact that the expectations to be realised in the Bill were not achievable in our context.
3748. Dr Russell: The Committee may conclude that. It would not be for the commission to analyse that. I can give you an example. The shift from DLA to PIPs, for example, is premised on a 20% cost saving. We do not doubt for a minute that 20% may be saved as consequence of the shift from DLA to PIPs. Our concern is that it might be a blanket approach determined in advance. Who knows? As a consequence of moving from DLA to PIPs and analysing people individually, you may well find that the government's requirement to support people, while complying with convention requirements and the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (CRPD), will cost more, and resources would be - better diverted from other parts of the pot.

3749. Mr Corey: Some of your questioning bears out the point that we made about the importance of secondary legislation or regulations being subject to scrutiny, even though the equivalent regulations may not have been subject to scrutiny or may have gone through the Westminster Parliament by negative resolution. We are saying that affirmative resolution or confirmatory procedure should be applied. We would almost say that you should apply that approach to all the regulations that will come through on this. It reminds me of a phrase that we used in the past when we talked about parity in other areas, which is, “We are interested in parity but not parrotry.”
3750. Mr F McCann: Much that I was going to ask has been covered, but I will go ahead anyway.
3751. Mr Durkan: Parrotry — who’s a pretty boy? [Laughter.]
3752. The Chairperson: He does not really mean that badly.
3753. Mr F McCann: Do you want us to be here until 5.00 pm?
3754. Thanks for your very informative presentation. Things would be different if we were talking about a Bill that does what it says, which is to change or reform. The Bill that we are dealing with is, however, more ideologically driven than it is aimed at bringing changes for the better to people in England. Obviously, I will not ask you to comment on that. It is also sanction-led, as you, quite rightly, said. In the Assembly, some time ago and more recently, we tried to get at the “two strikes and you are out” issue. You could be sentenced for a particular social security issue through the justice process, then, on release, you walk into an office where you can apply for and get benefit. However, if you are caught doing the double, your benefit can be suspended for 26 weeks, two years or whatever. So, if you are charged with a benefit offence and apply, you will be refused benefit. Something in that seems unfair: you could be done for robbing a bank and be accepted as a legitimate claimant, but if you make an error claiming benefits, you are refused benefit.
3755. As I read through the information, I noted the case of Ásmundsson v Iceland, which I think that you quoted. What were the consequences of that? Does the judgement have a knock-on effect on how sanctions are applied here?
3756. Housing is the other issue. Is there an international standard for the size of rooms? Most of the old Housing Executive or social housing providers’ homes had a box room that measured about 6 feet by 10 feet or 8 feet by 10 feet and could take a single bed, but now we are told that it can sleep two people. Is there anything in law that states that, at a certain age, people of opposite sexes have to stay in a separate room or even people of different ages?
3757. Mr Corey: I will ask David to pick up your first and third questions, and Colin will deal with the second.
3758. Dr Russell: The Ásmundsson v Iceland case was a European Court judgement on a sanctions regime. The court determined that the removal of social security benefits was disproportionate. So, yes, case law has been set down. You raised the issue of how long a sanction should go on for, and sanctions could be subject to a test. We have included the case law in our presentation to indicate that there is the possibility of sanctions being tested when the new sanctions regime kicks in. What the court would consider in that instance is whether it was a proportionate and reasonable response to fulfil a legitimate aim of the sanction. There is nothing adverse to human rights standards in imposing the sanctions regime; the question is whether it is a reasonable and proportionate response and, vitally, and what most concerns us, will it push people into destitution? That would be unacceptable, and it would be a clear breach under inhuman and degrading treatment. As the sanctions regime

- sits now, our concern is that that might happen. However, that comes with the caveat of our not knowing what the secondary legislation will be. European case law would have relevance in this jurisdiction, because the Human Rights Act 1998 is read in conjunction with European Court judgements.
3759. Mr Caughey: Another judgement is Limbuela, which is equally difficult to pronounce. That case related to an asylum seeker's eligibility to apply for benefits, and a restriction had also been placed on his working. The House of Lords ruled that it was possible that making someone unable to access benefits could be considered as leaving them in destitution.
3760. There is nothing as specific as that case on your point about the size of rooms. However, under the United Nations Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (UNCRPD) and the right to independent living, it may be that someone will require a carer to enable them to live more independently or will, occasionally, require a carer to stay. There are ways in which the size of a room or the availability of additional rooms in a house would be relevant to someone's enjoyment of rights that are protected under international human rights law.
3761. Mr F McCann: Are there different definitions of destitution?
3762. Mr Caughey: The principal definition is contained in the Limbuela case. That comes from the Nationality, Immigration and Asylum Act 2002 definition, under which someone would be considered as being destitute if they lack:
"accommodation, and food and other essential items".
3763. Dr Russell: In essence, we are talking about the choice between having a roof over your head and feeding yourself. Everyone should have the right to shelter, accommodation, food and clothing. Where people are faced with choosing between those, there is the potential that we could overstep the mark and be in breach.
3764. The general reference of the UN's Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights is to "adequate housing". However, there is no definition of what constitutes that. Once again, the focus on human rights is on individual need. These decisions should be premised on individual circumstances. What a family of four requires not to be destitute will be completely different from what a single person living alone requires.
3765. Mr F McCann: On the housing issue, would the legacy of conflict, underoccupancy and the difficulties that remain with people moving from one area to another have an impact on people's human rights? They may have been asked to move but refused because they feared for their life.
3766. Dr Russell: There is a clear, positive obligation on the state to ensure that there is no potential breach of the right to life. Given the nature of society here and the threat of sectarianism and all that goes with it, the choice of housing stock in which it would be appropriate to accommodate people is limited. That is only one particular circumstance. We also know that there is a higher level of DLA claimants as a consequence of the impact of conflict here. We do not, necessarily, have the highest level, as there is some debate about how the UK is broken up regionally.
3767. Mr F McCann: That is interesting. I have one final question on the cap on benefits. We were told that 520 or 580 families will be directly affected by that. However, over 13,000 people on DLA may also be affected by the transition to PIPs. Obviously, through the Bill, it has been decided to place a cap at a certain level. That will penalise a certain section of the community — those with large families. Is there anything there that you see as impacting on destitution or taking away people's right to quality of life?
3768. Dr Russell: The right to family and private life under article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights would be engaged at that point,

- and there would also be a potential breach of article 14, as it may be discriminatory.
3769. Mr Corey: It almost comes back to the earlier point of how you measure destitution and hardship and the impact that they have. If benefits are capped, it may not affect a small family, but it could start to have the impact that you described on a large family.
3770. Mr Durkan: Those comments are timely, as I was going to make a point about the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child. In my opinion, the inclusion of child benefit in the benefit cap is a breach of that convention. Further possible regulations will certainly be a breach, particularly as we have heard Iain Duncan Smith talking about stopping child-related benefit at two children. Article 26 of the convention states:
- “Parties shall recognize for every child the right to benefit from social security”.*
3771. There is no mention of just the first two children. What would be the implications if the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) were breached? Do you think that this could constitute such a breach?
3772. Dr Russell: The Convention on the Rights of the Child is binding law on which the UK Government and the Northern Ireland Executive have to report back periodically to the United Nations. I am sure that the UN’s Committee on the Rights of the Child will look at that issue closely. It is not dissimilar to the previous point. I would imagine that, in the first instance, because you are talking about a move from the family unit with two children to the three children scenario, the most likely first avenue to explore would be whether family life was impacted in a discriminatory fashion, which would engage article 14 of the European Convention on Human Rights. You would then bring in the UNCRC on top of that. Domestic human rights protections and international protections quite often mirror each other.
3773. Mr Durkan: It is proposed that the mobility component of PIPs be removed from someone in a hospital or care home. Would that be a breach of human rights?
3774. Mr Caughey: The UNCRPD requires that disabled people be supported to live life independently. If a car was a necessary element of enabling someone to live life independently, there is certainly the potential for their not having one to have adverse implications on their right to an independent life. As far as I understand it from my reading of developments in England and Wales, the mobility component is to be retained for persons in care homes. However, that may be inaccurate.
3775. Ms Brown: Thank you very much for your very interesting presentation. I want to ask you about the lack of a childcare strategy and the necessary infrastructure and resources. That places women at an obvious disadvantage in relation to welfare reform. Will you give us your view of placing work-related requirements on women with childcare responsibilities and the possible sanctions? Northern Ireland is unlike England and Wales, where there is a responsibility to provide childcare. Are there any apparent human rights issues?
3776. Dr Russell: Yes. We addressed that issue in our submission, which lays out the standards quite clearly. Article 22 of the United Nations Declaration on Social Progress and Development 1969 provides for:
- “the establishment of appropriate child-care facilities in the interest of children and working parents.”*
3777. As with all the treaties mentioned in our submission, that has been ratified by the UK and is binding on the Northern Ireland Executive. Furthermore, article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights might also, potentially, be engaged in that area, as could article 1 of the Convention on Eliminating All Forms of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW), which does not allow for discrimination against women on the basis of sex and in comparison with men. It demands equality in political, economic and, vitally in this instance, social life. All those could potentially be engaged.

3778. We are conscious that the situation with childcare here is different. There has been some indication — I do not have the figures to hand — that the demand for childcare is higher and would outstrip the current supply. So the requirement to attend interviews, for example, will obviously be onerous on women, and there is potential for discrimination. Again, I do not know. All this has to come with the caveat that we do not know what the regulations will say. A regulation could provide adequate protection to deal with this circumstance.
3779. Mr Brady: Fra talked about the double-whammy effect. We have been told that someone who receives an overpayment of £50,000 in benefit, or is jailed for an offence relating to social security fraud, will have their benefit sanctioned for three years. So someone who has spent two years in jail and is released will have their benefit sanctioned for a further year. He will return to the household with, say, his partner and three children, and they will not get benefits. Presumably, though it will depend on the outworkings of the regulations, he will be living in a household that receives a certain amount of money for his partner and children, but not for him. Presumably, he will be assimilated back into the household. Then we come back to the issue of possible destitution, whatever the definition of destitution may be. There seems to be no provision made for those circumstances. That sanction may well lead to the break-up of the family, because money will be coming in for only four people, not five. There are all sorts of implications connected with that. Would that particular situation be considered as a breach of human rights?
3780. Fra made the point that, if you commit a crime, you go through the judicial system and are punished. When you come out, you can immediately claim benefit, but not if the crime related to social security. Since 2008, here in the North, the incidence of social security fraud has continually decreased, whereas the incidences of claimant error and departmental error have risen. DLA, for example, is the benefit least prone to fraud: it is less than 0.01%. Yet the demonisation of people on benefits has contributed to the general atmosphere around so-called welfare reform. There is almost an acceptance by some people of the attitude, “I am working, so why should those people be better off?” The reality is that all the changes to contributory benefits, such as ESA being paid for only a year, irrespective of how many contributions have been paid, will have an impact, not just on the working poor, the unemployed, or those on benefit, but on people who work.

3781. Dr Russell: Your first point was on the demonisation of those on benefits. The commission's views are quite clear: the human rights requirement on the state, under the European Social Charter, is to ensure that there is an adequate social security system.
3782. On the specific issue of prisoners, the deprivation of liberty is the punishment for the crime. The further punishment, which you suggest may be introduced after a prisoner has been released, raises a serious human rights concern. The commission would have to look at that in more detail. To date, we have not analysed that, but we will be happy to do so should the Chair or Committee see fit to ask.
3783. Mr Brady: We talk of demonisation, but what has been forgotten in all this is the duty of care that the state owes to the most vulnerable. If you listen to some of the media here and in Britain — I have said this before and will continue to say it — you would think that the Social Security Agency was some sort of charitable institution that gives out money like a church organisation or the Society of St Vincent de Paul. There is a duty of care to be met, and, as you said, a requirement on the state to provide an adequate — “adequate” is an important word in this case — social security system for the betterment and enhancement of people's lives. I can say in all honesty that no one to whom I have spoken has ever said that they like being on benefit, or that they are there by choice. It is as simple as that.

3784. Mr Corey: Absolutely. You refer to the duty of care owed by the state to the most vulnerable. From the perspective of the Human Rights Commission, our priority is the most vulnerable people. People in prison are among the most vulnerable, and on their release they are also amongst the most vulnerable. As David said, the commission staff have not yet examined that, but if asked, we will pick up that point.
3785. You made a wider point about the demonisation of individuals by, for example, allegations of benefit fraud. At the end of the day, we all want a benefit system that is there for everyone. This is not about examining benefit from the point of view of people who have committed fraud but about benefits for people who are ill, disabled or lose their job, and the system should be there to protect everyone with dignity and respect. That is what this should all be about.
3786. The Chairperson: John, David and Colin, thank you for the commission's written submission and for your contribution today. It has been very important and very illuminating for all of us.
3787. I want to make one point. Most organisations that come here refer to the recent announcements by the Minister. Last week, he announced that the Bill would be modified to facilitate direct payments to landlords, for example, for people in receipt of universal credit and rent support. That will go, by default, to the landlord directly. However, there was a question about split single payments or monthly payments. The implementation of universal credit has been deferred from October 2013 to April 2014 to facilitate the development of the IT system to provide for the modification of the method of payment, either by way of single or monthly payments. Last week, however, I had discussions with David Freud, who in no way accepts that the default mechanism will be that people can get their choice of fortnightly payments. That will still have to be negotiated by way of some type of special circumstances. The detail has not been worked out yet, but he made it very clear that they still want to pay as many people as possible monthly and by way of a single payment. I am just making the point that the Minister took that at face value, but it is for the panel to examine that, and people will submit their views on what form split payments might take. You have ideas, and the women's sector will have ideas. As yet, there has been no agreement on the ultimate nature of any modifications. Our difficulty, as a Committee, is that we will have to decide on the Bill at Committee Stage before any of those deliberations have been concluded, but it is up to us to grapple with that.

3788. For your information, we will complete Committee Stage and provide our report to the Assembly on 27 November. Your contribution has been a very important part of our deliberations. Thank you, and we will, no doubt, engage with you again.
3789. Mr Corey: Thank you very much, Chairperson.

3790. The Chairperson: We will have a number of presentations and briefings today, the first of which will be from Citizens Advice. We have Pól Callaghan, head of policy; Rose Henderson; and Louisa McKee. Many of you will remember Pól. I formally welcome the three of you who are here on behalf of Citizens Advice. I remind members that at tab 1 of their Bill folders is the briefing paper from Citizens Advice, which was provided earlier. Without further ado, the floor is yours.

3791. Mr Pól Callaghan (Citizens Advice): Thank you, Chairperson, and thanks to the Committee for affording us the opportunity to come and speak to you this morning.

3792. Before I start off, I will just say that we obviously appreciate everybody has been working to a very tight time frame over the last while, but we would like the Committee's indulgence if any of what we said appears a little bit rushed or whatever else. We had our AGM with President Higgins yesterday, so we have perhaps been a little bit more distracted than would otherwise be the case had the timetable been different.

3793. I am head of policy and information for Citizens Advice. On my right is Louisa McKee, who is our training manager. She specialises in mental health issues and engages in some voluntary work in that field outside Citizens Advice. On my left is Dr Rose Henderson, who is a member of our information team. She has more than 10 years' experience as a front line adviser in east Belfast citizens advice bureau (CAB), in particular, and elsewhere.

3794. As you indicated, Chairperson, we have already provided a written submission to the call for evidence. That hits on many of the key issues that we would like the Committee to consider. We will touch on some additional points this morning, because some things have come to light even in the past week to 10 days. We are conscious that the Committee will have had significant evidence from other stakeholders and from the Department, so we will try, in so far as we can, not to regurgitate things. There are obviously some points that our network would like us to hit on as well, but we will also try to hit on some new perspectives, raise new issues and bring new information to light where we can. However, there will obviously be some degree of overlap.

3795. I will give a brief overview of how Citizens Advice operates and how our work relates to the Bill; summarise some of our overview approaches to welfare reform and the Bill in order to provide some context; and make some brief comments on the Minister's recent statement on operational flexibilities. We will then proceed clause by clause through some of the things that we have put in our written submission and mention some things that have dawned on us since the deadline. I will deal with universal credit and some of the other elements and will then hand over to Rose, who will deal with the employment and support allowance (ESA). Louisa will deal with personal independence payments (PIPs). I will wrap up at the end.

3796. We have obviously provided some amendments as per the call for evidence. We have attempted to provide amendments where we think there would generally be little or no financial cost and where we think supplementary measures might be available to the devolved institutions to address some things. In so far as possible, we have put forward amendments that we think will attract reasonably significant support or widespread support and should not be too contentious, but that is obviously for the Committee and the wider Assembly to decide, not us.
3797. I know that some members of the Committee already know Citizens Advice very well. Some members have been involved in the bureaux in the past, some have been on management committees and others have been very strong and powerful advocates for their local CAB. Those are all roles that we respect, acknowledge and appreciate.
3798. Citizens Advice provides information and advice to the public in 28 main offices across Northern Ireland and in over 100 outreach outlets and services. According to MORI, there is 98% awareness of Citizens Advice among the Northern Ireland population. To give a degree of context to our work on welfare reform and the people who will be affected by it, 39% of adults who live in homes where the household income is less than £15,000 have used a Citizens Advice service in the past three years. Our offices handled over 305,000 issues last year on behalf of 84,000 clients. Over half a million items from our online advice guide service were downloaded on to Northern Ireland computer stations. Last year, we provided advice on over 40,000 issues relating to disability living allowance (DLA) alone. So between the migration from DLA to PIP, universal credit and the other aspects of the Bill, we anticipate that there will be a significant impact on our work and on the people who come to Citizens Advice looking for help and assistance.
3799. We obviously work closely with our sister organisations in England, Scotland and Wales and with Citizens Information in the Republic. I know that some of you will be aware of some of the partnership work we have done, including the recent report, 'Holes in the safety net: the impact of universal credit on disabled people' by Tanni Grey-Thompson. So I will not dwell on that too much this morning, but we will obviously be happy to comment on it.

3800. I will touch briefly on the potential impact of the Bill without regurgitating too much of what other advice providers have touched on. Significant impacts will include issues such as the major switch entailed by the move to digital default, and particularly the search and demand for advice and information in the context of having a dual system in operation for some time. Most of the external commentary assumes that the switch will take place overnight, but we will, effectively, run two systems for advisers and the public for a significant number of years. There will obviously be a rise in appeals; training requirements for advisers; changes to case recording systems internally; changes to our public and internal information systems; and some physical investment will probably be required in new facilities, particularly to deal with the online dimension of welfare reform.
3801. We are aware that the overall Bill is largely a read-across from the Welfare Reform Act 2012, and we are aware of the devolutionary constraints under which the Assembly and Committee are working. It is an enabling Bill, and, as others have said to the Committee, much detail remains unconfirmed and we await further information on regulations, including input from the Department for Work and Pensions (DWP) in December. There has been quite a lot of consultation here and a lot of input from many different stakeholders. It is not the Committee's fault, but there has not been as much output in the form of certainty as people might have hoped for, so we still do not know the range of elements to be tabled in relation to PIP and various other things. To some extent, we are in - the dark and some of what we say is a result of that.

3802. We welcome in principle the idea of simplification in welfare reform. The idea that fewer agencies will interact with clients and that there will be less duplication makes sense. The drive to employment is obviously welcome, but the Committee is well aware of the lack of employment here. So, our real problem is not the drive for employment but the lack of employment, and I do not need to tell any member of the Committee about our region's latest unemployment statistics. Citizens Advice is worried by the practice of cuts often being dressed up as reform, and elements of the Bill fall into that category, particularly its impact on disabled people and the 20% statistic that the Committee is well aware of.
3803. Various elements of the Bill appear, to us, to be contradictory, and that theme runs throughout the Bill. For example, the Committee may have heard the point made that sanctions may result in people losing their home. That does not bode well for helping people to secure employment or get new employment. As recently as this week, the Confederation of British Industry (CBI) expressed some concern about the potential impact of universal credit on the business community as whole. There are obviously burdens on enterprises and young entrepreneurs that may go against encouraging people to start their own business and get into work. We share that fear.
3804. There are some particular issues around the loss of flexibilities in the tax credit system, which makes the reforms quite complex. We are concerned about the sanctions-first approach that is led by the DWP in particular. We think that it is based on misconceptions about the level of benefit fraud and we fear that there is a lack of evidence behind the sanctions-first approach, as is demonstrated by research findings.
3805. Overall, the Bill purports to reflect real life in the real life working environment. However, in respect of the reality of self-
- employed people's work and how they organise their business, what is in the Bill coming across from London does not. The proposed reporting systems and the removal of cautions go against how the legal system generally works and various other things.
3806. So, some initial general observations and themes that do not relate to one particular part or clause of the Bill but seem to be recurring issues that the Committee may like to hear and might already have in mind. The first is the whole issue of gross and net savings. The explanatory and financial memorandum and other departmental documents provide various estimates of savings. Perhaps the Committee has been brief on this already, but we are a little confused about whether all these savings are gross, net or sometimes a mixture of both.
3807. I know that you have heard evidence on some of the secondary consequences of various cuts. If you are looking at things such as disabled students' allowances (DSA) time-limiting stipulation, the obvious question is whether that saving is one that is net of the impact on jobseeker's allowance (JSA) and income-related ESA. Do the figures for youth ESA provided to the Committee reflect the impact on income-related ESA? We will touch on the fact that it seems to us that that is not the case. Housing underoccupancy sanctions have an obvious impact on discretionary support costs as well.
3808. Then there are the wider cost implications, which, I imagine, many of the disability charities would have raised. With PIP, there is the impact on appeals, on the health system and on the mental health budget. With regard to ESA time-limiting, what are the effects going to be on retirement provision? The Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (DHSSPS) is leading on the adult care consultation that is running until March 2013.
3809. Obviously, quite a number of the things that are in this Bill will directly impact upon the ability of people in their 50s and 60s to provide for their care in old age. So there is an issue of joined-up thinking there. If you look at the whole area of sanctions, particularly the higher end, it appears to us that there has not been enough focus on the unspoken potential consequences, such as the impact on the criminal justice system. As people are sanctioned at the higher end, is that going to result in higher crime that will impact on other people in those communities which will already be impacted upon severely by welfare reform? Then there are the impacts with regard to family breakdown, with the costs to social services and whatnot.

3810. I have just mentioned the lack of joined-up thinking. Look not only at adult social care but also the not in education, employment or training (NEET) strategy, the purported increased focus on people as they get older in the workforce, and the whole issue of mixed-age couples and people who are retired and who are now coming into the realm of universal credit. There is a bit of confusion around that. There is certainly an issue about the resources of the Department for Employment and Learning (DEL) being focused more towards older people, according to the stipulations in this Bill. Arguably, we need to be focused more on younger people and getting them into the workplace for a longer period of time. There will be consequences such as a lower standard rate for under-25s which will have an impact upon the ability of people under 25 to secure education and training for themselves and to get into productive employment.

3811. As to ESA in youth, DWP has estimated that 90% of people who fall out of the ESA in youth provision will then qualify for income-related ESA. On the figures provided by the Department of £390,000, in broad terms, if that meant that there was a net saving of £39,000, that is the starting salary for a principal officer grade 7 in the Civil Service. I have no doubt that there will be at least one principal officer assigned to deal with this; probably he will have a team under him. So that is actually the saving at the end of the day. So maybe that is a question that the Committee might want to ask. It is something that struck us as an odd working together of the numbers.

3812. The whole question of under-earnings is one that we are a bit concerned about. Particularly when unemployment is so high — you will have heard this argument before from others — it seems strange that we are going to be pursuing people to increase their earnings. Maybe the focus should be, particularly as DEL's services are under strain, to get people into the employment world at all. The lesson from the changes to working tax credits earlier this year is that, when people needed to increase the number of their hours to maintain their working tax credit entitlement, they found it very difficult to do that. Especially, for example, people working in major supermarkets and whatnot else sought to increase their hours and found it very difficult to do. And that is in the context of people seeking more hours. We think that this smacks of people being punished for being low-paid, and we are worried about that. The Committee might want to think — as it may well be doing — about how things like the social protection fund may be utilised in order to ameliorate some of those points.

3813. We look at welfare reform in the round, and the whole question of parity and everything else. Things might be applied equally in England, Scotland and Wales, but over here the impact can be very disproportionate. We think that there is potentially an insidious consequence of the under-earnings approach, as opposed to the under-working approach — which is the working tax credits approach. As I have already said, it penalises people not for working less; leaving aside all the other things, it punishes them more for being paid less, which, we think, is more than a little unfair given their burden.

3814. If we look at average earnings here, they are obviously 16% lower than the UK average, according to the Labour Force Survey of June this year. In particular, we are concerned about the impact on women. In this region, women earn £71

- a week less than local men on average. Obviously, if under-earnings is going to be a driver for work requirements and sanctions, it will impact more upon those who are earning less, which, in this case, is women.
3815. Let us look at this in the round, when people are talking about parity and what might merit the making of a particular case here, or steps being taken here. To put it most starkly, if you look at the Labour Force Survey (LFS), which assesses average earnings across every region of England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland, and between men and women, with the exception of Welsh men, men here on average earn less every week than anywhere else. Women here not only earn less than women anywhere else in the UK but, on average, earn £384 a week less than men in London. So, the axe will not fall hardest on your average man in London. The Committee will understand well some of the other considerations behind all this, but it appears that women here will be hardest hit of everybody who will be impacted by the under-earning provisions. We think that that is very unfair and penalises people for their circumstances rather than their motivation to be in the workforce and to be productive in that context. So, that is what we have to say about that.
3816. There are some themes to keep in mind. You will be aware of various arguments about childcare and the fact that we are effectively 15 years behind England according to Employers for Childcare. A piece of research from the Resolution Foundation in the UK this week disclosed in its Counting the Costs survey that two parents working full time on the minimum wage with two kids will end up £4 a week better off. The local implications and statistics will be slightly different, but there are issues about making work productive for people and practical implications in the Northern Ireland context, particularly with the rural dimension, which rural members will understand. There are also issues right across our region that maybe merit a different approach.
3817. issue of school hours is quite different. As we understand it, children in school, especially younger children, will generally be released from school at 3.30 pm in England whereas, here, many of those children, as many of the parents here will know, will be released at 2.00 pm. That has an impact, especially on people who are trying to work around school and around childcare responsibilities. School holidays here tend not be co-ordinated, and that has an impact on people's availability for work and their childcare costs.
3818. Another dimension that members will be aware of from their constituency experience is the issue of where childcare is located. In the Derry area, parents in places such as the Bogside were told that nursery places were available in places such as Claudy and Eglinton. As a lone parent, you will be sanctioned because you have been told that childcare is available in somewhere such as Claudy or Eglinton. That is not fair as far as Citizens Advice is concerned, and I am sure that that example of nursery provision will be replicated in various other places. We need to be very careful about the rules and regulations once those issues are drilled down over the next number of weeks and months.
3819. The Committee will have heard quite a lot about disability already. I have mentioned the 'Holes in the safety net' report that Citizens Advice did at UK level with the Children's Society and Disability UK. People who are disabled will be affected by a number of things such as the 12-month time limit and the loss of the severe disability premium by the position that the UK Government are taking on the Gorry case, which involves underoccupation and two disabled children. As we understand it, the UK Government have been granted leave of appeal to go to the Supreme Court, and that will start in December. To Citizens Advice, that appears to effectively be a 14% disability child penalty on families that have two disabled children rather than one. If they have to separate them out, effectively the state will

- penalise them for having to make that accommodation themselves even though the Court of Appeal has already said that that is unlawful. Maybe the devolved arrangements could look at that and the social protection fund.
3820. You will have heard a number of arguments around PIP, such as the likely cut in numbers of people who are entitled to higher rate DLA as we move across to enhanced PIP; the forwards/backwards test; the increase in the anticipated condition from three plus six months to three plus nine months; issues around deteriorating conditions; the reduction in the absence period that is provided for; and passported benefits. That is all in the context of the 20% cut underpinning the welfare reform approach.
3821. One other issue that we have taken up is to do with transitional support, and we have been in contact with the Department and the agency on that. I am sure that the Committee is well aware of the issues around that and that transitional support will be effectively calculated at the point of migration for people as they move into the universal credit system. The figure is then locked, but it is locked as an actual figure, not as a real-time figure, and there will not be any index-linking. The real value of that figure will decrease over time, and there will be a loss in earnings or income for a number of people compared with the current system. Another important point about transitional support is that any change in circumstances will trigger its removal. We have exchanged correspondence with the agency about that, and its position, as outlined to us, indicates that any change will trigger that. The loss of any element could include, for example, the birth or death of a child, or even, presumably, the loss of a job. So it seems that, potentially, people will be penalised for taking up and then losing a job after universal credit comes in, which seems to run totally contrary to the stated public policy intention of the system. My final point may require further clarification from the Department, but is probably worth asking the question if it has not already been posed.
3822. At a policy level rather than its impact on advice providers, the CBI and the Local Government Association in England this week expressed further concerns about the timetable for the “digital by default” provision, which is of concern to anybody with a stake in how the system will apply here. The lesson of the Ulster Bank’s failure in the summer is that people will be worried by both what happens if there is a delay in the migration to the new system and how people’s payments will be provided if there is a failure in that system. I am sure that the Committee is already considering that.
3823. The Committee will know that 30% of people in Northern Ireland do not have access to the internet at home or at work. People here who are on benefits are, by definition, more unlikely to have access in work anyway, so increasing the digital divide. The rural dimension is particularly important here, given that we have a disproportionately rural population. Although the numbers of people with internet access at home are broadly the same in urban and rural areas here, the implication of not having internet access in a rural area is that people are further from a library. Even leaving aside the issue of opening hours, which I think that members mentioned, rural dwellers are further away from advice centres and other such places, including MLA constituency offices, so it is harder to get access to the internet. There will also be issues around secure internet access from public places, and so on.
3824. Just a day or two ago, the Joseph Rowntree Foundation released data that it commissioned through the University of Portsmouth that shows that only 40% of claimants in England are currently ready and able to use an online system. Only 20% of claims in England are currently done online, and there are clearly huge challenges there. It may be that the idea of trusted [Inaudible.] in the advice centre, which Louisa may touch on, could be considered in the Northern Ireland context. We know - that Advice NI previously spoke to the Committee about a statutory right to advice. The general terms of that would need to be worked out, but Citizens Advice thinks that that would be a useful idea, particularly in the context of a more sanctions-focused system that will have consequences for people who do not do things within stated timelines. It is important that people have a reasonable opportunity to secure reliable advice, which would, presumably, also end up costing the state less in resources, appeals, and so on, which makes sense to us.

3825. Will I finish the first part of the presentation by moving on to the Minister's statement?
3826. The Chairperson: Work away.
3827. Mr Callaghan: Some detail remains to be worked out, but we welcome the progress that the Department and the Minister have made in their negotiations with Lord Freud and others in DWP.
3828. The Minister's statement did not contain further details on the question of payments to landlords, so we are still a bit in the dark about when and in what circumstances clients can opt out. There are also all sorts of issues about care for clients who may have mental health challenges, such as dementia, and how that will be handled. The Minister said that there would be further consultation on determining the criteria around split payments and more frequent payments "where necessary". What exactly will "where necessary" mean? Citizens Advice is firmly of the view that child payment elements of the various benefits, moving forward, should follow the main carer in the home in any split payment and that the housing element, if it is to be taken directly by the tenant rather than the landlord, should go to the person who would normally be responsible for looking after the housing payment to the landlord. The Minister touched briefly on other issues, such as money advice, financial planning and banking products. There has been some recent engagement between the Department and advice providers and other stakeholders on that. The Committee will probably just want to keep a watching brief on that area for now.
3829. Before we go to the clause-by-clause commentary, may I stop to catch my breath?
3830. The Chairperson: Fair enough. It is entirely up to you how you make your presentation, but you may want to bring in your colleagues to make their points, and we will take members' questions at the end of your presentation. It is entirely up to you, Pól. The floor is yours. Feel free to make your presentation in whatever way you want; this is your session.
3831. Mr Callaghan: Does a member have a question that you want me to deal with?
3832. The Chairperson: Members want to come in. They have indicated that they wanted to come in, so we will wait until you finish your presentation. We may have the answers before you finish.
3833. Mr Callaghan: Maybe not. As my mother often told me, Chair: quality and quantity are not the same.
3834. I will try to run through the clauses of the Bill as quickly as I can. As I said, we are not going to go through everything that is in our submission. You have that in writing.
3835. We deal with clauses 3 and 4 on entitlement in our submission. We think that the issue of mixed-aged couples will cause considerable distress and unease. The lack of clarity about the effect on people who would currently be deemed to be in retirement and in receipt of various retirement payments, either occupationally or from the state, will, once there is some more public traction, cause concern. Universal credit is supposed to be a working-age benefit, and, at least nominally, we are being told that those who are retired will come into the sphere of universal credit if they have a partner at pension credit age. The Committee might have further information on that, but, as we understand it, we do not know whether that means that any work requirements will fall on the older partner. It may be that that is not the intention, but there is a little bit of distress building on that. If it is meant to be a working-age benefit, it would be a little unfair to extend the working age by your choice of partner. Some people might say that that would entail additional work anyway, but that is another issue. Clearly, as we move forward to 2018 and beyond, the rising women's pension age will bring more people into that net. As I think other witnesses have testified, there will be implications around DEL resources. I am sure that the Committee is addressing those.

3836. We feel that clause 4 raises some issues around the habitual residence test (HRT). I know that members are aware of the issues of inconsistency, subjectivity, and so on, to do with the habitual residence test. I will try not to say HRT, because I know that that would cause some confusion. The Committee is probably aware of issues at an EU level between the European Union and the UK Government, the European Union's unhappiness at the right-to-reside element of the test and its deeming that it falls contrary to the discrimination elements of the treaty and EU regulations on social security co-ordination. As I understand it, Commissioner Andor has given the UK Government two months to come back to the Commission with their position, but the Commission has also indicated that it will take a further legal challenge on that to the European Court of Justice (ECJ). Although that is a relevant point for the Committee to consider, and there is a lot of uncertainty about how the HRT will work in practice, there is certainly a lot of dodgy sums involved in the calculations and in what it will and will not cost. Twelve months ago, Iain Duncan Smith said that the cost to the Treasury of repealing the right-to-reside element of the habitual residence test would be £2 billion, and, last month, the Treasury released new figures giving the actual cost at £155 million. When we have major questions of public policy being determined on such wide-of-the-mark calculations, I do not think that that is a place that any of us want to be in.

3837. On the Northern Ireland-specific elements of the habitual residence test, there are particular views on our tradition of emigration and people going away and coming back after working for many years outside this jurisdiction. Our approach is that, given the work conditionality that is being built into universal credit in particular, we do not really see the need for the habitual residence test to be applied in its current form. Why put in place that extra barrier when the whole point of universal credit, as the coalition Government would describe it, is so that we do not have people relying on the state and not wanting to work?

3838. One of the things that we think might be worthy of some more attention by the Committee is the question of people who come back here to carry out caring responsibilities and those who return after a family break-up. They may have moved away with a partner, have come back and are facing difficulties in that context. There may be other areas in which the social protection fund might want to be considered by the Committee.

3839. Clause 5 deals with financial conditions and the area of capital limits. I know that the Committee is very aware of the various impacts that the switch from tax credits and pension credit will entail. Quite a lot of the discussion up to now has focused on older people and those who are approaching retirement age. We are also worried about the impact of the capital limit stipulations on younger couples who are saving for a house deposit, and for parents of disabled children who have set aside money to provide for the future care of that child. As people get older and if, for example, one of them falls out of the workforce, there will be a significant impact with capital limits in universal credit. When that is mixed with the 12-month time limit in the ESA work-related activity group (WRAG), it could have a calamitous effect on people's finances when, in fact, they should be saving for older age. That again falls in with the question of [Inaudible.] and what we are going to do around that. There is also

- the mixed-aged couples dimension and pensioner poverty, on which I know that other witnesses have testified previously.
3840. Clause 6 deals with restrictions on entitlement, and we have a bit of an issue about the waiting period that is set out in the Bill. The Bill is supposed to provide for a seamless transition between being in and out of work. That is especially important in the context of lower-paid and insecure workers —those who do not have security of tenure. The Joseph Rowntree Foundation has done quite a lot of work on that both in the Northern Ireland and wider context. There is, perhaps, an opportunity to maximise the potential of the real-time information system. When that comes in, a seven-day statutory limit for a claim to be processed seems overly generous. That is why we have suggested that an amendment be made so that that limit would be capped at three days in law here. That is in our submission.
3841. Clauses 7 to 10 deal with awards. I have touched on the issue of under-25s and the impact of a simplified standard rate on the NEETs strategy, and so on. On clause 8, we have raised an issue about tax credits. We would like to see a designation of all statutory payments, such as statutory sick pay and maternity pay and comparable benefits such as maternity allowance, being considered as earnings for universal credit purposes. At present, they are classified as earnings for working tax credits. If they are not captured in the disregard, it could entail an actual loss to people as we move across into the universal credit system, especially for those who are new parents or who are in early illness. We are also worried that the transitional protection provisions would be triggered and that transitional protection might be removed from people if they were to fall in or out of those benefits. If someone falls sick, for example, has a child or has had a child before they move onto universal credit and come off a payment such as statutory maternity, that in itself would be a change of circumstances, even though the child has been born. They would lose that transitional protection.
3842. The Committee has heard various arguments on self-employment. Our view is that the system should ideally be constructed on actual earnings rather than on assumed or deemed income. When we talk about self-employed people, very often we are talking about individuals such as taxi drivers or plumbers and those who do not necessarily run medium-sized enterprises. Whether it is an individual or someone running a small shop or local business, various things such as the impact of the recession on trading and even an event such as a burglary or fire in a premises or someone going on maternity leave or falling ill will have real impacts on their actual income, which would not be properly accounted for in the deemed income system. We are concerned about that. We also share some of the concerns that others have expressed about the burden of monthly reporting that will be placed on people. That is not really based on the reality of how people go about their monthly business. We would be concerned that it might have the adverse consequence of directly or indirectly causing some people to go into the black market, who would not otherwise do so.
3843. In the Northern Ireland context, there is a particular issue about the rural community and farmers. Presumably, they will be classified as self-employed for many of the purposes of universal credit. When we have had a spring, summer and autumn such as we have had, farmers being deemed to have certain incomes is not necessarily reliable or desirable. That could have a further impact on rural incomes over and above the difficulties the rural community already has.
3844. I will not dwell too much on the one start-up every five years issue. I know that you have been briefed on that by other stakeholders. I want to make a couple of other points on the issue of disability. The first point is dealt with in our submission, and for the purposes of the presentation, we will refer to it as “post-trauma income”. DWP regulations provide for certain disregards on earned income such as personal injuries payments. The regulations specify that certain special compensation schemes will also fall into that classification. They stipulate three categories in particular: people who have received compensation for Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease; people who were compensated for contracting HIV from a blood transfusion; and people who were compensated as a result of the 2005 London bombings. At this stage, because of time pressures and various other issues, we do not have the answers, but the Committee may want to look into that. If those types of regulations are being provided for in England, it raises questions about fairness here for people who are receiving payments as a consequence of the Troubles or who may receive payments as a result of child abuse in an institution, and so on.

3845. The issue of housing benefit and rate relief calculations is a separate but not entirely unrelated point. At present, there is a mandatory disregard of war widow's pensions, widower's pensions or war disablement pensions when assessing entitlement to housing benefit. It appears that that entitlement will go when we move across to housing credit as part of universal credit. For example, a recent client who was part of our Royal British Legion (RBL) project and who is 75% disabled receives a war pension and his full housing benefit entitlement because his war pension does not count towards his housing benefit calculation. However, as we understand it, he will lose that entitlement when we move across to universal credit. It is important to point out that one of the reasons why that is not dealt with in the regulations in England, Scotland and Wales is that they do not have a mandatory disregard. It is discretionary because the housing system is administered at a decentralised level. That will be not an issue for DWP, but if the regulations were simply transferred across, there could be an unintended consequence here. There have been other recent issues whereby there have been unintended consequences from reciprocal arrangements. The Committee may want to raise that with the Department.

3846. In respect of responsibility for children, and disabled children in particular, there is an issue with moving away from tax credits. The disability element of child tax credit, which is £57 a week, will be arbitrarily cut to £28 a week for many disabled children unless they are blind or on the higher rate of DLA. If the motivation is to move parents into work, it is important to consider that childcare for disabled children is particularly hard to secure because of the lack of availability and because it can often be more expensive. From family experience, I know others will know this too that that is a particular problem, and it needs more care and attention, not less. Citizens Advice, therefore, recommends that the Committee suggest the establishment of a special childcare fund for disabled children as a bespoke initiative to mitigate the impact, if it is impossible to do that through the benefit system per se. We do not have numbers for the quantum involved, but presumably it would not be tens of millions. I am sure that questions could be asked of the Department.

3847. Clause 11 deals with housing credit. Do not worry, I will bring in some of my colleagues soon enough. Some of these comments also relate to clause 69. I know that the Committee is very aware of the various arguments around the underoccupancy provisions, such as the nature of our housing stock, the University of Ulster research and the particular circumstances here. I think that somebody used the example of Tiger's Bay and New Lodge at one stage. Fundamentally, our view is that people should not be penalised for not moving when there is nowhere suitable for them to move to, given our local circumstances. The fact that there is less protection for mixed-age couples, whereby the younger person triggers universal credit, is another issue. Again, we just do not know what will happen there, and we need more clarity.

3848. I know that you have been briefed previously on the issue of the zero-earnings rule for owner-occupiers getting housing benefit help as they move across to housing credit. That appears to be particularly unfair on people who are trying to engage flexibly with the labour market, such as carers or people with disabled children. Universal credit is supposed to be a seamless transition. However, the reality for young people and low earners who are often in and out of the workforce in an unpredictable labour environment is that this is not a seamless transition but a cliff edge. Although to some extent it mirrors what happens with working tax credit, universal credit is supposed to be better than that, so that is something to consider. The Committee has already received evidence on support for mortgage interest and the impact of that on arrears. We are fearful that that might be an extrapolated problem as we move across.

3849. We have made three recommendations on housing credit. In our view, a change-of-circumstances trigger should not apply until two years after the change of circumstances, partly to reduce the demand for smaller properties that the underoccupancy provisions generally will bring about as people come into the system new rather being subjected to transitional protection. We do not believe that the underoccupancy provisions should apply in any circumstances in which suitable alternative accommodation cannot be made available, and we think that there is a reasonable ground for arguing that that is not an issue of parity but an issue of local reality and local public policy. Ideally, we think that the Committee and decision-makers should hold the line a little until we see the outworkings of what is happening in Britain. DWP has suggested that 35% of claimants will fall into rent arrears. There is clearly already a huge problem with rent arrears in the Housing Executive, for example, and it seems illogical to proceed, potentially to create many more arrears, before we know what is going on. We can wait and see what might happen across the water.
3850. Clause 12 deals with child carers. You have heard about the removal of the severe disability premium (SDP). I note that in Tanni Grey-Thompson's report for Citizens Advice, Disability UK and the Children's Society, she recommends that a self-care element be introduced into universal credit if the SDP cannot be retained. If that cannot be done as part of universal credit, it could be addressed as a supplementary non-benefit measure here, and a separate fund could be set up to deal with that because, although we do not have the figures available today, the numbers of people and the amount of moneys will presumably not be overly high.

3851. One issue that is not in our submission and, as far as we can establish, has not been picked up by anybody else – I am sure that I will get some odd looks if it has been – is the loss of carer premium from ESA. Since we put in our submission, we have noted that the DWP regulations state that people will be able to receive either the amount for limited capacity for work or the carer element of universal credit but not both. That represents a significant departure from the current arrangements. It seems to be predicated on an assumption that people who are on ESA and who have been assessed as having a limited capacity for work cannot care for somebody. However, if people have been deemed by the state, particularly given the various issues with ESA and assessment, as having some capacity for work – it might be limited, but there is a capacity – and if they have a capacity to work, surely they have a capacity to care and should be accommodated appropriately. If this proceeds as we understand that it will if the regulations are read across, that will be a potential loss of £32.60 to an awful lot of already hard-pressed households.
3852. I will jump to clause 14 and the claimant commitment. There is a lot of merit in the claimant commitment approach, but it should be based on partnership rather than on stipulation on the part of the Department and the agency. You are aware of the issues of sanctions and what happens if there is one refuser. It seems to us that there is potentially a [Inaudible.] element to that and that other people would be punished for the “offence” of the person who refuses to sign. That will add to distress and, potentially, domestic abuse, mental illness and various other issues, and we endorse calls from others for a single rate to be paid to someone who signs and the amount for children. There is little evidence that sanctions work, which we have referenced in our paper. It is potentially counterproductive to impose sanctions that last after someone re-enters the workplace, because it acts as a deterrent to people coming back, given that they would then have to repay the sanctions. We have various examples of clients who are unaware of the reason for a sanction being imposed. If a client is unaware of that, it becomes solely a punitive measure without any constructive learning or developmental impact. There is one case from a bureau in Scotland in which a dyslexic client was sanctioned after having made the employment support service aware that they could not use computers because of their dyslexia. That person was then sanctioned for not using an online system and was not given the reasoning until after they enquired after the sanction had already been imposed. We certainly do not want examples such as that here. So we are recommending that claimants are asked to affirm their understanding of the reason for any sanction before it is proceeded with. That would ensure that reasons are understood, and it enables a claimant to challenge the decision or provide a good reason in prompt fashion thereafter.

3853. We have also provided another amendment to do with partnership, which effectively could be summarised as follows. Years ago, when women were getting married, they had to say that they would honour and obey their husband. I do not think that anyone who is reasonable would now suggest that that should be done. Effectively, the contract that the claimant commitment purports to make is that you will honour and obey what the state tells you, which is not much of a contractual undertaking. We think that a more mature and constructive approach should be taken to that.

3854. I will move on quickly. Clauses 15 to 24 are on work-related requirements. We have raised a particular point about “improving personal presentation”. We think that that should be proportionate to the person. It is potentially unlawful, but it will certainly be helpful if, in order to keep it lawful, there should be clear — I almost said “clean” — fair and well-understood guidance arrangements both for claimants and for front line officials who are taking decisions.

3855. As to clauses 17 and 18, it is important that clause 18 is tailored to the circumstances of the claimant. It makes sense for claimants and also for getting the most economic impact for them once they get back into the labour market, given their skills, experience and many other things.

3856. One thing that citizens advice bureaux have reported over the past few years of the recession is that, in many cases, jobs and benefits offices are not very well suited to dealing with people who come in with high education levels or very high levels of skills in the manual sector, and so on. They are not well geared up for that. Perhaps, as we move forward to the new system, we need to have a more client-focused system rather than a bureaucratic one.

3857. There is one point about under-earning. At clause 18(5), we think that the regulations that are provided for here should explicitly protect people who are working but under-earning from sanctions to ensure compliance with existing work demands. In other words, if people are called to interview with the Social Security Agency (SSA) because the Department has decided that they are not earning enough, given that they are in work — this will be a new phenomenon — potentially people will then be subject to further requirements and sanctions. In complying with the Department’s requirements, they should not then have to fall foul of their existing

- employers with regard to rostered hours, and so on.
3858. With regard to clause 22, you have already heard about the 35 hours per week of having to look for work, and there are various issues around EU migrant workers. We endorse what organisations such as the Law Centre have said on those issues.
3859. With regard to clause 23, we have suggested another amendment. When interviews are being scheduled with the stated aim of assisting a claimant to comply, there should be a statutory obligation on the Department to make at least a reasonable effort to have regard to the circumstances of the claimant, his or her caring, work or other arrangements, before that is done. That is not a veto; it is just a provision “to have regard to”, like many other statutory duties.
3860. With respect to clause 24, we have provided two amendments, which would be consequential. Those have to do with hate crime. As the Bill stands, it provides for a 13-week suspension of requirements that have been imposed on people if they are victims of domestic violence. We believe that that should be extended to people who have been subjected to hate crime, particularly in the event that it is so significant that it disrupts their family life, to the point at which they need to be rehoused. We do not have exact numbers, but the evidence that we have been able to deduce is that the Housing Executive reported last year, in the first quarter of 2011-12, that there were 10 cases of hate crime that required legal intervention, and there was no indication in any of those 10 cases that any rehousing was required. So presumably the numbers of people affected would be very small, and that could also be addressed by the supplementary fund.
3861. With clauses 26 and 27, there is a technical point that is important for clients, which is to do with sanctions and the issue of appealability. Paragraph 97 of the explanatory and financial memorandum appears to indicate that the sanction decision will be appealable but not the decision to impose work-related or connected requirements or a claim of good reason. That clause may raise issues with article 6 of the Human Rights Act concerning due process and the right to a fair trial. Effectively, we are unclear about how a sanction decision can be appealed but not the other decisions unless manifest maladministration is the only thing under appeal. You cannot really decide on a sanction decision if you cannot take the other factors into account. So, the other things should be appealable too, because that prevents things building up to the point of a big appeal, which is more complex and distressing for everybody concerned.
3862. Clause 28 deals with hardship payments, and you have already heard the various arguments about the shift from a grant to a loan system.
3863. Clause 33 brings into the realm transitional protection arrangements, and we have already touched on some of those issues.
3864. Under Part 2, which is on page 18 of our submission, we have suggested two amendments to clause 45. Again, our comments on the recoverability of hardship payment apply to clause 47. Clause 50 concerns work programmes, which we refer to on page 9 of our submission.
3865. Chair and everybody else, I am sure you will be pleased to hear that I am going to hand over to Rose, so I will get a break, and you will get a break from me.
3866. The Chairperson: OK, Pól. Thank you very much. Fire away. It is OK; just take your time.
3867. Dr Rose Henderson (Citizens Advice): I am going to address the proposed time limiting of contribution-based ESA, of which I know you are all aware. I would just like to remind you of what Ms Pollock from DSD said about the clause. She said:
“ESA for people in the work-related activity group was only ever intended to be a benefit for temporary, short-term interruptions in employment. It is considered that a limit of one year allows people time to adjust to the effects of their health condition, and the benefit provides support for them while they do so."

3868. I think that those words will sound quite hollow for a lot of our clients. A typical person falling into that category might be medically retired from a job they have done all their life. They want to work, but cannot, probably because of the toll their job has taken on their body. As we know, over-50s have great difficulty in returning to the workforce. That is what the 50-plus element of the working tax credit was about, though that has now been abolished. As one client said to me, "I have no qualifications and a bad back; what job can I apply for?" For those people, we are not talking about temporary, short-term interruptions in employment. Realistically, there is no work out there for them.
3869. You have heard from others about the unfairness of the proposal. People who have paid national insurance all their lives will be denied benefit at a time when they need it. The people hardest hit will be those with a partner who works or those with savings, because they will not be able to access income-related ESA. They are the very people who, in the Prime Minister's words, did the right thing. They saved for their old age and now, just as they are coming up to retirement, their savings will be eroded. The DWP estimates that, in Great Britain, 48% of those who will lose out under this proposal will be over 50.
3870. Another aspect is that the 365-day time limit will apply retrospectively when the Bill becomes law. For instance, in England, where the Bill went through in April, people started losing their benefit straight away, because they had already been in the work-related activity group for a year.
3871. The Law Centre has noted the cost of breaking parity on the issue. However, we would like to draw your attention to the significant difference between here and GB. In Great Britain, letters were sent to affected claimants in 2011 to warn them of the proposed change in April 2012, allowing them a year to plan. We have asked the ESA branch about notifying claimants here, but it says that it cannot do anything until the Bill is passed. There is some information on NI Direct, but it went up only in the past couple of weeks. So, there is lack of information here. All we want to say is that as no notification has been given to claimants about a change in benefit, which could see them losing up to £99 a week, we propose that the 365-day time limit should run only from when a claimant is informed of their potential loss of benefit. That would give them a year to plan for what is a significant loss of income. After all, one of the thrusts of welfare reform is about financial responsibility and planning, so this would fit in with that aim.

3872. As Pól said, we would like to see an assessment of the net cost of the implementation of the claim. He talked about people moving on to income-related ESA and JSA. Other people will try to get moved into the support group, which is not time limited. So, there will be more assessments and appeals and even greater demands on an advice sector, which is already trying to get to grips with ESA work.
3873. If time limiting is implemented, there is lack of clarity about what will happen when a claim ends. It is important that claimants who qualify for income-related ESA move seamlessly between the contribution-based and income-related claim at the end of the 365 days, so that there is no gap in their entitlement. However, there are ongoing problems with people claiming both income-related ESA and contribution-based ESA. This is quite complicated. As you know, you cannot get premiums on contribution-based ESA. So, if you have a disability or housing cost, you have to claim income-related ESA at the same time. For example, a client with mental health problems recently came into our Newtownabbey bureau, where the adviser saw that he was not getting the right amount of money on his ESA. He should have been getting a severe - disability premium. When she rang the ESA branch, she was told, “Oh well, he hasn’t applied for the income-related; he applied for contribution-based ESA”. But it is difficult for clients to understand that they have to apply for both. We are flagging up the need for a simple, straightforward and robust system to be in place so that claimants who are transitioning from income-related ESA at the end of their contribution-based claim have no gap in payments. Simplifying that process is really important.

3874. Clause 53 allows a person who has lost their contribution-based ESA as a result of time limiting to requalify if their condition deteriorates and they are moved into the support group. For example, if someone with arthritis has to give up work, they are put into the work-related activity group for 365 days, after which they then come out of it because they no longer get income-related ESA. If their arthritis gets worse, they are reassessed and put into the support group. Clause 53 is positive and allows their new claim to link back to a previous one, so that they can go back on to contribution-based ESA. We would like clarification on whether there are any time limits for the linking of the new claim to the old one and how it is shown that the claims are linked. Our London colleagues, who are already working with the new system, say that to establish a link you have to continue to claim ESA even though you cannot get it. That involves submitting more limited-capability-for-work questionnaires and participating in further work capability assessments, as required. To us, this seems overly bureaucratic and off-putting to some people who will not want to be bothered with it. However, when their condition gets worse and they want to reapply, such people will have prejudiced their continuous claim and they may not be able to be put back into the contribution-based support group. That, again, needs to be simplified, probably through regulations.
3875. Finally, clause 54 deals with ESA relating to youth, which supports people with disabilities to lead independent lives.
- As Pól said, it is not a lot of money, and 90% of claimants will qualify for income-related ESAs. Do we really want to undermine, by removing this benefit, the independence of the other 10% who will not qualify, perhaps because they are in a relationship? We would like to see ESA relating to youth retained.
3876. Mr Callaghan: Chair, to keep the sequence of the Bill, I will quickly touch on a couple of small points before coming to PIP.
3877. Clause 69 relates to housing benefit. I know that others have given useful evidence on the 30th percentile, the consumer price index (CPI), and all that business, and how housing benefit will be uplifted in the future. However, even the use of the 30th percentile presents problems, because we understand it to be a measurement of marketplace rents rather than available rents in the marketplace.
3878. I will give you an example. Our bureau in Ballymena recently surveyed local rent agencies. It is an anecdotal survey, but it is probably the experience of a lot of people in Ballymena. In all the rent agencies that our bureau visited, it could not find a single property available to rent that fell within the lowest 30th percentile. As the advisers in Ballymena will tell you, this is because people who are getting cheap rent tend to not want to move. Therefore, even before you consider dropping it down to what CPI would entail, the 30th percentile measure is arguably not based on an accurate measurement of market availability. That is a bit of a problem.
3879. I have talked about a lot of the underoccupancy stuff. As we understand it, the Housing Executive has 25,000 people currently in arrears. That figure has risen by 10% in the past year. Bringing in underoccupancy legislation will only add to that problem. There will be more people coming into see the citizens advice bureau and more people coming into all of your constituency offices, as you well know.

3880. Other people have talked about the issues around foster carers, and we have already touched on the Gorry case. Just like with the Gorry case, we think that foster carers could be the best people that the social protection fund could be used to address.
3881. Clauses 70 to 73 deal with the social fund. There have been some welcome developments here, including that it will be more open to low income and contributory benefit recipients. At a recent stakeholder event, the SSA said that the social fund budget would effectively be ring-fenced for the next two years. However, according to the current timetable, the transition will last until around 2018. So, we think that ring-fencing should also last until about 2018.
3882. I will pass over to Louisa, who will deal with some points relating to PIP
3883. Ms McKee: As Pól said at the beginning, I am wearing two hats today in that my background includes working with lots of marginalised groups. In particular, I have a keen interest in mental health, and I work as a volunteer counsellor. I have also worked with victims of domestic violence and victims and survivors of the conflict.
3884. I will give a very short contextualisation, which I am sure you are aware of. In Northern Ireland, 40,000 people are claiming ESA and more than 189,000 are receiving DLA. Those figures do not even include the people who have not yet transferred to ESA from income support and incapacity benefit. Westminster have indicated that they want a 20% reduction in disability spending, which will take a very significant chunk out of our local economy and out of vulnerable people's pockets. Of course, that was before the Chancellor went on to announce a further £10 million cut last April.
3885. I will start by looking at PIP and addressing the 10 clauses from clause 76 that refer specifically to PIP. There is a proposed absentee reduction from the current position of 26 weeks to a period of four weeks. I know several clients who experience chest conditions or rheumatoid arthritis and go abroad and stay with relatives for large chunks of the winter because that makes their lives bearable. Although our very damp climate gives us a lovely green environment, it also exacerbates such conditions and can cause considerable pain, discomfort and disability. Stopping claims after four weeks abroad will have a severe impact on people's lives. They will probably not be able to go abroad without the support of DLA that allows them to address those conditions.
3886. One of the things that we are concerned about is what currently happens with assessments for ESA. Clients do not see the report at the end of the assessment for ESA, which can go on for about 75 minutes. To us, it would seem much fairer if there could be a signed-off report at the end. We had a client who was asked whether she had a pet. It was recorded in the report that she had a pet, was able to care for it and, therefore, was able to work. That client had a dog that her children walked and that provided her with companionship. However, that came out only when it went to appeal. That was a huge waste of resources. It could have been addressed simply by the client getting sight of the report and being able to clarify the situation. Think about other contexts in which legal contracts are entered into, such as a police witness statement. The person signs off the report even if they have not written it themselves. That would be relatively easy to incorporate, although we might have to do something about doctors' handwriting.
3887. Still under the same clause: providers in England are offering assessments. Capita is offering assessments in GP surgeries, and Atos is offering 60% home visits. That could be addressed in the tender here, because it will very much lessen strain on the current system. People whose disability means that they cannot manage stairs are turning up at Royston House and are being told to go away, to go to Ballymena, or to come back at another stage. Think about the impact that this - has on someone with a severe health condition, particularly a mental health condition, as opposed to their being able to go to their own GP surgery or a nearby GP surgery or to have a home visit. That issue, hopefully, can be dealt with when the tender is being developed.

3888. We hope that the learning advanced by the Harrington report, which advocated that there should be a mental health champion present at the functional assessments of ESA, could be transferred across since we are moving to a functional assessment for PIP.
3889. The Committee may already know this, so, if you do not mind, I will pose it as a question to you: if an individual already receives the PIP mobility component, will they continue to receive it once they reach pensionable age, as in the case of DLA? If no one knows, perhaps we could get clarification from the Department.
3890. We should learn from the experience of ESA in the transfer to the functional assessment. At the moment, clients can go to their assessments and bring medical evidence of a spinal injury, for example. We had a client who brought an X-ray and was told by the medical health professionals that it was irrelevant. That evidence then had to be duplicated at a later stage. Perhaps the functional assessments could be widened to accept evidence certified by the GP or the consultant at that point. That would reduce the number of cases that go to appeal. So many cases will be going to go to appeal anyway while we hammer out the case law. The more that we can prevent those, the less drain it will be on our resources and those of the Social Security Agency's.
3891. As far as the claim procedure itself is concerned, we already raised concerns about the digital-by-default claim. One thing that we want to try to ensure is that individuals do not experience the time limits around the return of the two-part form as being a barrier to seeking advice. Obviously, we are going to be swamped, Advice NI is going to be swamped, and the Law Centre is going to be swamped. Our waiting times are going to increase. Perhaps something could be done to expand that window or ensure that people have access to advice as a statutory entitlement.
3892. Since we have full ISO accreditation and are a trusted intermediary in many cases — for example, with debt relief orders through the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment — we also hope that we will be able to make claims. In the current system, we cannot make a claim for PIP on behalf of a client. That is detrimental, particularly in the area of mental health, in that people have to advocate for themselves. Lots of people are not even fully aware of their own problems. I have sat in a room with a 70-year-old man who told me that he had no problem caring for himself, yet I had to keep Vicks under my nose throughout the entire interview with him. If people with our experience are filling in the forms; in many cases, you will get a much better picture of how the condition is impacting on the person. It will also come to the Social Security Agency in the language that it understands and as it wants to get it.
3893. We are seeking clarity about the forwards/backwards test if somebody is not given a prognosis that they will have their condition for nine months, which is quite a stretch for a health professional to make. If it turns out that a condition does last for nine months, because individuals' conditions develop differently, will their claim still stand? Do they need to claim again? Can that claim be backdated for them? If, in effect, they have been ruled out for not meeting that condition but it turns out that they do, there should be some mechanism that triggers their claim by just a check-up on evidence that the medical condition is still the same.
3894. Our rural bureaux have concerns, to which I have a bent as a Fermanagh woman, that the reforms are Belfast-centric. We think that it is likely that there will be times when the Republic of Ireland will be deemed to be the competent authority responsible for paying disability benefit to someone who lives in one jurisdiction but works

- in the other. That has the danger of disincentivising people from cross-border working, which is commonplace, because they would lose their disability benefit.
3895. A final concern of mine concerns people on remand — we are always interested in working around the margins. A person may lose the motability component of their PIP when they go into prison on remand. We have talked about similar passporting arrangements being applied to motability. It means that a person who is ultimately found to be innocent could lose their motability car. We need to look at doing something to sustain that transport provision, perhaps something similar to the DLA provisions for people going into hospital. Otherwise, is there not an assumption of guilt being made? You will be glad to hear that that is it from me.
3896. Mr Callaghan: Chair, if it is OK, I will make four final points. I am conscious that we have taken up quite a lot of the Committee's time, but I hope that you will find the points useful.
3897. The first is about our discussion with the SSA about why so many ESA appeals are successful. One point that SSA officials made to us was that they do not receive the determination and the statement of reasons for it from the Appeals Service unless they initiate legal action to appeal the appeal. That seems to be a bit of a bureaucratic monster and we believe that it would be helpful for the Bill to place a statutory duty on the Appeals Service to disclose the reasons to the SSA, perhaps at the agency's request. It seems to make an awful lot of sense to do that because the SSA could learn why a tribunal took a different view, and it could incorporate that, and a proper understanding of the law, into its decision-making on the front line after assessments are received from Atos or whoever the provider is.
3898. Secondly, our submission refers to clause 101, which concerns the mandatory revision of a decision in the SSA before an appeal can take place. We think that a compromise solution is that it is fair to have revision as the default position, but that if a client has lost confidence in the agency's ability to deal with their case or is minded to appeal anyway — and we have all dealt with people of that view — they should be able to opt out of the revision. Revision will often make sense and save people from having to go through the appeals procedure, but it may sometimes make sense to allow people to bypass it.
3899. My penultimate point concerns reciprocity of sanctions. You have heard quite a lot about sanctions, so I will skip what I was going to say about them because most of it is in our paper anyway. The reciprocity of sanctions goes back to the question of whether the claimant commitment is a real partnership between the claimant and the state — one that mirrors that between an employee and employer — or amounts to the same old approach of the state telling the citizen what to do.
3900. The sanctions are being ramped up so that they are becoming ever more punitive measures on people who receive overpayments, even when they are not at fault and, in some cases, will be charged for them. We think that this is outrageous, and the Committee is probably looking into it and has heard evidence on it. It would be a useful signal to the Department and, indeed, to claimants if the Bill provided for a penalty against the agency if it issues an underpayment. There is an issue with underpayments generally and about fraud and errors. All the focus in the media is on fraud and not on errors in the Department, and the Committee is aware of the various statistics on that, such as the 1% benefit fraud statistic.
3901. From the point of view of a public policy, and in the context of the good use of public resources, a penalty on the Department whereby, for example, it had to pay £50 to a client who is underpaid, which is effectively the way that it will work in reverse, would drill down better performance in the agency and in the Department and minimise error. It would be an innovative approach in the Northern Ireland context, but it should be considered here.

3902. My final point relates to the benefit cap. When it was going through Westminster, you will remember that there was a little bit of confusion about the number of people who would be affected here and the whole issue about London and housing. You know all the arguments, and I will not rehearse them.
3903. Even now, the focus with the benefit cap is very often on people with large families. There may be all sorts of issues around carers and people with childcare responsibilities, but analysis by the Children's Society in England, Scotland and Wales shows that for every adult affected by the benefit cap one in four children will be affected at UK level. This is a punitive measure against children rather than against "lazy adults", which is obviously not language that we use but is the sort of language that some commentators use. You are not hitting the people who you want to hit even on the terms that the benefit cap seems to be driven by.
3904. The empirical evidence — and this is a DWP statistic released this month — shows that 59% of families who will be hit by the benefit cap have between one and four children, not five and more children. This will bring more families into the loop, presumably, than would otherwise be the case.
3905. There is a big issue with statistics, and we are not sure that the numbers of people stated by the Department to fall within the benefit cap are reliable. In February, the Social Development Minister said in a statement that 99% of households will be unaffected by this. So, there was an implication that up to 2,400 households might fall into the benefit cap. However, DWP statistics released on 17 October show an increase in the number of households in Britain that have been notified of potentially falling within the benefit cap. You have to bear in mind that the numbers notified are not the ones that have been deemed to definitely fall within that. The figure will be above £450 rather than £500. Nevertheless, the numbers that have been notified have gone up by 41% compared to six months ago. So, DWP is obviously widening the net with the number of people that it is modelling and now says will be affected.
3906. This is not only a London issue. You might say that the whole narrative is London-centric and to do with London housing, but the number of people in Scotland who have been notified that they fall within the benefit cap has increased by 61%, and the number in Wales has increased by 52%. Socio-economically, we are not all that different to Wales, and Cardiff is not, as I understand it, all that different to Belfast socio-economically compared to, for example, parts of London. The Committee might want to look at that because, with the statement that was issued by the Department at that time of the February 2012 figure, one of the footnotes said that it is based on the Northern Ireland version of the DWP modelling tool for the impact of the benefit cap. So, the Department said in February that the statistics that the Minister released at that time were based on the modelling tool that DWP has now effectively revisited and said was not reliable. The Committee may want to look into that as well. You will be pleased to hear that that is all I have to say.
3907. The Chairperson: Thank you Pól, Louisa and Rose for your comprehensive written submission and oral presentation.
3908. Mr Brady: Thanks for the presentation. I have a couple of questions about PIPs. You state in your submission:
"appropriate claimants should be given an award on the basis of their submitted evidence".
3909. What is your definition of an "appropriate claimant"?
3910. It seems to me that medical evidence should have primacy. The problem with ESA, and presumably with PIPs, is that medical evidence is often given to an assessor who is probably not sufficiently qualified to read it. Medical evidence usually comes to light only in the appeal process, but the decision-maker should - have that evidence in front of them and make an informed decision on that basis.

3911. You mentioned the statutory right to advice. You and all the other advice agencies have mentioned the increase in your workload. Has there been any discussion with the Department about funding? Obviously, most, if not all, advice organisations are under-resourced and under-funded. Over the years, there has been a lot of talk about mainstream funding, task forces and God knows what, yet we still end up in the same position. I just wonder whether there has been any joint approach to or discussion about funding, particularly with CAB being such a large organisation, as you outlined, or have things been left to see how they evolve?
3912. Mr Callaghan: We had a feeling that a question about funding would come up, Mickey. I checked with the interim chief executive, and there has not been any specific consideration of future funding needs, certainly not at any detailed level. Yesterday, I read something on the web about DWP making £65 million available to the advice sector in England in light of welfare reform. With everything else that was going on yesterday, maybe I should not put that on the record, but I recall reading something along those lines.
3913. We endorse the approach that you outlined of medical evidence having primacy. If you think in the abstract and talk to people who are involved in disability organisations and to some disabled people, there is a desire to move towards a social model. The problem is that we have a flawed application of the social model. It is a bit like the problem with the 11-plus that people used to talk about: it was not even an academic measure of a child; it was an academic measure of a child on one day. The Atos assessment is a bit like that, because it is not an assessment of functional needs, even on a typical day. Instead, it is an assessment of functional capacity, as it appears to the assessor, on a particular day. There is so much up in the air to do with when that is, how someone is feeling and whether they have one of the various fluctuating conditions that the Committee is well aware of. The use of medical evidence makes an awful lot of sense, because it makes the whole process less cumbersome and more effective for everybody.
3914. You asked about the term “appropriate claimant” in our submission. Even the Department would say, before we even get to PIP that, in ESA cases where there is prima facie evidence that a person should qualify, applications can be processed as a paper exercise.
3915. Mr Brady: For terminally ill people, for instance.
3916. Mr Callaghan: Yes, there is probably quite a wide range of people to whom that would apply. We certainly do not want a situation to develop with PIP in which the more people who are put through the assessment system, the more lucrative the contract for the provider. I am not saying that that is the position now, but it should be pre-empted.
3917. Dr Henderson: You mentioned people with terminal conditions, but we should also consider those with long-term conditions who are, obviously, not going to improve. It seems unnecessary to bring those people in for face-to-face consultations.
3918. Mr Brady: That is where the primacy of medical evidence comes in.
3919. Dr Henderson: Exactly.
3920. Mr Brady: These are medically based benefits.
3921. You mentioned providers, 60% home visits, GP surgeries, and so on. We are dealing with a flawed process, and it does not matter whether assessors come out to your house or visit you at the top of a mountain. Unless the flawed process is addressed urgently, it will not matter, and they will still come up with the same result. It is important to mention that.
3922. Mr Callaghan: You are right that, in a way, it is an ancillary point. As you know, there has been a furore about rushing various clients through assessments,

- and how that affects someone on the day is a big issue for them. However, you are quite right: it is no good putting a bandage on a massive wound.
3923. On the point of medical evidence, we had a client from, I think, north Antrim — it was certainly the Causeway bureau in Coleraine that dealt with the case. An internal appeal letter from Atos stated — Rose may correct me on this — that its job was not to assess the client's medical condition but to test him on various points. The person who dealt with the appeal put it in very stark terms, and that epitomises the problems with the ESA assessment. People might say that PIP is not ESA, but the functional approach is the same.
3924. Mr Brady: The case law on DLA means that it is not what causes a condition but how it affects someone. PIP takes that a step further so that it is how people cope with their condition. Most people with disabilities would argue that they cope within their limits but need extra support to allow them to do so. That is the important issue.
3925. Mr Callaghan: There are problems with various descriptors. We provided a submission in response to a couple of the Department's consultations earlier this year. There is too much detail to get into it now, but we referred to those points.
3926. Ms McKee: I want to make one last point. One of the difficulties with PIP is that so many of the provisions will be removed. It has come back almost to just those are terminally ill. An expansion of those provisions would save everybody a lot of stress and resources.
3927. Mr Copeland: Pól, it seems a long time ago now, but, at the start of your presentation, you said that either income or salaries in Northern Ireland were 16% lower than elsewhere. What does that statistic mean? Is that an average of everyone in work? As a disproportionate number of people in Northern Ireland are employed in the public sector and subject to national pay scales, would you agree that that drags the average up?
3928. Mr Callaghan: That is correct.
3929. Mr Copeland: The true figure of need could well be far beyond that. Adjustments were not made to allow for that, so the true differential in salaries could be 20%, 25% or 30%.
3930. Mr Callaghan: I do not want to put words in your mouth, Michael, but if you are asking me about average earnings in the private sector, they would, as you put it, drag the average earnings down. The private sector tends to be the more unstable sector of employment. People tend to come in and out of the private sector and, generally speaking, those who work in the public sector have security of tenure. The figure that I gave was for average earnings, not earnings per hour. Women's earnings are statistically lower not just because they earn less per hour, although that is true. It is as much a reflection of the fact that, in broad terms, if one partner in a couple works fewer hours and so earns less in a week, it tends to be the woman. The problem with universal credit is that it does not factor that in. It is about what you earn and not why you earn less, so it is a tax on low-paid people.
3931. Mr F McCann: Thank you very much for your presentation. It was very intense.
3932. Mr Callaghan: I know that you like a bit of intensity, Fra. [Laughter.] Hopefully, it was not too spooky on Halloween.
3933. Mr F McCann: It certainly covered everything.
3934. You mentioned sanctions, and we spoke to representatives from the Human Rights Commission yesterday. One of the issues I raised with the commission was the "two strikes and you are out" rule and the fact that people convicted of benefit fraud will lose the right to make a claim after they have been sentenced. I said then that someone could rob a bank and come out of jail and not be affected by that rule. Is there any evidence — perhaps from your sister organisation in Britain — that - families are being penalised as a result of that and other aspects of welfare reform, especially when you look at the three-year sanction?

3935. Mr Callaghan: I think that the Bill calls those “higher-level sanctions”. The evidence from England is that the impact of a serious sanctions regime is varied and various. One impact is that it leads, or certainly contributes, to the break-up of families. Think about it: if someone is imprisoned as the result of benefit fraud, there is a perverse incentive, which is built into the Bill and the sanctions regime, for his or her partner to dissociate themselves and become a stand-alone partner. I do not want to use stereotypes, but let us say that it is a man who is in prison and he has three children with his partner. There is a perverse incentive in the Bill for his partner to say that they are separated, she no longer has anything to do with him and, as far as she is concerned, he deals with universal credit his way, and she deals with it her way.
3936. There are further repercussions down the line for the rehabilitation of offenders and bringing people back into the community, whether as a result of benefit fraud or something else. I am not an expert in criminology, but, from what I know of it, the evidence tends to suggest that, if people have family and social support on leaving prison, there is less likely to be recidivism and repeat offending than if they are left to fend for themselves in a post-sanctions environment.
3937. Mr F McCann: That could probably be stretched to take account of the likes of mixed-age couples, where the younger person will have to claim for the older person. In such cases, the temptation will be for people to claim separately as there is a substantial financial gain. The system will lead people to that.
3938. You spoke about the implications of clause 59 and the entitlement of lone parents to income support. You went on to say that there should be different rules, but you did not make any suggestions.
3939. Mr Callaghan: Is that to do with children in school?
3940. Mr F McCann: Yes.
3941. Mr Callaghan: For the record, it was, to be fair, Rose who made that point. In a way, we have not really had time to figure that out. At the risk of pointing out the obvious, Fra, if the Treasury obsession is with parity and the statutory providers of services put certain citizens in a position in which they are affected more adversely by, in this case, the childcare burden, that should be a reasonable consideration in how another part of the statutory framework responds to dealing with those citizens, whether through sanctions or something else. I am thinking on my feet, but you could, for example, make a special provision in the sanction arrangements to reduce the number of hours that someone with children in P1 to P3, or whatever, had to work. You could also bring in ratios for the level of earnings that they might be required to hit within a week. You could also deal with it differently outside the benefit system by providing a particular childcare fund for people who have children of that age, because they will be subject to sanctions if they do not fulfil the work-related requirements of universal credit. There are a few different ways that that could be done, and I am sure that other people inside and outside CAB have other suggestions or ideas. There are different ways of skinning the cat, Fra, but, one way or the other, it will squeal.
3942. Dr Henderson: At the moment, we are out of step with Great Britain, where the age has been lowered to 5. We could just decide to continue to be out of step.
3943. Ms McKee: It has changed the claimant commitment?
3944. Dr Henderson: It has changed already in GB, yes.
3945. Mr F McCann: That is an important point. Pól, you mentioned the whole question of parity. Within CAB, certainly in how things in Britain relate to here, there are clear examples of breaches of parity, but they have not been documented. Around the table, there is a difference of opinion on how this should be handled. Sinn Féin believes that parity should be stretched to its very limits to find ways through. Others believe that parity is paramount in maintaining the level of benefit. However, in many respects, it is not like for like.

3946. I have raised this next point a number of times. Organisations such as CAB and bigger organisations, such as the Joseph Rowntree Foundation (JRF) and others, seem to have had a run at this with amendments in the House of Commons and the House of Lords. However, they did not stick, and there did not seem to be any real breakthrough. When it comes to trying to get people to buy into it, what is the difference between what happened then and what might have happened 10 years ago? I know that the criminalisation of claimants is one aspect of it, but this leaves us bewildered. Mickey often refers to this, mostly because he was born before the Beveridge plan of the 1940s. [Laughter.] He rightly says that, had things like this happened years ago, hundreds of thousands of people would have come on to the streets.
3947. Mr Callaghan: You will appreciate, Fra, that we as an organisation would not comment on some of those points. However, you made a point about attempts to amend the Bill. Colleagues in London were involved in a sustained lobby of Parliament, and many of the amendments that we suggested were taken up by Members of the House of Lords. Many others were also involved in that lobby, not just Citizens Advice. You will all be aware of the various amendments that got through the House of Lords but, when the Bill went back to the Commons, the coalition Government shot them down. One such amendment related to the Gorry case and a question about disabled children. Unless the Supreme Court takes a different view, it looks as though the UK Government will be forced to change the position that it imposed in the House of Commons, as the Supreme Court will deem it unlawful.
3948. Unfortunately, there is a certain perception, at times not helped by media coverage, of people on benefits. Terms such as “spongers” are thrown about, whereas others not on benefit are seen as contributing positively to society. That is the sort of media debate that has been framed. I remember being on Radio Ulster about a month ago. On the same day, there had been a headline in the ‘Belfast Telegraph’ along those lines. A point that we make frequently about welfare reform, and which I made on Radio Ulster, is that it is a false paradigm to say that some people are on benefits and others are in work. There are tens of thousands of people, in the North alone, who are working and in receipt of benefits. I do not have the figures with me but the vast majority of people on housing benefit are also in work, and, for them, housing benefit is a supplementary income stream. The whole point of tax credits, for example, which will be a part of universal credit, is that they keep low-paid people in the workplace and make work pay for them.
3949. Part of the problem may be a misunderstanding of the issue. When it comes to dealing with the whole question of benefits, in England, the political centre of gravity — as opposed to Scotland, here or in the South — is a little further to the right. There is maybe less understanding in some parts of the English body politic about what it means for benefits to interact with the workplace, and so on.
3950. JRF did some very interesting research, not only on low pay but on the lack of security in the workplace. Very few of us do not have family, friends or even personal experience of being on the dole for a few weeks. It is all too common a story now. I am not having a pop at the media, but the headlines in the papers are often about people losing their jobs. We saw that with FG Wilson and umpteen others, but there is no link to say that, when someone loses their job in FG Wilson, hundreds of people will go down to the dole office in Larne, Newtownabbey, and so on. So you are a saint one day and a devil

- the next. You cannot have it both ways when constructing the narrative. It would be helpful if we tried to frame a more productive and mature narrative. We can pick that up in the pub later, Fra.
3951. The Chairperson: It is an interesting and very important conversation, but it is not related to the Bill.
3952. Mr F McCann: Is that you telling me to shut up, Chair?
3953. The Chairperson: No, I would never tell you to shut up, Fra, but I might want to move on to another member. It is a very important debate because it is about demonisation and misunderstanding. We need to remind people that, in a few months or a year, they might be one of the recipients of universal credit. When you are employed, it is a credit; when you are not employed, it is a benefit.
3954. Mr F McCann: I have a quick point that has been raised a number of times. As so many elements of the Bill will impact on a large cross-section of the community, have you considered taking legal action against certain elements of it?
3955. Mr Callaghan: The Bill is not yet passed, and we do not know what will be in it, so we have to wait and see. The other issue is the regulations. I am not saying that amendments to the Bill, as an enabling Bill, are not important, but regulations will often have more of an impact on clients than some clauses. Other clauses are very significant, but we are so much in the dark that it is very much a case of wait and see. They do not even know in England. We have talked to our colleagues in London about what they are hearing in Whitehall and from our network in England. So much is still up in the air there, too. So, unfortunately, the problem is that we are not even in a position to consider those issues, Fra.
3956. Mr Durkan: You mentioned Halloween, Pól, and it is safe to say that the more I hear about this, the more scared I get. Thank you for your useful and comprehensive submission and presentation.
3957. When talking about clause 8, you expanded that to exemptions and possible protections for victims of the Troubles. WAVE was here previously, and we would certainly support it. Do you have any ideas about how that could be managed?
3958. I will run through a few points, and your team can come back to me. With clause 11, you propose to delay the underoccupancy penalty for two years where suitable accommodation is not available. We would support that, but it would be very hard to get agreement from the Department because the fact is that suitable accommodation is not available, and, at this rate, it will not be available even after two years. What is your view on the increase in the fund for discretionary housing payments? Is that sufficient and sustainable? You spoke about the possibility of utilising the social protection fund in specific circumstances for people so affected.
3959. The proposal on clause 24 is very useful. That is about expanding the definition of victims of domestic violence to include victims of hate crime. I strongly agree given the context here and the fact that sectarian attacks have not, unfortunately, been completely consigned to the past. The Equality Commission and the Human Rights Commission were here yesterday. Do you think that we could pursue that as an issue with them or that they could pursue that with us?
3960. Clause 130 is about the removal of the rate relief scheme from the housing benefit scheme. Representatives of housing groups will be here later, and they might be better placed to talk about that. However, will you outline the impact of that as you see it? I await answers to a couple of questions that I submitted to the Minister of Finance and Personnel on that last week. I agree with your point on the benefit cap and the unreliability of figures that we have been getting in response to our questions as individuals and as a Committee. There has been disparity in many of those.
3961. At the start of your presentation, you mentioned stringent or strict time frames being imposed on claimants throughout this process. It is not referred to in your submission, but clause 92(2) gives effect to schedule 10, which gives the power to regulations to determine rules for transition. In the consultation on PIP, 28 days was specified for someone undergoing the move from DLA to PIP. If they did not do that, they had just a further 28 days in which to appeal. If that was not met, they would be struck off. What are your views on those time frames? They show that we will have to be very attentive to the regulations when they come so that we do not such things slip by. Is it your opinion that people would need more time than that, or should they not be penalised during the first migration? I hate the fact that I am using the word “migration” because it sounds like they are going somewhere good.

3962. Mr Callaghan: Thanks, Mark. To take those in some order, I will deal with the first four and pass the other two to my colleagues if that is OK.
3963. The straightforward answer to your question about victims is that, right now, we do not have further suggestions. I do not want this to sound like a complaint, but we had a two-week turnaround on the Bill, which is a huge piece of work. Even in the week since then, and despite other distractions, we have come up with a few ideas. I know that that is not the Committee’s fault and that it is no doubt as vexed about this as we are. However, from our point of view, it is a little frustrating that, in the week that the Committee invites us to submit our written response, we get a letter from the DHSSPS about ‘Who Cares?’ — the report on adult social care that is out for consultation — and the deadline for that is two days before St Patrick’s Day. That is despite the fact that, arguably, this Bill is more significant in the Assembly mandate, and I would say that its impact on the community is just as extensive. So we have not really had time to thrash through all of the issues.
3964. Ms McKee: We had some discussion about victims and survivors as the Bill developed. I am sure that you are aware of some of the anomalies already in the system that could perhaps be addressed under welfare reform, such as the fact that special provision was made in regulations for compensation received by victims of the London bombings. Special provision was also made for people in Omagh. Yet the situation of the multitude of others who have been so adversely affected by the conflict does not seem to have been addressed. We would certainly want that to be looked at.

3965. Mr Callaghan: It is not for us to instruct the Committee, but you may want to seek written or oral evidence from the likes of the Victims and Survivors’ Service.
3966. Mark, you asked about the underoccupancy questionnaire and the two-year delay in discretionary housing payments. As you have probably heard from elsewhere, the problem with discretionary housing payments is that they are supposed to deal with short-term crises and are not supposed to be a substitute for a long-term problem. We know from what is happening on the ground that we are sleepwalking our way into creating a problem. It is a bit like saying that we know that we are going to stab you, so we are going to buy a huge number of Band-Aids that we will whack on to you afterwards. I am not trying to be flippant, but it is a bit like that. A Band-Aid is not designed to heal a wound. If someone has a wound, they do not use a Band-Aid to heal it; they get surgery. The problem with the discretionary housing payments response is that that is what it is like. One of the problems with doing it through DHP as opposed to, say, a special fund to deal with underoccupancy or certain categories of underoccupancy victims, if you want to put it like that, is that it undermines the point of having discretionary support. It is discretionary, which, in a way, is problematic because it is not an entitlement. As it is discretionary, it is, therefore, subject to all sorts of budgetary pressures and everything else.
3967. It also confuses the people who are delivering the service through the agency in the Department, because they are having to balance different priorities. On the one hand, they are being told that they are there to help people in a crisis, and on the other hand, they are there to bolster a flaw in public policy implementation. In that context, what people are doing is admitting that they are implementing a flawed public policy and are then saying that they are going to try to fix it through a device for fixing crises. That is just not really satisfactory.

3968. Jumping to the issue of hate crime; we work a lot with the Equality Commission, in particular, on a number of things, and Louisa has done some of her training with the commission. We have not spoken to the commission about the hate crime idea. The Committee might want to gather more evidence from the PSNI, the Housing Executive and others about the stipulations for that. Certainly, it is probably worth asking their views. I think that that would send out a positive message, given some of the recent stuff about hate crime. The Committee is probably aware of the Channel 4 reports on victims of disability hate crime here. I think that that would be a good message to send out. However, you are quite right, sectarianism is still a major problem.
3969. I will pass over to Rose to answer the question on rate relief.
3970. Dr Henderson: Unfortunately, we have very little information about what will happen to rate relief. Given that the changes are going to come from next April, it is quite worrying that we have not seen more. The indication is that there will be a 10% cut in the subsidy. Earlier this week, I saw something about the DWP making additional money available to local authorities that will handle rate relief in England. I do not know whether we will get the same here. Our worry is that unless the rate relief scheme is very well integrated into universal credit, we could get those cliff edges that universal credit is supposed to be ironing out. This is also true of other passported benefits such as school meals. By taking on extra hours, you are not suddenly going to lose your rate relief as long as it is all tapered. It is really important that rate relief is well integrated into the universal credit system. Of course, come next April, universal credit will not be in place, but these new rate relief arrangements will have to be in place. I am afraid we do not have the information, but I know you have other people coming in who might have that.

3971. Mr Callaghan: Mark, you used the phrase “waiting for answers”. I think that we are in the same boat as other people. Louisa will deal with the one on PIP.
3972. Ms McKee: As you have seen from our submission, we expressed grave concerns about the 28-day turnaround for PIP. It will not be as bad for them as it will be for those on contribution-based ESA, because, next April, the Social Security Agency will at least send out some information in the uprating letters to forewarn people. I am concerned — again speaking with my other hat on — about people with a mental health condition, and I do not even mean those with a severely chronic mental health condition. I am thinking of one client in particular who received a DLA form and just put it away, because her strategy for dealing with life is avoidance. We have serious concerns about what safety nets are being put in place to ensure the turnaround of the migration process to PIP. The follow-up phone call is all very well, but who among us answers the phone if we do not know the number of the person calling?
3973. If there is going to be a phone call from the Social Security Agency to remind somebody that they need to get their PIP application in, that person is unlikely to answer the phone. The second letter is likely to get the same treatment as the initial prompting to get the form. Also, with the likely increase in demand on our services and the other advice services, people may not be able to get advice within four weeks, especially as they probably will not bring their forms to us until the day before it is due back. We all avoid what we do not want to take on.

3974. Mr Callaghan: With ESA, we had a 40% increase in the number of clients and cases due last year. That was not even the first year of the ESA migration, so the problem had been building even before that. There have been some questions about anticipated demand, but we have not finished our own modelling exercise. This is different on many levels to the changes in tax credits nine or 10 years ago, when our business went up 25%, or the ESA migration. Take the 40% increase in workload due to ESA as a benchmark and compare the PIP migration with the ESA migration. With ESA migration, we were not talking about a digital-by-default system and lots of clients who, whether it is done by computer or not, will not be able to understand the application process. It is effectively as though we will be suddenly generating a lot of illiterate clients who cannot fill in the forms. That is what it will amount to.
3975. So, you will end up with advice providers, whether it is ourselves or others in the independent sector, having to deal with people who are seeking advice about their entitlement and how the change will affect them and also having to deal with those who are having problems with the complexity of the process. Lots of people who will be on PIP will also be affected by the universal credit change, so there will be compound problems, housing credit coming into that and a myriad of issues. There will not just be an increase in the number of clients affected compared to the increase after ESA migration, there will also be an increase in the complexity of the effects on every client who comes in. Then, there will be the functional aspect, because of the online stuff, and issues around personal security and how we access systems. The whole advice sector is still a little bit in the dark about how all of that is going to work out. That could build-in problems, because there will be at least two appointments required, whether they are by phone or otherwise, for a lot of claimants who seek advice from us. That will add to the workload, and that is only the start of it.
3976. Dr Henderson: As we said in our submission, PIP is a significant change from DLA. At the moment, if we are giving phone advice to a client and think that they should be applying for DLA, we can phone up and request a DLA form for them. That form will be dated, which will mark the start of their claim. They then have a month to submit the form, and we can fill it in for them if they make an appointment with us. Under PIP, we can only ring up and request a form for someone who is sitting beside us. So, if we establish over the phone that a client should be applying for PIP, we then have to make another appointment for them and bring them in. It is extra work. Is it really necessary?
3977. Mr Douglas: On clauses 28 and 47, you mention hardship payments. You go on to say in your submission:
- “Any decisions to recover hardship payments are likely to deter the entry of claimants into the workplace.”*
3978. Do you have any evidence to support that?
3979. Mr Callaghan: We do not have a comparable sanctions system. However, it stands to reason that if you have a system in which a sanction is going to apply even after someone goes back to work, you are, at the very least, removing an incentive for them to do so, which goes against what we have been all been told is the fundamental point of universal credit.
3980. Iain Duncan Smith and others have consistently talked about how universal credit is about engaging people who are disengaged from “constructive” or “productive” life and preparing them for the workforce. They also say it is about treating people like they are in the workforce, which is how the whole debate about monthly payments arose. If you look at sanctions, perjury results in a sanction in a criminal court. However, Once you purge your contempt of the court, the punitive consequences of that offence come to an end. You will have heard about that in some of the debate about what is going on in the courts in Dublin with a well-known family. What we are doing here is saying that norms and conventions that apply in other established institutions of the state, such as the courts — whether in the North, the South, England, Scotland or anywhere else — will not apply to people on benefits, who have to be treated more punitively. That goes back to our discussion about people on benefits are stigmatised and, as the Chair said, demonised. It seems to us that on the basis of fairness, it should be done differently. It is not for me to say, but if you consulted a lawyer on that issue, they would probably say that they could at least give it a crack under the article 6 right to due process. Whether it would go anywhere is a whole other kettle of fish.

3981. Mr Brady: You suggested amending the claimant commitment to ensure that it is done in partnership and with due regard to the person's knowledge, skill, etc. You were right to make the point that a lot of the people who are being sanctioned currently and will be in the future do not know that they have been sanctioned. That information is not apparent. I watched an interesting programme about food banks in Coventry, and the majority of people interviewed were there because of sanctions. Yet, the vast majority of them did not know that they had been sanctioned; their benefit just stopped or was reduced. That is an important issue. However, at the moment, the claimant commitment is very much down to the terms laid down by the Department. It is in no sense a reciprocal arrangement. The Department will dictate what is required and the claimant does not have much input. Your proposed amendment might strike a balance.
3982. Mr Callaghan: We obviously agree, Mickey. Interestingly, by happy coincidence, as I did some last minute reading-up on the internet last night, and I found that the London-based Centre for Economic and Social Inclusion had commissioned work to be undertaken on universal credit through the University of Portsmouth with the Joseph Rowntree Foundation. They picked up on the idea that the claimant commitment should be more partnership driven. We were pleased to see them pick up on an idea that we had had a couple of weeks ago. [Laughter.] Leaving that aside, there are two points about our proposed amendment that I did not make because I was conscious of trying to get through a lot. You touched on them, Mickey, but they are two separate issues. The first is that the client should be engaged. In a way, this is about respecting the client as a citizen, which feeds back to some of the things that President Higgins said at our AGM yesterday. However, it is also about enabling the claimant's potential rights of appeal and all that stuff, including understanding, learning and development, which, again, fit into the idea of the workplace model. Most of us in work will have training plans and what not because we are supposed to develop over time.
3983. The other point is one of having a public policy that is advantageous to the client but goes wider. So, there is the issue of consultation, but also that of having regard to the client's skills, knowledge and experience.
3984. The feedback to our bureaux is that lots of people who never thought that they would end up in benefit offices are now going to them. All of the people that I have talked to who are going into benefit offices say the same thing, and I am sure that you have heard it too. They are probably the likes of those who worked in FG Wilson or umpteen other places around the region, and the benefits system and the jobs service that we have is not cut out to deal with them. I do not think that I am being unfair in saying that.
3985. The experience of many clients is similar to that of the man I talked to in the past week. This guy has a degree and two Masters, including an MBA, and he ended up unemployed. He is claiming JSA and the response he got was, in effect, "Oh, you've got a degree; that's great". When he said that he had an MBA, the response was almost, "That's amazing". He felt a bit patronised but, more importantly, he said that the service was not much use to him and that the stipulations set for him were not very demanding, given what he should have been doing to get a job. He was doing far more than the agency required of him.

3986. It is not about people who are in a position to earn less in the economy, because many of them will be well educated or whatever else, and it is not about being biased towards people who have a higher earnings potential. It is about being more reflective of the different realities across our labour market. If we have a system that can deal with people who have basic training and basic education needs, that is great. It is obvious that we need to develop that and the Committee is aware of that. However, we will have a problem if we have people with higher skills, whether technical or engineering skills, or former professionals, such as architects. We need a jobs service that can work with people to maximise their potential, not just, necessarily, for them but for the Northern Ireland economy as a whole. If we end up with people falling into a rut and not only falling out of the labour market but not having the aspiration to get back into the part of the labour market they were in or that they can usefully contribute to, that will not good for any of us in our attempts to rebalance the economy in the long term.
3987. The Chairperson: No other members have indicated that they want to ask a question. Pól, Rose and Louisa, I thank you for your very helpful and useful contribution in writing, your oral submission and your deft handling of a lot of the questions that were put to you.
3988. Obviously, the Committee is involved in what I would consider to be quite an intense stakeholder engagement. We have received more than 40 written submissions and, by the end of this process, we will have received over 20 oral submissions. A number of those responses are coalition-based. Given the complexity of the Bill, thankfully and importantly for us, there has been widespread engagement. Although it has been a relatively short period of time in people's minds, you and others have been over the Welfare Reform Bill on a number of occasions over the past year and a half. Everybody is well versed in its provisions, and everybody has pointed out the big difficulty is that a lot of it will be dealt with by way of regulations down the track that are not available to us.

3989. I thank you for helping us in our deliberations. We look forward to completing our report by 27 November. I have no doubt that your contribution will assist us in doing that.
3990. Mr Callaghan: If there is anything else, Chair, we are, obviously, happy to help.
3991. The Chairperson: That is not a problem. No doubt we will engage with you again.

3992. The Chairperson: We have Karen Hall, information and policy manager of Disability Action; Norah Marquess from Disability Action; and Jenny Ruddy from Mencap. First of all, I apologise for the delay. I know that you have waited very patiently, and I thank you for that. I formally welcome you to the Committee this afternoon. I thank you for providing us with papers and for being here to help us in our deliberations on the Welfare Reform Bill. Without further ado, if you are happy enough, I will leave it to you to make your presentation to members.

3993. Ms Karen Hall (Disability Action): We are very clear in our message about the Welfare Reform Bill. It will have a significant impact on the lives of disabled people in Northern Ireland. It is not only the possibly 117,000 who will be reassessed in the transition from disability living allowance (DLA) to personal independence payment (PIP). We also have big concerns about some elements of universal credit.

3994. In respect of universal credit, we are really worried about the removal of the severe disability premium and the impact that it will have on children with disabilities and how the proposed disability additions will work. Another big concern is the one-year time limit on contributory employment and support allowance (ESA) for those in the work-related activity group. We are also worried about the housing criteria, which we will talk about in a bit more detail; the changes to the social fund; and the support that will be given to disabled people if they are to be moved into employment and what those supports are. It will not just impact on disabled people financially. It will have a significant impact on people's stress and mental health and well-being.

3995. We have already been out talking to groups of disabled people about the changes to DLA and PIP. At a public meeting that we had in Dungannon, there were clear concerns about how this will work and how people will deal with the stress of having to go for an assessment. The message from disabled people was clear. So, it is about what measures we can put in place to help to alleviate some of the issues.

3996. We also need to be clear about the bigger picture. It may be that some disabled people will be better off in work under universal credit, but that does not mean that an employer will offer them a job or that the appropriate supports will be available for them to go into the workplace. None of the measures outlined by the Government to date has looked at the fundamental social and economic barriers that people face in trying to live independently in their own community. The measures are very much focused around individual responsibility rather than looking at the collective disadvantage that disabled people face and the societal barriers that mean that disabled people cannot live independently in their own homes or communities. We have to be aware of that wider context.

3997. I will not go through the Bill clause by clause, but I will pick out a couple of things. We added a section on the United Nations Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (UNCRPD). The Joint Committee on Human Rights at Westminster did a report that looked not just at welfare reform but at how changes to adult and social care and different things were impacting on disabled people's ability to live independently in their own community. It made a couple of recommendations, and one key point was that not enough work has been done to look holistically at the impact on disabled people and the cumulative effect of the different changes. The committee said that there needed to be a much wider look at that impact, particularly at article 19 of the UNCRPD, which requires the state to take effective and appropriate measures that will facilitate full enjoyment by disabled people of key rights to independent living and inclusion and participation in the community. As we move forward, that human rights context is important.

3998. As I said earlier, there are two main concerns about universal credit, the first of which is the responsibility for children and young people in clause 10 and the disability addition. Children who are in receipt of the higher rate of the DLA component will get the higher addition under universal credit. That is similar to what happens now. However, those children who receive the lower level of support through the disability element because they receive the lower middle-rate care component of DLA will now receive the new disability addition, which will be worth only £27 instead of £54. That is quite a significant decrease. Work needs to be done to look at extra support for families with a child or children with a disability, and, at the very least, financial support should be extended to those in the middle-rate care group, not just those in the high-rate care group.
3999. On housing elements, the Bill states that there will be an additional room for an overnight carer. We think that it needs to go further than that. It is about additional space, not just for care. It could be for treatment or for additional equipment in the house. That equipment is sometimes big and bulky, and that needs to be taken into consideration. Jenny will probably talk a bit more about being close to your own community and how that family support can be quite important as well.

4000. The removal of the severe disability premium under universal credit is another key concern. Basically, severe disability payment (SDP) allows for somebody who lives on their own to get extra support with living independently. That will be a big reduction for quite a lot of people, and we are worried about how that will impact, especially on disabled people who live independently. The responses have said that people will get DLA and PIP but that DLA and PIP do not consider what support you already have around you. So, if you are living on your own as a disabled person, you might need additional support in many areas. We have gone through the claimant responsibilities under universal credit bit by bit. We need to take into consideration that disabled people face barriers in going into work or even trying to move into work because of attitudes, perceptions and employers. We have gone through that in detail.
4001. The time-limiting of those in the work-related activity group of employment and support allowance is in clause 52, and 53% of people will be impacted by that. They will not be able to move to income-related ESA, and there will be a significant decrease in income. We are worried about how people will manage that and how they will be supported, particularly if they have been in that work-related activity group for a year, or whatever timescale, already. It is not clear what support they have been given to move into work. Jenny will speak a bit more about conditions for youth and contribution to ESA in youth, but we are concerned about how the claimant commitment works and some of the elements of that.
4002. Disability Action made a response to the high-level new discretionary support policy, and we are waiting for - more information about how that will work. However, the equality impact assessment (EQIA) basically said that no figures were available for disability in relation to social fund data scans, but we know that a significant amount of disabled people rely on support through crisis loans, and particularly community care grants, for different elements of their lives. The personal independence payment is the big area. There is not much about it in the Bill, so the issue is more related to the subsequent regulations, particularly the thresholds and the descriptors. There needs to be some clarification or additional information in the Bill.

4003. We asked recently whether the policy analysis on DLA had been done. It was stated in the EQIA that there would be some policy simulation models. That is available for universal credit, but it has not yet been completed for disability living allowance and PIP. So, we need further information on who will be impacted. However, we have put some information in our submission about what should be in the regulations and the length of awards. We are particularly concerned about people with fluctuating conditions, especially those with mental health problems or conditions like MS. As I said, we are waiting for more confirmed detail on that.
4004. On the issue of reporting to the Assembly, the Bill states that that should happen within two years. We have seen the difficulties with the work capability assessments (WCAs). The report needs to start very soon into the process so that those problems can be ironed out. We have seen with the WCAs that there have been changes made, but it has taken time for them to be implemented. We would also like to make sure that disabled people are involved in that process, because they are the experts on how the provisions are working for them.
4005. I am going to leave it at that and pass over to Jenny.
4006. Ms Jenny Ruddy (Mencap): Thanks, Karen. I thank the Committee for the opportunity to come up and speak today on the Welfare Reform Bill and how it is going to affect the 33,000 people who have a learning disability and live in Northern Ireland.
4007. A learning disability, as you may know, is a reduced intellectual ability and difficulty with everyday tasks, which affects someone for their whole life. We go into a lot of detail in our written submission, but I want to highlight three key areas: changes to ESA, the housing criteria and the introduction of PIP.
4008. In section six of our submission, we talk about changes to ESA. The aim of the reforms has often been cited as being to reduce dependency and promote work. It is estimated, however, that less than 10% of people with a learning disability are in paid employment due to the difficult barriers that they face when trying to find work. The proposed changes to welfare do not address any of those barriers and, instead, may lead to some disabled people in work being forced to give up their jobs because they can no longer afford the support they need.
4009. Mencap's research and experience indicates that most people with a learning disability clearly want to work. However, we believe strongly that compelling people with a learning disability to work could be counterproductive. In particular, it would add further stress to people with a learning disability as they go through a process of facing and understanding the changes that are happening to welfare reform. We are also aware of the high number of people who have been assessed as fit to work and have successfully appealed that assessment, as Karen has outlined.
4010. In section 6.3, we state that it is unfair and unjustified to time limit benefits for people with learning disabilities who have paid into the system and have a right to expect that they will be supported as they move towards work. Ultimately, we ask the Committee to consider an amendment that removes time limits from the benefit. However, if that is not possible, we ask the Committee to consider an amendment that reduces the time limit from 365 days to 730 days for those in the work-related activity group (WRAG) of ESA. One of the other concerns with ESA, as Karen has outlined, is that the 365-day time limit is effective straight away. So, if you have already been in that group for a year, your benefit will be affected. There is little evidence to show what support people have been given in the WRAG group in that time period, what the reasonable adjustments have been made to take account of a person's disability or how effective the support has been in helping people to gain and retain employment. So, we cannot see the argument for that. We ask the Committee to consider an amendment that ensures that the time limit for the WRAG group is continuous and that the days are counted after the Bill is passed and not before.

4011. As Karen outlined, one of our main concerns is proposed removal of the youth condition in contributory ESA. The benefit supports those with severe and lifelong disabilities, such as those who remain in education after 16. I know that the Committee has heard that the cost of the benefit is estimated to be £390,000 a year in Northern Ireland. Mencap's community-based advisers, who support people through the benefit process, have told us that opportunities for employment for those who receive the benefit are quite restricted, owing to their disability. They are also allowed to claim the benefit as an adult, which gives them a little bit of independence. It is about being financially secure, which means that they can often do voluntary placements, as work is not usually an option.
4012. Section 7.1 of our submission deals with housing and the new size criteria. The reasoning behind the policy is to contain growing housing benefit expenditure and to make better use of available social housing. There is a shortage in suitably sized properties available to people who would, under the new rules, be deemed to be underoccupying their home. Moreover,
- and as Karen outlined, many homes might have been adapted to meet the individual's need, meaning that, should the individual have to move, new adaptations would have to be paid for. In addition, there are issues for people with a learning disability who access the package of support and have built up support networks in the area in which they live. Those could not be maintained if they were forced to move to another area.
4013. The proposals do not take into account other learning disability factors or the importance of an individual living in a particular area: being close to family or friends who provide support or caring responsibilities; accessing community services; accessing transport, which is vital for people with a learning disability; and being a part of the local community. The limited provision of accessible housing options may already significantly reduce the choice that a person with a learning disability has over where to live. By implementing the housing criteria as it stands, people with a learning disability may not have the opportunity to live independently in their community.
4014. We ask the Committee to consider an amendment to exclude DLA or PIP claimants from the new size criteria. We ask the Committee to consider amendments that would ensure that, in cases of people with a disability or of families with a child with a disability, where an adaptation is in place, where additional space is needed for treatment or equipment, as Karen said, or where services are available only in a specific area, they will not be required to move and will not have their benefit reduced.
4015. Finally, I want to talk a little bit more about the introduction of PIP. I know that a lot of this will be in the regulations, and Karen said that there is not a huge amount of detail in the Bill. However, we want to raise our concerns anyway.
4016. When reform was first announced, the ambition was a 20% saving of the DLA expenditure, with a commitment to focus resources on those with the greatest need. In Northern Ireland, that would mean that 24,000 people will potentially

- lose that benefit under PIP. We believe that the UK Government have not fully considered the huge and detrimental impact that the proposed changes will have on the lives of the UK's most vulnerable people and their families.
4017. Section 8.3 of our paper outlines the results of report that Mencap undertook in 2010, titled 'DLA: why it matters'. The survey's findings highlight the central role that DLA plays in the life of people with a learning disability, helping them to afford the support that they need to live an independent and fulfilling life. Mencap believes that access to all rates of DLA must be protected; otherwise, people with a learning disability will be left socially and financially vulnerable and isolated.
4018. One of our main concerns about PIP is the assessment process. It will introduce face-to-face assessments for most PIP claimants, stricter criteria and a shorter timeline for the claiming process. The changes proposed to the assessment process will put people with a learning disability and their families under considerable stress and increase their reliance on independent advice providers and external organisations.
4019. We are also concerned about the removal of lifetime or indefinite awards, given that learning disabilities are lifelong conditions that people are born with. Although individuals may develop other disabilities or conditions during their life, their learning disability will not change. We ask the Committee to consider it imperative that the decision-maker from the Social Security Agency (SSA) or whoever carries out the medical assessment has a good understanding of learning disability and the context in which people with learning disabilities live. The responsibility will be on individuals once they receive correspondence from the SSA to make a claim for PIP, so there will be implications for people with learning and communication disabilities. If people cannot read or have difficulties reading, or if they do not realise that they have been asked to apply for PIP, they may not realise the impact of not engaging in the process. The level of support needed for people with a learning disability must be recognised and resourced by the SSA. It is also important that people with a learning disability be given the additional information and support that they require to complete the process, including reasonable adjustment and, where necessary, advocacy or advice from external organisations.
4020. We also have concerns about the changes to entitlement for the enhanced rate of the mobility component. Under DLA, individuals can be awarded the high rate of the mobility component if they have severe mental impairment, are in receipt of the high care component or have significant challenging behaviour. Under PIP, the criteria for receiving the high-rate mobility component will be removed. Several people with a learning disability whom Mencap supports meet that criteria under DLA and are in receipt of the high-rate mobility component. The removal of that award will have a huge financial impact on individuals, their families and their carers. Having funding for a mobility car or to pay for transport is a lifeline for those individuals, and its removal will have a devastating effect on their life. We ask the Committee to seek further information on that and to give it attention when the regulations on PIP are published.
4021. Finally, we are concerned for those individuals who currently receive DLA but who may not receive PIP under the regulations. Earlier, I spoke about the significant barriers that people with a learning disability face when they are trying to get employment, and I said that less than 10% of people with a learning disability are in paid employment. In a 2011 survey by the Disability Alliance, 56% of disabled people said that they would have to stop or reduce work if they lost DLA. That could result in 1,200 disabled people in Northern Ireland becoming unemployed, which, based on the average NI salary, would lead to a loss of £6 million in income tax and national insurance to the Treasury. We ask the Committee to ensure that the Department publish the policy

- assimilation model and results that Karen spoke about and clearly state mitigating actions where the impact on people with a disability and carers is required.
4022. I thank the Committee again for the opportunity to speak today.
4023. The Chairperson: Thank you very much, Jenny. Norah, do you wish to add anything?
4024. Ms Norah Marquess (Disability Action): I am here as the manager of the employment and training unit in Disability Action. We feel quite strongly that the Welfare Reform Bill will have a big impact on employment for people with disabilities. I am here to answer any employment-related questions.
4025. The Chairperson: OK, thank you for that.
4026. Mr Brady: Thanks very much for a very informative presentation. I have a few points to raise. Karen, you raised the whole issue of societal barriers for disability. That is very important. People tend to look in isolation at the physical or mental disability.
4027. You also mentioned the loss of the severe disability premium. It is often forgotten why that was brought in. It is to help people, particularly those who live independently, to cope with those societal barriers and their disability. The whole purpose of DLA and the severe disability premium was to enable those people to live independently and to become part of and remain in the community. If you consider it, that is one of the main planks of Transforming Your Care. However, we have one Department going one way and another, seemingly, going the other. That is important to recognise.
4028. The other thing is the loss of the youth incapacity payment. The severe disability premium was for those who are 16 years old and upwards, mainly those with learning disabilities. Not only did that give them a degree of independence but it was a source of comfort to parents, in that at least the kids were going to have something going into the future. The waiving of the contribution conditions was a progressive step, even though the severe disablement allowance was abolished. It now means that all those people will be subsumed into your area of employment.
4029. In a previous life, I worked as an advice worker in Ballybot House in Newry, where Mencap has a unit. You see how well people cope with their conditions, but they find it difficult enough to cope and could not be transported into employment. This goes back to your point about the reassessment under PIP and the fact that there will be no indefinite awards and people will receive awards for only two, three or five years. I have represented at appeals young people with Down's syndrome who were given two-year awards, as if they are going to wake up the next Monday and not have Down's syndrome. You wonder about the mentality of the people who make such decisions, and there is no guarantee that the people who will make the decisions in future will be any better equipped.
4030. You mentioned the mental health champions, and there are also autism champions. As far back as 2007, when the initial stages of welfare reform came in with work-focused interviews, Fra and I argued for the need for staff to be trained. For example, we asked that if someone with bipolar disorder went in for an interview, would the person behind the counter be able to deal with that and realise that it is a fluctuating condition. You mentioned other fluctuating conditions such as MS and a number of other mental health conditions. We have asked what training staff will get and, to date, have had no definitive answers. That has been going on for five years. Staff whom I know who work in Social Security Agency offices admit that they are at a disadvantage in many cases. They cope as best they can and do very well in many cases, but they are at a disadvantage, because they are expected to make decisions that they do not feel qualified to make. That is another issue.

4031. DLA came in in 1992 along with disability working allowance, which encouraged people of working age to work. However, that seems to have gone out the window completely, not that, in my experience, it was ever used to any great degree. Six months after it came in, I remember ringing up the Department to ask who would qualify for it, but it could not tell me. There was a lot of disinformation and lack of knowledge about the system, and I am not sure that the personal independence payment will be any better.
4032. You also mentioned the assessment, which I think is very important. We have argued, and continue to argue, that the primacy of medical evidence in these cases is paramount. The decision-maker who ultimately makes the decision is not necessarily the person who did the assessment. That might have been done by a civil servant who does not have the knowledge. Good, informed medical evidence is very important. Do you agree with me about the primacy of medical evidence?
4033. Ms Hall: Yes, we have said that it is really important for the medical evidence or the evidence that there is about a person to be taken into consideration at any early stage and that nobody should be financially disadvantaged for having to obtain that information. We have already seen people being charged for evidence from doctors for work capability assessments. People should be not financially worse off for having to do that. Where evidence exists, it definitely should be used.
4034. We understand that the thresholds and the descriptors will be out in mid-November. I have a copy of our original response to the previous consultation, if you would like to see it. In that response, we asked for an awful lot of changes to the descriptors, because they did not take into account how people live or their individual circumstances, which are different for every disabled person. The previous set of descriptors did not take into account some of the barriers and looked only at certain activities; for example, being able to microwave a meal. Living off microwaveable meals is not healthy. It should be about preparing a fresh and healthy meal that will sustain you and help with your health and well-being. Quite a lot of what was in the thresholds and the descriptors was worrying. We await what I understand will be the final draft of the descriptors and the thresholds. If they are to be used, it is so important to get them right now so that people do not experience the same level of problems with them as they do with the work capability assessment, which involves two completely different assessments: one about work and one about living independently. The descriptors and the thresholds do not apply to the social model of disability. It is still about looking at the medical evidence rather than considering what a disabled person's everyday life is like and what support he or she has.
4035. Ms Marquess: On the point about medical evidence, people need to be aware that people with learning disabilities do not necessarily have a very close relationship with their GP, because they are not ill. Therefore it sometimes might be difficult for a GP to give a good assessment of somebody's capabilities. That always needs to be borne in mind when looking for medical evidence.
4036. Mr Brady: Obviously, then, the people who know best, such as parents and families, should be an integral part of the decision-making process. You mentioned the work capability assessment. Even after the revision by Professor Harrington and all the other stuff, it was still a disaster. That just shows you how bad it was at the start. A couple of revisions have been done, and it is still not fit for purpose. You are right that a lot of youngsters with learning disabilities do not have immediate or direct contact with their GP all the time, because there is no need for them to have that. It is therefore essential that their family and the people closest to them be involved.
4037. Ms Hall: The big thing as well is that around 75% of people within the age

- range on DLA are on indefinite lifetime awards. There are people out there who honestly do not think that this applies to them. The message is not getting out that this will apply to all those people and that they will be reassessed. The communication is not there at the minute, and that is key. People think that this will not affect them.
4038. Mr Brady: On that point, if you do not reapply for PIP, there will be that gap. I just want to make that point.
4039. Mr Copeland: No matter what way you cut it, if the current benefit is reflected, around 25% of people applying for PIP will be suffering from mental illness. We have not as yet seen the award of the contract. The talk is that it will go to Atos. Do you feel that, if the contract tender document did not place on the contract provider — in other words whoever wins it — the necessity to have panelists available to do the examinations, and if that panel did not reflect the fact that 25% of people applying are liable to be suffering from mental illness, the usefulness of the contract and the whole exercise can be called into question?
4040. Ms Hall: From our perspective, we obviously do not yet know who will get the contract. I am not privileged to the information on what the process is. Whoever is providing the service or the assessments will have to have those specialisms built in. Even take the number that they will have to do in a week — how will that be possible? If the contract is not delivered on and if the supplier is not doing what it is supposed to be doing, there need to be sanctions imposed. However, I have no further detail on that at the minute.
4041. Ms Ruddy: May I make a point about the medical evidence? We have had some good engagement with the Social Security Agency's PIP team, which has been running a number of external stakeholder events since the start of the year. There have been some positive changes to the form. Initially, on the front page, where it asked for a contact, it just specified a person's GP
- which, as Mickey has outlined, is not necessarily practical for someone with a learning disability who may not have had contact with a GP for many years. That has now been changed to allow for any medical professional with whom you may have been in contact with, including occupational therapists and speech and language therapists, who might be more relevant to someone with a learning disability. There is also now a section providing for a family member or carer to give some comments on your disability. We saw that as being quite a positive step.
4042. In our written submission, we outlined the effect that this will have on the health service. If you are now having to go and seek medical evidence, the doctors' waiting lists or whomever you go to get that evidence from will become longer. Everyone is going through the reassessment process for many different types of benefit. We are concerned that people might not be able to seek that evidence within the shorter time frame under PIP.
4043. As to ESA in youth, which we talked about earlier, I know that when MPs considered the amendment in the House of Commons, the argument arose that people in that age bracket were already getting other types of disability benefit so why did they need that additional money. However, I think that that is a very naive take on the additional costs that someone with a disability may have, considering that some people may be worse off under the reforms. People underestimate the additional costs that someone with a learning disability has. ESA in youth is really is a lifeline for those people who have stayed in education after 16.
4044. Mr Douglas: Thank you very much for your presentation. On delegation and contracting out, you mentioned concerns about the output-related funding model for contractors, and you related your experience to that in England. Can you elaborate on that?
4045. Ms Hall: That is more to do with contracting out the work elements. If it is being contracted out under the Steps

- 2 Success programme, what we have seen and heard from other organisations in England and Wales is that, although the programme exists, people with disabilities are furthest removed from the labour market and so it requires quite a lot of work and support to get them into employment.
4046. The contractors are getting the people who are easiest to get into work into work, and disabled people are being left behind. That is one of the key concerns. Norah can tell you a bit more.
4047. Ms Marquess: We recently attended a seminar run by the Centre for Economic and Social Inclusion, and it had brought people over from England because of Steps 2 Success. It was quite clear that, for people with disabilities, there was “creaming and parking”, which is a terminology that is used. There is so much output-related funding, so people with disabilities are seen as not being lucrative, because it will cost more money to move them through the system and get them into employment. Therefore, those people are being registered by the companies but are then being parked because there are no facilities or resources to provide the support that they will need. Somebody at that conference said that creaming and parking is happening across the water and that the car park is getting very full. It is happening in England, Scotland and Wales, and we should be doing something to prevent that here, because, as a disability organisation, we have grave concerns about how people with disabilities will get left behind. Welfare reform is up in the air for them.
4048. Mr Douglas: I have a final question. You referred to a disability disregard provision to be inserted in clause 8. What would its effect be? Do you have any idea how many people that would benefit?
4049. Ms Ruddy: That is about couples where both partners have a disability. Was your question about the number of people?
4050. Mr Douglas: What will the effect be? How many people are we talking about?
4051. Ms Ruddy: We do not have any figures on how many people it will affect, but, under universal credit, both people in a couple cannot claim disability benefit. Therefore, there is a level of disregard there, and their disability benefits would be capped. We are asking that that be taken into consideration. Both partners in some couples have a disability, and even children with a learning disability have parents with a disability. Some families have more than one member with a disability, and we need to take that into consideration. That issue may not have been raised before. Our national office in London asked about taking that into consideration. The numbers are pretty much unknown.
4052. Mr F McCann: I have a couple of questions. Thanks for the presentation. I sit on the Committee for Employment and Learning, and people sometimes forget that the consequences of the Welfare Reform Bill will have knock-on effect in DEL. I raised a question last week in that Committee about the migration of probably thousands of people who suffer from mental illness into work-related groups. Mickey touched on the point about decision-makers not having the proper training. Perish the thought what it will be like when people with serious mental health problems and disabilities who have been long-term unemployed suddenly find themselves in that arena. Have you raised that with the likes of DEL? The response that I got from one of the senior officials led me to believe that that Department has not even thought of that. That will have serious consequences for what we are deciding here.
4053. Ms Marquess: We responded to the Steps 2 Success consultation, and we raised all our concerns about people with mental health issues or any sort of disability being exposed to difficult situations. We raised the fact that DEL staff do not have the training to support people with disabilities. We raised the issue that, in the past, disability employment advisers (DEAs) were trained to work specifically with people with disabilities, had set caseloads and knew their clientele. That has fallen by the wayside with Pathways to Work. We suggest that that is worth reconsidering. DEAs still exist in England. That specialism is still there. We are concerned that generic departmental staff do not have the skills or know-how on how to treat people, deal with their situations and work with the barriers that they face, so we will push for specialism to be brought back into the Department.

4054. Mr F McCann: Will you provide us with any information that you have on that?
4055. Ms Marquess: I have a copy of it here.
4056. Mr F McCann: As Mickey said earlier, we have been told that training or information have been provided by organisations such as yours that allows decision-makers to be trained to a level of competence. In some of the cases that we deal with, there is no evidence that that has happened. We may need to go back to some of those people and tell them that the evidence of training that we asked for has not been forthcoming. Although welfare reform will impact on the realm of DSD, it will also have a knock-one effect on other Departments.
4057. In our talks with the Department, a number of Committee members raised the issue of supported housing and special adaptations for people with physical disabilities. I believe that supported housing will be exempt, but a huge number of people have had their currently underoccupied houses specially adapted. At the minute, it does not look as though there is anything in the Bill to protect such people. Have you dealt with some of that stuff?
4058. Ms Hall: Although we welcome the allowance of a room for an overnight carer, our main issue concerns not overnight care but having room for treatment. Someone may be on dialysis, need physio, occupational therapy support or whatever. People need to have room to do that. We need to look at how that will work. We do not want somebody having to move or look for different accommodation because of that clause. We are concerned because they will probably have to move further from their family and existing support networks. We do not even know where accessible housing is in Northern Ireland. A register for the Housing Executive is looking to be developed. We need to work through all of that before bringing in a provision that will have a significant impact on disabled people. Even a hoist, because of its size, takes up a lot of room.

4059. Ms Ruddy: We also point out that the housing pool is very small for somebody with a learning but not a physical disability. We think that imposing this criteria has the potential to make that pool even smaller. We know that transport is the number one issue. It is vital. Moving people who are living in the community on their own to somewhere with poorer access to transport or away from family members on whom they rely to get out and about will have a huge impact on their independence. If you cannot get out of your home, how are you expected to have a job? How are you expected to engage with your community? How are you expected to get to some of your services? The Bill does not really look at that. It is important to consider the effect that this will have on those with physical disabilities who live in adapted housing. However, people with learning disabilities can sometimes fall beneath the radar when considering facts that are not based on adaptations. We should also consider the Bill's effect on people's local community links that is caused by moving them to a different area or putting them in the position of not being able to move out of their family home.
4060. Mr F McCann: Finally, I do not know whether you have assessed the impact of the shared room allowance on people with mental illness. It is one of the issues that we have raised, particularly the provision to raise the age eligibility from 25 to 35. What is the impact on somebody with a mental illness or physical disability suddenly living in a shared house for the first time? Such

- households can sometimes be fairly disruptive. Have you been collating any evidence on that?
4061. Ms Hall: Not specifically. We can certainly look at our enquiry stuff and do an analysis of some of the data. Sometimes, the information we pick up does not go far enough down. A case was taken in England, under human rights legislation, on the issue of private households. So this will impact on social housing. Three young disabled people successfully took a case against DWP in relation to extra room space and earned the right to live independently. There is some learning to come out of that, as DWP had to reissue advice. However, my understanding is that it will appeal the decision, so we await the outcome of that.
4062. Mr F McCann: Surprise, surprise.
4063. The Chairperson: Fair enough. Thank you, members. Are you happy enough? You have made your presentation, but do you want to make any additional points?
4064. Ms Ruddy: I just remembered something that I meant to say earlier when I was talking about the form and how the introduction has been changed so that you can include any medical professional's opinion in the evidence. One of our concerns — it was not just the learning disability sector but a lot of the disability sector that voiced this — is what weight that carries. So, again, it will come down to the training, the decision-maker or the agency. That is what we have seen with Atos and employment support allowance, in that the medical assessment carries more weight than the independent evidence from a family member or a medical professional. That is a huge concern as well. When it comes down to it, the medical assessment will carry more weight, and that is what the decision will be based on.
4065. The Chairperson: Thank you very much, Jenny. That is a very helpful additional bit of information. If you are happy enough to leave it at that for today, I will just say again that we very much appreciate the submission you provided, as well as the additional information in your oral submission here and how you dealt with some members' questions. It has all been very helpful.
4066. We are working towards the 27th November for our report. I just want to assure you that your contributions so far have been very helpful. In some cases, you have reaffirmed some members' views, and you have certainly given some additional weight and clarity to some of the issues that we need to grapple with. So, again, thank you very much for your support to the Committee in its deliberations on the Bill.
4067. Ms Hall: Thanks for the opportunity. If you need anything further, let us know.
4068. The Chairperson: I have no doubt that we will be engaging with you again. Thank you very much. Again, apologies for the delay earlier today.

4069. The Chairperson: I formally welcome everybody to the resumed Committee meeting. Obviously, we are here to continue our formal scrutiny of the Bill.

4070. In this session, we are pleased to receive a briefing from a range of housing-related organisations. Without any further formal ado, I invite the witnesses to come to the table. With us today are Dr Jennie Donald from the Chartered Institute of Housing; Ricky Rowledge from the Council for the Homeless; Cameron Watt from the Federation of Housing Associations; and Nicola McCrudden from the Housing Rights Service. I formally welcome you this afternoon and apologise for the slight delay at the end of the morning session. It went on a bit longer than planned, but, given the importance of this legislation, we would not, in any way, want to restrict any of those who make submissions to us. I thank you for your written submissions and for being here to give us your oral submission. The floor is yours. I will leave it up to you how you want to make your presentations.

4071. Dr Jennie Donald (Chartered Institute of Housing): Thank you very much, Chair. On behalf of my colleagues, I thank you for inviting us to come along today to give evidence and for the opportunity to suggest potential amendments to the Northern Ireland Welfare Reform Bill. We welcome the Minister's announcement last week, and we would like to acknowledge and commend the role that the Committee played in pursuing and securing the flexibilities in the administration of universal credit and the delayed implementation in Northern Ireland. You will know from our written submissions and conversations that we have had with the Committee that each of our organisations has always been clear that we support the general principle of work paying more than welfare and the principle of a simpler, more easily understood and more accessible benefits system.

4072. In moving from the principle and policy of welfare reform to the practical reality, I want to pick up on a couple of reports that were published this week. A KPMG report brings a stark warning that one in five workers in the UK exist on below the living wage of £7.20 per hour. Northern Ireland has the highest proportion, 24%, of workers living on below the living wage. Moving people from benefits to low-paid work that leaves them struggling to meet their basic household needs is not a solution to tackling poverty and disadvantage. The Joseph Rowntree Foundation published, amongst other findings, research that suggested that work may not necessarily pay under universal credit. For some, the incentive to work full-time will increase only marginally, whilst for others the incentive will be weaker than under the current system.

4073. I know that you are very well aware of the particular housing challenges in implementing the welfare reforms. I do not want to rehearse those again, so we will move directly to the Bill. I want to highlight a couple of concerns about universal credit more generally and then two areas in which we would like to suggest amendments. In many ways, it is difficult to talk about the housing cost element of universal credit because there is so little information in the Bill to comment on. The detail on rent service charges and mortgage interest will all fall to the regulations to determine. At the appropriate time, we would very much welcome the opportunity to discuss the regulations in Northern Ireland to ensure that we can drill down to the level of detail of how housing costs will be dealt with. It would be very helpful if the Committee could perhaps seek some clarification from the Department on the timetable for the regulations and when we might be able to see those to comment on them and help to shape the detail.
4074. On a general note, the process of designing and implementing universal credit poses a number of strategic and operational risks to the provision of an effective system. We are very concerned about that. That detail is in our written evidence, so I will not go through it again, but we are happy to take questions.
4075. We are membership organisation, and one of the concerns from members is that landlords — social landlords and possibly private landlords — will have to subsume much of the significant implementation costs of universal credit that will fall outside the budget of the Department for Work and Pensions (DWP) and the Department for Social Development (DSD) in preparing for the changes and their impacts on tenants. It almost goes without saying that a lot of those concerns could be allayed if we had more information and clarification on a number of issues in the Bill, such as universal credit as it is being developed; how the IT system will operate; the new local arrangements for rates relief; passported benefits; the social fund; support for non-online users and how those services will be delivered; what the delivery structures will look like; and how housing assessments will fit into the determination of universal credit payments.
4076. I will touch briefly on two areas where we feel that it would be very useful to seek amendments to the Bill. The first is extended payments. The Bill does not allow for housing cost run-ons, which are also known as extended payments, when claimants start work. Under the current system, housing benefit or support for mortgage interest continues for four weeks after an individual has found employment. It helps claimants in the transition from benefits to wages. We know from colleagues in England that universal credit regulations being drafted in Westminster plan to abolish the extended payments. We feel that contradicts the objective of improving incentives for the long-term unemployed to take up work. Given the high levels of long-term unemployment in Northern Ireland and the prevalence of low-paid employment for people who do transition into work, we ask that you consider continuing extended payments on the introduction of universal credit and writing that provision into the Bill. We have suggested wording of an amendment in our written evidence.
4077. The second issue is rates relief. We feel that there is a real risk that the more elements that are provided outside of universal credit, the more the simplification principle of the benefit is eroded and the single taper may no longer necessarily apply. That is why we advocate that the benefits of a lower withdrawal rate of support, which is obviously a key element of universal credit, are not lost when it comes to housing benefit for rates relief. We ask the Committee to seek to ensure that help with rates remains outside of universal credit whilst mimicking the amount of benefit that would be received if help with rates was included in the benefit. We have provided some of the more technical detail of that in our written submission. If the new rates relief scheme is developed based on the current system rather than what would be the case if support for rates was contained within universal credit, low-income households returning to work or taking on additional hours would find very quickly that they have to take on responsibility for payment of rates. Again, we have provided all that detail. Essentially, what we suggest would ensure that payment of rates is assumed at a level commensurate with universal credit, thus ensuring that households do not find themselves only very marginally better off in work or if they increase their hours.

4078. Mr Cameron Watt (Northern Ireland Federation of Housing Associations):

Chair and Committee, thanks again for the opportunity to present today. I would also like to reiterate Jennie's thanks for the Committee's support for the flexibilities that have been secured in the operation of universal credit here. I am sure that the robust cross-party consensus really strengthens the Minister's negotiating position with DWP. I put on record our thanks to Minister McCausland for winning those flexibilities, which we believe will help greatly in mitigating the impacts of welfare reform and, as you know, are being viewed enviously by the rest of the UK.

4079. As Jennie mentioned, most of the detail on how housing costs will be covered under the new system will be set out in regulations. Some of those regulations — on service charges, for example — have still to be finalised in GB. It would be very helpful if the Department provided a timetable for publishing the regulations due to be made under the Bill. Given their importance and complexity, we hope that the Committee will be able to scrutinise those draft regulations on housing costs in the necessary detail once they are produced.

4080. Clause 69 will introduce an underoccupancy penalty, or bedroom tax, for social tenants. We, too, support the principles of simplifying the benefits system and making work pay. However, we believe that the underoccupancy penalty is unjust and has the potential to cause real hardship to many low-income families. A fairer approach would be to apply the penalty only if or when the affected tenant had been made an offer of a suitable smaller home that they had refused. The scope to mitigate the impacts of the penalty without breaking parity seem limited. In common with the Chartered Institute of Housing (CIH) and others, the Northern Ireland Federation of Housing Associations (NIFHA) is very concerned about the failure to exempt disabled people and foster carers from the underoccupancy penalty. Those issues were debated at some length during the passage of the GB Bill, and additional funds will be made available to offset the impacts on those two groups. However, those measures will be only temporary. We think that we should be able to do better here in Northern Ireland, so we ask the Committee to amend the Bill to exempt those two groups from the penalty.

4081. We also think that there is a strong case to delay the introduction of the penalty for six months in line with the six-month delay to the introduction of universal credit here. Housing associations along with the Housing Executive have been, and are, active in publicising the likely changes to tenants and doing what we can to prepare. However, in GB, there will be a gap of over a year between the Act being passed in March 2012 and the penalty being introduced in April 2013. Here, the period could be as little as a few weeks. The information-sharing powers that will allow our members to better pinpoint and identify people affected are contained in this Bill. They cannot be used by housing associations until this Bill passes into law. Given that the impact of the penalty will severely impact so severely over 30,000 households in social housing, we believe that our members and tenants need more time to prepare, especially when the delays that have inhibited that preparation have been completely outside our control.

4082. As I said, housing providers need that real-time benefit information to pinpoint which tenants are impacted by the changes to provide appropriate help as well as mitigate the risks to their income streams. So, as far as clauses 116 and 117 on information-sharing are concerned, we believe that housing associations should be specifically added to the list of qualifying persons so that we can definitely get hold of that information. In the GB legislation, there is provision for local authorities that want to share the information with housing providers, but, in practice, not a lot of them have done that. Here, all housing providers providing social housing should have access to that information as of right so that they can provide the necessary help and support.

4083. We know that the budget for discretionary housing payments will increase from £3.4 million to £6.9 million. However, the underoccupancy penalty will result in benefit savings and, therefore, lost income to tenants of £15.5 million annually. Over 6,000 housing association households will be receiving £70,000 less each week in housing support as a result of the bedroom tax. That is £3.7 million annually. Therefore, there will be immense pressure on this comparatively small budget. So, to prevent severe hardship, we think that it is likely that the fund for discretionary housing payments will need to be increased. We ask the Committee to consider that.

4084. I would just like to finish with a word on exempt accommodation. Many of the homes that our members provide are specialist and supported housing for vulnerable people. We welcome DWP's decision to remove housing costs for supported housing from universal credit, because that recognises that this housing is more expensive to provide and needs to be supported at a higher level. However, the announcement in GB that we are going to move to a new localised system for exempt accommodation creates real uncertainty. We feel that there is a real danger that we could move away from a demand-led system, where the costs are fully and properly covered, to these costs being covered from a finite pot which could create a major shortfall in the amount of housing support that is available and necessary for people in exempted accommodation. We ask the Committee, therefore, to closely scrutinise how housing costs for exempted accommodation are going to be managed within the new system.

4085. Ms Ricky Rowledge (Council for the Homeless Northern Ireland): I, too, thank the Committee for asking us along today to give evidence. In the short time available for me to talk to you, I want to focus on homelessness, and, in particular, the impact of the Welfare Reform Bill upon people who are already homeless, not those who potentially may have difficulties with affordability in future when the Bill is implemented.

4086. I want to talk to you about the administration of universal credit, and a little bit about a couple of the clauses and what they will mean to homeless people, so that you are mindful of that particular group of very vulnerable people in society. Finally, I will also talk about the implications for some of our strategies in Northern Ireland.

4087. Homeless people who live in temporary accommodation live in hostels or single lets. Single lets are self-contained accommodation units that are leased en bloc by the Housing Executive to give people temporary homes. There are around about 800 of those units in Northern Ireland. They have very poor access to IT on the whole. If we look at the default method of applying for universal credit, we see that it is online. You will find that many of those people who are homeless and in that population have low literacy and numerous skills, and low IT skills. They also will not have great access to the actual technology that will allow them to apply for universal credit. We need to be mindful that when we look at other methods of applying for universal credit — whether it be by telephony or through individual face-to-face contact — homeless people - should be given as much opportunity as possible to access that.

4088. In regard to the provision of temporary accommodation, providers will need to look at how they can gather the resources to provide the actual computers whereby people can access their online applications, because many of them will not have that. Also, they will need to be trained up in skills development to help people learn how to use computers and how to do things, particularly when circumstances change and you have to reapply. I also think that there are some issues with confidentiality around getting help for applying.
4089. The second area regarding administration is the fact that universal credit is likely to go directly into bank accounts. In my work, I speak to many, many homeless people who live in temporary accommodation and to the staff who work with them. Banks and building societies are very loath to give bank accounts to people who are in temporary accommodation. That is a fact. I know providers who have talked directly to many different banks in Northern Ireland, and who have been told, “We don’t think so.” I think that there is a responsibility on the Stormont Executive to speak to the banking fraternity to encourage them to ensure that there is accessible banking for everyone in Northern Ireland.
4090. The third and most important thing for people with regard to administration, when they are in temporary accommodation, is the production of evidence. Many of our more vulnerable homeless people — whether they have suffered domestic violence, been involved in criminal justice and have been released from prison or live chaotic lifestyles — will not have the kind of evidence that is needed in order to apply for universal credit. The way it works — at least the way we are told that it will work — is that your claim will not become active until all evidence has been presented. We have people who will not be able to provide all evidence, and that means that they could go long periods of time without money, and those who are accommodating them will be a long time without any rental income. At present, third-party verification from a reputable source is allowed as evidence, and we ask that it be written into the Bill that, while those who are homeless are seeking to get together the evidence needed, third-party verification should be accepted to kick-start their claim.
4091. I support what Cameron said about what will be included in housing costs. The housing cost element — whether it is paid directly to the landlord or not — in supported temporary accommodation includes an element for intensive housing management, and that recognises that it is more expensive to provide the bricks and mortar for certain vulnerable groups. We ask that that is maintained in the housing costs that will be delivered external to universal credit. Otherwise, we will have an increase in arrears, and, potentially, schemes will close due to lack of finance.
4092. I will finish by talking about discretionary payments, particularly discretionary housing payment for homeless people. Most people who leave temporary accommodation, regardless of the reason they became homeless in the first place, will need help, normally through a community care grant, to set up a home. Research says that 70% of tenancies will break down due to loneliness and due to people living in a house and not a home because they have no furniture. Could you imagine living in a house where you literally have nothing? People depend on money coming through community care grants and, ultimately, often through crisis loans to establish a home, and if you have those things, it is more likely that your tenancy will be sustainable. I agree with my colleagues that it will be spread very thin. We have real concerns that it will be subsumed into a wider discretionary social fund and will not be ring-fenced for housing costs alone. We ask that consideration is given to, first, increasing the fund; secondly, to ring-fencing it for housing costs; and, thirdly, to some level of prioritisation

- for homeless people who are leaving temporary accommodation and do not have furniture in storage to set up a new home.
4093. I hope that you recognise that the UK welfare reform legislation will have a negative effect on some of our local initiatives; namely, the homelessness strategy, which was consulted on and approved by DSD and passed by the Stormont Executive. That strategy praises as its mainstays the prevention of homelessness and access to affordable housing, but this legislation and the regulations that apply to housing will not just drive a horse and carriage through it but will drive a steamroller through it. That will mean that it will be virtually impossible for us to meet the aims that we have set ourselves. I ask that, in some way, that is taken into consideration.
4094. Ms Nicola McCrudden (Housing Rights Service): As a front line agency that provides advice to people who are already affected by implementation of cuts to housing benefit, we see very little in this Bill to improve their situation. In fact, we are very concerned that it will put a lot more people in a much worse situation. It is very difficult to provide an informed comment on the clauses that relate to housing because, as my colleagues said, the detail will be in the regulations. With regard to clause 11 and housing costs, that will include what is to be included and excluded from housing costs; when a claimant is to be treated as liable or not; when a claimant is to be treated as occupying, including temporarily occupying accommodation; how the amount itself will be calculated; and when that entitlement will commence and cease. We strongly urge the Committee to conduct full and proper scrutiny of the regulations, because the devil will be in the detail.
4095. We have looked at the draft universal credit regulations in Britain and have genuine concerns that there will be further cuts through regulations that will affect social housing tenants, private tenants and homeowners. Even though that is not related to the Welfare Reform Bill specifically, it will come in on the back of the detail of the regulations. With regard to homeowners, one of our major concerns is the waiting period before entitlement to help from support for mortgage interest. We are still waiting for a determination on how long that waiting period will be. Currently, homeowners have to wait up to 13 weeks for assistance. There has been talk that DWP will extend that to around 39 weeks. I am sure everybody is aware of the saying that a person is only three months away from becoming homeless. Working people tend to have some reserves. However, our experience to date has been that those reserves are running pretty low and that people have enough to get by for only a month or two. So to expect people who lose their job to wait 39 weeks before entitlement to support for mortgage interest is very impractical. We are extremely concerned about that, and we ask the Committee to clarify what the intentions of the Department and DWP are in that regard.
4096. One key change being signalled by the Department is that an owner on universal credit will lose help with housing costs, even if they take up temporary work. At the minute, such a claimant can get, for example, employment and support allowance (ESA). However, it is our understanding that if a lone parent, for example, takes up a job for a day week, they will no longer be entitled to any help from support for mortgage interest. That runs contrary to the principle of the Welfare Reform Bill.
4097. We are also concerned that there may be cuts to entitlement generally. At the minute, a person on income-based jobseeker's allowance (JSA) is no longer entitled to any assistance from support for mortgage interest after two years. That really has been a lifeline to the vast majority of our clients. However, if that were extended across the board, we would have serious concerns about the implications for the local housing market, unless someone with a crystal ball can see an end to

- this recession, because our market is in a very different place from the one across the water. Most of our clients are in negative equity, which leaves them with very limited options. Our house prices are still quite suppressed. So, again, in respect of Northern Ireland's circumstances, I would just ask the Committee to be mindful of that.
4098. I will touch very briefly on the issue of tenants. There are significant changes coming down the line, and those of you who provide advice to your constituents on housing benefit, as I know you all do, may be aware of some of these terms. There will be changes to overlapping entitlement or what is known as the "two homes rule". If someone who is renting privately is made an offer for social tenancy and that is accepted — a landlord often does not want the accommodation to be void and naturally the person on the waiting list wants to move in — that person will have an overlapping entitlement, because they are liable for rent on two homes, and their benefit paid will be paid. Our understanding is that that will be done away with under the universal credit regulations. Again, as Ricky pointed out earlier, currently, homeless people in hostels who are waiting for a social fund payment for furniture are entitled to assistance. Our understanding is that that will also be done away with.
4099. Currently, claimants who are temporarily absent from home are entitled, under specific circumstances, to housing benefit for up to 13 weeks or 52 weeks. However, under the draft universal credit regulations in Britain, that will be payable for a maximum period of six months. People who were entitled to it for up to 13 weeks will obviously benefit, but those were entitled to it for up to 52 weeks will obviously be at a disadvantage. That includes people who are admitted to hospital, to long-term respite care and to prisoners who are in custody on remand.
4100. There are a number of other issues, but I do not have time to go through those here. I really just wanted to make the Committee aware that there are further cuts coming down the line. It is so important that you scrutinise the regulations line by line, clause by clause. I agree with what Jennie said about the timetable. It is very important to get a timetable from the Department and to ask it whether there is scope within the regulations to make Northern Ireland-specific amendments.
4101. We, too, are very concerned about the budget for discretionary housing payments. However, we are aware that it is discretionary and is temporary. However, we ask that provision be made within the social protection fund to ensure that people who have had their benefits cut and are at risk of losing their home are provided with some kind of assistance through that fund, even on a temporary transitional arrangement.
4102. The Chairperson: Thank you very much, Nicola. We have had four presentations so far, and like the others, that was very informative.
4103. Mr Douglas: Thanks very much for your presentation. We have heard from a number of stakeholders about the underoccupancy requirements. People are saying to us that the requirements should not be applied until there is sufficient and appropriate housing stock. What is your view on that?
4104. Mr Watt: I think that, in an ideal world, we would not introduce such a requirement until we had sufficient and appropriate stock so that everyone could have a home that was deemed a suitable size. Given our limited housing stock and the very major constraints on the newbuild programme because of limited public funding and our members' limited capacity to borrow privately, that is, perhaps, unrealistic. We should, however, aspire to some changes that will make the system fairer. As I said, exempting particular groups, such as foster carers and disabled people, would make it a fairer and more equitable system. Given that the changes are so fundamental, providers and, more importantly, tenants, need a fair opportunity to prepare for the very

- major changes that the bedroom tax, or underoccupancy requirement, will usher in.
4105. In communicating with tenants, our members have done a lot of work on the range of changes that will impact on social tenants. However, much of that work has been frustrated by a lack of clarity on, for example, direct payments. We are, obviously, very thankful to the Minister for securing that. However, the uncertainty in that area had created a difficulty in communicating clear messages on direct payments. That is also the case with the bedroom tax, because we do not know what the final shape of that legislation will be here.
4106. As to the provision itself, building new, smaller homes is a part of the solution. Under the social development programme, housing associations are committed to providing 150 new smaller units this year and 200 next year. However, set against the scale of the problem, which is that over 30,000 social households are underoccupied, that is a significant but small part of the solution. Along with perhaps exempting one or two particular groups and delaying the introduction to give us a fair chance to prepare, we also need to do much more work on, for example, supporting people to take in lodgers and looking at issues to do with allocations and tenancies. I do not think that there will be any quick fixes. This will require a lot of small, incremental improvements.
4107. Dr Donald: Absolutely. If we can delay the underoccupation penalty, perhaps by six months to bring it into line with universal credit, that would certainly be helpful. Communication with tenants is fundamental. I understand that it could be January when tenants are notified that they are at risk of being evicted by virtue of this penalty. That does not leave much time for people to assess their housing options and find a suitable property, if indeed such a property is available.
4108. In other parts of the UK, a lot of time has given to thinking about how to make better use of stock. Investment has been put into programmes of work with local authorities and housing associations on using the stock that they already have more effectively and supporting tenants to move if they are willing to do so. Obviously, when people become aware of the severity of the reductions in benefits, there is a chance that they will want to move on. So we should at least give some thought to putting money into that sort of programme, and we should put a lot of resource, right now, into using the stock that we have more effectively while we wait for the programme to catch up and for those smaller homes to start being built.
4109. Ms Rowledge: I slightly disagree with my two colleagues on this issue. I think that other elements need to be taken into consideration and that we should try to delay the implementation for as long as we possibly can, certainly while we do other work. My reason for saying that relates to the differential between the security of tenure of a social tenant and that of someone in the private rental sector. Many of the people who will be affected by this will be like me: their children will be grown up and have left the house, and they are in a bigger house than it is deemed that they need. If it were me, I would be sitting in a secure tenancy, and I would say that there was nowhere in my area or community, to which I have ties, to move to. So I may decide to pay for the two extra bedrooms. The alternative would be to move into the private rented sector, if accommodation were available there. I would have much less security of tenure, and it would be highly unlikely that I could find a home in the bottom thirtieth percentile in order to get full housing benefit. So I would have to pay something towards my rent anyway. Where would you stay? You would stay in your secure social housing tenancy.
4110. Therefore, the driver and ideology behind the legislation, which is to get better use of social housing stock, as is right and proper, is pointless, because we do not have secure tenancies to move people into, we have quite high rents, and we do not necessarily even have the most appropriate housing in the private sector. People will, I think, choose to stay in their social rented tenancies. Therefore, we have to look at how we can better use our housing stock and look at the sharing of homes and that kind of thing. If you can get a six-month delay, that would be brilliant. However, if you could get a delay that was a wee bit longer, we could start to work with private as well as social landlords on looking at change of use, which would be positive.

4111. Mr Douglas: The Housing Executive told us that, if the Bill were implemented tomorrow, it would not have the necessary housing stock.
4112. Ms Rowledge: Exactly.
4113. Mr Douglas: Somebody suggested yesterday, after a discussion with the Housing Executive, putting off the implementation of the requirement for 10 years, because it would take that long to get the necessary housing stock.
4114. Mr Watt: As has been said, the evidence from GB is that about 80% or 90% of social tenants affected by the bedroom tax will seek, at least initially for a year or two, to stay put. So to begin with, you will not necessarily get movement within the social housing stock. The Housing Executive is taking the lead in procuring a new online home-swap portal. That is intended to work across the social housing sector in Northern Ireland, including the Housing Executive and housing associations, so that, where people are interested in downsizing or upsizing, we are efficiently and effectively facilitating movement within the social stock to match people up as best we can.
4115. Ms McCrudden: Providing advice and support to tenants will play a very important role. Tenants do not know what their housing options are. They do not necessarily know that moving into the private rented sector means that they are giving up a secure property, their entitlement to buy and all the other rights associated with that. Tenants need to be informed and given proper time to seek out that independent advice so that they can make an informed decision about where they want to go.
4116. We have not had any investment for looking at the whole financial inclusion agenda. The Executive are producing a financial capability strategy, and I am on that advisory group, but it will be in place only from March. So we need to look at what investment will be attached to that strategy. It is very unfair to start cutting people's housing benefit entitlement when they have not had the support, information and guidance to show them how to manage their money more effectively. That is quite important.
4117. My third point is about our allocation scheme. There is a mishmash between how our social housing property is allocated and the underoccupancy regulation that will be brought in. Someone could be offered a property and two children under the age of seven would be expected to share, whereas the current allocations policy is two children under the age of 10. That mishmash needs to be looked at, because somebody could be offered a property today and be underoccupying that property come April.
4118. Mr Douglas: Housing Executive officials said that the Bill was very clear, and they used these stark words: if people do not pay the rent, they can expect to be evicted. They said that they wanted advice from us, and they certainly did not say that they would evict everybody who did not pay the rent. What is the response of your sector to what happens now with evictions and the potential for evictions under the Bill?
4119. Ms McCrudden: If you are asking about the attitudes of landlord to evictions, it would be more appropriate for Cameron to respond.
4120. Mr Watt: The housing association movement is committed to working with the Department for Social Development, the Housing Executive, Advice NI, Housing Rights Service and the other housing and welfare agencies to ensure that people do not lose their homes as a result of the changes. However, as we have acknowledged, the changes will cause real hardship, and people will run up greater arrears. DSD, as the regulator for social housing, has very tight expectations of the arrears under which our members are allowed to operate, and, obviously, our members are committed to keeping those as low as possible. A significant and sustained increase in arrears would jeopardise our members' capacity to borrow privately. Lenders to the social housing market are pulling out as fast as they can, and it is a challenging environment. If our arrears were to start increasing significantly, our members' banking covenants would be breached, and the capacity to borrow privately and build new social homes in Northern Ireland would be severely jeopardised. We will work with everyone else to give as much help to everyone affected by this. However I think that there has to be a bottom-line expectation that, one way or the other, people still have to pay their rent.

4121. Mr Douglas: I go back to Nicola's point on the financial capability statement. The Consumer Council is providing advice like that. You are all saying that we need to have some sort of statutory regulation to support advice agencies and those types of organisations.
4122. Mr Brady: Thank you very much for a very informative presentation. You mentioned one point that many of the other groups mentioned, which is that the regulations are not yet available. It is also important that the guidance to social security staff is not yet available. Many of the sanctions and how they will be addressed are predicated on guidelines, so it is important that those are available, too.
4123. Some of the concerns that you raised are very real. In your submission, you state:
- "Since universal credit rolls together a number of different benefits it will comprise of different elements (eg standard, childcare, housing costs). At the moment these elements are processed in parallel. There is a danger that the decision on an award will be slowed down to the slowest part of the process. Under universal credit, nothing will be paid to* the claimant until everything within the claim has been decided."

4124. Ricky, you mentioned homelessness. That is a huge problem, and it will impact on those vulnerable people. However, there are other people who simply do not have the information at hand and for whom it can take a while to get, for instance, bank statements and details for their mortgage companies. That is a real difficulty.
4125. In your submission, you also state:
- "There are no safeguards in the universal credit system to prevent the type of tweaks and additions which have caused the current system to become so complex and unwieldy."*
4126. That is very true. There is a notion abroad that universal credit will make everything so simple, but it is all predicated on the effectiveness of the IT system. I have been around the benefit system for a long time. In 1993, when the Social Security Agency (SSA) went live, it involved the biggest computerisation since NASA, and apparently this one is even bigger. That system did not work. The system for the former Child Support Agency (CSA) is the classic example: they had to revamp the whole thing. The inherent difficulties in rolling out universal credit will be a real problem, particularly for housing.
4127. Although we welcome direct payments to landlords, that means that landlords, to a degree, will be OK. The same protection is not afforded to tenants, whose money it really and legally is. It is not just some altruistic gesture on behalf of the Department. Tenants are not afforded the same protection in the reduction allowed in underoccupancy, and so on. The protection is very unbalanced in that respect. I have no doubt that universal credit will probably create more problems than it solves.
4128. Dr Donald: Some of the information in and around universal credit comes from my colleagues in GB, and they are working quite closely with DWP and the Work and Pensions Select Committee on some of those issues. You are exactly right: our big concern is that tenants and

- claimants have complex and multiple issues. They do not always fit neatly into one simple, streamlined system. Of course, the reason why the current benefit system has reached its current size and level of complexity is simply because it had to reflect the nature of all the different circumstances. That is one of the concerns.
4129. We will also, simultaneously, be reforming a system and imposing expenditure cuts. When those two things happen at the same time, the potential for things to go wrong is greater, which is a very real concern for us. We continue to raise the issue with DWP and the Work and Pensions Select Committee, and we are trying to get more clarity on how those processes will work, particularly the IT system. However, the idea that it will slow down, because fewer benefits need to be assessed and factored into universal credit, is a very real concern.
4130. Mr Brady: I want to make a point about the living wage. That report refers to a living wage of £7.20 an hour and the minimum wage is £6.19 an hour. It also states that people in the North will be impacted more heavily by the lack of that £7.20. We live in a minimum wage economy, and in many cases employers will not pay more than that. Some obviously do, but the majority do not. Therefore, people are still that £1 an hour below a decent living standard. That leads on to other problems and to their trying to cope on a daily, weekly and monthly basis. Therein lies the problem.
4131. How the complexity of tax credits, for example, is going to be resolved in a benefit that will subsume all that makes it even more worrying.
4132. Dr Donald: Absolutely.
4133. Ms Rowledge: I would add that there are particular issues in Northern Ireland about the sanctions around seeking better-paid or more work. On the whole, we do not have better-paid or more work in Northern Ireland. How we apply that to our circumstances here really needs to be considered.
4134. Mr Watt: I think that most people would support the move to digital by default. We are moving into a digital age, and people need to be able to use computers. However, although digital by default may be the right approach, there has to be a fallback for vulnerable people. If those people have a problem with their computer or have no IT skills or access to a computer, the system will break down. A fallback is needed so that people can sit down with someone and get a problem sorted. That fallback will not be available in GB, but I think that we need to make sure that there is some sort of fallback for face-to-face support if people need it.
4135. Mr F McCann: I want to raise a couple of issues, especially on Cameron's last point about it being right that we move to a computerised system. Some of the evidence that we have heard is that a fairly high percentage of people cannot afford computers and would not be able to tap into that. There are many other people who have a limited knowledge of how a computer works. That also needs to be considered.
4136. Sammy raised the issue of evictions. Evictions are already taking place for rent arrears and for those who cannot meet their mortgage payments. There will be a huge increase in the number of people who will lose their homes.
4137. Ms Rowledge: There has been an 18% increase in homelessness in England in the past year and a 36% increase in London.
4138. Mr F McCann: Cameron mentioned the 30,000 houses that would immediately come under the provisions for underoccupancy. Is that within the housing association movement or the Housing Executive?
4139. Mr Watt: About 26,000 Housing Executive houses and 6,200 in the housing association movement will be affected. Overall, about 32,000 households in the social housing sector will be affected.
4140. Mr F McCann: When people argued that point, you said that you are building

150 units over the next wee while. That is a drop in the ocean compared with what is needed. There needs to be a complete change in the mindset of those who have drawn up the Bill. There are huge differences in housing here. We live with the legacy of conflict, and it is not easy for people to move across communities. A couple of weeks ago, I told the Minister that there are a couple of hundred houses lying empty in Tiger's Bay and that 200 people from New Lodge want to move into them. Would they allow it? No, they would not. There are major differences that need to be considered when this is all done.

4141. Jennie, your presentation refers to the extension of the shared accommodation rate. Do you have insight from landlords on the effect of the shared accommodation rate to date?

4142. Dr Donald: I was trying to get a bit information on that the other day, and I spoke to a colleague who works in the private rented sector, particularly helping low-income and vulnerable households to gain access to homes in that sector. There has been a bit of a delay because of the transitional protections, and the shared accommodation rate is not hitting as immediately as we thought it might because it depends on renewal of tenancy. However, increasing numbers of people are starting to say, "I can no longer afford my current tenancy. Can you find me something cheaper?" In most cases, it is almost impossible to do that because, in Belfast, it is a £40 drop between the local housing allowance before the shared accommodation rate and after. Last month, 40 people across Northern Ireland were impacted by the shared accommodation rate and said that they can no longer afford their current accommodation. My colleague said that, in many cases, landlords are prepared to drop rents but cannot drop them enough to make up the shortfall. We can meet tenants in the middle, but it is not feasible because tenants cannot make up the shortfall that is particular to the shared accommodation rate.

4143. Mr F McCann: I have dealt with a couple of people in that category, and a number of people are walking away from accommodation and are back with parents or staying with friends because they cannot afford it. It goes back to the bluff that was put across when it was announced that there would be an increase in discretionary payments from the Housing Executive to cover the cost. It talked about up to £3 million and now up to £6 million. A lot of that was initially said to cover the cost of the shared room allowance. If you add 30,000 people on top of that, it is a minimal amount. Many people do not grasp the fact that it is short-termism and that people still have to deal with the effect of it. Individually, you all do good work, but the hard message that needs to be sent out is that we are not prepared to deal with underoccupancy because it will lead to homelessness. A decision has already been taken that no new hostels will be built, which has a knock-on effect for homeless people.

4144. Nicola, we constantly talk about the impact on people who will lose their benefit for mortgage payments. If possible, could we have some clear examples of how it will impact people? That would allow people, especially us, to see the implications clearly. We get four or five presentations a day, and the Committee has guaranteed that everybody will be given the chance to have their say. We had a two-hour session this morning, and there are more evidence sessions this afternoon. We have accepted that, but, for it to be written into what we are doing, we need those clear examples. The impact of some of the changes on housing, Cameron, and from a homelessness point of view, Ricky, needs to be clearly outlined.

4145. Ms McCrudden: We are undertaking a piece of work that is like a snapshot survey of what is happening with homeowners who are experiencing mortgage arrears because of the cuts to support for mortgage interest. We are looking, almost a year down the line, at where they are now. We are having

- difficulty in following up a lot of people. That is not surprising because they are probably no longer there and have probably moved somewhere else. We will probably have that information within the next few weeks.
4146. Mr F McCann: I raised an issue yesterday with the Human Rights Commission, and it could make a major difference. It is the question about what the box room in many of the older housing association and Housing Executive social houses stands for. That may have been drawn up many years ago and might have fitted in with the guidelines then, but surely, in this day and age, a box room is more of a cupboard than a room. If that were removed, it would assist a lot of people. That is the message that we are sending out.
4147. Mr Watt: Some flexibility about the redesignation of rooms would be helpful. I suppose that one of the advantages of the GB legislation is that it is not prescriptive about what does and does not constitute a bedroom. Obviously, we cannot do a wholesale reclassification of two-bedroom properties as one-bedroom properties.
4148. Mr F McCann: Is that because it might reduce rent?
4149. Mr Watt: I am afraid that landlords could not take that hit.
4150. Ms McCrudden: It would also impact on tenancy agreements. If people are allocated a three-bedroom property, they will sign a tenancy agreement to say that they have a three-bedroom property. That is not to say that we cannot overcome that if some properties are redesignated, but there probably are some legal implications.
4151. Dr Donald: In respect of future borrowing, you could get round the implications for landlords, but there would be knock-on consequences for existing loans taken out against the stock that they have, rent levels and all those sorts of things.
4152. Mr F McCann: How has your sister organisation in England dealt with that?
- It is obviously ahead of us given that the legislation is already in place there. Has it be able to work out ways round it?
4153. Dr Donald: In respect of underoccupancy?
4154. Mr F McCann: Yes.
4155. Dr Donald: It is actually very interesting. Along with DWP, we have been running a learning network on direct payments. That is starting to feed back lots of other issues. Direct payments are obviously a concern for landlords in GB, but underoccupancy is emerging as the bigger concern. Like us, they are very worried about what that means for them. However, as you pointed out, they do not have the added issue that we have of segregated housing.
4156. We have developed an underoccupation toolkit, which we provide to landlords. That is free to download from our website and is accessible to everyone. It gives social housing providers lots of practical steps on how to help to support tenants through the changes, how to change their business modelling and how to take account of the effect of the changes on them, as part of the association, and on their tenants. So we are providing that support and advice to landlords. I have to point out that that was funded by the Department for Communities and Local Government. It invested in a team within the CIH to make better use of social housing stock. That is why we have been able to do that sort of work.
4157. Mr F McCann: Are you saying that it has a flaw?
4158. Dr Donald: It is not work that we as an organisation have been able to do entirely on our own. It has relied on government support. That is because the Government recognise that underoccupancy is a major issue and that we need a strategic and targeted approach to deal with it.
4159. Mr Watt: As well as landlords continuing to do what they can to explain the changes to tenants, by doing leaflet drops, providing tenant newsletters and going door to door, I think that some sort of public information campaign is necessary. The Housing Executive website sets out the changes to underoccupancy, but it is still says, "These changes may apply from next April." The likelihood, however, is that they will apply. If it is only saying that they may apply, I think that the reality has yet to hit home. I think that complementing landlords' efforts with a public information campaign would really help to raise awareness. People would then go to our members and get the help that they need.

4160. Dr Donald: We have to be much more creative. A standard issue letter will not necessarily do the job. Going door to door is one thing, but landlords in GB are using social media more and are texting tenants to make them aware of the changes. We have developed an app for smartphones that housing officers use when they go out to talk to tenants. Within five minutes of putting in all their details, the app will tell them exactly how the benefit changes will impact them and exactly how much they will lose each week from their benefits. That is helping tenants to make informed decisions very quickly.
4161. Ms Rowledge: It is important to remember that the regulations, the changes and the potential loss in rental income are multilayered. If people have children at home, they will be hit by increasing non-dependant deductions, which puts stress on families. However, if the children leave, people are immediately hit by underoccupation. So people are caught coming and going. People do not recognise the different levels. We need to try to make sure that the information directs people to advice agencies, which will help them to recognise how comprehensive these changes to housing are. It is confusing enough for those of us who work in the area, so it must even more confusing for tenants.
4162. Mr F McCann: I have just a final point. During the presentation given by the Housing Executive, the representatives said that they had recently completed a survey in the Portadown area in relation to underoccupancy. There was a huge percentage of people who said that they would not move. This is the bottom line in all that. It goes back to Sammy's point earlier on. If people say that they will not move and they start to incur penalties — and this will probably come down to organisations that you would oversee, Cameron — what moves do you make then? Departments and things like that would probably force them out and they would all be evicted. How do you evict 30,000 people?

4163. Mr Watt: Clearly, we cannot evict 30,000 people. Hopefully, the majority of those who make up the difference, will be able to find a way, one way or another, whether through bringing in a lodger or whatever. However there will be significant numbers of tenants running up significant arrears. We need to extend as much help to them as we can. However, as I have said before, the housing associations cannot be financially viable without collecting the rent. We will have to find a way of collecting the rent.
4164. Ms McCrudden: Just a final point on that: we have concerns that tenants will not be able to make up the shortfall. The figures that we have been given here for housing associations are that the shortfall will be £9.42 for one room and £17.48 for two, and that is per week. So, I would be very surprised if those tenants were able to make that up. For Housing Executive tenants, it is £8.25 for one room and £14.70 for two.
4165. The Chairperson: OK. Fair enough. Thank you for that.
4166. Mr Copeland: This is a sort of unforeseen possible consequential. The housing management system (HMS), by which the Housing Executive allocates properties at the moment, can, on occasions, if the applicant has FDA (Full Duty Applicant) status, give rise to a property being offered that has more bedrooms than the facts indicate are needed. The claimant, or the applicant, is entitled to three "reasonable offers". The executive's view of reasonableness, on many occasions, is a bit strange.

4167. What I am asking is whether you feel that there is a parallel piece of work going on to ensure that a property turned down on the basis of economics, is not actually counted as a reasonable offer that will then see someone for ever in the limbo of not having a home?
4168. Ms McCrudden: It should not be treated as a reasonable offer because the Housing Executive needs to take into account the suitability of the accommodation. Currently, my understanding is that allocations are still being made, and people are that desperate to get a social tenancy that they are taking them anyway, even though they may be informed that they may be underoccupying. If you have the options of being in a hostel, sleeping on someone's floor or you have been offered a tenancy, you will take it and then hope that these changes will not happen, because everyone keeps saying that they "may come down the line". That just reinforces what we said earlier. It is very important that the regulations are brought forward as soon as possible to you, so that that information can be communicated to tenants.
4169. Mr Watt: I believe that there are some changes to the common selection scheme going before the Housing Executive board shortly, which will make some tweaks to the system, in light of welfare reform. However, I think that landlords will still have to offer larger properties than may be covered under the new system and that that will still constitute a "reasonable offer". There is a huge amount of work that needs to be done on the common selection scheme. A fundamental review is under way, which is signposted in the housing strategy. However, a huge amount of work has to be done on the common selection scheme, allocations and tenancies in light of the new system.
4170. Ms Rowledge: I —
4171. Dr Donald: Oh sorry, Ricky. I have one last thing, or one last thing before Ricky. There is an issue of training for staff, which is something that we should take on as an organisation and take a certain amount of responsibility for. We have been saying for a long time that welfare reform cannot be the responsibility of one unit within a local authority, the Housing Executive or a housing association. It has to be disseminated right across the whole organisation. Everyone working in housing needs to know what the changes are and how they will impact on people, so that someone who is in a district office managing allocations or advising people about housing options is fully aware of the entire picture of what these welfare reform changes will mean, so that they can direct tenants or applicants to appropriate properties.
4172. Mr F McCann: I could probably argue with you about that for an hour. The system needs to be scrapped and started over again.
4173. The Chairperson: That is for another day and another hour.
4174. Ms Rowledge: I wanted to talk about the common selection scheme. Fra and I can have a conversation in the bar about that another day. [Laughter.]
4175. The Chairperson: You have made a very comprehensive set of written submissions and, more importantly, you were here today to underline a range of those points. I thank you for your presentations. I also thank you for your indulgence given the delay in the time frame of the meeting. It is very important for us to hear from experts in the field like you.
4176. Sammy raised the issue of the Housing Executive. The Housing Executive representatives made it clear that although they will be duty-bound to have a robust policy of repossession or eviction if people are deliberately not paying their rent, they make a clear distinction between those who do not pay their rent even though they have the wherewithal to do so and people who, as a consequence of the welfare reform proposals, are unable to pay their rent because they do not have the wherewithal — that is the term that they used. They have drawn attention to the - fact that they will be faced with that and have to deem people homeless.

4177. Ms Rowledge: At vast expense.
4178. The Chairperson: That also brought in the whole question of displaced payments. I do not want a run of headlines that 30,000 people will be evicted by April.
4179. Mr F McCann: I thought that it was March.
4180. The Chairperson: I am just making the point that, to be fair to the Housing Executive representatives, they raised a clear concern about people who, as a result of these proposals, may not be able to pay their rent. They put that question out for discussion: how do you decide whether to take someone's home off them?
4181. Mr Douglas: They also talked about underoccupancy, which will affect something like 26,000 people in receipt of benefits. To go back to Nicola's remark: how will those people deal with that penalty?
4182. Ms Rowledge: You also have to bear in mind that 11% of those people are working people. Therefore, they will not be getting housing benefit. However, the money that is taken off them is a percentage of their total rent and not pro rata to their benefit. So, many of them may actually end up in a negative position of getting no housing benefit.
4183. The Chairperson: I am just making the point that, in fairness to the Housing Executive representatives, while they will, on an ongoing basis, evict people who are deliberately or carelessly not paying their rent, they have said that they could well be faced with people who cannot afford to pay their rent and asked how housing associations should deal with that. That is a big question; there is no question about that.
4184. Mr Watt: Housing associations are social businesses. They are in it for a social purpose. They will do everything that they can to support people in the worst circumstances who have the least room for manoeuvre. However, unlike the Housing Executive, we are not deficit-funded by the taxpayer. The Housing Executive does not have the same financial constraints as our members. Our members will do everything that they can to support and help people and show understanding and forbearance where they can, but they have loan covenants that they have to stay within if they are to continue to provide new social housing.
4185. The Chairperson: It is an issue that is not resolved; that is for sure. It is clearly a cause for concern from everybody's perspective. For accuracy, I am just trying to put on record the comments that the Housing Executive made to the Committee.
4186. Thank you again very much. We are working our way through 40 written submissions and 20 oral submissions. A lot of those are from coalition-based groups like yours. That is very important to us. We have had the benefit of discussion with you, and we will continue to have that. Thank you very much for an invaluable contribution to our deliberations on the Bill.

4187. The Chairperson: Members, we are going to move on to the next briefing, from the Northern Ireland Council for Ethnic Minorities (NICEM).

4188. I formally welcome representatives from NICEM here this afternoon. I apologise if you have been held up longer than was necessary. I am sure that you have heard that often enough, but there you go. I welcome Patrick Yu, director of NICEM; Karen McLaughlin, legal policy officer; and Jolena Fleet, manager of the Belfast Migrant Centre. I welcome you all here this afternoon. The floor is at your disposal, so without any further ado, please make your presentation.

4189. Mr Patrick Yu (Northern Ireland Council for Ethnic Minorities): Thank you, Chair and Committee members, for giving us the opportunity to speak to you today on the Welfare Reform Bill. I will do a short introduction, and then Karen McLaughlin, our legal policy officer, will talk about the implications of the Bill for ethnic minorities, in particular, and the EU legislation. Jolena is the manager of the Migrant Centre, which provides a wide range of advocacy, advice and support services for all migrants. She will use two cases to illustrate the implications of the Bill for ethnic minorities.

4190. I am pleased to follow yesterday's submission from the Northern Ireland

Human Rights Commission, in which the chief commissioner gave a detailed account of the human rights implications of the Bill, with which we completely agree. However, the commission ignored the impact on ethnic minorities, which are protected by international human rights law under, in particular, the UN Declaration on the Elimination of all Forms of Racial Discrimination.

4191. So, something was missing from the commission yesterday, and we are happy to fill in the gap today. We appreciate the opportunity to present our case, and we are very narrow on the race issue. A lot of submissions have already covered the wider implications of different aspects that impact on ethnic minorities, and we are one of the many groups affected by the Bill.

4192. My key message to the Committee today is that the Bill might infringe a number of EU laws. My colleague Karen will give more detail about that effect. Under the Northern Ireland Act 1998, the Assembly cannot make any law that is incompatible with EU law and the Human Rights Act 1998. Our assessment is in line with that of the Joint Committee on Human Rights, which was very critical of the absence of a detailed human rights impact assessment on the same Bill, which is now being discussed in the Assembly. So, we have more or less copied and pasted everything from England, Wales and Scotland, and, in Northern Ireland, we do not have a mechanism similar to the Joint Committee on Human Rights to scrutinise. This Bill is so important and affects so many people. I ask the Committee to talk to the other Assembly Committees about whether they should put a mechanism in place to safeguard the legislative process in the future.

4193. This Bill will affect the most vulnerable groups in our society. We are coming out of a conflict and have a high level

- of poverty and social deprivation. Without a full EU law and human rights impact assessment, the Assembly will be vulnerable to making law that is incompatible with EU law and the Human Rights Act. Any law that is incompatible with EU law will be void.
4194. Therefore, we request that the Committee seeks a full human rights impact assessment and EU law impact assessment from the Minister before the Bill continues. It will be more expensive if the Bill is not done properly, and, therefore, it is better to do the right thing in a sufficient time rather than to rush it through. The Chair had very good experience when we engaged with him on the seafarers Bill that is proposed by the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister. That is exactly the same situation. History tells us that it will cause a lot of people anguish and, at the same time, create more unnecessary litigation. Therefore, I ask the Committee to consider our suggestion. I will pass over to Karen.
4195. Ms Karen McLaughlin (Northern Ireland Council for Ethnic Minorities): Thank you, Patrick. At the outset, I want to point out that it is important to recognise that social welfare law is not developed in a legal vacuum. I have set out in section 2 of our briefing paper the number of international human rights standards, including the concept of progressive realisation, that prohibit the introduction of retrogressive measures, and I am sure the Committee has heard from a number of groups over the past number of days that believe that the Welfare Reform Bill constitutes a retrogressive measure.
4196. As well as international human rights standards, NICEM is particularly concerned that the Welfare Reform Bill seems to have been developed in the absence of a thorough consideration of EU law. A number of sources of EU law should be taken into consideration, and I will go through them in four points.
4197. First, the principle of non-discrimination on the basis of nationality is enshrined in article 45 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union.
4198. Secondly, the right to social security and the principle of non-discrimination is enshrined in articles 34 and 21 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union.
4199. Thirdly, a crucial issue for us is that the Race Equality Directive 2000/43 lays down a framework for combatting discrimination on the grounds of racial or ethnic origin and puts into effect the principle of equal treatment. According to article 3(e), (f) and (h) of that directive, social protection, including social security, social advantages and access to the supply of public housing, followed in the scope of the directive. The concept of discrimination in the directive includes three elements: direct discrimination, indirect discrimination and harassment.
4200. Finally, it is important to bear in mind that social security is also an area of co-ordination in EU law, and it is governed by two EU law regulations, nos. 1408/71 and 884/2004. So bearing that in mind, I will briefly outline three of NICEM's key concerns in relation to the compatibility of the Welfare Reform Bill and programme with EU law.
4201. It appears that some parts of the Bill are inherently discriminatory. For example, the provision for differential treatment of EU migrant workers, set out in schedule 1 paragraph 7 of the Bill is quite striking. That provides for EU claimants, who ordinarily fall under the non-work-related requirements to be instead placed into the work-related requirement category. As I have already mentioned, one of the core principles of EU law is equal treatment, and that forms the basis for the co-ordination of social security law in the union. This is a clear case of differential treatment of EU migrants that would undoubtedly be found to be discriminatory in court. Therefore, NICEM recommends that this provision be deleted from the Bill.
4202. In addition, NICEM is also concerned that clauses 61 to 63 may discriminate

- against migrant workers, who may experience a change in their immigration status. These provisions introduce a new requirement for claimants to have an entitlement to work in order to claim certain contributory benefits. This is particularly concerning for non-European economic area (EEA) nationals, who ordinarily are not entitled to non-contributory benefits. So effectively, that would exclude non-EEA nationals even further from the welfare system. Bearing in mind the Limbuela case cited in the briefing paper, it is arguable that those clauses can have a potential to breach human rights, where migrants have lost their jobs and, despite having paid tax and national insurance contributions, migrants may find themselves being forced to live in destitution by the system that the state has put in place. Therefore, NICEM recommends the deletion of those clauses from the Bill.
4203. Our second concern relates more broadly to the programme of welfare reform. Since the Welfare Reform Bill before the Committee is an enabling Bill, most of the details will be left to the regulations. NICEM is deeply concerned that Northern Ireland will adopt the same approach as Great Britain in drafting the regulations. The draft regulations in Great Britain, as well as indications by the Department for Work and Pensions (DWP), suggest that EU migrants may be paid benefits at lower rates. That again would constitute direct discrimination. The introduction of the requirement to seek work for 35 hours per week could also potentially discriminate indirectly against EU migrants, particularly in relation to paragraph 7 of schedule 1, as I have already mentioned.
4204. So, in NICEM's view, clauses 8 to 10 of the Bill, which deal with the calculation of awards, and clause 22, which deals with work requirements, could potentially allow for Great Britain's approach to be transposed to Northern Ireland, and that would undoubtedly amount to discrimination.
4205. Therefore, NICEM calls upon the Committee to put in place safeguards within the Bill to ensure that those provisions do not provide a pathway for discrimination in the regulations.
4206. The DWP has indicated that a new residence test will be introduced for personal independence payments (PIPs): a worker must have been in the UK for two of the past three years. Such a test has previously been held to be in breach of EU law and, in addition, the Council of Europe's 'European Code of Social Security' prevents the state from setting a minimum time period to determine residency. The introduction of such a test could potentially lead to infringement proceedings by the European Commission against the UK, concerning the misapplication of EU law. In the briefing paper, I have referred to ongoing infringement proceedings against the UK in relation to the application of the right-to-reside test.
4207. I have already mentioned potential breaches of international human rights obligations, but those are not legally binding. However, it is important to bear in mind that EU law is legally binding, and any breaches of EU law may result in infringement proceedings which could lead to hefty fines, as Patrick has already mentioned in his introduction.
4208. That concludes my presentation and I will now pass on to Jolena to provide some cases studies to illustrate the ongoing issues faced by migrants on a daily basis. Given the fact that the Bill paves the way for differential legal treatment, this will undoubtedly have a knock-on effect on the administration of payments at the coalface.
4209. Ms Jolena Flett (Belfast Migrant Centre): Chair and the Committee, thank you for the opportunity to present to you. I would like to set the context of what we are seeing in our advice services and how the changes are beginning to impact on individuals among the black and minority ethnic (BME) population.
4210. NICEM has been formally providing advice since 1998, and to the migrant working population in particular since

- 2004, beginning with the floating support project. In 2010, we received three years of Big Lottery funding to establish the welcome house project, which has now become the Belfast Migrant Centre. The centre has one full-time adviser, two part-time advisers and an immigration adviser. Since 2010, the advisers have assisted in over 5,000 cases, with 41% of those related to welfare benefits.
4211. Our increased capacity for advice services has allowed us to monitor trends and respond to the different needs of the migrant population. We have seen our caseload change from queries about filling out forms and simple questions about benefit eligibility to complex appeals in the alarming rate of people who are in crisis situations. The increasing demands on our services mean that we no longer have the capacity to meet the ever-increasing need. There is an increasing need for tribunal representation, which we do not have the resources to provide. There is also a difficulty in accessing that through other advice centres that do have the resources, as they are already oversubscribed.
4212. There are further difficulties around language, as many advice centres have no funding to provide interpreters, and, even with the basic grasp of English, the terms used in assessments and tribunals are not feasible without the help of an interpreter. For example, a client who was doing an assessment to transfer from disability living allowance (DLA) to PIP was asked whether she had trouble communicating. She answered yes, as she could not speak good English.
4213. We continue to be concerned about the access that our service users will have with the changes proposed under the Welfare Reform Bill. Migrants have increased difficulty in accessing social welfare as a result of a lack of local knowledge. Therefore, navigating the administrative system, sometimes without access to interpreters, leads to increased difficulties. We are deeply concerned by the indications that all applications will now be processed online and that claimants will need a bank account.
4214. There are two case studies in the briefing paper that outline some of the difficulties people have faced. One of those refers to a 65-year-old man whose employment support allowance (ESA) was stopped after an assessment, which had the knock-on effect of stopping his housing benefit. That meant that he had to live off a credit card for six weeks and got into debt as a result. Help from our crisis fund helped him to pay his rent to avoid homelessness. The other case study looks at the impact of an assessment that was done by a GP without the use of an interpreter, which meant that the claimant's DLA was stopped. On appeal, she was awarded a new DLA award that was increased to high rate mobility and middle rate care and that effectively met her needs.
4215. The other issue we have had, which I am sure you have heard about from other groups such as Advice NI, is about getting GP reports and having to pay for further information. That has further decreased people's access to what they need to get a proper assessment done.
4216. We have received funding because there was a recognition of the gap in accessible and independent advice services for people from the black and ethnic minority community, particularly those who are migrant workers from EU and non-EU states. Difficult economic times, austerity measures and welfare reform have dictated that the need for the service will continue to increase. However, our funding officially ends in June 2013.
4217. Issues of discrimination and harassment at work and in housing, increased redundancies and unemployment of migrant workers, delays in the benefits system due to a lack of understanding of eligibility and compliance investigations have put the BME population in an increasingly desperate situation. Many of the crisis situations we have supported have been caused by delays in the processing of tax credits and benefits,

- with an increasing number of our service users being referred to the compliance unit almost immediately after applying for what they are entitled to. That has led to an increase in depression and mental health issues and substance abuse. Our staff have had to train themselves in mental health awareness and suicide prevention, although counselling is not within their usual remit.
4218. I hope that the increasing pressure on the independent advice sector is taken into account, especially the advice needs of those who are particularly marginalised in our society. We also hope that there will be recognition that people in those communities also suffer from disabilities and include older and younger people. Thank you.
4219. The Chairperson: Thank you very much for your presentations. Before I bring in Sammy Douglas, you have, obviously, raised a range of concerns in your submission. Have you raised any of those with the Department?
4220. Mr Yu: No, not yet. I think that you are aware that we have lobbied Departments like the Department for Employment and Learning (DEL) on the agency worker directive, which gave us a problem. We are in the same situation with this Bill. We also lobbied on the seafarer's regulation and the amendment of the whole race legislation. At the moment, we have so many things in one pot.
4221. We will not let the Department off the hook. Our presentation of evidence to the Committee today is just the starting point. As we have done previously, we will publish a more detailed paper and present that to the Department. We will also circulate that to the Committee.
4222. Mr Douglas: Thanks very much for the presentation. In your paper, you stated that:
- "DWP has indicated that a new residence test will be introduced."*
4223. You went on to state that:
- "Such a test has previously been held to be in breach of EU law".*
4224. Patrick, I think that you said that you endorsed the Law Centre's presentation to the Committee.
4225. Mr Yu: Yes.
4226. Mr Douglas: OK. The Law Centre also raised serious questions about the potential discrimination of migrant workers as a result of paragraph 7 of schedule 1 to the Bill. What is your view on that? Should it go ahead, have you considered some sort of legal challenge to the Bill?
4227. Ms K McLaughlin: I will take up the question on paragraph 7 of schedule 1, and I will leave the question of the legal challenge to Patrick. Was your question about the case that was found to be in breach of EU law?
4228. Mr Douglas: It was about the potential discrimination of migrant workers.
4229. Ms K McLaughlin: The way that it is set up, migrant workers, who would ordinarily not fall within the work-related categories, will now fall within them if such regulations come into effect. It is a cause of concern for us that that power even exists or that even the idea of differential treatment has been set out. Clearly, primary legislation should not set out differences between one group and another. EU social security law is based on the free movement of workers. It allows workers to move from one member state to another, and, equally, workers can move from here to another member state. They should be treated equally. So, that is quite concerning.
4230. Mr Douglas: Are you saying that, as it stands, this is very much a misapplication of EU law?
4231. Ms K McLaughlin: Yes, on the basis of the principle of equal treatment and the free movement of workers.
4232. Mr Yu: We are not worried about the litigation issue now. We are going to our own lawyer to ask. This is what we have indicated as the prima facie cases at the moment. We just give them more detailed legal opinion on how far it may infringe.

4233. As I said, EU law is quite straightforward. All the cardinal rules are already set up by the European Court of Justice. We will see whether the infringement will worry us. The Committee had very good experience of that when it dealt with the seafarers regulations.
4234. Mr Douglas: Jolena, those case studies were very good. Anything like that is very helpful to us. We are going through all the clauses, but it is people's lives we are talking about here.
4235. Ms Flett: We have several case studies to illustrate all the different points. Anything that is needed is available for submission.
4236. Mr F McCann: On the back of what Sammy said, the Equality Commission, the Human Rights Commission and the Citizens Advice all raised the problems that might be faced by ethnic minorities in relation to the Bill. It baffles me that there are clear breaches of European law ahead but DWP and others are still pushing ahead. The difficulty of dealing with an enabling Bill is that the devil will be in the detail. Most of the detail will come in the regulations, and you will probably find that it will be much worse once they start to lay the thing out. Although groups have individually spoken about that, is there a possibility of the groups coming together under the auspices of NICEM?
4237. One of the questions we have asked every organisation was whether they have considered legal action on aspects of the Bill. I would not expect an organisation like yours, with the little resources that you have, to be able to tackle something like that. However, if you joined with the Law Centre, the Human Rights Commission, the Equality Commission and Citizens Advice you could, maybe, launch a united action once the regulations come out, based on all the stuff you said today. Many of the representations that have been made to us show that there is growing concern.
4238. You heard me ask the people from Mencap and Disability Action who were here before — and I have asked the question a number of times at different levels — about how people are treated under the proposed legislation or the old legislation when they go into the offices. That can be related to migrant workers. Sammy is right about the need for clear examples. If there are other examples we can use in evidence or that you can put into evidence, those will be helpful.
4239. Mr Yu: That is very important. We always keep a legal challenge in our minds. It is one of the many options that we should consider. We are highly likely to take a legal challenge in this case, because we are not happy about the whole benefit system. We have a lot of cases. Jolena gave just two examples, but have dealt with more than 4,000 cases on the benefit side alone. Most of those are all about discrimination.
4240. You can see that the process will lead to the commission bringing infringement proceedings. The legislation has not yet come fully into effect. I imagine that the commission is watching the British Government very closely to see how they introduce the legislation. We will keep in contact with the commission and send our assessment to it to see whether it will take any action on the issue. The bigger issue is who should take the legal challenge. There is no doubt that, according to statutory duty, the Human Rights Commission and the Equality Commission have more and more powers, functions and resources. However, we, as a voluntary and community sector, are also very important. Any legal challenge must not be out of context. We need to produce a very good testing case and keep within our remit. You are talking about multi-layer partnership. Each of us does our bit to help the process if the law is not made right.
4241. As I said clearly at the outset, it is very important that the Committee should consider, or raise with the Business Committee, the lack of mechanisms that our Assembly has to scrutinise the Bill to determine whether it is in breach of human rights or equality legislation. I remind the Committee

- that an additional duty applies to the Assembly under section 75. You must make sure that the legislation will not discriminate. You also need to promote equality of opportunity on so many different grounds. This Bill is more or less a wake-up call. That is why it is very important that we should have the scrutiny mechanism. Otherwise, like the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister (OFMDFM), you will have more trouble later because of a law that was forced to pass.
4242. Mr F McCann: Patrick, you are right. As Mickey often quotes, in 2007, this Committee put down amendments challenging the early stages of the Bill. Last Thursday, there was a proposal from this Committee to, under Standing Order 35, suspend the Committee and set up an Ad Hoc Committee to look at the human rights and equality implications of the Bill. It was a deadlocked vote, which meant that it was lost. Yesterday, the Chair mentioned bringing that proposal back to the Committee next week. Do you see that as a way forward in looking at the human rights and equality implications?
4243. We asked the Human Rights Commission representatives yesterday whether they will consider legal action, and they were not as clear as you were. It was the same with the Equality Commission. There needs to be someone to pull all those groups together and say, "We have all said this. How can we deal with it? Rather than having singular cases, let us present a collective case." What do you think about the proposal under Standing Order 35?
4244. Mr Yu: I agree that article 35 is the first step towards rectifying the situation that we face. However, in the long term, we should also have that kind of parliamentary mechanism to properly scrutinise a Bill such as this, which is so important because it affects every section of society. You can imagine that there may be more such legislation in the future for which we will need to give over more time for scrutiny. My gut feeling is that this is quite simple.
- Just like the Human Rights Act, all Departments must attach to Bills their assessments of who will be affected by them. They need to do that before the Bills come to the Committees otherwise Committees will always need to second-guess or seek legal advice before they scrutinise Bills, and I do not think that that is fair to members.
4245. Mr Brady: Thanks very much for the informative presentation. What Karen said bears out that the Welfare Reform Bill was formulated in Britain with complete disregard for European law. European law is legally binding. If this legislation goes ahead, and the draft regulations and guidelines have yet to come, there will, without doubt, be legal challenges. Patrick makes a practical point by asking who has the resources to do that. I am sure that larger organisations will come together to bring legal cases, because, as you said, the Bill contravenes various European laws. Britain just seems to have flouted EU law in pursuit of the ideology on which the legislation is predicated. We talked about invoking Standing Order 25 to set up an Ad Hoc Committee, but that is another discussion.
4246. I was interested to see Citizens' Advice's proposed amendment to clause 24(7), which makes special provisions for victims of domestic violence. It wants that provision to be extended to those who suffer hate crimes and have to be rehoused. The wording is relevant to you and states:
- "For the purposes of subsection (7)...'hate crime' has such meaning as may be prescribed and shall include grounds of ethnicity, sexual orientation, gender identity, religion, political opinion or disability".*
4247. The proposed amendment continues by explaining that a:
- "'victim of hate crime' shall be defined by regulations under subsection (7)...'resulting in a need to be rehoused' shall be defined in regulations".*
4248. It goes in to say that the amended provision will apply to a person who has "recently been a victim" of hate crime.

A lot of hate crime is racially motivated throughout the North, not just in Belfast and other places. It has happened in my constituency and in others. Provision for victims of hate crime could reasonably be enshrined in clause 24 in particular because domestic violence is seen as something that needs to be addressed, and hate crime is no different. What is your view on that?

4249. Ms K McLaughlin: Picking up on the point that was made about EU law: I reiterate that infringement proceedings have been ongoing for a year in relation to the right to reside and those proceedings do not seem to have fazed the drafting of the Bill. So, there is a clear disregard.
4250. Mr Yu: Before we go to Jolena, I would like to say that this is a very complex issue. I think that your intention to protect that grouping is good. Jolena will give you more practical examples. In the end, people are being excluded, or they will relocate to England instead of staying here, because they feel that enough is enough.
4251. Ms Flett: Obviously, any further protection for victims of hate crime is welcome. There is also a lot to be said on the interpretation of who is a victim of hate crime, the under-reporting of hate crime and the police failure to report hate crimes as such. That is another discussion. If that line is to be followed, then a lot of work must be done on who falls into the hate crime category, how it is interpreted, and what the guidelines will be. There needs to be training and more understanding in the Departments about what a hate crime is and how it is reported.
4252. Mr Brady: I wanted to flag that up because I agree that it is a very complex issue and can vary from individual to individual.
4253. You talked about the right of residence. Habitual residence was introduced by the Tories in 1995 by Peter Lilley and was pure xenophobia. There was no other reason or logic to it because it contravened European Union law.

However, it is interesting that the majority of people affected are people who were born here and lived here, went to America or Australia or wherever to work and came back. It is such a nebulous concept, because you could be here for a week and be accepted by the Department as being habitually resident and somebody else in another office could decide that it is three months, because the case law states that the longer you are here, the more habitually resident you become. That needs to be addressed.

4254. Ms K McLaughlin: Definitely. That is the issue that we have with the two-year rule. In the South, they had a two-year rule, which had to be rowed back from because it was simply in breach of EU law. Any move towards that would be silly because it will be open to legal challenge immediately and will be an easily won case. It will draw out the process and lead to litigation costs for the Government.
4255. Mr Yu: Another implication is that, once you infringe EU law, that part of the law will be void immediately, and there will be consequences for the implementation of the programme.
4256. The Chairperson: I thank members. Are there any additional points, Karen, Patrick or Jolena, that you need to put to the Committee before the session ends?
4257. Mr Yu: I want to raise a little bit of detail about the programme. Karen briefly mentioned indirect and direct discrimination. Part of the programme in the future will involve the use of online applications, and you are aware that such applications will exclude a lot of people. I tried to highlight that more than 65% of migrants from the EU cannot speak any English. How could they apply for benefit? A second element of the online application process is that a person must have a bank account. You are aware that we have anti-terrorist legislation, and that if a person wants to open a bank account, he or she needs to reside here for six months and show that they have a residence requirement and ID for that purpose. In particular,

- if the person does not have a tenancy, they will not get a bank account. A former colleague of mine from NICEM worked in Brussels for four or five years and then came back. She resided here before and has all the bank records, but she cannot get a bank account until at least six months have passed. As you can see, this is the trouble.
4258. Most migrants from the EU work in meat-processing plants, and quite a lot are agency workers. I highlighted the same issue to the Committee for Employment and Learning, and there was a formal investigation by the Equality and Human Rights Commission in GB into the meat-processing industry. One effect is that there is multi-layered exploitation. One layer is that employers give people cheques but know that they can never cash them. They ask people to become self-employed and give them cheques. A lot of people then become doubly exploited. If they try to cash the money, they need to go to the Western Union, where they will pay a certain interest rate or fee in order to do so. As you can imagine, such people are very low paid already, so that kind of exploitation system is created. If you do not have the language and a bank account, and cannot apply for one, there is both direct and indirect discrimination due to language and the barriers created.
4259. As well as ethnic minorities, you also have the vulnerable groups of people who are illiterate. We came across some Chinese people who can speak with a very good local accent but who cannot read or write. That group will most likely be in the benefit system. So, you will be excluding not only the ethnic minority but also those in the margins. You should think about how to improve the programme otherwise there will be a lot of legal challenges.
4260. The Chairperson: Thank you very much for your written presentation and for your contribution today. You will understand that you have raised a number of issues with us, not least the last couple of points regarding potential direct and indirect forms of discrimination arising from the Bill. You gave us a number of case examples, and Karen gave us some more fulsome responses on that matter. You will have also determined from members' questions and other submissions that a range of concerns has been raised by others as well as those that you have raised this afternoon. It is very important that we receive concerns that are confirmed by a spectrum of organisations.
4261. Thank you for your invaluable contribution, which will help us to scrutinise the Bill to the best of our ability. We look forward to completing our report by 27 November under the current schedule. Your contribution has been a big help to us in understanding the Bill and its consequences, and it will help to shape our response when we come to the clause-by-clause scrutiny.
4262. Again, thank you very much, and we look forward to continuing our discussion with you in due course.

4263. Ms Anne McCleary (Department for Social Development): Thank you for giving us this opportunity to go through the Bill and provide you with further information. As you can see, there are quite a few officials here today, and I am taking a back seat at this stage. You will be familiar with Colm McLaughlin, Martina Campbell and Michael Pollock, who will take you through the document in relation to universal credit and the working age benefits.

4264. We also want to thank all the stakeholders who took the time and trouble to respond to your call for evidence. The amount of time that they have put into all this, the amount of time that the Committee has allocated to it, and the amount of time that the Committee has spent on this has been quite significant. We have listened very carefully to everything that has been said, and we are still working through the written submissions. We recognise the scale and depth of the concern that has been expressed by stakeholders, but we also recognise that there is a degree of confusion in some sectors. We want to advise the Committee and the stakeholders that the Social Security Agency (SSA) has a communications plan — I know that there have been some concerns about that — and there have been a number of events for stakeholders and more are planned, including one aimed at employers, which is to explain the role in relation to the real time information. A lot of that is ongoing, and a lot more is planned. In particular, there is the event in the Long Gallery coming up later this month.

4265. We understand and acknowledge that much of the detail will be in the regulations or in the guidance that is provided to SSA staff. Where possible, we will try to give you reassurance on that, and we will see where that takes us. That is all that I want to say at this stage. I hand you over to Martina and the team.

4266. Mr F McCann: The question of reassurances from the Department came up time and time again last week. At the start of the process, you talked about seeking and getting reassurances from the Department at this stage, in the absence of being able to look at the regulations. People seem to indicate that the regulations could dramatically change the workings of some of the stuff that we are talking about. Will the reassurances that we may be given today be changed or affected by regulations?

4267. Mr Michael Pollock (Department for Social Development): I would not have thought so. In going through the Bill quickly, we have explained the policy intent, and that would be the intent that we want to see coming through in the regulations. If there is an unwarranted outcome as a result of some of the regulations, we would not be happy about that either. If we are telling you now that a particular clause is designed to do something, we want to see that translated through into the regulations. What was said previously was that, following Final Stage in the Assembly, we will try to share regulations — any of the regulations that have been drafted through the Department for Work and Pensions (DWP) — with you in advance of our own regulations coming through. We will try to share with you anything that is in the public domain so that you will have longer to go through and scrutinise them before we bring ours forward.

4268. Ms Martina Campbell (Department for Social Development): In our responses to the questions raised during the various evidence sessions that we have attended, we have stated, where the regulations are available, the relevant regulation in the DWP published version. As you know, the DWP regulations have gone to the Social Security Advisory Committee (SSAC), and it has responded to DWP with a list of comments and recommendations. DWP is working through those. There may be a slight tweak to the regulations, but that would be only in response to the recommendations made by SSAC, which would obviously mirror concerns in the Committee and among stakeholders.

4269. Mr F McCann: I have no doubt that you are trying to guide us through the regulations as far as you know them at this stage. I noticed that you mentioned SSAC. There have been a number of occasions in the past when SSAC made recommendations that came down in opposition to elements of the Bill — the shared-room allowance was one — and its advice was disregarded. I think that somebody from the Law Centre sits on SSAC. The Law Centre representatives said that the devil was in the detail of the regulations. The Human Rights Commission, the Equality Commission and a number of other groups were asked whether they were considering taking legal action, but they said that they could not, based on what was in front of them. The main thrust of this will come in the regulations. So, there seemed to be an indication that although the main thrust of the Bill points in one direction, the regulations, when they are published, may take us in another direction. We will not know that until December.

4270. The Chairperson: OK. The point has been put on the record as an issue. [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] We will start with the document that we have in front of us. Part 1 deals with universal credit. [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] Obviously, as we go through this with the departmental officials, this is our best guess at what the outstanding matters are for response from the Department. I will hand over to Martina and her colleagues.

4271. Ms M Campbell: We will start with clauses 1 and 2 and the issues of frequency of payment, the recipient of the payment and the direct housing costs payment. I will take points 1 to 4 in the issues paper together.

4272. In his statement of 22 October, the Minister clearly stated that he has secured flexibilities from Lord Freud and that the outworkings of that in relation to the definition of exceptional circumstances and the circumstances in which those flexibilities will be operated will be consulted on. In our evidence sessions, we told you that the legislation as drafted allows for those flexibilities in exceptional circumstances.

4273. The first way forward, on page 2 of the issues paper, says:

“The Committee may wish to consider if it is content with this approach or if it wishes to pursue the potential for twice monthly payments ... as an option for all claimants”.

4274. Again, I remind the Committee of the overall policy intent, which is that the purpose of universal credit is to get claimants used to going back into the world of work. The monthly payment mimics what happens for the vast majority of people, according to the stats that we use, who receive a salary monthly.

4275. As I have said, there will be an exceptional service for claimants who are deemed to be vulnerable. There will also be a range of budgeting products, to which I have also referred. We have given you more detail about those products in our responses. We will be doing all that we can to support claimants who receive a monthly payment to manage their money on a monthly basis and, indeed, those claimants for whom a monthly payment is not appropriate at this time.
4276. Do you have any questions about that, Chairperson?
4277. The Chairperson: I just want to establish a point for the record, Martina, because we are not debating any of these provisions at the moment. In his statement to the Assembly, the Minister made it clear that the default position will be that payments for rent support will go directly to landlords.
4278. Ms M Campbell: Yes, that is correct.
4279. The Chairperson: Although, as you rightly point out, the Bill provides for such payments to go on, the Minister's announcement also dealt with establishing a board or whatever else to have a look at all that. What was agreed with Lord Freud — I spoke to David Freud after that as well — was that there would be an examination of what the nature of the payments might be within the facility of particular circumstances. There is no default mechanism for more frequent payments or split payments.
4280. I am just putting this on the record. There is a default position that rent support will go directly to a landlord.
4281. Ms M Campbell: Directly to landlords, unless they opt out.
4282. The Chairperson: Whereas the issue around more frequent payments or split payments, whatever they may be, in detail, is not at a default position. It will be in the core legislation by way of exceptional circumstances, but the detail of that is to be agreed.
4283. Ms M Campbell: Yes. That is correct.
4284. The Chairperson: I am just getting that for the record. Michael, did you want to ask a question?
4285. Mr Copeland: I just wanted to check whether that gave landlords the right to insist on getting payment from tenants in a particular way. In other words, a landlord taking on a new tenant could say that he wanted paid directly, whereas the tenant may wish to accord with the policy intent, as indicated in the clause.
4286. Mr Colm McLaughlin (Department for Social Development): In relation to a landlord requesting it from the claimant himself, the claimant would have to come to the Department if the norm for him was that he wanted it paid directly to himself.
4287. Mr Copeland: The thing about exceptional circumstances, Colm, is that someone has to make their mind up about what exceptional circumstances are. What may be exceptional circumstances for the customer may not be for the Department.
4288. The Chairperson: The default position is that the rent will be paid directly to the landlord, unless the tenant opts out of that.
4289. Mr Pollock: Do not lose sight of the fact that it is the individual who is entitled to the payment, not the landlord.
4290. Mr G Campbell: I wanted to make sure that there is no distinction between what the Minister said and what Martina said. In paragraph 1, headed "Frequency of Payment", the Minister's statement is cited, beginning:
"In the majority of cases there will be a single monthly payment".
Martina used the phrase, "the vast majority".
4291. Ms M Campbell: Yes, except where there are exceptional circumstances and the claimant wants it paid in a different way.
4292. Mr G Campbell: Yes. However, you have no idea, at this stage, what will - constitute “the majority of cases” or “the vast majority of cases”: whether it will be 55% or 95%?

4293. Ms M Campbell: No; we have no stats on that.
4294. Mr G Campbell: Not yet. Right, OK.
4295. Mr F McCann: At present, what happens is that there is an opt-out on the back of the housing benefit form, which states that you can get it paid directly to the landlord, or you can receive it yourself. I think that that provision already exists in applications for housing benefit. I take it, from what the Minister says, that that is not going to change?
4296. Ms M Campbell: This is a new IT system, so it was originally designed that the payment would go directly to the claimant. That is a part of the outworkings of the Minister’s statement. We are trying to get it built into the IT system that there may be an option.
4297. Mr F McCann: I was offering that as a point of clarification. However, you have raised the subject of the IT system. If it is not capable of doing that, there will not be that option. Is that what you are saying?
4298. Ms M Campbell: No. We are saying that Lord Freud has committed to making that change for Northern Ireland.
4299. The Chairperson: There are two issues in all that for me. One is that there is an IT system, and, two, there is the political decision to make the payment by whatever way. For me, the IT system should follow what the Government decide that they are going to do. The IT system should not dictate it; it should be the other way around.
4300. Ms M Campbell: Yes.
4301. The Chairperson: OK, so the decision has been taken that payments for rent will be paid directly to the tenant, unless the tenant opts out. However, that is not the case in respect of universal credit, in any which way. It will be paid according to the determination of exceptional circumstances.
4302. Ms M Campbell: Yes: the split payment and frequency.
4303. The Chairperson: That is to be agreed at some point and further consulted on. That is not a default position. That is still in special circumstances.
4304. Mrs Cochrane: I was just going to ask about the phrase “where necessary”. The document cites the Minister’s statement:
“payment flexibilities will allow for different payment arrangements where necessary, not least where vulnerable customers will find budgeting difficult.”
4305. At what point will we know what the definition is? Who will be defined as being one of those people?
4306. Ms M Campbell: The Minister has tasked officials with consulting on that issue and what defines an exceptional circumstance.
4307. Mrs Cochrane: Will that come to us before we are supposed to have finished our report?
4308. Ms M Campbell: Probably not.
4309. Mrs Cochrane: We would need to decide whether we would want to amend that. We might not be happy with how it is defined.
4310. Ms M Campbell: I appreciate that. I would say that that work will not be completed by the end of November.
4311. The Chairperson: I want to remind members that this paper was provided by the Committee Clerk as a help. We do not need to deal today with the part on the way forward. We are not dealing with the way forward, because those are considerations, which, obviously, will have to be looked at. We are still trying to clarify that we all understand what the Bill is about. Ignore the part on the way forward, because that is for another discussion. Once we have all of this, we can seek some understanding and clarification.
4312. Mr Brady: I would like some clarity. Paragraph 3, which deals with regularity of payment, states:

- “only the most ‘vulnerable’ (however defined) will be eligible for split/twice monthly payments.”*
4313. If we start with the premise that everybody on benefit is vulnerable, to a larger or lesser degree, who makes the decision about who the most vulnerable are? Who defines that?
4314. Ms M Campbell: The consultation, which the Minister has committed to undertake, will define the criteria for exceptions, and the decision will ultimately lie with the decision-maker.
4315. Mr Brady: So they will define some kind of vulnerability pecking order?
4316. Ms M Campbell: The criteria will be defined in consultation with stakeholders.
4317. Mr Pollock: There will not necessarily be a pecking order, as such.
4318. The Chairperson: That is as per the announcement from the Minister. All that detail will have to be worked out.
4319. Ms M Campbell: Paragraph 5 deals with who makes a claim. Clause 2 makes provision for a member of a couple to make a claim as a single person, but that is to be defined in regulations. The Committee has heard from stakeholders that, where one member of a couple refuses to sign a claimant commitment, they would like the option for the member who is willing to sign the commitment to be able to make a claim in their own right. That is currently not permitted in the legislation. The legislative position is that both members of the couple must sign the claimant commitment. If one member of the couple does not sign the claimant commitment, there will be what we are terming a cooling-off period, and, obviously, they will be encouraged to re-engage and make their claim on that fashion.
4320. The Chairperson: So, Martina, beyond what may be a cooling-off period — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.]
4321. Ms M Campbell: There is no claim.
4322. The Chairperson: There is no claim. OK. Do members understand that?
- Members indicated assent.*
4323. The Chairperson: There is nothing further on that.
4324. Ms M Campbell: Paragraph 6 deals with third-party verification. We heard from a lot of stakeholders that homeless people in particular might not have the documentation available to them to enable them to have their verification completed. We will definitely consider that issue, but we think it is probably unlikely that the system would permit third-party verification. However, we will discuss that with Conrad McConnell, the fraud policy lead. He may be able to give the Committee more clarification on that tomorrow or Thursday, when we are back.
4325. The Chairperson: So that is a deferral.
4326. Ms M Campbell: Paragraph 7 deals with mixed-age couples. I think there is some confusion here. I want to clarify that where one partner in a mixed-age couple is under pension age and the other is over pension age, they will have to make a claim for universal credit for new claims. In those circumstances, only the working-age member of the couple will have to complete a claimant commitment. We would not expect the member of the couple who is over pension age to complete a claimant commitment. That is in line with government policy that working-age people should be encouraged and supported into work where they are fit and able to do so.
4327. There was an issue in respect of the impact on passported benefits. As I have said previously, the issue of passported benefits is under consideration by a cross-departmental group. All these issues and the criteria for defining passported benefits and access to passported benefits will be considered by the individual Department that owns the passported benefit.
4328. Mr F McCann: There was no confusion from the Committee. The Committee

- understood perfectly that the change in the benefit would mean that the older person would have to rely on the younger person to make the claim. The argument from the Committee at that time was that it is unfair that a person who has worked all their life and is in a partnership with a younger person would lose out because the younger person would assume the lead role in a claim for benefit because they are working. I do not think that there was any confusion from the Committee. We were raising concerns that this could have a direct impact on the relationship. I just wanted to make that point.
4329. The Chairperson: Was the issue not that some organisation — it might have been the Law Centre — made the point that it was not clear about whether a person over pension age who has a joint claim with someone of working age would have to join the workforce. We are now being told that that is not the case; is that right? That was a query from a number of organisations. Do you have a further query, Fra?
4330. Mr F McCann: I thought that we were still being told that it would have to be the younger person who makes the claim. That would have a direct knock-on effect on the older person in the relationship who, until they reached pension age, would have had to make the claim themselves.
4331. Mr C McLaughlin: The younger person would claim for both.
4332. Mr F McCann: If the older person in the relationship hits 65 or 66, whereas normally they would claim, this pulls them back into the system because the young person will be making the claim in their place. Therefore, there would be a net loss for the people in that relationship.
4333. Mr C McLaughlin: The younger person is of working age. The work-related activity, actively-seeking-work and available-for-work regulations are appropriate only to the person who is of working age.
4334. The Chairperson: Is there any adverse impact on the older person in that situation?
4335. Mr C McLaughlin: No.
4336. Mr F McCann: So they would still be able to claim for their old-age pension in their own right?
4337. Ms M Campbell: Yes. When they reach state pension age, they will be able to claim pension. That will be taken as unearned income.
4338. Mr F McCann: That is not what I picked up.
4339. Mr Pollock: You thought that the younger person has to claim the pension on behalf of the older person.
4340. Mr F McCann: Yes.
4341. Mr Pollock: I do not think that that is the case.
4342. Mr F McCann: If the younger person in the relationship has to claim for both people, that has to have a knock-on effect on the older person in the relationship. That is the point that I am making.
4343. The Chairperson: Yes. I thought that what we were being told is that the younger person in the couple would have to make the claim.
4344. Ms M Campbell: The younger person has to make the claim.
4345. The Chairperson: On behalf of both of them?
4346. Ms M Campbell: Yes.
4347. The Chairperson: The older person does not have to meet the job commitments, and so on?
4348. Ms M Campbell: No.
4349. The Chairperson: Is there any other adverse impact on the older person, in respect of passported benefits for example?
4350. Mr F McCann: In respect of finance and pension benefits?
4351. Mr Brady: On that point, presumably their income will be aggregated, so if the older person is entitled to contributory state pension, that is OK, but,

- presumably, for the younger person, the number of hours they work could then impact on the overall benefit coming in. If the younger person is eligible for universal credit, or the whole claim is eligible for universal credit, the older person is going to be subject to the tapers, depending on what the younger person is doing. Inevitably, it has to have an impact. You cannot divorce, and hopefully they will not in some cases, according to what Fra is saying. The point I am making is that it has to have an impact. You cannot say it does not. It is inevitable that it will have an impact, because they will not be making separate claims. That is the point. So it will inevitably have an impact. It will depend very much on what the younger person is doing. If, for instance, the younger person is sanctioned, how does that impact on the older person? The younger person is the one who is going to be subject to all the rules and regulations under universal credit. Again, I go back to the phrase “inextricably linked in benefit terms”. You cannot get away from that. So it is going to have an impact.
4352. Ms M Campbell: We will have another look and come back to the Committee on impact.
4353. The Chairperson: I am a wee bit concerned, Martina, to be honest with you, because I asked a direct question twice about whether there would be an adverse impact, and I was told that there would not. I am concerned that now, on further investigation, I am getting different responses. I just want to say that. I do not want to repeat it again, so I will leave it at that for now. Do you want to move on?
4354. Ms M Campbell: The next paragraph is related to temporary absences from Northern Ireland. The proposed change allows for temporary absences of between one month and 26 weeks, depending on circumstances. Stakeholders have raised some concerns that there may be some disadvantage compared with the existing rules. That issue is under consideration
- by DWP, so we cannot give a definitive position on that.
4355. The Chairperson: Is there any particular reason? It was raised by some stakeholders. Do you have any indication as to what the consideration by DWP will be based on?
4356. Ms M Campbell: I think it is being reconsidered based on some of the comments arising from SSAC.
4357. The Chairperson: OK.
4358. Ms M Campbell: Paragraph 9 deals with under-16-year-olds and under-17-year-olds. Under the current rules, 16- and 17-year-olds are entitled to payments made on a discretionary basis where severe hardship occurs within job seeker’s allowance (JSA). Under the new rules, it is proposed that there will be no such provision. In terms of the Northern Ireland Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders (NIACRO) point about people who are registered for training but have not secured an immediate placement, again, DWP’s position is that those people will not be entitled to any payment. We have sought further clarification on that from DWP, but the initial indications are that that will be the position, unless, obviously, they are a lone parent, or are leaving care, or one of the types of exceptions that are already defined.
4359. Mr G Campbell: Numbers-wise, do you have any idea of how many people might fall into that category?
4360. Ms M Campbell: No, I do not think we have any numbers on that, but I will check that for you.
4361. Mr Brady: I want to check something. You mentioned lone parents, etc. At the moment, child benefit is a qualifying benefit, so if the parent is receiving child benefit, the child or young person is still dependent. That can lead on to the issue of estrangement from the family household — not kids coming out of care or whatever, but —
4362. Ms M Campbell: That exception is still there. If there is no parental

- support, they are still entitled. The next paragraph is entitled, “Receiving Education”. The definitions are in the regulations and are similar to the position now. So anybody on income support who gets benefit now whilst in education will continue to do so, as those rules are being carried forward. We are not aware of any disadvantage there.
4363. With regard to the tariff income provision in clause 5, there has been a suggestion that it will impact on older claimants who have savings over the £16,000 limit, and we are aware that there will be an impact. We have not been able to assess that impact, because the sample size for Northern Ireland is too small. However, DWP has done some work on that, which we can provide copies of to the Committee. We realise that there will be an impact, but we go back to the overall policy intent, which is that the benefits are for people who are in need: those who have savings and are able to maintain themselves should do so. The benefit is only there for when people need it.
4364. Mr Brady: Another effect will be predicated on the passported benefits because, for a lot of people, a tariff income will qualify them for a small amount of benefit, which will bring them in. So I do not know how the passported benefits will operate, because, for the majority of older people, even that small amount of benefit — 4365. Ms M Campbell: It gets them access, yes. I appreciate that.
4366. Mr Brady: That is important, and I wanted to flag that up because the number of older people who have that kind of money is relatively small.
4367. Ms M Campbell: From memory, DWP research found that it was one in five.
4368. Mr Brady: There would be a much more drastic impact if the passported benefits were affected.
4369. Ms M Campbell: Yes, absolutely. That is why it will be important that Departments, when they come to define their criteria for passported benefits, take into account all those factors.
4370. Mr Brady: The difficulty is that it will still then go back to the amount of capital. At the moment, for people on pension credit, it is open-ended, which is a much more effective way of ensuring that older people have access to passported benefits. To me, this measure is a way of stopping that.
4371. Ms M Campbell: I might be able to get the figure for cost of raising that for older people to you tomorrow — I thought I had the information with me. I think, from memory, it was something like £50 million.
4372. Mr Brady: Maybe you could supply us with the figure.
4373. Ms M Campbell: I will have it for tomorrow.
4374. Mr Brady: Thank you.
4375. Ms M Campbell: Clause 6 is entitled, “Restrictions on entitlement”, and should be read in conjunction with clause 8. It is about the number of waiting days. The clause states that the regulations may prescribe that the period of waiting does not exceed seven days. That does not mean that the number of waiting days is seven, it just means that we cannot prescribe the number of waiting days to be seven, if that makes sense. It states that a period prescribed “may not exceed” seven days. The purpose of that is to administer the benefit. There are waiting days in benefits, and where a person is only entitled to universal credit for one or two days and the amount is small, where the administrative cost is more to pay that out, the payment will not be made. The Department reserves the right not to make the payment.
4376. Mr Brady: At present, if someone is entitled to 10p, the Department legally has to pay them that, because it could impact on other things. For instance, we are back to passported benefits. Even if it is a miniscule amount, it could still bring them in.

4377. Ms M Campbell: Yes, but there should be something in the award notice that gives them that underlying entitlement.
4378. Mr Brady: Obviously, that is in the future. We will check that through the regulations.
4379. Ms M Campbell: Through the regulations and through the passported benefits.
4380. Mr Brady: You are saying that it could be seven days; it could be three days.
4381. Ms M Campbell: Yes. It is highly unlikely that it will be. Generally, they are saying that a payment for less than seven days is unlikely.
4382. Mr Brady: What you are saying is that that is an administrative difficulty of the Department. It is making a unilateral decision. It may cost us money administratively to pay that. The claimant is losing out. The Department is not losing out. It is making that kind of decision because it may cost it money.
4383. Ms M Campbell: It is about the cost to the taxpayer as well.
4384. Mr Brady: It is all a cost to the taxpayer. The point is that the person who is on benefit is still entitled to benefit, and they are also entitled to the passported benefits that that miniscule amount may bring them into. That is a matter for discussion. I just wanted to flag that up.
4385. Ms M Campbell: Next is the basis of awards, which is dealt with in clause 7. The issue is about monthly payments, and so on. We have already covered that.
4386. The Chairperson: Members, that is in your CBC folder. By CBC, I mean clause by clause, not a new digital channel.
4387. Ms M Campbell: Clause 8 concerns calculation of awards. This is about benefit cap. Citizens Advice raised an issue about statutory sick pay and statutory maternity pay. It said that the first six months should be categorised as earnings. The proposal is that they will be treated as earnings.
4388. There are different rates for younger people, and this is the same as the position in the current system. Younger people will receive lower rates, and that is proportionate and justifiable because younger people have expectations of lower wages and are more than likely to live at home and have fewer expenses.
4389. The Chairperson: There is a reference to the fact that the potential restriction of EU jobseekers to standard allowance may be unlawful. There is a general sense around EU people, and that has been referred to on a number of occasions as being quite discriminatory. That is one point, and other points might arise later.
4390. Ms M Campbell: I will cover that now. People from within the EU are free to come to live and work in any country and enjoy the benefits. However, they are not entitled to be supported by the benefits system unless they are working or actively seeking work. To be entitled to universal credit, you have to have a right to reside and be habitually resident. EU workers have a right to reside if they are not seeking work or are a student, but they must be self-sufficient. This is a way of testing that EU workers are actively seeking work by putting them in the all-work requirement so that they are proving their right to reside and receive benefits.
4391. Mr Brady: I have a couple of questions. There is an assumption that younger people, or people under 25 — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] There has always been a bone of contention — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] — the difference between someone who is 24 years and 364 days and someone who — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] The other thing is the self-employed. A lot of self-employed people who have small businesses — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] Would the minimum amount be based on the minimum wage and would it be predicated on people — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.]
4392. Ms M Campbell: The minimum income floor rate has not been decided yet. That will be in the autumn statement.

- However, all the indications are that it will be based on the national minimum wage, which is £6·19 an hour.
4393. Mr Brady: That would make more sense, because that applies in Britain and here, the argument being — 4394. Ms M Campbell: Not the median wage.
4395. Mr Brady: OK. You will earn less than £7 an hour.
4396. The Chairperson: We have had a response around EU stuff.
4397. Ms M Campbell: I also point out that the Bill has a slightly different wording to GB, in that we have tweaked it. Paragraph 7(a) of schedule 1 states “asserts a right to reside”, rather than the GB legislation, which contains the wording “has a right to reside”. There is a slight difference, in that ours is slightly less onerous.
4398. The Chairperson: Less onerous or less obligatory. I do not have the Oxford English Dictionary here, but someone who has a right and someone who asserts a right — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] People may assert that right but they may not have that right. [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.]
4399. Mr C McLaughlin: In the GB legislation — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] We investigate it anyway. It clarifies the investigation process.
4400. The Chairperson: Where is right to establish — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] Do you investigate?
4401. Mr C McLaughlin: We investigate.
4402. The Chairperson: [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.]
4403. Mr C McLaughlin: And he has a right — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.]
4404. The Chairperson: [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.]
4405. Mr C McLaughlin: [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] — get the evidence to ensure that he has a right.
4406. The Chairperson: Why would the Department — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.]
4407. Mr C McLaughlin: [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] — clarification, more or less. [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] Investigation mechanism has to take place to find out whether he has a right or not.
4408. The Chairperson: [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.]
4409. Mr Pollock: [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.]
4410. The Chairperson: [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.]
4411. Mr C McLaughlin: There has to be evidence or proof that a person has a right to reside — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.]
4412. The Chairperson: To put it to you another way — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.]
4413. Ms M Campbell: We will write to you further on that.
4414. Mr Brady: [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] Will that change with the right to reside? If you assert the right to reside, you have to prove it. In that sense, it is a two-sided coin: you have to prove to the Department that you have the right to reside and the Department accepts that. It used to be that if you wanted to prove habitual residence, you had to show that you were on the housing list and show your passport and your aeroplane ticket if you were coming from America or Australia. You would also have to have your kids registered in schools. That was all proof that you were here to stay, rather than coming over for a month’s holiday and heading back. I suppose what I am asking is whether that will be more clearly defined.
4415. Mr C McLaughlin: Habitual residence?
4416. Mr Brady: Yes.

4417. Mr C McLaughlin: It will be the same. A person will still be able to come here and provide evidence after two weeks that he is going to be a habitual resident.
4418. Mr Brady: At the moment, one office could decide that two weeks is enough for it to accept your claim while another could make another decision. The Newry office could decide that it is two weeks, the Banbridge office could decide that it is four weeks and the Lisburn office could decide that it is three months.
4419. Mr C McLaughlin: It depends on the circumstances of each individual case and what evidence is produced to the decision-maker. For example, if people register their children in a school and register with a doctor, that would provide a lot more evidence a lot more quickly that they are habitually resident.
4420. Mr Brady: With the European Union stuff, someone has the right to reside here for work. Some people who are not from the accession countries, such as those from Romania, have the right to reside here, but they do not have the right to access public funds. Therefore, there are all sorts of permutations around that. I think that that needs to be clarified by the Department in the guidelines, as opposed to necessarily the regulations. You need to clarify all that.
4421. Mr Pollock: In the guidelines that are given to decision-makers, it was never the intent that there would be anomalous situations.
4422. Mr Brady: Anomalous situations are prevailing at the moment.
4423. Mr Pollock: Part of the underlying trend of the Welfare Reform Bill is to simplify things —
4424. Mr Brady: Allegedly.
4425. Mr Pollock: — so that claimants know what is required of them, and, in turn, that the decision-makers and everybody else should be able to apply the rules consistently.
4426. Mr Brady: I want to flag that up, Chair. It is a bone of contention with a number of people, and it will continue to be so unless it is dealt with.
4427. Ms M Campbell: We will write to you and try to provide further clarification on that one.
4428. Moving on to the calculation of awards, I do not have anything in my version, so I am looking at the clause-by-clause stuff. Sorry, that is about the different rates, and we have done that.
4429. Clause 10 deals with the responsibility for children and young people. There is a concern that, under the new arrangements, families with a disabled child may see a reduction in the disability element of their child tax credit from £54 to £27 a week. If they are in receipt of child tax credits, they will have transitional protection when they transport on to universal credit. Therefore, there should be no disadvantage. The whole reason that the disability premiums are being reconfigured is to bring them more into line. There will also be higher disregard for disabled people within the earnings disregard. That is probably all that I want to say on that.
4430. Mr Brady: I know what you are saying about someone who already gets it.
4431. Ms M Campbell: Transitional.
4432. Mr Brady: That will obviously affect people who come on to benefits.
4433. Ms M Campbell: Yes.
4434. Mr Brady: The rationale from the Government appears to be that by cutting it from £54 a week to £27 a week —
4435. Ms M Campbell: There will be two rates. The £27 is the lower rate.
4436. Mr Brady: That will spread it wider. However, really, that misses the point. It is about the degree of disability. That is the issue, Although there is transitional protection, it will be the people who come on to benefits who are going to be affected. By spreading it, you are not necessarily helping. If the child is disabled, families may lose out. That is the issue, and that is what the - stakeholders were arguing, reasonably in those circumstances.

4437. Ms M Campbell: That point is noted.
4438. Mr F McCann: On the back of that, Martina, you said that people will be transported. However, if there is a break in their benefit, that will impact on them just as if it is a new claim. What the people said to us last week was that, over time, that will come into effect. Over time, benefits will change, so there will be an impact on people's benefits.
4439. Ms M Campbell: I do not think that we have ever denied that there will be some winners and some losers. That will inevitably be the case. What we have to look at is what we can do to mitigate that. The whole point of this is to try to make the system simpler and fairer, not only for the claimant but for the taxpayer. There needs to be some work done on that. As far as I know — I will confirm it tomorrow — DWP has committed to undertaking a review of the disability rates in 2015, when there will be enough evidence to show whether the action has achieved the intended aim.
4440. Mr F McCann: The point that Mickey and I are making is that as this rolls out over time, everybody will eventually be affected by what people have said to us: a lower amount of benefit will be paid to people. There will be that transitional protection, but, as your benefits change, the payments that you get will change along with that.
4441. Ms M Campbell: I accept that point. There are elements in the award that are supposed to mitigate that. There will be higher earnings disregards, and the taper is more generous. In the published equality impact assessment (EQIA), the incentives to work are higher for disabled people than for non-disabled.
4442. Mr Brady: The only question would then be whether there are incentives for an employer to employ them.
4443. Ms M Campbell: That is different. You are into employment equality legislation. That has nothing to do with the Bill.
4444. Mr Brady: I understand.
4445. Mr G Campbell: You said that DWP would be conducting a review.
4446. Ms M Campbell: I think so. I will confirm that tomorrow for you.
4447. Mr G Campbell: If that is the case, what automaticity or otherwise would there be in any outcome of a review that DWP conducts into the impact that we find in Northern Ireland? Would there be a degree, or would the Minister just review the outcome of that review?
4448. Ms M Campbell: I think that we would probably seek to be part of that study in the same way as we were part of the Harrington review. Obviously, we would seek to influence it here. The Minister may decide to do a similar review, which would feed into the DWP one, but it probably makes more sense from a cost-effectiveness point of view that we be part of its study. DWP would bear the bulk of the cost of the review, and we would feed in.
4449. The Chairperson: OK. Thank you for that.
4450. Ms M Campbell: Clause 11 concerns housing costs. It is on the underoccupancy stuff. There is a suggestion to defer the general implementation of the clause until there is a sufficient supply of appropriate housing stock. That is not an option. Housing division colleagues are conducting a number of pieces of research that will inform this. An interdepartmental group, made up of the Housing Executive, the Council for the Homeless and other stakeholders, is looking at how we can manage the outworkings.
4451. Mr Pollock: The outcome of some of the research is probably due very shortly. A cost is attached to all the options to defer or delay. We have some figures. I cannot find them in the myriad papers, but I will come back to you if you have not already received them by way of our responses. Significant amounts are attached to not implementing the underoccupancy provision. Some safeguards have been mentioned in the past, such as discretionary

- house payments. Obviously, individual circumstances and things like that will be taken into account. Members raised concerns about the segregated society still in Northern Ireland. All of that has to be factored into the implementation.
4452. The Chairperson: Before I bring in Fra, I want to ask about two things that are on the minds of members. The first was the Housing Executive's presentation, in which its representatives talked about the need to balance the implications of the Welfare Reform Bill as drafted with people's needs. Secondly, and more importantly, the Minister confirmed that David Freud will be here in person at some point, I think, in November.
4453. Ms M Campbell: He will be here on 27 or 28 November.
4454. The Chairperson: OK. I am not sure what guidance, if any, your Department has received on how to proceed on this. There will certainly be a difficulty for this Committee, because the Committee is due to report by Tuesday 27 November. It means that the issues of underoccupancy, and so on, will be difficult for us to deal with.
4455. Have you had any guidance? You said a minute ago that you did not think it would be possible to defer. The bullet points that the Committee Clerk has provided are a synopsis of points that have been put by various stakeholders. Have you been given any further guidance on what you may or may not be able to do about this issue in the context of the Minister's announcement that David Freud is coming here at the end of November? I see us as being in limbo until 27 November because, in theory, we will not be able to have a full deliberation. The Minister may well announce something later on, but I do not know what the outcome of that discussion will be. We are in a difficult position.
4456. Ms M Campbell: I appreciate that. We will try to get you some costs attached to each of those bullet points.
4457. Mr Pollock: We have probably already provided those in the formal responses.
- I can check that, but in the past couple of days, I have seen the figures that we have been attaching to non-implementation.
4458. The Chairperson: It is just that a moment ago you were saying that it would not be possible to do something, and you may be right, but we have had an announcement from the Minister that David Freud will be here to look at all this. Can you qualify whether you may not be able to do anything with it at the moment? I am looking for any guidance that you have. Under the current time frame, the Committee will have to make a decision by 27 November on what it thinks of the Bill as drafted and what it might look like.
4459. Mr Pollock: We provided figures on the numbers of households affected. Latterly, as I said, we have put a cost figure on those. There are some figures available.
4460. Ms M Campbell: The discretionary housing fund has been increased. Is that what you were talking about?
4461. Mr Pollock: No, the actual cost attached to it.
4462. Ms M Campbell: We will have that with us tomorrow, hopefully.
4463. The Chairperson: It is about not just the cost but the policy intent. The Bill provides for certain things. Stakeholders, including the Housing Executive, have given us counterarguments to that. The Minister has announced that the Department will have a look at that with David Freud in November.
4464. Are you coming here to argue for the provisions as they stand, without any guidance to say that you should hold off for a few weeks until you have had another look at it?
4465. Mr Pollock: No, there is guidance. There are some exemptions; for example, for families with disabled children.
4466. The Chairperson: That is in the Bill.
4467. Mr Pollock: That will be carried forward in the same way as the provision for

- overnight carers is. We need to spell all that out for you, but we will also spell out the costs attached.
4468. The Chairperson: I am just making the point that our deliberations, at some point before 27 November, have to come down to what we have in front of us. I am asking you for the record whether you are able — you are probably not — in light of the Minister's recent statement that he is going to look at some of this with David Freud in late November. Are you in a position to tell me to hold on to this for a while or to work on the clauses as they are because you have no guidance on whether we can change anything? I am presuming that that is your position.
4469. Mr Pollock: The policy intent, which we went over, is clear, in so far as it is not expected that benefits would be paid for an individual or a household to overoccupy a particular premises.
4470. The Chairperson: You do not know that.
4471. Mr Pollock: We know that that is the policy intent.
4472. The Chairperson: [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] — 28 November. You have no deviation from what is on the table?
4473. Mr Pollock: At the minute, no.
4474. The Chairperson: I do not expect you to, but I need it on the record.
4475. Mr F McCann: You have asked part of my question. I was a bit concerned when Martina said that it is not an option, because the facts remain that considerable numbers of people will not be able to move because of the property that they live in. One of the big issues that was raised was that, within the next two or three years, housing associations want 150 units to become available, and the figures range from 25,000 people to 30,000 people. I take it from what you are saying that, regardless of whether anything is going to be built, people are still going to be penalised.
4476. Ms M Campbell: No, that is not what I am saying. I am saying that the interdepartmental group, which includes relevant stakeholders, is looking at options. As far as I understand it, a pilot scheme in Lurgan is ongoing, and the group is looking at that model, as well as other options for mitigation, including the use of discretionary payments.
4477. Mr F McCann: My understanding is that the pilot scheme in Lurgan is a survey of people rather than an active scheme to find out what would happen. Secondly, by the very nature of discretionary payments, they are made over a short period, so people will be hit two years down the line rather than six months. Therefore, it is going to have an impact. I have spoken to people, and it seems that the increase in benefits will not meet the need that will be there for the number of people who could be impacted on by this right away. There is a direct impact, and people will be faced almost immediately with some severe problems.
4478. On the legacy of the conflict, I know that, in certain areas of Belfast, houses are lying empty. If people wanted to move into them or put their names down for them, the Department and the Housing Executive would be the first to say that they cannot move into them because they are designated as different. There are serious problems here that go far above what might exist elsewhere.
4479. Ms M Campbell: Yes, and that is why the Department has set up an interdepartmental group with key stakeholders to look at the matter. We will confirm all those points and the costs, but I take what the Chair has said about the Minister committing to discuss this further with Lord Freud and that we do not know the nature of those discussions or their possible outcome.
4480. Mr F McCann: Martina, you said that it was not an option. Last week, we had in some of the people whom you are talking about sitting on the key stakeholders' group, and the Council for the Homeless in particular was very opposed to what is going on here.

4481. The Chairperson: The point has been made.
4482. Mr F McCann: The point is that Martina said that it was not an option. All the stuff that comes after it seems to say that it will not have any impact on it at all.
4483. Ms M Campbell: Can I provide clarification? Anything that the Committee or Assembly chooses to do is an option within the legislative context, but there is a cost attached to it, and that has to be considered. The point that I was making was that some of these bullet points would, in all likelihood, be cost-prohibitive, but we will come back to you with costs for each of them. All of that is notwithstanding any discussions that the Minister has with Lord Freud on flexibilities around this issue.
4484. The Chairperson: The point that Fra is making is that we all have to work out and consider the implications of all of this.
4485. Ms M Campbell: Absolutely.
4486. The Chairperson: And take our decisions accordingly. We are still trying to clarify the final aspects of the Bill.
4487. The issue of foster carers was raised by a number of organisations in the context of underoccupancy. It seemed to be quite restrictive or problematic for people who are long-term foster carers but have a room for a child that is not currently being used. At the moment, that would be classified as underoccupancy. That seems difficult.
4488. Ms M Campbell: I appreciate that point. That is one of the considerations that are ongoing.
4489. The Chairperson: OK.
4490. Ms M Campbell: I move now to the shared accommodation rate. Again, just to clarify, the shared accommodation rate for under-35s is not in the Bill; it is already in place. Members will remember that when there was a debate on this, the costs attached to the shared accommodation rates were in the region of £9 million.
4491. Mr Pollock: It was about £10 million, I think.
4492. Ms M Campbell: However, that is not within the Bill.
4493. In terms of support for mortgage interest — Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.
4494. Mr Pollock: Again, that is probably — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] I think I mentioned previously — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] The jury is still out on that. We have not come to a decision — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.]
4495. Mr Brady: The issue around somebody getting a part-time job and losing their support — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] Surely, that flies in the face of the policy intent, which is to encourage people into work. Who is going to take a part-time job if it is going to cost them, because they are going to lose their mortgage interest? They probably would not be getting enough, if they are on the minimum wage, to pay the mortgage anyway. How does that square with the policy? I know that that is not — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] I am just raising the point. It seems that you have a policy intent in all of this to encourage people — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] — but then you come down to the nuts and bolts, and it actually discouraging people — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.]
4496. Mr Pollock: It is basically — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.]
4497. Ms M Campbell: Exempted accommodation or supported accommodation. That is paid through the Department of Health. As far as I am aware, it is demand-led. I am not sure what the issue is there.
4498. Mr F McCann: I appreciate that — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.]

4499. Mr Pollock: [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] — definition of social housing.
4500. Mr F McCann: No, what I am saying is that the problem with supported housing is that — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.]
4501. Ms M Campbell: Their housing costs are outside of universal credit. Therefore it does not apply, because it is paid from the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety. That is how I understand it.
4502. Mr F McCann: There is going to be — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] The question was raised last week by some of the disability action groups. They said that the difference existed because houses that had been paid for special adaptations by the Housing Executive, for the likes of chairlifts —
4503. Ms M Campbell: I get your point that in a lot of cases it would be nearly cost-prohibitive to move and make the same adaptations to another property. That is one of the issues in the mix of options for dealing with under-occupancy. In terms of those people in supported accommodation being affected by under-occupancy, we will confirm that position, but their housing costs are outside of universal credit.
4504. Mr Brady: Do you know whether there has been any discussion with the Department of Health? Supported housing is under Transforming Your Care for people with a disability and older people. The premise of ‘Transforming Your Care’ is to keep people at home in the community rather than having to go into acute hospital care. That will become a bigger issue because a lot of those people will presumably, because of the nature of their disability, be on benefits and, by definition, be claiming housing benefit. Has there been any discussion at this stage? The consultation period for Transforming Your Care finishes in December, and we will start to get detail from January as it rolls out. Has there been any discussion, because that will certainly have some impact on the issue of supported housing? One issue from stakeholders was that money for that should be ring-fenced. That will become a bigger and bigger issue and cannot be done in isolation. It needs to be addressed at this stage.
4505. Ms M Campbell: Yes, I appreciate that point. I am not aware of whether colleagues in housing have been having any of those conversations, but —
4506. Mr Brady: Far be it from me to suggest that they should, but it might be an idea.
4507. Ms M Campbell: Absolutely. I totally agree.
4508. Mr Brady: Thank you.
4509. The Chairperson: All right.
4510. Ms M Campbell: Moving on to clause 12, “Other particular needs or circumstances”. We have already discussed removal of the severe disability premium. The rates are not yet available. We hope that they will be available on 10 December in the autumn statement. The general thrust is that claimants in receipt of severe disability premium will have transitional protection for as long as that lasts. Couples will be able to claim a limited capability for work element. One member can claim that, and the other can claim a carer element. There are higher earnings disregards for disabled people. Finally, anyone in receipt of disability living allowance (DLA) is exempt from the benefit cap.
4511. The Chairperson: Martina, can I just take you back a wee second for clarification on the housing costs of run-ons and extended payments? Under the current —
4512. Ms M Campbell: I beg your pardon. For clarification, as far as we understand the position, there is no provision for run-ons under the new system. That comes back to the whole idea that work is going to pay and that the higher earnings disregards, etc, will enable the claimant to meet all their commitments.
4513. The Chairperson: OK, thank you.

4514. Ms M Campbell: Moving on to clause 14, "Claimant commitment". I discussed that earlier. Where one member of the couple refuses to sign the claimant commitment and the other is willing to sign it, there is no claim. That is the current position.
4515. Mr Brady: Just on that, can I just check with you. Under the guidelines, if one member of the couple does not sign, it would seem reasonable that the reason why that person has not signed may be that they have mental health problems that may not have been diagnosed. They may have had a particular run-in. I am only trying to think of reasons. It would be ridiculous for someone not to sign it if it would mean that they were not going to get any money.
4516. Ms M Campbell: That is why there will be a cooling-off period. Obviously, the other partner will try to highlight any such issues.
4517. Mr Brady: The difficulty with the cooling-off period is that it could run for two to four weeks, and they would not get any money.
4518. Ms M Campbell: No.
4519. Mr Brady: So, therein lies the difficulty. The reason why that person is not signing needs to be addressed. Is it just because they are an idiot or is it because they have particular reasons for not signing?
4520. Ms M Campbell: I have said that the claimant commitment will be drawn up in consultation with the claimant and will be tailored to their particular circumstances. Where there is a known mental illness, obviously that will be taken into account. Where there is an undiagnosed illness, I do not understand how a claimant adviser could possibly diagnose it if it is undiagnosed.
4521. Mr Brady: With respect, if you are a claimant adviser and deal with people on a regular basis — I did as an adviser, as did many other people here — there is, possibly, a way of finding out whether that person is doing it for a particular reason or whether they are just being bolshie about it and saying that it is the system and they are not —
4522. Ms M Campbell: Complying.
4523. Mr Brady: It goes back to the point that we have been making for a number of years —
4524. Ms M Campbell: It is common sense.
4525. Mr Brady: Training.
4526. Ms M Campbell: Absolutely; I agree.
4527. Mr Brady: Thanks.
4528. Mr Copeland: This is a very small point. Where a claimant has surrendered or given up their status as a claimant to someone, say, with a power of attorney, has any thought been given around who is entitled to say whether they should sign?
4529. Ms M Campbell: Whether they should be?
4530. Mr Copeland: Let us say, for example, that someone has a vested interest in keeping someone at home and they have power of attorney —
4531. Ms M Campbell: Right.
4532. Mr Copeland: Under this, you are saying that if the person who is the subject of the power of attorney wishes to do one particular thing and the person with the power of attorney refuses to sign the document, then that, effectively, deprives the person of the right to claim.
4533. Ms M Campbell: Yes. There is something covered under power of attorney, but I imagine that it is in the guidance, rather than in the Bill.
4534. Mr Copeland: The reason I ask is that I had a very specific case to do with power of attorney that took months to sort out.
4535. Ms M Campbell: Some consideration has been given to that, and I will try to dig out the correspondence with DWP.
4536. Mr Pollock: It would not be markedly different from what is already happening in practice.
4537. Ms M Campbell: Yes.

4538. Mr Copeland: It took about three months.

4539. The Chairperson: OK.

4540. Ms M Campbell: In a partnership approach to the claimant commitment, what we are saying at the outset is that one of the aims of universal credit is that it is a partnership between the claimant and the Government, and it is about setting out what is expected and what is reasonable. There is no right of appeal against what is in the claimant commitment, because it is felt that that should be drafted in consultation with the claimant; therefore, there should be very little debate around what is in it once the claimant signs it. However, there is, obviously, a right of appeal around any sanction that would be subsequently imposed if the claimant failed to comply.

4541. The Chairperson: OK, Martina. Thank you. That is the provision where, if someone does not sign a claim — a partner does not sign the commitment — then the whole claim falls.

4542. Ms M Campbell: The claim falls.

4543. The Chairperson: There is no provision for dealing with that beyond that?

4544. Ms M Campbell: No.

4545. The Chairperson: OK. Thank you.

4546. Ms M Campbell: No comment was made on clause 15, which is on the work-focused interview. Clause 16 is on work preparation. The Law Centre has raised issues around the need to reintroduce a work-focused health-related assessment for people with limited capability. I should advise the Committee that this is under consideration, so this may change. It is based on the fact that there has been a two-year suspension for employment support allowance (ESA) claimants. That lapsed in August, and DWP is considering the evidence gathered during this period. This will possibly change.

4547. The Chairperson: Thanks for that.

4548. Ms M Campbell: I totally accept the point about the work-search requirement that the policy intention is that the claimant should be available to search for work 35 hours a week. We all accept that proving that and doing that will be, I would suggest, very hard. That is where the guidance and an element of common sense comes in. As the legislation states, the claimant is expected to spend all their working hours looking for work.

4549. The Chairperson: Thank you.

4550. Ms M Campbell: I am not sure what the point was on work availability.

4551. Mr Pollock: It is to do with the lack of jobs.

4552. Ms M Campbell: As the Chair said, this is an Executive Bill. Benefits are intended to be there for people who are in need, but the overall aim is to get people and support people back into work. That is an Executive function as well, so welfare reform does not exist in a vacuum. It is a priority one commitment under the Programme for Government, and it ties in with the priority two commitment of the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment and the Department for Employment and Learning (DEL) — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] It is about the Executive working together — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] The time frame for that is set out in the regulations. I am not sure whether it is in the draft that is available. [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] As I said when I was speaking to that clause, there will be no change to the current system where lone parents with a child under the age of five will only be subject to a work-focused interview — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] Couples will obviously be able to nominate a responsible carer, so that person, for sake of argument the mother, will be able to restrict their availability for work to suit the childcare arrangements. [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] — programmes to help disabled people.

4553. Clause 22 deals with claimants subject to all work-related requirements. We have already discussed that regarding the EU workers being placed in that group, so I do not think — we have agreed to write and provide further clarification on that. Claimants who are in part-time work are currently, under tax credits, not expected to seek any other work on top of their part-time commitments. It is unclear how that will work in practice. When the claimant makes their claim they will obviously come in to discuss their current work arrangements and will sign a commitment saying what they will do to either increase their hours or get a better-paid job. However, obviously, we will take into account their obligations and limitations in getting those hours. Again, that will be covered in guidance.
4554. Somebody has suggested that the commitment is in consultation with the claimant and with reasonable regard to the circumstances. We do not believe that that needs to be on the face of the Bill. That is within guidance. It is what happens now, and we can certainly expand the explanatory memorandum on that point. That is not an issue.
4555. Clause 24 is about the definition of domestic violence. It encompasses other forms, such as emotional, psychological and financial. The definition will be the same as that used in the current JSA regs, so it covers all of those. DWP has made it known recently that it is extending that to cover those issues raised around hate crime and race stuff. That is not in the published regs, but it will be in the draft that comes to you early in the new year.
4556. That covers all those points, so we are on to clause 25, dealing with compliance and sanctions. There are sanctions in the current system, but these obviously strengthen the system. There are provisions in the Bill to introduce a stronger sanctions regime for the existing benefits. The sanctions will only be applied where people persistently and repeatedly do not comply with the requirements of their claimant commitment. It is certainly not the intention for people to be penalised on a whim. They will be given every opportunity to explain, and good cause and all of that will be taken into consideration. On the point about leaving people destitute, people who have been sanctioned will be able to apply for a hardship payment. Also, it is only their personal allowance that will be affected, not the rest of their award.
4557. I will ask Conrad to comment on the point about the double whammy where somebody, having been convicted of fraud and subject to a sentence, is then subject to a three-year sanction after they have come out.
4558. Regulations in GB suggest a period of five working days to establish good cause, but stakeholders believe that that is not enough time. That point is probably best covered in guidance, or we can put it in the explanatory memorandum. We accept that there will be cases, particularly if there is some medical or mental health reason, where it may take longer than five days. We suggest that it is better not to define the number of days, because that restricts you. We will look at that in the guidance.
4559. The Chairperson: OK.
4560. Mr Brady: On the hardship payments, you say that people will not be destitute because they can get a hardship payment, but that is recoverable. So when a person's benefit kicks in again, they will be paying back x amount a week, which means that they will be living below subsistence level and could be left destitute in the future.
4561. Obviously, the guidelines will designate how much is to be recovered. Historically, in the North, people on benefit have paid back proportionately more in overpayments and stuff like that than those in Britain. That kind of knocks the parity argument a wee bit. I am just wondering whether that will be considered. Presumably, hardship payments are there to get people over a bad period until their benefit comes in. Take, for instance, the social fund: in some cases, people were asked - to pay back huge amounts that were totally disproportionate to the amount of benefit they were getting.

4562. Ms M Campbell: The hardship payment will be recovered. The plan is to recover it in 12 equal installments, but obviously that will depend on the period of the sanction.
4563. Mr Brady: It will depend on the amount of hardship payment given.
4564. Ms M Campbell: Yes.
4565. Mr Brady: That could vary from person to person.
4566. Ms M Campbell: Yes.
4567. Mr Brady: I just wanted to clarify that.
4568. The Chairperson: Thank you. Sorry, Martina. Go ahead.
4569. Ms M Campbell: On the point about access to childcare, I think that we are on record, a number of times, as saying that we are not aware of any claimant being sanctioned for not having access to childcare. That will certainly be covered in the guidance. Again, as I have said before, there is protection there for lone parents and for members of couples to restrict their availability around their child's school hours. Is that fine?
4570. The Chairperson: Yes.
4571. Ms M Campbell: I will move on then to clause 27, which deals with other sanctions. As to whether hardship payments go back into a hardship fund, I should put it on record that there is no such thing as a hardship fund. That payment is demand-led.
4572. Paragraph 32 deals with the concurrent exercise of functions by the Department. I think that that has been covered. If DEL is dissolved before the Bill comes into place, the transfer of functions Order will pick up all those points and set out how the functions will be carried out.
4573. Delegation and contracting out is mainly for DEL, but I see that there are issues there about the personal independence payment (PIP). Any issue arising in connection with a contracted-out function is a contractual issue. It is not a legislative issue per se.
4574. The Chairperson: That is clause 30, and paragraph 33 of our document.
4575. We will adjourn now. There will be lunch at 12.30 pm.
4576. Ms M Campbell: So you want us back at 4.00 pm? That is fine.
4577. The Chairperson: Thanks very much.
- Committee suspended.*

On resuming —

4578. The Chairperson: We have reconvened for our scrutiny of the Welfare Reform Bill. I thank the officials for kindly being with us again this afternoon. Mark, this is for your benefit: Hansard has advised us that this morning's recording was quite poor due to interference from telephones. Therefore, I ask people to switch off mobile phones and other electronic devices.
4579. Martina, over to you. We got to clause 30.
4580. Ms M Campbell: I think that we had completed it.
4581. The Chairperson: I think so. A great deal of time was taken up by the first 30 clauses, which is understandable, given the nature of them. We have moved through some of the parts a bit more quickly. With members' and officials' indulgence, we should try to work through and get much, if not all, of this completed this afternoon. I do not think that we will go through every clause. Bear in mind that this is for clarification, for the most part, or further explanation. Can we proceed on the understanding that we will work through until people's heads drop?
4582. Ms M Campbell: Clause 31 is about supplementary regulation-making powers, and the query is about clarification on whether there is any further change around the issue of deprivation of capital. That clause power is actually more beneficial, because it is better and clearer for the claimant than the present position. It introduces specifics such as the capital can be used to reduce or to pay a debt. It includes reasonable spending, which would be day-to-day living expenses and, obviously, a requirement to look at everything together. That is spelt out further in clause 47 of the DWP published regulations, so I do not think that there is any issue.
4583. Mr Brady: There will be an infinite or a finite list in the guidelines, presumably, for what is reasonable spend. Years ago, it used to be holidays, cars and all sorts of miscellaneous stuff.
4584. Ms M Campbell: Yes. There are issues specified in the regulations, but it is then back to the guidance and our good friend common sense.
4585. Mr Brady: There is a certain discretion.
4586. Ms M Campbell: Yes. It leaves the claimant more scope. Probably taken into account is the fact that —
4587. Mr Brady: Depending on the decision-maker.
4588. Ms M Campbell: We are straying off the point, but there is an independent decision-making standards committee that scrutinises decisions. That report is published. We have a very high degree of accuracy in that regard.
4589. Mr Brady: I have no reason to think otherwise.
4590. Ms M Campbell: Clause 32 gives us powers to make regulations. It makes consequential amendments. That would pick up any amendments to primary legislation required by other Departments, for example, around passported benefits. There was an issue about the claimant commitment. I have clarified that already. Where one claimant is over pension age and the other is under, only the working-age person will be subject to a claimant commitment. Is any further clarification required?
4591. The Chairperson: No.
4592. Mr Durkan: While we are on this, I nearly raised the issue of mixed-age couples earlier in the very early clauses. It is around the passported benefits associated with pension credit. When there is a single household claim, how is it intended that the likes of the winter fuel payment will be processed?
4593. Ms M Campbell: Winter fuel payments will continue.
4594. Mr Durkan: To the individual or to the household?
4595. Mr Pollock: If you are an individual who is over pension age, you will get a certain amount under the winter fuel

- payment; if you are both over pension age and you live in the same household, it goes up.
4596. Ms M Campbell: There is also a couple rate.
4597. Mr Pollock: There is a couple rate as well.
4598. Ms M Campbell: Clause 33 provides powers to make supplementary and consequential amendments. With regard to the query on transitional protection and the cash top-up being eroded unless it is index-linked, if I understand the point that Citizens Advice is trying to make here, it is talking about the fact that benefits are up-rated by virtue of the consumer price index as opposed to the retail price index. That amendment is already in place. The consumer price index is considered to be more reflective of inflation rates.
4599. With regard to the cash top-up being eroded, I will give you an example. If the claimant is entitled to £100 under current benefits but is entitled to only £70 under universal credit, the claimant will get transitional protection of £30 for whatever time it takes during which he or she does not have a material change of circumstances. Therefore, when the universal credit payment is up-rated the following year, it will go up to, say, for the sake of argument, £75, to keep the numbers round, the claimant will still get £100. Therefore, the claimant is still £25 better off by virtue of his or her transitional protection. I am not sure that the point about the cash top-up being eroded by inflation really stacks up because the claimant is still better off. It is like a marked time thing.
4600. Mr Brady: Can I clarify that? There is transitional protection for those who are already on benefits. However, someone who comes onto benefits in the same circumstances will be £25 worse off.
4601. Ms M Campbell: In that example, yes. However, that person never had the £25.
4602. Mr Brady: I know that. However, they will be £25 worse off than someone else in exactly the same position.
4603. Ms M Campbell: Yes. However, that will always be the case in life.
4604. Mr Brady: Only if the change is made. It is an issue of equality. You could reasonably argue that although two couples are in exactly the same position, logically, under the same benefits system, one is £25 a week worse off. There is something inherently unfair about that.
4605. Ms M Campbell: They are not the same benefits because there are different rules.
4606. Mr Brady: However, it is the same “social security”.
4607. The Chairperson: There are rights and wrongs. The provision is that it is a transitional arrangement.
4608. Mr Brady: I understand that. I was just making the point that one couple will be much worse off than another.
4609. The Chairperson: I understand that.
4610. Mr F McCann: Earlier, the point was made about transitional payments that if there is any break in your benefit — that is, where people are mostly caught in it over time — you will lose the £25.
4611. Ms M Campbell: Yes.
4612. Mr F McCann: That is the point that I am making.
4613. The Chairperson: I understand that. That is clear. OK. Thank you.
4614. Ms M Campbell: Clause 34 deals with the abolition of benefits. It relates to reinstating the reduction in tax credits for childcare by 10% from 70% to 80%. As the Committee Clerk has pointed out, that is an excepted matter and is not for the Executive. Therefore even if there was a will to do that, we could not do it. However, the Executive could decide to do something outside social security, which is their prerogative. The estimated cost of reinstating the 10% is £17 million. That would give an average of £12 extra per claimant. If we were to do that, DWP would have to take a view on that, we think. The total cost of our meeting the 80% cost - is £117 million. In the last Employers for Childcare report, which I think was based on 2011 rates, Northern Ireland had the lowest average cost of childcare in the UK and the highest number of childcare tax credits claimed back. That is down to some of the work done by the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister and Playboard, Jacqueline O'Loughlin's group, and funding under Executive funds. When they go in to help organisations, they make it a condition that parents must claim child tax credits. That is one reason, along with our good advice service in pointing claimants towards tax credits.

4615. There were no comments on clauses 35 or 36.
4616. Clause 37 is "Migration to universal credit". As we said, the migration strategy is being developed, and no decisions have been taken about the stage at which claimants will migrate, whether all ESA or all JSA. None of that has been decided. The point was made on a number of occasions by Committee members about the transitional protections. We are aware of those concerns.
4617. Clause 38, "Capability for work or work-related activity", is about the work capability assessment for work-related activity, and about medical records being given primacy in a medical-based assessment. Medical evidence will be taken into account and given due consideration, but there are other factors to be considered. It is about what work the claimant is capable of doing, obviously taking into account fluctuating conditions.
4618. Mr F McCann: I do not want to distract the meeting, but I happened to listen to a debate in Westminster yesterday regarding work-related assessments and especially about Atos and the number of people who have died as a result of decisions that were made. It must concern officials and others that these people are maintaining those assessments when all that is happening around them. That concern has been continuously pushed by this Committee.
4619. Ms M Campbell: Yes, and it is a concern that is shared by the Minister and us.
4620. The Chairperson: OK, fair enough.
4621. Ms M Campbell: I think that was and/or "physical or mental condition". Mr Copeland asked for clarification that it included physical and mental. I think that I confirmed that when the issue was raised; it is in the regulations.
4622. Mr Brady: When we were talking about the primacy of medical evidence, it was not necessarily medical records. For DLA purposes for appeals here, medical records are made available with the permission of the claimant. That has never been the case for DLA appeals in England. It just seemed that it was better to have an overall picture of the medical condition. If you are being assessed primarily on a medical condition, which is what the assessment is all about — or what it is supposed to be about — you know that it is not because it is a tick-box exercise looking at what you can do rather than what you cannot do.
4623. The object of the primacy of medical evidence was if the decision-maker, who is a civil servant who is not medically qualified, would have that at hand as well as the tick-box exercise carried out by the assessor, which is useless in the sense that it has been accepted as being not fit for purpose. Therefore our argument was that if the decision-maker was making the decision, it would be an informed decision based on that particular person's medical condition. You have mentioned fluctuating conditions, which could be MS, bipolar disorder, or many other things. That medical evidence would be available to the decision-maker. The argument was that, at the moment, it is not available. Decisions are made, people are turned down, they then appeal, the medical evidence becomes available and they win their appeal. It is to cut out all that peripheral stuff. It just makes sense. It is a money-saving exercise as well, because, to get back to the taxpayer argument, it all comes out of the same pot. It is not necessarily about

- the medical records; it is about good, informed medical evidence that the decision-maker would have to hand. That would come along almost as an add-on at some stage later down the line.
4624. Ms M Campbell: It is a good point, and we will certainly feed it back.
4625. There is no comment on clause 39. Clause 40 deals with couples. That is when a relationship has broken down but the parties continue to share the house. There is no change on that; the position is as now. We all recognise that that is more and more common and that, because of negative equity and such, people cannot move out of their house. There is a great deal of commissioner case law already on that. All of that will be carried forward in the guidance.
4626. Clause 41 is just about interpretation, so there is no comment on it.
4627. Clause 42 deals with the pilot schemes, apparent differences between Northern Ireland and GB and the relevance of the results. When I looked at the stakeholder comments, I saw that the crux was about the direct payments on the demonstration projects that DWP is running, the direct payments to the landlord, the frequency of payment, the split payment, and the pathfinder. The pathfinder starting in GB in April will inform events in Northern Ireland, but that is really more about testing the IT, for example. We expect DWP to release the early findings from the demonstration projects any day now. There has been something on its website from 30 October, but I could not find a link, and my contact person was on leave, so I could not check it yesterday. As I said, there has been a press release on DWP's website on the demonstration projects from 30 October. We expect some learning reports to be published, and we will provide the Committee with them as soon as we get them. We take into account the learning from any pilots in GB, and we would have to build in local differences in infrastructure, etc.
4628. The Chairperson: The crux of the issue was that there are no such bespoke projects here.
4629. Ms M Campbell: There are no projects here.
4630. Mr Brady: That is the question that I was going to ask: why not? That was raised during the last mandate by one of Paul and Sammy's colleagues in the Social Development Committee. We are constantly told about parity and that what happens in London or Oxfordshire or wherever may have some relevance, but the argument is that prevailing conditions here are so much different. There does not seem to be any logic. The Department has not come up with any rationale, as far as I can see, for why there should not be one here.
4631. Ms Martina Campbell: As I tried to explain last time, it boils down to costs. Many of those pilots are expensive.
4632. Mr Pollock: There is also the issue of validation. It is about having statistically valid samples and ensuring that you have enough of a cohort to draw statistically valid conclusions.
4633. The Chairperson: We are getting into a discussion about this. The question was whether there is a bespoke project here, and the answer is no.
4634. Ms Campbell: No.
4635. The Chairperson: Therefore, you cannot really tell us much more about how to extrapolate that because you do not have enough of a cohort here to do a single project. How do you extrapolate it from somebody else's project? To my mind, the answer is no, you do not have a bespoke project. We can discuss whether it is a good or a bad idea later.
4636. Ms M Campbell: At the minute, we have no legislative cover. Therefore, in any event, the Bill will need to be in place and then the regulations will need to be brought forward in order to give you cover to do a project.
4637. Clause 43 is about the regulations. The Department was asked to clarify whether it anticipates providing different levels

- of support for housing costs in different areas, and, if so, on what basis will that be made. The current position is that local housing allowance rates are based on eight broad market rental areas. Each month, the Housing Executive monitors rent in an area and decides the local rate for that area. Therefore, there is no change on that really.
4638. The final one is about Assembly control for the various regulations. I have already submitted the timetable for when we expect to make the list of regulations and the different types of control attached to them. We have been alerted by the Examiner today of an error in our delegated powers memorandum around clauses 110 and 112, so we will take steps to rectify that.
4639. The Chairperson: Thanks for that, Martina.
4640. Ms M Campbell: That is my bit. I will pass over to Michael.
4641. Mr Pollock: Thank you, Chairman. Again, thanks to Martina, because she has ploughed much of the ground on the common issues with working-age benefits.
4642. Clause 45 deals with the claimant commitment for jobseeker's allowance. Members should note the Department's response. The unions are opposed. Citizens Advice wants the claimant commitment drawn up in consultation with the claimant. That is the case; it was always the intention to draw up the commitment in consultation with the claimant. There is nothing to suggest that it will be drawn up — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] — or anything like that. There is nothing much more to say about that. It is deemed to be an improvement on the existing jobseeker's agreement in so far as it spells out more clearly what is required of the claimant and what would be the result if someone did not comply with the requirements of the claimant commitment.
4643. Clause 46 deals with the different ways in which to conduct interviews. It is seen as a future-proofing exercise, in legislative terms, to allow the Department to conduct interviews of that nature by telephone or online. There are no immediate plans for anything like that at the outset. However, as I say, it is a future-proofing exercise in line with the Government's move towards conclusion through IT. Clause 47 deals with sanctions. Martina has covered the ground on the different levels of sanctions and clarified what is expected of an individual. The higher-level sanctions apply for misconduct, dismissal and those types of things. Individuals who are able to look or prepare for work should be required to do so as a condition of receiving benefit. So, it is not something that is deemed to be punitive, as such.
4644. Members should be aware that the sanctions regime has been deemed ineffective for some time. Therefore, irrespective of welfare reform, there were plans to review the sanctions regime to make it more effective. The different level of sanctions and the clarity on the claimant commitment are all part and parcel of that process.
4645. The Chairperson: OK.
4646. Mr Pollock: Clause 48 deals with the procedure for regulation-making powers. There are no comments on that, and the same applies to clause 49.
4647. We received stakeholder comments on clause 50 from Citizens Advice about work experience programmes. All those points have been well made. It wants to ensure that the client advisers are adequately trained on those programmes. We will provide quite a bit of clarification about what DEL and the employment service do to ensure that there is no job substitution and to ensure that employers take work experience placements seriously. Employment staff have a robust monitoring regime for any programme of work placement. That includes on-site visits to support the participant and to confirm that the placement is operating within the guidelines.
4648. The Chairperson: OK.

4649. Mr Pollock: Are there any questions on that?
4650. The Chairperson: I do not think so, so you can move on.
4651. Mr Pollock: Comments were made about the dual entitlement arrangements under clause 51, which could see a person sanctioned under not ESA but universal credit if they had dual entitlement. That is where an individual would be entitled to ESA of around £50, with a top-up of universal credit of £10 or £15. We are trying to bottom that out to what the sanction would refer to. However, if an individual were sanctioned for £20 and had a top-up of only £15 of universal credit, depending on why they were being sanctioned, such as being in breach of the universal credit rules and the JSA or ESA terms and conditions, logically, you would say that the amount comes out of both. However, we are going to bottom that out and come back to you on it.
4652. The Chairperson: Thank you.
4653. Mr Pollock: Clause 52 deals with ESA time limiting and is pretty controversial. For clarification, we talked about the prescribed number of days and the 365-day limit starting to run from when the claimant is notified of the change in regulations. This measure has been introduced in the rest of GB, and it has been in operation since April, I think.
4654. Ms M Campbell: Yes.
4655. Mr Pollock: People in the rest of GB were notified towards the end of November last year, I think, that time limiting was going to be applied to ESA contributory. So, in that way, there is nothing any different here. The agency has plans for a couple of mailshots to notify people about time limiting once the Bill goes through. The first of those might be in January after the Bill has completed its Assembly passage but before it receives Royal Assent. Depending on the IT, a further mailshot could be done later but before May, which is when the provisions kick in. Some serious costs are attached to not introducing those time-limiting measures. The overall programme for welfare reform has something like £36·5 million in 2013-14 earmarked for cost savings that would be made by introducing this measure. In 2014-15, that figure is £51 million, and it is £62·2 million in 2015-16. Those are the result of saving on costs that would be incurred where individuals are compensated by income-related employment and support allowance. So, there are serious issues and serious costs attached to this provision. Any increases in the length of the time limit would erode savings, so that is something that we have to think seriously about.
4656. Clause 53 is about further entitlement after time limiting. The stakeholder comments on the clause are about some of the people who are not affected by time limiting. In that respect, there are quite a few exemptions, such as people who are in the support group, and so forth. I do not have too much detail on the comments, but I will come back to you.
4657. Clause 54 deals with conditions relating to youth. We have some figures to clarify the savings that are attached to that measure and to the people who are part and parcel of the ESA youth cohort and who would not be affected by the change. At the moment, the figure that we have is that 90% will be affected, but the latest figures indicate that, of the 16- to 24-year old cohort, somewhere in the region of 96·9% would not be affected by ESA time limiting.
4658. Mr Brady: I was going to ask about the 10%, which has now been reduced to roughly 4%. What will be the difference? The whole idea of the severe disablement allowance and the incapacity in youth benefit was that they were for kids who would never be able to work in the normal sense, so the contribution conditions were waived. They are now going to be put into that employment pool, if you like. You are saying that 96% will go to income-based ESA. The conditions will not be waived for those people, because they will then have to qualify under the normal criteria

- for income-based ESA. What is the difference between those people and the ones who will not have to do that?
4659. Mr Pollock: It would obviously be considered on a case-by-case basis. Part of the philosophy has been that individuals have been condemned to a life on benefits — at least, that is what the Government are saying.
4660. Mr Brady: With respect, they are condemned to a life on benefits because of their conditions. It is not a lifestyle choice. That was the whole issue behind the severe disablement allowance. I am wondering about the policy intent of moving these people into the work-related area. Presumably, their conditions are not going to change overnight, and in most cases, they will still have the same conditions that they were born with. I suppose the question that I am trying to ask is: how bad will you have to be before you do not have to go into that work-related group? Has that been decided upon? Is that in the guidelines and regulations or whatever?
4661. That is just something that I wanted to flag up now because it is going to affect a large cohort of those young people.
4662. Mr Pollock: It is going to apply to all new claims. I do not have an answer to how we will differentiate between individual claims. I think that that is for —
4663. Mr Brady: I know. I understand that, because each case is going to be individual. I am just wondering about it in the general sense. It is a general intent, so some thought — or maybe lack of thought — has to have been put into how it is going to affect those young people. It was always accepted that there was a group of young people who, because of their condition, would not be able to work in the normal sense. Those people are going to be expected to go into an employment pool, if you like, where all that will have been taken away from them. That is really what I am saying. Obviously, it may be something that you have to come back to us with. However, I just wanted to flag it up.
4664. The Chairperson: All right. Thank you.
4665. Mr Pollock: Clause 55 deals with the claimant commitment for employment and support allowance. It mirrors what I said about JSA and what Martina said this morning about simplifying the process for universal credit.
4666. There are a couple of points relating to disability groups, which want assurances that proper support will be provided. We envisage that that would be the case. We would need to look at that to see what assurances we can give the Committee on the details of that. We will do that when we get back to you formally on all those issues
4667. The Chairperson: OK. Thank you for that.
4668. Mr Pollock: Clause 56 relates to work experience. Placements are to be included as part of the customer obligation. I think that we went over the work experience previously when we discussed its nature. It is voluntary in that sense. As such, no one will be press-ganged into it. I spoke earlier about the response from DEL on client advisers. DEL imposes quite an onerous regime on employers who participate in those sorts of employment schemes and work experience schemes, as it tries to ensure that the individual, as well as the employer, gains from it and that no one abuses the system. A fairly robust checking system is in place for that as well.
4669. The Chairperson: OK.
4670. Mr Pollock: Clause 57 relates to hardship payments. It introduces hardship payments under ESA, if I am thinking right, where previously they were not in place.
4671. The Chairperson: That was a part of the NIPSA presentation. Have you seen page 159 of the submission?
4672. Ms M Campbell: Our version uses slightly different page numbers, because we started to fill in the response.
4673. Mr Pollock: We started to fill in the blanks.
4674. The Chairperson: I am sorry about that.

4675. Mr Pollock: There was no hardship regime under ESA previously. Is that not right, Colm?
4676. Mr C McLaughlin: Yes.
4677. Mr Pollock: The claimant commitment and, I suppose, the potential for sanctions, essentially now affords the opportunity for someone who would be sanctioned under ESA to avail themselves of hardship arrangements.
4678. Mr Brady: Can I just ask whether that applies to both contributory and income-based ESA?
4679. Mr Pollock: I do not know, but I can find out.
4680. The Chairperson: OK. Thanks for that.
4681. Ms M Campbell: Another important point to note is that hardship payments are not recoverable for ESA claimants.
4682. The Chairperson: OK.
4683. Mr Pollock: Clause 58 deals with claimant responsibilities for employment and support allowance. Members should note that that clause relates to delegation and contracting out, and they may wish to view that clause in the context of their previous deliberations on the matter. I think that that is essentially —
4684. The Chairperson: Is that not a timing issue?
4685. Mr Pollock: I can only assume that the contracting out relates more to DWP in GB and the delivery of some particular aspects of its work. It relates to the privatisation of functions that are connected to work-focused interviews, and so forth. Again, there is absolutely no intention at the moment of doing that in Northern Ireland. So, it is a legislative future-proofing process.
4686. Mr Brady: As I said, we were told that in 2007, and three weeks later —
4687. Mr Pollock: I was not here in 2007.
4688. Mr Brady: No, I know. Forgive me for being sceptical.
4689. Mr Pollock: Earlier, when I was talking about alternative interview arrangements and such things, such as — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] I said that DEL adopts the philosophy that face-to-face contact is better in all those things. I cannot see anything happening on that in the near future. It is something that we, as civil servants, are also interested in.
4690. Clause 60 deals with claimant commitment for income support. There are no particular issues under that clause. I think that NIPSA raised the same types of issues about contracting out, and so forth.
4691. The Chairperson: I am sorry, Michael, you skipped clause 59.
4692. Mr Pollock: Is that the clause that deals with work experience?
4693. Ms M Campbell: No, it deals with lone parents' entitlement to income support. Is this the childcare issue?
4694. Mr Pollock: As Martina pointed out this morning, there has not been a raft of people who have been sanctioned because they have no childcare. We did have one blip, and a clutch of people were supposedly sanctioned for a lack of childcare, but we are investigating that. The overwhelming evidence is that decision-makers and everyone else look very sympathetically on anyone who cannot fit in work placements or whatever because of childcare responsibilities. There is flexibility in the legislation, and we envisage that that will be carried forward under any new arrangements.
4695. The Chairperson: OK. Fair enough.
4696. Mr Pollock: Where are we now?
4697. Ms M Campbell: Clause 60.
4698. The Chairperson: Is it not really clause 64?
4699. Ms M Campbell: No, we are on clause 60.
4700. The Chairperson: I do not think that there is anything under that clause. You can skip clauses 61, 62 and 63 and

- move to clause 64 in Part 3, which deals with industrial injuries benefit. You may not need to cover that.
4701. Mr Pollock: I do not think that I would particularly raise anything else about those clauses. I have looked through the material that you provided on clauses 60, 61, 62 and 63, but no particular issues have been raised.
4702. Mr Brady: Where industrial injuries are concerned, elements such as unforeseen aggravation will all go. Is that the case?
4703. Mr Pollock: Unforeseen aggravation?
4704. Mr Brady: If you were to suffer an accident, such as breaking your arm, and if, as a direct result, arthritis were to set in 10 years later, you can claim retrospectively. That is called unforeseen aggravation, as it could not have been foreseen at the time. From my reading, I understand that that will all go.
4705. Mr Pollock: I am not sure, Mickey. Colm, do you have any notion of that? Is that Jane's area?
4706. Mr C McLaughlin: It is Jane's area.
4707. Ms M Campbell: Yes. She is behind us.
4708. Mr Pollock: I do not know about that. Jane will join us now anyway. Does she want to come forward?
4709. Mr Brady: I asked that question only because I knew that Jane is looking forward to getting into the debate.
4710. Mr Pollock: You knew that she was chomping at the bit to get in.
4711. Ms M Campbell: We will have a quick changeover.
4712. Mr Pollock: Jane, do you know anything about industrial injuries?
4713. Ms Jane Corderoy (Department for Social Development): As I said previously, the changes on industrial injuries are largely technical to clarify legislation. Maurice, would you like to take that question?
4714. Mr Maurice Byrne (Department for Social Development): You asked about unforeseen aggravations, and that is a feature of the post-1948 scheme rather than the pre-1948 scheme. That will not change. The clauses will abolish only the — 4715. Mr Brady: When I read the Bill initially, it seemed to me that that was going to change. That is what I wanted to check.
4716. Mr M Byrne: No, the post-1948 scheme will not change in that respect.
4717. Mr Brady: There are changes on other accidents.
4718. Mr M Byrne: There are changes on industrial accidents, payments to under-18s and trainees. However, unforeseen aggravations will remain unchanged.
4719. Mr Brady: I just wanted to clarify that. Thank you.
4720. The Chairperson: We are nearly halfway there.
4721. Ms Corderoy: Do you want us to go through the queries in your table about industrial injuries? There are a couple. We could discuss the query about the reduced earnings allowance.
4722. The Chairperson: Yes.
4723. Ms Corderoy: As Maurice said, the reduced earnings allowance is a feature of the post-1948 scheme. It is not affected by the abolition of the pre-1948 scheme.
4724. We have come back to the Committee on a couple of queries that were raised the previous time. The first is whether bereavement benefit would still be paid under this clause. As I said previously, the clause will remove redundant legislation from the statute book. Industrial death benefit is payable only when the death occurred before 11 April 1988, so claims for deaths that occurred before that date are no longer being made. Deaths that occurred after that date are dealt with through bereavement benefit.

4725. There was also a question about what would happen if people were pursuing long-term cases for respiratory illness that were proved after the legislation has been commenced. When we looked at that, we felt that persons who found themselves in that position may have already received benefit for it.
4726. There was another question on clause 68 and the determinations.
4727. Mr M Byrne: That is to do with the — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] — of the declaration of death in industrial accidents and how evidence would be gathered. At the moment, claims can be made without a previous declaration for industrial accidents, and there does not seem to be a problem with them. Most employers are required to keep accident books, which is one source of information for the Department. Other than that —
4728. Mr Brady: I was thinking about experiences that I have had with claimants over the years. When an accident is not reported or recorded, difficulties are created. If a person then, for instance, makes a civil claim for injury, it becomes more difficult. It is really about enforcing that. Do they have to have accident books? Is it a legal requirement?
4729. Ms Corderoy: Yes.
4730. Mr M Byrne: Yes, it is a legal requirement to have an accident book. It is then about enforcing whether it is actually used. If a person is going on to make a claim and possibly a civil claim for damages, those are the important issues.
4731. Mr M Byrne: Depending on the severity of the accident, the Health and Safety Executive may be involved. So, there is another source.
4732. Mr Brady: That is where unforeseen aggravation came in. It may have seemed relatively innocuous at the time but became much more serious down the line.
4733. Ms Corderoy: Our discussion can go up to clause 68, so it is back to you for the clause on housing benefit.
4734. Mr Pollock: It is back to me for housing benefit? I missed that. We have been through quite a bit on housing benefit. Under-occupancy is the housing benefit measure that is particularly exercising everybody. As we said this morning, quite a bit of work is ongoing in trying to quantify the issues on under-occupancy. We have some facts and figures regarding the groups and numbers that would be affected, the number of people who would be exempt from the under-occupancy measure, and the cost attaching to some of the things that we mentioned, such as the schemes, pilots or trials that were ongoing with conversions and such. We will be providing those facts and figures to the Committee for clarification.
4735. An awful lot of work is being done on this issue, and, hopefully, we will be able to give you as much clarification as possible to inform the Committee's decisions and the discussion with Lord Freud before the end of the month. Is there anything in addition to that?
4736. Mr Brady: The issue of couples who live in the same house but separately came up earlier. That may have an impact on under-occupancy. I wonder whether two people who are occupying two bedrooms in a three-bedroomed house will impact on the Department's interpretation of under-occupancy. Will it influence one interpretation of one issue having a bearing on under-occupancy? Has that been factored in or thought about? Martina mentioned it, and she talked about negative equity and seemed very magnanimous about how that might be addressed. However, when it comes to under-occupancy, people are up against the cold, hard fact that they are going to have a house that the Department may say they do not need because they are not using two bedrooms, or whatever. So, it could well have an effect.
4737. Mr Pollock: I assume that it would be a case of taking all the evidence in the round. If the individuals were claiming

- as individuals, presumably why they were claiming as single people and not as a married couple would have been explored when the claim was made.
4738. Mr Brady: To finish, those decisions might have been made in isolation. A decision on under-occupancy may have been made for housing benefit and a decision on whether the couple is living together or separately may have been made for benefit purposes. There needs to be some coming together of the two —
4739. Mr Pollock: Certainly, everybody needs to be talking to one another.
4740. Mr Brady: It is not necessarily about joined-up government but joined-up administration in the Department. I just wanted to flag that up.
4741. Mr Pollock: That is a good enough point.
4742. Ms Corderoy: Clauses 70 to 73 —
4743. The Chairperson: I am sorry, Jane. Michael, you said that you are going to try to come back with some additional information on that. When we come to the clause-by-clause consideration, we will have to deal with what is in front of us. Any evidence that you provide will be quite pertinent. I know that you understand that, but I am just putting it on the record.
4744. Mr F McCann: I intended to raise some issues, but in light of the earlier questions, I take it that they will still be in the mix when Lord Freud comes over. I know that local housing allowance is set at the thirtieth percentile. If under-occupancy kicks in and quite a number of people have to seek other accommodation, the thirtieth percentile is at the lower end of the private-rented sector in which some of the accommodation is atrocious. I just want to make the point that people are being forced out of houses into what is probably the worst of living conditions. On top of that, they might have to pay a top-up after losing their housing benefit. Has the Department taken that into consideration?
4745. Mr Pollock: Yes. The Department has to factor in all the information that is available. The thirtieth percentile is not in this Bill. It is already on the statute books.
4746. Mr F McCann: It says it in front of us, Michael. I am raising it because it says it in relation to the local housing allowance.
4747. Mr Pollock: It is a factor in setting the local housing allowance, but that legislative change is already in and implemented. My Department is looking at the impact of all the housing benefit reforms in the round to try to assess the best way forward. Under-occupancy raises issues around the housing stock and segregated housing and all the things that we discussed this morning. So, all those factors are in the mix in that respect.
4748. Mr F McCann: The point that I am making is that, if the local housing allowance is set at the thirtieth percentile, it is usually in and around the lower end of the private rented market. If people lose their house through under-occupancy and falling into arrears and they apply for housing benefit to move on, they will only be paid enough to go into the group that falls into the thirtieth percentile. Therefore, they will be forced into the worst elements of the private housing sector.
4749. Mr Pollock: I know that that is a point. Part of the agenda as far as the housing benefit reforms and the spiralling costs of housing benefit in particular are concerned is to try to create some sense of fairness for the taxpayer, in so far as benefit recipients would not have access to a level of accommodation that, say, a low-income family would have access to. That has to enter into the overall consideration as well. The state of the accommodation is something different again.
4750. The Chairperson: From the Committee's point of view, evidence has been presented that there is very limited accommodation within that thirtieth percentile.

4751. Mr F McCann: Even the recent housing bulletin released by the Department showed an increase of 870 in the number of people presenting as homeless, and 40% of them were single males. That is a clear indication that what happened in and around the shared-room allowance is starting to bite. When we talk about percentiles, we are actually talking about people and about families.

4752. Mr Pollock: I understand that. None of that is lost on us.

4753. The Chairperson: Fair enough. Obviously that is a big issue and a big area of work.

4754. Ms Corderoy: Clauses 70 to 73 deal with the abolition of the discretionary part of the social fund. The majority of the stakeholders' comments relate to the replacement scheme, which is the new discretionary support scheme. Our colleagues are taking that forward with great urgency, and they are due to come up later this week, so they will be able to answer those questions.

4755. The Chairperson: We were supposed to — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.]

4756. The Committee Clerk: I remind the Committee that it took a briefing from the SSA on the social fund a few weeks ago, and we have a paper from it. I meant to put it in the tabled items folder, but we will have it for tomorrow's meeting just to remind members of the agency's intention in respect of developing that.

4757. Ms Corderoy: Maternity payments, funeral payments, cold weather payments and winter fuel payments are outside of all of that. They are just staying the same. They are not affected by those clauses.

4758. Mr Pollock: Clauses 74 and 75 deal with state pension credit. NIPSA had some comments:

“Amends the State Pension Credit Act (NI) 2002 but instead of Invalid Care Allowance being the measure of entitlement it has changed to a definition of ‘regular and substantial caring responsibilities’. This has yet to be defined”

4759. In response to that, we say that there will be a degree of discretion, which will be defined in the regulations and guidance. If the member giving the care is under pension age, they would have to claim carer's allowance, the same as it is now, to receive the additional carer's premium as they are not receiving a state pension. So, there is no overlapping benefit rule. If the member of the couple who is giving the care is over pension age, the new rule would apply.

4760. The Law Centre had a couple of issues about the clause appearing to extend entitlement to the additional amount of the guarantee credit beyond claimants receiving carer's allowance. It says that it is not clear what the extension would be as that is being left to the regulations. Again, that would be specified in the regulations, and a degree of discretion would be spelled out in the guidance.

4761. Mr Brady: The Bill talks about “regular and substantial caring responsibilities”. At the moment, I think that 35 hours is the minimum. It is possible that that may be changed, affecting people who are over pensionable age. Pension credit age is 60 at the moment, so people are still entitled to claim carer's allowance until pension age. Then, you have an underlying entitlement. Is that likely to change? I am a bit wary of the talk about changing the definition, which the Bill is essentially doing, and the talk of “regular and substantial caring responsibilities”. At the moment, 35 hours is the prescribed minimum. If, for instance, that was extended to maybe 40 or whatever hours, that would put people in a position where carers might, possibly for therapeutic purposes, want to take on part-time employment to have a balance between their caring responsibilities and doing something else. Will that be contained in the regulations?

4762. Mr Pollock: I do not know that, Mickey, at the minute, but it would be contained in the regulations and there would be

- more detail in the guidance. Certainly, we will try to check it out as much as possible for the clause-by-clause scrutiny. [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.]
4763. The Chairperson: We move to Part 4.
4764. Ms Corderoy: Anne had wanted to say a few words about some of the issues that had been raised in the stakeholder sessions, but she is not here. She has had to go to a meeting with the Minister. If it is OK, I will read a bit of what she had wanted to say.
4765. She wanted to emphasise that the personal independence payment assessment would be very different from the work capability assessment (WCA). The assessment for PIP will focus on the ability to carry out key everyday activities, the challenges people face and the support they need, rather than on the functions linked to a person's ability to work, as is the case with the work capability assessment. The work capability assessment looks at an individual's ability to work, whereas as the personal independence payment would be payable to disabled people regardless of whether they are in work. She wanted to say that ESA and PIP are very different benefits paid for very different reasons. That fact alone means that the assessments will be different. In most cases, the assessment for PIP will involve face-to-face consultation with an independent health professional. That will give customers the opportunity to explain how their health condition or impairment affects them on a daily basis. Customers will be encouraged to bring a family member, carer or advocate with them to the consultation if they wish. Where enough paper evidence is held to make a fair and accurate assessment without the need for face-to-face consultation, that will be done.
4766. The Department is seeking to learn from the experience of delivering the work capability assessment to ensure that we get the personal independence payment right from the start. As part of that, we are looking at the findings of the independent reviews of WCA carried out by Professor Harrington to ensure that, where appropriate, his recommendations are fully taken into account. The assessment will continue to be monitored to ensure that it reflects any further best practice arising from future recommendations that may be appropriate. Guidance will make it clear to the assessment provider that customers must feel that the assessment is a two-way conversation and that they have been genuinely listened to. We will have a monitoring regime in place to ensure that that type of service is delivered.
4767. The PIP assessment criteria have also been the subject of extensive consultation. All the consultations were issued here at the same time as the consultations in Britain, beginning in May 2011. The second draft of the assessment criteria document was published in November 2011 and a further supplement was issued in January 2012. The consultation closed earlier this year. The Minister and the Department continue to make representations to GB and DWP to make them fully aware of the particular circumstances that we are facing here and to ensure that they are factored into the design of the new benefit. That is important, given the differences, of which we are all aware in Northern Ireland, in the disability living allowance customer base, with its much higher proportion of mental health cases. Following the latest consultation exercise, the Minister wrote to DWP and secured a commitment from its Minister that all views and concerns expressed from Northern Ireland during the most recent consultation exercise would be given careful consideration as DWP evaluates what further changes need to be made to the personal independence payment assessment criteria to ensure that they are a fair reflection of disabled people's needs.
4768. Anne felt that it was important that that be put on the record, given some of the concerns that came back from the stakeholder evidence. People were seeing mistakes — I am sorry; I should

- not say that, being from the Department — seeing issues with the work capability assessment. [Laughter.]
4769. The Chairperson: You were right the first time.
4770. Ms Corderoy: We did not want to replicate them.
4771. The Chairperson: You will not be back tomorrow. You just lost two brownie points.
4772. Mr Copeland: I just wanted to check that the skills base of the healthcare professionals will be matched to the perceived primary disability condition of the claimant.
4773. Ms Corderoy: I understand that that is the intention.
4774. Mr Mickey Kelly (Department for Social Development): It is the intention that the provider will be asked to consider in certain circumstances who is best placed to do the face-to-face consultation when it arises. It may be a health professional from a specific profession or it may be a health professional with particular skills and expertise, for example, in mental health. Given the prevalence of mental health issues in Northern Ireland in the existing caseload, the provider will have to blend its resources to deal with the scenario.
4775. Mr Copeland: Is there any difference in the tender document that was issued in connection with PIP to reflect the need for more people, perhaps, in Northern Ireland who are skilled in mental health diagnosis and assessment?
4776. Mr M Kelly: I will confirm that for definite for you, but my understanding is that the contract would not have been specific. We were part of a national framework that was drawing down a contractor. The documentation would not have been specific; I think it would have mentioned that there is a higher proportion of mental health issues in Northern Ireland, but it would not have said, at that stage, that we needed more of a specific type. That will come during the discussions with the provider when we announce the successful bidder.
4777. Mr Copeland: So, the successful bidder, on the assumption that people who are qualified in mental health may be more expensive than others, will have to take a judgement, but your view is that anyone who has mental health issues should be seen by a skilled mental health professional.
4778. Mr M Kelly: For the record, I said that the provider will consider who is best placed to say. I cannot give you a categorical assurance that x will be seen by y. Those are the sorts of things that we will work through as part of the operation of the provider's contract to ensure that skills are best matched to the people, taking into account the particular circumstances here.
4779. Mr Brady: The fear is that the disaster that has happened in Britain with Atos will be replicated here. We have been told over the past couple of months that we are going to find out to whom the contract has been awarded, but it seems to be moving away from us all the time. Have you any idea about when that might happen?
4780. Mr M Kelly: I think we would probably expect to be able to announce the provider towards the end of this month.
4781. Mr Brady: I live in hope.
4782. The Chairperson: That is fair enough. You do not know the answer.
4783. Ms Corderoy: I hope that what I read out earlier answers those first three or four queries in your document. The assessment criteria have been extensively consulted on and disabled people and disabled people's organisations have been involved in designing those criteria. We have sent our analysis of the consultation responses to the Committee, and we have sent it to DWP. The Minister there has written to our Minister saying that it will take on the various points that have been raised in Northern Ireland, consider those and evaluate what further changes may need to be made to the assessment. We hope that that response to the consultation will be published next month.

4784. Mr M Kelly: I should add that a lot of the comments raised during the meetings with stakeholders were about the monitoring and performance within the contract. I know that people might have reservations, but the contract will include an annual review. It will include monthly performance reporting on service levels. Penalties are in place for scenarios in which thresholds are breached. Obviously, those penalties are commercial in confidence, but I want to put on record that there is a system in place through which the agency and the Department will be monitoring the providers' performance.
4785. Mr F McCann: You say that there will be monthly reviews. Have you the ability to change anything? Has that been built into the contract as well?
4786. Mr M Kelly: It may not be explicitly built into the contract, but there are penalties in place for underperformance and the breaching of thresholds. A number of thresholds have been set. The provider would, obviously, be given an opportunity to redress below par performances before we would, I imagine — I am not a commercial expert — move in with some sort of contract variation.
4787. Mr F McCann: When you say underperformance, it throws up all sorts of concerns.
4788. Mr M Kelly: I do not expect it, and we do not want it. That is not what we want to deliver, in any shape or form, for the people who are going to go through the assessment process. I am conscious and mindful of the concerns that members have about the current WCA and the performance of the provider. It is to set in context that there will be a vigorous performance management regime in place to ensure that the standards that we want are delivered.
4789. Ms Corderoy: The first bullet point in the paper asks that the severest cases be dealt with by a paper exercise. We can reassure the Committee that the legislation provides for that.
4790. The second bullet point recommends that the required waiting condition
- [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] We know that the qualifying period has changed from six months to three months. The combined effect — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] — definition of long-term disability for equality and disability legislation.
4791. Next one down is clause 86 to ensure — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] — subsequently released, or whose conviction is quashed. The withholding of that is nothing to do with the presumption of guilt or innocence. [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] Next is the mandatory requirement for independent advice. Obviously, people are entitled to independent advice through this.
4792. The Chairperson: That arose from a number of stakeholders — [Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.] — access to that as a right. That is what the monitoring requirement relates to.
4793. Mr M Kelly: I know that some members will be aware that the agency has developed a series of customer journeys for people who are claiming personal independence payments. We will intervene with people at a number of junctures. Whether that is perceived as being independent advice is another matter, but there will be a number of instances where we have conversations with customers.
4794. Mr F McCann: It would be interesting to find out how that works in practice.
4795. The Chairperson: It is a separate thing, but independent advice is outwith the Department. We will have to consider that as well.
4796. Mr Douglas: Chairman, are we putting a price on this? One of the agencies told us that its work is going to increase by at least 30%, and there have been cutbacks already. It is not just a matter of saying, "We will get you support." There has to be something to say that we are going to support this financially.
4797. The Chairperson: In fairness, the stakeholders are putting the case for - such statutory access to independent advice. In one sense, it is up to the Department to say it can work with that. It is also up to the people who are making the proposals to suggest how it might look to have them delivered. It is a two-way process. We do not have a model from the proposers of the idea, so we can invite them to suggest one if they wish. The key thing is whether the Department will be willing to embrace that. The detail of it could be a bit like the detail in the universal credit or housing benefit discussions elsewhere.

4798. Ms Corderoy: The next point is that DWP proposes that, after four weeks abroad, DLA and PIP should no longer be payable and entitlement should end unless the absence is for medical treatment, when the period of absence can be extended to a maximum of 26 weeks. The proposal for the temporary absence rule for PIP and DLA is to be brought into line with incapacity benefit and employment and support allowance. Around 75% of working-age claimants are also in receipt of incapacity benefits, including JSA. Those benefits will only allow an absence of four weeks abroad. Also, I think there is research that shows that those DLA recipients who are in work are unlikely to be able to take more than a four-week holiday abroad, but we have noted that comment and will take it back to the Minister.
4799. Mr McClarty: Are those four consecutive weeks or four cumulative weeks?
4800. Ms Corderoy: Consecutive.
4801. The next thing is to ensure that people of 65 or pensionable age who are in receipt of PIP continue to receive it, and they will do. That is exactly the same as DLA, and it will continue.
4802. The current rules allow people who have come off DLA to reclaim the benefit within two years if they need it again without having to requalify. The Government plan to limit that to one year for PIP. The Committee may wish to consider a proposal. Those are the current proposals, but we certainly noted that comment and the comments made by stakeholders.
4803. The next bullet point is:
- “Address concern that people held on remand (clause 86) and are not convicted do not lose motability component.”*
4804. That is the same as the provision for people who are in hospital. Payment will continue for the first 28 days of detention. As I said, the clause is not a reflection on perceived guilt or innocence; rather, it is a measure that aims to prevent duplication of provision. DLA and PIP are intended to contribute towards the extra costs associated with disability, and it is important to ensure that funding of those extra costs is not being duplicated. Disabled prisoners have their disability-related daily living and mobility needs met by the Prison Service or through healthcare provided by health and social care trusts. To pay PIP on top of that would be to duplicate public funding.
4805. Mr Brady: One of the criteria for people in residential accommodation was that the Motability component would be used for visits and that kind of thing. So, that will not happen for somebody on remand.
4806. Ms Corderoy: They will have it for the 28 days.
4807. Mr Brady: Yes, but after that they could be on remand for quite a long time. So, that is not going to happen.
4808. Ms Corderoy: The next bullet point is the recommendation:
- “the mobility component for adults is brought into line with the extended timeline provided for children under this clause”.*
4809. I think that the Equality Commission mentioned that.
4810. The Chairperson: It did, yes.
4811. Ms Corderoy: PIP is for working-age people only. It does not apply to those under 16. Extension to 12 weeks for children under 16 is a condition and recognition of the additional special needs they may have for support from - their parents while they are adjusting to hospital life. I think it is possibly linked to continuation of child benefit as well.

4812. Clause 88, “Report to the Assembly”, refers to making a report to the Assembly within two years.
4813. Mr M Kelly: To clarify for members, the Welfare Reform Act stipulated two years. The reason for that was to allow, I suppose, for the system to bed in and to allow a sufficient number of people to go through the assessment to get a feel for it. That was the rationale and thinking behind that. Because the assessment criteria are UK-wide in how they operate, if we thought about conducting a review earlier than that, it is unlikely that we would get any changes through until GB conducted its full review and necessitated changes to the overall criteria. There is consideration of a period of a year, but I am just not sure what the benefits of that would be at this particular juncture.
4814. Ms Corderoy: A couple of suggestions came through from stakeholders about what that review might include or look at.
4815. Mr M Kelly: In the context of what the review consists of, we are quite happy to work with customer representative groups. We work with them quite a lot on the PIP stuff that we are doing. We are quite happy to involve them in discussions about how the review would look.
4816. Mr Douglas: Are you saying that, in GB, the period is two years?
4817. Mr M Kelly: Yes. It was just a comment on the rationale for that and the impact of having an earlier review. We might not get any benefits from doing that.
4818. Ms Corderoy: The next bullet point is to do with “competent state”. I am trying to think of an easy way to say this. The EC regulation co-ordinates the social security schemes of member states and sets out in detail the persons and matters covered. The regulation applies directly to all member states and is open to interpretation by the European Commission and the Court of Justice of the European Union. Therefore, we feel that it would be inappropriate for domestic legislation to seek to expand or limit European law, which has a direct effect here, although we do provide guidance to decision-makers.
4819. There might be stuff that we can reassure people on. It was the cross-border aspect. If somebody is living here, we are obviously the competent state, but the query was about what happens if they are working over the border. I think that was the particular issue to do with the Republic. If they are working over the border and they are paying the equivalent of national insurance there, that would be the competent state for them, but they would be covered either way. We checked out the specific issue that somebody raised about somebody who gets paid DLA here but then takes a job in the South. That is exportable. They have already qualified for it here. I hope that is clear.
4820. The final point is:
“The Committee may wish to clarify that the definition of ‘care home’ under clause 84(3) and the reference to ‘personal care’ ... does not include establishments such as hostels where people might receive such services.”
4821. That is correct. It is the same as DLA, and there is no change to it. At the last meeting, you mentioned an issue to do with supported housing. It is not counted as a care home, so those people will still get their allowance.
4822. Mr Brady: That happened locally a few years ago. Praxis had supported housing, and the severe disability premium was taken off people because the Department argued that they did not need it because they were not living alone. That was sorted out. It was brought up under the same kind of argument because there is obviously a difference between a care home and a hostel. The Department has used that argument in the past.
4823. Ms Corderoy: It has been confirmed to us that, if recipients are not in a care home or hospital and receive domestic care in their own home or in rented

- accommodation, they will continue to receive payment of anything they are entitled to.
4824. The Chairperson: That has completed Part 4. We will now move on to Part 5.
4825. There was an argument or a suggestion from the stakeholders about adding to the list of potential exemptions. We will take your views on carer's allowance, widow's and bereavement benefits and contributory-based ESA.
4826. Mr Pollock: In respect of benefits, 620 households, which equates to less than 1% of claimants, were affected. People in receipt of working tax credits were exempted from the cap in the analysis. Therefore, that rules out the majority of in-work households. Some clarification is provided on what is included in the benefit cap: for example, bereavement benefit, care allowance, child benefit, and child tax. There will be a full list of everything that contributes to the benefit cap, and some commentary will be provided on the actual amounts there: for example, £350 for a single person with no children or if the children for whom you have responsibility do not live with you. There is clarification on when the benefit cap will not apply. That will be the case, for example, if you qualify for working tax credits or get any of the following benefits: DLA, which will be PIP from April next year; attendance allowance or industrial injury; ESA if paid with a support component; and war widows or war widowers pensions.
4827. There are quite a few comments from the various stakeholders. The Law Centre said that the clauses paved the way for the benefit cap and that regulations will set out how the cap will be calculated under universal credit. There is not terribly much more that I can say about that at present.
4828. The Chairperson: OK, thank you. We move on to clause 96.
4829. Mr Pollock: Clause 96 is supplementary to clause 95. Citizens Advice is concerned that the decision to apply the benefit cap relates to a particular award of benefit and may not be appealed
- should the cap be applied incorrectly. If the cap has been applied incorrectly, the claimant can challenge the decision. Therefore, any errors in the application of the cap can be corrected. The only aspect that cannot be appealed is the right to apply the benefit cap, which will be applied to all benefit claimants unless they fall into the categories listed under the exemptions in clause 95. The exempt categories are quite extensive, and they are listed in our formal response.
4830. Mr Brady: I assume that, where that cap has been applied incorrectly, those affected will be sent an assessment sheet detailing that. That is really how most people find out whether their benefit is correct or not.
4831. Mr Pollock: I would imagine so, particularly stating how much the various components are.
4832. Mr Brady: It is really the only way that people can find out. If one of those was exempted, that would be discoverable when going through the assessment sheet.
4833. The Chairperson: OK, we are happy enough to move on.
4834. Ms Corderoy: Clause 97 deals with claims and awards. There is a question about the context of default payments made by a secondary earner. I know that Martina answered that this morning. However, I suppose that we could say our bit, which is that a move to single monthly household payments will be a significant change for some, and an alternative payment arrangement may be needed. The Department has powers to split payments between members of a couple in joint claim cases. The regulations will provide that the Department may, in any particular case where it considers that it is in the interest of the claimant, their partner or any child in respect of whom universal credit is payable, arrange that universal credit payable in respect of joint claimants be split between the couple in such proportion as the Department sees fit.

4835. The Chairperson: OK.
4836. Ms Corderoy: Clause 98 deals with powers to require information relating to claims and awards. The Committee wanted to clarify whether the Department was clear about which Departments, agencies and service providers the clause might cover. As far as I understand, this is really for the verification of claims. The regulations are not finalised, but we have a list of those whom we think it likely to cover.
4837. Mr M Byrne: The clause deals with possible information requests from HMRC, landlords, childcare providers, and so on. It is just to substantiate information that has come forward already. However, until we see what is in the regulations, we cannot be definite about how exactly that clause will be applied.
4838. The Chairperson: Fair enough. Thank you.
4839. Ms Corderoy: Clause 99 relates to payments to joint claimants, and it was covered well enough this morning, too.
4840. Paragraph 76 in the Committee's paper relates to clause 100, which concerns payments on account. There was a question about whether the clause relates to legislation that will bring about the social fund's replacement. The answer is that it does not. The replacement social fund will be a Government amendment. As I said, colleagues from the agency who deal with that discretionary support will be here to speak to the Committee on Thursday.
4841. Clause 101 relates to the power to require consideration of revision before appeal. This is the mandatory reconsideration. The point of the clause is that too many disputes that could have been resolved earlier use the appeals service and so put additional pressure on it. In addition, as Committee members said this morning, it is stressful for appellants and costly to the Department. The reconsideration process is proposed to enable the earlier resolution of more disputes. It will allow a claimant's decision to appeal to be informed by whether reconsideration had provided them with clear justification and a clear explanation for the original decision. It will also enable new information or evidence, which may not have been available when the original decision was made, to be taken into account within the reconsideration. If that information were provided earlier, the dispute could be resolved earlier than would be the case when going through the whole appeals process.
4842. There is a suggested amendment in the Committee paper that relates to a claimant being left without income. We think that, in practice, it is relatively unlikely that someone would be left in that situation.
4843. The final suggested amendment concerns the application of a time limit. There are, as you know, operational time limits and targets that have to be met internally, and probably the most appropriate place for that would be in the guidance. We would not necessarily place time limits on the Department at this point.
4844. Mr M Byrne: There are time limits in place within which an appeal has to be made. I think that the current time limits will remain in the new system.
4845. Mr Brady: I just want some clarification: are you talking about a time limit for the Department to process an appeal or a time limit within which a claimant must appeal, which is 28 days?
4846. Mr M Byrne: Yes, or a month.
4847. Mr Brady: Is that also applied to the Department to ensure that an appeal is dealt with in a timely fashion?
4848. Mr M Byrne: From when the appeal is lodged to when it is heard by the appeals tribunal?
4849. Mr Brady: Yes.
4850. Mr M Byrne: There is no time limit on that.
4851. Mr Brady: That is what I want to confirm or clarify. The suggested amendment states:
"A time limit should be applied to the Department"

— not to the claimant —

“to ensure an appeal is dealt with in a timely fashion.”
